Saddam Hussein and his sons were so humbled by the example of the United States in abandoning its invasion at the last moment out of respect for the UN, that they ordered the termination of all Iraq's illegal weapons research programmes.

Then they converted to Christianity and used the power of the Holy Spirit to bring all the people they had killed back to life.

Most remarkably of all, a few months later, when Iran's secret nuclear programme was revealed, Saddam announced a new policy of "turning the other cheek" and ordered all former Iraqi nuclear scientists to be assigned to hydro-electric projects in the desert in order to "keep their minds away from their former wicked ways".

Thu, 02/05/2004 - 23:23 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

What Has The Grand Mufti Denounced?

Saudi Arabia's top Muslim cleric, Grand Mufti Sheik Abdul Aziz bin Abdullah al-Sheik, has denounced terrorism, declare the media triumphantly. But has he?

“Is it holy war to shed Muslim blood? Is it holy war to shed the blood of non-Muslims given sanctuary in Muslim lands? Is it holy war to destroy the possession of Muslims,” he said, adding that their actions gave enemies an excuse to criticise Muslim nations...

“Islam forbids all forms of injustice, killing without just cause, treachery ... hijacking of planes, boats and means of transportation. After all this, our religion is still described as terrorism?” he said.

What about shedding the blood of non-Muslims in non-Muslim lands? Is “sanctuary” the only status of non-Muslims in Muslim lands that protects them from having their blood legitimately spilled?

Do you need three guesses about whether he considers Tel Aviv to be “Muslim Land”?

The Grand Mufti's past rulings are hardly promising either. He has denounced women who go out in public and do business with men without dressing like a pillar box. He has participated in the suppression of those in the Saudi media who oppose Islamist incitement in Saudi schools and anyone else who calls for reform.

Just about the one group he has yet to denounce is the one that really is running his country at top speed towards the gates of hell.

Fri, 02/06/2004 - 23:04 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Who Is The Liar?

Hans Blix has said that Tony Blair was like an insincere salesman when he based his case for war on Weapons of Mass Destruction.

Mr Blix is getting very close to calling Tony Blair a liar. Like Mr Gilligan did – an allegation that was thoroughly refuted by the Hutton Inquiry. Unfortunately, Mr Blix's remarks are beyond Lord Hutton's remit, so let us review who has actually told the truth and who has not.

Tony Blair said that Iraq had programmes for making WMD:

In recent months, I have become increasingly alarmed by the evidence from inside Iraq that despite sanctions, despite the damage done to his capability in the past, despite the UN Security Council Resolutions expressly outlawing it, and despite his denials, Saddam Hussein is continuing to develop WMD and with them the ability to inflict real damage upon the region and the stability of the world.

David Kay and his team have discovered that Iraq had programmes for making WMD. So Mr Blair was telling the truth.

Hans Blix was instructed by the UN Security Council to investigate Iraq's WMD programmes and report his findings to them. He found, but did not report, that Saddam had a variety of rocket warheads apparently configured to scatter "bomblets" filled with biological or chemical agents. This was a blatant lie of omission.

Mr Blair, by contrast, told no lies.

Sun, 02/08/2004 - 22:31 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Truth and Lies

"This was a blatant lie of omission"

Intriguing thought, this. I must question it in search of truth. Does that say that if everyone says nothing, that everyone is committing a blatant lie of omission? Or if everyone qualifies everything they say, then is everyone telling the truth? No matter how confabulated?

Not taking sides here, for the rational reasons noted below. Not sure what to say about this, so i won't say Blair or Blix. I'll listen to both, taking each statement and weighing it on its merits, but not dwelling on it fixedly.

I tend to think rather than "told no lies" or "this was a blatant lie of omission", the key question is the search for larger truth. Trying ot look for that, rather than the search for who might be lying, comissionally or omissionally.

The search for truth also I would think involves intent to find it. I am less concerned with wording of a sentence, or lack of wording, then i am with the reality of what is.

The reason that I mention this is that it is all to easy to get caught up in sides, "who" said what, and "who" didn't say what, and "who" is telling the truth, and "who" is lying. Take every statement with a grain of salt, and assemble the best findings that we have to work with. Humans are fallible especially with words, and especially when the conclusion is drawn about the meaning of words after the fact of speaking them. If we pick apart sentence structure or pregnant pauses, we're dealing only in minutiae of two sides with allegiances or camps, justifying their own precise wordings, arguing a non-essential point or points in phrasing a sentence or two, well after the fact. Sometimes that entirely confabulates the essential issue.

Seeking truth. What is the reality of what is?

by a reader on Tue, 02/10/2004 - 16:34 | reply

Blix v. "everyone"

reader^a16:34,

You lost me somewhere in all that, but as regards your opening sentences, the difference between Blix not reporting banned items and "everyone" saying "nothing" in a general abstract situation, is that Blix was charged with a positive, specific task, while (lacking other information) "everyone" is not.

Blix's task involved at its very core verifying Iraq's compliance (or non-compliance) with UN Resolution 1441; this was the raison d'etre of Blix's responsibility, it's the only reason we even know his name in the first place. Given this responsibility, for him to "bury", even subtly, items which are wholly germane to the issue of Iraq's compliance or lack thereof (I would have mentioned the banned UAV Blix found rather than the "bomblets" thing, but very well), is indeed a "lie of omission". Unlike "everyone", Hans Blix had a positive responsibility to report such things.

The real problem of course is that Blix approached his job as if his responsibility was not to very Iraq's compliance or lack thereof with Resolution 1441 at all, but rather, to prevent a war between the US and Iraq. This was dishonesty of a rather different sort.

Blixa
blixa.blogspot.com

by a reader on Tue, 02/10/2004 - 20:18 | reply

Blurred Responsibility

It would help a lot if a person charged with a specific responsibility would stick to talking about what they are responsible for; too often, a limited authority and specific knowledge of one area is used to cast wide aspersions. This is where Blix goes wrong I think. If he has something specific to say about the inspection process in Iraq, that which he knows, fine. If he is using his stage as a bully pulpit to speak about foreign and domestic policy, that is neither his field of knowledge, nor can it even be a credible role for him.

Blix is no more credible to me than the average person on the street when it comes to spouting off about world politics. Tony Blair, on the other hand, is sticking to his area of responsibility, the office he was elected to, the office he holds, and the carefully considered weighty decisions of that office.

by a reader on Wed, 02/11/2004 - 00:12 | reply

Lies were necessary

Er - I don't see how your quote illustrates your point. In your quote, TB states:

"Saddam Hussein is continuing to develop WMD"

This is ambiguous. It could mean that he has WMD and is continuing to develop them or that he is just developing them. Reading the rest of the document we find statements like the following:

"As a result of the intelligence we judge that Iraq has:

1. Iraq has continued to produce chemical and biological agents;
2. Military plans for the use of chemical and biological weapons, including against its own Shia population. Some of these weapons are deployable within 45 minutes of an order to use them...."

It is clear, then, that Tony Blair is not referring to programmes in the sense of having plans to develop WMD, but not actually having WMD. Rather he thinks that Iraq has WMD and is continuing to develop them.

The US and British government had to lie about WMD in order to drum up enough support for the war among people that mattered (e.g., congress). The real reasons for the war were as follows:

1. To send a message to a post-911 world that belligerent dictatorships will no longer be tolerated.
2. To bring freedom and democracy to the people of Iraq.
3. To realise Iraq's full potential as an oil producer (this very important reason is not defended nearly enough by supporters of the war).

4. To secure military bases in the Middle East

5. To better ensure the flow of intelligence from the Middle East.

It would have been just too hard to sell all these (good) reasons for war. So, they were made secondary.

by a reader on Wed, 02/11/2004 - 04:12 | reply

had to lie

reader[@]4:12 writes,

*The US and British government had to lie about WMD in order to drum up enough support for the war among people that mattered (e.g., congress).*

The U.S. Congressional vote authorizing war against Iraq occurred in October 2002. Kindly point out which lies about WMD you think the U.S. government (British government is irrelevant here) to its Congress prior to that vote. Thanks,

Blixa
blixa.blogspot.com

by a reader on Wed, 02/11/2004 - 06:00 | reply

had to lie

Difficult to know where to begin.

Read this speech by George Bush given in early Oct 2002, prior to the Congressional vote:

<http://www.whitehouse.gov/news/releases/2002/10/20021007-8.html>

Here are some extracts:

"We've also discovered through intelligence that Iraq has a growing fleet of manned and unmanned aerial vehicles that could be used to disperse chemical or biological weapons across broad areas. We're concerned that Iraq is exploring ways of using these UAVS for missions targeting the United States."

The Director, Intelligence, Surveillance and Reconnaissance, US Air Force, did not agree with this view.

"We know that Iraq and al Qaeda have had high-level contacts that go back a decade. Some al Qaeda leaders who fled Afghanistan went to Iraq. These include one very senior al Qaeda leader who received medical treatment in Baghdad this year, and who has been associated with planning for chemical and biological attacks. We've learned that Iraq has trained al Qaeda members in bomb-making and poisons and deadly gases."

Intelligence agencies knew of tentative contacts between Saddam and al-Qaeda in the early 1990s, but found no proof of a continuing relationship.

"Saddam Hussein is harboring terrorists and the instruments of terror, the instruments of mass death and destruction."

"The evidence indicates that Iraq is reconstituting its nuclear weapons program. Saddam Hussein has held numerous meetings with Iraqi nuclear scientists, a group he calls his "nuclear mujahideen" -- his nuclear holy warriors. Satellite photographs reveal that Iraq is rebuilding facilities at sites that have been part of its nuclear program in the past. Iraq has attempted to purchase high-strength aluminum tubes and other equipment needed for gas centrifuges, which are used to enrich uranium for nuclear weapons."

CIA and UN reports up through 2002 showed no evidence of an Iraqi nuclear weapons program. And it was established at the time that the aluminium tubes could not be used to enrich uranium. Yet the lie that they could be was recirculated for months. There was no faulty intelligence here.

"If the Iraqi regime is able to produce, buy, or steal an amount of highly enriched uranium a little larger than a single softball, it could have a nuclear weapon in less than a year."

This is just scare-mongering.

"Knowing these realities, America must not ignore the threat gathering against us. Facing clear evidence of peril, we cannot wait for the final proof -- the smoking gun -- that could come in the form of a mushroom cloud."

Again, scaremongering that had no basis in fact.

"Before being barred from Iraq in 1998, the International Atomic Energy Agency dismantled extensive nuclear weapons-related facilities, including three uranium enrichment sites"

The inspectors were withdrawn - not barred - in 1998 when it became clear the Clinton administration was going to bomb Iraq.

BTW, don't throw the Oct NIE back at me in response. Or, if you do, please use the declassified version, and also read:

<http://www.ceip.org/files/pdf/Iraq3FullText.pdf>

by a reader on Thu, 02/12/2004 - 01:39 | reply

It's simple really...

From http://www.meib.org/articles/0311_iraq1.htm:

"The eradication of WMD was always an important part of the Administration's strategy, but it was (and is) far from being the whole. And this fact was never hidden, although the WMD piece was publicly much more prominent than were the larger, strategic elements. This was hardly surprising, since the Administration was trying to give potential allies (e.g., Germany, France) something they could endorse, and the destruction of Iraqi WMD was a far easier goal for the Europeans to support than a proposal for sheer US power projection would have been.

Still, the decision to be relatively coy about the strategic goals of Operation Iraqi Freedom carried a risk: If WMD were not found, there would be some explaining to do. When the decision to emphasize WMD was made, this risk seemed relatively low. In retrospect, it was not."

by a reader on Thu, 02/12/2004 - 21:43 | reply

the lie of omission was from ...

the lie of omission was from Blair or certainly from his ministers who knew the 45 minute claim did not threaten the UK as claimed in the media but only related to battlefield weapons.

Although since the 45 minute claim was itself found to be bogus then its moot.

In contrast Blix DID mention the so-called "bomblets" which may or may not have been intended to scatter weapons, many items are dual-use in that way and of course we have never found the chem/bio weapons we speculate that could deliver.

by a reader on Fri, 02/27/2004 - 13:14 | reply

“I Have tears In My Eyes”

This famous Vietnam war picture of a South Vietnamese officer summarily executing a Viet Cong prisoner – has a surprising story (via Solomon).

What moral follows from this? Context is everything? War is hell? Cameras do lie? The Americans were the good guys in Vietnam after all? The media, and their agenda, haven't changed much in 30 years? Not really. Nothing much follows from the fact that some human being has made a mistake. It's what human beings do. But all those morals are true nonetheless.

Wed, 02/11/2004 - 03:48 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Immoral Outrage

The pop singer Justin Timberlake tore off part of the black leather shirt of another pop singer, Janet Jackson, while they were performing together live on television (during the interval of a sporting event known as the 'Superbowl'), briefly exposing Jackson's curiously decorated right nipple. Some people seem to doubt the entertainers' explanation that this was a "wardrobe malfunction" and suspect that it was a carefully choreographed stunt...

"Immoral outrage" is what New Jersey's Star-Ledger rightly calls the widespread reaction to this event. But the Star-Ledger does not go far enough: it only condemns some aspects, such as the selectiveness of some people's outrage, the insincerity of others', and the increase in media censorship that has followed.

The truth that the Star-Ledger coyly skirts around is that everyone who was offended by witnessing this event is an immoral person. In fact, some of those who are perfectly sincere and consistent in their outrage are more immoral than some of the hypocrites who pander to them. Sincerity (as Robert Heinlein used to point out) is overrated as a virtue, and likewise hypocrisy is overrated as a vice. But in any case, all the complainers of every kind, jointly and severally, are a disgrace to our society, and to American society in particular.

Fri, 02/13/2004 - 09:25 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Holier

Than Thou News Flash.

For anyone who actually saw the "halftime show", it would more informative to call the interim performances between football ballet and commercials "a mediocre mish-mosh of flash and glam and rockets" than an "immoral outrage". Perhaps the flash that some people focused on, if they even saw an image, was a ripped bodice, all of two seconds at a great smoky glittering distance. Was that the only thing in 15 minutes of halftime performance fame that could attract an oft distracted human's attention?

Whether the entire show or two seconds of it was tasteless pandemonium or accidental theater is not the point. The point is audience reaction. The from-camera-1-to-the-tv-share-household, to the mental process going on behind the eye of the beholder exhibited itself as a knee-jerk reaction, "well I never....!"

Seeing an opportunity to exploit the numbers, shock and awe at a public sighting of a bared breast (partially), cheesy media responds in a blizzard of coverage. Pandering coverage. Is a ripped bodice and a nipple ring front page news? Apparently so. Which says something about what some people consider as important news.

Wasting (mostly feigned) outrage on the little things is occupying the distant recesses of more than several lower brains. We have a (moral) problem, Houston. Think.

by a reader on Fri, 02/13/2004 - 17:53 | reply

Further Explanation

I wish The World would elaborate about why those who were offended are immoral.

Gil

by Gil on Fri, 02/13/2004 - 18:17 | reply

being offended

... distinguishing carefully between being offended/outraged and feeling mildly nauseous (which is a natural enough reaction from the squeamish to seeing metal threaded through holes in other people's tender bits)

by a reader on Sat, 02/14/2004 - 10:45 | reply

Re: Further Explanation

Why are those people immoral? Well, they subscribe to a moral code which attributes rightness to a covered breast and wrongness to an uncovered one, a distinction which is in reality one of convention only. Admittedly conventions, once they exist, give rise to genuine moral issues: is not automatically OK to violate them under all circumstances. However, the same is true of taking offence at such violations. People to whom this particular violation constitutes a personal disaster are, even in cases where they never complain of it to anyone else, conducting their lives very wrongly. Of course it is in the nature of this sort of vice that such people do not in fact keep their outrage to themselves. They try their best to punish the perpetrators both through verbal abuse (which is immoral because the perpetrators do not deserve it) and, in practice, by helping to make or enforce unjust laws. But these outward signs of immorality are, as always, the consequences of previous morally wrong choices within the minds of individuals, choices which, even if they somehow failed to harm anyone else directly, would be bad for those individuals and would make them worse people.

by David Deutsch on Sat, 02/14/2004 - 13:47 | reply

Convention

Why is the difference between a covered and an uncovered breast merely convention and not a direct moral distinction?

Clearly, The World is leaving this as an exercise for the interested reader, so I'll have a go:

It's because, traditionally, adult-pairing relationships, to the extent that they are not concerned with shared creative interests, are coercive. Maintaining such a relationship is possible because the coercion is offset by bribery. The bribery is along the lines of "if you do all these unpleasant tasks then you get to have exclusive private access to my body". Such bribery is only effective because there exists a false meme (with moral implications) in the mind of the sugar-receiver. The coercion-bribery component in relationships has been tolerated because stable, permanent male-female pairings were considered absolutely necessary for the welfare of children. These days, given the existence of contraception and other stuff, the meme makes its holder a bad person. For example, the meme prevents one from forming close friendships with potential alternative sexual partners. This sacrifices valuable opportunities for knowledge growth. For example, two musicians may stop playing duets if they fear their intimate professional relationship is putting a marriage in danger.

Most people unconsciously recognise the meme to be false which is why divorce is now widely tolerated (badness is always inconsistent).

One of the ways that the meme is implanted in children is via the public nudity taboo. The degree of nudity, as we all know, shifts with time, and the boundary is exploited by celebs and film stars who wish to draw our attention. It also depends on context, for example, nudity in school biology textbooks is acceptable.

I'm pretty new to ARR theory so please criticise the above where wrong.

In the meantime, Happy Valentine's day, everyone!

[Arrghh! Forget I wrote that last bit please]

by Tom Robinson on Sat, 02/14/2004 - 20:42 | reply

i don't even know which day valentines day was tom,

you didn't answer your own question! you described why people are pissy about nudity. but your question was why is the difference btwn a covered and unconvered breast just convention (ie arbitrary) not fundamental or important.

the reason is clear if we try the question with some new subject material: Why is the difference between toys in a toy chest and toys in a bag a matter of convention and not a fundamental moral issue? sounds stupid now, huh?

ok you may counter covered breasts make sense to stay warm. this is true, and a real difference. however no one was worried that Janet was cold. so the outrage obviously wasn't about that. nothing else comes to mind, just like nothing comes to mind with bag vs chest.

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Sun, 02/15/2004 - 13:50 | reply

Where the boundary lies

You're right, I ought to have gone on to explain why the boundary of the convention, or part of it, currently happens to lie around the female nipple (in the West, at least)

I've posted my slightly lengthy answer over at TCSsociety, which will hopefully pass the moderators shortly.

<http://groups.yahoo.com/group/TCSsociety/>

by Tom Robinson on Tue, 02/17/2004 - 01:17 | reply

So, is Bush Immoral?

Is somebody who is outraged by gay marriage similarly immoral?

Gil

by Gil on Wed, 02/25/2004 - 06:47 | reply

Re: So, is Bush Immoral?

that facet of Bush is immoral. but the statement "Bush is immoral" would be inaccurate and misleading.

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 02/25/2004 - 16:10 | reply

Bush is Immoral

The World wrote "That everyone who was offended by witnessing this event is an immoral person." Not "That everyone who was offended by witnessing this event has an immoral facet." I think it was a reasonable usage. I don't think it means they are entirely immoral. I asked if he was similarly immoral.

I think he is.

Gil

by Gil on Wed, 02/25/2004 - 17:19 | reply

Re: Bush is immoral

Looking back at my previous comment in this thread, I see that President Bush's opposition to gay marriage is indeed in broadly the same category as some people's opposition to breast-baring. So he is immoral in the same sense as they are, but, I'd say, less so in degree.

In fact I would say much less so in degree if it weren't for one thing: there's a war on, and he's leading it. At a time like this, he should not be diverting his creativity and attention into a highly controversial social engineering project (his proposed constitutional amendment) that is not only wrong and ultimately doomed, but even aside from that, cannot be reasonably regarded as urgent.

by David Deutsch on Wed, 02/25/2004 - 18:48 | reply

la de da

the world was calling them immoral in context (the context being a discussion about a specific issue). saying someone is immoral in a discussion in a certain context is a much weaker statement than just calling someone immoral with no context. calling people who are offended by breasts immoral sans context would be a mistake, but i'm sure that's not what The World meant to do.

if being immoral in one facet made someone immoral generally then all we'd have to do is consider how good the angry people are as parents to condemn them, nevermind the whole incident about the breast.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 02/25/2004 - 21:42 | reply

Gulf War II Syndrome?

The Ministry of Defence is quite rightly planning to run physical and psychological tests on British soldiers who have served in recent wars, to try to ascertain whether they have suffered illness as a result. As the leader of the study commented:

“The immediate concerns are first, whether or not there will be a repeat of the kind of physical health problems experienced by Gulf One (1991 Gulf War) soldiers and, second, the increasing concerns about psychological issues,” study leader Simon Wessely told the paper on Sunday.

He is, of course, referring to Gulf War Syndrome, a distressing condition whose only scientifically established symptom is that the sufferer tends to attribute subsequent ailments to it. Fortunately, most Gulf War veterans did not catch Gulf War Syndrome. We hope that Gulf War II syndrome does not claim as many victims as its predecessor.

Mon, 02/16/2004 - 19:27 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Apparently, common symptoms o...

Apparently, common symptoms of GWS include fatigue, musculoskeletal pain, cognitive problems, skin rashes, and diarrhea. So at first it sounds like a run-of-the-mill vague pseudomedical condition, and a fine opportunity for litigation (as The World hints).

I wonder if anybody has considered that GWS may be due to a chronic activation of the so-called 'acute phase' of the body's immune response. In general, people who are depressed or anxious can become ill in this way. The most likely cause is a moral one. One has failed to perform a duty or has done something unforgettably shameful. I expect that war, which is obviously a dramatic event, provides plenty of scope for such failure. Dylan Evans thinks that the placebo effect operates by damping down the acute phase mentioned above. I recommend his book BTW, it's an exceptionally clear and interesting discussion. In it he breaks the taboo of linking physiological malfunction to beliefs. I wish he had made the final step of providing an evolutionary rationale for the fact that coercion stress impedes physical health. Humans are the only animals which think in order to thrive. They are vulnerable to bad memes, especially from members of the tribe who are closely related to them biologically. Therefore genes might viably exist which help to kill off those who cannot understand the world or who have acted badly by their own lights.

This might explain why Ayn Rand's character, John Galt, always enjoyed perfect health.

by Tom Robinson on Tue, 02/17/2004 - 02:22 | reply

John Galt

Since John Galt was a fictional superhero, he could not be otherwise. Ayn Rand made up for her alter-ego John by suffering some very strange and debilitating maladies and delusions. She never admitted any of these. It was the other guy who had problems.

by a reader on Tue, 02/17/2004 - 18:59 | reply

Who is John Galt?

Just kidding. :-)

Gil

by Gil on Thu, 02/19/2004 - 20:40 | reply

Immune system and GWS

Perhaps I should flesh out my earlier comment. Of the many soldiers who went out to the Gulf, a tiny minority did some things that made them ashamed. Perhaps someone became paralysed with fear just before action. Perhaps somebody else drove a jeep carelessly whilst tired and killed a friend. When they get back home they experience nightmares and regret. This triggers phase 1 of their immune systems (lethargy, fever, inflammation), whilst suppressing phase 2 (tailored antibody production). As a result they get ill more easily, catch viruses, lose motivation and generally feel physically bad. Then they hear about Gulf War Syndrome. They remember all the special injections they received in case of chemical attack. B follows A therefore A caused B and presto, their maladies are explained and the guilt is obscured and abated. Then a slightly larger minority, encouraged perhaps by counselors, accident lawyers, and the anti-war media, decide to try to cash in on GWS through litigation. After all, it's surely no worse than making a false insurance claim...

I could be quite wrong about this guess. I should also add that the majority of our armed forces are good, decent and honorable people that carry forward a great tradition. They have an awesome supply of common sense including a judgement of right and wrong that leaves most of our politicians, academics and journalists far behind.

by Tom Robinson on Thu, 02/19/2004 - 21:13 | reply

gulf war syndrome

you know fuck all about gulf war syndrome you stupid arse

by a reader on Thu, 09/30/2004 - 16:03 | reply

Such Brilliance (was gulf war syndrome)

'you know fuck all about gulf war syndrome you stupid arse'

Such wit! Such rhetorical flair! Sir, I take my hat off to you and concede that I have been totally wrong about Gulf War Syndrome. I prostrate myself before your supreme wisdom.

Alan

by Alan Forrester on Sun, 10/03/2004 - 02:01 | reply

re: brilliance

why feed the trolls?

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Sun, 10/03/2004 - 03:29 | reply

Rumour Of A Momentous Development In Iran

Mohammed Reza Khatami calls for abolishing Islamic republic in Iran, reports the Israeli newspaper Maariv.

Mohammed Reza Khatami, leader of the Islamic Iran Participation Front, Iran's largest pro-reform party, said today (Wednesday) in Teheran that the time was ripe for establishing a secular republic. This was reported by a western diplomatic source, and confirmed by Stratfor. Khatami is President Mohammed Khatami's younger brother. He is among the 80 incumbent members barred from running for re-election in Feb. 20 parliamentary elections by the Guardians Council.

Well, Maariv has not yet reported this as a fact, and nor has anyone else. It's only a rumour. Stratfor isn't always accurate, and nor are "western diplomatic sources". So maybe the story will dissipate. But if it pans out, it's a momentous development and, unlike previous important news from Iran, it will receive front-page treatment and intense analysis and be welcomed all over the media, right?

Thu, 02/19/2004 - 04:27 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Tonge Descends Further

The author H. G. Wells was a passionate socialist – a failing that caused some amusing inaccuracies in his science-fiction visions of the future, and more seriously, caused him forever to besmirch his reputation as a decent human being when he sided wholeheartedly with one of the greatest and cruellest evils of all time: He visited Stalin in 1934 and delivered this verdict:

“I have never met a man more candid, fair and honest, and to these qualities it is, and nothing occult and sinister, that he owes his tremendous undisputed ascendancy in Russia. I had thought before I saw him that he might be where he was because men were afraid of him but I realize that he owes his position to the fact that no one is afraid of him and everybody trusts him.”

The fact that this sort of betrayal of civilised values was common among Wells’ fellow intellectuals was one of the great catastrophes of the twentieth century. But few of them descended as deeply into the moral gutter as today’s Jenny Tonge, the Liberal Democrat Member of Parliament for Richmond Park.

We commented on Tonge recently, after she said that she might become a suicide bomber if she were Palestinian. Now she has gone further, displaying such fatuous trust in vicious killers that Wells would seem perceptive and honourable by comparison. On a recent visit to the West Bank, she met some terrorists who were proud of her. She claims to be ashamed of this (why? are they not doing what she said she would do in their position?) but then reports:

More re-assuring was the statement that they now accepted that Israel had a right to exist and their campaign would stop when Israel withdrew to its 1967 borders, removed settlements and returned Jerusalem to the Palestinians.

Should one weep in sorrow or laughter at the sheer naivety of this statement? The mass-murdering terrorists tell her they don't want to wipe Israel from the map and kill all its inhabitants, so obviously it must be true! But it is not true. She continues:

We visited the family of a suicide bomber. The stories of indoctrination of little children right through their schooldays didn't seem to apply here.

Perhaps she never bothered to visit a school or pick up a textbook or watch television during her visit. Her willingness to take a cynically sanitised propaganda tour at face value is disgusting abrogation of the values of openness and criticism. Shame on her.

So desperate is she to to rescue the sacred premises of the leftist drivel that consitutes her world-view that she will swallow any argument, no matter how ridiculous or counter-factual. Thus she argues that suicide bombing is a result of poverty:

I would challenge anyone to spend a few days here and see the contrasts between modern Israel and its affluent citizens and the third world of Palestine.

She will not let the fact that most Islamists are well off and educated and come from wealthy countries get in the way of her "righteous indignation".

She churns out every myth exculpating Palestinian terrorists as if it were Gospel, including the wicked remark that got her fired from her shadow-ministerial position in her party:

It is certainly true that suicide bombers are regarded as national heroes here, but what else do they have - born out of despair and the desire to resist occupation, laced with religious belief.

What else do they have? The Palestinians could choose as their heroes those trying to resist the terrorists. They could fight against terrorists rather than praise them. That is what every civilised person is urging them to do.

Footnote: Jerusalem cannot be "returned" to the Palestinians because they have never held sovereignty over the city. Arabs have not held it since 1250, and Jews have been the majority there since about 1850 – Editor.

Sat, 02/21/2004 - 19:25 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Israel and terrorists

"They could fight against terrorists rather than praise them. That is what every civilised person is urging them to do."
or they could elect terrorists as PM, Israel having been ruled by terrorists Menachem Begin and Yitzhak Shamir only 20 and 10 years ago

Begin bus bombing innocent civilians - 1 of many incidents

http://www.cdiss.org/terror_1940s.htm

Twenty Arabs, five Jews and two British soldiers killed and thirty wounded in Jewish terrorist bomb attacks on buses in Haifa and Ramleh, Palestine. British mandate to rule Palestine ends on 15 May 1948; state of Israel established.

December 29

Jewish Irgun terrorists throw grenades from passing taxi into cafe near the Damascus gate, Jerusalem, Palestine, killing eleven Arabs and two British policemen.

Shamir murdered the UN peace negotiator

<http://www.us-israel.org/jsource/History/folke.html>

The terrorists, wearing khaki shorts and peaked caps, left their jeep, found Bernadotte in the second car of the convoy and one man, later discovered to be Yehoshua Cohen, fired a Schmeisser automatic pistol into the car, spraying the interior with bullets and killing Seraut and then Bernadotte. The other LEHI members shot the tires of the rest of the convoy and all the terrorists escaped to the religious community of Sha'arei Pina where they hid with haredi (ultra-religious) LEHI sympathizers for a few days ... Yitzhak Shamir reputedly played a role in planning the assassination; however, he was never tried and went on to become Prime Minister of Israel.

by a reader on Thu, 02/26/2004 - 16:13 | reply

Israeli Terrorism

Jewish terrorism had an objective that was not lunatic, genocidal, racist nonsense, unlike the atrocities committed by Palestinian terrorists

<http://www.settingtheworldtorights.com/node.php?id=84>

by Alan Forrester on Fri, 02/27/2004 - 02:23 | reply

terror is terror

that is rubbish, terrorism is terrorism and you seem to be close to condoning it there.

what was the purpose of Begin's killers bombing a cafe full of civilians if not to murder innocents ? too much mayo in the bagels ?

the ultimate purpose was an Israeli annexation of land whose inhabitants were still 2/3 Pal arab even in 1947, if anything the Pal rationale for terror: to end illegal (under international law an dUN res 446) Israeli annexation of the remaining 22% of their homeland is MORE justifiable.

by a reader on Fri, 02/27/2004 - 09:14 | reply

Jewish Terrorism

Couple of points:

(1) Terrorism was only ever a minority thing among the Jews.

(2) The Irgun and the Stern Gang were deliberately dissolved and suppressed by the IDF very shortly after the War of Independence.

<http://www.settingtheworldtorights.com/node.php?id=86>

'When the United Nations envoy Count Folke Bernadotte proposed a new partition plan which, among other things, again did not assign Jerusalem to Israel, he was assassinated by Lehi. Ben-Gurion ordered: "Arrest all Stern Gang [Lehi] leaders. Surround all Stern bases. Confiscate all arms. Kill any who resist." Virtually all Lehi members were indeed arrested and Lehi ceased to exist.

'Ben-Gurion then demanded that the Irgun be dissolved. Any members of the Irgun who unconditionally handed over their weapons and joined the IDF, would receive amnesty for their previous crimes. Otherwise they would be treated as criminals. The Irgun, in a bitter statement in which they said that they evidently valued the lives of IDF soldiers more than the Israeli government did, complied, and its members joined the IDF.'

For more details see Martin Gilbert's book Israel.

by Alan Forrester on Sun, 02/29/2004 - 02:30 | reply

Alan, terrorism was such a "...

Alan,
terrorism was such a "minority thing" about Israelis that they elected 2 of the terror chiefs as Prime Minister.
exactly - Israelis only ceased terrorism once they got a state - maybe there's a clue to "solving" Palestinian terrorism. Or maybe it would have been better if the world hadn't given in to Israeli terror in the first place.

"virtually all Lehi members were arrested" - and none served any extensive time in jail - the terror chief Yitzhak Shamir never faced justice for his crimes. the killer who pulled the trigger on Bernadotte, Yehoshua Cohen, later became Ben-Gurion's personal bodyguard.

<http://www.adelaideinstitute.org/Beauty/bernadotte.htm>

by a reader on Mon, 03/01/2004 - 14:00 | reply

what should we do about it?

wow, now i see how awful the jews are. but as a new member of the anti-semite clique, i don't yet know all the pieces. specifically, you've convinced me how horrible the jews are, but have yet to tell me what we should do with them. could you please fill me in?

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 03/01/2004 - 20:56 | reply

Elliot, don't be so juvenil

Elliot,

don't be so juvenile !
did I say I thought Jews were horrible ?
I condemn terrorism, Palestinian and Israeli. strange how condemning Israeli terrorism and the election of Israeli terrorists gets you all excited yet you seemed perfectly happy at the claim that Palestinians "praise" terrorists.
that speaks volumes about you.

by a reader on Thu, 03/04/2004 - 12:27 | reply

Palestinians, Jews, and a recent poster

The Palestinians have two major national aims. They want to establish a state, and they want their state to replace Israel. Israel's national objective is to continue to exist as a free and democratic Jewish State. The first Palestinian national objective is in no conflict with the Zionist mission, but the second one is, as it calls for the destruction of the Jewish state. Israel is, understandably, only willing to cooperate with the creation of a Palestinian state if the state is not a step in a Palestinian attempt to destroy Israel.

Unfortunately, the Palestinians are only willing to cooperate with a two-state plan if it seems to allow them to continue moving towards their goal of Palestinian sovereignty in all of Israel's territory, including the section inside the green line. They are currently seeking, not peace, but favorable diplomatic agreements that facilitate both their legitimate and illegitimate national agenda. As Israel and her allies are now unwilling to cooperate with this, there have been no new agreements lately. The Palestinians have been fighting the war with their suicide bombers rather than trying to negotiate their way to victory.

It's certainly the case that a just peace will involve a two state solution -- but that is not possible until both sides genuinely want it. As such, Palestinian terrorists are undermining the legitimate effort to get the Palestinians a viable state, and should properly be regarded as traitors to the legitimate Palestinian cause. And yet, they are widely supported by the Palestinian people. This fact is worth mentioning, and it ought to tell us something about which national objective the Palestinians value more.

The pre-state Zionists were dealing with a completely different situation than the modern day Palestinian Arabs. They were dealing with Arabs who wanted them dead and gone, and a British authority that wanted to appease the Arabs more than it wanted to save the Jews from genocide. This was not a situation they could improve by agreeing to be peaceful and negotiate sovereignty. It was necessary to raise an army that could fight a war and win, in the face of an occupier that tried to prevent this. In these circumstances, everyone faced impossible choices, and some of the Zionists formed terrorist organizations and used unjust tactics for just causes. The mainstream Zionists did not approve of terror and tried to suppress it to some extent, but they were really not in a position to put down the terrorist organizations and win the war at the same time. They rightfully considered preserving their existence to be more important, and they later suppressed the terrorist organizations. Former members of these organizations joined the legitimate army and renounced terror at that point. They had the right aims all along, and they have now renounced the unjust means they once used. As such, there is no dishonor in electing them.

It is now no longer reasonable to describe surviving pre-state Zionist members of terrorist organizations as terrorists at all, as they now neither advocate nor practice terrorism. It is also quite unreasonable to draw parallels between modern Palestinian Arab terrorists and pre-state Zionist terrorists, as the former are acting to promote manifestly unjust aims and the latter were using unjust means in the cause of morally vital aims.

A recent poster has been arguing that Zionism and Palestinian nationalism are essentially morally equivalent, while suggesting that Zionism is perhaps a bit worse. This poster has argued on this thread that Israel's election of some former members of defunct pre-state Zionist terrorist organizations to political office is somehow morally equivalent to the Palestinians' current pursuit of terrorism as a means of destroying Israel. This person has made similarly ill-reasoned anti-Zionist claims on other threads, and has yet to offer any substantive reasonable criticisms of Israel. It seems reasonable to conclude that this poster believes that there is something inherently unjust about Zionism that makes it immoral regardless of the means it adopts. As the poster seems somewhat supportive of Palestinian nationalism, objecting only to some of their means, I am assuming the objection is not to national movements in general. So, given that the poster claims not to find Jews horrible, I'm left wondering what non-antisemitic objection this person has to the Zionist movement.

~Woty
<http://woty.davidsj.com>

by Woty on Thu, 03/04/2004 - 19:42 | reply

thanks for your post, woty.

thanks for your post, woty.

I'll believe that in fact many Palestinians do genuinely support a 2 state solution - whereas a large number of Israelis trot out their refusal to countenance a Pal state at, denying Palestine's right to exist with lines such as "there's never been a Pal state before", "Gaza and the WB are disputed not occupied", "Jordan is really the Pal state" etc etc.

Meanwhile the Israelis continue to seize more and more of the remaining 22% of Palestine in defiance of international law, UN res 446 and the road map - Israel rejected the road maps settlement freeze and when the Pals accepted it and went as far as getting a ceasefire which Sharon sabotaged by assassinating a string of Hamas/IJ leaders (on Aug 8 and 14th prior to the bus bomb on Aug 19th).

SO yes I think the Pals do have a just cause - their survival in any sort of Pal homeland.

meanwhile you argue that the Arabs in the 1940s wanted the Jews dead - there had been attacks of Pals on Jews of course though historical Arabs and Jews have got on better than say Jews and Europeans. Atrocities like the Hebron massacre against indigenous Jews were certainly not justified but they were provoked not by gut hate but by anger at the prospect of their land - in which Pals were still a 2/3 majority in 1948 - being annexed for an Israeli state against their wishes - the "just" cause you refer to. Israel is far the regional superpower, there is no threat to their existence from the Pals - while the US continues to unconditionally support an Israeli state bent on hoovering up the remains of the Pal land there will be no peace.

by a reader on Thu, 03/04/2004 - 21:05 | reply

just read some of your post i just read some of your post in a bit more detail

"that Israel's election of some former members of defunct pre-state Zionist terrorist organizations to political office " ahh - I like that ! you mean : Israel's election as prime minister of former terror chiefs - not just any old "members" or any old "political office"
I see from your website that you're not too bothered about Sharon sabotaging the ceasefire as Israel wasn't on ceasefire - no "supportive action" or withdrawal then as the road map calls it, no settlement freeze. no wonder I wonder if SHaron wants peace.

by a reader on Thu, 03/04/2004 - 21:16 | reply

Rethink your picture

If I am understanding "a reader" correctly, events in the Middle East need to be understood in the context of an expansionist state that is permeated with aggressive ideology. This state marches forth with its superior weaponry to crush its hapless neighbors. These neighbors, who lack any good options, find themselves in a war of survival and resistance against the iron grip of the martial state.

But this picture is problematic.

There does not exist any philosophical or ideological tradition among Jews and Zionists that would make these actions on this scale palatable to a majority of Israeli Jews. On the contrary, many Israeli Jews left such states in order to seek a socialistic utopia in peaceful co-existence with arab neighbors. Even rudimentary knowledge of Jewish and Zionist traditions renders it hugely implausible that the idea of territorial gain, at the expense of innocent civilians both Israeli and Palestinian, was ever on the ethnic or national agenda.

Israel is a Capitalist Democracy. Therefore, it would take a conspiracy theory of incredible intricacy in order to explain how Israel continuously elected "terrorists" who ripped apart the economy with their expansionist wars, killed scores of young Israelis, and caused constant disruptions in the daily life of a largely professional populace. On the other hand, if only a fringe group supports the government, how are they gaining such amazingly disproportionate power?

by Paco on Fri, 03/05/2004 - 07:08 | reply

well that Israel is progressi well that Israel is progressively annexing the remaining Palestinian land in the West Bank and Gaza is a matter of fact not a matter of speculation given the philosophical nature of the Jewish people. As it happens I'm a big admirer of Jews: particularly their steadfast loyalty to their cultural roots over millenia and their academic and entrepreneurial achievements in the face of oppression. I welcome your remarks as more evidence that the Israeli state and its actions are not supported by large numbers of Jewish people.

by a reader on Fri, 03/05/2004 - 08:49 | reply

The occupation

Countries that fight defensive wars are generally considered justified in annexing or occupying some enemy territory for the sake of avoiding having to fight the same war again.

The West Bank and Gaza were both captured in a defensive war. The West Bank is territory captured from Jordan. The Gaza Strip is territory captured from Egypt. Neither these nor any other territories have ever been part of a Palestinian state.

The closest thing to a State of Palestine that's existed in modern times is the British Mandate of Palestine. The largest portion of this territory is now Jordan.

Does the recent poster object to the existence and policies of the states of Jordan and Egypt, or just Israel? And does the recent poster want Israel to return the occupied West Bank to Jordan?

~Woty
<http://woty.davidsj.com>

by Woty on Fri, 03/05/2004 - 14:39 | reply

Explanation and fact

Although "a reader" believes his claims are born out by facts alone, I put it to him that his entire understanding of the Middle East situation is governed by explanations of those facts, involving theories of culpability, rather than the facts themselves. Therefore "a reader" ought to be compelled by an argument which makes the underpinnings of his/her explanatory structure highly implausible.

by a reader on Fri, 03/05/2004 - 17:56 | reply

The above post was by me, sor

The above post was by me, sorry.

by Paco on Fri, 03/05/2004 - 17:58 | reply

Terrorism is a relatively new concept

I don't think that terrorism by some Jews in 1947 should be excused just because their strategic intentions were good. I think it can be excused because

-6 million Jews had just been murdered, the horror and pain being sharp and raw

-The prospect existed of keeping a grip on a homeland which could offer sanctuary against possible future genocides. However, there was no guarantee, therefore the mood must have been truly desperate. Desperate people don't always think straight.

-The intentional mass killing of ordinary, innocent civilians for political or religious reasons wasn't widely understood to be an absolute and atrocious crime like it is now. (Many of today's crimes weren't crimes if you look far enough back in history. Even murder wasn't murder once if the guy killed was from another tribe.)

Whether this is correct or not, I don't see how hotel bombings in the late-1940s have much bearing on Israel 2004.

These days, there's no way on earth the Israelis would elect a terrorist as their leader. On the other hand, it seems unlikely that the Palestinians could avoid doing so, given the death cult.

by Tom Robinson on Sun, 03/07/2004 - 03:41 | reply

woty, "The West Bank and Gaz

woty,

"The West Bank and Gaza were both captured in a defensive war. " no they weren't - they were captured in 1967 as part of the war that started in 1947 when the Israelis seized 78% of Palestine (and Jordan is not part of Palestine, by the way) against the wishes of its 2/3 Pal Arab inhabitants: at the time Ben Gurion made it very clear that Israel wanted ALL of Palestine, hence the annexation of the WB/Gaza.

Tom,

" bombings in the late-1940s have much bearing on Israel 2004" because the terror chiefs became PM of Israel only 10 and 20 years ago - Shamir is still at large having never faced justice for his crimes.

and no, terror against anyone is not justified: maybe the Pals are desperate as the remains of their homeland are hoovered up. you discount the 1940 terror attacks and maybe in 50 years time you'll discount the current suicide bombings as inevitable acts of a people fighting for their homeland against the odds.

by a reader on Mon, 03/08/2004 - 11:26 | reply

tom,

i don't think jewish terrorism in 1947 should be excused. but it doesn't need to be. it was just a small minority. it didn't have the support of the jewish people in general. and in fact the jewish people put a stop to it.

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 03/08/2004 - 21:11 | reply

Who's a what now?

'no they weren't - they were captured in 1967 as part of the war that started in 1947 when the Israelis seized 78% of Palestine (and Jordan is not part of Palestine, by the way) against the wishes of its 2/3 Pal Arab inhabitants: at the time Ben Gurion made it very clear that Israel wanted ALL of Palestine, hence the annexation of the WB/Gaza.'

If the Israelis wanted to keep the West Bank and Gaza why did they offer to give it back immediately after the 1967 war in return for peace and recognition from the Arab states?

Also, in 1947, the Palestinian Arabs made no attempt to declare a state in the portion of the former UN mandate that was allotted to them. If they wanted a state back in 1947 why didn't they declare it?

Next, I am unaware of any quote by David Ben-Gurion to the effect that he wanted to annex the whole of the West Bank and Gaza. In fact, I am fairly sure there is no such quote. Could you provide such a quote, preferably with a reference?

Finally, why didn't the Arabs of whom you speak wish to participate in a democratic state with equal rights for all of its citizens like Israel? What kind of state did these Arabs want?

by Alan Forrester on Tue, 03/09/2004 - 03:17 | reply

Fighting for a homeland?

Elliot,

You're quite right. Rather than excusing the terrorist acts I really wanted to excuse those among the minority who committed them at that early time, and who were later elected to office (having renounced terrorism).

-- Tom

reader on 03/08/2004 - 11:26 GMT,

in 50 years time you'll discount the current suicide bombings as inevitable acts of a people fighting for their homeland against the odds

I doubt that very much. I believe in moral progress. Terrorism can no longer be confused with freedom fighting under any circumstances. Also, there never has been and never likely will be any kind of Palestinian holocaust. So you can't draw a parallel with my argument above, whether or not you agree with it.

I don't accept that the Palestinians are fighting for a homeland, or any land at all. They're blowing themselves up out of a kind of twisted religious hatred. If they had any sense, they would have seized the opportunity to become Israeli citizens while this was still possible. As Israeli citizens, they would have been more secure and more wealthy. They would have been free to buy and sell land. Furthermore, land would itself have been a relatively trivial issue, as it is within the West today. (If you add up the value of all assets in an advanced economy, land makes only a small percentage of the total).

If you listen to the Jenny Tong interview, you'll discover that Palestinians regularly go to Israeli hospitals for treatment. But if an ordinary Israeli took a walk in the West Bank, he could expect to be killed by a mob within an hour. There is no symmetry here.

The Israeli government is now building a wall. The Pals don't like it. However, they, and in particular, the suicide bombers and the death cult, are responsible for that wall. They could scarcely be more responsible if they mixed the concrete themselves.

Even if I adopted your premise that the Israelis have stolen land from the Palestinians (which I don't), it doesn't justify murder. You don't murder a thief, or murder your children by brainwashing them into suicide-bombing him. OTOH, seizing a murderer's assets, including some of his land, might well be a reasonable way of extracting reparation. It might also shock him and his brethren into turning away from crime and having a change of heart.

by Tom Robinson on Tue, 03/09/2004 - 06:59 | reply

Alan, why didn't the Pals de

Alan,
why didn't the Pals declare a state in 1947 ? because they had a bigger priority - opposing the occupation and ongoing expansion of invading Israelis whose sworn aim was to seize and expel the Palestinians from ALL of Palestine (Ben Gurion: in June 1938: "I support compulsory [Palestinian Arab population] transfer. I do not see in it anything immoral."
in 1947 "We feel we are entitled to Palestine as a whole," replied Ben-Gurion, "but we will be ready to consider the question of a Jewish state in an adequate area of Palestine."
<http://www.jpost.com/com/Archive/04.Dec.1997/Features/Article-2.html> previously in 1936 BG made it clear he wanted some of Palestine as a first step to getting the lot - in a letter to his son Amos at the time of the Peel plan).
given that I think liberating their homeland was more important than declaring a state.
Now of course : 50 + years later the Palestinians realise there is no possibility of liberating the 78% of Palestine that is now Israel. they accept a 2 state solution. so do I though I still think the 1947/8 ethnic cleansing was wrong.

do you ever disagree with those Israeli propagandists who deny Palestine's right to exist : who claim there is no such thing as Palestine and claim the WB/Gaza is "disputed" ?

"why didn't the Arabs of whom you speak wish to participate in a democratic state with equal rights for all of its citizens like Israel?" a bi-national state consisting of the current Israel and West Bank/ Gaza is one solution. Or if you mean why didn't the Pals in 1947 "participate" its because they were ethnically cleansed. For exactly the same reason that Israelis today oppose right of return the Israeli in 1947/8 drove out the Pals in a series of bloody massacres to ensure an adequate Jewish majority.

no Tom, "Terrorism can no longer be confused with freedom fighting under any circumstances" its not good enough to claim that terrorism was OK in the 1940s but its not now. Nor is it OK to claim that terrorism against Pals was justified by the holocaust given that the Palestinians did not participate in the Holocaust - if it had been Americans bombed by Israelis in reaction to the Holocaust I think you'd appreciate the faulty logic.

no, I didn't say that land theft justified murder - or that you could murder a thief (although the right to bear arms/ gun lobby might disagree with us there) - however thats easy for me to say since its not my land being stolen.

anyway isn't it Ariel Sharon who says land is worth innocent lives. He rejected the road map insisting on continuing the land grab and then sabotaged the Pal ceasefire assassinating a string of Hamas/IJ leaders on Aug 9/14th knowing this was bound to get a response and result on the deaths of innocent Israelis: hope that Pal land is worth it.

by a reader on Tue, 03/09/2004 - 08:52 | reply

Fabricating History

A reader wrote:

'why didn't the Pals declare a state in 1947 ? because they had a bigger priority - opposing the occupation and ongoing expansion of invading Israelis whose sworn aim was to seize and expel the Palestinians from ALL of Palestine (Ben Gurion: in June 1938:

"I support compulsory [Palestinian Arab population] transfer. I do not see in it anything immoral."

This quote is incomplete, the full quote reads:

'I saw in the Peel Plan two positive things: the idea of a state and the idea of compulsory transfer...I support compulsory transfer. I don't see in it anything immoral, but compulsory transfer can only be affected by England and not by the Jews...Not only is it incoercible for us to carry it out, but it is also inconceivable for us to propose it.'

So, to summarise, the British government proposed the Peel Plan in 1937 which included the idea of compulsory transfer and also cut down the Jewish state to an even smaller sliver of land than the UN awarded them. It was in the context of this reduction of Israel to a tiny fraction of the Palestine Mandate that the Zionists were reluctantly prepared to agree to such measures being undertaken by the British. Hence Woodhead Commission that consulted the Zionists said of the transfer idea: 'on behalf of the Jews it was made clear to us that Jewish opinion was opposed to the exercise of any degree of compulsion.'

Also, the surrounding Arab states invaded Israel in 1948 with the intention of killing or expelling all of the Jews and even before then sent in irregulars and terrorists to wage a campaign of mass murder against the Jews. Yet, somehow, the Jews managed to find the time to declare a state. So, again, why did the Palestinians not declare a state?

Overall, the content of your comment bears no relation to what actually happened. As Efraim Karsh has shown, many historians such as Benny Morris, Tom Segev and Avi Shlaim have deliberately and systematically distorted the historical record by selectively quoting from the contents of meetings in such a way as to completely change the meaning of the what was actually said. When they have not been able to find a way to distort a quote to say something bad, they have simply made it up.

<http://www.meforum.org/article/302>

'do you ever disagree with those Israeli propagandists who deny Palestine's right to exist : who claim ther is no such thing as Palestine and claim the WB/Gaza is "disputed" ?'

I would support the formation of a Palestinian state in the West Bank and Gaza with a democratic government determined to suppress terrorism. I would not support a Palestinian state run by terrorists and tyrants, I think both the Israelis and the Palestinians deserve better.

by Alan Forrester on Tue, 03/09/2004 - 19:11 | reply

Alan, your BG quote apart fr

Alan,
your BG quote apart from stating he regarded ethnic cleansing as positive merely seems to confirm he thought the 1/4 Jewish population at that time unable to drive out the Pals.
in fact BG supported the Peel plan seeing the allocated Jewish state as a bridgehead for taking ALL Of palestine by force Ben-Gurion was quite explicit, as illustrated in a 1937 letter to his son:
"A partial Jewish State is not the end, but only the beginning. The establishment of such a Jewish state will serve as a means in our historical efforts to redeem the country in its entirety. ...We shall organize a modern defense force ..and then I am certain that we will not be prevented from settling in other parts of the country, either by mutual agreement with our Arab neighbors or by some other means... We will expel the Arabs and take their places with the force at our disposal."

your claim that the arabs wanted to "kill or expel" all the Jews in 1948 is a common unsubstantiated claim despite the fact that as shown above the Israelis were the aggressors. the pals rejected partition allowing the Israelis a state from which to carry out their sworn intention of overrunning Palestine and expelling the indigenous Pals. the pals then lost the initial war and were in no position therefore to declare a state with 78% of their homeland occupied.

your Karsh link at a glance rejects Morris et al as you'd expect. It seems to mainly cite an old 1990 link by Teveth (BGs biographer) , "The Palestine Arab Refugee Problem and its Origins," Middle Eastern Studies, Vol. 26, No. 2Apr. 1990, pp. 214-49.

(actually its Palestinian not Palestine).

he quotes Morris as saying

"what happened in Palestine/Israel over 1947-9 was so complex and varied" as though that debunks the occurrence of ethnic cleansing.

I agree at least with your last para. given Sharons refusal to even freeze the expansion, never mind remove, of illegal settlements at the heart of the proposed Pal state how do you suggest this will happen ?

by a reader on Wed, 03/10/2004 - 09:18 | reply

Bored now

Sharon has said many times that he will make concessions in return for peace. The Israelis did in fact disassemble their settlements in Egyptian territory after their 1979 peace treaty, the same would happen in the West Bank and Gaza if the Islamonazis would stop killing Israelis. Your distortions and falsifications are tiresome, read:

<http://www.settingtheworldtorights.com/node.php?id=74>

<http://www.settingtheworldtorights.com/node.php?id=105>

<http://www.meforum.org/article/466>

<http://www.meforum.org/article/207>

Ben-Gurion not only never advocated ethnic cleansing, he explicitly stated he would never do such a thing:

'We do not wish, we do not need to expel Arabs and take their place...All our aspiration is built on the assumption... that there is enough room in the country for ourselves and the Arabs.'

by Alan Forrester on Fri, 03/12/2004 - 02:50 | reply

", the same would happen in t

", the same would happen in the West Bank and Gaza if the Islamonazis would stop killing Israelis." well that flies completely in the face of the facts and Sharon's own statements when he rejected the settlement freeze (a freeze mind you, not even dismantlement) proposed in both the Mitchell agreement and the Road Map claiming this would require "a pregnant woman to have an abortion just because she is a settler?" - its not known whether Sharon thought the continuing land grab of Palestinian land was forcing Palestinian women to have abortions or whether he was the slightest bit worried if they were.
http://news.bbc.co.uk/2/hi/middle_east/3020335.stm

Despite your claim that Sharon would support a Pal state and dismantle the settlements but for pal terrorism it is uncontested fact that Israel rejected the road map peace treaty whereas the Pals accepted it without reservation and obtained a ceasefire (despite the fact the RM was slanted towards Israel) Straight away Israel announced 14 reservations <http://www.us-israel.org/jsource/Peace/road1.html> basically refusing to meet any of its commitments. Sharon then rejected the road map on the 31st July announcing he'd continue his land grab of Pal land in defiance of the road map. <http://www.cbsnews.com/stories/2003/08/01/world/main566251.shtml> and http://news.bbc.co.uk/2/hi/middle_east/3115325.stm

if Bush has clamped down on Israeli violations like he said he would (he earlier said he'd "ride herd" to ensure Israel and the Pals met their commitments <http://www.jerusalemmites.org/news/english/jun2003/5a.htm>) then many Israelis and Pals would be alive today.

The IDF then assassinated a string of Hamas/IJ leaders on Aug 8 and 14 which provoked, as Sharon must have realised, the August 19 suicide bombing (which I regard as not justifiable but certainly inevitable given Sharon's actions) <http://in.news.yahoo.com/030808/137/26rqn.html> and http://www.unhchr.ch/Huridocda/Huridoca.nsf/\(Symbol\)/E.CN.4.2004.G.7.En?Opendocument/E.CN.4.2004.G.7.En?Opendocument) and <http://www.guardian.co.uk/israel/Story/0,2763,1018928,00.html>

And its ludicrous that you deny BGs support for ethnic cleansing when we have it from his own lips. Its also strange to me that the same people who refuse the Pals right of return on the grounds that it would endanger the demographic majority of Jews in Israel fail to see that the Israelis carried out, indeed needed to carry out in their view, ethnic cleansing in the 1940s on precisely the same grounds.

by a reader on Fri, 03/12/2004 - 10:43 | reply

Islamism, Lunatic Conspiracy Theories, And Death

Of course those evils go together like the heads of Cerberus. But here's a manifestation that we had not heard of before.

Polio is a terrible disease. It can kill; more often it cripples. Throughout history, the terror of recurrent polio epidemics used to be an abiding fact of life, and especially of parenthood – until it was all but eradicated by mass vaccination.

Occasionally, there are still outbreaks. These things happen. They are dealt with.

But sometimes they don't "just" happen. Sometimes they are not dealt with, and start to spread, and there's a reason for that. At present,

Nigeria accounts for almost half of all new polio cases and [the northern, Islamic province of] Kano is at the centre of the disease's resurgence.

Why? Because Kano hasn't allowed any polio vaccinations for months. Why? Because they defer to their holy men who, unfortunately, are barking mad:

Kano suspended immunisations last year, following reports by Muslim clerics that the vaccine was contaminated with an anti-fertility agent as part of a US plot to render Muslim women infertile.

[...]

A United Nations Children's Fund spokesman said any delay would result in the spread of the virus crippling more innocent children, both in Nigeria and neighbouring countries.

Polio has already radiated out from Kano to infect at least six west and central African states.

Conspiracy theories kill. And cripple.

Eco-Loony Feeding Frenzy In The Press

It's what they have been dreaming about for years now: the most extreme fears about environmental catastrophe being endorsed by an authority so close to the heart of the Establishment that even ~~sane people~~ supporters of the present Administration can't dismiss it as cranky. And so, for instance, The Guardian (whose sister publication The Observer apparently broke the story) thrashes about in ecstasy, hardly knowing which tasty morsel of doom and Bush-hatred to snap at first:

A secret report, suppressed by US defence chiefs and obtained by The Observer, warns that major European cities will be sunk beneath rising seas as Britain is plunged into a 'Siberian' climate by 2020. Nuclear conflict, mega-droughts, famine and widespread rioting will erupt across the world.

[...]

The findings will prove humiliating to the Bush administration, which has repeatedly denied that climate change even exists. Experts said that they will also make unsettling reading for a President who has insisted national defence is a priority.

Yes, savour that humiliation! Perhaps he'll even have to withdraw from Iraq and reinstate Saddam and apologise to the peace-loving peoples of the world and confiscate Halliburton's assets and [pant, pant...] And so on:

By 2007 violent storms smash coastal barriers rendering large parts of the Netherlands inhabitable. [Er... we think they mean uninhabitable. But then, since when has accuracy been an issue when writing loony scare stories? – Editor.] Cities like The Hague are abandoned. In California the delta island levees in the Sacramento river area are breached, disrupting the aqueduct system transporting water from north to south.

Well, let's get one thing out of the way first: these conclusions are junk. They are false. They are unsupported by science. They are made up. None of them is going to be borne out. You heard it here first, folks. Now, the more interesting question is, precisely what sort of howler has been made here, and by whom? It is perhaps remotely possible that 'The Pentagon' (whatever that means) really has taken this seriously. After all, part of their job is to investigate ridiculous possibilities before they suddenly turn real and bite us. It can happen. More likely, though, is a much simpler explanation: that the scenario described above is the premise, not the conclusion, of a report not intended to evaluate the science of climate change but something else, perhaps simply the Pentagon's own preparedness for an unexpected catastrophe. So they could just as well have used the "Martians attack" scenario. Just imagine what sort of reaction that would have produced in the gullible if it had been leaked. No, wait – we already know the answer to that one: the media would panic; ordinary people would not.

Update: Elegance Against Ignorance has an alternative explanation that seems quite plausible too.

Tue, 02/24/2004 - 14:19 | digg | del.icio.us | permlink

Heads I win -- tails you lose

So now both high and low temperatures are signs of impending catastrophe inflicted upon us by the wicked George W. Bush, spoiler of the Kyoto protocol.

The "precautionary principle," which counsels panic over claims of danger which are unproven, will seem nostalgic in a time of panic over claims of danger which are unfalsifiable.

by Alan Furman on Wed, 02/25/2004 - 10:19 | reply

Falsifiability and the Precautionary Principle

So now both high and low temperatures are signs of impending catastrophe inflicted upon us by the wicked George W. Bush, spoiler of the Kyoto protocol.

The "precautionary principle," which counsels panic over claims of danger which are unproven, will seem nostalgic in a time of panic over claims of danger which are unfalsifiable.

Claims made under the Precautionary Principle are also unfalsifiable. The PP claims that we should try to refute statements of the form 'X exists' where X is an adverse ecological effect and all such claims are unfalsifiable. If DDT has no bad effects on birds or humans, then it might have a bad effect on shellfish or whatever. As far as I know environmentalists have yet to condemn DDT for its bad effect on malarial mosquitoes, but it's bound to happen eventually.

Environmental organisations deliberately couch their claims in such a way that they can always manufacture new claims that disaster is imminent. I think there are two reasons. The first is that they desperately want to believe that disaster is imminent and thus that they are right to be anticapitalist. The second is that as long as they keep manufacturing new scares there are people who will take those claims at face value and give them money.

by Alan Forrester on Wed, 02/25/2004 - 13:57 | reply

Eye witness report from the Hague

I happen to live in the Hague and I can tell you it really is getting wet here, so this is not something to joke about. I'm glad at least I'm living on the third floor. Must not forget to buy a rubber boat tomorrow.

Also, I want to report one mistake here. In fact all the terrible floods all over the world the last few hundred years have been caused by the Netherlands. So the ~~environmental-apocalypse wishers/economic-apocalypse-makers~~ nice environmentalist have their facts backwards, I'm afraid. The Netherlands is not disappearing because the sea level is rising, but the sea level is rising because the Netherlands is still here.

Without those wicked dikes and dunes 25% of the Netherlands would be permanently below the water and 68% of the Netherlands would have regular floods. And we all know that when you go into a bath tub the water level rises cause your body pushes the water away. Well, that's just what happened here. Cause greedy Dutch capitalists pumped the water out of Holland so as to get more and more land, the water level of all the seas in the world have risen 12 meters, causing millions of deaths and poverty and malaria due to wetlands in the third world.

This is a terrible racist injustice which must be stopped immediately, but the problem is that the world court in the Hague is trying to implement world piece in Israel right now and they're afraid they might get wet if they do the right thing and remove those man made, and hence evil, water blocking objects. Don't they understand that a wall in the water is an even greater obstacle to justice than a wall on the land?

I do hope nobody finds out that the biggest multinational polluter and global warmer is mother nature herself in the form of vulcanos, spontaneous oil releases under the ocean, bush fires, bacteria, radioactivity and clouds - because I'm not sure about the consequences if Kyoto forbids all these things as well.

Oh, by the way, maybe the streets are wet right now because it rained. But the rain may well have been caused by Golf war environmental syndrome or something - the Pentagon should look into this.

Henry Sturman

by Henry Sturman on Thu, 02/26/2004 - 10:44 | reply

Even more worrying

Look at this Guardian report on Mars:

Or did a magnetic field that must once have protected

the planet fade, leaving it at the mercy of pitiless solar and stellar radiation that gradually dismantled molecules and stripped the atmosphere and seas a little at a time?

Imagine the consequences if this were to happen here! And yet the Bush Administration neglects to even consider this possibility, while Americans the world over are misusing precious magnetism to build hard disk drives and to stick notes to fridges. And what do these things have in common? Simple: holding information.

Save the Earth's magnetic field - down with information!

by Kevin on Thu, 02/26/2004 - 16:47 | reply

[Er... we think they mean uninhab...]

[Er... we think they mean uninhabitable.

no they meant inhabitable

<http://dictionary.reference.com/search?q=inhabitable> inhabitable

*In*hab"it*a*ble, a. [L. inhabibilis: cf. F. inhabitable. See In- not, and Habitable.] Not habitable; not suitable to be inhabited. [Obs.] The frozen ridges of the Alps Or other ground inhabitable. --Shak.*

More likely, though, is a much simpler explanation: that the scenario described above is the premise, not the conclusion, of a report not intended to evaluate the science of climate change but something else, perhaps simply the Pentagon's own preparedness for an unexpected catastrophe.

why don't you demand that this document is made public then we'd know wouldn't we and wouldn't have to sepculate

by a reader on Fri, 02/27/2004 - 14:53 | reply

It is news like this that keeps us from news.

The impending disaster meme combined with conspiracy theory meme combined with the news meme:

Do the power of memes multiply?

Is there a part of the human brain that craves regular doses of Fear and Suspicion?

Likely.

Pentagon Reveals Global Warming Investors Scheme; Beach Property For Sale at Bargain Prices as Millions Panic over Rising Tides.
Real News at 11!

by a reader on Fri, 02/27/2004 - 17:59 | reply

Re: [Er... we think they mean uninhab...]

No, the folks at The Guardian do not use Shakespearian English. They have trouble enough with present-day English.

As for the document, it has already been published.

by Editor on Fri, 02/27/2004 - 19:34 | reply

Scientific Integrity in Policymaking

Does anybody here have an opinion on this report from the Union of Concerned Scientists? Surely it merits discussion at least as much as the Guardian article?

by a reader on Tue, 03/02/2004 - 03:59 | reply

Re: Scientific Integrity in Policymaking

What is interesting is that now Bush appears to be saying he wants to improve the scientific objectivity of government.

Henry Sturman

by Henry Sturman on Tue, 03/02/2004 - 13:46 | reply

Yeah, Right

Maybe Bush says he wants to improve the scientific objectivity of government, but what he does is something else.

Gil

by Gil on Tue, 03/02/2004 - 16:44 | reply

Union of Concerned Scientists

There's a critique of them here:

http://www.activistcash.com/org_detail.cfm?ORG_ID=145

by Editor on Thu, 03/04/2004 - 00:03 | reply

Kevin wrote: 'Look at this

Kevin wrote:

'Look at this Guardian report on Mars:

'Or did a magnetic field that must once have protected the planet fade, leaving it at the mercy of pitiless solar and stellar radiation that gradually dismantled molecules and stripped the atmosphere and seas a little at a time?

'Imagine the consequences if this were to happen here! And yet the Bush Administration neglects to even consider this possibility, while Americans the world over are misusing precious magnetism to build hard disk drives and to stick notes to fridges. And what do these things have in common? Simple: holding information.

'Save the Earth's magnetic field - down with information!'

Ah, Kevin, you thought you were joking, but you were wrong.

However, this does highlight a serious and potentially devastating shortage, we are running short of ways to mock environmentalists because their views are already so ridiculous that satire is redundant.

by Alan Forrester on Tue, 03/09/2004 - 17:41 | reply

Copyright © 2007 Setting The World To Rights

Tonge Tongue-Lashed

Jenny Tonge, the Liberal Democrat MP and sympathiser with mass murderers (whom we have discussed before, here and here), was for some reason granted an interview by Dr. David Sangan of the Hadassah Hospital in Jerusalem. Tonge remained as clueless and spiteful as ever but Sangan is so good he could be an Israeli ambassador. It's worth listening to in full, but since the BBC may not archive its audio, we have transcribed a particularly good section of his comments:

I come from a family of Holocaust survivors. I have never known my grandmother, my grandfather – never: they were gassed in Auschwitz. My father brought me up. With forty years of being alone in the world, he has nobody from his family. Never ever had he persuaded me or said to me 'listen, go and suicide in a supermarket in Frankfurt with the Germans'. His parents were gassed! We didn't gas the Palestinians. We didn't – we don't kill them deliberately. We don't kill citizens. Yes, there's some problems with the roadblocks and yes there's problems with getting their salaries, their income, but nobody really has hunger there. I treat the Palestinians here. I treat all the Palestinians from the West Bank, from Jenin, from Ramallah, from Hebron. They come to me. You see nobody has hunger. You are talking about people that six million of them have been gassed and nobody from all their descendants went into suicide in the German supermarkets!

Not only have Germans not lived in fear of Jewish suicide bombers following the Holocaust, but today, Palestinians fear the Israelis so little that they are eager to go and get medical treatment from them. So much for the evil Zionists.

Sat, 02/28/2004 - 16:21 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

What's New?

What I find amazing is that the facts here are all well known.

And yet, so many people have so much trouble processing them morally.

Gil

by Gil on Sat, 02/28/2004 - 23:38 | reply

Morality and Facts

'What I find amazing is that the facts here are all well known.

'And yet, so many people have so much trouble processing them morally.'

Well, their view of the facts is more strongly influenced by their view of the moral of the situation than vice versa. Specifically, their moral ideas are usually so tangled up in the notion that particular groups are good or bad, and that in turn is usually tied up with what they think of as fundamental moral principles, that they can't divorce themselves from that idea without doing severe violence to their worldview. As such, many of them will not change unless offered a better alternative worldview. some of them won't even change then.

by Alan Forrester on Sun, 02/29/2004 - 03:05 | reply

well Sangan is just factually well Sangan is just factually wrong: the allies DID bomb civilians in WW2, you may say that it was necessary to win the war and end Nazi atrocities (and maybe Pals say the same about their search for state and though I would disagree I can't see anything other than force ending the Israeli land grab) obviously the bombing of German civilians wasn't by Jews in particular and weren't "suicide" attacks but I can't see that that is important.

by a reader on Thu, 03/04/2004 - 12:48 | reply

Factually Wrong?

Which facts were wrong?

He wasn't talking about the Allies; he was talking about the Jews, and Israelis. He was pointing out that they don't target civilians as a matter of policy, in contrast to the Palistinians. This is true and important. It's sad that you can't see that that is important.

Gil

by Gil on Fri, 03/05/2004 - 02:45 | reply

well he was very selective in well he was very selective in his facts then wasn't he ?

Jews may not have have authorised the attacks on German civilians in WW2 but do they support or condemn them as a valid means of fighting that war ?

and to claim that Israelis don't target civilians is also wrong : from the terror attacks of the 1940's to the more recent attack on the UN base at Qana and the demolition of a Gazan tenement block Israelis have deliberately attacked civilians.

by a reader on Fri, 03/05/2004 - 08:44 | reply

Targeting civilians

Consider the following situation:

You are in a crowded area, with your children, and for some reason a terrorist is trying to shoot you. You are armed, and you can shoot the terrorist, but the crowd density is such that you will almost certainly harm bystanders.

If you shoot in this situation, is it your or the terrorist who is intentionally targeting civilians?

~Woty
<http://woty.davidsj.com>

by Woty on Fri, 03/05/2004 - 14:29 | reply

red herring

irrelevant, that wasn't the case when the IDF flattened a Gazan tenement block , or at Qana, or when Menachem Begin's terrorists bombed buses and cafes in the 1940's - its a complete red herring.

by a reader on Mon, 03/08/2004 - 09:48 | reply

Evil at heart of Palestinian society

Leave the red herrings alone. We can only hope that one day the hatred and calls to murder ,made by Immams in mosques in The west bank and Gazza during friday night prayers will end when the free and life loving Palestinians fight to reverse the immense moral depravity which is rife and ravages Palestinian society today. Palestinian society has busily indoctrinated their own children by glorifying child suicide bombers in their high school text books. Footage of children aged 5-7 years old interviewed on palestinian TV aspiring to be suicide bombers is well documented. Suicide bombers are heroes on the Palestinian streets in Gazza and the west bank as their posters can be seen on every street corner.

When it comes to evaluating moral standards, the Palestinians haven't got a leg to stand on. And neither do scores of suicide bombing victims who've had their limbs blown off in these attacks, which Palestinian society is so proud of.

by a reader on Sun, 08/21/2005 - 10:07 | reply

Jeanie Kennedy's Description of Daniel Pipes's Talk

Daniel Pipes is one of the world's leading experts on the Islamic world, a member of the President's new US Institute for Peace, and Director of the Middle East Forum. He recently gave a talk at UC Berkeley. Here's how the event was reported by the Daily Californian, the student newspaper there. Notice how Pipes is described in the title as simply pro-Israel, as if he is only a member of a self-interested faction, and there is no such thing as objectivity.

My comments, as one who attended, are below this article.

Staunch Israel Backer Attacks 'Militant' Islam

By GEORGE DERK, MEGAN REITER AND EMMA SCHWARTZ
Wednesday, February 11, 2004

The controversial head of a Middle East watchdog organization delivered a searing attack on militant Islam at a campus talk last night to an impassioned but divided audience.

Like many campus events on the Middle East, Daniel Pipes' speech ignited antagonism between fierce ideological opponents. Supporters welcomed him with a standing ovation, but his opposition frequently interrupted the presentation, booing Pipes and calling him a racist.

Nonetheless, Pipes, who runs the Web site Campus Watch that tracks Middle Eastern studies in North America, sought to spread his own philosophy of action for the Middle East.

Pipes said the region has been overpowered by militant Islam, a force hostile to free speech that needs to be destroyed.

But he said achieving democracy in the Middle East would be slow and pointed to Iraq as a key example.

"I supported war against Iraq as any civilized person must," Pipes said.

For the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, Pipes had a simple cure: no diplomacy until all Palestinians recognize the state of Israel.

"Palestinians need to give up their foul ambition of destroying their neighbor," Pipes said to a burst of dissent from many audience members.

Pipes also took aim domestically, chastising his colleagues in Middle Eastern studies for "incompetence" and called campus Muslim students' associations bastions of militant Islam.

Aside from a lecture on the war in Iraq and the Israeli-Palestinian crisis, the audience's internal crossfire seemed to tell a story of its own.

Throughout the speech, a handful of loud commentators were escorted outside by police, and a large faction of Pro-Palestinian students made a dramatic exit toward the end of Pipes' speech.

Pipes' supporters often shouted back for those students to listen.

And those somewhere in between, the moderate Jews, Muslims and community members said they found little resonance in Pipes' words and even less of an opportunity for real discussion.

Throughout the crossfire, the event was overshadowed by the question of what constituted appropriate free speech on campus.

To Pipes' denouncers, the protest represented the precise expression of free speech.

"This is a man who has made his career by vilifying Arabs and Muslims and spreading conspiracy theories on Middle Eastern studies," said English graduate student Snehal Shingavi, the first person thrown out of speech.

But for Pipes, the audience members' outbursts only reaffirmed what he had come to preach: that universities – UC Berkeley in particular – were the most intolerant institutions in the country.

"I thought this was an institution of higher education," Pipes said.

This article of course was entirely too even-handed in its assessment of the whole event. The disrupters were even warned by many signs on the front doors not to engage in disruptive behavior. The whole experience was extremely uncivil, and ruined Pipes' talk for those who actually wanted to hear what he was saying. There were constant interruptions, not only involving name-calling, but shouting back and forth within the audience. Moreover, the 6-8 police in the room (which was filled to its capacity of several hundred, with many more outside, unable to get in) had to wend their way through the long rows of chairs to evict the worst of the disrupters. They and their placards not only called Pipes a racist, but also a Fascist and a McCarthyite. At one point, they all shouted together as a mob so that no one could be singled out to be evicted.

The evening wore me out. First, the location was changed to way up the hill and across campus. Then there was the suspense of possibly not being let in to this free event without possessing some blue ticket that had been sent out in advance, even though many of those ticket holders weren't going to show up. This during all the shouting outside. THEN, we had to line up in 3 groups, according to a number we chose in our heads, and then at first only one line got in. After that, the rest of us squeezed our way to the front door, then they frisked us and went through our bags. Last, there was the palpable tension in the air during the presentation. I didn't know if the loudmouth guys behind me, who were razzing me when we supporters of Pipes were giving him standing ovations for certain statements, were going to hit me or what!

We were supposed to start at 7:30, but the introductions didn't even take place until 8:20. Pipes only spoke until about 9:10, but with the interruptions, so I doubt he was given more than 20 minutes actual speech time. The Q&A went just past 9:30.

Whew! This was my first experience setting foot on the Berkeley Campus, even though I have lived really close for 2-1/2 years, and it may be my last. On the way out, I heard from some fellow supporters that the next pro-war type to speak there will charge $20, which may keep this sort of thing from happening again, at least in the same way.

Anyway, it was heartening to hear about his Campus-Watch project. I think Pipes does a lot of good with that all over the nation, making Middle East Expert professors accountable for what they are teaching. He's an impressive guy, with very impressive credentials. Please go see him if he shows up in your area.

Jeanie Kennedy

Sun, 02/29/2004 - 22:49 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Behaviour of idiotarians

Unfortunately, the extremist viewpoints of radical islamists will never allow opposing dialog of their self proclaimed cause.

So much for the quote.... is a peaceful religion..."

Was never able to fathom what it means, but then it's probably my fault not 'catching on' to what's really meant, but left unsaid.

Anyhoo, it's still all free entertainment. :o)

by a reader on Wed, 03/03/2004 - 17:06 | reply

Pipes

I have heard Pipes talk. At no time did he denounce Islam, only violent Islamists who are muffling moderate Muslims. I imagine that in the audience were also leftist, self-hating Jews who are so gullible that they believe the constant shrill of Muslim denouncement against any voice of reason and moderation.

by a reader on Fri, 05/21/2004 - 14:09 | reply

home | archives | polls | search

Copyright © 2008 Setting The World To Rights

Setting The World To Rights

Ideas have consequences.

home | archives | polls | search

Everything On The World (Oldest to Most Recent)

This page lists every article that has appeared on the front page of The World, starting with the oldest. Click here for a list starting with the most recent article.

Setting The World To Rights Is On A Break

More on The World

Wed, 03/03/2004 - 23:15 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Setting The World To Rights

Ideas have consequences.

home | archives | polls | search

Everything on The World

This page lists every article that has appeared on the front page of The World, starting with the most recent. Click here for a list starting with the oldest article.

History of Israel

More on The World

Wed, 03/03/2004 - 23:26 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Setting The World To Rights

Ideas have consequences.

home | archives | polls | search

The World Classics

A Short History of Israel
Allied Complicity in the Holocaust Anthropomorphism
Anti-Life
At Least One of Us Has Gone Mad Cargo Cult Politics
Conspiracy Theories
From Whom Can the Coalition Accept Unconditional Surrender?
Further Thoughts on the Death Penalty
In a Nearby Universe...
It's Not About Oil
John Kerry, Cambodia, And Iraq
Legitimacy of the Post-War Iraqi Government Neither Death Nor Taxes On Loyalty
Open Letter
Perhaps the UN Should Send In Some Saddam Inspectors Seriously Satirical Shoot the Junk Down Slavery
Studies We'd Like To Commission – 1: On Idiotarianism
The Other Appeasement
The Scandal of Faked Grades
The Settler Non-Problem
United Nations Reform – A Modest Suggestion
What Are Armies For?
Why?
Everything on The World

Wed, 03/03/2004 - 23:33 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Saddam's Weapons Of Mass Destruction – The Issue Won't Go Away

In the acrimonious controversy between supporters of the liberation of Iraq (currently somewhat on the defensive because no WMD stockpiles have been found there) and the 'Bush Lied' faction (currently engaged mainly in mindless crowing), the central issue of understanding what happened is being largely overlooked. For if there really were no stocks of WMD, as David Kay now considers most likely, there is no getting away from the question: did Saddam know this, or was he being deceived? Both possibilities are, on the face of it, extraordinarily implausible.

In Case Not Closed: Iraq's WMD Stockpiles (via Solomon), Douglas Hanson, WMD expert and recently Chief of Staff of the post-liberation Iraqi Ministry of Science and Technology, puts it like this:

[Was Saddam] really fooled by scientists scared to death of him and the Baath Party, or [did he run] one of military history's most successful deception operations. If he did the latter, we must also ask why he would risk the toppling of his regime, and his death or capture, over non-existent WMDs. The only alternative explanation to these two questionable scenarios is that WMD stockpiles did in fact exist, but that they have been hidden, and/or spirited out of the country.

The anti-liberation faction are trying their best not to let this issue go away. They needn't worry. There is no prospect of its going away until the truth – and that now means, principally, the true explanation of Saddam's and Iraq's pre-war behaviour – is discovered.

Thu, 03/04/2004 - 00:34 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Your argument is incomplete

For if there really were no stocks of WMD, as David Kay now considers most likely, there is no getting away from the question: did Saddam know this, or was he being deceived? Both possibilities are, on the face of it, extraordinarily implausible.

You have not argued why both these possibilities are implausible.

You are right it is very unlikely Iraqi scientists deceived Saddam into believing in non-existent weapons. But you also disregard the other option that Saddam did know there were no WMDs, on these grounds: Why he would risk the toppling of his regime, and his death or capture, over non-existent WMDs?

There is something missing in your argument, because you are implicitly assuming something without giving reasons for those assumptions. Namely: you are assuming (1) that Saddam put himself at risk of war on purpose, plus (2) that if he did provoke the war on purpose he would only have done that if he believed he had WMDs. You have failed to give reasons for both of these two conclusions. Without that the obvious possibility remains that Saddam was simply telling the truth when he said Iraq had no WMDs.

Another note: The case for war was NOT that there were WMDs. The case for war was that Iraq was not complying with the inspections, and hence Saddam MIGHT have had WMDs. The fact that the allies also had a positive belief that Saddam DID have WMDs is besides the point. The fact that Saddam MIGHT have had them and was not complying with inspections is good enough reason for the war. (And even if we knew Saddam had no WMDs, anybody still would have been justified in liberating Iraq for humanitarian reasons.)

Henry Sturman

by Henry Sturman on Fri, 03/05/2004 - 19:40 | reply

Dying For A Fad

One of the most under-publicised scandals of recent decades is the stance of environmental pressure groups – and the governments that pander to them – on the issue of the insecticide DDT. It all started with a book called Silent Spring by Rachel Carson, which alleged that DDT causes a thinning of birds' egg shells (thus endangering many bird species) and cancer in humans. Since then it has emerged that these claims were based on misinterpreted evidence. Nevertheless, Silent Spring remains the Bible of the environmental religion – and we do not mean that figuratively: its apocalyptic, moralising tone, its many factual inaccuracies, and the uncritical praise lavished upon it by its fatuous disciples make it typical of the holy books of religions throughout the ages.

Some Africans are now beginning to question the wisdom of the environmentalist crusade (or jihad) against DDT. Malaria kills about a million people every year – most of them children in Africa – and is spread by mosquitos. DDT kills mosquitos and is the best pesticide for this purpose by a large margin. Indeed DDT is the best means of any kind available to prevent malaria.

Environmentalists overwhelmingly agree that killing animals in the name of clothing fashions and fads is wrong. It has been clear for many years that there is no scientific case for banning DDT on either health or environmental grounds, and yet this remains the policy of most governments, aid agencies, and the environmental organisations that shape their policies. The fact that they are prepared to allow millions of people to die just to preserve the anti-DDT fad at the centre of their religion is a tragic and disgusting irony.

Mon, 03/08/2004 - 21:11 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Anti-DDT Fad

It is all too convenient to claim the virtues of DDT in an age where DDT does not exist in daily use. DDT is an extremely dangerous and crude pesticide that persists and moves up the food chain from insects to birds to man as well as being directly harmful to man. Few of us lived in those times, but the dangers of its continued widespread use as a broad-spectrum pesticide and poison became very clear. No one book had much to do with it worldwide. I would not claim that there is never a reason to use DDT, only that its persistence in the food chain needs to be heavily weighed against any potential benefit of use. There are other non-persisting pesticides and methods that destroy mosquitos in the larval stage and eradicate the danger of malaria. The problem is not the absence of DDT. The problem is only in the willingness to address and apply the many solutions. Death to the mosquitos!

by a reader on Mon, 03/08/2004 - 22:59 | reply

The previous message...

... is an apt example of what The World is talking about. Look at the amazing indifference to tens of millions of deaths just because they happened as a result of following the environmentalist religion. Look at the way a belief is clung to, and the only response to scientific evidence is to re-state the belief more passionately. And look at the ending, a chanted prayer, no less: "death to the mosquitos!" But prayer is not effective at preventing disease. DDT is.

by a reader on Tue, 03/09/2004 - 00:36 | reply

Evidence?

A reader wrote:

'DDT is an extremely dangerous and crude pesticide that persists and moves up the food chain from insects to birds to man as well as being directly harmful to man.'

Really? If what you say is true, then presumably there is a study somewhere documenting the harm done by DDT. Could you provide an example of such a study?

by Alan Forrester on Tue, 03/09/2004 - 02:56 | reply

Really

"American scientists found that the insecticide increases the risk of pregnant women having their babies before 37 weeks of gestation." That is a direct quote, I must presume, as a result of a study example.

Really. No one says though, including me, that you have to believe it.

I am neither an "environmentalist" or a "prayer chanter". Having worked with DDT many years ago, and not as a scientist, I can say first hand that it is a crude and dangerous chemical. Used with careful forethought it is extremely effective. Before jumping on the crazy-looney bandwagon, please note again, "I would not claim there is never a reason to use DDT". I used it, it is effective. It is something you handle very carefully.

Read the studies yourself. Or don't. Draw your own conclusions.

by a reader on Wed, 03/10/2004 - 23:02 | reply

Straight Talk

A reference page:<http://extoxnet.orst.edu/pips/ddt.htm>

by a reader on Thu, 03/11/2004 - 05:31 | reply

Re: Straight Talk

It's hardly surprising that DDT is somewhat toxic. Let's play with some figures and see what might be extrapolated from animal studies.

The reader provided a source which gives 50% lethal oral dose for rats: LD50 = 112mg/kg

The long-term regular dosage leading [?] to tumours for mice: TD50 = 12.5(mg/kg)/day

Breastmilk DDT of affected mothers is up to 20mg/kg of milk fat

Assuming:

3% milk fat

baby drinks 1.5L per day

baby weighs 5kg

This gives a baby's DDT dose to be $0.03 \times 1.5 \times 20 / 5 = 0.18$ (mg/kg)/day

...which is about 1.5% of TD50 for mice

Assuming linearity that's a 0.75% chance of cancer due to DDT over lifetime.

Assume 1 billion Africans live in malarial areas

Assume life expectancy = 35 years

$0.75\% \times 1 \text{ billion} / 35$ gives 220,000 annual cancer cases due to DDT. Note that this is completely hypothetical. I don't think epidemiologists have ever recorded significant rises in cancer due to DDT spraying.

In reality, approx 900,000 Africans die every year of malaria.

So even if all the hypothetical cancer cases proved fatal, this rough & ready calculation shows that, deathwise, Africa would be 4 times better off with DDT.

A shortfall is that DDT might cause other problems. e.g. liver disease, hormonal disruption or poor quality of life. Just don't know. However, non-fatal cases of malaria are known to be pretty unpleasant.

The calc was conservative, cos, amongst other stuff:

-poisons are often non-toxic at low doses

-we don't drink breast milk all our lives
-neither do many of us weigh only 5kg
-we aren't rodents, and the other mammals tested were better off than mice
-it's probable that other preventative measures/cures will be found before current babies reach middle age, whereas it's certain that people are dying of malaria right now

by Tom Robinson on Thu, 03/11/2004 - 18:23 | reply

Tom Robinson

I can follow that extrapolation as stated. DDT has little to do with cancer. Little or no evidence of that. Malaria is a horrible disease. DDT is effective when used properly. Africa does have DDT and it has an appropriate use. We agree on all that.

DDT should never be used indiscriminately. Insect populations develop resistance over time. Watch runoff into streams and lakes since DDT breakdown is slow and has particular documented toxicities as widely noted. Mix and apply carefully. Use proper precautions. We agree on all that.

You've weighed the knowledge about this pesticide and you in particular have a healthy respect for it. So have I, and so do I. That is why we each posted. Fine.

by a reader on Fri, 03/12/2004 - 02:44 | reply

Malaria Action

The Gates article is worth reading too:
<http://news.bbc.co.uk/2/hi/health/3127040.stm>

by a reader on Fri, 03/12/2004 - 16:02 | reply

Tom Robinson

I don't get it. Is DDT in widespread use in tropical Africa or isn't it? If it isn't it should be: 1 million annual known human deaths trump other unknowable environmental consequences. Resistance argues for heavy DDT use for a decade or so in my (underinformed) mind. Piecemeal use would tend to encourage more resistance by differentially killing off weaker strains of midges.

All animal and plant bodies are made of chemicals. What does it matter if a particular chemical accumulates, what matters is whether it causes harm. The human misery and poverty caused by religious-style conceptions of purity and contamination seem more likely to have a nasty impact on wildlife conservation.

by Tom Robinson on Sat, 03/13/2004 - 09:08 | reply

Africa

That is my understanding of it too. The general problem with Africa is that is thought of as a vast third world country that needs to be treated like poor neighbor or ignored. Not many people are thinking about the problems of African countries and peoples. Who is interested in Africa ? Malaria is only one of the problems and it affects millions but it is not an impossible task to wipe it out. It could be done in less than 5 years with a concerted effort. Polluted wells and parasites are not an impossible problem to address, likewise. Hunger and starvation are not insurmountable. Aids and other diseases can be addressed. These are not unfathomable problems beyond the scope of money, science and intelligence.

It is the thinking of people inside and outside of the continent that is the problem, and it is religious style conceptions of purity and contamination, a conception of human worth that is the problem, regarding DDT, malaria, and also unclean water, hunger and all of the above.

by a reader on Sat, 03/13/2004 - 15:25 | reply

Africa and Malaria

I have been more than 7 times in Niger, Benin and Central-African republic.

I observed that people don't care about protecting themselves against the risk of acquiring malaria.

For me they prepared a bed with a mosquitonet, but due to the heat, whole families, including small children were sleeping outside.

In the evening, at the moment of highest mosquito activity, small children run around without any clothes.

What I want to say: Protecting has to start with education of the people and learn them to minimize risks.

At the same time governments must treat watersurfaces with chemicals.

I was once in the north of Benin living close to a small river. I did not encounter one single mosquito!

people told me that sometimes an helicopter flies along that river and sprays insecticides.

This underlines the need of chemicals as part of the solution.

by Jerome van Dijk on Fri, 03/18/2005 - 18:33 | reply

DDT is not banned

The resurgent claims about millions and millions of lives lost due to a nonexistent ban on DDT is one of the oldest antienvironmental claims. It has developed a life of its own.

I doubt that the editors of this page has actually read "The silent spring", and it is obvious that they have not checked any of the claims about harmful effects of DDT with scientific literature.

First of all: Rachel Carson's "The silent spring" did NOT advocate a universal ban on DDT use - the book explicitly distinguished between agricultural use (which Carson did want banned) and in disease control (which she argued should continue).

The book made claims about DDT causing thinning of bird's eggshells as well as being carcinogenic in humans. The second claim has never been convincingly validated, at least not in realistic doses. But the link between DDT and declines in raptor populations all over the industrialised world in the years 1950-1950 has overwhelming support! Apparently, DDT does little harm to smaller birds low in the food chain (like in the quails and songbirds studies), but since it accumulates upwards it does affect birds like raptors, owls or herons severely. This is confirmed by almost all major studies in the last 40 years.

Read the book!

And DDT is still not banned, neither formally nor de facto. It is still used in many countries in the world where it is still effective - but only against disease-carrying insects. The US ban of 1972 only covered the agricultural use, and it had absolutely no force of law outside the US.

And DDT could by no means eradicate malaria - there is a very big problem: the rapidly evolving resistance by the mosquitos. This is the main reason for the cease in the use of DDT in many poor countries. You could start spraying with DDT all over the tropics, but you would most likely only achieve making DDT useless in the antimalarial fight for a long time into the future. You can argue this as much as you want, but there is absolutely no factual support whatsoever to these claims.

The main advantage of DDT is that it is cheap - therefore, every environmental organisation that I have ever heard arguing for a phaseout in the use of DDT has also argued that another antimalarial drug should be provided without costs to the poor africans or latin americans.

You should check some sources to these often heard allegations. I guess that www.junkscience.com is a major source - try <http://johnquiggin.com/index.php?p=1902> - or - <http://timlambert.org/2005/06/ddt10/> - or - <http://info-pollution.com/ddtban.htm>

Please check these sources and point out to me exactly where they are wrong.

Christoffer Harder

by Christoffer Bugge Harder on Sun, 05/28/2006 - 10:45 | reply

Curious

Are there studies of DDT used solely as an insecticide in endemic malarial regions that document its harm to non-pregnant, non-breastfeeding humans?

Has Tom Robinson accurately summarized the extent of hypothesized damage to humans by DDT?

by A Reader on Sun, 05/28/2006 - 23:38 | reply

Hysterics

"Some Africans are now beginning to question the wisdom of the environmentalist crusade (or jihad) against DDT"

This idiotic statement, including in particular the hysterical term 'jihad', is exactly the same sort of thing you are accusing other people of (you know: calling something 'terrorism' when it is not; indulging in dumb conspiracy theories - that sort of thing). Hypocrisy par excellence.

by Yoni on Mon, 09/11/2006 - 19:29 | reply

Sources

"Please check these sources and point out to me exactly where they are wrong"

Christoffer,
Hysterical people do not want to be bothered with facts.

by Yoni on Mon, 09/11/2006 - 19:30 | reply

An Egyptian Undertaking

The Egyptian government has agreed to secure its side of the Egypt-Gaza border after the Israelis leave under Prime Minister Sharon's unilateral disengagement plan.

"We agreed on several steps to ensure the border from our side and to make sure that there is no weapon smuggling. I hope there will be no violation," Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak told Israeli reporters

He hopes? What seems to have escaped the attention of the entire fawning press corps is that this constitutes a public admission, at long last, that Egypt has been flagrantly violating the terms of its peace treaty with Israel in 1979:

[Article 2]: Each Party undertakes to ensure that acts or threats of belligerency, hostility, or violence do not originate from and are not committed from within its territory [...] against the population, citizens or property of the other Party [...] and undertakes to ensure that perpetrators of such acts are brought to justice.

By permitting terrorists to smuggle weapons at will across its border for a quarter of a century, in violation of the promises for which it has been lavishly rewarded, the Egyptian government has been complicit in the hundreds of murders committed with those weapons.

Fri, 03/12/2004 - 03:42 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Two Kinds Of Spaniard

Today, when they cast their votes at the Spanish General Election, the voters are reportedly split on what lesson to draw from the fact that Al Qaeda has now committed mass murder on Spanish soil. Will their reaction be:

- 'He was right: global terrorism is a serious danger that we must fight'; or
- 'If we hadn't fought them, they would not have attacked us.'

Which is true? Well, both of them have been stated in a way that disguises a moral judgement as a pragmatic one. For in fact, to those who are in moral agreement with the terrorists' objective, global terrorism is not a serious danger but only a tiny additional risk in their lives, a price well worth paying to create a world worth living in. And to those who value a way of life that is incompatible with the world that the terrorists are trying to create, it is simply false that 'they would not have attacked us', for they already have attacked us, many times.

So the Spanish voters do have to choose which way to jump on this issue. But it's not a question of whether the recent attack tends to vindicate or refute Prime Minister Aznar's pro-Coalition stance in the war. It is whether they believe that our society is better than the one the terrorists are fighting for, or not.

Update: "...we seem to be very near the bleak choice between War and Shame. My feeling is that we shall choose Shame, and then have War thrown in a little later, on even more adverse terms than at present" – Winston Churchill in 1938. He was right on all counts, and that was Britain's moment of greatest shame. Today the Spanish people were given the choice between war and shame. They too chose shame. They too will get war. This is the most disgraceful moment for the Spanish nation since 1936 – or perhaps 1492.

Sun, 03/14/2004 - 13:15 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Or their reaction may be:

Ansar has been wasting Spain's resources chasing a mirage in Iraq while leaving our home vulnerable.

by a reader on Sun, 03/14/2004 - 16:39 | reply

Or:

"If we had continued to attack al-Qaeda with our full military might, and not got side-tracked by paper tigers like Iraq, they would not have attacked us".

by a reader on Mon, 03/15/2004 - 03:32 | reply

interesting

Hypothesis: most supporters of tackling terrorism rather than appeasement would generally vote for whatever the smaller-taxation, less-interventionist party on offer is.

In Spain, and in the US, this means that the anti-war people probably wouldn't have been natural supporters of the party in government anyway. I wonder how much the "ETA is prime suspect" bit damaged the Spanish government, rather than their pro-coalition stance?

The really interesting thing is going to be watching what happens in the next UK general election, where a high-intervention, high-tax party went to war... maybe the (non)-liberal democrats will pick up all the anti-war votes? (polls aren't suggesting it at the moment)

Emma

by a reader on Mon, 03/15/2004 - 11:28 | reply

Will Tony Blair be a casualty of Spanish silliness?

Emma - Yes, you are right: It will be interesting watching what happens during the UK election. IMHO, the Spain election result will have panicked the British Labour party, most of whom did not support the war, and they will see Tony Blair as a liability to be got rid off before the election.

by a reader on Mon, 03/15/2004 - 23:39 | reply

Terror works

I'm going to say something about the Spanish situation, but before I do let me first tell you about another story which I believe has relevance for what's going on here. Today I was dismayed at reading in a Dutch newspaper the comment of a politician on the recent murder of an Islamic woman in Holland by her husband. Apparently in many Muslim countries it is seen as the perfect right of husband to kill his wife if she doesn't obey him, and he'll even get support from the woman's own family. Death threats are seen more and more in Holland within Muslim families. Anyway, this was the suggestion of the politician: "Government should help women receiving death threats from their husband get a new identity or move to a foreign country." This, it seems to me, is the epitome of the culture of appeasement. Surely, if women are being threatened or killed, then the appropriate action is to go after the perpetrator and punish him so severely so as to discourage any would-be criminals to commit such crimes in future. But in the upside down world we apparently live in it's not the criminal who is to be dealt with in the case of crime, but it's the victim who should yield. This politician is proposing that we punish victimized women by banning them from their community, thus achieving the criminal's objective that there be a strong disincentive for women disobeying their men.

And so there we have it. As this example shows, terror works in our weasel society. And creating a system in which terror works creates more terror. For you get whatever you reward. And so it is for Spain. Those who would have us believe that going to fight off the oppressors in Iraq promotes terrorism got it backwards. It may be the case that Muslims would wish to seek revenge for Spain's participation in the fighting, though it's ironic that the Muslims will in fact do better with Saddam gone rather than worse, so you'd have to question the logic of the revenge theory. But that aside, being involved in a situation where the other party may commit revenge is not the same as promoting terrorism. Promoting terrorism would have to mean rewarding terrorism. And who is it who is rewarding terrorism? Aznar's party who sent troops to Iraq? No, that would count more as the opposite of a reward for terrorism. The ones who are rewarding terrorism are the voters who changed their vote from the ruling party to the socialists in response to the terrorist attack in Madrid. Those voters are the ones who are making it so that terrorism works. Terrorists commit a terrible terrorist act, and within a week they are rewarded by voters putting a party in charge that will obey the directives of the terrorists 100% by getting the troops out of Iraq.

These voters have done the whole of Europe a tremendous disservice. With this level of success for the terrorists, surely they will be inspired to act again. Who will be next? Holland? England? Well, I hope not, but it is a real possibility. Certainly they will be better targets than the US. Because if the US is attacked again, they are likely to get angry again. But if European countries are attacked they are likely to submit to the terrorist demands. And so it's the weasel mentality which promotes terrorism and not the hawk mentality.

Having said all this, I do also think that the voting result is partly Aznar's own fault. People rightly were angry that he continued to shift blame of the attacks on the ETA, even while evidence for an Arab attack was piling in. In fact, many of us correctly put the blame on Muslims as soon as the attack happened. But still I don't think this was the overriding reason for the voters to vote the way they voted. And I think without Aznar's foul play the same would have happened. They voted the way they did because they suffer from a dangerous case of blame-the-victim mentality. Shame on them.

Henry Sturman

by Henry Sturman on Tue, 03/16/2004 - 11:18 | reply

People with no emotions don't

People with no emotions don't get it.

by a reader on Wed, 03/17/2004 - 02:06 | reply

Not a terrorist victory!

Henry Sturman - Good posting, but I can see some holes in your argument. Let's look at this:

"The ones who are rewarding terrorism are the voters who changed their vote from the ruling party to the socialists in response to the terrorist attack in Madrid. Those voters are the ones who are making it so that terrorism works."

Undoubtedly, some voters did change their vote from the ruling party to the Socialists in response to the attack. But the attack also provoked a substantially larger turnout than the previous election. So it is quite possible that the election was determined by Socialists who would not otherwise have placed a vote. So I ask you: Is it a victory for the terrorists to get more voters into the booths? I think not.

"Terrorists commit a terrible terrorist act, and within a week they are rewarded by voters putting a party in charge that will obey the directives of the terrorists 100% by getting the troops out of Iraq."

But they won't be withdrawn until the handover in June and maybe not even then. So what's the problem - we should hope that Iraq can stand on its own feet by then. Could you point out some other examples of how the new government is engaging in appeasement? I think there is a danger in writing off the election result as a victory for the terrorists. For that truly is to encourage them.

by a reader on Wed, 03/17/2004 - 21:01 | reply

Terrorist victory

So it is quite possible that the election was determined by Socialists who would not otherwise have placed a vote. So I ask you: Is it a victory for the terrorists to get more voters into the booths?

Yes.

But they won't be withdrawn until the handover in June and maybe not even then. So what's the problem - we should hope that Iraq can stand on its own feet by then.

No it can't. But that's not the point. The point is that Spanish voters have given in to terrorist demands.

Could you point out some other examples of how the new government is engaging in appeasement?

Isn't this enough? Come to think of it, I think the new socialist government should retract its campaign promise to withdraw the troops, on the argument that things have changed because of the bombing, and so they are no longer bound by that promise, and they refuse to be part of a terrorist plot to control Spanish policy. In other words, the honorable thing for the socialists to do is to keep the policy in place that would have occurred had the bombing not taken place, even if they don't in fact agree with that policy.

I think there is a danger in writing off the election result as a victory for the terrorists. For that truly is to encourage them.

The damage has already been done. Denying what happened won't change that. The terrorists know they were successful, even if we were to deny it. We must explain to the voters who changed their mind in the election (either by voting for someone else or by voting while they had planned not to vote) how bad that is, in order to help prevent such things from happening again.

Henry Sturman

by Henry Sturman on Thu, 03/18/2004 - 10:21 | reply

Not a terrorist victory!

Henry -

You are making certain assumptions about the motivations of the bombers. The election took place three days after the bombing. It was not clear at this stage who carried out the bombing let alone what their motivations were. We now know that al Qaeda were involved but there is still no clear evidence that they intended for a Socialist government to come to power. An argument can be made that in fact they wanted to cement in a victory for the ruling party. For example, see this. Given the uncertainty, the rational thing for the Spanish people to do was to vote for the party they intended to vote for anyway (as you acknowledge). I suspect that most in fact did, given the opposition to the Iraq war that was already prevalent in Spain and given that larger turnouts have tended to favour the socialists. That more people turned out to vote is not a victory for the terrorists but a victory for democracy (and it is so, even if we hate socialism). Until we know more about what the bombers intended we cannot say that they won. I am not denying what happened. Sure the terrorists may think they were successful. But it doesn't help when we agree with them, especially when the evidence is not in and most especially when it may be the case that they didn't win. I agree that we need to make clear to people the dangers in changing your vote in response to terrorism but we cannot tell those who would not otherwise have voted to stay away from the polls. That is silliness.

Danny

by a reader on Thu, 03/18/2004 - 22:33 | reply

home | archives | polls | search

Copyright © 2007 Setting The World To Rights

1976 – The Best Year Ever?

It takes a special kind of blindness to believe that science can define the 'happiness level' of even a single person as a single, objectively measurable number. An even more dangerous delusion is that this can be done for society as a whole. This level of delusion typically results from years of specialist training in how to pretend that a bureaucrat with no knowledge or skills (that anyone would actually pay for if they had the choice) is nevertheless capable of running the world and making people happy by fiddling with numbers.

Capitalists look on the market as being a set of conditions under which which people can try ideas to see whether they sink or swim. Leftists, when they notice the market at all, judge it according to whether the values they happen to like are doing well.

So if you see a story about an economic think tank called the New Economics Foundation saying that 1976 was the best year ever, you know what to expect.

What did they actually do to reach this startling conclusion? They added up a bunch of arbitrary numbers, called it the Measure of Domestic Progress (MDP) and declared that it measures well-being. Since the MDP peaks in 1976, they say that it was the best year ever.

Of course, no piece of leftist nonsense is complete without some pat, fatuous pseudomoralising:

Too much food makes the nation obese.

No, it doesn't. Food consists of physical objects and objects that do not control people cannot explain behaviour. People who are obese have made choices that lead to them becoming fat, such as eating a lot or not exercising much.

More guns make our streets unsafe.

Again, the physical object fallacy. Also, this is wrong both morally and factually.

Endless choice leaves us hurried and harried.

All this choice may fluster some easily-confused leftist bureaucrats who are only accustomed to choices involving paper and staples, but the rest of us are just fine.

Burning too much carbon threatens our climate.

No. And finally, the words we've been waiting to read:

Excessive commercialism erodes social value and strips our lives of meaning.

Leftists insulting people for wanting to have nice things to buy – they're so predictable.

However, in that very predictability lie the seeds of hope. Leftists do not understand why they are comically mistaken, about the greatness of 1976, the meaning of life, and everything else. But many people today, such as The World, understand what is wrong with that kind of nonsense and can argue against it.

When they've stopped laughing.

Wed, 03/17/2004 - 20:57 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Overindulgence Starts at Home

1976 was a very good calendar year. It has been all downhill from there. Don't blame the world. In the words of Pogo, we met the enemy and it was us.

How to improve the comedy? Rethink the excuses above.
Possible rewordings and slogans to go along with the reality:

Too much food - eaten by one person - makes the person overly full.
(Stop personal overindulgence !)

More guns - shot at people on the street - make a street unsafer.
(Don't be crazy with a gun !)

Endless choice - unmade - leaves one hurried and harried.
(Make choices, please !)

Burning too much carbon - without oxygen - threatens one's breathing.
(Stop smoking cigarettes, you idiot!)

Excessive commercialism erodes social value and strips our lives of meaning.
(Stop complaining, don't buy the useless stuff !)

by a reader on Thu, 03/18/2004 - 19:54 | reply

ho ho

It's already been garbled.

A complete stranger told me yesterday, absolutely seriously, that 1966 had been identified as the best year ever.

"Ah" I said, nodding sagely. "Of course, that was in the days before normal people could afford dishwashers"

Emma

<http://rationalparents.blogspot.com/>

by a reader on Fri, 03/19/2004 - 09:58 | reply

Copyright © 2007 Setting The World To Rights

Conspiracy Theories – 4: Collectivism

For the first three instalments of this series, see [here.]

Have you heard the one about light bulbs? The secret of everlasting light bulbs has been known for decades but is being suppressed by the manufacturers of electrical goods because they would be ruined if people did not continually have to buy new bulbs. But how do they enforce this policy among themselves, and how do they prevent researchers (including their own, who are presumably dupes wasting their lives tinkering with an obsolete technology) from rediscovering the principle?

Now give the story a more sinister turn. The myth relies on conspiracy. Even if an individual firm would seize avidly the opportunity created by the everlasting light bulb, the manufacturers would establish a cartel to see that our inventor was assassinated or otherwise removed from the scene.

This urban myth is one of a class of conspiracy theories about evil capitalists. They are widely believed. And yet the people who believe them – and make real-life decisions on the assumption that they are true – nevertheless fail to wonder about even the most elementary implications of their own theory. For instance, how does the conspiracy get transmitted to the next generation? There must come a point at which a conspirator's child, or a talented young executive about to be promoted from Dupe to Conspirator, is taken aside and told the dirty secret: "until now you have believed that we make our living by making a positive contribution to society, but in fact we are secretly parasites and murderers". What happens to those who are appalled by the revelation and want nothing to do with the conspiracy? Can all light bulb manufacturers be relied upon to murder their own children if they suspect they may be about to flirt with environmentalism, or with integrity? What happens to manufacturers who are going bankrupt anyway and so have nothing more to gain from the conspiracy, but could be saved by capitalising on the secret? If the conspiracy theory is true, we cannot directly observe how the conspirators deal with such dramatic problems, but we do know that they must be doing so: the logic of the situation dictates that a long-lasting conspiracy must include some method of converting dupes to conspirators. And this method must be extremely reliable despite the fact that it involves people suddenly and radically altering the moral values on which they base their lives.

But the believers in such theories just don't care. We have remarked that one characteristic of conspiracy theories is that their holders apply them very selectively to explain away some aspects of the world that they do not like. They are uninterested in any wider consequences that their theory would have if it were true. In other words, they fail to take their own theory seriously as an account of what is happening in the world.

It is therefore no accident that conspiracy-theoretic ways of thinking are always associated with collectivist fantasies of one sort or another. For Marxists, the 'ruling class' has many of the attributes of a person – a devious, dangerous person capable of having inherent 'interests' and secret motives and taking coherent actions to further them. Likewise, Nazis and other antisemites conceive of The Jews (or often, tellingly, 'The Jew') as being such an entity, while for many Libertarians The State plays this role. If the conspiracy theorists can manage to think entirely in terms of this monstrous Person and its evil agenda, then they never have to think about the issues which make all conspiracy theories ludicrously flawed when taken seriously – issues such as how the conspirators are supposed to communicate, agree upon their evil plans, deal with dissenters, launder the funds needed to pay the assassins, groom a new generation to take over in due course, fool and control the dupes, distribute the spoils and so on, all while plausibly pretending that all their overt actions have some entirely different purpose.

Some ideologies have become notorious for the conspiracy theories that they contain. So when we find people who earnestly believe the light bulb myth, we may well enquire whether they are (say) socialists, and if so, we may guess that this explains their gullibility in regard to the economics of electrical technology. Given our analysis here, though, it is possible that the true explanation goes in the other direction. It may be that people are attracted to collectivist ideologies (including Libertarian versions of statism) because they want to believe a conspiracy theory and because the collectivist ideology allows them to disregard its flaws, rather than vice versa.

Part 5

Sat, 03/20/2004 - 18:32 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Why do they bother?

issues such as how the conspirators are supposed to communicate, agree upon their evil plans, deal with dissenters, launder the funds needed to pay the assassins, groom a new generation to take over in due course, fool and control the dupes, distribute the spoils and so on, all while plausibly pretending that all their overt actions have some entirely different purpose

And they have to work full time on their ostensible jobs too. And those researchers: they have to pay them anyway, so they could be paying them to do real profitable research instead! Why don't they? The whole thing's crazy.

by a reader on Mon, 03/22/2004 - 04:50 | reply

Conspirators

I have come to the conclusion, um theory, that most and maybe all conspiracy theories depend on the 'juicy gossip' syndrome, just bigger and more full of lies. Conspiracy theories are patently nonsense and otherwise they would have no life. Most of the people, conspirators, that pass them on are not convinced of their truth themselves, but pass them on because they would like to believe them, or some choice portion of them. Or, they would just like to stir up some trouble and controversy. Or, they have nothing better to do and no one would talk to them without their conspiracy gossip.

Conspiracy theories are tall tales that are told on the basis that you can trust no one, which itself is untrue. Make up a wild alternate scenario to what actually happened. Talk trash and nonsense in a conspiratorial tone. Psst, pass it on, because the conspirator has nothing better to do. Be untrustworthy or gullible or both, but blame it on the wild conspiracy rumor. Otherwise the person and their willing confidants might have to stick with truth.

Conspiracy theories would quickly fade away if it were not for the conspirators who perpetuate them.

by a reader on Tue, 03/23/2004 - 23:32 | reply

Conspiracy Theories Are Elementary School BS - Tabloids Paradise

It is elementary... Conspiracy Theories are just a quick way to make people question a particular person or party. If someone wants to find fault with a particular person or party to turn others against them, they think of ways they are trying to harm everyone... That is how most gossip starts in high school, elementary school, work places etc.... Democrats want to find fault with the Republicans... It is that simple.. But think about it, if Clinton had been elected, I am sure we, Republicans could somehow blame Clinton for the 911 attacks... perhaps linked to Monica Lewinsky too! Perhaps Hilary and Monica were having an affair and had to cover it up... Believe me.. If we tried hard enough.. we COULD link them somehow.. It is all Tabloid BS to me..

by gadarInbabe on Sat, 08/20/2005 - 22:53 | reply

every corporation is a conspi every corporation is a conspiracy.

every rock band is a conspiracy.

every plot to bomb a building is a conspiracy.

people working together - that's all a conspiracy is. nobody knows anything about anything anyone is doing; therefore every group's operations are to a large degree secret. most public operations of groups are uninteresting to others anyway. therefore either every group is a conspiracy or conspiracy is a meaningless term.

the author of this site is tilting at windmills. there is no such thing as a "conspiracy theorist". people are exposed to different information and draw different conclusions based on that information and their own biases. the only thing protecting us is our ability to assess the quality of the information we take in and our ability to suppress or eliminate our biases. better information inevitably precedes better conclusions about the true nature of things. there is better information to be had about 9-11 than what most have read. those who have read it and have incorporated it into their knowledge framework will see that all roads of inquiry lead to a small nest of neocons who obviously engineered 9-11 and the iraq/afghanistan mess. we who know this are not "conspiracy theorists"!

i am sussing that the implicit message of this website is: "if you think Bush was behind 9-11, you're a CONSPIRACY THEORIST and here's what's wrong with you." If the author were describing inane arguments against evolution, perhaps I would have understood. but I myself have done research on 9-11 and know what I know to be corroborated by FACTS, some of which I have observed firsthand ^(a) ground zero or through logical fallacies i discovered in the media myself.

Let me break it down for you:

BUSH AND HIS TEAM WERE BEHIND 9-11.
BELIEVING THAT DOES NOT MAKE ME CRAZY.

have you considered that by your definition of "conspiracy theorists" it's the mainstream media that are the REAL conspiracy theorists by pointing the finger at bin Laden and his supposed "gang of 19" without a shred of evidence?

-j

by the definition on Sat, 12/03/2005 - 17:58 | reply

a hoax?

Why did bin Laden admit it?

by a reader on Sat, 01/21/2006 - 00:54 | reply

You don't have to be crazy but it helps

"BUSH AND HIS TEAM WERE BEHIND 9-11.
BELIEVING THAT DOES NOT MAKE ME CRAZY" erm, Yes it does. OK maybe not crazy but certainly deluded or stupid.

The insanity of people who believe in 9/11 conspiracy theory is incredible to behold. The way they can hold mutually incompatible theories in their heads at the same time is truly impressive. I visited a couple of sites and in less than ten minutes of looking managed to find these two examples of "evidence" on the same sight.

1 The planes that crashed into the twin towers were "remote controlled" from a secret command centre operated by Dick Cheney.

OK you may say that in itself is nuts. Put aside the calls from those onboard or indeed what truly happened to all the passengers because this same site goes on to claim

2 The FBI failed to investigate Mohammed Atta because they were instructed not to by lawyers acting for the administration.

To all 9/11 conspiracy theorists out there, please think this through and please be consistent. Either there were hijackers out there being protected by the evil lawyers and they crashed the plane OR the planes were remote controlled by Cheney and the passengers killed off separately after making their last calls. You cannot have both!

by RK on Thu, 06/29/2006 - 13:20 | reply

9/11 denial

9-11 Conspiracy Websites are apt to point out that never in world history has a plane brought down a building by airplanes but go on to state that the World Trade center buildings were brought down by a controlled demolition using thermite. So when in world history has thermite ever been used in a controlled demolition? It could probably be done, but the fact that it hasn't happened before is completely irrelevant to a reasonable discussion. The tin foil hat brigade themselves don't take their theories seriously. So no plane hit the Pentagon you say? How did the 5 light posts and generator get moved? Oh they were planted. What about the DNA tests, oh, I see, the FBI, CIA, FAA, NTSB, Military, pentagon employees, fire department, coroner, FEMA, police, NSA, they are all in on it too? What happened to the original plane? Were the passengers killed or are they coconspirators? Wouldn't the coconspirators be worried about eye witnesses to the missile attack and workers at the pentagon, or FAA inspectors that weren't in on the plot leaking what they actually saw? Wouldn't it have been easier just to use a remote controlled plane like they did with the World Trade center towers? Popular Science magazine disagrees with the theories, that's because they are yellow journalists as a front for the CIA. The Structural Engineering Institute of the American Society of Civil Engineers disputes your claims? That's because they are in on it too! So is the Society of Fire Protection Engineers, the National Fire Protection Association, The American Institute of Steel Construction, the Council on Tall Buildings and Urban Habitat, the Structural Engineers Association of New York. Not a single structural engineer in the United States believe the world trade centers believe the world trade center was brought down by controlled demolition but you know the truth, you've done your research on the web. Boy ain't you smart! How far down the rabbit hole do you want to go, if you believe your own theory, consider the implications. Are the passengers still alive as well as the so called hijackers? How do "they" keep them quiet? It's absurd.

by random on Sat, 09/23/2006 - 04:03 | reply

Copyright © 2008 Setting The World To Rights

Buy Microsoft!

Heaven knows we are no fans of Microsoft's trading practices or software. Just look at the last entry under the Error Correction heading in our sidebar... But there is no comparison between what Microsoft does and what the European Commission does. The bottom line is that Microsoft uses creativity to produce products which people freely buy, use intensively, and then freely choose to upgrade repeatedly. The EC uses force to take people's money to fund their enormous salaries and ruinous subsidies, and to make monumental nuisances of themselves.

Their latest stunt, namely to impose a record €497m fine on Microsoft, for the crime of Trading While Rich, is both unjust and economically harmful.

We have no way of making our opinions felt, or even known, by this behemoth. So all we can do in protest is show the other behemoth a little solidarity by giving it a free advertisement: Buy Microsoft Software!

Wed, 03/24/2004 - 19:36 | digg | del.icio.us | permlink

Trading While Rich - arguments?

While admitting that imposing a half-billion fine for integrating a media player into Windows does sound a little overkill (provided I know neither the details of this trial case nor the actual multimedia companies profits involved) I nonetheless don't understand your arguments. In particular, "Trading While Rich" sounds cynical to me. There is no need to remind me that stronger people are always righter. In return, I ought to tell you n-th time that freedom of establishing a monopoly has nothing to do with the economical freedom and economical prosperity. If americans are so strong (and, therefore, morally right) what happened to them when it was brought to their attention that that are not free to buy a PC without Windows on it anymore? Sorry for the such a violent argument.

The bottom line is that Microsoft uses creativity to produce products which people freely buy...

by a reader on Fri, 03/26/2004 - 09:52 | reply

Trade and freedom

Indeed, we most go after wicked companies that force us to buy things we don't want by integrating different parts into one product. Just as it is wrong to sell a PC with Windows, or Windows with a media player, it is wrong to sell cars with wheels and tires and an engine and houses with windows and doors and floors. All integrated products should be forbidden and it should only be allowed to sell the smallest parts, like screws, tires, bricks and buttons. And we should put anyone into jail who would offer the service of putting those parts together. That's what freedom is about.

Henry Sturman

by Henry Sturman on Fri, 03/26/2004 - 10:01 | reply owned!

applause for henry

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Fri, 03/26/2004 - 10:48 | reply

A better alternative to government imposed sanctions

Microsoft strategies for lovers of freedom and justice

by a reader on Fri, 03/26/2004 - 17:30 | reply

Freedom and Justice?

That all of those non-MS alternatives exist is proof that Microsoft is not inhibiting freedom. And, I haven't heard a persuasive argument that Microsoft has done anything unjust.

Anyone, who wants to, can try to compete with Microsoft. But, people who want governments to intervene with voluntary trade to help assure the success of Microsoft's competitors are supporting something very different from freedom and justice.

Gil

by Gil on Fri, 03/26/2004 - 18:59 | reply

Freedom

That all of those non-MS alternatives exist is proof that Microsoft is not inhibiting freedom.

No it doesn't. I can create a much longer list of non-MS alternatives that no longer exist at all. Does just the mere existence of this other list provide proof that Microsoft is inhibiting freedom? Neither list provides "proof" either way.

And, I haven't heard a persuasive argument that Microsoft has done anything unjust.

Read Judge Jackson's Findings of Fact. The interesting part starts at the bottom of page 40 in the section "Microsoft's response to the browser threat".

This is not a company competing in the market by providing it's customer with better choices (i.e. more freedom). This is a company that competes by inhibiting its customers choices to its products. Microsoft is the master at inhibiting our freedom to ensure that their products remain the only choice.

But even if you remove Microsoft's business practices, their products still inhibit your freedom. You do not have the freedom to make a copy of their software and give it to someone else. Nor do you have the freedom to modify, enhance, or just fix out right bugs in their programs. This is not a moral criticism of Microsoft, they are entirely within their rights to put whatever restrictions they want on the terms of the purchase of their products. It is merely a statement of fact of the way that proprietary software in general inhibits your freedom.

Note that none of those non-MS alternatives inhibit your freedom in this way.

by a reader on Fri, 03/26/2004 - 20:15 | reply

Freedom and Justice

Competing vigorously (but not fraudulently) and exploiting competitive advantages and enforcing property rights is not inhibiting freedom or violating justice. Freedom and justice don't entail having your dreams come true regardless of the facts of reality.

It sounds like your problems are with property rights, not Microsoft.

I started to look at the findings of fact (from the man thrown off the case for unethical behavior and clear anti-MS prejudice), but I didn't see anything new or unjust. Can you tell me what specific action that Microsoft did what was unjust? I don't mean something that was tough or an aggressive business practice, but a violation of other people's rights.

Gil

by Gil on Fri, 03/26/2004 - 21:56 | reply

Back to freedom.

I am willing to accept that whether or not Microsoft's business practices can be interpreted as unjust versus very aggressive is very debatable. I do see both sides of the issues. IMO, the behavior in this recent The New York Times article is unethical, unjust, and immoral (sorry, free subscription required):

Newly Released Documents Shed Light on Microsoft Tactics

I do not have any problems with property rights. I already stated, "This is not a moral criticism of Microsoft, they are entirely within their rights to put whatever restrictions they want on the terms of the purchase of their products." I agree that they have such rights.

What I said is that the rights Microsoft asserts with regards to its products (which in this case is actually deals with copyrights, not property rights), does place a limit on our freedom of what we can do with that product. This is completely independent of Microsoft's business practices, they could be the perfect corporate example of proper behavior, yet such actions still result in the same restriction of our freedoms.

Let me repeat. Microsoft is entirely within their rights for imposing such restrictions, just as I am from restricting complete strangers from trespassing on my property. But let's be clear, both scenarios are in fact inhibiting the freedom of others, both scenarios are less than a completely non-coercive situation.

The freedom being referred to in the title of the original article I linked to is this freedom. Our freedom to do what we want with the software on our computers. The products referenced in that article give you this freedom, whereas Microsoft's products restrict this freedom.

by a reader on Fri, 03/26/2004 - 23:23 | reply

subject lines now have a max length that's pretty short a reader is right that just as a list of failed companies wouldn't prove microsoft evil, a list of active ones does not prove it innocent.

on the other hand, i read the entire section about microsoft and the browser threat. the gist of it is microsoft didn't give certain technical specs to netscape, and offered some deals that would suck for netscape. as to the deals, so what? now, in a better society, any company trying to sell an OS but hiding tech specs from developers they don't like, wouldn't sell many copies once that got announced on the news. but microsoft is not to blame that our society is sufficiently bad to buy windows anyway. they figured out how much shit most people wouldn't mind. somewhat immoral, but shrug perfectly legal, perfectly just, as it should be.

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Fri, 03/26/2004 - 23:49 | reply

Definitions

If Microsoft did violate confidentiality agreements then I agree that's immoral. I know that this has been alleged many times, and perhaps it has happened, but I know that Microsoft officially strongly discourages such activity and will fire employees who are found guilty of such actions.

Aside from that, you (Reader) seem to be using the expression "inhibiting freedom and justice" to mean that they do things that you don't think are in your (or others') best interest, or that don't allow you (or others) to do whatever you want with Microsoft's products. This usage is very different from mine.

Physics and morality place limits on your actions. Calling this inhibiting your freedom seems strange to me, and calling it unjust seems even worse.

Why not just say you don't like some of the things that Microsoft does?

Microsoft's behavior is not up to you, and I suspect that this is a very good thing for the world. Microsoft has a tremendous record of success and productivity that greatly surpasses that of its competitors and critics who offer it unsolicited advice.

Microsoft's aggressive practices may not make us happy, but I think we agree that they tend to be within their rights. What's clear to me is that the EU's actions (and the US DOJ's before it) are unjust and immoral. I think The World is right to recognize and condemn these actions.

Likewise, I think it's perfectly within your rights to avoid Microsoft's products; but wrong to imply that they are acting immorally by invoking "freedom and justice". I also happen to think that you're making a mistake to encourage others to follow your lead, if you think that the tech industry (and everyone it affects) would be better off if Microsoft were made to fail. I think it would be much worse off.

Gil

by Gil on Sat, 03/27/2004 - 09:55 | reply

EU's Microsoft Inquisition

The EU's Inquisition of Microsoft is so ridiculous that it baffles the mind. The EU's ruling, once you take away the legal jargon, basically says that Microsoft is responsible for producing too good of a product, and that other companies that don't produce products that are as good as Microsoft's are being unfairly discriminated against because these other company's products aren't good enough to be sought after by users/consumers.

Ask yourself this question. Why do the computer companies include Microsoft with the purchase of their PCs? I'll tell you why, because their PCs wouldn't sell if they didn't include Microsoft's Windows. It's a very simple fact of supply and demand, and no sane PC manufacturer is going to SUPPLY PC's that only offer Linux as the OS because there is no DEMAND for PC's that only offer Linux as their OS. Granted, there are quite a few Linux users, but they comprise less than 1% of new PC buyers (probably because these users are usually computer geeks who prefer to make their own PCs from parts they buy at discount suppliers such as Price Watch...like me!).

Once again, the EU's whining about something because their countries' companies can't come up with anything to rival Microsoft. So instead of trying harder to make a better product (thus, "raising the bar" so to speak) they prefer to drag down the competition so that their sub-par products can get a "fair share" of the market. If an End User can't figure out how to send email attachments, much less load the appropriate drivers for a software application to run on a Windows platform, then they probably shouldn't be using that application in the first place and should stick with the Windows application that came with their PC (that's why Windows is so successful...because even a complete idiot can point and click on the GUI button prompts that have made Windows so popular). Yet, somehow the EU thinks that this ease of use is a bad thing and that because Microsoft has made PC usage so easy for PC users that they have broken some law of conduct that makes it unfair for other software vendors who's products aren't as easy to use on a Microsoft Windows OS. That's the kind of logic that led the French Vici Government to adopt the "Victory through Surrender" approach to German aggression (and the Spanish government's current terrorist's puppet regime).

Hey Europe, get off the government dole and produce something! If you have to fine someone/something, fine yourselves for not having an original thought in the last fifty years! If I were Bill Gates, and who knows maybe I am, I'd pull any distribution of new Microsoft Products from Europe and make them come up with something on their own (and I wouldn't give them access to the billions of lines of code developed by Microsoft software engineers). I'd make them start from scratch, and if they stole any of Microsoft's code then I'd sue them!

by a reader on Sat, 03/27/2004 - 19:02 | reply

The difference is that PC is not produced by MS

Adn if I wat intel PC with Linux on it I shouldn't have been forced to pay for Windows

by a reader on Sun, 03/28/2004 - 20:56 | reply

Missing the point

Microsoft - and I must say I abhor EU and EUNUCHJS and EUROCRAPPERS and all they stand for - engaged in PREDATORY MONOPOLISTIC practices! Not only in EU, but in the US and, indeed worldwide. All what was said above it's very nice, but nobody noted the MEGA COSTS for millions of users and companies because of this predatory behaviour. Just think back 10 years, and tabulate losses through viri, worms. Hell - just think about the man-years lost through rebooting every day, at least once, to keep the beast alive! Ask the South Koreans if they are happy with Microsoft, after loosing like 3bln last year through use of Windoze. MS uses a big part of its profits, just like the tobacco companies, to hire the best lawyers to avoid law-suits. I predict, just like the tobacco companies, this is FUTILE. Once there is a breach Bill will be much poorer and MS price on NYSE 5 % of what it's now. In the previous comments I discern lack of knowledge about

1, what LINUX is, can do, how MARVELOUSLY stable it is (I write this cmnt. of course on LINUX MANDRAKE!)

2, history of MS - the years of "WAPORWARE" (eg. a small co., like CARLSBAD with their compression SW is WIPED OUT by MS promising MONTH-AFTER-MONTH "better solutions", after few months the targeted co. folds - NO SALES - everybody waits for "superior" product from MS)

I've been with the PC's since 1976, and IMHO we would've been much better off if MS was cut down to size in the US years ago.

MS is bad news for freedom and capitalism!

Oldo, Bhaktapur, Nepal

by a reader on Mon, 03/29/2004 - 06:40 | reply

bzzzzt. try again.

ummm, just calling someone "predatory" is not case closed. you have to say exactly what they did and why it's wrong.

u gave an example about MS promising upgrades then taking 4ever. well, so what? if everyone wants MS products so much they will wait 4ever instead of buying from someone else ... well how do u get from there to something illegal?

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 03/29/2004 - 11:35 | reply

It's a bit strange

It's a bit strange. Someone in this thread says they use Linux but the evil Microsoft monopoly forced them to buy Windows. Another person says they build their own PC but the evil Microsoft monopoly stops them buying one unless they buy Windows too. Well, those two people should get together and prove each other wrong.

Meanwhile, I use a Mac on which I run the Mac OS. I could run Linux if I wanted, or even Microsoft Virtual PC with Windows. Somehow the evil Microsoft monopoly failed to stop me doing all that. What's the definition of monopoly again?

Now here I am depriving everyone in the entire world of their freedom to be 15th on this comment thread. I have established a monopoly on it! Will the EU come and fine me too?

by a reader on Tue, 03/30/2004 - 06:07 | reply

Will the EU fine you?

Whether or not the EU will fine you depends on a very important matter of principle to them.

How much have you got?

Gil

by Gil on Tue, 03/30/2004 - 17:09 | reply

Sorry, Microsoft is corrupt...

Yet another example of business as usual within Microsoft:

Microsoft behind $12 million payment to Opera

Microsoft purposely made it so Opera, a competing browser, would display messed up pages when viewing MSN. This is not a case of Opera not working correctly. If Opera identified itself to MSN as IE, then Opera could display the generated pages just fine. But if Opera identified itself as itself, then MSN generated a different set of pages which made Opera display the site with errors.

The only explanation that I can conclude for MSN generating different pages for Opera than IE was to make it appear that the Opera browser was faulty. Note that this occurred at the same time both Opera and IE were competing for contracts in the embedded browser market (such as PDAs and cell phones).

by a reader on Tue, 05/25/2004 - 18:37 | reply

corrupt?

It says: "Opera has accused Microsoft of deliberately breaking interoperability between its MSN Web portal and various versions of the Opera browser--charges that the software giant has repeatedly denied."

Well, suppose Microsoft did do this. What exactly is corrupt about "breaking interoperability" between one's own web site and someone else's browser?

Un-public-spirited, definitely. Ungenerous, probably. Mean, maybe. But corrupt? How? And why on earth should doing a thing like that be against the law?

I don't use MSN or IE. Do you? If so, why don't you stop? If not, what are you complaining about?

by a reader on Tue, 05/25/2004 - 19:51 | reply

Yes, corrupt.

They did not just "break interoperability". If the entire web site was designed such that IE worked fine but Opera had problems, I would call that "breaking interoperability". However, what MSN was doing was detecting when the Opera browser was accessing it and then feeding only it a set of pages designed specifically to break it. If Opera fooled MSN into thinking it was IE, then Opera displayed the IE generated pages without a hitch. Here is a technical explanation of what MSN was doing:

Why doesn't MSN work with Opera

It was if and only if the browser was Opera that MSN would feed it the faulty web page. If Opera identified itself as an unknown browser such as Oprah, then MSN did not send it the faulty page. At the time, Microsoft denied any problem on their end and claimed Opera was not standards compliant, and Microsoft continues to deny any fault.

To purposely cause a competitors product to fail and then to deny that you were the cause of the failure is well beyond un-public-spirited, ungenerous, or mean. It is dishonest and deceitful. It is yet another example of the core corruption of Microsofts business practices.

I do not use either MSN or IE and I am not complaining. I am stating that I think Microsoft is corrupt and needs to be identified as such.

by a reader on Tue, 05/25/2004 - 20:37 | reply

Libel

To accuse Microsoft of corruption, and of purposely doing things one has insufficient evidence of (that has been denied), seems at best irresponsible and at worst libelous.

I'm not sure what's happening in this case, but I know that ASP.NET can generate different HTML based on the detected browser type. This is a feature intended to ease development. It's an attempt to make things work well in all browsers; not to fail. The problem is that many browsers are not standards compliant and adapting code to handle each one's incompatibilities can be a lot of work.

Now, it might be that Microsoft made mistakes when generating Opera code (perhaps they misinterpreted a bug, or the bug was fixed, or they just did it wrong...). But it takes a fanatical conspiracy theorist to conclude that they must have intended for visitors, to a site that they hope to reap large ad revenues from, to have a bad experience in the hopes that they'll want to switch to Microsoft's free browser.

Gil

by Gil on Thu, 06/03/2004 - 16:31 | reply

Corrupt I say!

I'm not sure what's happening in this case, but I know that ASP.NET can generate different HTML based on the detected browser type. This is a feature intended to ease development. It's an attempt to make things work well in all browsers; not to fail. The problem is that many browsers are not standards compliant and adapting code to handle each one's incompatibilities can be a lot of work.

These days, all browsers with the exception of IE attempt to be standards compliant. I realize that way back when Netscape ruled before IE that it did add many non standards compliant features, but that was a long time ago. Currently, I am not aware of a single browser (again except IE) that does anything beyond what the W3C standards dictate.

These days web sites have to worry about two classes of browsers, IE which makes no attempt to keep with the latest W3C standards and the rest which do.

Can you provide any references to these non-IE browsers that are not standards compliant?

Now, it might be that Microsoft made mistakes when generating Opera code (perhaps they misinterpreted a bug, or the bug was fixed, or they just did it wrong...).

As the above linked article explains, the problem was MSN sent the Opera browser a style sheet with the following code:

```
ul { margin: -2px 0px 0px -30px;
}
```

The problem is the "-30px" value which explicitly instructs Opera to move list elements 30 pixels to the left of its parent. This was the only thing wrong and caused all lists to look like they are misaligned. Opera has never had any bugs or problems with aligning list elements in the wrong place. This is not a complicated piece of html or code to have accidentally made a mistake with.

If Opera identified itself as IE, then this "-30px" value did not occur and Opera displayed the IE compatible pages just fine. If Opera identified itself as some random, unknown browser, then this "-30px" did not occur and Opera displayed what must be the default pages just fine. It was if and only if the browser said it was Opera that this extra "-30px" showed up and Opera dutifully complied with exactly what it was told to do.

But it takes a fanatical conspiracy theorist to conclude that they must have intended for visitors, to a site that they hope to reap large ad revenues from, to have a bad experience in the hopes that they'll want to switch to Microsoft's free browser.

I agree if the point was to try and get personal computer users to switch back to IE then this would be a fanatical conspiracy theory. But this was not the reason.

The reason is because at the time the two companies were (and still are) competing in the embedded browser market. Microsoft was trying to scare companies considering contracting with Opera Software instead of Microsoft for the use of their browser in cell phones and PDAs. It did this by making it appear that Opera was flaky at times and could not render sites properly that other browsers could.

Microsoft was just doing business as usual when trying to take over a new market.

by a reader on Fri, 06/04/2004 - 01:15 | reply

The Many Other Wheelchairs, And Related Matters

Allah Is In The House is in a rare serious mood today, and is at least as well worth reading as when he is being hilarious. Read it, and follow his links too.

Fri, 03/26/2004 - 03:40 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Terrorism

Though global terrorism is on the rise, there is some good news, and that is that terrorism by Europeans has been in sharp decline since the 70s. European terrorists have always had at least some rationality, and they have tended not to maximize the number of deaths in their acts, because they knew that would not be good for their popularity. IRA bombings have ceased and ETA bombings have become smaller. And the Rote Armee Faction and the Italian Death brigades have pretty much disappeared. Arab terrorists are less susceptible to rational reasoning, because they have no political cause and have only an ideology that promotes killing as many Jews, Christians, and nonbelievers, as their holy book clearly advocates. Well, at some point they will change as well, because there is a tendency of humans in the end to want Western values of freedom and prosperity because they are universal values, and so the Arabs will eventually understand that. I just hope it doesn't take 100 years. But events in countries like Iran are promising nonetheless.

Henry Sturman

by Henry Sturman on Fri, 03/26/2004 - 23:26 | reply

A Meaningless Death In An Evil Cause

Oliver Kamm rightly speaks ill of the dead – Tom Hurndall of the International Solidarity Movement (ISM), in whose service Hurndall died. The ISM, under the thin disguise of 'peace activism', does nothing for peace but is active in support of the mass murder of Jews in Israel. Although the details of the two cases differ slightly, most of our comments on that other dead ISM activist, Rachel Corrie, apply here too.

Mon, 03/29/2004 - 16:19 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Iran: Get It, Before It Gets You

Here are two articles for people who, like ourselves, need to learn more about Iran. The first, Who Rules Iran?, is about how Iran is governed:

Westerners often meet with assorted officials who, they are led to believe, run Islamist Iran. They don't.

The second article, The Next Threat, is about the historic catastrophe that Iran is about to bring about, if we – and particularly the US government – can't find a way to stop them:

The Shahab-4 missile, developed with the kind assistance of North Korea, could carry a plutonium-core nuclear bomb from Iran to Central Europe. Even the mullahs aren't crazy enough to do that, but just the existence of that capability may well affect European decision makers when they next discuss immigration, or headscarves, or the middle east conflict, or cooperation with the United States. But the critical issues are not those. They are: the survival of Israel, and the threat of an untraceable nuclear attack on America.

Taken together, the implication of these two articles is this: the present evil oligarchy that rules Iran is speeding down the road to hell – for them, their people, and for the rest of the world. Yet they will not voluntarily change course. The only way of avoiding this hell is for the people of Iran to change their government.

Tue, 03/30/2004 - 17:08 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Pakistan could also be "The next threat"

In my eyes, Pakistan represents just as great a threat as Iran. General Musharraf's grip on power is weak and the country is swarming with Islamofacists who would grasp any chance to topple him. And the recent battle with al-Qaeda members in the border region of Waziristan will only have underscored Musharraf's weakness and emboldened the Islamofacists.

by a reader on Wed, 03/31/2004 - 02:20 | reply

only way? what about the people of somewhere else changing it for them?

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 03/31/2004 - 05:20 | reply

The proposed solution is horrific

The proposed solution in the second article mentioned seems at least strange.

First of all, I don't get this: "destroying the Zionist entity is worth the retaliation". It assumes that Iran could potentially bear the consequences of a "one or few nuclear detonations" caused by Israel. Well, everyone is ignorant in some ways. So, we can assume they are nuts, i.e. Israel nuclear program wouldn't stop them. Then American one wouldn't do either.

Second, the author then suggests to threaten them. American society is very good at threatening their criminals with a capital punishment and prisons - do they have less criminals or prisoners per 1000 of population? Another question is - are you really going to wipe out the whole state if a new terrorist attacks happens brought by unidentified terrorist group or it is just a threat that suppose to restrain them well?

Reminding you again Osirak campaign in 1981 I could suggest a better way of dealing with them. If Israel cannot accomplish a similar task with now several Iranian targets, then US probably can (without starting a full-fledged war). International community will swear hard on US, but, as the author asserted on account of this, who cares?

Not far apart from this topic, an interesting fundamental question arises - shell a nuclear submarin soldier launch an attack knowing that his own state has been already wiped out? If he does so - there will be no chances of hosting a human life on Earth for another 4 billion years, if not - there is still a certain possibility that at least one continent will survive (of course, with evil regime). What's your answer?

by a reader on Wed, 03/31/2004 - 10:25 | reply

Joint effort

Elliot,
...or a combination of the two?

-An Iranian Student (AIS)

by a reader on Sat, 04/03/2004 - 01:50 | reply

The Iran hype-machine has beg

The Iran hype-machine has begun. Are we looking for the action to begin in June? Remember, Americans have a very short attention span.

The fear and panic this propaganda is supposed to initiate cannot be sustained for a lengthy period and must be used within several months or it will be squandered.

by a reader on Tue, 04/26/2005 - 03:23 | reply

Re: The Iran hype-machine has beg

It's almost funny that the anonymous reader from Towson, Maryland posted such a comment on an article over a year old.

Only almost, because the anonymous reader arrived here via a Google search: iran wipe out the zionist entity israel.

by Editor on Tue, 04/26/2005 - 04:47 | reply

A Reporter Fails To Apologise

"Reporter Apologizes for Iraq Coverage", says the headline in "America's Oldest Journal Covering the Newspaper Industry":

In the wake of Richard Clarke's dramatic personal apology to the families of 9/11 victims last week -- on behalf of himself and his government -- for failing to prevent the terrorist attacks, one might expect at least a few mea culpas related to the release of false information on the Iraq threat before and after the war. While the major media, from The New York Times on down, has largely remained silent about their own failings in this area, a young columnist for a small paper in Fredericksburg, Va., has stepped forward.

The "young columnist" in question, Rick Mercier, had stepped forward to say:

The media are finished with their big blowouts on the anniversary of the invasion of Iraq, and there's one thing they forgot to say: We're sorry. Sorry we let unsubstantiated claims drive our coverage. Sorry we were dismissive of experts who disputed White House charges against Iraq. Sorry we let a band of self-serving Iraqi defectors make fools of us. Sorry we fell for Colin Powell's performance at the United Nations. Sorry we couldn't bring ourselves to hold the administration's feet to the fire before the war, when it really mattered. Maybe we'll do a better job next war. Of course it's absurd to receive this apology from a person so low in the media hierarchy. You really ought to be getting it from the editors and reporters at the agenda-setting publications, such as The New York Times and The Washington Post.

Quite a climb down, you might think. A dramatic reappraisal of his former views. Others who supported the liberation of Iraq might therefore do well to reappraise theirs? That's certainly how the Communist China Daily, and apparently all others who picked up the story, saw it (Admission of US media's fault concerning pre-Iraq war coverage). "Rick Mercier is a brave young man" wrote one reader of the report in InfoShop News. "It's been a long time since a journalist has taken this level of responsibility" wrote another, as they unanimously welcomed the convert.

But the whole thing is bunk. In reality, this "person so low in the hierarchy" was no convert to the anti-liberation camp. He had been a virulent opponent of the liberation before, during and after the event, and he was not apologising at all. He was fantasising about other reporters apologising to him and other like him. For what? Well, in his fantasy, the media had spent the pre-war months in a frenzy of blind support for the liberation of Iraq.

Ironically, but not surprisingly, he does have something to apologise for. A quick visit to Google shows that he did let unsubstantiated claims and blind partisanship drive his coverage. Propagating the 'imminent danger' canard, and touting an arms embargo against Israel as an alternative formula for regional stability, and speaking wildly of chicken hawks, he was insufficiently critical of 'experts' who claimed that "the Kurds of Northern Iraq aren't too keen on [an invasion]", and that an invasion would be followed by "tens, perhaps hundreds, of thousands of more civilian deaths, particularly among children, the aged, and others of the most vulnerable sectors".

And not one word about the continuing murder and terror that following their advice, and his, would have visited upon the people of Iraq.

Fri, 04/02/2004 - 02:35 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

So, where is WMD? Where is Al-Qaeda link?

I agree on Israel issue. I agree that that was an evil regime in Iraq indeed. Millions of people in North Korea are dying from hunger because of even worse regime - so what? I seem to be like a child saying: THE KING IS NAKED. Produce your proof at last!!!

by a reader on Fri, 04/02/2004 - 11:13 | reply

Media

Who is the "media"? The "media" is not any one source or even a hundred sources. The "media" is the mediums of transmission of words and pictures, synopsisized and soliliquy-ized by thousands of mostly invisible journalists, reporters, media-heads, headline writers, editors and the like across all the media mediums. To say that the "media" should apologise completely misunderstands and misstates the nature of the assemblage, massaging, sorting, defining of information which is transmitted across and to the vast audience of people who then receive and digest transmitted information in their own individual minds.

What is more truthful to say is that the "media" is a vast marketplace of words and pictures and sounds across many languages and mediums that is only accountable to its readers, viewers, and listeners. Any opinion and its opposites can easily be found, useful and useless. There is choice, and there is rebuttal. The old adage about marketplaces says, "Let the buyer beware".

Since the "media" is a distributed marketplace of marketplaces and venues, and there is no such thing as one arbiter of the vast media bazaar, might we say, "Let the recipient reason". Choose wisely. Choose critically. Utilize your perceptive capacities and your mind.

Ultimately, there is no one to apologise for "the media". Or, there is everyone to apologise, and to apologise for, but why? There is always specifically bad reporting along with the good, along with the insightful. There is always the competitive scramble to "sell" the particular idea product in any way and by any means that it can be sold. There is always somewhere, the voice of reason, or rather, voices of reason. Some of the products are useful, some of them are useless or worse. Some of this is not "fit to print" or to disseminate. What is so new about that? It has always been so from the times of the first scribes and orators and gossip in the street.

As always, then as now, there is only personal responsibility. We live within a river of the words and pictures and sounds, growing wider, flowing faster, among which we must personally discriminate the flotsam from the jetsam and the eddies from the streams. Although specific distortions are always culpable, responsible or not to someone and somewhere, there is no river god of "media", or even a river god of "big media" to blame.

It is the consumer of information who blindly believes in distorted ideas who should apologize. Yet, apologize to whom, oneself, and for what, ignorance or gullibility? Rather than mea culpa, get on with it, consider the source and the content. Above all, take personal responsibility. Agree, rebut, discuss.

"Let the recipient reason". Set it right within.

by a reader on Fri, 04/02/2004 - 17:36 | reply

sigh

how about "a large majority of major media outlets that deal with politics acted very badly. each and every one that acted badly ought to apologise for it."

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Fri, 04/02/2004 - 17:56 | reply

Spain Gets War?

No, not yet. The Spanish people were indeed given the choice between war and shame, they did indeed choose shame, they will indeed get war. But the bomb found on a Spanish high-speed railway track today is not that war. That's not how it works. In the short run, appeasement usually pays off.

Nevertheless, this incident does illustrate two points that appeasers everywhere desperately need to consider. The first is that the terrorists of the world are already working as hard as they can to kill good people and bring down the only society in which people can become better. Partial submission will seem as meaningless a gesture to them as it does to you. It will not placate them, any more than an offer to exempt Methodists from terrorism would placate President Bush. And by the same token, refusing to submit will not make them any angrier. They are already mass-murdering innocent people! They could not be more angry.

The second point is that the enemies of civilisation, though they have become remarkably similar in their strategies and tactics, are diverse in their other aims and ideologies. So people who initially hoped that the attacks of March 11 were perpetrated by Basque separatist terrorists rather than by Al Qaeda, and those who now hope that today's bomb wasn't placed by Muslims, are missing this bigger picture: in regard to the appeasement issue, it really doesn't matter whose bomb this is. If it is Al Qaeda's, then Spain has been unlucky and appeasement has failed in record time. But suppose for the sake of argument that Al Qaeda has decided not to attack Spain for the moment. Then nevertheless, Spain has been unlucky and appeasement is failing. For whoever planted this bomb wants something, and they expect their demands to be met just as they saw Al Qaeda's being met. And they won't stop until they either get what they want or the survivors among them despair of ever getting it.

What if this bomb was set by some ultra-nationalist terrorist group opposed to the appeasement of Muslims? Take this to its logical conclusion: if rival terrorist groups make opposite demands, which one does the appeaser choose to appease? And in either case, what good does it do? What effect can it have, other than to attract even more terrorists to the decaying corpse of the appeasers' society?

Copyright © 2007 Setting The World To Rights

Hans Blix's Allegiance

Hans Blix, the former UN weapons inspector, has at last openly declared his allegiance to Saddam Hussein.

No doubt he does not think of himself as having done that, but then, what Hans Blix thinks has never been a good guide to what is so. He thinks he has been fairly explicit in siding against Saddam:

“What's positive is that Saddam and his bloody regime is gone,”

But there's a 'but':

“but when figuring out the score, the negatives weigh more,” the former chief U.N. weapons inspector was quoted as saying in the daily newspaper Jyllands Posten. “That accounts for the many casualties during the war and the many people who still die because of the terrorism the war has nourished,” he said. “The war has liberated the Iraqis from Saddam, but the costs have been too great.”

But this is identical to Saddam's own position on this matter. Saddam probably did not, even in the privacy of his own mind or within the inner circle of the Ba'ath Party, hold up his killings and tortures and repression as being benefits of his rule. He would have called them necessary evils, worth it on balance because the alternative of stepping down would, in his view, have precipitated an even worse outcome.

Blix, in endorsing Saddam's view of why it would have been better if Saddam had stayed in power and continued his aggressive, mass-murdering tyranny, has sided with Saddam.

Tue, 04/06/2004 - 17:59 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Popper thought

Popper thought an idea should be criticised on it's content not on who held it.

So, does The World have an argument for why Blix's position is wrong?

And if Irag becomes an Islamic Republic rules over by a Grand Ayatollah, will The World admin that Blix was right, and that it was wrong?

by a reader on Wed, 04/07/2004 - 08:59 | reply

sheesh

oh come on. The World was not disputing Popper, they were just assuming their readers were opposed to Saddam and his murderous regime.

you want an argument for why that's a good idea? because he was murderous. the side-effects of fighting evil are the fault of the evil people who had to be fought, not something to blame on the good guys.

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 04/07/2004 - 11:34 | reply

Kebab

Sadam was murderous, but he has been murderous for a long time. The West chose to side with him against Iran because a murderous fascist regime is less dangerous than an Islamic Fundamentalist one. Sadam, if left in power, would have killed many of his own people, but he would have been unlikely to want to nuke Manhattan or set bombs on the London Underground.

During the cold war all sensible people knew it was necessary sometimes to side with evil people, and ignore their deeds, strategically, while fighting a bigger evil.

If Iraq falls to the Islamists then this invasion will have been a huge strategic blunder, and your desire to kill bad people, even when un-strategic, will be revealed as naïve in the extreme.

Thatcher would have known that, as would Churchill.

by a reader on Wed, 04/07/2004 - 14:44 | reply

A Simple Point

This piece was making a simple point: that Blix's position on the issue of whether Saddam should have been allowed to carry on doing what he was doing, and why, is the same as that of Saddam himself. It argued for this point simply by stating both positions without the logically irrelevant details (such as Saddam's Ba'athist ideology, or the disclaimer preceding Blix's 'but') and noting that they are identical. This argument did not address, and does not depend on, whether this common position of theirs is right or wrong.

by Editor on Wed, 04/07/2004 - 15:11 | reply

Iraq and terrorists

'Sadam, if left in power, would have killed many of his own people, but he would have been unlikely to want to nuke Manhattan or set bombs on the London Underground.'

Saddam funded terrorism, which made him a legitimate target of the War on Terror. He might not have set a bomb on the Underground, but some of the terrorists he funded might have.

'During the cold war all sensible people knew it was necessary sometimes to side with evil people, and ignore their deeds, strategically, while fighting a bigger evil.'

That is true and that is why we are allied with Pakistan at present.

'If Iraq falls to the Islamists then this invasion will have been a huge strategic blunder, and your desire to kill bad people, even when un-strategic, will be revealed as naive in the extreme.'

No. If Iraq falls to the Islamists then somebody somewhere along the line has made a mistake about the country's security arrangements. However, that has not happened and probably will not happen at all.

by Alan Forrester on Wed, 04/07/2004 - 15:18 | reply

Re:A Simple Point

And there was not the slightest hint that having the same opinion as Saddam implied some guilt by association, or was prima-facie evidence of badness. This was a simple piece with no sub text whatsoever. Any subtler meaning was entirely in my own mind I am sure.

by a reader on Wed, 04/07/2004 - 15:49 | reply

A Simple Point

I have to agree with "a reader" that this post seems designed to argue against Blix's position by associating it with Saddam, and that this is an appeal to emotion rather than reason.

I think Blix is wrong, but the fact that Saddam would have made a similar argument is irrelevant to that. And, while Saddam might have expressed a similar argument, I'm sure his considerations weren't identical to Blix's. I suspect that the fact that it was he who was in power would have entered into his thinking on the matter.

Saddam is a murderous bastard. And I think that if someone agreed with him about everything, then that would be good circumstantial evidence that he was similarly immoral. But a single identical conclusion is evidence of precisely nothing.

Gil

by Gil on Thu, 04/08/2004 - 18:19 | reply

Re: A Simple Point

It's not the conclusion, it's the argument, based on the judgement that Iraq under Saddam was 'on balance' better off than it is after liberation. Not everyone who opposed Saddam's removal made that argument, because not all of them share that judgement, and the underlying moral values on which it is based. That Saddam and Blix both do share that judgement and those values even though they differ in other judgements and values is, I think, undeniable and also significant. It reflects badly on both of them as people. (BTW I agreed with Oliver Kamm's take on the broader issue at the end of this piece.)

That Saddam would have made other arguments as well is undoubtedly true. And he would have been superhuman if his own future had not figured somewhere in his private deliberations. But it seems highly implausible that his personal benefit was the decisive argument in his mind: first, because millions of other people who are not Saddam approved of his rule too; and second, because if he had not approved, on balance, of the way he ruled, he would have ruled differently.

by David Deutsch on Thu, 04/08/2004 - 20:00 | reply

Not The Same Argument

I'm sorry, but I don't think it's credible that Blix and Saddam believe anything like the same argument.

I don't think Saddam weighs the harm caused by either his own murders and tortures or the harm to casualties of the invasion as heavily as Blix does.

And, I can't know for sure, but I suspect, that Saddam would disagree with Blix both about whether the invasion and transformation of Iraq, if successful, would help or hurt terrorism; as well as about whether international terrorism is a bad thing.

And, I don't understand the "second" point above. How does Saddam's approval of the way he ruled argue against his personal benefit being a decisive argument in his mind? Isn't his personal benefit likely to be part of why he approved of his rule? I suspect that if he had been a victim of another tyrant ruling identically, he wouldn't have approved as much.

Gil

by Gil on Thu, 04/08/2004 - 21:00 | reply

Not 'Allegiance'

I agree that 'allegiance' is not a fair description of what Blix has shown Saddam. But I think 'siding with' is a fair description. They share the relevant values of undervaluing the freedom of Iraqis and being blind to Saddam's instability and menace. Because of those shared values, they agree about who should currently be ruling

Iraq, despite their differences in other respects.

by David Deutsch on Fri, 04/09/2004 - 13:53 | reply

Siding with one Evil

Good point. The World would then - in making any statement on which evil was greatest - necessarily (by its own words) "side" with one of the two evils.

Indeed, by the logic of The World's own argument: Whenever there are two opposed evils, and you make any judgement about their badness, you always side with one of the evils - which is still an evil - and are therefore always to be identified with that evil as if you had perpetrated it yourself.

by a reader on Fri, 04/16/2004 - 11:48 | reply

Re: Siding With Evil

If you judge that one of two evils is greater than the other, and it is, then surely you have done nothing wrong. If the difference between the two evils is slight or subtle, then you may not have done anything wrong either. If, in judging between two evils, you favour the one which is in fact an enormously greater evil, then your judgement is morally wrong. If, in making the judgement, you assist the cause of the much greater evil, then you have done wrong. If you did this because you share some of the evil values, then you are to that extent 'identified' with the evil.

Is any of that controversial?

by David Deutsch on Fri, 04/16/2004 - 14:19 | reply

The controversy

Then I think it would be better to question Blix' judgement, rather than to tag it with "Saddam" and guilt-by-association. So your case is a good one, Mr Deutsch, though the original case was poorly stated.

by a reader on Mon, 04/19/2004 - 07:06 | reply

In A Nearby Universe: Japan May Withdraw From Iraq

Following the kidnapping of three Japanese civilians today by terrorists who threaten to burn them alive unless Japan withdraws its forces from Iraq, Japanese Prime Minister Koizumi demanded that Japan be allowed to reinforce its existing force of 550 with a specialised search-and-rescue team of 550,000, comprising five armoured divisions with corresponding air and logistical support.

'This is a Constitutional issue', said Koizumi. 'Our military is not called the Self-Defense Force for nothing. We are Constitutionally required to use it to defend our citizens from aggression, which this crime clearly is. Ever since World War II, Japan has considered itself to have a sacred commitment to the cause of peace. That is why we are proud members of the Coalition, and that is also why we are determined to rescue our kidnapped citizens with all possible dispatch, to bring their kidnappers to justice, and to burn every evil war criminal who dares to stand in our way while we are doing so.'

Japanese officials who have been asked to prepare contingency plans in case the hostages are found dead are said to be scouring certain 60-year-old documents 'for ideas'. Koizumi is said to have threatened to leave the Coalition if its response to today's outrage is insufficiently vigorous.

Fri, 04/09/2004 - 01:40 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Japanese Reactions in Iraq

Others have made a variety of comments in other places, but I'd just like to say that, based on my experiences in Japan that I would not want to be an arab/Islamic terrorist when the SDF is told to "get Imperial" on their butts.

"Insufficiently Vigourous response"!!!! Try cutting off limbs!

They have some VERY SERIOUS people in their post-WWII forces (in spite of a deliberate effort to look otherwise), and while I'd be pleased to have them in my foxhole or watching my 6, I would never want them mad enough to get serious on me.

This will be fun to watch.

Charlie 32

by a reader on Tue, 04/13/2004 - 03:07 | reply

Link, please

Do you have a link to Koizumi's response? There was nothing about the 550,000 in the article you had already linked to.

by a reader on Fri, 04/16/2004 - 10:50 | reply

Re: Link, please

Links to that parallel universe don't seem to be working at the moment. When they are, we'll post one right away.

by Editor on Fri, 04/16/2004 - 14:22 | reply

sheesh

oh c'mon. obviously the reader doesn't understand the MWI stuff. u ought to explain it, or at least point him in the right direction, not make an odd joke he won't follow. more like this:

dear confused reader person:

the universe thing is from quantum physics. you can just think of "in a nearby universe" like "imagine a duplicate of our universe, expect slightly different". so in this duplicate, we can imagine it'd be about the same, except b/c of a few differences (japanese more moral, in this case) there is a different result (japanese defense forces defend japanese citizens)

~curi

by a reader on Mon, 04/19/2004 - 01:34 | reply

Joke OK

The joke was right on. It was my own fault for not reading the damn headline. But then again, who does?

by a reader on Mon, 04/19/2004 - 07:03 | reply

i read headlines

i read headlines (repeating in case you don't read subject lines either)

also it wasn't really a joke. i believe The World is rightly entirely serious that A) that did happen in a similar universe and B) the implication that they'd like it to, and it'd be better

by a reader on Mon, 04/19/2004 - 23:09 | reply

Nuclear Dis-Argument

During the 1930s, the era of the Great Dictators, a faction in the West argued that the only way to achieve peace was to disarm, hoping that the Dictators would keep their promises to do likewise, and meanwhile to concede their demands and tolerate their crimes in order to persuade them that we were not belligerent (the Dictators' supposed belief that we were belligerent being the supposed cause of their demands and crimes). Unfortunately, this policy was adopted, and very soon caused the most destructive war in history with some fifty million dead.

In the minds of many people, this sequence of events had tested that policy to destruction. The very word 'appeasement', which had been proudly coined by the policy's own supporters, became a term of abuse. It remains so to this day, with the amusing consequence that ever since then, appeasers have been obliged to deny they are appeasers in order to get a hearing.

During the Cold War, the appeasers argued that the only way to achieve peace was to disarm unilaterally and hope that the Soviet Union and Communist China would follow suit, and meanwhile to concede their demands and tolerate their crimes in order to persuade them that we were not belligerent (the Communist dictators' supposed belief that we were belligerent being the supposed cause of their demands and crimes). Fortunately, fewer people than before now accepted this argument, and the policy was never enacted, thus preventing the most destructive war in history with some hundreds of millions dead.

Though the appeasers' position was not tested to destruction this time, the outcome of the Cold War nevertheless refuted it: the Soviet Empire did not launch a nuclear attack. Instead, it fell – though not before it had tried every possible strategy to conquer, enslave and intimidate other nations without provoking a nuclear response.

Which brings us to the present day, and another chapter in the shameful history of the appeasement faction. Only this time, it is not a matter of a flawed argument or a refuted argument, but of no argument.

The British Ministry of Defence is planning to redevelop its nuclear weapons facility at Aldermaston to replace Britain's Trident nuclear deterrent in 2010 if the need should arise. Anti-nuclear activists marched on the facility this Easter weekend in an attempt to stop this. The BBC comments:

The MoD insists whatever is decided will be within Britain's legal obligations under the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty.

But that treaty requires the signatories to work "in good faith" for total nuclear disarmament and forbids the acquisition of new nuclear weapons.

Actually the Treaty permits the modification of current nuclear weapons, which is what is being planned. Article X even allows signatories to withdraw under "extraordinary circumstances" – like, say, an Islamofascist country like Iran getting nukes?

But what is the supposed point of unilateral disarmament this time? The position of today's appeasers, who call themselves "peace protesters", is cruder and more reprehensible than that of their forebears. They are not fearful of invasion or destruction. They are fearful of the United States. They believe – viscerally – that the United States and its allies, especially Israel and Britain, are the essential evil in the world. They want this evil to be disarmed and if necessary eradicated by force, and for the future of the world to depend instead on the goodwill of the world's most irrational and tyrannical rulers, granted a monopoly of the world's most destructive weapons.

But the facts remain as they always were. The peace of the world is in no danger from British nuclear weapons, nor American nor Israeli ones. The exact opposite is the case. And in the current security situation, to reduce our capacity to retaliate against a nuclear strike is to invite such a strike from the enemies of civilisation.

Tue, 04/13/2004 - 23:01 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Tolerating The Intolerable

In a free society, thoughts go unpunished. There are exceptions: if you kill someone accidentally, you will be treated very differently from someone who did the same thing while intending to kill. The guilty thought makes all the difference.

In a free society, words go unpunished. There are exceptions: if you hire someone to commit a murder you are guilty of murder even if all you ever did was talk.

In a free society, the practice of religion goes unpunished. The only exceptions are acts which would be illegal whether they were religious practices or not.

Does Salman Rushdie live in a free society? Did his Japanese translator, his Italian translator, or his Norwegian publisher? And if they don't, do we?

Do mainstream Muslims living in Western countries identify with the evil doctrine of death to the apostate, or do they live in fear of it? Either way, do they live in a free society? And if they don't, do we?

Update (via LGF): an important paper, Islam, Apostasy, and Human Rights, presented to the UN Commission on Human Rights by Islamic apostate Ibn Warraq.

Sat, 04/17/2004 - 15:53 | digg | del.icio.us | permlink

Signed posts

I guess you've probably thought this over, but maybe you should post as individuals so we can see the differences among the contributors. Perhaps you all talk about the posts and contribute to the weblog as a collective. To some people it would be interesting to see the differences of opinion among the contributors, if there are any. I've noticed that the responses to comments are signed by individuals. Sometimes that provides an insight into what people think or what they will say in defence of their opinions. Some other blogs do the individualist method, though I have no idea whether that results in better entries. Perhaps you could sign as yourselves when you are the sole author, and not when it was a collective effort.

by a reader on Sun, 04/18/2004 - 01:44 | reply

1000 year Reich

If you ever wondered what the world would have been like if the Third Reich really remained in power for 1000 years and became the source of a 'civilization', you don't need to wonder anymore. Just look at islam and the Islamic world today. Well, it is 1400 year Reich by now, but you get the point.

An Iranian Student (AIS)

by a reader on Mon, 04/19/2004 - 00:31 | reply

Copyright © 2007 Setting The World To Rights

Captain Euro

Warliberal has a wonderful series of funny-because-they're true stories about a European superhero, Captain Euro:

Captain Euro in Afghanistan

Captain Euro meets Buffy the Vampire Slayer

By the way, if you don't know who Buffy the Vampire Slayer is, then you should immediately:

- Purchase a television set;
- Purchase a DVD player;
- Watch these.

Do this at once. We'll still be here when you get back.

The complete Captain Euro collection (in reverse chronological order)

Thanks to Meryl Yourish for the reference. Her blog is well worth reading too.

Tue, 04/20/2004 - 17:57 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

i don't see what's so great about buffy

i've watched a dozen or so eps from i think mostly around season 3, and the first about 4. i have up thru season 2 to watch whenever i want. but, shrug, there's so many other things, i don't watch buffy. i don't see what's so impressive.

also since u like buffy so much, you really ought to watch firefly.

by a reader on Tue, 04/20/2004 - 20:29 | reply

Not A “Whistleblower”

Reuters, the masters of anti-Israeli and anti-American bias, report:

Israeli nuclear whistleblower Mordechai Vanunu emerged defiant after 18 years in prison Wednesday, saying he was proud of revealing secrets that exposed the Jewish state as an atomic power.

Whistleblowers are insiders who report wrongdoing in the organisations for which they work. But many highly reputable people (including ourselves, of course) believe that there was no wrongdoing in Israel possessing nuclear weapons, or in keeping the details secret. The correct term for people who reveal military secrets is spies. If they do this with the intention of destroying the state of which they are citizens, then they are also traitors.

By using the unambiguously positive term whistleblower rather than spy or traitor, or even renegade or defector, Reuters is endorsing Vanunu's call for the destruction of Israel.

Update: In regard to a tangentially related issue, Steven Den Beste corresponds with a reporter from Paris Match and criticises their biased conception of impartiality.

Wed, 04/21/2004 - 18:16 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

A reader

Does the state have the right to develop nuclear weapons without seeking the consent of the citizenry? If so, why?

by a reader on Thu, 04/22/2004 - 10:00 | reply

Secret weapons

a reader asked:

Does the state have the right to develop nuclear weapons without seeking the consent of the citizenry? If so, why?

Most states do not have the right to develop nuclear weapons at all. Those that do, derive that right from their duty to defend their citizens. In some situations, the effectiveness of a weapon depends on secrecy. In such situations, if the the state in question has a right to develop that weapon at all, it has an obligation to develop it with the appropriate level of secrecy.

Thus, for instance, the Soviet Union and China had no right to develop nuclear weapons because they were rogue states. The United States had both a right and a duty to develop them because they were fighting a just war and such weapons would help to end it sooner, more certainly, and with less loss of life. Because of the circumstances, they also had a duty to do this in the utmost secrecy, which they did. Britain and France had a right to develop them under the conditions of the Cold War, but with a much lower level of secrecy: the existence and some of the capabilities of the weapons were rightly determined by public debate, while other details rightly remained secret. Israel had a right to develop them because of the existential threat it faced. Under the circumstances, the deterrence value of the weapons depended on only their bare existence being publicly known, but none of the other details. So the fact that they existed was deliberately leaked, and the other details kept secret – a policy of intentional ambiguity whose existence was itself deliberately leaked. These policies were publicly discussed and overwhelmingly approved. In particular, all the major political parties were in favour of them, and their leaders continued them through successive changes of government.

by Editor on Thu, 04/22/2004 - 12:52 | reply

A reader

Nice answer. Thanks.

by a reader on Fri, 04/23/2004 - 09:29 | reply

Isn't the problem (with news reporting) the idea that impartiality is possible?

by a reader on Fri, 04/23/2004 - 23:16 | reply

bias unavoidable?

no. the world is non-biased. thus proving it's possible.

(ok not perfectly, but far more than the media we complain about. so the media could be much less biased, if it was better.)

~curi

by a reader on Fri, 04/23/2004 - 23:22 | reply

Don't understand

When you say "the world" is not biased, do you mean "Setting The World to Rights" is not biased?

by a reader on Fri, 04/23/2004 - 23:29 | reply

you got it

yes. sry if my lack of caps confused u.

~ curi

by a reader on Sat, 04/24/2004 - 05:00 | reply

rogue states ? just war ?

who decides which the rogue states and just wars are ?
presumably Israel is not a rogue state despite constructing illegal settlements on someone else's land, despite electing as PM bus bombing terrorists like Menachem Begin and Yitzhak Shamir (who also ordered the murder of UN peace negotiator Bernadotte)

by a reader on Wed, 04/28/2004 - 10:02 | reply

Re: rogue states ? just war ?

who decides which the rogue states and just wars are ?

We do, of course. Since you evidently did not see our our post yesterday, giving a working definition of 'rogue states' for the benefit of readers without a moral compass, you must be a newcomer to our blog. Welcome!

You will see that Israel does not meet the criteria. You should also read our Short History of Israel.

by Editor on Wed, 04/28/2004 - 13:34 | reply

The 'Oil For Food' Scandal

The United-Nations-run 'oil-for-food' program was intended to shield the Iraqi people from the effects of UN-mandated sanctions. Despite consuming staggering amounts of money, it largely failed to do so. It was profoundly corrupt, not only in the sense that all sorts of people unjustly enriched themselves through it, but in the sense that it undermined every institution and sabotaged every political process that could genuinely have improved the lives of Iraqis. All this has been well known for years, but to the great shame of the international community, was regarded as an inevitable part of the scenery of world politics.

Now that hard evidence and the sordid details are beginning to come out, there is a chance that the world may learn a lesson. Everyone should at least read these articles:

The Oil-for-Food Scam: What Did Kofi Annan Know, and When Did He Know It?

The next month, "humanitarian" became a broad category indeed. On June 2, Annan approved a newly expanded shopping list by Saddam that the Secretariat dubbed "Oil-for-Food Plus." This added ten new sectors to be funded by the program, including "labor and social affairs," "information," "justice," and "sports." Either the Secretary-General had failed to notice or he did not care that none of these had anything to do with the equitable distribution of relief. By contrast, they had everything to do with the running of Saddam's totalitarian state. "Labor," "information," and "justice" were the realms of Baathist party patronage, propaganda, censorship, secret police, rape rooms, and mass graves.

And:

World leaders on list of oil recipients

Fri, 04/23/2004 - 14:47 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Greg Dyke Is Unrepentant

Greg Dyke is the former Director General of the BBC who was forced out after the Hutton Report.

Anyone who thinks that he left in disgrace, or that he is in any way repentant, or that either he or the BBC have the slightest idea what they have done, should think again.

Last night Dyke had the honour of being guest presenter of the BBC's flagship comedy-news-quiz programme Have I Got News For You. In the programme, an executive of the Shell oil company had just been quoted as reacting as follows to an internal company report about oil reserves:

"This is absolute dynamite, not at all what I expected and needs to be destroyed."

Dyke seized the opportunity to proclaim his position on an entirely different Report. He remarked:

"Funny, that's exactly what I said when I saw the Hutton Report. Of course, the difference between the two was that the Shell report was true."

Unrepentant. Unenlightened. Insufferable.

Sat, 04/24/2004 - 01:41 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

and supported by most of the UK

a majority of the British people would agree with Dyke that the Hutton report was a whitewash.

All the info relating to the inquiry was published at its web site and it beggars belief that Hutton could reach the conclusions he did.

by a reader on Wed, 04/28/2004 - 08:19 | reply

Your Hutting Us On

'a majority of the British people would agree with Dyke that the Hutton report was a whitewash.'

If they would I should think that says rather more about them than it does about Hutton.

'All the info relating to the inquiry was published at its web site and it beggars belief that Hutton could reach the conclusions he did.'

What conclusions should he have reached and why?

by Alan Forrester on Thu, 05/13/2004 - 01:40 | reply

Photoblogging

In our first tentative excursion into photoblogging, we provide evidence that in Oxford, 2004, idiotarianism is alive and graffiti-ing.

This picture of a newly politicised pillar box was taken today by our colleague Lulie.

Sat, 04/24/2004 - 19:15 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

But it's true.

But it's true.

by a reader on Fri, 04/30/2004 - 12:52 | reply

Re But it's true

Don't you mean "but it'$ true"?

by Editor on Fri, 04/30/2004 - 14:03 | reply

European Union – The Mask Slips

The prospect of the proposed European Constitution being put before (ugh!) the people for ratification in the forthcoming British referendum has shaken the European ruling class so much that some of them have accidentally said what they really mean. So now, briefly (for soon the oversight will be weaselled out of view with a torrent of non-denying denials), we can plainly see that all that talk of the benefits of Unity and the sacredness of Treaty Obligations is just code for them ruling the rest of us without restraint or accountability. In reality they have as much respect for either concept as a pigeon has for the statue it perches on.

The EU's External Relations Commissioner Chris Patten said that

A British 'No' vote in a planned referendum on the European Union constitution would be tantamount to a vote to leave the bloc because, after all,

"What's the point of being inside and endlessly, truculently making trouble," he said.

"Making trouble" is, as President Chirac made clear recently, EU-code for not silently doing whatever France and Germany say.

Chancellor Schroeder was even more explicit:

Aware of the paralysis a British rejection could cause the bloc, German Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder told Focus magazine he wanted the new constitution to permit implementation of new voting rules even if not all countries had ratified the deal.

In other words, Schroeder is proposing to abrogate the existing EU constitution, as defined by the most solemn and binding treaties to which any of its members have ever committed themselves, and which require unanimity for any changes, and to replace it by a constitution that allows France and Germany to change the constitution as they please.

Well, so be it. The only question in our minds is whether the resulting entity should be called the Fourth Reich or the Sixth thing would be to adopt a statesmanlike compromise and call it the Fifth Eurenial.

Republic. Presumably the European

By the way, Bernard Connolly, whose book we illustrate above (click the picture to buy it), really is a whistleblower, unlike some who are so designated. The vicious way he was treated by the leviathan for exposing its true nature has never received anything like the opprobrium that it deserves.

Sun, 04/25/2004 - 14:10 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Bernard Connolly

It is not clear to me what the ruling was against Bernard Connolly and why it was bad. On the linked article I read:

The EU's top court found that the European Commission was entitled to sack Bernard Connolly [...]

What is wrong with that? Isn't any employer fully entitled to fire employees which are critical of them, or for any other matter of their choosing? Unless I misunderstand this article, this is simply an issue of free association and freedom of contract, and not about freedom of speech.

Could someone please clarify what would be the problem with this ruling?

Henry Sturman

by Henry Sturman on Sun, 04/25/2004 - 19:48 | reply

When is it desirable to make a decision by referendum?

When is it better for politicians to make the decision?

by a reader on Sun, 04/25/2004 - 22:00 | reply

Why Was Firing Connolly Wrong?

The head of a company has been skimming money and defrauding his shareholders ever since the company was first launched. Some of the shareholders think something funny is going on and pressure the boss man to get an auditor in. The boss man does so and gives the auditor a carefully doctored set of records. The auditor finds out that they are doctored and begins telling people. The boss man demands that the auditor give the cooked books back, demands that he shut up and fires him. Now imagine we are not dealing with a businessman, but with an organisation with taxpayer's money and arbitrary powers.

by Alan Forrester on Mon, 04/26/2004 - 00:24 | reply

Then the contract entitles boos to do so. Or what?

When an auditor company is being hired both sides are supposed to sign a contract that should allow/disallow the auditor to disclose any findings. Or some state law can allow the auditor to do so. We are not in a court room to figure it out. So, why would I comment on other party's commercial contracts? Do we have a moral right to do so?

by a reader on Mon, 04/26/2004 - 08:38 | reply

Re: Bernard Connolly

A person should have the right to spend his own money for whatever lawful purpose he wishes, and in particular, to hire and fire whomever he likes and not give any reasons except as required by the relevant contracts. The reasons may be arbitrarily whimsical or hypocritical or base or evil, so long as they are not unlawful. He also has the right to require, as a condition of employment, that his employees not reveal the extent of his wickedness or hypocrisy.

The European Commission does not have any of those excuses or rights. It is not a person or company but an arm of government whose legitimacy depends in part on its being impartial between legitimate political opinions. In particular, it is not permitted to use its spending power, including the power to hire and fire employees, to encourage or discourage the expression of any legitimate political opinion. It is not using its own money, but exclusively other people's, which it obtains by force with the legitimacy of government action. This legitimacy depends in part on its not being whimsical, hypocritical, base or evil: obeying the letter of legal constraints is not enough. It also has to have 'transparency' – i.e., unlike a private citizen or company, it has an obligation to keep everything it does open to public scrutiny except where there is a publicly-justifiable reason to keep it secret.

These are some of the reasons why I think firing Connolly was wrong.

by David Deutsch on Mon, 04/26/2004 - 16:31 | reply

Governments Have Different Obligations

I think that David is exactly right here.

This is why I think that governments should be bound by, for example, anti-discrimination rules that would be wrong to impose on private businesses.

Gil

by Gil on Mon, 04/26/2004 - 18:59 | reply

Copyright © 2007 Setting The World To Rights

Who Knows What They Believe?

A train in North Korea exploded killing 160 people and injuring 1,300. South Korea offered train loads of aid but the North Korean thugocracy refused to let it across the demilitarised zone. Why?

Does the North Korean government believe its own propaganda that the South is an American colony? Do they think that the South might use this as an opportunity to attack?

Or is it even worse than that? Are they turning the aid down despite knowing that South Korea only wants peace and is willing to help the North to cope with this disaster?

The North Korean regime is so closed and irrational that we can't tell what they're really thinking, and this is a problem. They might already have nuclear weapons and they have certainly been trying to acquire them. Crazy communists and nuclear weapons don't mix well. The West needs to come up with a policy to make sure that we don't find out the hard way that the rulers of North Korea have both nuclear weapons and irrational beliefs.

Mon, 04/26/2004 - 18:14 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

You Can't Make A Silk Purse Out Of...

Remember the Koran that was being written in Saddam's blood? And his handwriting on the Iraqi flag? Well, now it's been revealed what that flag was actually made of:

BBC NEWS WORLD EDITION

Last Updated: Monday, 26 April, 2004, 15:52 GMT 16:52 UK

E-mail this to a friend

Printable version

Iraq unveils new 'inclusive' flag

Iraq's US-appointed Governing Council has approved a new national flag for the embattled country, officials said.

The design consists of a pale blue crescent on a white background, with a yellow strip between two blue lines at the bottom.

What the new Iraqi flag might look like

IGC spokesman Hameed al-Kafei said the flag heralded "a new era" as Iraq could not continue using its flag from the Saddam Hussein era.

Mon, 04/26/2004 - 18:41 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Some Working Definitions For The Twenty-First Century

We have devised some working definitions that can be used to spot the bad guys without needing to resort to airy fairy concepts like whether or not their cause is just. Simply check your suspected evildoer against this handy checklist:

You are a terrorist leader if:

- 1) You are prepared to kill more civilians in the cause of your righteous battle than the evil regime you are trying to overthrow is willing to kill to stop you.
- 2) You live a life of luxury in the centre of your enemies' homeland, preaching your values in the certain knowledge that the evil, corrupt government there will do its best to protect your right to do so.
- 3) You regularly use the word 'infidel'.

Yours is a rogue state if:

- 1) Whilst fighting a desperate defensive war against another nation that threatens your very sovereignty, you can still manage to spare enough resources to massacre large numbers of your own civilians.
- 2) Your ruling party won the last election by a majority of 100% or more.
- 3) The leader of your main Opposition party is in prison, in hiding, or dead.
- 4) Your chief torturer appears on the western media and criticises your enemies for human rights violations.
- 5) Your ambassador to America refused to come back after his last diplomatic mission.
- 6) Your military is funded largely through food aid from the European Union.

The Truth Is...

Steven Den Beste of USS Clueless has been blogging a lot less lately due to some sort of blogger burnout. But today something seems to have boiled over inside him and he has burst back into the blogosphere with a massive essay on the theme 'The Truth Is...'. Firing wildly in all directions, he nevertheless hits the bull's eye with every shot.

Does he look like a carrot, though? We don't dare venture an opinion.

Thu, 04/29/2004 - 00:11 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

A Veiled Threat

Her Majesty's Government is intending to exempt anyone willing to dress up as a Muslim woman from the proposed new universal requirement to carry a photo ID. This is in any case a wicked and stupid law, but the exemption is insane beyond belief.

Isn't it interesting that just as the British have invented this grotesque new form of appeasement of militant Islam, the Saudis, in a vanishingly rare display of sense, are going in the opposite direction?:

Saudi scholars, Imams and women say that unveiling in critical situations is appropriate, and called for establishing policewomen sections within existing male departments to help foil terrorists who disguise themselves in Abayas. Tareq Al-Hawass, a professor at Shariah College in Dammam, believes that Islam does not prohibit a woman from unveiling her face if the necessity arises and for the sake of proving her identity to a policeman at a checkpoint. ...there is no Islamic script or verse that shows veiling as obligatory in Islam...

What a pity the religious authorities never explained that to their mass-murdering lackeys who forced Saudi schoolgirls back to their deaths in a burning school because they were not fleeing modestly enough.

Thu, 04/29/2004 - 16:28 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Why is a universal requirement to carry a photo ID

"A wicked and stupid law" but the U.S. fingerprinting Brazilian visitors a good idea?

by a reader on Thu, 04/29/2004 - 23:33 | reply

I'm interested to know why it's a good idea for Blair to have a referendum over Europe - despite his personal strong opinion - if it wasn't a good idea for him to have a referendum over the war.

by a reader on Fri, 04/30/2004 - 05:14 | reply

Excuse off-topic nature of the last question but it sank without trace when I asked it five blog entries earlier.

by a reader on Fri, 04/30/2004 - 05:17 | reply

The murdering lackeys ...

... is actually the bigger of the two stories, if you ask me.

by a reader on Mon, 05/03/2004 - 07:40 | reply

why 1 of these things is not like the other

a reader @ 5:14,

You really see no difference between joining Europe and participating in some war?

Hint: one's a finite-time policy choice which even if you think it's a mistake, (evidently) fell entirely within the PM's purview. (And if you disagreed with him, you can vote him out next opportunity.) The other alters the constitution of the country for all time. (And voting Blair out would not change that.) if you're an American, it's like the difference between amending the Constitution, and passing some law. The former has a higher threshold for success, and rightfully so.

-Blix

by a reader on Mon, 05/03/2004 - 19:50 | reply

Oliver Kamm And The Missing Argument

Oliver Kamm recently wrote that he would not have reconsidered his position that the war to depose Saddam was right, however things had turned out afterwards. He wrote:

Deliberately allowing such a regime to remain in place when we had the power to remove it would have been to violate values that are axiomatic. Again, I can't easily argue for them, they merely seem to me obvious and irreducible. That's not to say it would be right to overthrow a bestial regime regardless of any other considerations, ever; there would, however, be an overwhelming presumption in favour of such action where it was possible to take it.

It was indeed a matter of moral values and we agree with Kamm's conclusion. However, we do not think that the relevant values are axiomatic and we shall now supply an argument for them.

We human beings do not understand the world all that well. That is not to say that there aren't some things that we understand very well indeed. The current state of human knowledge is an astonishing achievement for which we should feel pride and awe. However, the fact remains that our ignorance dwarfs our understanding – and (as Donald Rumsfeld recently remarked) when we are ignorant of something, we do not always know what. Therefore, when we think we are following a good policy based on a good underlying theory, we will sometimes be wrong. So we need to have a way of coping with such errors.

The way that we in the West do this is through institutions that allow people to withdraw their support from policies, ideas or leaders that they think are in error. Liberal democracy is one such institution: if we think that a political party that we once supported was so badly in error that we no longer wish to support it, we may vote for another party and try to persuade other people to do the same. Because of such institutions, the West is not necessarily doomed to be limited by the mistakes of any of its subcultures. This has made it the first and only society in history that is stable under rapid changes, and therefore also the first ever to be capable of sustained rapid improvement.

In some countries – of which pre-liberation Iraq was certainly one – the rulers go out of their way to destroy such institutions or to prevent their formation. They do this to maintain themselves in power, to murder and extort with impunity. Such societies never thrive, and are doomed to suffer the errors of their rulers indefinitely.

From the point of view of these evil dictators, the open and self-improving nature of the West is an ever-present threat to their legitimacy and their lives. If they realise this, as they often do, they will be willing to go to considerable lengths, and take considerable risks, to hurt, cripple or destroy the West if they possibly can. If we let an evil dictator such as Saddam persist in acquiring weapons of mass destruction we run the risk of facing a mortal threat to our open society: there is the direct threat of mass casualties and the fear thereof; and there is the fact that in a society that cannot effectively suppress the intimidation of good people by evil factions, political progress is, at best, on hold. We also sacrifice the possibility that the dictator's victims would one day have contributed something distinctive to our understanding of the world.

A possible reason why Oliver Kamm missed this argument is that he is of the left. The left generally wants the state to interfere in economic transactions. Now, in short, you can switch your electricity company in a rather short time without going to jail, but you can't stop paying tax to the current government anywhere near as quickly or as certainly. In this and many other respects the market is an even better institution of criticism than liberal democracy. This argument is closely related to the one given above. Leftists, by definition, either do not know this argument or do not understand its generality. Hence being a leftist puts one at a disadvantage when it comes to understanding the reasons why the war to depose Saddam was right.

Fri, 04/30/2004 - 20:48 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Leftists by Definition

I am a Leftist, by definition, hypothetically. Please state further why I do not know this argument or do not understand its generality. This is not to debate the point of Leftism or Rightism so much as to better understand the argument. Can one be a Leftist not by definition?

by a reader on Fri, 04/30/2004 - 23:40 | reply

Leftist by Definition

'I am a Leftist, by definition, hypothetically.'

A person is not a leftist by definition, they are a leftist by choice. It's just that believing leftism entails thinking certain things that contradict this particular argument.

'Please state further why I do not know this argument or do not understand its generality.'

If you're a leftist you want to let the state rather than the market control certain parts of the economy. However, a state institution providing a good is not as easily criticisable as a free market institution providing that good. If a person thought that criticisability was an important criterion for all institutions they would favour free markets over states. So leftists evidently don't see that this argument applies to the state/market issue in the areas where they think the state ought to interfere. Thus they either don't know the argument at all, or they are unaware that it applies to this case.

by Alan Forrester on Sat, 05/01/2004 - 00:44 | reply

not quite right

Hence being a leftist puts one at a disadvantage when it comes to understanding a reason why the war to depose Saddam was right.

to explain their misunderstanding of the other reasons, we must point out some of their other flaws.

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Sat, 05/01/2004 - 02:08 | reply

Good job!

This was a great post.

AIS

by a reader on Sat, 05/01/2004 - 02:16 | reply

Could it be argued...?

Could it be argued that if one understands that argument and its generality even better than the average non-leftist, one will conclude that the deposing of Saddam is a job best done by private enterprise, and so government should keep out of it?

If not, why not?

by a reader on Sat, 05/01/2004 - 03:17 | reply

private armies? and more not right private armies are a nice idea, and I hope to see them someday, but we do not have them yet, and we can't just wait around and refuse to have any wars until they are created -- defense is necessary now.

also i wanted to add another objection to the post. most right wing people do not explicitly understand the argument about markets being better institutions for criticism (how many get it inexplicitly is hard to say). but anyway, also, most right-wing people supported, for true, explicit reasons. (how many people said they supported the war but didn't know why..?) therefore, i just don't see how you can claim this leftist failing was a significant handicap to having the right view on the war.

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Sat, 05/01/2004 - 07:35 | reply

A reader

Good post. But I think you need to add some explanation of the following:

1. Why was the West willing to tolerate - and indeed support - Saddam throughout the 80s?
2. Why did the West not take the first Gulf War into Baghdad?
3. Why did the West not give support to the Shites during the 1991 uprising?

Did the best suffer from a moral failure? Or was it the case that Saddam served a useful purpose: namely keeping militant Islamism in check? And isn't the fact that we are still in Iraq a reflection of the truth of that?

by a reader on Sun, 05/02/2004 - 22:56 | reply

Good post. Re: comments, I

Good post.

Re: comments, I'm still trying to figure out what "I am a Leftist, by definition" is supposed to mean.

-Blixa

by a reader on Mon, 05/03/2004 - 19:52 | reply

"By definition"

I think you're somehow mis-parsing the sentence. The phrase "by definition" is enclosed in parenthetical commas. So to understand the sentence, read it omitting that phrase, and then add: "(This follows from the very definition of Leftists, given above.)"

by David Deutsch on Mon, 05/03/2004 - 20:11 | reply

Not a Leftist Then

"The left generally wants the state to interfere in economic transactions."

I do not generally want the state to interfere in economic transactions. Therefore, by definition, I am not a Leftist. That was helpful to get that straight. Neither am I completely trusting of "the market" in all respects, unless the market is governed by natural market factors which are untethered from manipulation intended to distort markets or to imbalance them for solely personal gain.

Note the qualifier, "untethered from manipulation intended to distort".

by a reader on Mon, 05/03/2004 - 22:24 | reply

market distortion

can you give an example of a market distortion you're worried about? one that doesn't involve initiating force (which would make it illegal. no one says the market can withstand unlimited illegal acts...)

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 05/04/2004 - 00:31 | reply

market distortion

Agreed, no one says the market can withstand unlimited illegal acts.

There are also acts which are not illegal but legal within the bounds of the international marketplace. Walmart is a legal act, but that is far too easy. Eliminate the competition by volume. Corner the world market on cheaply made goods. Buy low high volume, sell low high volume, but sell relatively real price high and high volume. Exploit world market inequities in labor prices caused by world market forces of overpopulation and poverty.

Another would be to exploit market inequities caused not by market forces per se but by circumstance of source and resource and personal holdings. Is OPEC a market, a state, a private enterprise collaborative, or a princely fiefdom?

Another example, more troubling even, would be ships which fly the Liberian flag unregulated for safety or seaworthiness, and while still afloat on the high seas, ship hazardous chemicals worldwide with impunity.

Another example, this time to argue for natural market forces with limited oversight, would be the world diamond market. The market is normally driven by efficient market forces. In 2000 and 2001, Al Queda operatives sold extensive reserves of diamonds bought in Liberia and other gems, tanzanite from Tanzania legally, to finance illegal terrorism. The sales were legal. The sudden glut of gems on the market drove prices substantially higher. No one knew who was selling or why the market was distorted. There was no oversight In this case it was not distortion for personal gain but rather to finance worldwide destruction under the cloak of a free market. Perhaps this is an anomaly.

You are right. The market does work without initiating force. Some limited oversight may always be needed to see that it continues to be free.

by a reader on Tue, 05/04/2004 - 14:15 | reply

Market Distortion

I don't understand the criticism of Walmart. Isn't what they do helping to alleviate the "World market inequities in labor prices caused by world market forces of overpopulation and poverty"?

I also don't see why a sudden glut of gems on the market would drive prices substantially higher. Seems to me it would do the opposite.

Gil

by Gil on Tue, 05/04/2004 - 15:39 | reply

i don't get it

you're mad at walmart for cheaply providing products people want to buy, and hiring people who wanted to be hired?

you're mad at al quaeda for selling us gems?

you're mad at people willing to use unsafe ships at their own risk to bring you cheaper stuff?

as to oil, i'm not sure what you're mad at.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 05/04/2004 - 19:44 | reply

Gems Correction

Prices were driven lower ultimately, buy high sell low, because the Al Queda operatives were trading heavily at non-market driven prices. They wanted liquidity and cash fast. The market was distorted.

I am not mad at any of the above. These are examples of market distortion. Granted they are not good things. They are reasons for considering limited oversight. If Walmart begins to rape and pillage, I might get mad. If a rusty oil tanker breaks apart and sinks next to my favorite beach, I might get mad. I am already mad at Al Quaeda for attempting to blow us all up. As to OPEC, I have a question.

by a reader on Mon, 05/10/2004 - 14:12 | reply

A Fork In The Road

Which is true,

Iraqis Hail Falluja 'Victory' as U.S. Changes Tack

or

an astonishing success by the USMC or could it conceivably be both?

If the US has really 'changed tack' to allow the fighters in Falluja (including the perpetrators of the atrocities against the four Americans which sparked the present confrontation) either to escape or to retain control of their stronghold, it constitutes a major defeat for the Coalition and a catastrophe for Iraq and the world. For it means the end of hope for a functioning civil society in Iraq. No one will participate in civil institutions if their armed and murderous enemies are still permitted to operate with impunity.

On the other hand, if what we are seeing is merely part of a complex manoeuvre which is about to break the power of the faction currently controlling part of Falluja, then it is one of the most important victories so far in the liberation of Iraq and in the broader War Against Terror.

We are approaching a fork in the road.

Update: Wretchard at Belmont Club is sticking to his interpretation: Retreat, Hell!

We hope he's right.

Another update: And again.

Sat, 05/01/2004 - 15:12 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

The Elephant In The Room

The BBC World Affairs correspondent Paul Reynolds has posted an analysis of why the letter to President Bush by former American diplomats complaining about US policy towards Israel and the Palestinians is unlikely to have much of an effect on the White House.

In summary, the reasons he gives are:

- The State Department doesn't have much influence on the present Administration.
- Some of the diplomats are involved in pro-Palestinian lobby groups and may not be seen as impartial.
- Few of them are well known.
- The letter barely mentions Iraq, which is of more interest to the US Government and would also be more effective because of 'we told you so' arguments.

Not one word about the fact that the Administration considers the current policy towards Israel to be right. Nor about whether there was anything in the letter that could make them think that the current policy is wrong.

Isn't it astonishing that someone whose job is to keep abreast of world affairs is completely unaware of one of the major determinants of international events today? Or perhaps 'unaware' isn't the right term. He is aware of it. It's just that he is pathologically committed to denying its existence.

Tue, 05/04/2004 - 19:59 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Can I Quote Me On That?

David Schneider-Joseph looked up a New York Times story cited by Michael Moore in support of one of his conspiracy theories.

Guess whom the New York Times was quoting, in that story?

Thu, 05/06/2004 - 16:26 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

My guess is ...

... David Schneider-Joseph. But what good is a mere guess. You could tell us and give us a link, couldn't you?

by a reader on Mon, 05/10/2004 - 07:38 | reply

Link to Curiosity

a reader wrote

You could tell us and give us a link, couldn't you?

Perhaps the link we gave is not working for you. If it were, you would have seen that the person they were quoting was Michael Moore's own spokesman – in effect, Michael Moore himself.

by Editor on Mon, 05/10/2004 - 16:30 | reply

Works now ...

Well, Michael Moore isn't amusing anyway. Just very bullishly opinionated in a way which some people for some reason like. I'd hate to have such a guy on my side, so it's just as well he's a spokesperson for the other side of things most of the time.

by a reader on Tue, 05/11/2004 - 11:08 | reply

Another Elephant In The Room

Some snapshots of the interaction between Islam and other religions today:

In Cordoba, Spain, Muslims have petitioned the Vatican for permission to pray in Cordoba Cathedral, because it was once a mosque. Muslims are of course already allowed to enter the Cathedral as visitors, as they are allowed into all churches and synagogues. Incidentally, the mosque that became Cordoba Cathedral was built on the site of a demolished Christian church. Of course, in those days, the prevailing values were – well – medieval.

Last week, in Zamfara, Nigeria:

Governor Ahmed Sani of Zamfara State, has ordered the demolition of all churches in the state, as he launched the second phase of his Sharia project yesterday. Speaking at the launch in Gusau, the state capital, Governor Sani disclosed that time was ripe for full implementation of the programme as enshrined in the Holy Quran. He added that his government would soon embark on demolition of all places of worship of unbelievers in the state, in line with Islamic injunction to fight them wherever they are found.

What, like this?:

In Jeruslaem, Israel, four years ago, the Palestinians rejected a peace treaty that would have given them an independent state. They embarked instead on a murderous war to destroy the Jewish state. They claimed that the war was a spontaneous uprising sparked by Mr Sharon desecrating a mosque by entering it while being Jewish. They were lying: they had been planning the war for some time, and Sharon had never entered the mosque. However, the very idea that he had, caused an upsurge of anti-Israel feeling and violence among Muslims worldwide. Why? The doctrine that by entering a mosque, a Jew justifies the mass killing of Jews in retaliation, is never criticised in the press. On the contrary, Western coverage of these events usually condones it by blaming Sharon for his 'provocative' action of walking near the mosque. Incidentally, the mosque that he did not enter was built on the ruins of the ancient Jewish Temple.

Meanwhile, in Sudan:

Over the last 15 years, the Sudanese government has ... imposed a reactionary version of Islamic law that includes crucifixion, stoning to death of mothers who are out of wedlock, and "cross amputation" (removing the hand and foot from opposite sides of the body); waged what the U.S. House of Representatives has called a "genocidal" war on its southern, largely Christian and animist population; promoted forced conversion to its brand of Islam; strafed refugees with helicopter gunships; and manipulated food relief as a weapon, resulting in the death of over two million people — more than in Rwanda, Bosnia, Kosovo, Cote D'Ivoire, and Liberia combined. It has also produced four million displaced people, the largest such population on the face of the earth.

Sudan has just been re-elected to the UN Human Rights Commission.

Why is there so little public criticism of the values that inform the behaviour of Muslim governments towards non-Muslims?

Intimidation is one reason, but it is presumably not the main one. What is?

Sat, 05/08/2004 - 17:29 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Two Possible Reasons

Public criticism is extremely limited when,

- 1) There is not a free press in the countries where the behavior takes place.
- 2) There is not separation of church (or synagogue or mosque) and state. Borders are respected not only as physical boundaries but as religio-political boundaries.

Information starts at home.

Further, public criticism of values is limited when underground protest and press results in imprisonment and death.

by a reader on Sat, 05/08/2004 - 23:24 | reply

multiculturalism?

most people, I think, aren't that interested in doing, say, what LGF does. too much work and such. too complicated..

most self-styled intellectuals, the type who would be interested in doing that kind of commentary, sad to say, seem to be politically correct cultural relativists (why? we can blame colleges, the media, and umm, i dunno). and they are very nasty to people who try to be reasonable. LGF is deemed a hate site, or at the least biased and just one point of view.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Sun, 05/09/2004 - 06:20 | reply

Copyright © 2007 Setting The World To Rights

Come-As-You-Are Wars

When the United States joined the Second World War in December 1941, it did so with racially segregated armed forces. Ubiquitous, cruelly irrational discrimination against non-white soldiers was legal and largely taken for granted. Little of this had changed by the time the United States led the Allies to victory in 1945. It began to change only in 1948, when President Truman ordered the desegregation of the US Navy.

Therefore, if Hitler had only postponed his attack on Poland, and if the Japanese had only postponed theirs on Pearl Harbor, for a decade or so, the Allies would have been able to field armies incomparably more worthy to take up a fight against racist tyranny.

Of course, by then they would have been facing nuclear weapons and intercontinental missiles.

In the event, the enemy was not so prudent, and in 1941, Americans did not have the option to wait until they themselves were without sin before going to war. Though there were appeasers and pacifists and outright enemies among them who urged further phoney peace initiatives and concessions, the Second World War was not an elective war any more than the present war is. The West had already waited far too long. Fifty million lives too long, as it turned out. A blighted generation too long. A Holocaust too long.

The summons could not be refused and it could not be procrastinated. It said: come as you are, ready or not. For it is usually the aggressor, not the victim, who gets to choose when and where a war will break out. And so sixteen million young Americans, who had not been ready, rushed into the war with all their hangups and their shameful flaws and their parochialism and rough edges on display for all to see and sneer at. They had not asked for this to happen, and some of them made terrible mistakes. And some committed crimes – for among any sixteen million human beings chosen at random there will be thousands of murderers and tens of thousands of rapists and criminals of every kind. And that is how America saved the world.

They had the moral high ground. Yes, thousands of American criminals in uniform committed crimes in the liberated countries (and for that matter in allied countries). American bigots in uniform daily committed what would today be called hate crimes. American antisemites in power sent Jewish refugees back to their deaths and refused to attack the Auschwitz death camp from the air. Yes, they all shamed themselves and their country. But for all that, America did not lose an inch of the moral high ground that it had claimed when going to war. The idea that it could is insane.

Imagine that someone at the time had written about any of those shameful acts in the way that Andrew Sullivan has about the Abu Ghraib scandal:

But I cannot disguise that the moral core of the case for war has been badly damaged. It would be insane to abort our struggle there now because of these obscenities. But ... what this ... nightmare has done is rob us of much of this moral high ground – and not just symbolically or in the eyes of others. But actually and in the eyes of ourselves.

Of course it hasn't. Crimes have been committed: those responsible will be punished. Apart from that, what has happened here is that a sophisticated weapons system of which we were rightly proud, turned out to have a flaw and has harmed people against whom it was not aimed. Regrettably, this happens sometimes in war. Remember, this was a come-as-you-are war. Of course it must be investigated urgently, and the level of the system at which the flaw occurred must be identified, and improvements must be made so that it does not happen again. But there is no more significance to the affair than that. Most people understand this. Those who were morally opposed to the war of course still oppose it. Some (not all) of them are engaging in the same orgy of Schadenfreude and self-vindication as they do every time anything bad happens to America – including the occasions when American bombs, despite all the care that is taken, go astray and kill innocents. But very few who have believed until now that the liberation of Iraq and the broader war on terror are morally right, will be convinced by the Abu Ghraib affair that America is now a bad guy.

Fortunately, not everyone has a weakness for wallowing in completely imaginary guilt. Go flagellate yourself if you must, Andrew, but leave America out of it.

Sun, 05/09/2004 - 23:56 | digg | del.icio.us | permlink

"Flaw" or bad policy?

Crimes have been committed: those responsible will be punished.

Let me ask you this: do you think what happened at Abu Ghraib is the logical outcome of a US policy decision to use abuse - and in some cases torture - as a tool in the fight against terrorism? And if this is the case, can we bring those responsible (eg. Donald Rumsfeld, assuming he is responsible) to justice without compromising the war in Iraq?

Apart from that, what has happened here is that a sophisticated weapons system of which we were rightly proud, turned out to have a flaw and has harmed people against whom it was not aimed.

This so-called sophisticated weapons system imprisoned thousands of innocent Iraqis at Abu Ghraib, many for months on end, and inflicted abuse on many. It has done the same - and maybe worse - at other prison complexes in Iraq and Afghanistan (see eg. this). How can you say it was not aimed this way? It seems to me that the flaw of which you write is really bad policy and it won't be corrected until this policy is put under scrutiny.

BTW I accept your general argument that the scandal does not affect the moral case for invading Iraq. I just don't share your faith that all those responsible will be brought to justice.

by a reader on Mon, 05/10/2004 - 05:15 | reply

Moral, but impelling?

The coalition forces may have the moral high ground. But did they really have a impelling reason to be in Iraq? What has been gained for people in the US, British and other coalition countries? Aside from the moral joy of helping liberate some Iraqies from the misrule of other some Iraqis?

by a reader on Mon, 05/10/2004 - 09:35 | reply

How can educated people say such ridiculous things?!

Like "United States led the Allies to victory in 1945", "And that is how America saved the world". Everyone around the world loughs at it. It is very similar to French way of educating people. They, in France, say in schools: There were three fronts in WW2 - French resistance, some British help and a number of other countries. In a very similar way Egyptian thinks that they continuously won several wars against Israel (1967, 1973 etc.). Looking at how people re-tell historical events I sometimes think that there is no such science as history - it is only education that matters.

by a reader on Mon, 05/10/2004 - 09:51 | reply

The Difference

Mr A. Nonymous wrote that the World was talking rubbish when we said:

'Like "United States led the Allies to victory in 1945", "And that is how America saved the world". Everyone around the world loughs at it. It is very similar to French way of educating people. They, in France, say in schools: There were three fronts in WW2 - French resistance, some British help and a number of other countries. In a very similar way Egyptian thinks that they continuously won several wars against Israel (1967, 1973 etc.). Looking at how people re-tell historical events I sometimes think that there is no such science as history - it is only education that matters.'

The French surrendered in World War Two and only a few thousand of them mounted a resistance. The French government willingly shipped Jews out to the East to die. The Americans, on the other hand, produced most of the weapons used by the British and the Russians to defeat the Nazis. They played a very large part in planning the Allied invasion of Europe and they provided millions of troops. The British after becoming the first country in Europe to refuse to surrender to the Nazis helped the Americans to liberate Europe. The Russians fought and died in their millions against the Nazis; despite the fact that Stalin was also an evil man they deserve a large helping of credit for helping to beat the Nazis. So to wrap up - the French sat back and ate croissants; America saved the world.

The Egyptians in fact didn't win wars against Israel. Their aim, as clearly stated before every such war, was to kill all of the Israelis. They never succeeded in this war aim and they usually lost territory, which Israel later gave back as part of a peace deal.

History is not a science. However, there are good historical arguments like 'America saved the world during World War Two' and bad historical arguments like 'France saved the world during World War Two'. The only way we can get closer to such truths is by arguments like the one above rather than blank assertions.

Oh, by the way, we're British, not American.

by Alan Forrester on Mon, 05/10/2004 - 23:32 | reply

Re: The Difference

ouch!

by Tom Robinson on Tue, 05/11/2004 - 04:53 | reply

It is not French, who saved the world at all

I was just giving examples, how education perverts the truth in different countries in different ways. Saying that French saved the world is at the same level of truth as saying it about Americans, who got themselves involved only after Pearl Harbour (half-way through). In fact, several countries together delivered the victory - Russia (who defeated majority of all German troops even if losing badly millions of people due to mistakes etc.), UK and America. But US takes the top-from-behind of this list. If they only arrived earlier than the war wouldn't be such a disaster for everyone, but they didn't. What we all agree now is that blind pacifism (which prevented many nations from fighting Nazis from the beginning) very often leads to BIG problems.

by a reader on Tue, 05/11/2004 - 08:20 | reply

Separating issues

It's sad to see people so unable to separate issues. I am against the invasion of Iraq; it is a pointless battle. But none the less, condemning the war on the grounds of what some soldiers have done in Iraqi prisons is an argument I will not side with. IF the war had been a good idea, THEN what happened in Iraqi prisons serve only to stain those with responsibility and knowledge. They should of course be court-martialled and publicly executed (which for my own sake means I hope this goes all the way up to Rumsfeld). But I am ashamed to see those who - on the surface - agree with me resort to any cheap argument.

by a reader on Wed, 05/12/2004 - 07:02 | reply

Re Separating issues

"what happened in Iraqi prisons serve only to stain those with responsibility and knowledge. They should of course be court-martialled and publicly executed"

I wonder. Do you think that all Iraqis who were responsible for this level of human rights violations should be publicly executed too, or is it just Americans you fantasize about killing?

by a reader on Wed, 05/12/2004 - 12:10 | reply

Both

I see no reason to spare those who committed atrocities under Saddam. It puzzles me a bit that Saddam himself has not been executed yet, too. For though invading Iraq was a bad idea, the US has been very ambivalent about whether they really have taken over or not, when it comes to truly bringing responsible individuals to justice. IF you fight a war, do it whole-heartedly. That also forces the question upon you: "Is this war worth fighting whole-heartedly?"

Best: No war.

Second: A whole-hearted war.

Worst: This war.

by a reader on Thu, 05/13/2004 - 11:17 | reply

Lying Press

Here's Daniel Pipes on a type of systematic disinformation that we've noted several times before:

This euphemism "militant" is becoming a true obstacle to understanding the Palestinian war on Israel; things have reached the point where politically-correct news organizations are even surreptitiously changing the words of Israeli spokesmen.

Thu, 05/13/2004 - 02:15 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Too much fuss from one word distract people from the problem

It is true that making little changes in news announcements does a good job of perverting the truth or the image of Israel. But pointing out at "militant" each time doesn't do a good job of restoring the truth or the image. Just stop following the opponent in this stupid game and do something different instead.

by a reader on Thu, 05/13/2004 - 08:42 | reply

Something different

Should be done of course, but that doesn't mean stop insisting that the media et al state the truth. Words do matter; how we describe something has an affect on how we think about that something. The war being waged against Israel and her people is being waged on many fronts, and it is far easier to kill us if the world can be persuaded to look away, or see it as a warped sort of justice.

And while this is a "little change" in the wording, the affect could be quite large in the understanding.

be well,
Rachel Ann

by RachelAnn on Thu, 05/13/2004 - 09:40 | reply

The video

This place seems a reliable link source:

<http://ilovejennabush.blogspot.com/>

And you know which video I am talking about. The one that makes you grab for your guns.

by a reader on Thu, 05/13/2004 - 14:30 | reply

Copyright © 2007 Setting The World To Rights

Let's Face it

Solomon is trying to get the world to face up to a very ugly and frightening truth.

The frustrating thing is, if the world did face up to it, it would become far less frightening and would soon cease to be true.

Update: And here's a thoughtful piece by Evan Coyne Maloney on a related issue: Abu Ghraib & Nick Berg. (Via InstaPundit.)

Fri, 05/14/2004 - 03:31 | digg | del.icio.us | permlink

Dangerous turn

So, what is the point of this article in Solomon? What does the author ask the "Zionists" to do? Seems unclear to me. People all around the world seemed to miss the rise of Hitler - true. People seem to miss the rise of new Islamofashist ideology - true. But not only Islam - in fact, any religion as a social institute (not as someones personal beliefs) is evil. So what shall we do? Strike first, I guess. In what way?

Any extremist ideology usually starts from showing the truth about future decay unless we do something now. And of course, the people on this site are intelligent enough not to allow primitive instincts to burst out, but...ideas have consequences.

The article makes an important step - it doesn't only tell about specific moral failuers in Islam, it suggests starting a war against it. Or am I wrong about the main idea of it?

A war in Iraq has been a big failure for US not because some idiots tortured Iraqis in a jail, but because it was unjustified (there is no WMD, no Osama in there) and ineffective (more radical islamists are on their way). But the goal was right - remove the dictatorship of Saddam. The previous shameful US campaign in Jugoslavia - destroyed economy, islamists on the rise. How does it happen - whenever America goes to fight Islam radicalism - it always helps them. And 50 former american diplomats are wrong about loosing an image of "good guys" because of US Meadle East policy. The outside world sees Americans as similar extremist with a different name - may be it is not completely untrue..

by a reader on Fri, 05/14/2004 - 08:52 | reply

A couple of notes

First, thank you for the link. It's gratifying to spend time writing something and have it actually be read and appreciated.

Second, a bit of clarification for those who may need it. The theme of the article is basically me walking my thoughts through - thoughts brought on by hearing people carp about the major conflict of our world today - the fight against Middle Eastern Islamofascism and Totalitarian demagoguery - being just a product of us needing to understand each other better which I believe is likely nonsense and more a product of wishful projection. While I go a bit afield from that, that's just a product of writing without an outline I guess.

I wander into two territories to make my point. The first being Nazi Germany, which is an overused metaphor, but that's because it's such a good one for two reasons: Not as a prescription that we should march across Europe and seize Berlin (although as I write that it does contain some appeal), but One, because anyone worth talking to immediately grasps WW2 as about as close to a big war of good v. evil as you're ever likely to get, and two, because even those uninitiated in history have at least a basic outline of the facts involved. You don't have to do any extra explaining to make a point. There are plenty of other examples where physical confrontation was extremely likely regardless of how much talking either side did (King Philip's War here in New England coming to mind), but many of them would require a history lesson in and of themselves and would likely sidetrack the point. WW2 is very convenient for these reasons.

The second place I wander to is Israel and antisemitism, of course. If "the enemy" can so twist history, logic, morality, and the reporting of fact to demonise and ultimately destroy that country, and create hatred of Jews as they have, then it will only be a matter of time before those same forces are turned on us next. There's nothing to stop it, and, as readers of this web site know, those forces are ultimately irrational, based as they are on the twisting of all of the above. How can one reason with the irrational? Further, it is internally corrupting. That could be another whole post, but there's something in that letter from the 50+ "ex-diplomats" and their Arabist, antisemitic boobery that encapsulates the concept.

I don't generally do prescriptions. There's something ultimately frivolous and silly in a blogger making war plans that makes me want to avoid such posting. I'll only go so far as to say that I support opinion leaders who understand the gravity and reality of the situation we face and leave it there. Others will have to pick up from where my essay leaves off.

I am also cognizant of my own fallibility. It is possible I am wrong, and I understand that the concepts I address may lead toward some overreaching extremism - hence my holding out of some hope and ending the essay as I do. But at the same time I want to avoid being an "extremist," I'm not going to shy away from the truth as I see it in order to avoid a label.

by Solomon on Fri, 05/14/2004 - 15:10 | reply

Talking about the truth - but not only

Apart from informing everyone and sharing your thoughts, your comparison with late ignition in WW2 does a good job of provoking action. And, as I said, US already tried to start first with regrettable results. I am only afraid of worse consequences of such pro-active "highly moral" future American/British actions. I hope we all agree that it wouldn't be possible to start anti-German campaign before 1939, although there shouldn't be any appeasements and delays after the war has started with occupying Czechoslovakia.

by a reader on Fri, 05/14/2004 - 15:54 | reply

I can't say

History is as it was, no changing it. I've no encyclopedic memory, but someone who can rattle off the facts better than I can probably show that Hitler had been violating his treaty obligations since long before 1939. Yet the calculus at every point was to let it go rather than risk bloodshed. No one event was anything anyone wanted to risk war over, although they could have. (Reminds me of, "One more inspection...OK, but if Saddam doesn't cooperate THIS time, oh boy, we're really gonna talk tough then...") Chamberlain, a hawk rendered a dove by the horrors of WW1 ran more by the philosophy of, "As long as we keep talking, at least we're not fighting..." In the mean-time, Hitler built and re-armed... (I don't mean to only pick on Chamberlain here, the US didn't enter until we were bombed and declared war on, but again, Chamberlain is a convenient device to make the point.)

by Solomon on Fri, 05/14/2004 - 18:57 | reply

Re: I can't say

Solomon wrote:

History is as it was, no changing it

Indeed. Nevertheless (as Solomon implies), 'counterfactual' statements about it can be meaningful (see my book, The Fabric of Reality for an explanation). In fact, history, and the world in general, are incomprehensible without them.

For instance, it takes an unusually extreme commitment to political determinism (or to a variety of other life-denying falsehoods) to deny, as 'a reader' does, that if the West had adopted different policies, such as those advocated by Churchill and others, Hitler would have been stopped before 1939, and at the cost of fewer than fifty million deaths. This is not only a meaningful statement, despite the impossibility of changing history, it is an extremely important truth.

Likewise it is true that had the policy of appeasement been pursued for only a few years longer, then the consequences (either a nuclear slugging match or a Nazi victory) would have made the actual World War look like a brief inconvenience.

by David Deutsch on Fri, 05/14/2004 - 20:07 | reply

Treaty Obligations

OK I realise this is an old string but I've only just read it!

I thought I'd respond to the comment on German treaty obligations and how they were breaking them long before 1939. The treaty of Versailles limited Germany to an army of 100,000 with no tanks or heavy artillery. It also restricted their Navy to 15,000 men and no submarines while the fleet was limited to six battleships (of less than 10,000 tons), six cruisers and 12 destroyers. Germany was not permitted an air force.

OK here are a few facts to show how Germany was breaking these obligations long before 1939.

The Army

Panzer IV design work had begun in 1935 and trials of prototypes were undertaken in 1937. The Panzer I marked the first production tank design in Germany since the conclusion of World War I. In 1932, specifications for a light (5-ton) tank were made and issued to the German industrial manufacturers. Production began in 1934. Recognising that this programme was banned under Versailles the Panzer I was referred to as "Landwirtschaftlicher Schlepper" (an agricultural tractor).

The Navy

The treaty limited Battleships to 10,000 tons but the Pocket Battleships all had displacements over this limit. The first of which, Deutschland, was launched in 1933. The famous Battleship Bismarck was laid down in July 1936. It's displacement was almost five times the limit in Versailles.

The Air force

Heinkel, Messerschmitt, Dornier and others were developing planes for the Luftwaffe from the early 1930's. In 1934 the Luftwaffe held a competition to choose the design for its principal fighter. The winner was the famous Messerschmitt BF109. The Heinkel He111, one of the bombers responsible for most of the damage during the Blitz in 1940 first flew in 1935.

by RK on Wed, 06/28/2006 - 14:20 | reply

But The Damage Is Done

The Daily Mirror has apologised – sort of – for publishing a pack of lies about British soldiers abusing Iraqi prisoners. Responding to pressure from their shareholders and others, they have sacked their editor Piers Morgan.

However, Morgan himself refuses to apologise. Like Greg Dyke before him, he has no idea what he has done.

Sat, 05/15/2004 - 15:43 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Bush and Blair never apologised for cheating two countries!

The simple truth remains unnoticed by the authors on this web-site - there is no WMD in Iraq. Publishing fake photos is a child play comparing to what Bush and Blair have done to the image of two countries - they run a fake war - where is their apology after all???

by a reader on Mon, 05/17/2004 - 10:11 | reply

No, it was a real war

a reader remarks:

The simple truth remains unnoticed by the authors on this web-site ... Bush and Blair ... [ran] a fake war...

In fact we have already covered this in considerable depth here, and particularly here.

by Editor on Mon, 05/17/2004 - 10:39 | reply

Either the links are wrong or you avoiding answering

The links refer to conspiracy theories topic. I hope, the editor simply mad a mistake. The question remains: where is Iraqi WMD?

by a reader on Mon, 05/17/2004 - 12:57 | reply

Re: Either the links are wrong or you avoiding answering

a reader asked:

the links refer to conspiracy theories topic. I hope, the editor simply mad[e] a mistake. The question remains: where is Iraqi WMD?

No, the links are correct and we commend them to you. If you believe that we know where the Iraqi WMD are, then that is one kind of conspiracy theory. If, as seems more likely, it was a rhetorical question and you believe that the WMD never existed and Mr Blair and Mr Bush (or whoever is 'behind' them) have known that all along, then that is another kind of conspiracy theory. This is why we referred you to our series on conspiracy theories.

In particular, if you want to know why the belief in question is a conspiracy theory, consult that series. If you want to know our explanation of why conspiracy theories of this type tend to be false, consult that series. If you want further analysis of the role of conspiracy theories in the world today, and the harm that they do to their holders, we ask you to be patient. The series will continue.

Hope that helps.

by Editor on Mon, 05/17/2004 - 13:30 | reply

So, what was the reason to invade Iraq then?

I might have forgotten how frantically inspectors were searching for WMD in Iraq and believe that "illegal weapon possession" was the reason to go. Now, after you have noticed that it would be wrong to assume that Bush/Blair knew that there is no WMD all the way, then the only option remains as a reason - Saddam's refusal to admit inspectors or his wicked intentions to acquire WMD - is it what you trying to say? I thought we would never see the rise of "pre-crime units" in a civilised country, but reality proved me wrong...

If Bush and Blair didn't know that WMD existed for sure and discovered the truth together with the rest of the world - then they led two countries on war without a serious reason (nevertheless, the consequences are goddamn serious). You shouldn't be too keen on conspiracy theories in order to realise that. A number of other countries either do not admit inspectors or admit possessing WMD. A number of other countries exhibit dictatorship state model and incite/sponsor terrorism openly. And these are the cases when we know for SURE.

The damage Daily Mirror made is much much less important now. The damage done by Bush/Blair to Iraq, US, UK and the rest of the world by their unilateral action is incomparable - and there is neither apology nor a resolution from them both. There is a great opportunity for radical muslims in Iraq now to come into power sooner or later (as it already happened - thanks to Americans - in Afganistan not long ago). Of course, it would be rather silly conspiracy theory to assume that Bush/Blair never leave the opportunity to help brothers-muslims in a dodgy way.

by a reader on Mon, 05/17/2004 - 17:08 | reply

Why?

'I might have forgotten how frantically inspectors were searching for WMD in Iraq and believe that "illegal weapon possession" was the reason to go. Now, after you have noticed that it would be wrong to assume that Bush/Blair knew that there is no WMD all the way, then the only option remains as a reason - Saddam's refusal to admit inspectors or his wicked intentions to acquire WMD - is it what you trying to say? I thought we would never see the rise of "pre-crime units" in a civilised country, but reality proved me wrong...'

Saddam and his goons had already committed mass murder, tortured people by the bushel, started a war and was running a vicious Stalinist police state in his country. He was also running WMD programmes, presumably to start another war. Part of the reason was to prevent whatever evil he had planned and part of it was his past history. Also

<http://www.settingtheworldtorights.com/node/view/326.html>

by Alan Forrester on Mon, 05/17/2004 - 18:19 | reply

Also: Bush and his goons have already committed mass murder, tortured people by the bushel, started a war and is running a vicious Stalinist police state in his country(well still working on the last one!).

by a reader on Tue, 05/18/2004 - 02:24 | reply

The killing of innocents

"For nearly 12 years, Staff Sgt. Jimmy Massey was a hard-core, some say gung-ho, Marine. For three years he trained fellow Marines in one of the most grueling indoctrination rituals in military life - Marine boot camp.

The Iraq war changed Massey. The brutality, the sheer carnage of the U.S. invasion, touched his conscience and transformed him forever. He was honorably discharged with full severance last Dec. 31 and is now back in his hometown, Waynsville, N.C.

When I talked with Massey last week, he expressed his remorse at the civilian loss of life in incidents in which he himself was involved.

Q: You spent 12 years in the Marines. When were you sent to Iraq?

A: I went to Kuwait around Jan. 17. I was in Iraq from the get-go. And I was involved in the initial invasion.

Q: What does the public need to know about your experiences as a Marine?

A: The cause of the Iraqi revolt against the American occupation.

What they need to know is we killed a lot of innocent people. I think at first the Iraqis had the understanding that casualties are a part of war. But over the course of time, the occupation hurt the Iraqis. And I didn't see any humanitarian support."

Full article here.

The crimes of Piers Morgan and the BBC pale into insignificance compared to the above.

by a reader on Tue, 05/18/2004 - 05:05 | reply

Having your cake and eating it

If...you believe that the WMD never existed and Mr Blair and Mr Bush (or whoever is 'behind' them) have known that all along, then that is another kind of conspiracy theory

If you believe that WMD existed, that Bush and Blair knew this, and that the WMD have now vanished then, among other things, you have to account for why they were never used (and are not now being used by insurgents, terrorists, and such-like), why no-one has come forward to say where they are (esp. now that Saddam is gone), why satellite observations etc have not picked up the tell-tale signs of burial, and why the inspection programs carried out by the UN and by the US missed them. Seems like you need one whooper of a conspiracy theory.

On the other hand, if you do not now believe that WMD existed then you should be demanding an apology from Bush and from Blair for all the evidently fallacious claims that were made. Just like you rightfully demand an apology from Morgan and from Dyke. It matters not whether Bush and Blair did or did not know whether the claims they made were false (and it is not a conspiracy theory to believe that WMD never existed and that Bush and Blair did not know). It was their business to find out and they screwed up.

Judging from Alan Forrester's comment, you believe that Iraq had WMD programs "presumably to start another war". Now I might ask why he couldn't have been running them for deterrence (or, indeed, need them to start a war when he could just as well have started one with conventional weapons), but have you actually paid close attention to what David Kay said? He talked about WMD-related program activities. For example, they found:

1. clandestine network of laboratories and safehouses within the Iraqi Intelligence Service that contained equipment subject to UN monitoring and suitable for continuing CBW research.

2. A prison laboratory complex, possibly used in human testing of BW agents, that Iraqi officials working to prepare for UN inspections were explicitly ordered not to declare to the UN.

3. Reference strains of biological organisms concealed in a scientist's home, one of which can be used to produce biological weapons.

4. New research on BW-applicable agents, Brucella and Congo Crimean Hemorrhagic Fever (CCHF), and continuing work on ricin and aflatoxin were not declared to the UN.

5. Documents and equipment, hidden in scientists' homes, that would have been useful in resuming uranium enrichment by centrifuge and electromagnetic isotope separation (EMIS).

6. A line of UAVs not fully declared at an undeclared production facility and an admission that they had tested one of their declared UAVs out to a range of 500 km, 350 km beyond the permissible limit.

....

Note the equivocations, the use of phrases such as "that would have been useful", "suitable for continuing", "possibly used". If you read the speech with a critical eye, it is difficult to conclude that Saddam had any weapons programs of any significance. In any case, what David Kay concluded is a long way from the claims about actual WMD that were made prior to the war. You might argue that one of the reasons we went to war was to remove the uncertainty but what if the uncertainty arose because of failures in intelligence gathering and interpretation? Are we running the risk of making similar mistakes in the future by not demanding - as it seems you are not - full accountability (with attendant apologies)?

by a reader on Tue, 05/18/2004 - 05:57 | reply

Everyone was told that WMD was THE REASON

But not the past history. Full stop.

by a reader on Tue, 05/18/2004 - 07:59 | reply

What next?

I can't recall Bush or Blair coming on television to tell us that "We must wage war on Saddam's Iraq because it is a Stalinist regime that commits atrocities and violates human rights". What they told us was that Saddam had WMDs, and that was the reason, period. So you are left with two uncomfortable realities:

1. Bush and Blair's intelligence workers had their facts seriously wrong.
2. Bush and Blair knew there were no WMD, and had ulterior motives.

Since you reject (2) on the grounds that it is a conspiracy theory, you are left with (1). What consequences do you think such a serious and costly error should have for future international action by Britain and by the US?

by a reader on Tue, 05/18/2004 - 11:25 | reply

And Back In Reality...

Somebody wrote:

'Everyone was told that WMD was THE REASON

'But not the past history. Full stop.'

And Some other person wrote:

'I can't recall Bush or Blair coming on television to tell us that "We must wage war on Saddam's Iraq because it is a Stalinist regime that commits atrocities and violates human rights". What they told us was that Saddam had WMDs, and that was the reason, period.'

George Bush said:

'The threat comes from Iraq. It arises directly from the Iraqi regime's own actions -- its history of aggression, and its drive toward an arsenal of terror. Eleven years ago, as a condition for ending the Persian Gulf War, the Iraqi regime was required to destroy its weapons of mass destruction, to cease all development of such weapons, and to stop all support for terrorist groups. The Iraqi regime has violated all of those obligations. It possesses and produces chemical and biological weapons. It is seeking nuclear weapons. It has given shelter and support to terrorism, and practices terror against its own people. The entire world has witnessed Iraq's eleven-year history of defiance, deception and bad faith.'

So obviously people people were not told that WMD was the reason. Some people like to imagine that Bush and Blair said WMD were the reason but they are wrong.

by Alan Forrester on Tue, 05/18/2004 - 13:17 | reply

Re: And Back in Reality...

Also, here are the conditions that President Bush said, in his address to the United Nations, Iraq would have to meet if it wanted peace:

If the Iraqi regime wishes peace, it will immediately and unconditionally forswear, disclose, and remove or destroy all weapons of mass destruction, long-range missiles, and all related material. If the Iraqi regime wishes peace, it will immediately end all support for terrorism and act to suppress it, as all states are required to do by U.N. Security Council resolutions. If the Iraqi regime wishes peace, it will cease persecution of its civilian population, including Shi'a, Sunnis, Kurds, Turkomans, and others, again as required by Security Council resolutions. If the Iraqi regime wishes peace, it will release or account for all Gulf War personnel whose fate is still unknown. It will return the remains of any who are deceased, return stolen property, accept liability for losses resulting from the invasion of Kuwait, and fully cooperate with international efforts to resolve these issues, as required by Security Council resolutions. If the Iraqi regime wishes peace, it will immediately end all illicit trade outside the oil-for-food program. It will accept U.N. administration of funds from that program, to ensure that the money is used fairly and promptly for the benefit of the Iraqi people.

Human memory does not work in the way that it subjectively seems to. We do not store the equivalent of movie footage of our experiences and later play it back. We actually store only a tiny fraction of that amount of information, and not in the form of images but only clues for our later use. When we remember something, it is through a creative process of interpreting those clues in the light of our broader interpretation and explanations. This is why we are capable of understanding events, including their causes and the universal laws and principles that underlie them. But it is also why it is so easy to forget things that we did experience but which contradicted our interpretation of what must be happening, as here: and also to remember states of affairs that never happened, because we assume that they must have, as here:

I can't recall Bush or Blair coming on television to tell us that "We must wage war on Saddam's Iraq because it is a Stalinist regime that commits atrocities and violates human rights".

What they told us was that Saddam had WMDs, and that was the reason, period.

The internet has exactly the opposite virtue: it remembers facts superbly well but cannot tell you how to interpret them.

by a reader on Tue, 05/18/2004 - 15:41 | reply

Re: And Back in Reality...

George Bush did indeed say:

It [Iraq] possesses and produces chemical and biological weapons. It is seeking nuclear weapons.

In the same speech he also says:

If we know Saddam Hussein has dangerous weapons today -- and we do -- does it make any sense for the world to wait to confront him as he grows even stronger and develops even more dangerous weapons?

We've also discovered through intelligence that Iraq has a growing fleet of manned and unmanned aerial vehicles that could be used to disperse chemical or biological weapons across broad areas. We're concerned that Iraq is exploring ways of using these UAVS for missions targeting the United States.

The evidence indicates that Iraq is reconstituting its nuclear weapons program.

Satellite photographs reveal that Iraq is rebuilding facilities at sites that have been part of its nuclear program in the past. Iraq has attempted to purchase high-strength aluminum tubes and other equipment needed for gas centrifuges, which are used to enrich uranium for nuclear weapons.

If the Iraqi regime is able to produce, buy, or steal an amount of highly enriched uranium a little larger than a single softball, it could have a nuclear weapon in less than a year.

Facing clear evidence of peril, we cannot wait for the final proof -- the smoking gun -- that could come in the form of a mushroom cloud.

Nothing in these statements has proved true - and every one of these statements was questionable at the time the speech was given. Alan, are you not the least bit curious why? Or angry. Do you not think George Bush is as accountable for these mistakes as Piers Morgans or Greg Dyke were for theirs?

by a reader on Tue, 05/18/2004 - 22:02 | reply

They led two nations on war not having enough information

All the evidences Bush/Blair have given were either very modest or incomplete or wrong. They always left a room for speculations that they personally know something quite convincing but cannot disclose because it would harm their intelligence sources. So, they made faces trying to passuade and then started the war.

At the end of the day it turned out that they didn't know anything special at all. They deliberately started the war knowing that there is still not enough evidence - is it a "conspiracy theory" way of thinking?

All the other reasons are not strong enough for public and for me personally. All the other evils can constitute many other countries behaviour. So, Bush/Blair knew that without WMD there wouldn't be enough reasons to go. And again they deliberately stressed WMD issue in order to achive the goal. They knew that there is not enough reasons but they did it anyway - is it still a conspiracy theory?

Amongst other countries that 1) supported terrorism (Syria, Iran, Saudi Arabia do much more on this account) 2) have or develop WMD (Northern Korea does more on this account) 3) have evil regimes (all the above plus many more countries). All this had been known to public before Iraq war. But Bush has insisted on Iraq. So, once again, Bush deliberately led countries to strike on Iraq instead. Why such persistence?

In my PERSONAL VIEW - the reason is fairly simple - PERSONAL VENDETTA of BUSH FAMILY (and a good opportunity to do it in the light of 9/11). Now you can call me any names: conspiracy theorist or whatever. Just tell me if making logical analysis should always be called "conspiracy theory" or only sometimes?

by a reader on Wed, 05/19/2004 - 09:45 | reply

Personal vendetta of the Bush family

a reader wrote:

In my PERSONAL VIEW - the reason is fairly simple - PERSONAL VENDETTA of BUSH FAMILY (and a good opportunity to do it in the light of 9/11).

If so, then one of the following statements must be true:

1. Mr Blair is a member of the Bush family
2. Mr Blair is a dupe, in the sense defined here

Which is it?

by David Deutsch on Wed, 05/19/2004 - 15:23 | reply

The misleading statements of GW

The series on conspiracy theories is entertaining and mostly spot-on. But on the issue of whether GW lied or not, has the World seen this and this?

At the very least, there seems to be a lot of evidence that the Bush administration made many misleading statements on Iraq. And some that were just outright wrong.

by a reader on Thu, 05/20/2004 - 00:13 | reply

Re: The misleading statements of GW

a reader wrote

At the very least, there seems to be a lot of evidence that the Bush administration made many misleading statements on Iraq. And some that were just outright wrong.

Why describe events in terms that equivocate over precisely the issue that is in dispute? In this case, the word 'mislead' has two different meanings: one is to make a statement intended to cause the listener to believe something that one does not believe oneself, and the other is to make a statement which one believes to be true but is in fact false.

The document cited by a reader is rather long so I admit I did not study it carefully. However, dipping into it at random, I found very little even purporting to show that Administration officials misled anyone in the first (guilty) sense. If I am right that it is mostly about the second (innocent) sense, and presumably relies on the equivocation to make readers conclude that the Administration misled the public in the guilty sense, then ironically, the document itself is misleading in the guilty sense.

So ask yourself this: if Saddam's WMD stockpiles are found tomorrow, how much of the 'evidence' in the document will still seem to show Administration statements to have been 'misleading'? Whatever in the document does not pass that test is not evidence.

by David Deutsch on Thu, 05/20/2004 - 01:21 | reply

The definition of "misleading"

Why describe events in terms that equivocate over precisely the issue that is in dispute? In this case, the word 'mislead' has two different meanings: one is to make a statement intended to cause the listener to believe something that one does not believe oneself, and the other is to make a statement which one believes to be true but is in fact false.

Fair point. The second link I provided above is a searchable database of statements that is complementary to the document I cited. The methodology section on this second link provides an in-depth explanation of what is meant by misleading:

"... For purposes of the database, a statement is considered "misleading" if it conflicted with what intelligence officials knew at the time or involved the selective use of intelligence or the failure to include essential qualifiers or caveats.

The database does not include statements that appear mistaken only in hindsight. If a statement was an accurate reflection of U.S. intelligence at the time it was made, the statement is excluded from the database even if it now appears erroneous.

To determine whether a statement was misleading, the Special Investigations Division examined the statement in light of intelligence known to the Administration at the time of the statement. The primary sources for determining the intelligence available to the Administration were (1) the portions of the October 2002 National Intelligence Estimate ..."

So the authors are clearly saying that the statements were selective and contained information known by the Administration to be wrong. Does this make GW guilty in the first sense of misleading above? No, of course, we can't conclude that. But it does makes the Bush administration guilty in that sense (assuming, of course, that the statements are as the authors claim).

by a reader on Thu, 05/20/2004 - 03:06 | reply

In Which Sense Did Piers Morgan Mislead?

Did he publish pictures intended to cause the reader to believe something that he did not believe himself, or did he publish pictures which he believed to be true but were in fact false? If he misled in the latter sense, then - taking your view above - isn't he thereby innocent? Just curious.

by a reader on Thu, 05/20/2004 - 05:07 | reply

Re: In Which Sense Did Piers Morgan Mislead?

a reader asked:

If he misled in the latter sense, then - taking your view above - isn't he thereby innocent?

Yes. If he thought that the pictures were genuine, and if he was telling the truth when he said that he had "extensively checked" their veracity and the identities of the providers, then, obviously, he would have misled his readers only in the innocent sense of the word.

by David Deutsch on Thu, 05/20/2004 - 13:08 | reply

Partisan?

Given that you admit that it is possible that Piers Morgan thought the pictures were genuine, perhaps it is not surprising that he refuses to apologise and that "he has no idea what he has done". It seems that the World is willing to extend the benefit of the doubt to George Bush, but not to Piers Morgan. Did the Bush administration "extensively check" the evidence they had before making the statements they did?

by a reader on Fri, 05/21/2004 - 01:19 | reply

A Simile

Many supporters of the liberation of Iraq are perplexed that large stockpiles of chemical and biological weapons have not been found there, despite a careful search by the Iraq Survey Group, and there is no consensus among them as to the explanation.

Many scientists are perplexed that no extraterrestrial life has yet been detected despite the careful search by SETI, and there is no consensus among them as to the explanation.

Opponents of the liberation of Iraq who regard the former mystery as a vindication of their position are like creationists who view the latter as a vindication of theirs.

Tue, 05/18/2004 - 16:13 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Digging a grave

The simplest and most likely explanation is that neither exists, at least not in this universe.

Opponents of the liberation of Iraq who regard the former mystery as a vindication of their position are like creationists who view the latter as a vindication of theirs.

But this comment indicates a blindness on your part. You are taking a side-swipe at the anti-war crowd while refusing to face up to the real issues. One can still be in favour of the war on moral and strategic grounds but angry at the Bush administration for the many mistakes it made re. WMD. The anger is justified because, as a reader in the thread entitled "But The Damage Is Done" noted, the mistakes have consequences for future international action by Britain and by the US. And if corrective action is not taken, we will continue to make similar mistakes. If you do not demand accountability from the Bush and Blair governments, you are digging a grave for yourself.

by a reader on Tue, 05/18/2004 - 22:30 | reply

Timing is off

One can still be in favour of the war on moral and strategic grounds but angry at the Bush administration for the many mistakes it made re. WMD. The anger is justified because, as a reader in the thread entitled "But The Damage Is Done" noted, the mistakes have consequences for future international action by Britain and by the US

I think your intent is true; but timing is off. Now is not the time to act on any anger one might have regarding the lack of WMD. 1st the area needs to be secured. Second, it needs to be proven that

- 1)There were never WMD
- 2)That we were lied to.
- 3)Who lied and why.
- 4)That we were lied to altered how we would have conducted this, imho, moral war, in such a way as to cause more damage. Not every lie is evil.

It seems to me the presence of Sarin could indicate we were not lied to, though that remains to be determined.

After that one can act on any anger that might result from "being lied to".

be well,
Rachel Ann

by RachelAnn on Wed, 05/19/2004 - 01:57 | reply

But an election is looming

I think your intent is true; but timing is off. Now is not the time to act on any anger one might have regarding the lack of WMD. 1st the area needs to be secured. Second, it needs to be proven that

- 1)There were never WMD

It can, of course, never be proven that there weren't any. But I think that the lack of evidence, despite repeated searches, is very telling. And we can be quite sure about some things. For example, we know that Iraq was not reconstituting its nuclear weapons program (and the author of the original post at top implicitly acknowledges this by mentioning only biological and chemical weapons). The aluminium tubes could not be used in centrifuges to enrich uranium. etc.

- 2)That we were lied to.
- 3)Who lied and why.
- 4)That we were lied to altered how we would have conducted this, imho, moral war, in such a way as to cause more damage. Not every lie is evil.

I make no claims about whether we were lied to or not. It is quite possible that evidence was inadvertently cherry-picked to support the thesis that WMD existed and that the clamour to go to war meant that contrary opinions were overlooked. Bush and Blair would be accountable for this just as much as they are accountable if they lied. Yes, some lies are justifiable, but I don't think they were in this case (assuming we were lied to).

It seems to me the presence of Sarin could indicate we were not lied to, though that remains to be determined.

One shell, a WMD arsenal does not make.

After that one can act on any anger that might result from "being lied to".

My anger would only be intensified if we were in fact lied to. It is enough that they got it wrong. You say now is not the time for anger.

But given that we are almost sure that Iraq possessed no stockpiles of WMD and given that the US election is approaching, I think now is the time. I do not want Bush or Kerry making the same mistakes again. They have cost America dearly.

by a reader on Wed, 05/19/2004 - 02:43 | reply

Re: One shell

It's far too early to say what the significance of the two recent chemical weapons finds is. While it's certainly true that one shell does not an arsenal make, one counter-example definitely does make a refutation.

If the sarin shell is just an accidental leftover from previously-known arsenals, then it is not evidence of anything interesting. At the other extreme, if it is of a type that it has hitherto been believed Iraq did not have, as has been suggested, then it is significant because it proves the existence of a secret chemical weapons programme after the time when Iraq persuaded the UN that it had ended all such programmes. And the only possible reason for a new chemical weapons programme under those circumstances would have been an intention to produce chemical weapons.

As Rachel Ann says, all this remains to be determined.

If it turns out that there was indeed a class of chemical weapons being produced in Iraq of which the US had no inkling, then the CIA, FBI and US government have made a terrible mistake and should all resign. (Just kidding.)

by Editor on Wed, 05/19/2004 - 03:54 | reply

We don't know yet if it's Iraqi

...if it [the shell] is of a type that it has hitherto been believed Iraq did not have, as has been suggested, then it is significant because it proves the existence of a secret chemical weapons programme after the time when

Iraq persuaded the UN that it had ended all such programmes.

How does this follow? The shell could have been manufactured elsewhere and recently imported (smuggled) into Iraq.

by a reader on Wed, 05/19/2004 - 04:23 | reply

Re: We don't know yet if it's Iraqi

a reader wrote:

The shell could have been manufactured elsewhere and recently imported (smuggled) into Iraq.

Indeed. OK you're right. The US Government need not resign after all.

by Editor on Wed, 05/19/2004 - 04:28 | reply

Grounds for war

So war was waged on Iraq based on evidence just as good as those gatered by SETI for intelligent life elsewhere in the universe? That doesn't bode well for intelligence nearby, either. Neither of the military kind nor of the cerebral kind.

by a reader on Mon, 05/24/2004 - 06:14 | reply

Grounds for terrorism

It seems to me that if the US can go to war on Iraq because "the existence of WMD have not been disproved", then Al Qaeda can terrorize the West because "the existence of Allah has not been dsproved".

by a reader on Mon, 05/24/2004 - 06:16 | reply

WMD as a Side Issue

'It seems to me that if the US can go to war on Iraq because "the existence of WMD have not been disproved", then Al Qaeda can terrorize the West because "the existence of Allah has not been dsproved".'

At best, the WMD are a side issue in the justification for war. The real issue was Saddam's dreadful behaviour toward his own people, his foreign aggression and his sponsorship of terrorism. He also certainly had illegal programmes for making WMD regardless of whether they had actually produced any or not.

by Alan Forrester on Sun, 05/30/2004 - 01:48 | reply

Mainstream Antisemitism

Antisemitism in recent decades has been the hatred that dare not speak its name. Recently, it has become increasingly open. This worrying article in National Review surveys the extent to which antisemitic conspiracy theories have now become a widely accepted feature of mainstream political debate in the US:

Discussing Iraq last month on Washington Journal, C-SPAN's live call-in program, two callers — one American and one British — telephoned to ask whether I was Jewish. I am and said so. Both suggested that Jews were responsible for sending American soldiers into harms way. This was ironic since I volunteered for duty in Iraq, and then lived outside the security parameters enjoyed by other Coalition employees. One questioned whether I was part of a secret cabal operating for other than American interests. At the suggestion that his question might be anti-Semitic, the caller insisted my religion was a valid subject for a segment dedicated to a discussion of the situation in Iraq. Discourse has changed.

Indeed. To an extent not seen since the Second World War. However, serious awareness of antisemitism and its significance, and serious support for Israel, both seem to be at an all time high as well. May the best world view win.

Wed, 05/19/2004 - 17:18 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

It Has Spread to the US Senate

It seems that Senator Ernest Hollings (D-SC) wrote an opinion column for a newspaper that claimed that Bush went to war with Iraq to protect Israel and appease American Jews.

Here's an article:

<http://www.thestate.com/mld/thestate/8699607.htm>

He didn't blame it on a jewish plot, but claimed that Bush wanted to "Take the Jewish vote from the Democrats."

So, it's still caused by Jewish influence, apparently.

Gil

by Gil on Thu, 05/20/2004 - 00:09 | reply

Jewish influence

Everything is caused by everything. Not quite. I guess then that we could narrow it down a little and say that everything is caused by Jewish influence. How convenient.

Or we could narrow it down much further and say everything is caused by me, personally. Mea Culpa. But I refuse to take the blame for such narrow minds. Anybody else want to volunteer? No?

Maybe I should change my religion, and crank it up a notch. Since Jews have taken enough heat for the sins of the world, its about time someone else steps up to the plate.

(Psst, its the Episcopalians! Holy Moly, hold on to your crucifix, the truth about Episcopalian influence is finally revealed! First they took over Great Britain, and now they want to take over the world. Pass it on.)

by a reader on Thu, 05/20/2004 - 11:05 | reply

Max Boot on 'Neocons' Conspiracies

Here

by Alan Forrester on Thu, 05/20/2004 - 15:35 | reply

Re:Max Boot on 'Neocons' Conspiracies

I am surprised that "The World" would not cringe at being associated with someone like Irving Kristol, clearly anti-Popperian. Maybe "The World" is ready to repudiate Popper?

by a reader on Fri, 05/21/2004 - 01:03 | reply

Interesting

I live in an extremely anti-war, leftist area. (Berkeley, California)

I have never encountered a single anti-war leftist around here who who would make a comment like that. In fact, they would be abhorred.

Why is it that the one of the most conspiracy-theory laden, leftist entrenchments in America fails to represent this "widely accepted feature of mainstream political debate"? It seems rather... odd.

by a reader on Fri, 05/21/2004 - 12:45 | reply

Re: Interesting

a reader wrote:

I have never encountered a single anti-war leftist around here who who would make a comment like that. In fact, they would be abhorred.

Perhaps you are making an unwarranted assumption about what they "would" or would not say, or how they would behave towards those who do. Evan Coyne Maloney has spent a great deal of time talking to anti-war leftists and he has come away with an impression opposite to yours. Check out the video here, for instance.

by Editor on Fri, 05/21/2004 - 14:16 | reply

Check out this one ...

<http://www.isratv.com/video/filmpmwadsl.aspx>

by a reader on Fri, 05/21/2004 - 14:47 | reply

And this

The video in the last comment is amazingly important but not very relevant to this thread. This is though: Berkeley Intifada.

by a reader on Sat, 05/22/2004 - 02:59 | reply

I'll be damned

Seeing as how I discuss issues regarding Israel with them on a regular basis, I doubt I'm misunderstanding how they 'would' react.

On the other hand, that last link is horrifying. I suppose I just know the wrong people.

by a reader on Fri, 05/28/2004 - 20:56 | reply

anti posh word for oppsing people who might happen to be jewish Isn't it marvellous? You can openly claim to 'hate arabs' you can openly claim to 'hate hispanics' , no one will say much, and there is no fancy name for 'that ' sort of hate, and yet, you happen to dislike someone who is jewish, and you become antisemitic!! I am rather bored of the 'precious jew' syndrome, and have yet to discover why they feel they are so precious, and i lack the inclination to find out.

by Emma Flavell on Mon, 03/20/2006 - 18:17 | reply

if it's so boring why take th

if it's so boring why take the time to write anti-semitic comments?

-- Elliot Temple

Now Blogging Again

by Elliot Temple on Sun, 03/26/2006 - 09:45 | reply

Dear Miss, Ms. or Mrs. Flavel

Dear Miss, Ms. or Mrs. Flavell.

The inclination to find out, as you, less than eloquently, put it, is apparently not the only thing you lack. But worry not, the world is full of people such as yourself, and you can take pride in belonging to a group of people with very prominent members. Hitler, Himmler, Stalin, Arafat, Goering, the current pope, most of the previous popes, Mel Gibson, Osama bin Laden. In short, you are in good company.

by William Smythe-Livingston on Fri, 08/11/2006 - 00:53 | reply

Jews

Jews are not a religion. They are a nation. Historically, they've had a unique religion associated with them. That's a different issue.

by Yoni on Sat, 09/09/2006 - 22:57 | reply

Antisemites

"I am rather bored of the 'precious jew' syndrome"

This concept was invented by antisemites, and immediately flags you as one.

by Yoni on Sat, 09/09/2006 - 22:59 | reply

Where The Freedom Is

"Where is the freedom?" asks the demonstrator.

Well, um... if he didn't have a bag over his head, he might be able to see the incongruity of his question.

Explanation: The point of our comment above seems to be unclear to some readers. It is simply that a released ex-prisoner staging an angry protest outside the building where the prison guards who mistreated him are on trial, while soldiers stand unconcerned in the background protecting his right to do so, is about as close as one could get to encapsulating the concept of political freedom in a single picture. That he himself cannot see this, and that his placard asks where the freedom is, is an intense irony, to which the bag over his head gives additional symbolic emphasis.

Fri, 05/21/2004 - 02:22 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Idiotarian troll

Yeah, but where are the WMDs?

by a reader on Fri, 05/21/2004 - 02:28 | reply

Maybe he's afraid he'll be identified

As someone from oh, lets say Pennsylvania?

Hey Marge come look! Eds on the t.v.

be well,
Rachel Ann

by RachelAnn on Fri, 05/21/2004 - 06:18 | reply

Adding insult to injury

I must have misunderstood the posting, but it seems to me that you are making fun of the former prisoner on the basis that he is not fluent in English and in politics and in etc. etc.. Torture in Iraq prisons is a shame for coalition forces - do you have an urge to bring it up and elaborate on it. Most readers will use this as a perfect opportunity to make fun of you because of another shameful fact - absence of alleged WMD in Iraq.

by a reader on Fri, 05/21/2004 - 08:45 | reply

Indeed

The last commentator is correct. Who's to say what that man went through? If he was falsely imprisoned (or worse), then he has a right to be angry and a right to ask for justice. Which, presumably, is what he is really doing.

by a reader on Fri, 05/21/2004 - 10:14 | reply

Right to be angry

If he indeed is who he says he is...

There just seems to be something fishy with that photo...that is what i meant.

by a reader on Fri, 05/21/2004 - 10:28 | reply

WMD

Yes, the "absence of alleged WMD" is precisely correct. Now that the required tests conclusively prove their presence.

by a reader on Fri, 05/21/2004 - 17:56 | reply

No oppression by definition

If I read you correctly, there can be no oppression because if there is, and people protest against it, it means that there isn't. Your theory of freedom and oppression is a nice unfalsifiable theory.

by a reader on Fri, 05/21/2004 - 19:34 | reply

Re: No oppression by definition

No, you don't read us correctly. That the intervention of Coalition forces has enhanced political freedom in Iraq is a premise, not the conclusion, of our piece.

by Editor on Fri, 05/21/2004 - 21:43 | reply

Well I did miss your point

Admittedly, and you are correct.

I guess I just kept focusing on that hood and thinking, something isn't right here. As in, why would he be announcing he wants to go into court and tell what happened if he is hiding his face? Shame, no, because he reveals his face on other interviews. This is just a visceral reactions, which I admit are faulty, but I can't image someone who faced that kind of abuse would willingly put a bag over their face. Carry it, maybe. Hide their face in another manner, yes. But put the bag over their head? That's hard for me to imagine.

Maybe I'm barking up the wrong tree.

And your assessment is good.

take care,

be well,
Rachel Ann

by RachelAnn on Sun, 05/23/2004 - 08:08 | reply

Where is the freedom?

Something we should be asking ourselves every day. It is a good question. Incongruous or not, I like the question. Premises, conjecture, and discussion.

Freedom is an every day thing until it is not. Freedom is often invisible. Oppression is often invisible too. The ideas of freedom. We have to look closely to see.

by a reader on Mon, 05/24/2004 - 15:25 | reply

oh no!

What's really scary is the tiny little helicopter the Pentagon sent to pee on his head. I didn't know they had that capability.

by a reader on Sun, 06/20/2004 - 11:18 | reply

Re: oh no!

No, what's really scary is that the helicopter's rotor isn't moving. I suspect it was actually launched at the ex-presiner from a catapult, like some kind of giant metal cow.

by Kevin on Sun, 06/20/2004 - 17:50 | reply

Moore, Again

With all due apologies to the gentleman, who no doubt enjoys well-deserved worldwide fame and respect as editor of the Weekly Standard, we had not heard of Fred Barnes before today. But he has a complaint about Michael Moore:

It was in his first bestselling book, Stupid White Men. Moore wrote he'd once been "forced" to listen to my comments on a TV chat show, The McLaughlin Group. I had whined "on and on about the sorry state of American education," Moore said, and wound up by bellowing: "These kids don't even know what The Iliad and The Odyssey are!" Moore's interest was piqued, so the next day he said he called me. "Fred," he quoted himself as saying, "tell me what The Iliad and The Odyssey are." I started "hemming and hawing," Moore wrote. And then I said, according to Moore: "Well, they're . . . uh . . . you know . . . uh . . . okay, fine, you got me--I don't know what they're about. Happy now?" He'd smoked me out as a fraud, or maybe worse. The only problem is none of this is true. It never happened. Moore is a liar. He made it up. It's a fabrication on two levels. One, I've never met Moore or even talked to him on the phone. And, two, I read both The Iliad and The Odyssey in my first year at the University of Virginia. Just for the record, I'd learned what they were about even before college.

So it's one man's word against another's. Now, faced with a choice between believing a guy we never heard of before, and believing Michael Moore – we are inclined to place our confidence in Mr Barnes.

Tue, 05/25/2004 - 01:50 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Huh?

Huh? Humor? Iliad and Odyessey? Confidence in whom?

by a reader on Tue, 05/25/2004 - 03:34 | reply

I'm no Michael Moore fan but I'm no Michael Moore fan but sometimes when I hear something like this I can't quite bring myself to believe it; even with guys like him, you gotta think, Why lie about something so (a) dumb and (b) verifiable? I mean what the heck would possess him?

But it's not like I'm going to believe his version over Fred Barnes's. So I'm thinking perhaps there's some semi-innocent explanation, like that in recalling the incident from memory, Moore mistook Fred Barnes for one of the other McLaughlin Group panelists. Or McLaughlin Group for some other show. Or something along those lines - in other words, the exchange happened, but not with Fred Barnes, with Morton Kondracke or someone else.

I mean, to make this up out of thin air, just to take a swat at the low-lying pinata that is Fred Barnes, just makes absolutely no sense. Then again I'm not a lefty propagandist like, undoubtedly, Moore is, and I guess you just never know what makes sense to such people.

--Blix

by a reader on Tue, 05/25/2004 - 23:01 | reply

I'm no M. Moore fan either

Yes, Moore probably didn't deliberately lie on this occasion. But neither did he check the story. Did he care whether it was true or false? Unlikely. It fit his agenda perfectly, so he printed it. That's what he does.

by a reader on Thu, 05/27/2004 - 03:34 | reply

No Big Thinker

Parveen Sharif, sister of the suicide bomber Omar Sharif, said that he was a big thinker. This is an instance of a common fantasy about terrorists, that they have somehow seen something deeper than our petty, everyday concerns and gone off to explore it.

What, by redecorating the walls of some formerly joyful place with their own internal organs and those of as many innocent people as they can target? No, we rather doubt that Omar Sharif was a big thinker. Before he went to blow himself up in a bar in Tel Aviv, did he ever think carefully about the nature of morality? Did he ever bother to investigate Israel's history? Had he done so, he would have known that the war to destroy Israel is evil and he ought not to participate in it. Or about his own nature as a human being? Did he ever think for even two minutes about the strategic and tactical effects of such actions and whether they are likely to achieve the goals that he thought he died for?

The choice to become a suicide bomber is in fact a sign of mind-boggling shallowness.

One further comment: Parveen Sharif's evidence that Omar was a big thinker was that:

“He would contemplate a lot. He was mysterious. You did not see him smile much.”

We don't think that somebody who thought deeply about the world would never smile. The world as it is now is better than it has been at any previous moment in human history. Technology is increasing human lifespan, ease of communication and every material indicator of quality of life. Tyranny and slavery are on the defensive throughout the world and free societies are prospering. Of course, the world still has problems, but they are mostly better problems than we had before. There does not seem to be any compelling reason why this progress cannot continue indefinitely. So someone who is a deep thinker ought also to be an optimist.

Fri, 05/28/2004 - 01:59 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Truly Remarkable

There does not seem to be any compelling reason why this progress cannot continue indefinitely

Indeed, and when you think about it this is truly remarkable. And it is not just that the world has been getting better, it is that by many measures the world has been getting exponentially better. I truly cannot conceive what the world will be like in 20 years. It boggles my mind.

by a reader on Fri, 05/28/2004 - 05:08 | reply

Some problems are worse than we experienced before

"Of course, the world still has problems, but they are mostly better problems than we had before."

Not quite true when we speak about terrorism. There is no simple solution. Millions of people have to be somehow re-educated - but how? It is not that I am pessimistic about the future, but the terrorism wouldn't have a rise if people were not so scared and not so susceptible to it in general. Many developed western countries would rather give up some "ambitions" in return for a quiet life as before. Sadly, it is true.

by a reader on Fri, 05/28/2004 - 08:30 | reply

Optimist

Optimist, imho, are those who stare at a glass that is half full and assume it will not go down. In fact, it is likely to fill! Rain will pour down, fill the cup till it runneth over!

A pessimist looks at the same glass, sees it half full, assumes it will not go up. In fact, it is likely to empty completely! The sun will come out, and dry up all the water.

A thinker looks at the glass and thinks; this is good. Do I need all this water right now? Should I put some aside, share it? Do I need more? Where can I get more? How should I get more?

The realist then acts. If he or she is moral, acts in a way that benefits the world and the self.

The terrorist looks at the glass as half empty, and figures no one should have any more water than s/he does, goes around emptying and threatening to empty all the water in all the glasses reachable, including the water s/he owns.

Thats the difference, imho.

be well,
Rachel Ann

by RachelAnn on Fri, 05/28/2004 - 10:28 | reply

What about Bin Laden?

What about Bin Laden? Is he a big thinker?

by a reader on Sat, 05/29/2004 - 10:51 | reply

Re: What about Bin Laden?

Osama Bin Laden is not the same sort of person as a suicide bomber. As a thinker he would be best classified as a crank rather than an empty-headed gull. Cranks do think a lot, but not to any productive effect.

by Editor on Sat, 05/29/2004 - 15:40 | reply

Gore Is No Good

We supported Al Gore for the Presidency in 2000.

The events of September 11, 2001 caused us to reconsider, and improve, the criteria by which we make such judgements. We now realise that Gore is fundamentally flawed, in his relevant political values and personal qualities.

We would not support him again. Nor Kerry. We support George W Bush for the Presidency in 2004.

Here's David Schneider-Joseph musing on similar changes that he himself has undergone.

Fri, 05/28/2004 - 22:59 | digg | del.icio.us | permlink

Bothered

I would say that Gore's address was fundamentally flawed. As to his personal qualities that's a stretch. He might be plain angry something that even seems out of political character for him.

Much of what he spouted in the address is angry rhetoric and not particularly useful to him or anyone else. I take it at face value as not of much use. However, good people as well as not so good people do get angry and say so publicly.

Something else bothers me, the "Gore No Good" blanket heading. There seems to be much of an amplified knee jerk reaction here, no better than the Gore comments. Is this a political endorsement or a political disendorsement? What bothers me most is that it sounds like it should have a campaign ad trailer saying, "I am George W. Bush and I approve this message."

Politics is surely a dirty business aimed at the gut and often quite void of reason. Adding to the dirty business with a Gore No Good punch heading specifically bothers me.

by a reader on Sat, 05/29/2004 - 16:41 | reply

Bad Character

The fundamental flaws in Gore's address and in his behaviour since 9/11 are evidence of flaws in his character. The issue is not that he is angry per se, although the fact that he 'did a Dean' does weigh somewhat against him. He and many of his fellow Democrats have attacked Bush's character and policies in the War on Terror in a remarkably unprincipled and vicious manner. Discussing policies and trying to come up with better ways to implement them in cooperation with the Administration would be one thing, foaming at the mouth conspiracy theoretic ranting and unjustified character assassination is quite another. Gore is no good.

I do not say this because Bush has asked me to but because it is true. Nor do I say 'elect Bush' because he has asked me to, but because his policies on the most important political issue of our time (the War on Terror) are basically sound. Bush has flaws, his policies on gay marriage, abortion, embryonic stem cells and probably many other issues are a fatuous waste of air, but these are minor in comparison with his opponents' flaws. It's a recommendation but I doubt Bush would put it on a campaign poster.

by Alan Forrester on Sun, 05/30/2004 - 01:33 | reply

Bush Is No Good

I forecast that, in one or two years, you will have a title running, "Bush Is No Good," because you will have realised that he messed up the punishment for 9/11 (where is Bin Laden?), and he messed up our liberties. Puritanism is the only thing he is good for.

by a reader on Sun, 05/30/2004 - 01:40 | reply

Bush is Plenty Good

'I forecast that, in one or two years, you will have a title running, "Bush Is No Good," because you will have realised that he messed up the punishment for 9/11 (where is Bin Laden?), and he messed up our liberties. Puritanism is the only thing he is good for.'

How exactly did he mess up our liberties?

by Alan Forrester on Sun, 05/30/2004 - 01:50 | reply

Liberties

Evidence is everywhere. In all Western countries. Any newspaper. To start, you might want to go to <http://www.free-market.net/search/index.cgi>, and search in "news reports", "civil liberties" and, say, "war terror" as keywords.

by a reader on Sun, 05/30/2004 - 02:52 | reply

Learning from errors

See <http://www.antiwar.com/mercero/?articleid=2691>

by a reader on Sun, 05/30/2004 - 03:12 | reply

Northern Irelandization of England

For example (not to talk about abolition of traditional habeas corpus): Terrorism Act 2000 2000 Chapter 11 - continued PART I INTRODUCTORY Terrorism: interpretation. 1. - (1) In this Act "terrorism" means the use or threat of action where- (a) the action falls within subsection (2), (b) the use or threat is designed to influence the government or to intimidate the public or a section of the public, and (c) the use or threat is made for the purpose of advancing a political, religious or ideological cause.

Anti-terrorism, Crime and Security Act 2001 2001 Chapter 24 - continued PART 5 RACE AND RELIGION 38 Meaning of fear and hatred In Article 8 of the Public Order (Northern Ireland) Order 1987 (S.I. 1987/463 (N.I. 7)) in the definition of fear and the definition of hatred (fear and hatred defined by reference to a group of persons in Northern Ireland) omit the words "in Northern Ireland".

by a reader on Sun, 05/30/2004 - 17:12 | reply

Re: Learning from errors

Are you saying Mercer has learned from her errors? I see no indication of that.

by a reader on Sun, 05/30/2004 - 18:58 | reply

Re: Northern Irelandization of England

Are you saying that making threats intended to intimidate the public for the purpose of advancing a political, religious or ideological cause is a precious liberty? Are you also saying it was previously legal in England?

by a reader on Sun, 05/30/2004 - 19:03 | reply

Re:Re: Northern Irelandization of England

Are you saying it is important to have redundant sets of laws?

If making such threats were illegal before why pass a law to make it illegal twice over? Are terrorist willing to break one law but not two?

by a reader on Sun, 05/30/2004 - 22:44 | reply

Civil Liberties

I'm not particularly convinced that the Patriot Act to which the readers above are presumably referring is anywhere near as bad as it is often portrayed. See

<http://www.lifeandliberty.gov/>

If you can fault the Patriot Act after reading it and thinking about it rather than doing the knee jerk, security provided by government is automatically bad schtick, then I will be interested.

It is certainly an exaggeration to say that the civil liberties situation is worse than it has ever been before. It is interesting to note that there have been much worse violations of civil liberties in all previous wars. During WW2 both Britain and America took to interning lots of people whom they deemed might be a threat on the basis of ethnicity or nationality, no sign of that this time. It is also interesting to note that the Framers of the US Constitution saw fit to guarantee that:

'No Soldier shall, in time of peace be quartered in any house, without the consent of the Owner, nor in time of war, but in a manner to be prescribed by law.'

Evidently this was something that they foresaw might happen sufficiently often that they actually needed to cover themselves in case it did happen. The civil liberties during war situation has got better not worse.

In any case, I'm not entirely sure what abuses of civil liberties in the name of the War on Terror would actually demonstrate about the morality of the war itself, if anything. Islamist terrorists have said often enough that they want to destroy our civilisation and that they despise its values, as have the dictators who support them. They are at war with us whether we like it or not. As such we must wage war against these terrorists and the dictatorships that lend aid to them.

by Alan Forrester on Tue, 06/01/2004 - 01:39 | reply

This blog didn't exist in 200

This blog didn't exist in 2000!

by a reader on Thu, 06/03/2004 - 13:21 | reply

But..

But its editors did.

~Woty
<http://woty.davidsj.com>

by Woty on Sun, 06/06/2004 - 03:58 | reply

don't be so mean

surely A Reader meant something other than that the editors of the world didn't have political opinions before they had a blog. i don't know what, but it's gotta be something else. assuming it's something so utterly idiotic is insulting.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Sun, 06/06/2004 - 06:15 | reply

Copyright © 2007 Setting The World To Rights

Euro-Evil

A few months before 9/11 a Eurocrat by the name of Paul-Marie Couteaux made a rather interesting little speech in the European Parliament. Interesting because of the depth of evil to which it sinks. Mr Couteaux, who is on rather a lot of committees and is evidently rather distinguished in Eurocratic terms, said:

Madam President, the most surprising thing about our debate is our surprise, for Israel's expansionist policy is the inevitable and predictable result of the growing imbalance in the region, the stability for which we bear much of the responsibility. Firstly that is because since 1967 most of our states, with the notable exception of France, have continued to give the State of Israel – a state that is growing increasingly self-assured and domineering – the impression that it can violate international law and UN resolutions with impunity.

In reality, here as elsewhere we have followed Washington and persist in closing our eyes to the theocratic excesses of this religious state whose governments are under the thumb of fanatical parties and minorities that are just as bad as the other groups of religious fanatics in the region. That is why we should envisage imposing sanctions on Israel.

There is, however, another serious imbalance for which we are in part responsible, namely the imbalance of forces. I have no hesitation in saying that we must consider giving the Arab side a large enough force, including a large enough nuclear force, to persuade Israel that it cannot simply do whatever it wants. That is the policy my country pursued in the 1970s when it gave Iraq a nuclear force. We have now destroyed it. So we will carry on with our policy of imbalance and what is happening today is merely the annoying but inevitable result of our collective blindness and cowardice.

Try to look past the nauseating calumnies against Israel, and at what he is really saying. What is striking about the argument is how much it refers to power and how little to morality. We read of a “growing imbalance” and of Israel being “self-assured and domineering”. Look past the froth about theocracy in the second paragraph, which we are astonished that even Couteaux was braindead enough to believe. It analyses the political situation in the Middle East in terms of who holds the power. This obsession with power finds its fullest expression in the last paragraph. To solve the problems of the Middle East, he advocates giving the Arab thugocracies the power to destroy Israel through genocide. He doesn't bother to explain how this will improve matters, he just states that it will. It is self-evident to him.

One of the reasons why the Euroweenies and the vile dictators of the Middle East get along like a house on fire is that they share this obsession with power. They see political situations not in terms of right and wrong but of who has power and who does not. This common mistake binds them together more strongly than considerations of rationality or ideology or even genuine self-interest. And that is why they will lose their war.

Sun, 05/30/2004 - 19:06 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Which War?

The post ends with:

And that is why they will lose their war.

Which war are you talking about exactly, and who is on each side of it?

Gil

by Gil on Mon, 05/31/2004 - 04:13 | reply

Shocking

That the Eurocrat and "The World"s views are so fundamentally similar.

The Eurocrat believes: The EU should participate in social engineering in the middle east.

"The World" believes: The US should participate in social engineering in the middle east.(e.g. Iraq)

The Eurocrat believes: The EU will not suffer any "blowback" from such social engineering.

"The World" believes: The US will not suffer any "blowback" from such social engineering.

by a reader on Mon, 05/31/2004 - 06:20 | reply

Re: Shocking...

...that the Eurocrat and "a reader"'s views are so fundamentally similar. Both of them analyse political conflicts by compulsively ignoring the moral aspects of what is in dispute. Thus, by ignoring the difference between a policy of entrenching the tyrant in power and a policy of deposing the tyrant and liberating his victims, one can call both policies "social engineering" and argue that they are alike.

by Editor on Mon, 05/31/2004 - 13:20 | reply

Re: Which War?

Gil asked:

Which war are you talking about exactly, and who is on each side of it?

Neither the war nor the participants have generally-accepted names yet. It is between the good guys and the bad guys. The good guys often call it, misleadingly 'the War on Terror'. The bad guys use terminology like 'the war against Jews and Crusaders'. The Eurocrats think of it as the war to humble America, and therefore tend to condone, sponsor or side with the bad guys.

by Editor on Mon, 05/31/2004 - 14:03 | reply

Does the editor believe...

that any action someone takes is OK as long as they have "virtuous" ideals?

by a reader on Mon, 05/31/2004 - 14:29 | reply

Re: Does the editor believe...

No.

by Editor on Mon, 05/31/2004 - 14:56 | reply

The bad guys

Since it is the white hats against the black hats, apparently, it could be useful to know who the black hats are and how they thrive. Terrorism is the struggle of the seemingly weak by tactic against the seemingly strong. The bad guys see themselves as the good guys tiny army of reformers and this is how they see their cause:

http://www.globalsecurity.org/security/library/congress/9-11_commission/030709-sageman.htm

by a reader on Mon, 05/31/2004 - 18:10 | reply

So not only must someone's ideals be virtuous but their means must be virtuous as well. In addition, what the person(s) actually accomplish is as important as what their stated ideals were. Am I missing anything or does that fairly well sum it up?

by a reader on Mon, 05/31/2004 - 20:41 | reply

Re:Re: Shocking...

Might not a principle against social engineering be a more compelling "moral principle" to the reader? and not "compulsively ignoring the moral aspects of what is in dispute"?

by a reader on Mon, 05/31/2004 - 23:16 | reply

Against Social Engineering?

A reader wrote:

'Might not a principle against social engineering be a more compelling "moral principle" to the reader? and not "compulsively ignoring the moral aspects of what is in dispute"?'

Having a blanket principle against social engineering would be deeply silly and wrong and would inevitably involve ignoring important moral differences.

For example, it would involve ignoring the important moral difference between piecemeal social engineering (in which the US is engaged) and utopian social engineering (in which the US is not engaged).

Utopian social engineering involves setting up institutions that will attempt to direct a whole society toward some particular end. This invariably ends in disaster for various reasons that the reader can find in books by Karl Popper and F. A. Hayek.

Piecemeal social engineering is what the US is engaged in. It involves changing specific institutions in a way that is responsive to criticism. They toppled a dictatorship that needed to be toppled. They are trying to help the Iraqis to train themselves to defend their country, in other words to help them to build one particular set of institutions they urgently need given the problem-situation facing Iraq. At the same time they are attempting to help Iraqis to set up institutions that will help develop a democratic government in Iraq. They are undoubtedly helping to solve lots of other problems that they have discovered since the end of the invasion. The one thing they are not trying to do is to impose a plan on the (non-terrorist) Iraqis without their consent.

by Alan Forrester on Tue, 06/01/2004 - 00:51 | reply

Re:Against Social Engineering?

Would you consider prohibition, the war on poverty, and the war on drugs examples of utopian or piecemeal social engineering? I think you could easily call the above examples utopian social engineering. What is the precise demarkation between piecemeal and utopian?

by a reader on Tue, 06/01/2004 - 01:56 | reply

Hypocritical American policy

Talking about morality in the war between good and bad guys and about justifying means one must always remember that US is no exception to the common dirty way of doing all things. What I mean is that US sided with many bad guys not sharing their moral values but for the sake of enterprise against someone "trully bad". What do you, libertarians, call this method? Idiotarianism? Moral relativism? Whatever the name. US shouldn't have backed Osama Bin Laden in order to be anti-Soviet in Afganistan. Of course, USSR was such a terrible tyranny that even notorious Osama is better... Just imagine the world without this "freedom fighter" and remember that he is a USA creature, the creature that has undergone- unforeseen-transformations. This example may seem worn out, I agree. I will give you another one. Not long ago, before 9/11 Americans provided some sort of support to Chechen leaders just in order to be anti-something or pro-something again (pro-humanrights, I guess). The same J.W.Bush didn't give a damn about links between Al-Qaeda and Chechen terrorists before Al-Qaeda stroke him. Chechen leaders were accepted in White house, they had their representative offices in USA, they were live legends, symbols of whatsoever... And those "freedom fighters" became terrorists for him too. Although not quite "overnight" - the idea of a "political solution" was still reiterated for some time. As the time goes by they are becoming more terrorists than liberals, then a little bit more and more again. Just look at this link, for instance: http://www.larouchepub.com/other/2001/2838whtehse_on_putin.html - this dialog had me in stitches:

Helen Thomas: Haven't we made many statements denouncing Russia for its attacks in Chechnya? And isn't there some image of freedom fighters there? And all of a sudden you're calling them terrorists?

Fleischer: As I just indicated, the concern for human rights remains a vital part of American policy, and the only solution to the problem in Chechnya is a political one.

Q: Yeah, but why is it just today that you're calling them terrorists? What has changed?

Fleischer: Well, as I indicated, that's not the case. That's been the long-standing position.

Q: I think this is the first time—is this not the first time you've used this word at that podium? It's the first time we've heard it.

Fleischer: I'm not sure that I have discussed the situation in Chechnya with the White House press corps prior to this. We haven't had much reason to do so.

But that's why I indicated, going back to the previous administration, in testimony before the Senate, they said what they said because it's true. And the State Department publishes a report every year that included similar information.

Q: Is it fair to assume that these words from you are in exchange for Putin's cooperation on the U.S. effort?

Fleischer: No, it's an accurate statement about the situation on the ground and the importance of the speech that President Putin made. But keep in mind, President Putin called for political discussions. Leaders of Chechnya have now indicated they are willing to engage in such discussions. That's a positive development.

Q: It sounds like a deal, though. It sounds like, in exchange for Putin's support, we, rhetorically, from this podium, are lending him support in characterizing the opposition as international terrorists.

Fleischer: No, there's no—no such conclusion should be reached. This is consistent with actions taken by the previous administration, because it's an accurate statement about developments in Chechnya

A widely accepted principle "enemies of my enemies are my friends" is obviously immoral and eventually not effective in cases like Osama Bin Laden. But USA, UK and almost every country in the world has it as their main weapon of foreign diplomacy. European parliament is no exception either. Telling that USA are better than Euro because of moral grounds they are insisting on is very proposterous and cynical.

And that is exactly why everyone in the world hates America - not because they are doing worse things than others. Because of this outrageous cry that they are the most moral country and what they do is utterly right. European parliament is still not an accomplished master of this art - that why you have so many opportunities for critique.

by a reader on Tue, 06/01/2004 - 09:28 | reply

Re: Hypocritical American policy

So, how about this?

"We must shake off decades of failed policy.... [We] have been willing to make a bargain, to tolerate oppression for the sake of stability. Longstanding ties often led us to overlook the faults of local elites.... No longer should we think tyranny is benign because it is temporarily convenient."

by Kevin on Tue, 06/01/2004 - 16:11 | reply

Re: Hypocritical American policy

From your citation of Bush speach I can conclude:

1) Americans are not responsible for dodgy foreign politics anymore - some stupid presidents did this in past - not contemporary accomplished highly-moral Americans.

2) There will be compromises no more

I personally would be happy to see this dream coming true after all.

by a reader on Tue, 06/01/2004 - 16:32 | reply

Demarcation

'Would you consider prohibition, the war on poverty, and the war on drugs examples of utopian or piecemeal social engineering? I think you could easily call the above examples utopian social engineering.'

Utopian. They are aimed at imposing a single policy of preventing peaceful behaviour that the government dislikes on people across an entire country without paying the slightest attention to their wishes.

By contrast, trying to help build free institutions in Iraq is aimed at setting up a means for the Iraqis to solve their own problems. The only behaviour they are trying to prevent in doing so is evil, violent behaviour.

'What is the precise demarkation between piecemeal and utopian?'

Utopian policies invariably involve trying to force everyone to do something that the authorities say will make people happy, while they are in fact foisting their irrationalities on people.

Piecemeal policies involve giving people access to things and letting them choose for themselves whether to support it, as well as blocking attempts to curb free choice.

by Alan Forrester on Wed, 06/02/2004 - 00:09 | reply

Re: Demarcation

Would imposing (or attempting to impose) free institutions on a group of people who have no interest in such freedom be utopian or piecemeal engineering? Locke considered all government to be by the consent of the ruled. If this is true then the majority of Iraqis at least tacitly agreed to Saddam's rule. These people would not seem to be very good candidates for leaving each other alone.

by a reader on Wed, 06/02/2004 - 02:25 | reply

Re: Hypocritical American policy

"We must shake off decades of failed policy.... [We] have been willing to make a bargain, to tolerate oppression for the sake of stability. Longstanding ties often led us to overlook the faults of local elites.... No longer should we think tyranny is benign because it is temporarily convenient."

Are our new "allies" (Afghan warlords, Pervez Musharraf, Islam Karimov etc.) examples of our "new" policy?

by a reader on Wed, 06/02/2004 - 02:39 | reply

Re: Hypocritical American policy

I think your examples predate the speech I quoted — but more importantly, the USA is not actually a dictatorship whose policies turn on a dime at the whim of the President.

by Kevin on Wed, 06/02/2004 - 17:46 | reply

Yeah, methinks not

'Would imposing (or attempting to impose) free institutions on a group of people who have no interest in such freedom be utopian or piecemeal engineering? Locke considered all government to be by the consent of the ruled. If this is true then the majority of Iraqis at least tacitly agreed to Saddam's rule.'

Locke was wrong so your argument doesn't work.

by Alan Forrester on Fri, 06/04/2004 - 02:34 | reply

Re: Locke

Please explain why Locke is wrong and your view of how governments come to power and stay in power.

by a reader on Fri, 06/04/2004 - 12:13 | reply

Governments and Consent

'Please explain why Locke is wrong and your view of how governments come to power and stay in power.'

People frequently do not consent to the government they happen to live under. A government can come to power in one of two ways. It can win an open, honest and free election, which is repeated at regular intervals. Or it can seize power by violence. Governments that do the former have people's consent to be in power. Those that do not have not got people's consent to be in power since they have not offered people the opportunity to get rid of them, i.e. - to withdraw their consent. Saddam's government was obviously in the latter category.

by Alan Forrester on Sun, 06/06/2004 - 02:32 | reply

Re:Governments and Consent

Several comments:

1. An insolvable problem with democracy is that the rules of democracy cannot be established democratically. They can only be established by decree. An example of this is voter eligibility. One could argue that monarchy is a form of democracy where one voter is eligible.... the monarch.

Furthermore, there have been historically wide variations in the eligibility of voters:

- a. only the noblemen can vote (England around the time of the Magna Carta)
- b. only property owning white males can vote (post revolutionary war America)
- c. only males can vote (post civil war America)
- d. only people over the age of 18 can vote (present day America)

Would George Washington be considered a dictator since he (most likely) did not have the electoral consent of the majority of the total population of the 13 states?

2. How does like Saddam someone "seize" power. You could say: "I, Alan Forrester, declare myself supreme ruler of Great Britain.", but no one would think that you actually seized power. You need to have someone (a lot of someones) to carry out your orders to actually seize power. How does someone like Saddam get others to carry out his orders? And what percentage of the population must follow those orders for him to stay in power?

by a reader on Mon, 06/07/2004 - 23:18 | reply

Re:Governments and Consent

'1. An insolvable problem with democracy is that the rules of democracy cannot be established democratically. They can only be established by decree. An example of this is voter eligibility. One could argue that monarchy is a form of democracy where one voter is eligible.... the monarch. [followed by snipped examples]'

A democracy can't be established democratically where there was none before. However, your example don't really bear much weight. In some of the societies below, criticism of the powers that be was allowed and even encouraged. Voting was one of the means of doing that and the most effective one employed to date. Those would count as democracies IMO. So I would count (b) - (d) as democratic, although rather flawed. I should say (a) probably was not.

'2. How does like Saddam someone "seize" power. You could say: "I, Alan Forrester, declare myself supreme ruler of Great Britain.", but no one would think that you actually seized power. You need to have someone (a lot of someones) to carry out your orders to actually seize power. How does someone like Saddam get others to carry out his orders? And what percentage of the population must follow those orders for him to stay in power?'

From whence do tyrants originate? Well, it's not all that big a mystery really. Democracy, human rights and freedom are all abstract and difficult to discover ideas. Iraq had never been democratic even before Saddam came along and people had no knowledge of these ideas. The rewards of smashing in a person's skull and taking their stuff, or bumping off your enemies, or committing rape are immediate and obvious. The consequence of having a society where that sort of thing are routine and accepted are not immediately obvious. Furthermore, by the time such a system is established lots of people are all engaging in this behaviour and to dissent from it is to invite death unless you have a lot of people on your side and any time you invite somebody into a circle of dissidents you risk death.

Of course, that is not enough in and of itself to guarantee that a tyranny will stay alive. For that to happen, all outside ideas must be excluded. Rewards for using creativity to come up with new ways of smashing anything that vaguely resembles thought or dissent are necessary. An ideology that provides a specious pseudojustification form murder, torture and extortion also helps. Saddam's policemen had the habit of breaking into a person's home late at night while they were asleep, putting a gun to their head, telling them that Saddam had been toppled and that they must join the revolution against the Baathist state or die, of course the person would be shot if he agreed.

by Alan Forrester on Thu, 06/10/2004 - 00:25 | reply

Re:Re:Governments and Consent

If indeed: "Democracy, human rights and freedom are all abstract and difficult to discover ideas." how are the benefits of these ideas going to conveyed by an occupying force that, by in large, does not even speak the same language as Iraqis? Western civilization has evolved over a period of at least 400 years. and Iraqis are going to learn all of explicit and implicit principles in how many years? Maybe utopian isn't the right word, but....

"The rewards of smashing in a person's skull and taking their stuff, or bumping off your enemies, or committing rape are immediate and obvious." What are the immediate and obvious rewards of being a suicide bomber? or do you consider suicide bombing and tyrannical regimes completely unrelated to each other?

"An ideology that provides a specious pseudojustification form murder, torture and extortion also helps." Helps? I think ideology is essential. To get people to follow the orders of a tyrant, become suicide bombers, or torture and murder requires ideology (however specious we may think it is). What would the Iranian or Taliban regimes have been without Islamic ideology?

But the bottom line is that Iraqi's beliefs about the world have not fundamentally changed, and the continued presence of U.S. troops will not change that.

by a reader on Fri, 06/11/2004 - 12:14 | reply

Governments and Consent

'If indeed: "Democracy, human rights and freedom are all abstract and difficult to discover ideas." how are the benefits of these ideas going to conveyed by an occupying force that, by in large, does not even speak the same language as Iraqis? Western civilization has evolved over a period of at least 400 years. and Iraqis are going to learn all of explicit and implicit principles in how many years?

Maybe utopian isn't the right word, but....'

Oddly enough they have people there who speak Arabic. The soldiers aren't there to persuade them, they're there to provide security. also, it's harder to invent an idea from scratch than to learn it from somebody who already knows it.

"The rewards of smashing in a person's skull and taking their stuff, or bumping off your enemies, or committing rape are immediate and obvious." What are the immediate and obvious rewards of being a suicide bomber? or do you consider suicide bombing and tyrannical regimes completely unrelated to each other?'

The suicide bombing is a result of Islamist ideology, not every tyranny features suicide bombing.

'But the bottom line is that Iraqis beliefs about the world have not fundamentally changed...'

I tend to find arguments more useful than blank assertions. The evidence indicates that more Iraqis want democracy now than when the US arrived:

<http://www.thedesertsun.com/news/stories2004/national/20040515020610.shtml>

by Alan Forrester on Sun, 06/13/2004 - 15:31 | reply

Re:Governments and Consent

I asked: "How does someone like Saddam get others to carry out his orders? And what percentage of the population must follow those orders for him to stay in power?"

You replied: "Well, it's not all that big a mystery really Democracy, human rights and freedom are all abstract and difficult to discover ideas.....The rewards of smashing in a person's skull and taking their stuff, or bumping off your enemies, or committing rape are immediate and obvious."

I asked: "What are the immediate and obvious rewards of being a suicide bomber? or do you consider suicide bombing and tyrannical regimes completely unrelated to each other? "

My point was to question your theory of how tyrannies are formed (not specifically Saddam's) . That it could not simply be because the rewards of certain behaviors are "immediate and obvious". That in general humans are motivated by theories. And as long as the majority of people believe in those theories, they will tolerate a tyrant who espouses those theories.

by a reader on Mon, 06/14/2004 - 03:23 | reply

LE

Or, as a more reasonable middle ground, a nation can passively agree to accept rigged elections; so that the illusory facade of "consent" can be used to rationalize away the harsh reality, that we are nothing but a banana republic anyway.

Just a big, rich one.

This has certainly been clear since shortly after November of 1963, when an inconvenient US elected official was hastily replaced through public execution on the streets of Dallas.

From that point on, most Americans accepted the painful realization that their "consent" would be manufactured by elites, one way or another, with or without their active participation.

And most, predictably, stopped voting at all in national elections.

Uniquely American cultural norms in broad acceptance now, like the "couch potato", passively watching television for hours at a time, remaining thoroughly detached from real political decision-making; emerge from a mature and realistic acceptance of political power the way it actually functions and not as we fancifully imagine it to work.

In a gangster republic, the preponderance of force is the ultimate arbiter of political power. Even children intuitively understand that harsh reality of the schoolyard and the street.

In the end, people realize that the power is in the hands of those who command the loyalty of the armed forces (regular military, Reserves, National Guard, and elite special ops units) which will finally determine the outcome of the current evolving situation.

Just like any other ordinary Third World banana republic.

Referencing Tommy Franks remarks in a recent interview with Cigar Afficionado magazine, I would say that martial law here in the America is no longer inevitable - since it has already arrived in incremental fashion. Martial law is already here.

Most Americans just don't know it yet.

by a reader on Sun, 06/20/2004 - 20:23 | reply

Most Americans just don't know it yet

Right. Just a certain relatively small category of them.

by Editor on Sun, 06/20/2004 - 22:04 | reply

"Just like any other ordinary

"Just like any other ordinary Third World banana republic."

Only you are able to say all of this publicly without the slightest fear of any retribution. I wonder what this tells us?

An Iranian Student (AIS)

by a reader on Thu, 07/08/2004 - 01:41 | reply

What a farce!

How remarkable! A "libertarian" web-site that, because it is not "idiotarian" (which allows them to comfortably despise the rest of "idiot" humanity) decides that when it comes to the crunch, when push comes to shove, and given the available data at the present time, then actually..... it supports the world's most gigantic military installation ever, currently rampaging around Afghanistan and Iraq (I'm sorry, "building democracy" in Afghanistan and Iraq). "Rebuilding" means the wholesale demolition of towns like Falludja, of which we hear little these days....

It also means supporting Israel. Not that I have the slightest axe to grind for the "Arab thugocracies", but if it were any other country in the world, then Israel (which explicitly bases its flag, its citizenship, and its immigration policy on RACE and RELIGION) would rightly be called a racist state. And Ariel Sharon would be denounced for what he is: a fascist killer (anyone remember Sabra and Chatila? or indeed Sharon's services to the Israeli cause when he was leading punitive expeditions against the Palestinians?).

Oh yes, and while you're slamming the "Euroweenies" (whatever that might mean) for supporting "Arab thugocracies", might you perhaps tell us which ones you are thinking of? Could it be Egypt, one of the world's biggest recipients of US aid, including military aid? Could it be Saudi Arabia, which for decades has been the lynch-pin of US power in the region? Might it be possibly be Saddam's Iraq, which the US supported (via Saudi Arabia) during a particularly ghastly and bloody war against Iran (8 years of fighting, 1 million dead, massacres of Kurds using poison gas supplied by Germany)? Could it be Osama Bin Laden and his bunch of killers, hired, armed, and trained to fight the Afghan government supported by the USSR? And if we're talking about thugocracies, then let's go outside the Arab world and talk about Pakistan, Chile (Pinochet) not to mention Guatemala, Salvador, Panama (America's man the drug-dealer Noriega...), oh yes and the racist South Africa, and and and... the list just goes on and on.

Scratch a "libertarian" it seems, and you get a defender of US imperialism!

Not that the European states are any better of course, each defends its own interests with whatever means it has available and will cosy up to the most vile dictators (Saddam, Putin the butcher of Chechnya, China as long as they can sell them an airbus or two).

by a reader on Mon, 09/12/2005 - 13:21 | reply

The History of Israel

Surprisingly enough, you are factually mistaken about both the history of Israel and the nature of Zionism. We recommend our short account of that.

As for the moral/political issues you raise about Israel: That the Law of Return could possibly make Israel a 'racist state' even if it were an utterly iniquitous measure, and the idea that because of special privileges granted only to Jews it escapes being called a racist state, are examples of the grotesque sophistry under which Israel and Jews are singled out for condemnation according to the prevailing political correctness. Moreover, the claim that the Law of Return is iniquitous in the first place makes no more sense than a claim that the NAACP is 'racist' because it does not turn itself into an 'International Association for the Advancement of All People'. Indeed, it makes considerably less sense because if the NAACP did do that absurd thing, the people currently receiving its assistance would not be immediately subjected to genocide.

by Editor on Mon, 09/12/2005 - 14:26 | reply

Den Beste For President?

Here's the speech that Steven Den Beste might give at the D-Day commemoration ceremony, if he were President of the United States.

Tue, 06/01/2004 - 22:29 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

The Attributes Of A Saint

There may well have been a Jewish preacher in the first century CE called something like Yeshu, later known as Jesus Christ, whose life formed the basis of the myths related in the Christian Gospels. If there was, then it is unlikely that he was antisemitic.

There may well have been a person called Matthew who wrote the Gospel of that name a few decades later and who has since become known as Saint Matthew. Whoever wrote that Gospel probably intended to appeal to antisemitism in his readers when he wrote of the Jews cursing their own descendants with the guilt of deicide:

His blood be upon us, and upon our children.

But whether Matthew intended it or not, the overwhelming majority of Christians throughout the ages never doubted that the Gospel story, especially the story of the death of Jesus, is virulently antisemitic and that this was right and proper.

In the early nineteenth century, a German nun called Anne Catherine Emmerich claimed to have witnessed the death of Jesus and the preceding events via a series of miraculous visions, which were written down in a book called The Dolorous Passion of Our Lord Jesus Christ. This absurd claim was believed by most Catholics and remains recognised by the Catholic Church to this day.

Emmerich was of course obsessed by The Jews and their guilt. Among the things she saw in her visions was the eternal torture of all Jews, for which she blamed only – The Jews:

Whenever, during my meditations on the Passion of our Lord, I imagine I hear that frightful cry of the Jews, 'His blood be upon us, and upon our children,' visions of a wonderful and terrible description display before my eyes at the same moment the effect of that solemn curse. I fancy I see a gloomy sky covered with clouds, of the colour of blood, from which issue fiery swords and darts, lowering over the vociferating multitude; and this curse, which they have entailed upon themselves, appears to me to penetrate even to the very marrow of their bones, – even to the unborn infants. They appear to me encompassed on all sides by darkness; the words they utter take, in my eyes, the form of black flames, which recoil upon them, penetrating the bodies of some, and only playing around others.

In the early twenty-first century, an actor called Mel Gibson read Emmerich's book and was inspired to produce a Passion Play (if you're not aware of the history of Passion Plays, please read this), in the form of a movie, based on Emmerich's visions.

Pope John-Paul II saw the movie and allegedly authenticated it, saying 'it is as it was'. Since John-Paul no more has the supernatural ability to witness historical events than Emmerich or anyone else, this was taken as a moral endorsement of the content of the movie. Later, the Vatican denied the endorsement and the quotation.

Now John-Paul has beatified Anne Catherine Emmerich. Beatification is the step just short of sainthood, and is often followed by it.

What are the attributes of a saint?

Fri, 06/04/2004 - 01:52 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

saint = exceptionally good/mo

saint = exceptionally good/moral person or am i missing something?

by this criterion, Anne isn't one.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Fri, 06/04/2004 - 06:56 | reply

It is just an interpretation

It looks like the main point you were trying to bring is that Christianity is, deeply in its heart, antisemitic because of these words that Matthew added. Christianity is antisemitic in the same way and to the same extent as any religion or ideology is responsible for any hatred against other religions/ideologies. Up to a certain extent! It just happens every so often that whenever you stand for any moral value you would necessarily denounce any "immorality" and people who stand for different values. Judaists would say that being christian is bad - will we call them anti-european after that?

Whether certain people choose some words as the target or as an argument has nothing to do with the real meaning of the words (whatever it is). In the same way as you cannot blame a person who is falling on you from the stairs just because you never know who pushed that person first and why. If a woman pronounced these or similar words once and Matthew put them down or heard these words from someone else it still doesn't prove that he was anti-semitic. And if it does, it doesn't prove that passion plays are all anti-semitic. And, in turn, it doesn't signify that mentioning a crucifixion is anything to do with anti-semitism. Even if one says that judaism is evil religion (and this IS the main point of Gospels) it is still not "jews are all evil". You cannot say that all Saudi Arabians are bad people just because Islam is their main religion.

As you said earlier, everyone is entitled to a freedom of speech unless one gives orders to kill. I wouldn't be sure about Matthew being inciting violence against jews and neither I would say about Mel Gibson. And even a weaker link leads to the Pope.

Hitler himself was only responsible for Holocaust, not Matthew.

As for possible interpretations, one might say that the words meant "I know what I am doing and it is right and my children should be proud of it because we fought devil in this case" - isn't it what Bush and Blair say about themselves all the time?

by a reader on Fri, 06/04/2004 - 08:49 | reply

Pogo

I read the same Gospel and saw the same movie you write of, and came away feeling compassion for, not hatred against, the Jews.

I can understand how you might interpret otherwise, given the vile anti-Semitism of the Church's past. But I don't think this is the operative mode today. The idea that Jews put Jesus to death is as interesting as saying Americans killed Lincoln and Kennedy. Jesus was Jewish, lived among a Jewish population, and died at the hands of his people. This same sad story can be told in every part of the world.

I agree however, that attention to language and actions are essential. Just be careful of alienating all who support Israel by painting with too broad of a brush.

It's motive, not religion, that mattered.

by a reader on Fri, 06/04/2004 - 12:35 | reply

But...

Who cares? Who should?

by a reader on Fri, 06/04/2004 - 20:33 | reply

Call me simple but seems to m

Call me simple but seems to me that the attributes of a saint are no more or less than: having been declared a "saint" by whatever church you're talking about. Historically it would seem that good or bad people can be and have been declared "saints" by this or that church for good or bad reasons. Sounds like this Emmerich lady had her problems and should she be made a Catholic saint it would probably be safe to call it a shame.

Meanwhile, while it's appropriate enough to complain about historical anti-Semitic passion plays, and to place Emmerich's sentiments, vision and writing in that dishonorable tradition, the modern (and, American) understanding of "his blood be upon us" as exemplified in the recent movie by Mel Gibson (in fact the line was excised from the film IIRC) need not necessarily have much of anything to do with all that. Of course I remain open to evidence to the contrary, in the form of e.g. pogroms committed by recent The Passion of the Christ moviegoers. However, the actual historical record of that movie's release and its showings, in the US at least (I make no claims as to how it is being received in Arabia.. or France..), would seem to suggest that you can relax to some extent.

--Blix

by a reader on Fri, 06/04/2004 - 22:31 | reply

The Pope's mistake

The Pope, in deciding to beatify Emmerich, must regard her as an exemplary person.

Everyone in this thread so far seems to agree that the Pope is mistaken in this judgement.

by David Deutsch on Sat, 06/05/2004 - 00:38 | reply

Sometimes people get beatified

Sometimes people get beatified for being mystics rather than being martyrs or people whose actions were particularly meritorious.

The beatification implies papal endorsement of the visions experienced (Hildegard of Bingen, with her notoriously wacky visions got papal endorsement while still alive, which meant that she was safe to go on recording what she saw without being accused of heresy, which had been a real possibility).

I also consider the Pope to be mistaken in his judgement of the orthodoxy of Emmerich's visions.

Emma

by a reader on Sat, 06/05/2004 - 09:04 | reply

Exclusivity

The facts of the matter are:

None of us are very likely to ever be declared either beatified or a saint. Nor are any of us very likely to become Pope. One of the attributes of a saint is usually that they are no longer living so we can make up stories about who they were and they have little possibility of objecting. All in all a saint is just an example of the more visible traits of humanity, with a little sanctification and mystery thrown in. Most saints don't bother me. I imagine that they put on their coulottes one leg at a time like anybody else. Maybe they just gave more thought to it.

by a reader on Sat, 06/05/2004 - 14:41 | reply

The Pope's mistake

This 'mistake' has a name, doesn't it?

by a reader on Sun, 06/06/2004 - 14:49 | reply

Ronald Reagan RIP

We salute Ronald Reagan, fortieth President of the United States and victor of the Cold War, who died today.

Some will say that this is not a moment to engage in political controversy, but this is a special case: May the current President listen to reason, as articulated by President Reagan's widow Nancy among many others, and reconsider his irrational opposition to the scientific research that would cure terrible diseases such as the Alzheimer's from which Ronald suffered.

Sun, 06/06/2004 - 00:30 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Religious Morality

I salute Reagan as well.

I'd also like to note that the World often seems to praise Bush's religiousness as a guide to his moral choices. It's important to remember that this is also a source of significant moral errors, too. His position on stem-cell research is a good example of this. It isn't merely Bush's position on this research that's irrational. It's the basis of his entire worldview.

Perhaps it isn't so praiseworthy after all.

Gil

by Gil on Sun, 06/06/2004 - 04:49 | reply

foundationalism

worldviews do not have basis-es.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Sun, 06/06/2004 - 06:14 | reply

Re Religious morality and foundationalism

I agree that world-views do not have bases. Nevertheless I agree with the substance of Gil's comment. I would merely replace 'It's the basis of his entire worldview' by 'Religious thinking pervades his entire worldview'.

As I wrote here, even the best religions tend to 'entrench a slew of wrong ideas' in the minds of believers, some of which are evil ideas.

by David Deutsch on Sun, 06/06/2004 - 14:38 | reply

it makes a huge difference

it makes a huge difference. if something bad was the basis of a worldview, it would seem to make sense to conclude the worldview was bad, not praiseworthy, or something like that. this is what Gil did.

but for a mistake to simply pervade a worldview (come up a lot, be common) simply means the worldview has a bunch of errors with a common theme. and it would not automatically follow from this that the worldview shouldn't be praised. further argument and judgment would be required. and in some cases this would conclude that we should praise religious people.

you'll notice The World's post criticises a religious flaw in bush. so gil wasn't saying to simply be willing to criticise religious flaws when we see them. we do that. he wants more. it seems to me he clearly was asking the world to stop endorsing and praising bush generally, and to instead only do it in a very limited way like "Bush is good on the war".

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Sun, 06/06/2004 - 18:09 | reply

David, say more

You refer to the article on the Edge. Specifically I am intrigued by this statement: "Why would somebody hate so badly"? And he /George W. Bush/ replied: "my answer is, there's evil in the world. But we can overcome evil. We're good." This is the simple truth — a truth on which all our futures depend —

In almost all senses I agree. We can overcome evil. This is the simple truth - a truth on which all our futures depend -

However, the "We're good." of the address seems a broad brush way of saying the inclusive We, not as a critical rationalist statement, but as a foregone conclusion; right against wrong side. "We", the good guys.

The potential trap here is that in saying We're good, as in "We are the good guys", could become a conclusion, before critical thought. The president may not mean it this way but it is very easy to fall into this trap. Once you have concluded that you are on the "right side" it is easy to continue to conclude rightness before thinking about what constitutes goodness and how to act rightly from it.

It is significant and meaningful here that he is talking to children.

Children especially continue to ask why. Why are we good?

The truth does not take sides. It simply is. The "good guys" are good because they continue to think rationally, critically and act according to to this credo. In that sense, "We" are good too.

by a reader on Sun, 06/06/2004 - 20:22 | reply

It Makes Little Difference

Religion doesn't "simply pervade" Bush's worldview.

Religion PERVADES Bush's worldview.

And, these things don't simply have a common theme. They have a common source: his commitment to mysticism, faith, and allegedly divinely-inspired doctrine, rather than to reason. This is not a reliable path to moral truth. It's more likely to lead to moral errors. It, in fact, leads many others to be wrong on the war, so I think his rightness on this subject comes from knowledge that he has that is independent of his religious faith. I'm happy that he applies this non-religious knowledge to this issue. I wish he would do it to more issues. The fact that he doesn't do it often enough is a flaw.

Yes, I'm very happy that Bush knows that there is good and evil in the world. But, this knowledge is available without all of the irrational baggage of religion. Even a stopped clock is right twice a day.

Elliot is wrong again when he asserts that I object to praising Bush generally. I think it's quite appropriate to praise many religious people generally (Ronald Reagan is a great example). What I object to is praising his religiousness specifically as if it should be considered a badge of honor, and the mark of an enlightened and trustworthy leader.

And, what I noticed was that The World did NOT characterize Bush's error as a "religious flaw" but, rather, as an "irrational opposition".

Also, I'd appreciate it if either The World would endorse Elliot Temple as one of its official spokesmen, or he would stop giving the impression that it has (e.g. using "we" when referring to The World's posts and opinions).

Gil

by Gil on Sun, 06/06/2004 - 22:19 | reply

bush is critical

Bush has certain ideas about what good is. he talks about them all the time. he thinks everyone should be free, woman shouldn't be oppressed, people should not live in fear of their governments, and the list goes on. if our society wasn't like that, he would notice, and stop calling it good.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Sun, 06/06/2004 - 22:20 | reply

we

"we" gives the impression the world endorses me just as much as if i said "i am morally aligned with The World". in both cases clearly this is my view.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Sun, 06/06/2004 - 22:38 | reply

religion and the war

According to a survey conducted March 13-16 by the Pew Research Center and the Pew Forum on Religion and Public Life, 62 percent of American Catholics support the war, the same percentage as white, mainline Protestants. Religious support was strongest among evangelicals, 77 percent of whom support the war.

Only 36 percent of African-American Protestants favored military action in Iraq. "Seculars" -- respondents who said they were atheists or had no religious affiliation -- divided evenly, with 44 percent in favor and 44 percent opposed. --source

Gil, you seem to say Bush understands why the war is right despite his religion. in light of this view, could you explain the above stats which feature Christians being better on the war than non-religious people?

by Elliot Temple on Sun, 06/06/2004 - 23:17 | reply

Religion and the War

Those statistics don't require an explanation. They are just correlations.

But, religious communities often share many values that go beyond the contents of the religion. So non-religious correlations are to be expected.

What are the statistics among european christians? If their support for the war is lower, does that mean they're not following christianity as accurately as americans do? Or would it support the notion that the support of the war comes largely from values outside of the religious tradition?

Gil

by Gil on Mon, 06/07/2004 - 00:18 | reply

explanation

your explanation seems to be that more religious communities with shared values happened to share good values than similar atheist communities. isn't that explaining who is moral by luck or happenstance?

you say an explanation isn't required of you. well, not by the statistics. sure. however, i asked for one. if you want to be persuasive that your views are good at explaining reality (the criterion for good views, basically), then you should be able to explain things with them when asked. and also, the better your views are, the easier this should be, and the more sense your explanation should make, etc so if you find it difficult to explain facts in terms of your view, then this suggests your view isn't very good.

"If [European Christian] support for the war is lower, does that mean they're not following christianity as accurately as americans do?"

i would explain it by saying that is a different religious tradition, despite the shared heritage and shared name.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 06/07/2004 - 01:30 | reply

Explanation

Elliot,

If we were to find that, as I conjecture, american evangelical christians are more likely than athiests to be NASCAR enthusiasts, would that require an explanation based on religious traditions?

If not, then it seems to me that everything you've written above is nonsense.

Gil

by Gil on Mon, 06/07/2004 - 04:48 | reply

explanation

no one criticises christians for liking NASCAR. it's viewed as a matter of taste, and preferences on the matter aren't taken very seriously. thus they haven't really evolved a lot (though how to make the sport better may have).

the war isn't like that. this is something everyone's thought about, and involves moral issues accessible to everyone. so, say, "my mom took me to a race when i was little and i liked it" won't work for liking the war. it takes more detailed explanation involving people's moral theories.

have i proven the explanation for christians favoring the war is a religious one? no. but that's a possibility, and if you can't think of another one, then my version of events seems the most compelling explanation.

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 06/07/2004 - 05:06 | reply

Explanation

Ok, here's another possible explanation...

People in communities with lots of christians also tend to be more patriotic and nationalistic than average. They tend to support whatever their national leaders have chosen to do, and to resent those who oppose them. They were, I'd guess, more likely to support the Vietnam war, the draft, and Japanese internment during WWII, too.

Again, this is not caused by their religious faith and tradition, but merely correlates somewhat within the same communities; and has nothing to do with deep moral consciousness or superiority. Like NASCAR.

Gil

by Gil on Mon, 06/07/2004 - 05:27 | reply

"would"?

The above exchange aside, I'm still hung up on (what seems to be) The World's assertion that for the U.S. government to fund research which uses fetal stem-cells-from-other-than-existing-lines (as opposed to just adult stem-cells and/or fetal stem-cells-from-those-existing-lines) - which is what Bush actually forbid, you see - "would" cure diseases such as Alzheimer's. (And BTW, although he may "oppose" it on a personal level, AFAIK there is no stem-cell research which Bush has actually forbid.)

If The World really knows that such research "would" cure Alzheimer's, or even a disease-such-as-Alzheimer's whatever that might mean, it would be extremely newsworthy and scientifically relevant, and ought to be published in journals and publicized in the media. Such an earth-shaking scientific finding might even perhaps convince Bush to change his mind on this issue, who knows? Please, please don't sit on this finding.

Along these lines, another highly advisable course of action would be to pressure other agents than the U.S. federal government (such as European governments, George Soros, Bill Gates etc) to fund fetal-stem-cell-research-which-would-cure-Alzheimer's-or-a-disease-such-as. After all, if the only thing now preventing an Alzheimer's cure is the U.S. federal government not funding research involving fetal-stem-cells-other-than-from-existing-lines, that could be easily remedied. The U.S. government is not the only potential source of research money in the world; money from other sources is just as good. Certainly it can't be the case that Alzheimer's-or-a-disease-such-as "would" be cured if research is funded using U.S. government money but not other kinds of money, can it?

So again, I reiterate, please publicize your scientific findings regarding this disease that "would" be cured, both in the interest of science and to get other-than-US-funding to do the actual research. What's stopping you?

by a reader on Mon, 06/07/2004 - 23:11 | reply

Could

The above is amusing. But, I think it's a valid point that Bush has urged discrimination against a particular promising line of research because of the religious symbolism involved. That's a bad thing.

It's hard to tell, but this could have a chilling effect on privately-funded research because there would be fewer researchers who could follow-up on interesting results, and some might fear an eventual legal ban (as with cloning), etc.

Gil

by Gil on Mon, 06/07/2004 - 23:36 | reply

The Prisoners' Conscience

Getting back to Reagan...

I think The World readers will probably be interested in this short tribute to Reagan from Natan Sharansky.

Gil

by Gil on Mon, 06/07/2004 - 23:45 | reply

lots of things could...

Gil,

But, I think it's a valid point that Bush has urged discrimination against a particular promising line of research because of the religious symbolism involved. That's a bad thing.

1. Governments have, do, and will continue in the future to discriminate against the FUNDING of lines of research. (In fact, they have to. Capital is finite. To fund project X necessarily discriminates against the funding of project Y.) I don't know how they "discriminate against research" per se outside of the context of funding, unless you're talking about banning, which is not actually what Bush did and which your alarmism notwithstanding I don't think anyone seriously believes to be in the cards.

2. "Promising" is your, highly informed I assume, opinion. May be correct. However,

3. whether something is "promising" in and of itself is not very interesting. Even modulo subjectivity, lots of things are promising. It would only be informative as a relative statement (see 1, we must discriminate), as in, It's relatively promising compared to other things. That may be how you meant it, and indeed, that it may be, but,

4. Make sure you understand what you are calling "promising". Again, what Bush has actually declined to fund is research-using-fetal-stem-cells-from-other-than-lines-XYZW..., not "Stem Cell Research" in general. Are you really saying that fetal-stem-cell-research-from-other-than-those-existing-lines, is promising, and relatively so? Why are fetal cells in particular so necessary? Why are other lines so necessary? What's so bad about the existing lines? Have you done the leg work here?

5. Although Bush's religion was undoubtedly involved in his decision (as it is in virtually all his decisions I presume), unclear why you use the phrase "religious symbolism" to denote this decision. Religious principles perhaps, and understandably if one doesn't believe in any religion than all such principles may seem like mere "symbolism" or incomprehensible as anything other than that, but... Why don't I just go ahead and accuse you of engaging in Scientific Symbolism? Basis for the charge would be the same.

It's hard to tell, but this could have a chilling effect on privately-funded research because there would be fewer researchers who could follow-up on interesting results, and some might fear an eventual legal ban (as with cloning), etc.

But on the other side of the ledger we have The World's implicit declaration that this particular research (=research using fetal-stem-cells-from-other-than-existing-lines), if only funded at a higher level, would definitely cure Alzheimer's or some disease like that, and all that is really lacking is money. Your more sober hedging here is duly noted; however, assuming The World is correct, why wouldn't some enterprising funding agent/European government/researcher jump at the chance to grab that sure thing? ;-)

Again, apparently an Alzheimer's (or disease like it) cure is out there right now just for the taking, all that is needed is for enough money to be paid to a scientist to manipulate fetal stem-cells from lines other than the crappy useless pathetic ones that are US government approved. If it's such a sure thing then who cares if the US government, being overrun by religious fanatics, puts a (temporary, as it would surely be, since a cure is almost here!) "chilling effect" on future research or even bans it. All the more reason for Euro-gov'ts or George Soros (or hey what about the Chinese?) to fund this research aggressively, quickly pluck that low-hanging disease-cure off the tree, get famous/win Nobel Prizes/distribute the cure around the world, make big profits, and say a big "In Your Face!" to the stupid Americans who would be shown the error of their ways in the most dramatic way possible since Sputnik.

P.S. I know this is all mostly just an irritating tangent and perhaps I should have just let stand the sloppy use of "would" because the important thing is to allow all stem cell research unfettered in the interest of progressiveness and all that is good and nice. However, IMHO equally irritating was the fact that The World's first post about the death of Ronald Reagan was to use it as a flimsy springboard into a virtual non sequitur about Bush's mid 2001 stem cell research decision.

Does the life and death of Ronald Reagan have nothing more pressing to teach us than the need for the U.S. federal government to issue research grants to scientists who want to work with fetal stem cells other than the existing lines already in use?

--Blixia (last one too)

by a reader on Tue, 06/08/2004 - 00:42 | reply

Should

Blixia,

I'm responding in a somewhat random order...

I called it "religious symbolism", because it's my understanding that there's an adequate supply of embryos that would otherwise be destroyed; primarily from excess in vitro fertilization processes. These embryos would not otherwise have resulted in a baby, and using them would not motivate abortions. These embryos will die anyway. I think that this decision was purely symbolic, because it could not save any children, but it's a topic that just makes people think about abortions.

I'm certainly not an expert, but I understand that many researchers have claimed that fetal stem cells might have a wider variety of cells that they can become than non-fetal ones, or they can be made to do this more easily, or have some other such advantages. I think that there has been a great deal of recent progress with non-fetal stem cells, so this might not be as important as it was once thought. I don't know. What I do know is that many of these researchers claim that the preliminary results have been promising enough to warrant funding by the existing standards and it is just the religious aspect associated with using human embryos that have blocked it.

I don't claim to speak for The World, but I suspect that they meant to say something closer to what I have, rather than to imply that cures are imminent.

Like it or not, politics often works in such a way as to have certain legislative and regulatory changes triggered by peripherally related news events. Take the Brady Bill as an example.

And, it's true that the government should have no obligation to fund this particular research (as it should have no obligation to fund abortions). I actually would like to see the abolition of all non-defense-related publicly funded research.

But, when the government does fund things, I'd like it to base its decisions on the best available knowledge and criteria to get the most value for the money, rather than to sacrifice this quality to appeal to certain constituencies' prejudices. I think that private people should be able to discriminate about how to allocate their own resources using whatever foolish criteria they like; but the government, as trustee for the public, should be held to a higher standard.

Gil

by Gil on Tue, 06/08/2004 - 02:04 | reply

stem cell research

Blixa,

Nice post!

Do you think Bush analysed the issue as you did, and then came to your conclusions rationally, or do you think an irrationality stopped him from giving the idea of funding stem cell research fair consideration (fair judged by comparing it to how much consideration other similar research options get that he has no irrationality about)?

Also, do you think when The World said "would" this was meant to communicate an infallible guarantee, or simply that research will cure the disease, and this particular research is part of the correct path to finding the cure?

PS the 'would' thing may have been a picky point, but it was kinda interesting anyway. and i liked your response to gil.

PPS wanna join my email list, chat on AIM (curi42), meet, or email me from an addy you ever check? i don't bite. curi[at]curi[dot]us

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 06/08/2004 - 02:51 | reply

Comment Editing

The "edit your comment" feature is great, but it seems to revert back to the original comment if you go back to edit a comment again. This might be useful, but it should be optional since one is more likely to merely want to make a small refinement to the current state of the comment.

Sorry to complain about it here, but another feature that it's missing is the ability to delete extraneous comments entirely; so I had to write something.

Gil

Gil, I'll try to be as bri

Gil,

I'll try to be as brief as possible.

The "symbolism" charge still seems unjustified. 1. How do you know Bush (right or wrong) wasn't sincere? Sure seemed so to me. 2. What's the point of "appealing to" a constituency (pro-lifers) he already had in his back pocket? puzzled 3. In fact pro-lifers were not uniformly happy with the decision, the "using existing lines is ok" part being viewed as a terrible cop-out. The decision was a compromise that irked practically everyone, another reason I believe it to have not been a political ploy. It was not, as you seem to imply, prompted by "news events"; it was only in the news because he made it so in the first place. If it had been about votes or politics it would have been more astute to have made the opposite decision, or at least to have done it quietly on a Friday night, under the radar. Instead, he gave a (highly unusual for him!) prime time, prominent speech explaining his rationale. YMMV but to me these all point to him (however wrong his decision was) having given weighty and sincere consideration to the matter, and taken it quite seriously indeed, rather than some kind of political motives or trying to "appeal to" the "prejudices" of some constituency.

Re: what researchers think, It should be pointed out that all researchers think everything they're doing deserves funding, the more the better ;), however, obviously I do not doubt the substance of the claim that stem-cell research in general is especially promising, or that embryonic stem-cells in particular can have some advantage or another. But you still haven't said why the advantage is so overwhelming or why adult stem-cells - or embryonic stem-cells from the "lines" which are approved - are insufficient to whatever research task you have in mind, if any.

More importantly, it benefits precisely no one - not even the people who want the research approved! - to (as The World did) oversell the situation by crying Wolf and implying that there was an automatic-disease-cure in the works if not for Bush's decision. (And to have fed a grieving, agonized Nancy Reagan some fairy tale about how "this would have definitely cured Ronnie's disease, too late for him, but hey" so as to use her as a talking-prop, if that's what people did, is downright distasteful if you ask me.)

Re: it won't be saving lives, because of certain embryos which won't be growing up, and could be used in research, but now won't... Isn't it possible that Bush knows all that, and nevertheless is worried about a slippery-slope? And wouldn't he be correct - i.e. if he did allow the use of those particular embryos you're talking about, but not future embryos, or all embryos, or whatever, wouldn't you now be saying, He should be allowing everything!

But if all that's the test of "symbolism" then my earlier "scientific symbolism" jest may not be so far off the mark after all.. It's not at all clear that you have any concrete idea what's so necessary about the particular research that Bush has decided not to fund (=research using embryonic-stem-cells-from-other-than-some-particular-lines), but you really really want it to be funded regardless. I suspect you are far from alone in that regard. The way some people talk, it's hard to escape the conclusion that they want desperately this stuff to be funded because Bush doesn't want to (+ Bush is religious).

And by "best available knowledge" informing such decisions, you mean to axiomatically exclude all explicitly "Religious" knowledge, correct? Just checking :) Because all sorts of "knowledge" other than (what you would call, I imagine) Purely Scientific informs public-policy. Christians worried about stem-cells is hardly the first or last item; the relative funding of breast cancer and even AIDS research would probably be difficult to justify on objective, quantitative grounds for example. On some such not-purely-scientifically-informed issues, The World would probably even share my concerns - why is nuclear power so held back? genetically modified food? (On other matters I may be more alone: why the fk do carpool lanes exist?)

Can you see any possible bias here in singling out the known-Religious guy and saying he, in particular (because he's Religious) shouldn't be allowed to make decisions informed by his morality, which, in fact, is something that everyone does, and in a sense he's just one of the few who admits it? I know this is not what you think, but assuming Bush was sincere, should he have made a decision he believed to be wrong? Or should acknowledged-Religious people just not hold public office? Best,

by a reader on Tue, 06/08/2004 - 19:32 | reply

oops that was

--Blix again

by a reader on Tue, 06/08/2004 - 19:32 | reply

Re: Comment Editing

The "edit your comment" feature is great, but it seems to revert back to the original comment if you go back to edit a comment again.

The blog software doesn't actually keep any earlier version of an edited comment, and the timestamps in the headers look fine, so I think you might merely need to configure your browser to be slightly less enthusiastic in its caching.

Sorry to complain about it here, but another feature that it's missing is the ability to delete extraneous comments entirely

The software doesn't do that yet, so for now, we have implemented a feature that permits users not to write extraneous comments in the first place.

by Kevin on Tue, 06/08/2004 - 19:56 | reply

not extraneous

lol@kevin

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 06/08/2004 - 20:11 | reply

to Elliott

Thanks..

Do you think Bush analysed the issue as you did, and then came to your conclusions rationally, or do you think an irrationality stopped him from giving the idea of funding stem cell research fair consideration (fair judged by comparing it to how much consideration other similar research options get that he has no irrationality about)?

First of all I haven't analyzed the stem-cell issue, rationally or irrationally, all I know is what I read in the papers, and heard some other researcher allude to his use of stem-cells (or more precisely, his use of some drug/chemical/Thing which apparently was created using stem-cells) in a science talk or two. Bush has almost certainly given it more thought than I have, I'd bet on it.

Nor do I have any "conclusions". Although I'm (a bit flakily) pro-life, I'm not dogmatically opposed to embryonic stem-cell research on anything like pro-life grounds, but that doesn't mean I don't see any potential moral problems at all, and I'm mostly just kind of agnostic on the urgent need to do the kind of stem-cell research that Bush has declined to fund. (Remember: Bush has not declined to fund "Stem Cell Research" en masse!!) I don't actually understand why Bush's (I won't exactly call it "Solomon-like", but still seemingly reasonable to me..) compromise of "as for embryonic stem-cells, ok, but just use the dozen existing lines" [or however many it was] solution was not sufficient to researchers' needs; I'm open to being convinced, of course. Just need more info perhaps; it'd probably take one Google search, but like I said, I haven't researched the issue.

or do you think an irrationality stopped him from giving the idea of funding stem cell research fair consideration

I think it's certainly probably that the religious framework through which, we are so often told, Bush views the world, amounted to a bias or template that effectively prevented him from being convinced of the need/benefit of funding this research, by an amount/type of evidence that would have convinced other not-so-Religious (or other-Religious) people, or which would have convinced him on other matters not so connected to the morality of things his religion tends to focus on. Is that "irrationality"? If so, ok, but I'd just like to also be able to say that anyone who thinks painting a white diamond on the left lane of a freeway, and forbidding solo drivers from driving in that lane, absent any tangible evidence whatsoever that doing this has any salutary effects at all of any kind for society, is also clouded by irrationality. ;-) More generally I'd like to also say that precisely no one is free from a bias/template. Some people hide it. Not to say that all biases/templates are created equal but still.

So at the same time, what I have a problem with is assuming that Bush came to his decision "irrationally", or at least more than the next guy, because the only real basis for saying so seems to be either disagreement with the decision, or our knowledge that he's Religious and didn't somehow excise this portion of himself when making the decision. As far as I know (indeed I remember reading and anyway, came away convinced that) Bush gave it great thought and consulted with many people, not all of whom agreed with him or wore white collars. Now maybe that great thought Bush put into it was worthless, because of Bush being so stupid and all; or maybe the bioethicists etc he talked to couldn't convince him because they used big words or didn't point at a Bible.. but I don't actually know any of that.

And again, the decision - the actual decision he made, not the "he banned Stem-Cell Research!!" caricature being bandied around in some quarters - seemed ok to me; I saw no reason to think it unduly messed-up. I don't know all the answers and so I don't know that moral concerns about embryonic stem cells are wrongheaded. But it should be emphasized that pro-lifers weren't overjoyed at the decision, far from it. If you ask them, from their point of view what Bush actually did was that he allowed stem-cell research, and a debate about it on a more pro-life website would probably look like bizarro-world to people here.

I think part of where I'm coming from here is that I actually respected how he managed to make a decision that ticked off both sides :-) It either took lots of guts, or political stupidity... but it's almost impossible for me to interpret it, as Gil seems to, as some kind of political ploy to get votes... whose votes??

fair judged by comparing it to how much consideration other similar research options get that he has no irrationality about

The thing is, why would we take that as a control group? There are lots of research areas which Bush not only has no irrationality about, but hasn't considered at all, their funding running on autopilot or at least not touched by his admin. one way or the other, and which I would probably like to call "unfair". "Not having been considered by Bush in his religious mind-set" is not the test of "fairness" to me. Or to put it another way, practically everything which gets funded/decided in public policy, probably has been done so with some amount of "unfairness". Part of what I'm saying is,

Why single out Bush and his decision, and not all those others?

cuz he's Religious, right?

Also, do you think when The World said "would" this was meant to communicate an infallible guarantee, or simply that research will cure the disease, and this particular research is part of the correct path to finding the cure?

The thing is, even if it's the latter, I'd still disagree. Who knows that research will cure the disease? We may never find a cure. Who know that this particular research is part of the correct path? We may find a cure but by some other means entirely. (By the same token stem-cell research may cure something else or lead to other, unimagined benefits...)

That having been said, you asked me what The World "meant". And that's the problem, because honestly it looks like The World "meant" to paint embryonic-stem-cell-research-finding-a-cure-for-Alzheimer's-or-something-like-it as if not a sure thing, as close to a sure thing as they could get away with saying. I agree of course that if pressed The World would retreat to a more carefully hedged formulation, but IMHO what The World "meant" to do in the original post was to state their case as strongly as they thought they could get away with doing... and I didn't want to let them :)

Like I told Gil, it benefits no one to oversell stem-cell or any other kind of research as some kind of panacea. There is a definite "crying wolf" danger here; it is just not good to overstate and sensationalize your case in science, even if it leads to short-term gains. Look at the global-warming people as an analogy. Although politically I am squarely on the "anti-Global-Warming-people" side, at the same time I don't dispute that a (lowercase g, w)global warming has occurred in the recent 100-150 years or so, and of course I acknowledge the greenhouse effect is real, and thus that the future climate may be worth worrying about, etc., but the danger here is that they've spent so much effort turning it all into a cartoonish armageddon story + political/ideological dogmatism that even if they're right, eventually only the True Believers will have believed them.

Suppose that George W. Bush is as we speak perusing the blogs and comes across STWTR, sees this post, and gets convinced that stem-cell research should be funded unfettered because it "would" cure Alzheimer's. And then it doesn't. All that happens is that the next funding priority which is potentially impeded by someone's wrongheaded moral concerns, becomes a much harder sell....

P.S. I'll catch up on the private correspondence when I get a chance, i promise :)

by a reader on Tue, 06/08/2004 - 20:33 | reply

I Agree

Blix,

I agree with you. HOV lane restrictions are worse-than-useless and should be abolished.

As for the other stuff...

I don't think Bush is insincere such that he doesn't personally agree with limiting this research but is doing it only to win votes. I think he does believe in it. I just think he's wrong. If he didn't believe in evolution and was sincere in trying to abolish teaching it in federally-funded schools, I think he'd be sincere and wrong to do that as well.

You're right that all funding decisions are affected by politics, but most at least claim to be based on the objectively determined expected benefits of the research.

And, I don't think Bush is a monster. I think he's a fundamentally decent man who wants to do the right thing. I just think he has a major area of irrationality which leads him to do the wrong things sometimes.

My point was simply that people who are quick to praise him specifically for his religion-guided moral sense should be a little more restrained in their praise, because that knife cuts both ways.

Gil

by Gil on Tue, 06/08/2004 - 21:49 | reply

Gil, I don't think Bush i

Gil,

I don't think Bush is insincere such that he doesn't personally agree with limiting this research but is doing it only to win votes.

I'm glad you don't find him insincere but your political diagnosis still seems on the fritz: How will the decision "win" him any votes at all, in the first place? from whom? The pro-life people (who were already going to vote for him), the people who don't care much about this issue and wouldn't let his stance affect their vote (like me), or the folks who hate him with a vengeance and this is just fuel for the fire to them?

Objectively the actual decision he made was a political loser all around. He ticked off (a little bit) the true blue pro-life people with this decision you seem to think was made for them, are you denying this or simply unaware of it? I think many people, for whatever reason, are really underestimating just how much of a political loser this was, not only to make the decision he made, but to give a prime-time speech explaining it.

I think he does believe in it. I just think he's wrong.

As was clear. And perhaps you are right. But I hope you now understand that "he's wrong (in my opinion)" and "it was just religious symbolism" are not the same thing...

You're right that all funding decisions are affected by politics, but most at least claim to be based on the objectively determined expected benefits of the research.

And all too often that claim is disingenuous... frankly I find honesty more refreshing than pretense myself... YMMV

And BTW it's not that Bush didn't take into account the "expected benefits" AT ALL... remember, he allowed the funding of "some" stem-cell research if headlines such as Bush Allows Some Stem Cell Funding are any indication. Quote: "...if they're going to be destroyed anyway, shouldn't they be used for a greater good, for research that has the potential to save and improve other lives?" You boil that down to giving no consideration to expected benefits of research? Sounds more like he weighed benefits against the moral considerations he had and sought some compromise. (Which, again, did not make pro-life people especially happy!) Ok to disagree with his conclusion if you want, but at least characterize it accurately.

And, I don't think Bush is a monster.

Heh. That's good!

I just think he has a major area of irrationality which leads him to do the wrong things sometimes.

As do we all, my friend. As do we all.

My point was simply that people who are quick to praise him specifically for his religion-guided moral sense should be a little more restrained in their praise, because that knife cuts both ways.

That's a perfectly valid point that, I now see, you'd made earlier in the thread, and I basically agree. You will note that I've not praised Bush "specifically for his religion-guided moral sense" per se, here. (Well, or anywhere. :-) Doesn't make too much sense to me to praise someone "for being religious" qua religious. (I suppose I could sign on to a weaker formulation such as, 'On balance I'd rather have a leader who seems to have some good moral center rather than being adrift, even if at times I disagree with him...' + 'American-flavor Christianity for example provides a good moral center') But really, in practice this just means I'll praise him for his moral sense when I think it's right, and not when I don't. This here happens to be a case where I don't have a firmly held opinion one way or the other, and don't have a big problem with the decision that he made. Obviously YMMV, but of course one would hope a critic'd know what Bush's actual decision was, before deciding to lambaste it. ;-) Best,

by a reader on Wed, 06/09/2004 - 00:00 | reply

stem cell reserach, take 2

Blix,

We call wrong views irrationalities when they are held immune to criticism (actually this goes for true views too). Is Bush personally irrationally resistant to criticism on this point? Beats me; I haven't ever argued with him. But the tradition he identifies with, and many people who seem to be like him, are entrenched on this issue, and Bush hasn't done anything to show he isn't, so it seems a pretty safe bet he's at least somewhat irrational on the matter. (If he has done something to show he isn't, let me know. I haven't really been paying attention to that.)

Anyhow, most research he doesn't consider a moral issue, so it gets due consideration (usually by aids, or whatever you call the people who do that). But this particular research got special evaluation. And it was evaluated in terms of Bush's wrong, irrational view. This greatly increases the chance for a policy error compared with letting the normal processes handle the matter (but only because he is wrong, simply intervening isn't an error).

Given Bush's views on the matter as premises, he did do the right thing (ie, assuming he doesn't improve his views, what's the next best thing? This is it.)

Moving on, when you persistently defend Bush, with great energy, even when he does have a flaw -- well assuming when Kerry has a flaw that's overplayed, you don't come to his defense with the same energy ... then this shows a partisan bias in who you argue for. Is that bad? Well, some is OK. And I don't see a reason it would be necessarily bad. I wouldn't want to spend my time arguing for Kerry unless he was treated quite unfairly. But if your partisan approach to who you defend is too strong, people are more inclined to stop listening to you and write you off as biased. And the more you do it, the harder you may find it to keep perspective on matters yourself.

I'll be happy to call the people who made carpool lanes irrational. I do frequently call the whole damn environmental movement nuts. They are an amazingly easy target.

I understand your view that many people are far too aggressive in attacking Bush's religiousness; I think this most reveals a flaw in the attackers. And I do think Gil is one of those people. I hope to blog more pro-US-Christian, anti-atheism stuff soon.

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 06/09/2004 - 00:54 | reply

We call wrong views irrational

We call wrong views irrationalities when they are held immune to criticism

But who's to decide whether someone's "immune" to criticism or they just find that criticism wanting for other, perhaps quite good, reasons of their own... to diagnose "immune", at some point you still have to bring "I disagree with him and he won't change his mind and well, I think he should" into play
But the tradition he identifies with, and many people who seem to be like him, are entrenched on this issue, and Bush hasn't done anything to show he isn't, so it seems a pretty safe bet he's at least somewhat irrational on the matter.

I would only wish to say it weaker: It's not unreasonable to suspect he's irrational on the matter. I don't know how safe a bet it is, actually. (Well, "somewhat" irrational is a pretty safe bet - most people are at least somewhat irrational about most things - but "irrational" is less safe...)

If he has done something to show he isn't, let me know.

Well, start by asking yourself, Why did Bush allow any stem-cell research at all, in the first place? Remember, ask a pro-lifer to summarize Bush's decision and they might well say "he allowed stem-cell research, the sellout". Doesn't this compromise suggest he's at least listening to - heck, agrees with - at least partially the arguments of non-pro-life-addled people? did you look at the link I showed Gil, where he talks about the lives that can be improved etc? You're still talking as if this decision boiled down to Banning Stem-Cell Research Because I'm Pro-Life. That's, um, totally wrong.

Anyhow, most research he doesn't consider a moral issue, so it gets due consideration (usually by aids ...

You speak of this "due consideration" as if it's necessarily a totally bias-free process because Dubya isn't participating in it. Heh... I disagree, let's leave it at that. Can't the aides have their biases too? Or is it only a Religious person like Bush who infects the sterile, impartial process of public funding?

But this particular research got special evaluation. And it was evaluated in terms of Bush's wrong, irrational view.

I'm surprised you're saying this actually. You're really trying to say that because a decision Bush made was evaluated "in terms of" Bush's wrong, irrational view, that decision is flawed? Couldn't Bush be right, accidentally?

This greatly increases the chance for a policy error compared with letting the normal processes handle the matter (but only because he is wrong, simply intervening isn't an error).

I'm not sure. I'd concede this much, If you think that the view Bush evaluates things "in terms of" is Wrong, then when Bush intervenes and evaluates something, it's certainly fair to strongly suspect his evaluation contains errors. However, who's to say that the process of Bush-intervening has increased the errors? Maybe when Bush intervenes he just replaces other, different kinds of errors (of the aides, etc., who normally evaluate things) with his own. What's the net, positive or negative? I don't know. But I'm certainly not willing to concede that the normal processes of government-funding-decisions constitute a control group.. LOL when you persistently defend Bush, with great energy, even when he does have a flaw

You must have misunderstood because I'm not at all sure I think that his stance on stem-cells constitutes a flaw. Obviously Bush like all people has flaws but in my view, the greater ones lie elsewhere. As things stand, although I could still be convinced otherwise, I kinda liked his stem-cell compromise that ticked everyone off ;-) well assuming when Kerry has a flaw that's overplayed, you don't come to his defense with the same energy

There's no John Kerry-related issue on the table to talk about. If/when I see Kerry being unduly criticized IMO, I say something. (the "medals" thing comes to mind..) Kerry hasn't been President (yet) so I have no real policies to criticize or defend. And in this context there would be no way for me to bring John Kerry into this conversation (I can guess, but I don't actually know what his stem-cell stance is frankly) so I'm a bit puzzled why you take my lack of John Kerry-mention as indicative of something... I also haven't talked about Vladimir Putin or Britney Spears very much here, what does that mean??

this shows a partisan bias in who you argue for. Is that bad? Well, some is OK. And I don't see a reason it would be necessarily bad.

I'll go ahead and concede I probably have a partisan bias (I'd rather see Bush win than Kerry, I'll be voting for Bush, etc., so surely this influences how I talk about them). Still don't understand why you perceived it in this thread but that's ok, you're not wrong or anything :-)

But if your partisan approach to who you defend is too strong, people are more inclined to stop listening to you and write you off as biased.

That's true of course and to some extent that this would happen to me is inevitable. I honestly don't know how someone could start reading my posts here and come away thinking "but why isn't he defending John Kerry with the same energy????" however. I'd like to be able to but please explain to me how the heck I am supposed to defend John Kerry in the context of this conversation.. I could interject "by the way, John Kerry's a nice-looking man" or something, but that's about it...

I understand your view that many people are far too aggressive in attacking Bush's religiousness; I think this most reveals a flaw in the attackers. And I do think Gil is one of those people.

You have understood me more or less correctly on that note. As for Gil, I do understand him to have been making a fair point earlier, about people who "praise Bush's religiousness" en masse, and I agreed with him that that is a bit silly. (I don't know who was actually doing that in the first place, but whatever.. :) My basic point would be to say that much of the criticism against Bush is built, to an uncomfortable extent, on the pillar "..and we know him to be Religious". If Bush weren't known to be Religious some of the criticism would have to vanish. As you say, this leads to errors. A big one on evidence here is, "since Bush is Religious, if Bush decided X, and his Religion informed that decision, then X must be wrong". Boil it down and you get: I want X to be funded because Bush doesn't. And even worse, at least some of the people saying that here don't actually seem to know (1) what Bush's decision actually was, (2) what it is that he declined to fund, (3) why that thing he declined to fund is so important.

Can it really be true that research-involving-fetal-stem-cells-from-other-than-existing-lines is desperately worth funding because Bush decided - "in terms of" his Religion - that it shouldn't be funded??? I could be convinced this stuff needs funding but I'm gonna need a better reason than that.
best,

by a reader on Wed, 06/09/2004 - 16:02 | reply

News Events

Blixa,

One thing I forgot to mention...

My comment about changes being triggered by "news events" was about re-addressing the decision now that Reagan has died, not about the original decision, as you seem to have inferred.

Gil

by Gil on Wed, 06/09/2004 - 16:03 | reply

I concede

Blixa,

I concede your points about Bush and about partisan bias.

I don't agree with the epistemology of saying Bush might be right accidentally. It's possible, but everything else balanced, if he was wrong, and acted on this wrong view, it makes sense to expect mistakes.

Also you say irrationalities come down to "I think X person is irrational". Well, you could add "the speaker thinks" to all claims. Therefore, the fact that you can doesn't seem to me an argument against any claim.

I believe the people Gil considers to praise Bush's religiousness objectionably include The World and myself. Dunno who else though.

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 06/09/2004 - 17:39 | reply

*if he was wrong, and acted

if* he was wrong, and acted on this wrong view, it makes sense to expect mistakes.*

Fair enough, as I've acknowledged. However, for the most part people in public office are wrong and act on wrong views, like, a lot. Why are some people so mad about this particular kind of mistake (if that's what it is)? Cuz he's/it's Religious. no? They can tolerate all other kinds of mistakes not known to come from a Religion (that's just "normal") but the obviously or admittedly Religious kind, must be immediately weeded out with high priority.

I believe this is an error.

Also, if it's not ok to say Bush could be right accidentally, then I'm gonna hafta say that neither are The World or Gil right accidentally. That is, they've been trying to make a point about X needing to be funded, but they don't know all that much about X (at least it's not evident that they know much more than I do.), they distorted Bush's actual decision, they (well The World did) deliberately overstate the benefits (painting potentialities as sure things), and their reasons for thinking it should be funded (for objecting to Bush's decision not to fund it) contain a heavy dose of anti-Religion stuff (it's almost as if they want it to be funded because Bush doesn't wanna due to his Religion isn't it?). So why can't I say, When approaching the issue "should stem-cell research be federally funded with no restrictions?", The World/Gil used a wrong view. So even if it's true that "stem-cell research should be federally funded with no restrictions", an epistemology granting The World/Gil credit for being "right" about that is flawed, and thus the claim is open to question.

Also you say irrationalities come down to "I think X person is irrational". Well, you could add "the speaker thinks" to all claims. Therefore, the fact that you can doesn't seem to me an argument against any claim.

Remember though that the claim was "Bush is irrational". I wasn't trying to argue against that claim in the first place let alone use this as a reason to argue against it. Bush may be irrational, in fact I'm sure he is on many many things if not most things.

But on stem-cell in particular? You'd explained "irrational" to me in terms of, being "immune" to counterarguments (basically). As we both agree apparently, that requires a judgment call. By identifying that judgment call I do not mean to say that this constitutes a proof that Bush is not irrational on this. All I mean to say is that it remains a judgment call, and I'm still left with no (for lack of better term) "objective" means of declaring (or anyway being forced to concede) Bush is "immune" to counterargument.

And while apparently you believe Bush is immune to counterargument (and thus irrational) on this subject, on reflection, I do not. (He is certainly resistant, presumably, to counterevidence but I don't believe he is "immune" especially given that his decision was not in line totally with the pro-life dogma.)

So he's not irrational here, I say. Your move...? "is too"?

by a reader on Wed, 06/09/2004 - 18:35 | reply

Gil, That clears it up, ye

Gil,

That clears it up, yes. Thanks. Best,

by a reader on Wed, 06/09/2004 - 18:49 | reply

Bush's Irrationality

Blixa,

The reason that I think Bush is irrational on this subject is that I think his position is strongly influenced by the idea that killing a human embryo is very similar, ethically, to killing a born human.

It's not merely that I think he's wrong about this. I think that idea is one that is the accepted doctrine of his religion and is not subject to criticism in his mind. I don't think that there are any new facts or arguments that could convince him that he's wrong about this. So, if this idea is false, he has no way of being right about a policy that depends upon his knowing that it is false.

Gil

by Gil on Wed, 06/09/2004 - 19:49 | reply

*light bulb goes on in Blixa'

light bulb goes on in Blixa's head

I now see your point, Gil. The claim being that Bush is irrational about embryos being morally very similar to born human life, not that he's irrational about whether stem-cell research involving new embryos ought to be funded. Got it. Thanks for the clarification and the light-bulb, and sorry for being dense there (to you too, Elliot).

Yes, I agree completely that Bush is irrational on that - about his notion of the moral status of embryos.

However, I don't agree that that makes his stem-cell decision wrong ("he has no way of being right"). Being right on whether new-embryo stem-cell research ought to be funded does not depend on knowing that "the moral status of embryos is very similar to that of born humans" is false. One can know it's false but at the same time think that the moral status of embryos is not completely vacuous or irrelevant*, or that other derivative ethical or unintended-consequence issues may arise, and thus still end up agreeing with Bush's decision, because it was a compromise and did allow the funding of some research, but on a limited, controlled basis. (And there's still that whole issue of, Research can actually happen without the US taxpayers funding it, so one could even agree with Bush's decision on a grumpy libertarian "the gov't doesn't have to fund a damn thing so who cares, if he's withholding funds, I'm fer it" rationale which makes no reference to morality or Frankenstein horror stories whatsoever...)

In short there are people (I am one) who agree with Bush's decision without totally sharing his views on the moral status of an embryo. How can that be? Well, one resolution is to say that although we didn't start from wrong premises as Bush did, we simply must be wrong in our conclusion, because in agreeing with the conclusion of a Religious person who (therefore) "has no way of being right", we're just automatically wrong anyway, whatever that conclusion was.

In other words, if a Religious person comes to conclusion X and Religion played a known role in that conclusion, X is wrong.

That is precisely the reasoning I've been objecting to.

by a reader on Wed, 06/09/2004 - 20:33 | reply

Meeting of Minds

Great.

I think we're on the same page now.

I have NOT been making the argument that you've been objecting to.

I'm actually one of those grumpy libertarians who is against this funding anyway.

But, what I'm leery of is a president who may make numerous policy mistakes (e.g. gay marriage amendment, Supreme Court nominations with an eye toward overturning legal abortions, FCC censorship, etc.) because the policy involves areas of irrationality that he has due to his religion.

It's true that everybody has areas of irrationality, and I'm leery of those other areas too! Religious irrationality is just one that's easy to identify, and one that I consider to be under-estimated by some.

Gil

by Gil on Wed, 06/09/2004 - 22:39 | reply

If Religious-guy's irrational

If Religious-guy's irrationalities lead him to make X policy good-thingies (what's opposite of "mistake"? ;) and Y policy mistakes, and X is greater (and Y smaller) than for typical non-Religious guy (with his associated irrationalities, whatever they are), couldn't we come out ahead w/the Religious guy? Perhaps (I dunno) that's what people (which people BTW?) mean by the "praising religion" stuff you've perceived and are arguing against. I'm not saying that this applies to Bush, but hey. The point is that "it's good his religion guides him morally" (who said this BTW?) isn't refuted by observing one or seven errors that result. If Bush's religion based worldview still guides him correctly more than average, or more than the next guy, or on certain important things, or whatever (relative!) metric you want to use, the claim can still have merit.

I'm glad you're not making the argument I object to, but then you're still left needing to explain why Bush's was a "policy mistake" in the first place. And hint: you can't use "because it was based on his flawed thinking about morality of using embryos". Remember, you're not making the argument I object to.

I agree that Religion is one of the most visible/easy to spot sources of irrationality but it seems whack to claim that it's underestimated as such. If anything it's easy-to-spot'ness would lead to it being overestimated as a source of irrationality, it seems to me. Which was kinda my point actually.

Best,

by a reader on Wed, 06/09/2004 - 23:47 | reply

To anyone still here.

Interesting article

"PEOPLE NEED A FAIRY TALE," Ronald D.G. McKay, a stem cell researcher at the National Institute of Neurological Disorders and Stroke, told Washington Post reporter Rick Weiss, explaining why scientists have allowed society to believe wrongly that stem cells are likely to effectively treat Alzheimer's disease. "Maybe that's unfair, but they need a story line that's relatively simple to understand."

[...]

Researchers have apparently known for some time that embryonic stem cells will not be an effective treatment for Alzheimer's, because as two researchers told a Senate subcommittee in May, it is a "whole brain disease," rather than a cellular disorder (such as Parkinson's).

Nancy Reagan has cruelly been told a fairy tale, and is being used. The death of her husband is being used, including here on STWTR, and it is cruel.

by a reader on Thu, 06/10/2004 - 19:58 | reply

Stem Cell Research

President Bush is irrationally hostile, not to stem cell research but to experimentation on human embryos, just as his coreligionists in the 19th century were irrationally hostile to experimentation on human corpses. Although there are no doubt alternatives to both types of experiment, it is wrong to be hostile to them and harmful to use the force of law to discriminate against them compared with any other scientific research. Science makes better progress, including progress on curing Alzheimer's, if it uses scientific criteria and genuine morality, not ancient taboos, to choose what lines of research to pursue.

by David Deutsch on Fri, 06/11/2004 - 13:24 | reply

It's the hyperbole

President Bush is irrationally hostile, not to stem cell research but to experimentation on human embryos, just as...

Another "just as" you could've written is, "just as many people nowadays are irrationally hostile to experimenting on live human beings". But you didn't. I don't think it makes sense to paint all irrational opposition to all things as equally harmful or draw analogies which obscure important differences.

it is wrong to be hostile to them and harmful to use the force of law to discriminate against them compared with any other scientific research.

He is not using the "force of law" to discriminate against embryonic stem-cell research. There is no law in the US against conducting embryonic stem-cell research of which I am aware.

He is declining to fund stem-cell research with public monies. Not the same thing. Alternatively, yes you could say (if a bit awkwardly) he is "using the force of law to discriminate against" the FUNDING of such research, but again, discrimination is inevitable (in fact necessary) when deciding what to fund with public monies, and the "force of law" part of that equation is redundant, he wouldn't have this money to dish out if not for the "force of law" in the first place. To dish out public monies to a research scientist is, inherently, to use the "force of law" so if you accept publicly-funded research you can't take the "force of law" part out of it.

Another thing left out of this discussion was that the decision not to fund embryo research was originally made by Congress, it springs out of a law passed back in the '80s IIRC. (Aren't any of you the least bit curious why a U.S. President can unilaterally make such a decision? Because he is issuing a judgment about how he will enforce an act of Congress.) To wish/wait for a US President who will just, golly, interpret that law to bring about the result you want, may be a Pyrrhic victory if you get it. (Could lead to a counter-reaction - as perhaps Bush has done in his Presidency after Clinton had been "interpreting" the law more loosely...). A much, much better way would be to seek to change the public's minds so that they, through their Congress, would authorize this funding less restrictedly, as you think (or assume anyway) makes more scientific and moral sense. This would legitimize the decision in the public's mind - we do have a democracy, after all. So the people you ought to be making your pitch to are the voters, not Bush.

However, in making your case, if you engage in hyperbole and tell fairy tales to grieving widows to use as spokesmen-props, this (rightfully!) lessens the force of your argument and you just might find yourself back where you started - or worse - if/when people find out about the dishonesty.

Science makes better progress, including progress on curing Alzheimer's, if it uses scientific criteria and genuine morality, not ancient taboos, to choose what lines of research to pursue.

Do you have any good reason to use the word "Alzheimer's" in this discussion?

Does science make good "progress" if its advocates lie and exaggerate and trick the public in order to get their hands on the public's money?

I would be much more interested in a discussion of why Bush's embryo stance (which, again, I don't really agree with) is not "genuine morality" and, what is. Presumably such a discussion would not employ hyperbole about Alzheimer's in an effort to score points off of Ronald Reagan's death.

by a reader on Fri, 06/11/2004 - 16:25 | reply

Presumably

Presumably presidential hyperbole, if it is in fact a presidential stand on stem cell research, would not make a specific issue about stem cell research unless there is some specific scientific objection to stem cell research, or rather, question public funding of scientific research in general. But that's politics for 'ya.

As to religion:

How many angels can dance on the head of a stem cell?

41?

by a reader on Fri, 06/11/2004 - 18:15 | reply

Hyperbole

It must be because it is human embryo stem cells that the president is involved. Not human hair follicles or human dna. Hence the hyperbole:

Save The Human Stem Cells! Or was that, Discard The Human Stem Cells!?

Next those nasty scientists will be digging up graves in the night, or even experimenting on microscopic embryos trying to figure out stuff.

Correction, human stem cells, not human embryos, please disregard the hyperbole.

by a reader on Fri, 06/11/2004 - 18:37 | reply

A good thing

This is a good thing: UK to clone human cells.

Opposition to it is bad. Opposition to it by politicians, such as Anne Widdecombe and George Bush, is especially bad. All opposition to it is irrational.

The UK team seeking the go-ahead for the controversial experiment is led by Dr Miodrag Stojkovic, of Newcastle University. He plans to create dozens of cloned embryos using the same nuclear transfer technique that was employed by the scientists who created Dolly the sheep.

The cloned embryos will initially be exploited as sources of stem cells for treating diabetes patients.

'This is a great opportunity,' Stojkovic told The Observer last night. 'We are focusing on diabetes, but believe our work could lead to cures for other diseases like Parkinson's and Alzheimer's. Our intention is not to create cloned humans, but to save lives.'

I don't think he's lying or exaggerating.

by David Deutsch on Sun, 06/13/2004 - 02:28 | reply

Force of Law

'President Bush is irrationally hostile, not to stem cell research but to experimentation on human embryos, just as his coreligionists in the 19th century were irrationally hostile to experimentation on human corpses.'

'Another "just as" you could've written is, "just as many people nowadays are irrationally hostile to experimenting on live human beings". But you didn't. I don't think it makes sense to paint all irrational opposition to all things as equally harmful or draw analogies which obscure important differences.'

It is irrational to be hostile to experimentation on live human beings who give their consent. However, the reason why that particular just as was appropriate is that both corpses and embryonic stem cells are not thinking human beings, they are lumps of organic material that happen to be useful. Experimentation on live human beings brings up different issues.

'it is wrong to be hostile to them and harmful to use the force of law to discriminate against them compared with any other scientific research.'

'He is not using the "force of law" to discriminate against embryonic stem-cell research. There is no law in the US against conducting embryonic stem-cell research of which I am aware.'

He is, by legally banning the use of public money for stem cell research. If the government is going to extort money from people in the form of taxes, by making people pay it using the law (hence force of law) the only way this can be even slightly legitimate is if they don't block lines of research because of an irrational 'feeling in their water' or whatever Bush's current excuse of the week happens to be.

by Alan Forrester on Sun, 06/13/2004 - 15:09 | reply

A Flaw Is A Flaw

Alan,

I haven't checked (but it seems you haven't either). But if I had to guess at Bush's "excuse of the week" (which hasn't I bet hasn't changed for decades), it is: he thinks the embryos are partially human. Much like many people think animals are partially human. Would you say PETA's rationale is a "feeling in the water"? I wouldn't.

PS Wanna source that legal ban you mention? I tried Google and didn't spot any obvious headlines of that nature.

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Sun, 06/13/2004 - 20:14 | reply

source plz, dd

David,

got a source on bush's opposition to that cloning thing?

also, even taking some proposition as true as a premise, it's possible to oppose it rationally, by simply being mistaken.

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Sun, 06/13/2004 - 23:17 | reply

Re: source plz, dd

Remarks by the President on Stem Cell Research.

Read it and weep.

by David Deutsch on Mon, 06/14/2004 - 00:08 | reply

Alan Forrester, If the go

Alan Forrester,

If the government is going to extort money from people in the form of taxes, by making people pay it using the law (hence force of law) the only way this can be even slightly legitimate is if they don't block lines of research because of an irrational 'feeling in their water' or whatever Bush's current excuse of the week happens to be.

Policy makers are going to block lines of research for irrational reasons no matter what. Every single funding decision they make contains a healthy dose of irrationality as (at least) a part of its justification, and blocks the funding of some other line of research. (Even in cases where you think funding X is perfectly rational and can make a good rational argument for funding X with precisely the priority that they do, chances are the key vote for making that funding decision was swung by promising to build a highway in some Congressman's state or whatever.)

I suppose all this icky irrationality being part of the process could be part of an argument for why using public monies to fund scientific research at all is unjustifiable. (That is not my view BTW.) To single out for criticism the irrationality influencing one funding decision and not all the others, however, is odd to me.

Is the obsession with this decision anything other than "Because Bush Used Religion"? If not - if there were some objective reason to focus on this irrational funding decision to the exclusion of all others - one would think you, or someone anyway, would have ready answers to questions such as:

- why are embryonic stem cells in particular so necessary?
- what is wrong with the existing lines of embryonic stem cells, i.e. what research needs cannot be met by them?

Since this research is so urgently pressing and all to people here, said people presumably have these answers at the ready in their minds. Yet no one has shared those answers. I cannot easily explain why. Best,

by a reader on Mon, 06/14/2004 - 18:47 | reply

some answers to the questions in the above comment are here Dean Fischbach's Testimony Before Congress

by a reader on Mon, 06/14/2004 - 19:15 | reply

Why We Care

We are not upset because the irrationality is religious.

We're upset because Bush is our leader, and we do not have a better leader, and we wish Bush was better.

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 06/14/2004 - 19:26 | reply

Of Mice And Men

Apparently some Australians think it's fun to chew live mice, while a certain Mr Palaszczuk of the Royal Society for the Protection of Cruelty to Animals thinks it's fun to measure the civilisation of society according to a mouse-chewing-related criterion:

...both men put mice in their mouths and bit off their tails. One of the men went on to further chew his mouse then spat it out. They were taking part in a "Jackass promotion" – named after a US TV stunt show – which took place on Wednesdays at the Exchange Hotel in Brisbane and involved undertaking dares, one of the hotel's managers told BBC News Online. It was not clear who organised the promotions, but Marie Middleton said they had now been stopped. "The whole incident was horrific," said Ms Middleton. "It was all supposed to be harmless fun," she said. [...] "Chewing a mouse and spitting it out is not entertainment, it is barbaric," said Mr Palaszczuk. "All animals deserve respect. How we treat animals is a measure of how civilized our society is," he said.

The owners of the hotel have been severely ~~chewed out~~ criticised and the miscreants are being prosecuted. Trashing Australian culture may not violate the tenets of political correctness, but what about this: 'The United States is, in significant respects, a more civilised country than Mexico'? Because the United States does not tolerate bullfighting while in Mexico it is a national sport.

We propose a different measure of civilisation: the more civilised a society is, the more it prides itself on how well it treats people, not on how harshly.

Fri, 06/11/2004 - 12:23 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

The Pro-Death Lobby

In his address to the nation on stem-cell research, President Bush acknowledged that research in such fields as human cloning and embryonic stem cells has the potential to save lives, but, as he explained:

I strongly oppose human cloning, as do most Americans. We recoil at the idea of growing human beings for spare body parts, or creating life for our convenience. And while we must devote enormous energy to conquering disease, it is equally important that we pay attention to the moral concerns raised by the new frontier of human embryo stem cell research. Even the most noble ends do not justify any means.

My position on these issues is shaped by deeply held beliefs. I'm a strong supporter of science and technology, and believe they have the potential for incredible good -- to improve lives, to save life, to conquer disease. Research offers hope that millions of our loved ones may be cured of a disease and rid of their suffering. I have friends whose children suffer from juvenile diabetes. Nancy Reagan has written me about President Reagan's struggle with Alzheimer's. My own family has confronted the tragedy of childhood leukemia. And, like all Americans, I have great hope for cures.

I also believe human life is a sacred gift from our Creator. I worry about a culture that devalues life, and believe as your President I have an important obligation to foster and encourage respect for life in America and throughout the world.

This implication that supporters of this sort of research – such as ourselves – are part of a “culture that devalues [human] life”, is unfair as well as false. In reality, our (Western) culture values human life more than any other that has ever existed. The controversy here is not between those who value life and those who do not, but between rival conceptions of what ought to be thought of as a human being. And while there is room for considerable philosophical disagreement about this issue, no rational person can take the view that a collection of cells without a functioning brain is human in any moral sense whatsoever.

There are, unfortunately, cultures that really do devalue human life. Islamofascism is currently the most important of these. But it is a frightening fact that there is also an authentically Western cult of death that currently enjoys enormous support (including, ironically, from the very tradition to which President Bush belongs, and from which he bases his opposition to certain types of scientific research). Check this out (via InstaPundit):

it's a great shame that the field once known as medical ethics has degenerated into a coven of high profile bioethicists set on finding the best way to prevent new medicines from saving lives

Hyperbole, perhaps. But the underlying point is true: there is widespread, principled opposition to scientific research intended to defeat, or even significantly to postpone, ageing and death.

Mon, 06/14/2004 - 15:20 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Again with this..?

This implication that supporters of this sort of research – such as ourselves – are part of a "culture that devalues [human] life", is unfair as well as false.

Don't think he implied that. He said he "worries" about such a culture. Should he not?

The controversy here is not between those who value life and those who do not, but between rival conceptions of what ought to be thought of as a human being.

I thought the controversy here was whether research involving the use of certain types of cells ought to be funded by public monies. You seem more concerned with this "ought to be thought of as a human being" thing; embryonic stem cell research (from other than existing lines) per se is almost an afterthought here. Is the reason that the funding decision bothers you so much, simply because you don't want Bush's underlying idea that the embryo ought to be thought of as a human being to stand?

If so, why not make that argument by itself?

What if embryonic stem-cell research proves to be a big flop? Would you be forced to admit that Bush was "right"? Of course you would not do so. So why not decouple the two issues "embryo=human" and "stem-cell research should be funded" to make it more clear that it's the former that really concerns you? Is it because you think that dangling "Alzheimer's cure" in front of peoples' faces will more easily sway them to your side?

And while there is room for considerable philosophical disagreement about this issue, no rational person can take the view that a collection of cells without a functioning brain is human in any moral sense whatsoever.

Not in any moral sense whatsoever? Can't a rational person (not Bush) think it's (in whatever sense) .0001% human or whatever? Why such binary thinking here? Doesn't make rational sense to me. But perhaps I'm not rational, you'll have to tell me. By the way when does the binary switch occur?

But it is a frightening fact that there is also an authentically Western cult of death that currently enjoys enormous support (including, ironically, from the very tradition to which President Bush belongs, and from which he bases his opposition to certain types of scientific research).

Good thing you phrased that so carefully.

Bush says he "worries" about a culture of death and that's unfair and false. Yet here you (in a slippery, weasel-worded way...) place Bush in (oh yes I see merely "supported" by) a "cult" of death...

Ohhh-kay.

I'm still astonished how many people can become utterly convinced almost to the point of obsession of the urgent necessity of the US government (whether or not that's even their government...) to federally-fund some research they evidently know very little about... apparently all that's required is for a "Religious" person to oppose it.

On a positive note this does call to mind some potential reverse-psychology strategies for Bush, if only he were clever enough to employ them.... ;-)

by a reader on Mon, 06/14/2004 - 19:14 | reply

Public funding

Democracy is publically funded - should it be immoral to demand democracy? Certain areas of science are global and generic - they cannot be funded privately at all. Even big companies (biotechnological companies in this case) invest money only in specific research - a concrete drug or a concrete disease treatment. They do invest something in general research but to a very limited extend. Millions (if not billions) of public dollars had been invested in quantum physics research before a few private companies have attracted a couple of millions into the creation of first quantum computer. But it wouldn't be possible without public money at all. And it holds for almost all general research areas whether it is in biology or in physics or anywhere else. And deciding whether to give public money for a certain area or not is a way of allowing/disallowing a whole are of research. Bush's way of disallowing or discouraging stem cell research will cost lives in any way you look at it. If it provides a direct method of treating cancer, Alzheimer's disease etc. - that is one. If it doesn't - an enourmous amount of scientific data will be passes to researchers anyway.

And it might be not an "urgent necessity of the US government to federally-fund some research we know very little about". But it is important to show scientists that governor who know very little about their science wouldn't interfere on the basis of their irrational political ideology but rather choose another target. For example, falling educational standards all over the country.

But yeh, I hear the libertarian outcry - if you don't like state school then go private. However, the less people are educated en mass the more support Bush's opinion has.

by a reader on Tue, 06/15/2004 - 08:52 | reply

Science funding

Even big companies (biotechnological companies in this case) invest money only in specific research - a concrete drug or a concrete disease treatment

This isn't true. Research and development companies import most of their know-how from other RND companies with similar interests. In order to do this they have to attract scientists. This is because expired patents are hard to exploit, technical papers are difficult to read, conference gossip is valuable and elusive, and so on. The way you attract high-calibre scientists is by giving them considerable freedom to pursue whatever takes their fancy, including pure research. Otherwise they'll either be poor scientists or not interested in working for you.

Terence Kealey of Buckingham University, England, has analysed the history and economics of science funding. He has shown that every dollar of public funding displaces more than a dollar of private funding.

Government funding of science did not get going until the world wars. I hope we can agree that plenty of scientific progress had been made up till that point in history.

It's consistent to understand all this and to condemn President Bush's opposition to research which makes use of human embryos. Embryos aren't human beings. Life is valuable. It's perforce impossible to know which areas of research will yield the most fruit. These facts stand regardless of who pays your salary.

by Tom Robinson on Tue, 06/15/2004 - 10:54 | reply

It's Not Just About Funding

The President of the United States is using his bully pulpit to characterize certain lines of research as immoral because of their use of human embryos. This is not a fiscal point; it's a moral and cultural point.

This president has created a Council on Bioethics led by and stacked with people with well-known positions against many forms of artificially influencing biological processes, for reasons that appear to many of us to be mystical nonsense.

Ideas have consequences, and these are bad ideas that have the president's support.

I applaud The World for pointing this out.

Gil

by Gil on Tue, 06/15/2004 - 15:50 | reply

careful w/ the quotes

gil,

did Bush actually say doing it is immoral somewhere? I missed that bit.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 06/15/2004 - 16:06 | reply

Quotes

Elliot,

I don't know if he uses that exact phrase anywhere (and I didn't indicate that it was a quote), but the implication seems pretty clear and I thought it was fair to call it "characterizing...as immoral".

Here are some direct quotes:

Research on embryonic stem cells raises profound ethical questions, because extracting the stem cell destroys the embryo, and thus destroys its potential for life. Like a snowflake, each of these embryos is unique, with the unique genetic potential of an individual human being.

As I thought through this issue, I kept returning to two fundamental questions: First, are these frozen embryos human life, and therefore, something precious to be protected?

...

And while we must devote enormous energy to conquering disease, it is equally important that we pay attention to the moral concerns raised by the new frontier of human embryo stem cell research. Even the most noble ends do not justify any means.

Since he decided against continuing to use these means, it seems clear that he considers them to not be morally justified: immoral.

Gil

by Gil on Tue, 06/15/2004 - 16:35 | reply

what's the real issue then?

Two responses here get to the heart of what bothers me about this criticism.

1. "And it might be not an "urgent necessity of the US government to federally-fund some research we know very little about". But it is important to show scientists that governor who know very little about their science wouldn't interfere on the basis of their irrational political ideology"

2. "It's Not Just About Funding: The President of the United States is using his bully pulpit to characterize certain lines of research as immoral because of their use of human embryos. This is not a fiscal point; it's a moral and cultural point."

For both people who wrote these statements, the actual bee in their bonnet is that President Bush evidently believes embryos have at least some moral status, and they think that belief is wrong, and they don't want that opinion to stand or carry any force. "Stem cell research" as such is neither here nor there for both people who wrote these statements. They could be defending "kwyjibo flibbertigibbit research" for all they care, or know. All they know (were told, read somewhere..) is Scientists Want It and Bush used a Religious reason to oppose it, and that's enough to cause a hue and cry.

If it's wrong for President Bush to oppose the US government funding stem cell research for reasons which include irrationalities, is it also wrong for people to be in favor of the US government funding "stem cell research (whatever that is! but scientists want it!)" for reasons which include the aforementioned rationale - and are thus also irrational? Let me know, I'm still learning,

--Blix

by a reader on Tue, 06/15/2004 - 18:26 | reply

Huh?

Blix,

I'm not sure what you're asking. Are you saying "Is it wrong to support US Government funding for stem cell research merely because Scientists Want It and Bush opposed it on religious grounds?"

I think that depends. I don't think it's wrong to insist on scientific criteria to guide these funding decisions rather than mistaken religious criteria.

If by "Scientist Want It" you mean that there is a consensus that the research shows sufficient scientific merit to warrant funding based on historically applied criteria in the absence of an erroneous religion-based intervention, then it isn't wrong.

If by "Scientists Want It" you mean just that some scientists think its merit is greater than zero but it wouldn't meet the historically applied criteria for funding, think it is wrong.

Of course, the above assumes that US Government funding of this sort of research isn't wrong in general. I think it is wrong.

Gil

by Gil on Tue, 06/15/2004 - 19:27 | reply

Gil, There could (for all

Gil,

There could (for all I know) be a "consensus that the research shows sufficient scientific merit to warrant funding based on historically applied criteria in the absence of an erroneous religion-based intervention" (although I don't know how one ever sets up these controlled conditions, there still seems to be this weird assumption that non-erroneous non-religion-based (or at least, non-irrational) criteria are somehow the norm. I don't buy that).

But a large number of the people currently saying "We [or, 'you Americans', as the case may be, depending on the speaker..] must fund stem-cell research (from embryos (not from existing lines)) NOW!" don't actually know that, as far as I can tell. What they "know" is far closer to "some scientists think its merit is greater than zero". More like, "they read in a magazine (or saw on Oprah..) that some scientists think its merit is greater than zero".

This knowledge alone (and not any particular knowledge of this kwyjibo-flibbertigibit research or whatever the heck it is, who cares anyway), combined with the knowledge that George Bush opposes it and is Religious, is quite evidently sufficient grounds to bring the issue to the forefront in some peoples' minds and make it a huge urgent important issue. (Now, this all may not actually apply to The World's advocacy in particular, but thus far if Their knowledge of stem-cell research goes much beyond that, it's difficult to tell.)

by a reader on Tue, 06/15/2004 - 19:56 | reply

ok it wasnt a direct quote but you implied you were paraphrasing

Gil,

the stuff you quote shows that Bush considers it a moral issue. but his decision against funding does not mean he thinks the research is definitely immoral. it could be that he simply is not totally sure, and wants to play it morally safe. if he was sure, wouldn't he try for something stronger like a ban?

(it's not actually playing it morally safe, because his decision hurts real humans, but he doesn't seem to realise that. but that's another issue.)

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 06/15/2004 - 20:32 | reply

Immoral?

Elliot,

You're right. I implied that I was paraphrasing, because I thought (and still think) that Bush indicated that he thinks it's immoral. I don't think my interpretation is outrageous; and if Bush doesn't think it is immoral, and wants others to know that, he should have communicated better.

Also, I don't think the lack of a ban is a good test for his opinion, because I think he lacks the authority to ban it. I believe that would require an act of congress, and he knows that he wouldn't be able to get it without a politically costly fight (probably not at all).

Gil

by Gil on Tue, 06/15/2004 - 21:17 | reply

Irrational Support

Blix,

Yes, I agree that those who might strongly support this research funding only because they heard some scientists want to do it and that Bush blocked it for religious reasons are wrong and irrational.

I suspect that The World bases their judgment on the accounts of scientists that they have reason to trust that the research is otherwise deserving of funding in the sense that I indicated. So, I don't think that The World is wrong or irrational about this. Ultimately all of us, including Bush, must make our decisions based partially on the trusted advice of scientists; we can't be experts in all fields, and many decisions should not be left to those "experts".

Also, something that I think is not wrong or irrational is to take no position on whether the funding is warranted, but to criticize Bush's reasoning.

Gil

by Gil on Tue, 06/15/2004 - 21:31 | reply

Therapeutic Cloning

From the Advanced Cell Technology FAQ:

Cloning is a process in which a body (somatic) cell is placed into an egg cell from which the DNA has been removed, by a process called nuclear transfer. The egg cell is then activated and starts to develop. The resulting offspring has DNA identical to the animal donating the somatic cell. Cloning is an asexual form of reproduction.

In contrast, sexual reproduction uses a sperm and an egg cell and the resultant offspring has a genetic mix from two animals.

2. How does Reproductive Cloning differ from Therapeutic Cloning?

In Reproductive Cloning, following the nuclear transfer process the egg cell is grown into an embryo and is placed in the uterus of a surrogate mother who will carry the pregnancy to completion as a normal pregnancy. In Therapeutic Cloning, the egg cell is grown only to the blastocyst stage and the inner cell mass is removed from the blastocyst. The stem cells in the inner cell mass are then differentiated into cells that can be used to treat life-threatening diseases. It is important to note that no embryo is either created or destroyed in the Therapeutic Cloning process.

Someone asked:

what is wrong with the existing lines of embryonic stem cells, i.e. what research needs cannot be met by them?

For one thing, existing embryonic stem cells aren't genetically identical with the patient and thus there is the problem of rejection. It is not that there will be this research using embryonic cells and then we'll have treatments that don't involve using embryonic cells: therapeutic cloning involves the creation of embryonic cells – though note that we are not talking about a foetus about to be born, just a collection of 100 cells that have been dividing for only about 8 days.

Note also that these cells could become more than one embryo, and two such collections of cells (blastocysts) could become one embryo. These are potential human life, but then, a sperm or an ovum or a skin cell or just about any part of a person has the potential to become a human being.

For more information on this, read some of these fascinating scientific papers, this interview with therapeutic cloning pioneer, Michael West, and the explanatory articles linked here. There is also a very clear explanation of somatic cell nuclear transfer here.

Michael West's book about his brave and pioneering work in this field, The Immortal Cell, is an absolute classic. Well worth reading.

A question for those who disapprove of therapeutic cloning: Do you disapprove of using bovine egg cells too, or just human ones? Apparently it works using bovine ones, though obviously they would be using the patient's own DNA to create the so-called 'embryo' (all 100 cells of it) so perhaps this idea will have people protesting even more loudly. (And given that a bovine ovum has the potential to become human life – not a hybrid, but 100% human life – I'd be interested to know if all those against harnessing the power of embryonic stem cells are vegarians.

Here are some advocacy group pages giving useful information:

- Therapeutic cloning
- Why is George W. Bush Trying to Send America's Best Medical Researchers to Jail? What can you do about it?
- Stem Cell Action
- Texans for Advancement of Medical Research

I must admit that I am a bit hazy about what the current legal situation is in the USA, but according to the National Human Genome Research Institute:

In July 2001, the House of Representatives voted 265 to 162 to make any human cloning a criminal offense, including cloning to create an embryo for derivation of stem cells rather than to produce a child. In August 2002, President Bush, contending with a DHHS decision made during the Clinton administration, stated in a prime-time television address that federal support would be provided for research using a limited number of stem cell colonies already in existence (derived from leftover IVF embryos). Current bills before Congress would ban all forms of cloning outright, prohibit cloning for reproductive purposes, and impose a moratorium on cloning to derive stem cells for research, or prohibit cloning for reproductive purposes while allowing cloning for therapeutic purposes to go forward. As of late June, the Senate has taken no action. President Bush's Bioethics Council is expected to recommend the prohibition of reproductive cloning and a moratorium on therapeutic cloning later this summer.

Prepared by Kathi E. Hanna, M.S., Ph.D., Science and Health Policy Consultant

(March 2004)

In an editorial in The New England Journal of Medicine Volume 349:300, July 17, 2003, Number 3, Jeffrey M. Drazen wrote:

The U.S. House of Representatives has voted to ban research on, and the use of, medical treatments derived from embryonic stem cells. This bill is shortsighted and has the potential to put many critical future advances in medicine beyond the reach of patients in the United States.

There are two distinct uses of embryonic stem cells. The first, for which there is no support among members of the scientific and medical communities, is the use of stem cells to create a genetically identical person. There is a de facto worldwide ban on such activities, and this ban is appropriate. The second use is to develop genetically compatible biomaterials for the replacement of diseased tissues in patients with devastating medical conditions, such as diabetes or Parkinson's disease. This is important work that must and will move forward. [...]

As a physician who has cared for patients who suffered and died from conditions that we are currently unable to treat, I hope that this research can progress rapidly.

--

Sarah Fitz-Claridge

<http://www.fitz-claridge.com/>

by Sarah Fitz-Claridge on Wed, 06/16/2004 - 17:58 | reply

Gay Marriage

Good news, everyone! We here at The World fully recognise same-sex marriages. We oppose any discrimination in law between same-sex and different-sex marriages .

Indeed, unlike many who take those views, we go further. We also oppose any discrimination in law between married people and single people.

In other words, we think that the state should gradually phase out its relationship-validating and -invalidating business. If two (or more) people want solemnly to declare that they will never leave each other no matter how much they may later want to, that should be their right. If holy men and women set up in business to endorse or deprecate such declarations, that too is their right. But the state should not enforce such declarations (beyond what would be required by ordinary contract law) nor set up legal penalties or rewards for those who make them.

That President Bush should be expending time, energy and political capital on this issue in wartime would be reprehensible even if he were on the right side of it. It can wait. And we therefore say also to campaigners who are on the right side of the issue – such as Andrew Sullivan – remain calm; it can wait.

One more thing. Since we have recently made several criticisms of President Bush, perhaps it's worth stressing that we unequivocally endorse him in the forthcoming Presidential election, and not just because the other candidates are hopelessly bad. We agree with Condoleeza Rice that posterity will regard Bush as one of the great Presidents. We are just sad that he isn't greater.

Tue, 06/15/2004 - 13:48 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Rights??? Slightly off-topic

If two (or more) people want solemnly to declare that they will never leave each other no matter how much they may later want to, that should be their right

This idea is not quite clear to me. If I marry someone and, in addition, declare that I will never ever leave my spouse that I should be obliged to keep such promise? I thought that certain types of contract conditions should be void under modern legislation. If I want to sell myself into slavery and noone forces me to do so but nevertheless I wish to sign for it - this condition should also be void by any means. Even if I signed it, even if I got money in return for that - still noone should be able to enforce it. Catholic marriage, slavery, peonage etc. are inhumane things and shouldn't be considered as valid conditions under any circumstances. If two same sex people sign for an eternal marriage - it doesn't change a thing.

Is there anyone to disagree on this issue?

by a reader on Wed, 06/16/2004 - 08:34 | reply

I have been struggling with t

I have been struggling with this issue for a few months now and i cant seem to find a defensible position on either side of it.

One the one hand, a couple who are in love and wish to share their lives together really should have at least some legal rights as married people do now. On the other hand, if simple desire to be together is sufficient for two people to gain legal status and protection then why should not a brother and sister (both of legal age) be forbidden to marry for instance, or even parent and child? This may sound like its getting a bit off topic but how do you say that two peoples respective desire to live together is more or less important than any two other people. I'm sure there is a good argument to settle this, i just haven't heard it yet.

At the moment a marriage, in theory, is the union of a man and woman to create children. ignoring that this is not always the case, it is none the less the ideal case and the reason for the institution to exist. If that reason no longer applies as the guiding principle then it would seem to be morally impossible to refuse the union of any two people, regardless of their status or reasons.

by a reader on Wed, 06/16/2004 - 13:07 | reply

certain types of contract conditions should be void

Indeed they should.

by Editor on Wed, 06/16/2004 - 13:27 | reply

Re: I have been struggling with - why marry?

You don't even need to marry if you are going to have children.

At the moment a marriage, in theory, is the union of a man and woman to create children.

No, it is not for quite a while already. Marriage is a union of two people. Full stop. Official marriage gives you legal rights and practical conveniences in a number of situation. The examples are numerous: inheritance of property and share of property when divorcing, immigration and travel, adoption, mutual health care - when you are allowed to visit your spouse in hospital, make decisions on possible treatment etc., taxation as long as it depends on marital status and number of children. In all these areas same sex couples would be deprived of something quite important for them. Most people just ignore these issues and say something very simplistic like "if you want to live together just do it".

by a reader on Wed, 06/16/2004 - 17:04 | reply

damn subject line

the world said people should have the right to make marriage vows, not that they should literally be a legally enforceable contract.

brother and sister or parent and child should be able to marry legally for tax etc purposes. i don't see that happening though. more realistic is just not having marriage effect taxes etc anymore.

also, i don't see why living together should have anything to do with it. who to live with is a lifestyle choice and shouldn't have anything to do with taxes.

and yes if you enact my changes, we will have two straight brothers who are businessmen who live on opposite sides of the country "marry" to abuse the tax system. this reveals not a problem with my changes, but a problem with the whole idea of changing tax law for "married" people.

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 06/16/2004 - 17:56 | reply

Maybe it oughta be a law

Everyone should marry and adopt x number of dependents and open Roth IRAs to pay for their future educations. The current personal income tax system would then collapse under the weight of bliss or become ever more burdensome upon those unable or unwilling to wed a spouse.

by a reader on Wed, 06/16/2004 - 22:18 | reply

Taxation can be quite a diverse thing

The point was not about having less burden of taxes for officially married couples. Taxation is a huge area nowadays. If I want to make a present to a friend then in some countries you pay tax from the gift you receive. However relatives pay less. It happens because in some countries they consider gifts as income. Tax systems can be very complicated and tricky. Also, taxes from inherited property can be different depending on whether you are in relation or not. Childless people pay tax for not having children in some countries too. Of course, if you stand for abolishing all taxes then it is pointless to even argue about it. But this is what I meant by taxation in my previous post - as long as some tax makes any difference to married/unmarried status same sex couples are deprived (or favoured) of something. And after all, you have overlooked other important differences and other kinds of deprivation which may be much more important.

I find ridiculous not to be able to join my spouse in other country for several years - that is what majority of western "highly-civilised" countries force people to do. But it is even worse not to be able to join your spouse at all.

by a reader on Thu, 06/17/2004 - 08:45 | reply

Same sex marriage

According to editors of this site, the above issue 'can wait'. The reason cited? We are in wartime. Gee, can't we do more than one thing at a time? Let's hold off everything!! No no, let's get to increasing cancer research funding later, it can wait, we are in wartime. Let's put off fixing main-street - we are in wartime, it can wait. Hell, let's throw every resource we have into this 'war on terror' - because it's the only thing worth worrying about right now. Everything else can wait.

How long do we wait for? How long will we wait for the war to be over? How long until our friends in Fallugia are 'free'? We just wait. They'll just wait.

I think there is an argument for the view that trying to solve things quickly, with a shite-load of 'collateral damage' as is being done in Iraq, is, perhaps not the best way for ensuring freedom. This 'imposed revolution' might seem in retrospect to be the way we have made terrorists more dangerous - because they hate the west more. Perhaps better is what is happening in China - it's not a revolution of freedom - but an evolution of western values. The youth there and the freedom-lovers no longer stand before tanks, rising up against powers they are too weak to withstand. Instead western values just 'slowly' seep into the nation. In this sense, waiting is worthy. It's worthy because the light at the end of the tunnel might be a little further off, but at least we don't have to crawl over quite so many bodies and shattered lives as we do right now in Iraq, claiming the light is just around the corner.

Personally, I reckon the length the tunnel in Iraq is a hell of a lot longer than the one in China. Moreover it's going to be clogged with a lot more blood.

Whatever the case, we're going to be waiting along time. And with all that time let's do somethign productive rather than destructive...like, I don't know...give rights to people in democratic nations who are at the moment being discriminated against, like singles and gays.

by Brett on Sun, 11/28/2004 - 02:13 | reply

Re: Same sex marriage

According to editors of this site, the above issue 'can wait'. The reason cited? We are in wartime.

You're right. We should have stressed that it is the fact that this issue is divisive, as well as non-urgent, that makes it wrong to force controversial changes of policy through during wartime.

We did so in a later post, here.

by Editor on Sun, 11/28/2004 - 02:29 | reply

There Is No Honour In Victimhood

Former President Bill Clinton has been talking about his impeachment and the sexual peccadilloes that led up to it:

Clinton tells Rather he is proud that he fought the impeachment battle that failed to drive him from office. "I didn't quit, I never thought of resigning and I stood up to it and beat it back," he tells Rather. "The whole battle was a badge of honor. I don't see it as a stain, because it was illegitimate," says Clinton of the impeachment process that he calls "an abuse of power."

[...]

The failure high on his list of regrets is the affair with White House intern Monica Lewinsky that he terms "a terrible moral error."

He's likely to come in for a lot of criticism for calling his impeachment battle a badge of honour. The fact is this: he made a moral error. But it was not that terrible an error. He tried to cover it up, by lying. That was much worse (mainly because of the harm it did to Monica Lewinsky), but neither the original error nor the lies were even remotely serious enough to warrant impeachment. Clinton was indeed the victim of an abuse of power. The perpetrators ought to be ashamed.

None of that confers any honour on Clinton.

Thu, 06/17/2004 - 14:24 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

huh

I thought he meant beating them was a badge of honor. Beating people who attack you, even if they shouldn't be attacking you, can have honor in it. I don't see any victimhood in the quote.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Thu, 06/17/2004 - 16:22 | reply

battle

The need for impeachment is not so easily deflected as you describe. It was the cumulative effect of Clinton's multiple lies that pushed his detractors to propose a futile attempt at his removal when the electorate refused to do so.

He was and is slimey. He defamed the office of the president. He did not however deserve to be impeached, especially as he now views his sheer survival as honorable. But there is no honor to be found on either side in the whole mess.

KC Fleming

by a reader on Fri, 06/18/2004 - 15:18 | reply

Yes there is no honor in vict

Yes there is no honor in victimhood but there is honor in Clinton's support for Bush's Iraq policy today, especially compared with most other Democrats. The difference is, he had everything to gain and nothing to lose by "fighting" the impeachment, so it's no great credit to him that he did it. Supporting Bush today is case of doing the right thing whether it helps him personally or not.

by a reader on Fri, 06/18/2004 - 15:47 | reply

Impeachment should be easier, not harder

This Crackerjack-box history of the impeachment situation is somewhat unsatisfying in comparison with one's memory of the actual events (if one has any).

He didn't merely "lie". He lied under oath (perjury), and pressured others to do the same (subornation of perjury). In common parlance these are what is known as "crimes". He used the power of his political office to grant favors to a witness in exchange for her not giving damaging testimony against him, which was corrupt to at least some extent. You acknowledge damage done to Monica Lewinsky (for some reason; in fact, she committed perjury and deserves little sympathy) yet ignore damage done to Paula Jones, who was the actual complainant against Clinton in a civil case under a duly written law, and who was denied justice under that law because of Clinton's shenanigans.

Reasonable folks can differ about how serious these acts were or whether they justified removing him from office, but they cannot be simply papered over with the word "lie". "Lying" is something politicians regularly do and to some extent is unavoidable. Perjuring and suborning perjury are inexcusable for the chief of the executive branch.

One can also, by the way, use the discussion to seriously call into question the underlying laws which brought his acts into the legal spotlight (sexual harrassment laws). Yes, perhaps indeed he should never have been placed in a position where he was forced to tell the truth about adultery, or be committing perjury, in the absence of a criminal charge of harm against some person etc. I'll go with that.

I'm suspicious however of people who had that revelation suddenly dawn on them only when the perjury-trapped person in question happened to be Bill Clinton. It can happen to a thousand and one Joe Schmoes and go un lamented. You will notice, in addition, that sexual harrassment laws have not in any way been pulled back or repealed as a result of the horrendous unspeakable absurdities perpretrated against poor Bill Clinton in their name. Why should that be? Didn't we all agree that it was horrible that Clinton was forced to testify about his personal life? Where are the impassioned pleas to repeal sexual harrassment laws then, in order to prevent such atrocities from taking place ever again? Or are sexual harrassment laws only absurd when applied against people we like? This is the true damage Clinton did - to the notion of rule of law, to justice applying equally, and blindly. The tacit message is that sexual harassment laws were intended only for use against (R)s but not (D)s; or for use against the plebes, but not the powerful.

Another thing I'd like to see put to rest is the idea that nobility or honor can, even in theory, somehow accrue to Clinton fighting his own damn impeachment (uh, excuse me, what did we expect?) merely by ex cathedra asserting that to impeach him was (somehow) "illegitimate". Sorry but there was nothing "illegitimate" about it and The World's assertion that it was not "warranted" is little more supportable. Impeachment is a perfectly legitimate procedure written into the US Constitution. The standards for who can be impeached and why are amazingly open-ended and, in the end - as was pointed out during Watergate, I believe - boil down to, An "impeachable" offense is whatever the House says it is. One of the things which bothered me most about Clinton surviving impeachment is that it seems to have raised the bar to the point where frankly, I'm pretty sure that no President will ever be impeached again. I'd almost rather see Presidents impeached left and right. But perhaps that's just me. ;-)

--Blix

by a reader on Tue, 06/22/2004 - 00:01 | reply

Not morally legitimate

Blix wrote:

Impeachment is a perfectly legitimate procedure written into the US Constitution. The standards for who can be impeached and why are amazingly open-ended and, in the end - as was pointed out during Watergate, I believe - boil down to, An "impeachable" offense is whatever the House says it is.

By writing this, are you not conceding that impeachment is a political and not a legitimately legal process? (This is reminiscent of The World's discussion here, BTW.) Yes, it's constitutional, like a wide variety of other political processes. But not all political action is morally defensible. At his impeachment, Clinton was not facing the rule of law. He was facing a concerted misuse of Constitutional mechanisms with the intention of overriding the electorate's choice of President. His perjury, too, must be understood in that context.

It was perjury before a Star Chamber, not a rule-of-law court.

by David Deutsch on Tue, 06/22/2004 - 00:42 | reply

Not a criminal trial, Prez not a king

Again it's all well and good to assert out of clear blue sky that to impeach that particular President for those things was "not morally defensible", but that assertion is based on almost nothing of substance. Why don't you just come out and call it "EEEE-VIL"? That might really convince people! I don't see how Whether To Impeach maps so easily onto the "moral" spectrum as you seem to think. If at all. Perhaps one needs to have liked Bill Clinton to have seen this (not saying you did, but obviously I didn't, and perhaps it would've helped if I had ;).

But part of the problem is that the template through which you view these events is inapt. No, impeachment is not a legal process, "rule of law" or otherwise. But there is no reason to expect it to have been or criticize it for not having been. Impeachment is never a legal process, never obeys the "rule of law", and your criticism could be leveled against any impeachment, of anyone, past present or future. (But you choose to level it against that particular one for some reason, of course.)

Bill Clinton was not being criminally charged with anything in the first place. Had the Senate voted the other way, he would not have gone to jail or received any other form of punishment, or had his rights abrogated in any way whatsoever (absent a future, actual criminal trial for something). Impeachment was not a criminal trial. It was not even a civil trial (monetary damages were not on the table).

He would simply have been removed from the office of the Presidency, the occupation of which was not, as you seem to think, his inherent or civil right, but rather was a temporary privilege of authority he had been granted at the pleasure of the people of the US, and which - theoretically - could have been revoked at any time by their representatives in Congress, by impeaching and then voting to remove him. Or so it says in the Constitution. Impeachment is a (the only!) means for the people (through their representatives) to remove their chief executive from office.

Yes, the impeachment procedure, as set up, is reminiscent of a trial court - with the House, roughly, acting as a "grand jury" (deciding whether to "indict"), and the Senate acting as a "jury" (in what is actually called an impeachment trial). You seem to have read too much into that analogy though. So the fact that impeachment doesn't obey the "rule of law" (which it NEVER CAN) doesn't make it "morally indefensible".

To speak of the Congress removing the President by perfectly constitutional means, or just attempting to do so, as being "immoral" - whatever the circumstances - is quite odd. "Bad idea", "wrong", "not serious enough misdeeds to justify", sure... but "immoral"?? This seems prejudicial towards the interests of the guy who has the privilege of being President over the rights of the people who allowed him to do so. And why on earth would one have such a prejudice? Bill Clinton still being President was a "moral" issue? Was he a king ruling by "divine right"?

"Moral indefensibility" as such simply is neither here nor there, and lack of "rule of law" doesn't matter; it can't make impeachment "morally indefensible". Unless of course it makes all impeachments "morally indefensible". Is that what you're saying? If so, I again lament the sad fact that Clinton has apparently ruined impeachment for us forever, depriving the people of the lone Constitutional procedure they had once enjoyed for removal of a President (prior to the conclusion of his 4-year term) they through their representatives desired to remove. Apparently he's convinced a lot of really, really smart people that to remove a President prior to the conclusion of 4 years can somehow be "immoral"! Presidents have a "moral" right to serve (reign?) for at least 4 years now! Again, this is the true damage his "noble" efforts did.

On a similar note, trying to use "with the intention of overriding the electorate's choice of President" as part of your case for "morally indefensible" is equally inapt. By definition, any impeachment trial of any President would have to be with the intention of "overriding the electorate's choice of President" (i.e. removing him in favor of his Vice President - I hasten to add that Gore, and not some Republican, would have ascended to the Presidency had Clinton been removed). Unless of course the particular President being impeached had reached that office by some other means than election, which happens relatively seldom. You make it sound oh so horrible to have this horrible "intention" but if so, one must wonder why the author of the Constitution explicitly provided for precisely that procedure, and why its signatories didn't correct the error. Guess they were just too dumb to think through the obvious straightforward "immoral" ramifications, that if they allowed something called "impeachment" this might (gasp!) "override the electorate's choice of President" and a President would be leaving office prior to the end of his 4-year-term, which apparently is "immoral" (?).

A lot of people seemed to have this impression, that what was being done was not merely an attempt to remove him from office but an abrogation of Clinton's rights, that in attempting to remove him from office this was somehow metaphysically tantamount to throwing him in jail or some other punishment. I can only marvel at the strong identification some people seem to have with a head of state and his fates and fortunes, in an almost vicarious way. "Poor Bill Clinton! He wouldn't get to be President anymore! Not fair! He has a right to still be President!" Huh????

I can only reiterate that ideally, impeachment should be easier and not harder. And in passing, people need to stop identifying so much with (fantasizing about being?) the President over and above the Congress; it's not healthy for constitutional republicanism.

P.S. As for what to say about your characterization of (former Bill Clinton student, who eventually threw out the case) Judge Susan Webber Wright's court (the one in which the sexual-harrassment suit, under a duly-written law, was being heard against Bill Clinton) as a "Star Chamber, not a rule-of-law court", I'm somewhat at a loss. I suppose I could just give you the benefit of the doubt and assume that you speak from a basis of legal expertise + firsthand knowledge of the proceedings that went on in her court, to characterize it as such. Surely it is not just a vile, unsupported slander of Judge Wright and her court based on nothing?

The World's and/or your post, even if correct in the main (impeachment not a good idea, etc), have the flavor of someone speaking about impeachment from a distance, without knowing much about what actually happened. It's a phenomenon I encounter quite often when speaking with non-Americans who viewed all of the events through the prism of stories in their press or perhaps CNN. "they impeached him for having an affair", "all that he did was lie about sex", etc. This is really a cartoon version of the actual events. And often there is no clear separation in such peoples' minds between the sexual-harrassment lawsuit (if they even know there was one - nevermind if they know who "Paula Jones" was), and the impeachment trial. I'm guessing (to be courteous) that your "Star Chamber" bombthrow was merely an instance of the same phenomenon. Unless of course you really do have good reason to (whether or not you know this is what you were doing) question Judge Wright's abilities, legal expertise, decisions, and application of the sexual-harrassment law(s) in question? Best,

--Blix

by a reader on Tue, 06/22/2004 - 14:50 | reply

p.p.s.

Two more points.

1. I see that like many, you imply that the "electorate's choice" was for Bill Clinton to serve as President for the 4 years 1997-2001 regardless of what were to happen during those 4 years. Not so. They did not and CANNOT make such a "choice", they have no right to do so.

It was their choice for him to serve as President under the Constitution, which is what defines and restricts that office. Implicit in that "choice", even if not all (or no!) Clinton voters were conscious of it as they cast their votes, is the possibility that he could be impeached by the House, since impeachment is explicitly provided for in that Constitution. The electorate (=51% of voters, or however many it takes to make up an electoral college majority) has no authority whatsoever to make, and have respected, a "choice" for someone to serve as chief executive/head of state/commander in chief for 4 years independently of the constitutional provisions which define and restrict that office, any more than 51% of the electorate has the right to impose a dictator on the other 49%.

Notice that Bill Clinton had to step down after 8 years because the Constitution says so - and this didn't violate the electorate's choice for him to be President because they were perfectly aware of this constitutional provision, or should have been, when they cast their votes. Similarly, Bill Clinton could be impeached if the House decided to because the Constitution says so - and this didn't violate the electorate's choice for him to be President because they were perfectly aware of this constitutional provision, or should have been, when they cast their votes.

The possibility of being "impeached" is part and parcel of being President. There is no such thing as "being President" apart from the Constitution which defines "President", and part of that definition is "can be impeached". Ignorance ("nobody told me he could be impeached! not fair! I wanted him for 4 years no matter what! respect that desire of mine!") is no excuse and I have no sympathy for it. 51% of the electorate has absolutely no right whatsoever to impose a "President" on the other 49% and insist that he remain so, without respecting the Constitutional restrictions on that office, and impeachment is one such restriction. Or was, anyway.

2. However true it may be that Republicans' support of impeachment/conviction was political and did not respect a "rule of law", the same criticism (for what it's worth - not much) applies equally to Democrats and others who opposed conviction. Notice that all (D) Senators voted Bill Clinton-(D) "not guilty" of the acts for which he was impeached, acts which (regardless of whether the impeachment should have been handed to the Senate for those acts) no reasonable person can possibly argue Bill Clinton did not actually commit. In other words their "not guilty" vote was not based on a sincere deliberation that Clinton did not commit those acts for which he was impeached, but rather, entirely on their desire that - regardless of whether he committed the acts - Clinton remain in office. In short, justice was NOT blind, the Senate vote NOT TO REMOVE was ALSO "political" and did not obey the "rule of law".

But hey that's ok I guess. For some reason.

by a reader on Tue, 06/22/2004 - 17:58 | reply

Did they vote him not guilty of the acts?

Notice that all (D) Senators voted Bill Clinton-(D) "not guilty" of the acts for which he was impeached

I can't remember the details, but did they ever vote on whether he was guilty of the acts for which he was impeached? Weren't they just voting on a motion which both said that he committed the acts and that they amounted to high crimes and misdemeanors for which he deserved to be removed from office?

by a reader on Tue, 06/22/2004 - 18:23 | reply

yes

Click: "The perjury charge was defeated with 55 "not guilty" votes and 45 "guilty" votes. On the obstruction-of-justice article, the chamber was evenly split, 50-50." Vote breakdown (GUILTY or NOT GUILTY next to each name and under each article) can be found at that link.

by a reader on Tue, 06/22/2004 - 19:19 | reply

yes?

That CNN story quotes "guilty" and "not guilty" but did the senate really vote guilty or not guilty instead of aye and nay as usual or is that just CNN dumbing down the story? Anyway, that doesn't answer my question which was did they ever vote on whether he committed certain acts, or did they only vote on whether he committed certain acts and they amounted to high crimes and misdemeanors for which he deserved to be removed from office?

by a reader on Wed, 06/23/2004 - 14:20 | reply

Star Chamber

To Blixa: Yes, sorry about that: I confused the two proceedings! I forgot that (some of?) the perjury in question was in a real court and therefore much more serious morally than perjury in a political court.

by David Deutsch on Wed, 06/23/2004 - 18:43 | reply

to reader: you have a point

Everything I have seen suggests that the impeachment trial is a trial (political trial is a good way to put it) and that nominally the votes are called either "guilty" or "not guilty".

That doesn't mean I don't think you have a point. The most neutral way for me to answer is to point you to the text of the articles (1, 2) of impeachment which they were voting on. I think we can agree that, plainly, and in effect, a vote of "not guilty" (despite being denoted by the phrase "not guilty") was a vote to reject some aspect or another of the texts, both of which contain "he did X" stuff and "he should be removed for doing X" stuff.

By voting "not guilty" are they rejecting the "he did X?" part or the "he should be removed for doing X part?" Well, I can't say. Maybe in some cases they really didn't think he did X (although I doubt it). Maybe in other cases they thought, or didn't doubt, that he did X, but didn't think X was serious enough to warrant removal (which is why you have a point). In at least Arlen Specter's case he seems to have decided that Clinton having done X was "not proven, under Scottish law" or Scottish rite or something.

But for at least some of them - I suspect most, your estimate may differ - they thought he did X, but didn't really care, and although they might think doing X pretty serious in other circumstances, they weren't going to let a (D) President (or a President they liked..) be removed from office no matter what, at least not unless the polls indicated that they'd be punished on election day for not doing so (which they didn't), and so, because (obviously) they had full knowledge that the effect of casting a "guilty" vote was that it was a vote that said "yes remove him from office", they voted "not guilty" for this consequentialist reason, with virtually no reference whatsoever to the act X influencing that vote in their mind.

And that's basically what I'm saying: that (at least for some of the voters, at least to some extent..) the vote was political in nature, rather than a sober and objective deliberation as to Clinton's "guilt" of the acts or (although many affected this pretense of course) an objective, scientific weighing of those acts against some supposed objective, measurable standard of what is "impeachable" and what isn't. What I'm saying is that you simply can't squeeze the Politics out of that vote.

For what it's worth. (Again, not much.)

For the record, (and to avoid confusion) the reason I say it damaged the rule of law is not because the impeachment vote was politicized and didn't obey the rule of law (impeachment votes never really can..), but just because the chief executive pretty obviously broke the laws and was allowed to remain in office. That's just kinda bad, sets a bad example, etc. Maybe that Bad was outweighed by the other Good accruing from the fact that impeachment shouldn't have happened, I don't know.

Anyway, this point I've been hashing out with you is much smaller: "the (R)s' vote was politicized? yes but so was the (D)s". I don't think we're that far apart as long as I don't overreach to make this point ;-) Best,

by a reader on Wed, 06/23/2004 - 20:59 | reply

to DD

ok :)

I could also probably provisionally be convinced that the impeachment trial if not Webber's court was a "Star Chamber" then. The problem is, that criticism would apply to all impeachment trials, in the sense that: an opponent of any impeachment conviction can level the criticism, claim that it alone justifies a "not guilty" verdict, and there's really no rational way to rebut. Impeachment trials simply are never set up as rule-of-law courts and as I told "reader" you can't squeeze the politics out of them.

Which (if the logic that this makes them invalid "Star Chambers" carries the day) means, the American people have effectively lost a perfectly Constitutional means they (through their representatives) had once enjoyed for removing a President prior to the end of his 4 year term. This is what bothers me, the raising of the "impeachable" bar to unattainable levels and the overblown rhetoric about "Star Chambers" makes impeachment highly unlikely ever to happen again. Which is, well, bad (even if it was indeed incorrect to impeach, and would have been incorrect to remove, Clinton).

On the other hand I suppose I could console myself with the thought that many of the impeachment-opposers were simply being disingenuous about all their "that's not impeachable" and "this is a Star Chamber/witch hunt" stuff, and would be completely inconsistent and withdraw 99% of those rhetorical objections to it if/when it comes to be used against a President of the opposite party ;-)

Best,

by a reader on Sat, 06/26/2004 - 00:18 | reply

webber

=wright

by a reader on Sat, 06/26/2004 - 00:19 | reply

Impeachment and Star Chambers

I think there should be such a thing as impeachment and I think it can only be a political process and not a judicial one. I think that the US Constitution gets it about right.

By 'political and not judicial' I mean that the criteria for impeachability cannot be specified in advance in a Constitution or in legislation. I do not mean that it is morally OK (even though it is Constitutional) for legislators to use the process to remove a President because his political policies are harmful or because they hate him, or that impeachment should ever be used to resolve a current political controversy. Equally, it is not morally right for legislators to shield a President from impeachment just because his political views are right. Therefore honourable legislators should formulate, in their own minds, a criterion of impeachability which gives the same answer if they imagine a President of the opposite party being accused of the same misdeeds. The criterion should be non-judicial in another sense too: the purpose of impeachment in the US system should not be to punish wrongdoers who happen to be President: that should be the job of normal courts. It should be to prevent the nation from being harmed by a bad President, acting as President. Of course the party opposing the President's will always consider that he is in some sense harming the nation and indifferent to its welfare. Impeachable crimes or wrongdoings should therefore be actions, such as accepting bribes or committing treason, in which the President displays indifference or hostility to the welfare of the nation in a sense that is independent of current political controversies. Sufficiently serious crimes which are not directly of that type should nevertheless be impeachable if it can be (honestly) argued that a person who would do X would also probably have no compunction in harming the nation, or could no longer have enough respect among the people to be able to lead them effectively, but those are slippery slopes that one should resist going down except in uncontroversial cases.

It is not the fact that impeachment is a political process that made this particular one seem like a 'Star Chamber' proceeding to me. It is the fact that it did not meet most of the above criteria for being a morally right political process.

by David Deutsch on Sat, 06/26/2004 - 02:01 | reply

Clinton defamed office?

stuff and nonsense from a Clinton hater...explore the record of all of our presidents before you condemn one you so dislike...try reading up on the subject.

by a reader on Sat, 06/26/2004 - 14:42 | reply

DD,

I do not mean that it is morally OK (even though it is Constitutional) for legislators to use the process to remove a President because his political policies are harmful or because they hate him

How about cuz he broke the law and they think so? You impugn the motives of the (R) impeachment voters and in some/many cases you may be right, but again this is a criticism which can be made of any vote to impeach. You're entitled to be suspicious of motives of course but "be suspicious of their motives!" is obviously always going to be the rallying cry of the accused in any impeachment. Can't always be correct

Therefore honourable legislators should formulate, in their own minds, a criterion of impeachability which gives the same answer if they imagine a President of the opposite party being accused of the same misdeeds.

Sounds good to me. No doubt in my mind that these activities by an (R) President would have garnered lots of "guilty" votes from (D)s, but of course YMMV.

The criterion should be non-judicial in another sense too: the purpose of impeachment in the US system should not be to punish wrongdoers who happen to be President: that should be the job of normal courts. It should be to prevent the nation from being harmed by a bad President, acting as President.

Hm. I'll go with this too, with two caveats: (1) in some cases normal courts could be prevented from going after the President for reasons of "executive privilege" etc; (2) the "prevent harm" criterion could actually lower the bar for impeachment not raise it, in some cases. (example: it came out in the Clinton investigations that he had told Lewinsky they had to be careful on the phone cuz some foreign intel service [some say: Israeli] was probably snooping; was he just talkin', or did he really know this?

did this leave him open to blackmail? Blackmail re: an affair could harm the country even if there were no illegalities involved. And notice how his reaction to knowing about foreign snoops on to his affair - assuming there really were some - was "continue the affair but try to be more secret", not "discontinue the affair because it's recklessly leaving me open to exposure and/or blackmail". Wouldn't the latter have been better for the country? Isn't it valid to think a President who chooses the former has made a choice which harms the country to at least some extent?)

Impeachable crimes or wrongdoings should therefore be actions, such as accepting bribes or committing treason, in which the President displays indifference or hostility to the welfare of the nation in a sense that is independent of current political controversies.

Bribery and Treason are no-brainers seeing as how they are specifically mentioned in the Constitution. Obviously it's in the "high Crimes and Misdemeanors" part where all the wiggle room is. Unless this was a vacuous addition to the Constitution then "Treason, Bribery" cannot be an exhaustive list of "impeachable" offenses.

And as for "indifference or hostility to the welfare of the nation" what exactly is "I'm being snooped on in my secret affair, but I'll keep doing it"? Maybe the threat this posed to the welfare of the nation was small, but I don't think it nonzero.

BTW I don't know what you mean by "independent of current political controversies"; aside from the impeachment scandal, what current political controversies do you have in mind?

Sufficiently serious crimes which are not directly of that type should nevertheless be impeachable if it can be (honestly) argued that a person who would do X would also probably have no compunction in harming the nation, or could no longer have enough respect among the people to be able to lead them effectively, but those are slippery slopes that one should resist going down except in uncontroversial cases.

Why? Why not err on the side of caution and, When in doubt kick him out? I say follow those slippery slopes pretty darn far.

Again: if we learn that X is of a type who will have silly illicit affairs, with the full knowledge that foreign intelligence services may try to learn about them (thus tries doubly-hard, futilely, to keep them secret), it's only a short step (down that slippery slope) to get you to exposure and blackmail. Why bother the risk?

Are individual Presidents that important? I still don't understand the "person-centric" thinking here, why all the focus on how high a bar there should be for removing an Important Person from office and the burden against. IMHO it's the office that's important, not the person. (Maybe I have to be a more Important person myself to instinctively sympathize with the person over the office, who knows... ;-)

It is not the fact that impeachment is a political process that made this particular one seem like a 'Star Chamber' proceeding to me. It is the fact that it did not meet most of the above criteria for being a morally right political process.

I see, fair enough. IMHO it did meet most of those criteria shrug So, we have an honest difference of opinion. Obviously mine could be wrong but I still don't think it's as cut and dried as you'd made it out to be. Or perhaps (now seems likely) you didn't make it out to be as such, and I just overreacted to your assertion of immorality, which I should have better understood implicitly connotes "in your opinion" :-)

Best,

--Blix

by a reader on Mon, 06/28/2004 - 22:19 | reply

current politics controversies like, you wouldn't impeach a president for lowering taxes, or for abolishing social security, or for banning gay marriage. these are all current controversies.

also, you seem to have said that b/c many Ds would have voted guilty for a R prez, they should have voted guilty for Clinton to avoid a double standard. well, you could just as well say, b/c they voted not guilty for clinton, they should also vote not guilty for the R prez. their votes should be the same in both cases, but that could mean twice guilty or twice not guilty.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 06/28/2004 - 22:49 | reply

When in doubt, kick them out?

Why not err on the side of caution and, When in doubt kick him out?

Because the ability of our political system to foster the creation of knowledge depends on its ability to focus debate and creativity on the rival theories of what the nation as a whole should do, and abandon ones that are deemed to have failed to survive testing or criticism. For instance, at present, one of the most important areas is the area of how best to avoid 9-11-type disasters. Another one that has been near the top of the list for many decades is how much the government should intervene in the economy with taxes, subsidies and government services. If it were to become commonplace for politicians to lose or gain power for reasons independent of their positions on such issues, the creation of political knowledge would cease.

by David Deutsch on Mon, 06/28/2004 - 22:57 | reply

to elliot

[current politics] like, you wouldn't impeach a president for lowering taxes, or for abolishing social security, or for banning gay marriage. these are all current controversies.

None of those (rather, their inverses) had anything to do with what Clinton was impeached "for". I'm still confused. There seems to be an assumption here that (R)s had some boring wonky reasons for wanting to impeach Clinton. I really don't get that, I thought the standard party line was that they were salacious puritanical reasons? which is it? ;-)

Explicitly: what "current politics controversies" is it being alleged here had something to do with the impeachment vote/trial? Again, aside from the actual impeachment scandal itself.

gays in the military? I really can't think of anything else.

well, you could just as well say, b/c they voted not guilty for clinton, they should also vote not guilty for the R prez.

I could've, but I didn't, because I don't think in such hypothetical they should've ;-). You're right tho. Consistency by itself only demands the votes be the same. One needs additional criteria to break the symmetry to select either "GG" or "NN", and I'm supplying one: "perjury = you're out". K? --Blix

by a reader on Tue, 06/29/2004 - 00:19 | reply

DD,

I agree that "commonplace" goes too far but I did not intend to imply by "err on the side of caution" that they should become "commonplace" at all. (We can make huge errors on the side of caution before impeachment convictions of Presidents would become anything close to commonplace.)

As for improving our political knowledge, the problem is you (like many) artificially circumscribe what is political knowledge and what isn't. One kind of, nontrivial IMHO, political knowledge you have ignored is, What kinds of people should we select to be our leaders. Rather, you short-circuit that question by effectively insisting that {has a more correct laundry list of positions on what the nation as a whole should do} be the only, or almost only, criteria for selecting leaders.

I think this is flawed because it ignores a leader's character completely. But surely you agree that to ignore a potential leader's character and vote for him because (you think) he will point "what the nation as a whole should do" in a more correct direction is foolish. Of what use is a seriously morally damaged spokesman for a correct cause? (The Left would do well to heed this lesson in Michael Moore's case, for example.)

Had Clinton lost power it would indeed have been for reasons independent of his (correct, let's stipulate) policy positions on, for example, NAFTA and gays in the military. You are right that this would strike a blow against our polity learning/encoding/whatever the correct political knowledge in those areas. However, the reasons he would have lost power would still have constituted important political knowledge in and of themselves which (perhaps...) could outweigh those losses.

"Do not lie while under oath" is not a trivial message to be sending to either potential future leaders or to the public (by example). The idea that lying-under-oath should not be selected against in leaders means we never improve our political knowledge to an extent necessary to weed out Liars from seeking office. (Not that we ever will, but we can't even try?) Neither is "The President is not above the law" as political knowledge completely devoid of salutary benefits.

I do not accept "let's separate the personal from the political". Many people who insist upon doing this have all too understandable reasons for desiring that it be done: raw political ambition and "personal" skeletons. I do not accept that making it easier for such people to enter and hold political offices - rather, that forcing a kind of compartmentalization between the "personal" and the "political" which really amounts to insisting that voters vote based only on laundry lists of positions - is some kind of imperative for improving political knowledge. In fact I don't really even think it will improve political knowledge, but something like the opposite.

(Consider an extreme compartmentalization effect: the role abortion plays in U.S. politics. To extreme "pro-choice" people, being "pro-choice" is essentially the only variable they consider in a candidate... to "pro-life" people, just the opposite. In effect the candidates themselves never actually really matter as long as they are on the "correct" side, and the extremists from both sides will bend over backwards distorting their arguments to disingenuously laud "their" guy. This helps political knowledge how?)

Are (were) there no potential Democratic Presidential officeholders who would have supported gays in the military and NAFTA but have been wise enough not to engage in silly affairs with silly girls, let alone tried to cover it up with behavior up to and including perjury? Is it so quixotic for me to wish that our politics would at least have the potential for selecting for such people just a little bit? ;-)

Wouldn't convicting Clinton upon impeachment have, in fact, not only not destroyed whatever Political Knowledge he supposedly created, but, actually, sent the message "be more like Gore [Clinton-like policies but more squeaky-clean] than Clinton"?

And what's wrong with that? (not that I'm a Gore fan, just saying...)

--Blix

by a reader on Tue, 06/29/2004 - 00:56 | reply

Lying Liars

Blix,

I sympathise with your points above, but I think you're missing an important aspect of this. I'm not sure that it's helpful to select for truth-telling politicians before it's the case that the public generally prefers such people in office. All of the evidence that I see points to the contrary. Clinton was obviously a liar before he was elected the first time (Gennifer Flowers, "I didn't inhale", etc.)

People chose to elect him anyway because they didn't really care that he's a scumbag and a reflexive liar. He had charisma and charm and made them feel comfortable. Many people like being lied to. They want to believe that Social Security is solvent, that minimum wage laws help the poor, and that the rich are probably guilty of something and should be made to suffer. Most people lie themselves (as often they should) and don't want to be made to feel more guilty by a public punishment of just "lying about sex".

Try to change that. Good Luck. But, until that change happens most people will resent the removal of their lying politicians. They'll continue to vote for other lying politicians until they don't want to anymore. I suspect that impeachments will just entrench this preference.

The changes we seek will have to come from general changes in knowledge and opinions; not from isolated legalistic processes.

Gil

by Gil on Tue, 06/29/2004 - 05:11 | reply

Gil,

People chose to elect him anyway because they didn't really care that he's a scumbag and a reflexive liar.

That ain't good & demonstrates a distinct lack of "political knowledge". Which, I gather, we're trying to build.

Or, at the very least, not destroy. DD's position is (according to my parody) "keep him in there cuz the public should only select based on laundry-lists of issues and to remove him [&people like him] destroys that method of creating political knowledge". I doubt it does.

I suspect that impeachments will just entrench this preference.

Well we'll never really find out will we. You're so worried about a phenomenon which isn't actually in evidence and likely never will be.

The changes we seek will have to come from general changes in knowledge and opinions; not from isolated legalistic processes.

To be clear, I'm not here proposing that an "err on the side of caution" standard of impeachment would necessarily help create the "changes you seek" in political knowledge. I'm saying that it won't destroy that knowledge, and that this proposed firewall between the "personal" (BTW perjury is not "personal" but I digress and this was my usage anyway..) and "political" which people seek (especially if they have political ambition & personal skeletons) does not help preserve or enshrine any valuable knowledge. I don't know why a lot of people have convinced themselves that it does (unless that ambition thing is the entire explanation).

--Blix

by a reader on Tue, 06/29/2004 - 13:56 | reply

Copyright © 2007 Setting The World To Rights

Vote No To The New EU Constitution

As the Daily Telegraph says today:

this mind-numbing, 260-page document [...] is the capstone of a federal state, and gives the EU a foreign minister, a criminal code, a European prosecutor and a police force. We face a net loss of vetoes in about 40 areas and the constitution sets in stone an outdated, over-regulated economic model just at the moment that it is failing.

As Perry de Havilland of Samizdata says:

it is a constitution quite unlike the more famous US one. The EU constitution will incorporate, amongst other things, the essence of the Charter of Fundamental Rights, which requires not that the state refrain from making laws in many areas of life but that laws be mandated to ensure 'rights'. This includes such wonders as the 'right to education' including the phrase "this right includes the possibility to receive free compulsory education" (which is of course not in fact free at all and suggests we have a 'right to be compelled'). And wonders of double talk such as:

Equality between men and women must be ensured in all areas, including employment, work and pay. The principle of equality shall not prevent the maintenance or adoption of measures providing for specific advantages in favour of the under-represented sex.

So the much awaited document will prohibit discrimination between men and women... unless it is decided to pass laws requiring discrimination between men and woman. Clearly the Charter of Fundamental Rights which the new EU Constitution will aim to enforce is nothing less that the 'right' to require all European states to maintain regulatory welfare states. The much vaunted priests of democracy want to make sure that the constitution ensures that all you can vote for is who gets to regulate you rather than whether or not you will be regulated at all.

It is not too late for Britain but the last bastion is indeed the one on which the battle will be fought. Perhaps, just perhaps, when comes time for the UK referendum, that vast and growing tower will be struck by lightning and come crashing down.

Cast your votes accordingly, readers.

Perhaps the most important consideration here is one that is hardly ever mentioned – perhaps for reasons of unconscious political correctness – even by the staunchest opponents of British integration into a European entity: Britain's existing (unwritten) constitution and political culture are incomparably better than their European counterparts. Even if the proposed new order were an improvement for the rest of Europe, which it probably is not, it would still be a catastrophe for Britain and a tragic loss for the world.

It isn't going to happen.

Sat, 06/19/2004 - 20:25 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

"It isn't going to happen."

Let's hope so but, like for the war in Irak as should be obvious by now, wishful thinking does not suffice.

by a reader on Sun, 06/20/2004 - 00:57 | reply

wishful thinking works great aren't you aware that we favoured the war in iraq?

-- Elliot Temple

by a reader on Sun, 06/20/2004 - 03:04 | reply

Seeing how English Hooligans

Seeing how English Hooligans are behaving in my country, I wouldn't be so sure in your cultural superiority.

Where can you actually read the EU thing?

by a reader on Sun, 06/20/2004 - 09:05 | reply

English Hooligans and French Judges

Somebody wrote:

'Seeing how English Hooligans are behaving in my country, I wouldn't be so sure in your cultural superiority.'

These hooligans are not politicians, merely common thugs.

However, when these common thugs come back to Britain if criminal charges are filed against them they may get trial by jury, unlike France where they would be tried by a judge. Accordingly, in this sense, our laws are more open to discussion than French laws since a jury may choose not to enforce a law they think is being wrongly applied or a law they think is just plain pants.

Also, our thugs don't seem quite as bad as the French ones:

http://www.littlegreenfootballs.com/weblog/?entry=10860_French_Antisemitism_Watch

by Alan Forrester on Mon, 06/21/2004 - 00:54 | reply

Here it is the EU thing, if you really want to read it. 275 pages of EU constitution. "Reader friendly!"

by a reader on Mon, 06/21/2004 - 09:29 | reply

Alan, I think the way people

Alan, I think the way people behave says a lot about a country's political culture.

And the EU thing keeps crashing my browser. :P

by a reader on Mon, 06/21/2004 - 14:01 | reply

Wouldn't it help parents in Germany?

There's the stupid contradiction you pointed out, but point 3 of the same article guarantees parents to educate their children as they see fit.

by a reader on Mon, 06/21/2004 - 14:33 | reply

YES TO THE EU CONSTITUTION

As we all know, a tree can not make a forest. We all need each other to survive and that is the essence of washing our hands when in essence it's one that requires it.

All Farm Animals are not equal, but with the EU constitution in existence in Europe, all Farm Animals will be PROTECTED at the least which is a fundamental objective of A.V Dicey's doctrine of Rule of Law and Separation of Power... .

by PI on Wed, 02/02/2005 - 20:19 | reply

YES TO THE EU CONSTITUTION?

PI wrote:

'As we all know, a tree can not make a forest. We all need each other to survive and that is the essence of washing our hands when in essence it's one that requires it.'

What does that have to do with the EU Constitution? Without the EU Constitution we will be able to trade and interact with people in other EU countries without the regulations and bureaucracy of that pointless document getting in the way. So we will have more access to other Europeans without the Constitution, not less.

'All Farm Animals are not equal, but with the EU constitution in existence in Europe, all Farm Animals will be PROTECTED at the least which is a fundamental objective of A.V Diecy's doctrine of Rule of Law and Separation of Power...'

Protected from what? People already feed and house farm animals, they don't need protection.

by Alan Forrester on Mon, 02/21/2005 - 18:10 | reply political and cultural superiority of britain?

british political and cultural superiority is a joke, how can a country that throught the ages sought the desruction of so many states see itself as this great nation. what half decent country would allow the suffering of others simply because it ensured its self-enrichment. the malvinas are so rich in natural resources that would be of great use for the argentinian economy, yet the greedy culture of britain is willing to kill innocents to enrich itself. i'm sure you can be proud of your nation, who wouldn't be, coming from a country that has left countless other countries detroyed all the while not allowing them to recover from the mess your 'great culture' left them? very proud indeed.

by the way what is the culture of britain? it seems to me you try to hijack the cultures of those countries you've conquered during your sick military campaigns. without the many immigrants that are forced to look for work in your country due to your gluttonous culture, there would be no worthwile culture worth mentioning.

i suggest the british take a good long look at themselves before commenting on the political and cultural aspects of other countries, maybe if they do, people might actually have some sort of respect for a country void of political and cultural morality.

by a reader, from an occupied country on Sat, 04/22/2006 - 21:09 | reply

The UN And The Rule Of Law

Kofi Annan is complaining that the US should sign up to the International Criminal Court rather than seeking an exemption because:

"It would discredit the council and the United Nations that stands for rule of law."

We should like to make something clear to Mr Annan. The United Nations does not stand for the rule of law and never has.

No doubt there are many pieces of paper in the UN building on which the word law appears. But those words confer upon the UN neither the right nor the ability to enforce the rule of law. For there are at least two additional requirements.

The first is that legitimate laws come about via a process that allows the people subject to those laws to replace the lawmakers by voting them out of office. The UN's 'laws' do not satisfy this criterion since (amongst other reasons) dictatorships are allowed to participate in making them.

The second requirement is that legitimate laws are enforced impartially on all parties subject to them. But suppose, for example, that the UN General Assembly passes a resolution condemning Israel for its accidental killing of children while it is trying to take out terrorists. Then it must also be willing to pass a resolution condemning Palestinian terrorists who deliberately murder Israeli children. The UN does not pass this test.

If the UN stands for any kind of rule, it is not the rule of law. It is the arbitrary rule of corrupt bureaucrats at the behest of mass-murdering tyrants.

Sun, 06/20/2004 - 23:39 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Rule Of Law

1. The UN's 'laws' do not satisfy this criterion since (amongst other reasons) dictatorships are allowed to participate in making them.

Does this also mean that U.S. laws do not satisfy this criterion since corrupt state regimes (such as Richard Daley's Illinois or Huey Long's Louisiana) are allowed to participate in making them?

2.The second requirement is that legitimate laws are enforced impartially on all parties subject to them. This a nice fantasy, do U.S. judges stopped for DUIs get the same treatment as a poor immigrant stopped for the same offense?

by a reader on Mon, 06/21/2004 - 03:39 | reply

Re: Rule Of Law

1) Umm, I googled those people and they aren't in charge anymore. Thus they are good examples of how corrupt leaders are replaced (well I didn't actually check if they were corrupt, but whatever). You'd need like some current governors who rig elections to have a case.

2) Although I expect you can find a few unfortunate example cases (no one is perfect), can you demonstrate that this happens consistently?

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 06/21/2004 - 04:52 | reply

Re: Rule Of Law

Perhaps the difference is that the UN has laws which dictatorships are allowed to participate in making them indefinitely, whereas damage caused by a corrupt mayor or governor in the US is limited by a finite term and impeachability.

-Nic

by a reader on Mon, 06/21/2004 - 16:58 | reply

Re: Rule Of Law

I agree with the above comment by Nic. The UN has no mechanism, even in principle, for excluding dictators from its decision making.

by David Deutsch on Mon, 06/21/2004 - 17:31 | reply

Make a new rule

I know this might not be easy to do given the structure of the U.N. as a world body which is not a world government. It does seem vital to have a U.N.. Therefore we might reasonably expect the U.N., or a viable world body alternative, to be an evolving body. This flaw needs to be corrected by the U.N. governing council or the U.N. will always be limited in its moral power and therefore also in its moral usefulness. Some dictators might not like it but rules can change for the better by a majority vote or by governing council action. The one problem with dictators is that they can be expected to represent themselves but not the peoples of their country. How might such resolutions regarding decision making be introduced?

by a reader on Mon, 06/21/2004 - 18:15 | reply

Why

...do we need a UN?

What has the UN ever achieved? How much has it cost, in money and in lives?

What could the UN ever achieve that voluntary international agreements and 'coalitions of the willing' could not?

There's no a priori advantage to uniting nations. Diversity and spontaneous order rule.

by Tom Robinson on Mon, 06/21/2004 - 21:52 | reply

As far as I can tell, we need

As far as I can tell, we need the UN because, even if it accomplishes little, its presence provides a useful focus of attention, and emotional outlet, for the types of people inclined to think that we need a UN. Those people might cause real trouble otherwise. ;-)

--Blix

by a reader on Mon, 06/21/2004 - 23:29 | reply

they aren't in charge anymore

because they are dead. Not good examples of how corrupt leaders are replaced. When they were alive they were notorious for their rigged elections.

by a reader on Mon, 06/21/2004 - 23:47 | reply

Re: they aren't in charge anymore

Are their sons in charge now? Isn't that how it works with dictators?

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 06/22/2004 - 15:41 | reply

Re: they aren't in charge anymore

Vladimir Lenin. Joseph Stalin. Nikita Khrushchev. Leonid Brezhnev. Konstantin Chernenko. Yuri Andropov. None of these men had their sons as successors.

by a reader on Wed, 06/23/2004 - 13:35 | reply

sheesh

ummm, so? it doesn't have to literally be a son. are you saying these ppl were succeeded in a corrupt dynasty, and elections are rigged today, etc, or is it fixed and over and done with?

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 06/23/2004 - 17:24 | reply

Copyright © 2007 Setting The World To Rights

Royal Navy Gives Credence To Psychics

Even at the best of times, but especially in the middle of a war of reason against unreason, public institutions such as the Royal Navy ought to set an example to the public and to their employees, and also be held to a high standard of accountability in how they use their valuable time and resources.

Therefore they should not call in "psychics, mediums and paranormal scientists" to investigate why naval ratings don't like one of their buildings:

Top brass at Plymouth's naval dockyard have called in ghost-busting experts - to see if the base is haunted.

A team of paranormal investigators will arrive at Devonport Dockyard on Friday armed with night-vision cameras, dowsing rods and sound equipment.

The research will focus on the Hangman's Cell where naval ratings have been spooked by a strange "atmosphere".

Something stinks there, and it isn't ghosts.

Tue, 06/22/2004 - 19:21 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

I smell no stink

This is a spooky historic building, with a visitor centre. Presumably a section of the naval employees there are actually performing duties to do with tourist revenue rather than doing anything military. The paranormal research drummed up plenty of media attention from dozens of TV stations and newspapers around the world, and it emphasises the spooky appeal of the dockyard, with its working gallows and ghost legends, so it must have gained Devonport Dockyard lots of extra visitors and cash.

I don't understand what exactly makes this irresponsible. People who make money from the belief in the supernatural range from mystics who will take you under their wing and relieve you of all your material possessions to the authors of ghost stories who exploit the merest twinge of metaphysical doubt to give you a bit of a thrill. Many of the people along this range must be entirely innocent of doing any harm. Perhaps all of them are. People who believe in the paranormal presumably benefit from exploring that belief. Besides, there is a guilty pleasure - which ought not really be guilty - for some of the most sensible people in a pretense of belief in the supernatural. Examples are prayer, pretending to talk with dead loved ones (the very rational Richard Feynman admitted to this), and talking to pets (Churchill). I'm sure we ought not feel guilty for casual flirtation with illogical beliefs, and I don't see how the navy is doing wrong by providing people with the opportunity.

If it was an encyclopedia offering unscientific information, or the navy attempting to develop psychic communication with submarines in a 1960s cold war stylee, I would be disgusted, but we don't rely on the navy's visitor centres for accurate information about the status in reality of ghosts, whereas we do expect them to be entertaining, so the Devonport people have done the right thing.

Pseudoscientists deserve to be constantly debunked, but they are amusing, and are not a credible threat to science, are they?

by a reader on Thu, 06/24/2004 - 17:02 | reply

Churchill's Parrot myth

This isn't relevant to the argument here either way, but it appears that the Churchill parrot story is a myth.

by David Deutsch on Thu, 06/24/2004 - 17:34 | reply

what exactly makes this irresponsible

Why is this irresponsible? One reason (of several) is that the "psychics, mediums and paranormal scientists" will now be able to say in their advertising that they have worked for the Royal Navy. This will, as the title of the World piece says, give credence to their claims.

by David Deutsch on Fri, 06/25/2004 - 19:17 | reply

an idiotarian responds to randi-an spam

hi. new here. found this site in my bookmarks, wasn't sure why, checking it out. you link to tcs, which is a good thing. i'm not sure quite how you use the term idiotarian. but i'm from the lunatic fringe of the libertarian movement, call myself an idiot-savant, and will discuss your claims from that perspective.

The randi link reminded me of nigerian spam. "i have $1 million in negotiable bonds in a european bank, and i need your help getting it out. all you have to do is..." There are no objective criteria to claim the prize, no independent auditor, no formal set of rules applicable to everyone. key terms like occult are left undefined. so if, say, a guy can turn water into wine, and lead into gold, and find water, and diagnose problems with sick buildings, this wouldn't count, if the means were not occult by some moveable definition.

the X prize, as a counterexample, has specific disclosed objective criteria about building and flying a private spacecraft.

back to the naval college. [aside: is that the one at dartmouth? to americans, dartmouth is a college in new hampshire with an arbitrary name, to brits, it's the mouth of the river dart.]
One day, a group of wise men appear, dressed in flowing robes, carrying dowsing rods and such like. We'll call them hercule, sherlock, lord peter, lassie, and fung sueh-tsu.
They sniff, collect samples, walk around, set up equipment to measure auras and orgone flow and such, test dowsing rods, talk to residents, and say they will return when the moon is full to make their report. They speak amongst themselves, muttering occult-sounding spells. 'Aspergillus flavus?' 'serpula lachrymans. phoma.' 'grandfaloons?' 'no, not foma, phoma.'
On the day when the moon is full, they return, and suggest the following. Compact flourescent lighting. A fan to blow outside air from west to east. A radio playing classical music at low volume. And they bring a nightingale in a silver cage, with instructions for its care, but warn that if the bird dies, it should be sent to them at once. "Do these things, and the curse is lifted."
And so it was.
ok, silly story, but my point is that just because somebody calls themself a dowser or an efficiency consultant or a psychic doesn't establish whether or not they are able to solve problems at hand. Lord Peter is a wine expert; he has a sensitive nose which would detect and assess data you or i would miss. doubly true for lassie. some dowsers can smell water, or smell the conditions in which water is found. they may not consciously be aware of what they know and how they know it, but they can locate sites for wells. others can sense the presence of molds and germs which create health problems.
songbirds make inexpensive environmental monitoring systems.
etc.

by a reader on Sun, 06/27/2004 - 16:30 | reply

Randi

I think that the above has an unfair characterization of the Randi Challenge.

It's not that the criteria are subjective. It's just that the test procedures are determined in conjunction with the claimant and tailored to his specific claims. What's wrong with that?

It seems to me that describing the exact test conditions in advance for all conceivable paranormal claims is impractical as well as unfair; as it might provide a good magician with enough information to figure out how to defeat inadequate test conditions.

I don't think that the question of whether or not the claim is paranormal or not is likely to be controversial or unfairly defined. If the reader has some conflicting actual knowledge about this, I'd be very interested to hear about it.

Gil

by Gil on Mon, 06/28/2004 - 17:19 | reply

Plymouth Naval Base

Interesting comments, thank you. However, the Naval project was my own private project and still is, we all reasons for doing things and mine is learning, I hope the amount of money, time and effort I have spent in my studies and research will provide the navy with something concrete, as the organiser of the project I refrained from giving interviews after the investigation, if you can find me a tabloid where I did, I may chase another ghost for you! When you lose someone you love to wherever they may go, isnt it worth knowing more? millions of people who have seen ghosts, including me can't be mad! you never really know someone not here or on the other side so if someone wants to do something for a good cause .. who are you to stop them? and why dont you encourage them instead of discourage them? I never asked nor received any payment for the investigation, further more I have been asked for features for magazines and asked that any compensation be rewarded to the RSPCA, my favourite charity, we have free will, animals don't. We have a choice who we love, animals don't. As I said 'FREEWILL', whether Im criticised or not, I love the paranormal work, its my hobby, its my heart. So is the Naval base haunted? It's your choice to believe or disbelieve. God Bless

by a reader on Tue, 06/29/2004 - 21:47 | reply

Telling The Truth About The Middle East

Go and read Solomonias's transcription [scroll down a little: it's near the top] of a speech by Charles Jacobs at the recent Boston For Israel Rally.

“The distortion is so great I fear many people in Boston cannot see that bus. And I'm afraid that if we filled up this Plaza with buses and pizza parlors, and Passover celebrations and family cars with pregnant wives and little children . all with murdered Jews, many in Boston could not see it. They would dismiss the murder. More than a few would want to blame the Jews.

And so it's time for us to learn how to simply and powerfully to tell the truth.”

Read the whole thing. And the rest of the report is very interesting too.

Fri, 06/25/2004 - 18:19 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Proportional Representation In Iraq

The UN, in its infinite lack of wisdom, has proposed that Iraq should have a proportional representation (PR) election system. The Coalition Provisional Authority has agreed to this.

In PR, the people vote for a party and that party is allocated legislators in proportion to the number of votes they get. The best system is First Past the Post in which people elect a representative in a region rather than a whole country. As we have written before, proportional representation is bad, and we expect Iraq to provide an illustration of this in due course.

What do the Iraqis think? Aside from the Islamists, most Iraqis favour First Past the Post, according to Michael Rubin, Editor of the Middle East Quarterly. Why? Because they distrust political parties. This brings out an important point: In PR, there is simply no room for a candidate who represents local issues.

So why did the UN advocate PR? They say it will allow ethnic minorities to vote together across the country and get their interests represented. But according to Rubin, the fact of the matter on the ground is that these minorities often do not have many interests in common. For example, Shiite Turkmen in Tel Afar have little in common with Turkish speaking people in Erbil or Kirkuk. And of course, any minority that does not have its own party is in deep trouble under PR. Under First Past the Post, if a minority is concentrated in some areas, as Christians are, they could have chosen the candidate that best suited them without having to set up a party.

We guess that the UN has chosen PR more because of their collectivist world-view than any actual analysis of what would be best for Iraq. They think of people in terms of what groups they belong to rather than as individuals, and so they chose the most collectivist form of democracy they could find.

Sat, 06/26/2004 - 18:58 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

I gave some comments earlier

I gave some comments earlier about this issue. So I won't again go into my point that PR also has advantages which the district system does not. But now I am interested in the following:

They think of people in terms of what groups they belong to rather than as individuals, and so they chose the most collectivist form of democracy they could find.

To be sure, any form of democracy is a form of collectivism. But could you expand on the question in what regard do you consider PR to be more collectivist than the district system?

Another point is, if you think that members of parliament should be representatives of their voters, why then should this representation be geographically oriented? In other words, why should people be limited to voting for people living within a certain distance from their home? Why not allow people to vote for any representative country wide (instead of for a political party) and then give each representative a voting power in parliament in proportion to the number of people he represents? For example, if there are 100 seats and person A gets 5% of the vote in the country, he would get 5 votes in parliament. If B gets 1% of the vote, he gets one vote in parliament.

Henry Sturman

by Henry Sturman on Sun, 06/27/2004 - 13:43 | reply

Collectivist PR

'To be sure, any form of democracy is a form of collectivism.'

No. It's an imperfect individualist institution that allows individuals to criticise governments.

'But could you expand on the question in what regard do you consider PR to be more collectivist than the district system?'

In PR you vote for parties not for individuals, thus it is impossible to elect an individual who is not affiliated to a party.

by Alan Forrester on Mon, 06/28/2004 - 01:21 | reply

an idiotarian responds interesting contrarian perspective.

forgot to introduce myself, arbitrary aardvark.

my blog on election law issues is at ballots.blogspot.com.

first past the post systems tend to coalesce into one-party or two-party systems, and offer stability of a sort, and enable strong leaders. sometimes these elected bodies become facades for a strong-man with a military power-base. dissent tends to be limited, to the handful of issues at the location where party a differs, at least nominally, from party b. party c can have input into the debate if it willing to forgo power for truth.

PR does a better job of ensuring oppressed minorities get some voice and a piece of the action. However, some PR systems have had stability issues. Italy. Whether this was due to defects in the form of PR used, or is inherent, i leave to the political scientists - i'm just a lawyer, and a crazy one.

I spent much of my life working with the LP in the USA. Over 30 years, it's never elected a congresscritter, and most of its state reps have been in pockets where PR or fusion is allowed.

Here and there, the lp is emerging as a second party in one-party districts, but that is rare and mostly accidental.

The LP is as successful as it is precisely because it occupies a niche no one else wants. If therewere a move to PR, there would be lots of small parties, each looking after their own bloc or issue.

Currently, these tend to be factions within the two big parties.

The serious players have factions in both the big parties.

by a reader on Mon, 06/28/2004 - 01:27 | reply

huh?

You are (deliberately?) confusing two orthogonal concepts.

You shouldn't complain about PR because you want local representatives. The two have nothing to do with each other.

You should complain about having a single national constituency if you prefer local representatives.

Single Transferrable Vote PR-alike systems are fairer than first past the post, and can be used for local candidates.

by a reader on Mon, 06/28/2004 - 14:32 | reply

elitism

The appeal of PR for the UN may lie in simple elitism rather than in "collectivism". Ensuring that people vote for a "party" rather than individuals inserts an extra layer of abstraction between people and their leaders. This allows for some amount of control of who gets seats, at the party level, by elites in the proverbial smoke filled rooms. (Honestly, being in the US I have no idea how a party's "slate" (is that the word?) is chosen in PR.) The UN may hope to influence or control this process or at least have some reason to believe that the people who likely will, will do a "good" job of it by whatever criteria the UN has.

There may be some value in doing this, for reasons along lines outlined by reader #1 above, i.e. fear that direct "first past the post" elections (I don't quite understand that phrase - whaddya mean "first"? how did time enter this equation? - except that I know it's what the US has :) would lead to a stable but no-dissent strongman. (Although isn't that what the UN wants for Iraq? ;-)

However persuasive that reasoning may be, myself I oppose PR for my country and thus do not wish it on Iraqis. Of course, there are many things I would not wish for myself and do not wish on Iraqis to which they will be nevertheless subjected; the UN nontrivially influencing the direction of their country, for example. This PR thing is just an artifact of that, larger, tragedy IMHO.

--Blix

PR

Proportional Representation is not "just one thing" (in terms of election system)

Proportional Representation is in general achieved, more or less, in all other election systems but the single-seat-district system.

That is, it is kind of "ignorant" to say "this or that" about PR without specifying what the actual election system is, as well as what the political, economic, regional, historic, social, etc, etc realities are.

PR is often done per regions, to achieve Local Representation.

PR in general uses "Party lists", but they can either so-called "Closed Lists", the order pre-done before the election, or "Open Lists", the order is according to the personal votes the candidates get.

For larger populations PR is usually implemented through a "mixed" system, 50% of seats through local districts, 50% through larger region lists, closed or open. Furthermore the possibilities of having two votes, one local FPTP vote and one PR vote, or one must chose in which system one votes (nationwide party or local person).

That is, there are a minimum of two basic, major different dimensions to PR-systems, plus a handful of others.

Btw, Italy has actually been very stable, they have just had the same party shuffle some seats in the government every year... (additionally I doubt that many non-Italians understand what their election system is, it just as a much an election system as an PR system as an FPTP system, plus much more)

For anyone who wants to understand some of the basics (from an anglo-american perspective), some of it explained in these lectures http://www.citizensassembly.bc.ca/public/learning_resources/learning_materials/av

PPS I was actually searching fro that Bremer edict on Iraq getting the worst and most extreme of all PR systems, the one with a nationwide closed partylist, ridiculous to define something like that from USA...

PR

Btw, AEI did a "thing" on this topic today, somewhat tragic and funny.

http://www.aei.org/events/eventID.853,filter./event_detail.asp

SIkorski, frmr polish "Nato-guy", said

- americans do not usually understand PR

- then he talked about how bad PR is, repeated all the ignorant stuff, then that Poland is reforming, etc..

the funny one

- at the ends he recommended a PR system based on a mixed system..

That is, he obviously knew "it", but talked kind of differently until the very end..

by a reader on Tue, 06/29/2004 - 23:05 | reply

PR

are mostly for Nations who are already "stuck" with single-seat-districts, a certain number of seats on parliament, and can neither

- combine former single-seat-districts to larger districts nor multimember districts

- add more seats to the parliament

Compare all those former single-seat-winner-takes-all anglo-american nations which already have changed, Australia, New Zealand, Ireland, North Ireland, Wales, Scotland..Malta... most former colonies..

Even India has a PR senate..

Fairly well explained in that British COlumbia link I gave above

http://www.aei.org/events/eventID.853,filter./event_detail.asp

That is, seems Canada too has come to the end of FPTP...

by a reader on Tue, 06/29/2004 - 23:12 | reply

PR

Correction, addition to the comment above, I had included it as a comment to

"Single Transferrable Vote PR-alike systems " as in old newsgroup style, but it became html-tags..

by a reader on Tue, 06/29/2004 - 23:15 | reply

PR

However, this a good explanation for nation wide list, although it does not specify "Open" or "Closed" lists

=====

The U.N. team decided that January's election for a 275-member national assembly will use a system of proportional representation based on lists. With the signatures of just 500 supporters, political parties, political groups and individuals can submit a list with up to 275 candidates' names to contest the election.

"I'm very much aware that one of the problems this election might have is intimidation of candidates," Perelli said.

"It is for this reason that choosing proportional representation at a national level - removing the politics from just the local level where people can be easily identified and taken down - is an extra layer of security for the candidates."

But Perelli said special measures will still be needed to use "the full powers" of Iraq's judicial system and the commission "to basically not allow people who make acts of intimidation to run for the election."

The commission and U.N. advisers also must guard against the intimidation of electoral authorities, election workers and observers, and voters, she said.

"The whole issue of fear is going to be a theme in this election," Perelli said, explaining that it is essential to overcome "the culture of fear" that surrounded elections under Saddam Hussein.

"This election will work as long as Iraqis start to trust the process" and recognize that their votes will be secret, "that the possibilities of retaliation against them are going to be minimized, that the electoral authority is going to play a fair game ... (and) that the vulnerable will be able to express their voice," she said.

Perelli said she believes "a silent majority" of Iraqis is eager to vote if "they were certain that there's not going to be a retribution or a retaliation."

=====

<http://www.iraq.net/printarticle4284.html>

by a reader on Tue, 06/29/2004 - 23:22 | reply

Re: Collectivist PR

"It's an imperfect individualist institution that allows individuals to criticize governments." It allows the criticism of certain government institutions, but does it allow criticism of (democracy) itself? A monarchy could allow criticism of the monarch (e.g. "Prince Philip would be a better king than King Richard") but not allow criticism of the institution of monarchy.

Could armed revolt be considered another institution that allows individuals to criticize governments?

by a reader on Wed, 06/30/2004 - 00:16 | reply

Two Clashes Of Cultures

Today President Bush enraged President Chirac and many other denizens of Old Europe by strongly endorsing the entry of Turkey into the European Union.

President Bush said on Tuesday that Turkey belongs in the European Union and that Europe is "not the exclusive club of a single religion" in what amounted to a rejection of French President Jacques Chirac.

[...]

Bush held up Turkey as an example of a Muslim democracy and said its entry to the EU would be "a crucial advance in relations between the Muslim world and the West, because you are part of both."

"Including Turkey in the EU would prove that Europe is not the exclusive club of a single religion, and it would expose the 'clash of civilizations' as a passing myth of history," Bush said.

Mr Chirac, as is his custom, responded not by addressing what was said but by complaining about who was saying it:

Chirac said on Monday that Bush should not comment on Turkey's EU entry hopes as EU affairs were none of his business.

[...]

"It is like me trying to tell the United States how it should manage its relations with Mexico," he added.

Indeed. Or with Iraq?

Anyway, this clash between the two Presidents nicely encapsulates the difference between two rival conceptions of the European Union. In one conception, it is a glorified Customs Union, in which the members solemnly promise not to prevent the free exchange of goods and services, or the free movement of workers or tourists, from one member state to another. It could also regulate such things as the colours of electrical wiring, so that goods manufactured in one member state do not cause unnecessary shocks in another. This conception has largely been realized, and is on balance a good thing. In the other conception, the EU is a new European nation, complete with armed forces and a unified foreign policy and taxation system, outranking all its members' existing institutions and becoming a 'counterweight' (i.e. an enemy) to the United States in world politics.

The latter vision is insane as well as thoroughly bad in every detail. Nevertheless, it is widely held in Europe, and the conflict between that and the sane conception of the EU, which is also widely held, is the real 'clash of civilisations', or cultures, that is relevant to this issue. This is the reason for President Chirac's visceral rejection of EU membership for Turkey. For in his conception of what 'EU membership' would mean, not only would unlimited numbers of Turkish people be able to trade freely, travel and work in France, to the benefit of all, they would be able to vote there.

By the way, as long as that other clash of civilizations remains unresolved – between Islamofascism and the rest of the world including in particular the secular half of Turkish political culture – we should regard Turkish membership of even the first type of EU with some suspicion. But if carefully implemented, it could help the right side to prevail in both clashes.

Tue, 06/29/2004 - 17:57 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Trading EU seats for support

Why didn't Bush invited Turkey into unified US of A & T?

If you don't like EU economy or politics then why would you advise your friend to go into it? How can Bush possibly promise Turkey to assist with EU membership?

Many questions like this can be raised. Not all of them are irrational.

by a reader on Thu, 07/01/2004 - 09:04 | reply

Turkey and the EU

As surprising as it might seem, even though the EU is a festering pool of economically illiterate surrender monkeys with delusions of grandeur, there are worse people, like the group to whom they want to surrender.

by Alan Forrester on Sat, 11/20/2004 - 02:10 | reply

Turkey and bush

its just not right to do things like that even if you are President

by kristie on Wed, 11/24/2004 - 02:18 | reply

you are so right

you are so right

by kristie Leigh on Wed, 11/24/2004 - 02:20 | reply

Copyright © 2007 Setting The World To Rights

Solidarity With Terror

Lee Kaplan has just returned from infiltrating the International Solidarity Movement of which Rachel Corrie was a member:

This June I attended a "training session" of the International Solidarity Movement (ISM), an organization of volunteers whose purpose is to obstruct Israeli defense forces attempting to protect the civilian population from terrorist acts. The ISM was set up by the Palestinians after Arafat broke off the Oslo peace talks and launched the second intifada. [...] The idea was to bring in international volunteers, mostly radical students from the United States, Canada and Europe, as "nonviolent peace activists" who would interfere with the Israeli army's anti-terrorist operations

Kaplan's report makes grimly fascinating reading. We found it via Wretchard, at Belmont Club, whose comments are, as usual, apt. But he concludes:

One of the grandest educations in life is to observe the hard Left operate in cold blood at close quarters. While it may not confirm your belief in the god of history it will infallibly cement your conviction in the existence of the Devil.

Well, it has not had that effect on us. There is nothing supernatural about evil. At root, it is nothing but error. There is room for hope that in due course, despite the ISM's manipulative techniques and closed ideology, some of Lee Kaplan's fellow-inductees at that training session will come to understand what he understood going in. For they too are about to observe the Hard Left at close quarters.

Fri, 07/02/2004 - 21:19 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

At root, it is nothing but error.

"At root, [evil] is nothing but error".

Then morality is not based on good faith. How do you make a moral distinction between someone who makes an error in good faith and someone who makes a moral error--that is, someone who chooses to do evil? If it is just a mistake about the structure of moral reality, how is that morally any different from making a mistake about the structure of physical or sociological reality? Can't you choose to do evil even though you have roughly as good an understanding of moral reality as people who choose to do good?

by a reader on Sat, 07/03/2004 - 15:59 | reply

Sorting out errors

If someone wants to do bad then that's just a deeper error. He arrived at that state of mind by an accumulation of previous errors made in good faith.

So, yes, he can "choose to do evil even though [he has] roughly as good an understanding of moral reality as people who choose to do good". This is a bad hangup or flaw, which he eventually identified by exposing himself to criticism. The first step to curing the flaw is to understand why the theory and behaviour it promotes can expect to fail by their own terms. Next he has to invent and carefully establish some preventative good habits, being extra-cautious at the beginning. He must ensure that he has enough in the way of absorbing creative projects to sustain him through this difficult period. Finally, if possible and fitting he should make restitution for any harm done.

Only the last step applies to people who make an honest error. That is the distinction.

Btw, if I missed something or anyone knows another general way to eliminate character flaws pls comment or mail me.

by Tom Robinson on Sat, 07/03/2004 - 21:43 | reply

Re: Sorting out errors

One can contrast this approach (the willingness to expose ones theories to criticism) with this example:

"If God does not exist, and if religion is an illusion that the majority of men cannot live without...let men believe in the lies of religion since they cannot do without them, and let then a handful of sages, who know the truth and can live with it, keep it among themselves. Men are then divided into the wise and the foolish, the philosophers and the common men, and atheism becomes a guarded, esoteric doctrine - for if the illusions of religion were to be discredited, there is no telling with what madness men would be seized, with what uncontrollable anguish."

Irving Kristol, founder of neoconservatism

by a reader on Sun, 07/04/2004 - 12:39 | reply

dear everyone,

The World: I disagree that evil is error. Maybe with a broad enough meaning of error, this view could be convergent with the truth. But it's a terrible way to analyse current situations. Much like "there aren't good and evil people, just some people make more mistakes than others" would almost certainly lead to confusion.

a reader: morality isn't based on good faith. (please say intentions not faith. faith has a whole different meaning about faith in God) having honorable intentions is important certainly, but it's not everything.

tom: "a deeper error" is one description for someone who wants to do bad. but i think there are other ones that are more right-leading (opposite of misleading :D). even calling him evil seems to me to get the point across better. or "he means badly" is pretty good. describing things as an error leaves out key information.

a reader and tom: can a man understand morality and choose evil? well, sorta. if he understood enough, he would not want to choose evil. if he does choose evil, and someone else chooses good, we must suspect the good person knows something the evil one does not, and that this something is very critical. but it is possible the good person knows little else about morality, and the evil one knows all sorts of other things about morality (though rare-ish. ppl w/ good morality learn better. ppl w/ evil morality learn worse)

Irving: I see the conservatism, but that view sounds pretty ancient ;-P

Elliot Temple, The Most Curious Person In The World

by Elliot Temple on Sun, 07/04/2004 - 17:00 | reply

Don't want to mislead

Elliot,

I don't think that evil is synonymous with error. I don't think that the World does either (the World being one of the very few places that espouses a rational, scientific and practical world view which includes room for right and wrong). I see the point that describing evil individuals as merely error-bound isn't sufficient, and could be misleading.

However, many people are routinely misled in another important way when the subject of evil is brought up. They think of rushing winds, devils in black cloaks and other supernatural stuff. So they either choose to ignore evil (by pretending it doesn't exist) or they fail to deal with it adequately (by, say, confining their response to prayer).

Describing the nature of evil as being rooted in error IMO is beneficial in three ways. Firstly, it repudiates the unhelpful satanic nonsense. Secondly, if we could rewind a bad person's personal history, we'd find that his evil streak grew in response to one or more honourable errors. Finally, it reflects the fact that he could in principle be made to agree that he has been making mistakes (even by his own terms). (Evil streak == cluster of false ideas and bad intentions). His values have become inconsistent, the hallmark of evil being not that it causes suffering to others, as it often does, but that it is self-defeating.

Fighting evil is a different matter. It must be condemned, thwarted, mocked, avoided, extirpated, neutralised, refuted and destroyed!

by Tom Robinson on Sun, 07/04/2004 - 23:13 | reply

me talk more now

I believe, as demonstrated by fantasy worlds with magic, that self-defeating is not a sufficient description of evil. (acting in ways we consider wrong would sometimes lead to great success in such a world. at least by the normal criteria such a world.)

I think all The World did was misspeak a bit.

I agree there is useful truth in the evil as error idea, but I take exception to "at its root, it is nothing but" i think devils in black cloaks are a straw man. that may be how many morality-deniers see evil (or claim to...), but if you listen to even very religious people carefully, they seem to associate evil with things like tyrants and oppression. And I think they would welcome a freedom fighter who wore a black cloak.

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 07/05/2004 - 00:12 | reply

Re:dear everyone,

I think you might have misunderstood my comment. I think the fear of truth is the starting point of evil, i.e. pretending and wishful thinking instead of facing reality; to the point where the "illusion" becomes more important than reality. Yet this is precisely what Mr. Kristol is advocating. That illusion should win out over reality.

by a reader on Mon, 07/05/2004 - 01:31 | reply

Re:dear everyone,

a reader,

i guess i did. ah well.

I agree that Mr. Kristol's view is bad. it's very pessimistic.

i agree that deluding yourself to avoid difficult propositions is very bad (I'm used to the terminology: failing to take XXX proposition seriously). however, i deny it's the starting point of evil; I don't think such a thing exists. there are many different evil things, and things to know about evil. put them all together, you get a complete description of evil. I don't think it makes sense to try to call one the start or primary. you can start wherever you like and still get to the right answer.

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 07/05/2004 - 02:41 | reply

Not a sufficient description, but the key property acting in ways we consider wrong would sometimes lead to great success in such a world

True, and the key word is sometimes. If we replayed history, or equivalently examined nearby segments of the multiverse, we'd find a very different set of villains and dictators. Evil can succeed by chance. But for each success there is a graveyard of failures. People of good character would succeed more often, especially in the respectable professions.

Also, the normal criteria of success are usually connected to external stuff - money, houses, career title, etc. However: what shall it profit a man, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul? Can he still enjoy his money, houses and public prestige? If not, can he find new growth elsewhere? Evil is self-defeating. (Doesn't this follow logically from morality being about getting what you want?)

by Tom Robinson on Mon, 07/05/2004 - 21:30 | reply

SLAY (subject lines are yucky)

Tom,

Maybe wishing to rule the world or dominate men is self-defeating with our physics, but no one has an argument that this must be so. And it isn't in some fantasy worlds. Sure, it may be difficult, but it can be done. Raistlin defeated the Gods, both good and evil, in a Dragonlance series (he was an evil mage). He didn't become powerful despite his path through life and simply by good luck -- his path of evil made him strong.

In Castle Greyhawk, there's a dungeon level with a bunch of orcs, ogres, bugbears and such. They are pretty incompetent and bored. They wish to find an evil demon to serve. And if they succeeded in that, and became evil lackeys, it would by their standards be a great success and improvement.

I also, again, deny there is such thing as a key property to what evil is.

Evil is self-defeating. (Doesn't this follow logically from morality being about getting what you want?)

That would only follow if your premise was not just an aspect of morality but the entirety.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 07/05/2004 - 23:11 | reply

Copyright © 2007 Setting The World To Rights

Conspiracy Theories Kill And Cripple On Schedule

A few months ago we reported on a lunatic conspiracy theory adopted by the Islamist authorities in Kano, northern Nigeria: Islamism, Lunatic Conspiracy Theories, And Death. Their holy men had told them that that the polio vaccine donated by America had been poisoned in a plot to sterilise Nigerian Muslims. We remarked:

Conspiracy theories kill. And cripple.

Unfortunately, this is now happening in Kano:

An outbreak of polio has hit children in the Nigerian state of Kano. Kano is one of the Muslim states that had boycotted the use of the polio vaccine. Many Muslim states in Nigeria banned the polio vaccine because those in charge said the Americans were using the vaccines to make their population infertile. Many of them said the vaccine would also be used to spread AIDS in the region. Despite appeals from neighbouring countries to vaccinate its population, the conspiracy theorists in Nigeria got their way.

Now, as expected, polio is beginning to spread among children in the region. Now the local authorities are appealing for urgent assistance.

What sort of assistance do they mean? Regime change? Well, they're not going to get that as a gift from the West. Nor would it be right if they did. Yet nothing less can prevent such obscenities – and far worse ones – from happening again. And again. It is a terrible shame.

Sat, 07/03/2004 - 23:22 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

In The Tradition Of Roosevelt

Scott Ott of Scappleface urges the Democratic Party to adopt the war philosophy of President Franklin Delano Roosevelt:

"We are not a warlike people. We have never sought glory as a nation of warriors. We are not interested in aggression. We are not interested--as the dictators are-- in looting. We do not covet one square inch of the territory of any other nation. Our vast effort, and the unity of purpose which inspires that effort are due solely to our recognition of the fact that our fundamental rights are threatened...These rights were established by our forefathers on the field of battle. They have been defended--at great cost but with great success--on the field of battle, here on our own soil, and in foreign lands, and on all the seas all over the world. There has never been a moment in our history when Americans were not ready to stand up as free men and fight for their rights."
[Radio address from Hyde Park Library, September 1, 1941]

The contrast between Roosevelt's values and those of the inheritors of his party today is stark and depressing. One could equally well quote a more recent President from the same party:

The world is very different now. For man holds in his mortal hands the power to abolish all forms of human poverty and all forms of human life. And yet the same revolutionary beliefs for which our forebears fought are still at issue around the globe--the belief that the rights of man come not from the generosity of the state but from the hand of God.

We dare not forget today that we are the heirs of that first revolution. Let the word go forth from this time and place, to friend and foe alike, that the torch has been passed to a new generation of Americans--born in this century, tempered by war, disciplined by a hard and bitter peace, proud of our ancient heritage--and unwilling to witness or permit the slow undoing of those human rights to which this nation has always been committed, and to which we are committed today at home and around the world.

Let every nation know, whether it wishes us well or ill, that we shall pay any price, bear any burden, meet any hardship, support any friend, oppose any foe to assure the survival and the success of liberty.

This much we pledge--and more. [President John F
Kennedy, Inaugural Address, January 20, 1961.]

Some time between then and now, something terrible happened to the Democratic Party. And therefore to America, and the world.

Mon, 07/05/2004 - 13:27 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

here's a difference

the second speech twice mentions enemy nations. it seems to take it for granted there are such things. this defeats JFK's message, because according to the message rather than talking to these enemy nations he ought to be blowing them up.

i think two major, related parts of what changed are: the left got friendly with atheism, and the left adopted mechanical pseudovalues and began trying to see the world in terms of them (this is evident when they try to analyse moral choices in terms of:
greed, money, multilateral agreement, number of dead soldiers, number of dead civilians, or the root cause of terrorism is that we do things that upset their ideology. they don't seem to notice that the ideology itself is immoral and invalid.)

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 07/05/2004 - 16:41 | reply

Changes

I'd like to add another factor regarding this change. Whenever the Democratic Party is in power, the change is not as big as it may now seem. President Clinton was also prepared to defend liberty at home and abroad with military might. See Serbia and Somalia. Now the fact is, those were very bad choices for military interference, but it does demonstrate the principle that Democrats are not always pacifists. They are only pacifists when the Republicans are in power.
Democrats do not oppose the war in Irak because they oppose the war in Irak. They oppose the ware in Irak because they oppose President Bush. If Clinton had gone to war in Irak, all of them would be cheering about the liberation of Irak.

A pacifist is someone who lets other people fight his wars.

A pacifist is someone who prefers slavery over war.

Henry Sturman

by Henry Sturman on Tue, 07/06/2004 - 10:54 | reply

Copyright © 2007 Setting The World To Rights

Released Guantanamo Detainees Return To Battle

This via [Belmont Club]

"We've already had instances where we know that people who have been released from our detention have gone back and have become combatants again," said Rep. Porter J. Goss, Florida Republican, chairman of the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence.

is reminiscent of this.

Fri, 07/09/2004 - 02:02 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Don't release them after you torture them!

by a reader on Sat, 07/10/2004 - 22:50 | reply

Riiight

When faced with theories:

a) These are zealous combatants whose commitment to killing for their cause is much stronger than their concern over repeated detention by Americans.

and

b) These are innocent people who happened to end up in American detention and turned to active combat because of American torture.

What kind of person thinks b) is more plausible?

Gil

by Gil on Sun, 07/11/2004 - 19:50 | reply

Re: Riiight

I didn't say "These are innocent people who happened to end up in American detention and turned to active combat because of American torture." I wanted to bring up torture because "The World" consistently ignores or glazes over aspects of reality that don't fit their "theories". e.g. That the Guantanamo detentions are in violation of the Geneva Convention - that the U.S. signed. The the Bush admin violated the U.S. Constitution requiring a declaration of war - in which case they would be POWs not illegal combatants. Of course "The World" in its wisdom knows that it is OK to violate such documents as long as you are working for a "higher" moral purpose.

by a reader on Tue, 07/13/2004 - 01:53 | reply

making things up..?

when has the world ever invoked argument by "higher" moral purpose? source plz.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 07/13/2004 - 04:42 | reply

to 1:53 GMT

I'm against torture and all, but

1. Detained unlawful combatants (to the extent that these are who is housed at Gitmo) do not enjoy Geneva Convention protections. That's their fault not ours, for having engaged in some set of behaviors or another which causes them not to fit the definition of people covered by the Geneva Conventions. (People tend to assume the Geneva Conventions (of which there are more than one) all say something akin to "Signatories must be Nice to all people under all circumstances"; this is not the case.) There may be some being held at Gitmo who do fit the definition of someone covered by Geneva Convention protections - we'd have to check - but I don't guess you know one way or the other any more than I do. If so (it's certainly possible), those individual cases ought to be remedied to be sure they are being given GC-conforming treatment.

Of course, none of that need entail releasing them back into Afghanistan anytime in the near future.

2. Whether they are illegal combatants is not determined per se by whether the US declared war. On the other hand, someone in the Bush admin may have actually made that argument (I don't know - it does sound familiar). What I do know is that the US Declaring War would not automatically transmogrify all belligerents into legal combatants entitled to full GC protections. It doesn't really work that way, they have to satisfy some criteria (chain of command, distinguishing mark or uniform, can't engage in war crimes, etc.)

(Incidentally a better bet for you here, if you want to complain about torture, is just to bring up the international treaty on torture (I'm not sure that's what it's called), which I believe the US has signed...you would actually have a point there, probably...).

3. The "War Powers authorization" system of commencing war is not my favorite thing in the world, but it has passed Constitutional muster according to the Supreme Court, and anyway, if the Bush admin violated the Constitution in commencing a war within the rubric of the War Powers Act, then so did the Clinton admin, Bush 1 admin, etc. And at least they did their thing under an actual Congressional act; for Korea and Vietnam they just kinda called them "police actions"... As I'm sure you well know there's been no "Declaration of War" since WW2, making this kind of a silly complaint.

--Blix

by a reader on Tue, 07/13/2004 - 07:50 | reply

Re: making things up..?

I don't mean "higher" in the sense of a "higher authority", only in the sense that the of waging war seems highest value - to which all other values are subordinate. But there is more to it than that; "The World" doesn't even acknowledge that certain values might be significant (such as constitutionality). This implies to me that "The World" has contempt for such values - that the end justifies the means.

by a reader on Wed, 07/14/2004 - 23:55 | reply

Bizarre

Some bloke wrote:

'I don't mean "higher" in the sense of a "higher authority", only in the sense that the of waging war seems highest value - to which all other values are subordinate.'

Waging war is not a high value, it the least crappy of a crappy set of choices.

'But there is more to it than that; "The World" doesn't even acknowledge that certain values might be significant (such as constitutionality).'

We don't fetishise the Constitution and mention it all the time. America might be a better place in some ways if the US government stuck to the powers awarded to it by the Constitution. However, I fail to see the relevance of this as it would still require the government to defend America and part of that would involve fighting a war against Islamists, rogue regimes and so on who want to murder Americans.

'This implies to me that "The World" has contempt for such values - that the end justifies the means.'

A bizarre interpretation of the World's writings to match a bizarre complaint about them.

by Alan Forrester on Thu, 07/15/2004 - 01:03 | reply

Where does it end?

If "the world" has no problem with violating the constitution to wage war what else is it willing to accept? Rounding up people with arabic sounding names? How about conscription? Here's your chance "The World". Tell us...is the war still worth fighting if our children are forced into the military? Come on TCSer's, carefully nurture your children - so we can throw them into the meat grinder when they turn 18!

So what if you end up becoming more like your enemy, it is still worth it.

by a reader on Fri, 07/16/2004 - 03:50 | reply

err

Are you saying that rounding up arabs into camps is only wrong b/c of what the Constitution says?

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Fri, 07/16/2004 - 15:41 | reply

No...

I'm asking what other (presumably) values "The World" would abandon in the name of fighting Islamists.

by a reader on Sat, 07/17/2004 - 01:20 | reply

If...

...you were a tree...

'If "the world" has no problem with violating the constitution to wage war what else is it willing to accept?'

Yes, that tricky word 'if'. Meaning 'on condition that' in this context. I have yet to see any specific allegation about what part of the Constitution you think the World is in favour of violating.

by Alan Forrester on Sun, 07/18/2004 - 01:02 | reply

International Money Fountain

Jeffrey Sachs, an economic advisor to Kofi Annan, has said that African countries should renege on their debts:

“The time has come to end this charade. The debts are unaffordable,” said Jeffrey Sachs, director of the Earth Institute at Columbia University and special adviser to Annan on global anti-poverty targets. “If they won't cancel the debts I would suggest obstruction; you do it yourselves.”

No doubt many of them will follow this advice, for the simple reason that they never had any intention of paying their debts. Many of them are torn apart by civil war and/or ruled by vicious thug regimes that are the very reasons why they are poor in the first place. They are obviously not good loan risks. So who is lending to them?

The short answer is taxpayers. The somewhat longer answer is the International Monetary Fund (IMF). For all practical purposes, the IMF is a tax funded institution for showering money on governments. But not all governments qualify. Only those who have caused economic catastrophes in their countries.

The IMF also showers these governments with advice (often bad advice) on how to be more financially responsible. However, whether or not the governments follow this advice, the IMF will usually keep 'lending' them money anyway.

This pretence that the IMF (directly or through its pretend-bank, the World Bank) is giving loans is indeed a silly and destructive charade. It causes companies to invest in non-viable projects in non-viable countries on the understanding that they will be wholly or partially bailed out if it all goes wrong. If Western governments really insist on giving money to charity they should insist on giving it to suffering people, not those who make them suffer. The only good reasons for a government to give money to another government are strategic or military ones, or as payment for doing something they want them to do, like fighting terrorism. The hostile and/or bad governments who form the IMF's main client base deserve nothing. And the IMF itself should be closed down.

Damned, good post. --Blix

by a reader on Mon, 07/12/2004 - 22:22 | reply

Good Article

The IMF is clearly the guarantor (or partial guarantor) of bad credit of their rather unmandated choice and should be scrapped.

However (re 1st bit of last para)

I don't really see the effective difference between the IMF/World Bank in this role or if they were partially or wholly funding the loans themselves ...or have I missed something? Doesn't a guarantee or unguaranteed loan have, in this case, the same exposure?

by a reader on Tue, 07/13/2004 - 15:58 | reply

Insane Conspiracy Theories In Influential Circles

The significant, often determining role played by insane conspiracy theories in current affairs is being dangerously underestimated. Here are some that have been espoused recently by prominent people:

- The Supreme Leader of Iran, Ayatollah Khamenei, thinks that the United States and Israel are behind the recent spate of kidnappings and beheadings of foreign nationals in Iraq.
- Crown Prince Abdullah, the de facto ruler of Saudi Arabia, is 95% certain that the recent terrorist attacks against Westerners and oil installations in Saudi Arabia were perpetrated by "Zionists". Other Saudi officials were quick to agree and expand on this thesis: Prince Nayef, the Saudi Interior Minister said, "Al-Qaida is backed by Israel and Zionism."
- A successful popular song in the United States contains the lyrics "Why did Bush knock down the Towers?" Jadakiss, the singer, commented: "A lot of my people felt that he [Bush] had something to do with [the destruction of the World Trade Center]."
- Michael Moore's conspiracy-theory-laden movie Fahrenheit 9/11 won the Palme d'Or at Cannes and is enjoying huge success at the box office.
- Yasser Arafat has said that the recent bus bombing in Tel Aviv was masterminded by Israel. (The attack was in fact carried out by his own Aksa Martyrs Brigades terrorists.)
- Vanessa Redgrave, the celebrated actress and United Nations 'Goodwill Ambassador' has stated as fact that Israeli snipers habitually murder Palestinian schoolchildren in their classrooms.

No mother could possibly be accustomed to the fact that her little girl will go to school "and will sit with her classmates and an Israeli sniper will shoot at a classroom full of Palestinian children who are in their uniforms with their little scarves," she said in Jerusalem.

"Any Palestinian mother or schoolchild knows that a schoolchild who is dressed in the uniform can be and is frequently shot in the head – not in the chest, not in the legs, in the head,” she said,

Leaders of countries, role models, and shapers of opinion are affected just as much as billions of people not in the public eye. Anyone who wants to understand world affairs today has to take on board that extreme irrationality of this type, often with a powerful antisemitic component, is a major determinant of opinions and actions worldwide. Restricting one's attention to the factors more usually considered, such as political or economic self-interest, ideology, nationalism, or even strategy or tactics, is like denying the role of viruses in causing influenza.

Tue, 07/13/2004 - 13:22 | permalink

Can make a modest contribution

Woman oppression in muslim countries is caused (allegedly) by US politics, because: 1) US created Bin Laden, 2) "supports illegal regimes" of Saudi family and Iran's shakh (in the past). Afganistan, Iran and Saudi Arabia represent the worst woman oppression examples - USA is to blame.

How do you like this sort of logic?

See for yourself:

<http://www.fpif.org/pdf/vol5/30ifwomen.pdf>

by a reader on Tue, 07/13/2004 - 15:22 | reply

Goodwill...?

I'm sensing Vanessa Redgrave doesn't understand the term 'Goodwill Ambassador'. Just a hunch, not quite sure where it came from.

by Alan Forrester on Thu, 07/15/2004 - 01:09 | reply

Michael Moore

See also this site and this one about Michael Moore.

Henry Sturman

by Henry Sturman on Fri, 07/16/2004 - 12:43 | reply

“Worth Achieving At Any Cost”

The Times claims to have inside information that the Bush Administration is planning to “act to foment revolt” in Iran, in order to achieve regime change there without military action. A pre-emptive strike on Iran's nuclear-weapons manufacturing facilities is also allegedly mooted.

Of course, Iran vitriolically denies having any such facilities.

However, at at the end of the article, we find:

Despite the US threats one of Iran’s top ruling clerics vowed yesterday that the Islamic republic would continue to pursue its controversial nuclear programme. “We are resolute. It is worth achieving it at any cost,” Ayatollah Ahmad Jannati, head of the Guardians Council, said.

Yes: increasing Iran's electricity supply by 1% outweighs any other national goal and is worth achieving at all costs.

That is what their nuclear programme is for, isn't it?

Sun, 07/18/2004 - 00:35 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

1%?

Not that the figure sounds very far off, just curious where The World got its projection of 1% electricity increase. Is it a guess or a calculated value? Of course, even it was significantly more, its still not worth achieving "at all costs".

by a reader on Mon, 07/19/2004 - 20:27 | reply

Re: 1%

It was a pure guess.

A more accurate guess would be:

Iran's annual electricity production: 124.6 billion kWh (2001), which is equivalent to a power of about 14GW. The installed capacity must be at least that. Capacity of the power station under construction: 1GW. So the proposed increase in capacity is no more than 7%.

Close enough.

by Editor on Mon, 07/19/2004 - 21:14 | reply

Re: 1%

Yes, but that's the wrong calculation.

If this was really about increasing electric power, you'd have to subtract from your 7% the electricity they would get by spending the same money on conventional power stations. So the net increase might be 1% after all. Or even negative.

by a reader on Tue, 07/20/2004 - 04:12 | reply

Nothing There To Vote For

Michael Howard is now sounding increasingly like a parody of himself. His latest statement on Iraq is that he would not have voted to go to war in Iraq on the basis of WMD if he had known about flaws in the intelligence. But...

Mr Howard said he could not have backed the Commons pre-war motion on WMD, but he would have still supported going to war by backing a different motion.

Intellectually, this is pure sophistry. Politically, it is yet more cynical opportunism, designed for nothing other than to pick up a few careless votes by provoking the inevitable headline "Howard changes mind on WMD vote".

Several leading Conservatives have made similar noises. But if a political party gives up on the quaint old idea of having political positions and arguing in their favour, who can support it? What is there to support?

Thu, 07/22/2004 - 23:35 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink erm, how will this get him votes?

NT

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Fri, 07/23/2004 - 02:30 | reply

But...

... where is Bin Laden?

by a reader on Sat, 07/24/2004 - 18:55 | reply

in answer to your non sequitur

Bin Laden's dead. --Blix

by a reader on Mon, 07/26/2004 - 22:37 | reply

dead people still have a location

(or multiple locations)

so your answer isn't really an answer ;-p

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 07/26/2004 - 23:48 | reply

Re: dead people still have a location

Not necessarily, since atoms of a given element are fungible.

by David Deutsch on Tue, 07/27/2004 - 00:16 | reply

touche

Well either way, Elliot's got me there, I didn't really answer the question. ;-)

by a reader on Tue, 07/27/2004 - 01:27 | reply

It was an answer

I think your response implied that the question had no answer in the form of a location.

I think most questions really mean "Tell me what I'm asking for, or explain why what I'm asking for doesn't make sense, or can't be answered in the way I expect. I don't want a false answer just for the sake of giving me something in the form I requested... I want a response that satisfies me so that I don't have to keep asking the question. I would consider such a response an answer."

Gil

by Gil on Tue, 07/27/2004 - 17:28 | reply

Yeah but

I was gonna say something like that Gil, but I didn't want to arrogantly presume to speak for A Reader @18:55 by telling him what his question "really" was. Maybe he really did want to know where Bin Laden's remains are! And if so, I didn't, and couldn't, answer his question. ;-)

by a reader on Tue, 07/27/2004 - 18:31 | reply

Speaking For Others

What Blix meant to say is that speaking for other people is a great idea, and hard to mess up.

-- Elliot

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 07/28/2004 - 01:25 | reply

I don't understand this post.

I don't understand this post. Michael Howard would not have voted to go to war in Iraq on the basis of WMD if he had known about flaws in the intelligence. But he would have voted to go to war based on other arguments. That seems like an entirely consistent, logical, clear and good view point to me. What is your point?

Henry Sturman

by Henry Sturman on Wed, 07/28/2004 - 08:01 | reply

This is nuts

Nothing to vote for? How about the best available side- how about working to improve that side, even?

Or, we could just give up, and watch the UK slide into oblivion. I call that passive cynicism.

Whither principled active optimism?

Alice

by a reader on Wed, 07/28/2004 - 13:35 | reply

Equivocation

Henry:

When Michael Howard says that he would not have voted for the war on the basis of WMD, he equivocates between two possible interpretations of his words:

1. That if he had known at the time that there were no WMD stockpiles, he would have insisted, before endorsing the Parliamentary motion to back the war, that it not say that there was good evidence that such stockpiles existed.

Not only is that Howard's position, it is also Prime Minister Blair's position and the position of every MP (and probably every person without exception) who backed the war. It is not something that any sane person would bother to assert, being rather like saying that if he had known in advance that a particular bomb was going to go astray and cause collateral damage, he would not have advocated dropping that particular bomb, but that he would still have backed the general policy of dropping bombs as a tactic in the war.

2. That Tony Blair is guilty of wrongdoing in that he knew (or through negligence did not know) that the intelligence referred to in the motion was false.

Only the interpretation (2) constitutes a 'U-turn' or a 'change of mind' or a criticism of the government or a statement with any political import whatsoever. Howard is not willing or able to defend position (2) -- because it is indefensible -- which is why he equivocates: to any serious enquiry, he can always claim he meant (1). But he wants to reap some of the political benefit of (2), which is a popular belief. Though his words were very carefully chosen to be slightly closer to (1) than (2), his tone of voice and body language were totally appropriate to (2) and not at all to (1), and given the context, he knew that the press, eager for sensational developments, especially those that tend to justify the anti-war position, would adopt interpretation (2). That is why the headlines were all along those lines. And these events would constitute some much-needed positive press coverage for Howard and the Conservatives on the subject of the war.

by David Deutsch on Wed, 07/28/2004 - 13:59 | reply

Mad vs Bad

The Scotsman tells us (via Daniel Pipes) that an international terror suspect is ill. What illness afflicts him? Flu? Syphilis? Pneumonoultramicroscopicsilicovolcanoconiosis? Well, no. Nothing like that:

An international terrorist suspect held at a top security psychiatric hospital is seeking bail so that his mental health problems can be treated "in the community", the High Court heard today...

He was held on the grounds that he was suspected of actively supporting and raising funds for various international terrorist groups, including those linked to Osama Bin Laden.

As we have noted before, mental illness is not a real illness. This incident nicely illustrates the silliness of the whole idea of mental illness. If someone is capable of raising money to kill infidels, then it seems to us that he is perfectly capable of coping with being in hospital until his trial. We also think that a man who is capable of raising money for a mass murderer must be fairly difficult to upset. We also think he should be in jail so he doesn't run away. That such a capable person has been diagnosed with mental illness says more about the credulousness of psychiatrists than about his state of health.

We also wish to mention, in case it has slipped the government's notice, that we are at war. The government suspects this man of adhering to the enemy. Therefore he should not be running around and whether he is happy or unhappy about this should not be the determining consideration.

Wed, 07/28/2004 - 21:30 | digg | del.icio.us | permlink

we are at war????

When was it declared? If it doesn't need to be declared, then when haven't we been at war?

by a reader on Fri, 07/30/2004 - 02:57 | reply

Sheesh

Is it July?

When was it declared?

If it wasn't declared, then when hasn't it been July?

How can anything be true without a formal declaraction by congress???

Gil

by Gil on Fri, 07/30/2004 - 18:37 | reply

I get it!

Then it must be an undeclared war, ho hum.

by a reader on Fri, 07/30/2004 - 22:54 | reply

It was declared

it was declared here.

by a reader on Fri, 07/30/2004 - 23:19 | reply

Setting The World To Rights

Ideas have consequences.

John Kerry Doesn't Get It

John Kerry made a speech at the Democratic Convention last night. In it, he demonstrated that he does not understand the War on Terror:

Let there be no mistake: I will never hesitate to use force when it is required. Any attack will be met with a swift and certain response. I will never give any nation or international institution a veto over our national security. And I will build a stronger American military...

We will add 40,000 active duty troops not in Iraq, but to strengthen American forces that are now overstretched, overextended, and under pressure. We will double our special forces to conduct anti-terrorist operations.

The purpose of the War on Terror is not to go after terrorists who have attacked America. The purpose is not to deter future attacks by assuring prospective perpetrators that they would suffer a "swift and certain response". Both these approaches are ineffective in an era of suicide-terrorism, proliferating weapons of mass destruction, and terrorist-supporting states. Worse than ineffective: they are invitations to attack.

The terrorists are driven by evil ideologies, especially (though not exclusively) Islamism. These ideologies are based on conspiracy theories that furnish blanket justifications on demand for unlimited, savage violence against anyone who does not submit to their narrow and twisted vision of how people, and governments, ought to behave. These ideologies do not promise their followers life, so threats of retaliation are ineffective against them. But they do promise the satisfaction of inflicting suffering in the short run, and they promise that in the long run they will prevail by being intrinsically more willing to die. It is only by refuting those promises that the civilised world can end the fear, suffering and poisoning of our political cultures that are brought about by the terrorist threat. Every time a terrorist dies before hurting innocent people, these promises are refuted. Every time a terrorist, and especially a terrorist leader, surrenders in disillusionment with the attractions of death, these promises are refuted. Every time a terrorist-supporting regime ends, and its subjects embark on a decent way of life with life-affirming aspirations, these promises are refuted.

So long as those promises are not refuted, terrorists will hurt and kill innocent people in America and other free countries. It is not a question of if, but of when, how often, and how badly.

The War on Terror is not about responding to terrorist attacks, but putting an end to them. It is not about training special forces to hunt down perpetrators one at a time. It is about destroying the terrorist organisations, the terrorist-supporting regimes, and the evil ideologies that drive them. Anyone who does not understand that is not fit to be President.

Fri, 07/30/2004 - 14:58 | permalink

how many ppl know this, in the USA?

nt

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Fri, 07/30/2004 - 16:07 | login or register to post comments

Excellent Post

I think it's possible that John Kerry knows that it would be good to refute these theories, but he doesn't know of a way to do this that would be acceptable to the left.

I think he hopes that a broad western alliance will make this possible. I don't think so. An alliance that opposes terrorism on paper but is unwilling to take effective action to prevent it will not help us. And, I think the alliance he envisions will be unlikely to agree on effective steps to take.

And, rather than discouraging terrorists from attacking such an alliance, I think it might just create a more ambitious target.

I don't think they attacked the United States because they thought it's a weak enemy. They attacked the United States because it's a strong enemy and they think such an attack makes them great, or seem great to followers.

Gil

by Gil on Fri, 07/30/2004 - 18:25 | login or register to post comments

Very well said

Now lets hope the American people will make the right choice in November.

AIS

by a reader on Fri, 07/30/2004 - 19:08 | login or register to post comments

Deterrence could work

The enemy does not believe that he can get to heaven without sacrificing himself for ends that are both feasible and forewarded by the sacrifice. He has aims on earth, even if those are ultimately only means to get to heaven. If we loom over the clerical regimes and threaten their destruction if terrorists attack, it may deter them. The only way to deter those willing to die is to threaten that which they are willing to die for.

by a reader on Sat, 07/31/2004 - 02:03 | login or register to post comments

Rabin's assasin was driven by an evil ideology.

This ideology is based on a conspiracy theory that furnish blanket justifications on demand for unlimited, savage violence against anyone who does not submit to the assasin's narrow and twisted vision of how people, and governments, ought to behave.

by a reader on Sat, 07/31/2004 - 03:38 | login or register to post comments

readers

That a reader @23:03 has difficulty trying to "infer" who the World thinks doesn't get it from a post entitled "John Kerry doesn't get it" is quite puzzling. Reader, the evidence that John Kerry does not understand something crucial is, his words. If that is not good enough evidence for what he does and does not understand then what is?

Reader @2:03 fantasizes that deterrence could work by, I think, threatening to nuke Iran (?) under all circumstances involving a terror attack. That is wrong in general. Reader's post is also wrong in detail; this is wrong - "The enemy does not believe that he can get to heaven without sacrificing himself for ends that are both feasible and forewarded by the sacrifice." What "feasible ends" were forwarded by the 9/11 hijackers' sacrifices? The theory seems to have been that, You strike America at its core, then magically (or, Allah intervening?) America topples. There is also a healthy dose of naive semi Marxist type thinking about how key events can manipulate classes of people whose actions are somehow pseudo scientifically predictable (such and such will "inflame the Muslim world", and then... magically, or Allah intervening, we win (somehow)). So is this wrong - "He has aims on earth, even if those are ultimately only means to get to heaven. If we loom over the clerical regimes and threaten their destruction if terrorists attack, it may deter them." It is true that the Islamofascist has aims on earth, and that these aims involve a global Islamist state, but threatening to attack "the clerical regimes" (Iran..) will not accomplish what you think/imagine. First it would merely prove the Islamofascist correct that we are the Great Satan. Second the Islamofascist cannot but know that Allah would intervene on the side of the faithful and not allow us to carry out the proposed threat, or if he did, it would be part of a larger plan involving bringing about the world under Islam, some other way (i.e. that "the Muslim world gets inflamed, and then magically, because of this, wins" jazz). There is no real deterring someone who is secure in the knowledge that God is on his side and that for their cause to lose - not just have setbacks, but lose - is metaphysically impossible, a denial of everything they know about their God.

Anyway, I'm not too keen on placing all my chips on a lame "may deter them" construction. "May" doesn't cut it for me, sorry.

This is the type of thing John Kerry does not seem to get.

--Blix

by a reader on Sat, 07/31/2004 - 14:24 | login or register to post comments

There is no real deterring someone who is secure in the knowledge that God is on his side and that for their cause to lose - not just have setbacks, but lose - is metaphysically impossible, a denial of everything they know about their God.

How is there real refuting of someone like this?

by a reader on Sat, 07/31/2004 - 22:14 | login or register to post comments

Invalid inference

"If he has not made sure that everyone knows that he does get it, then, under the circumstances, that is in itself evidence that he does not."

No, that is not evidence. First it is a convoluted way of getting to reinforce your own ideas of what you appear to believe. Second, the 'if' in your statement is not based on anything particular other than your inferred ability to read one's mind, or at the least every past and future word. The campaign is young, there are many words to be spoken before its over. I get it. Is that enough to make you sure?

I also read in another post that someone infers that I fantasize that deterrence could work by nuking Iran. Hah. Of course you didn't mean that and I might infer that it was just wild speculation for effect. Otherwise I am sure you are mistaken.

What other inferences would you, Blix, wish to make that are unfounded? My only hope is to make sure that you know that I support George Bush in his divinely guided mission which apparently ensures that all his words show that he is divinely guided. How could he be wrong?

The fact that John Kerry has some experience in war where 'terrorists' wanted to sink his boat and were unsuccessful because he acted correctly both with aforethought and response, however, is of course meaningless. These are surely different times.

Regardless, your inferences about his understanding are nonsense.

A general guideline if you want to convince someone of the strength of your argument: Stop inferring if you aren't going to make sure that you have ample evidence to back up your allegations. If you don't have ample evidence, make sure that everyone gets your drift, your bias.

What is your drift by the way?

by a reader on Sat, 07/31/2004 - 22:52 | login or register to post comments

Correction

Blixa, upon rereading I see that you did not infer that I in particular, but rather another reader fantasizes that threatening to nuke Iran could be a deterrence. I stand corrected of that misreading by my own second reading.

Other than that, my post stands.

by a reader on Sat, 07/31/2004 - 23:01 | login or register to post comments

stop saying infer

Reader who uses word "infer",

The only one "inferring" here is you. Or I should say, failing to "infer". Let us recap: The World writes a post "John Kerry Doesn't Get It", using John Kerry's words to show that he indeed, doesn't get it. You comment saying that (unbelievably) you find it difficult to infer who The World means (and also using "infer" in places where you mean "imply", I think).

You have now been answered: The World means John Kerry. Ok? The World's evidence for what John Kerry does and doesn't get is, the words of John Kerry. Got a better suggestion? If not, what's your point?

--Blixa

by a reader on Sun, 08/01/2004 - 00:07 | login or register to post comments

arg does work

part of Getting It is realising how important it is. if Kerry got it, he would understand it should be the first thing he says, the last thing he says, the thing he says the most, etc, and we would have heard it more times than we heard he served in Vietnam.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Sun, 08/01/2004 - 00:39 | login or register to post comments

George Bush does not really get it either

"It is about destroying the terrorist organisations, the terrorist-supporting regimes, and the evil ideologies that drive them."

In this regard, Saddam's Iraq was a but a little league player. And by committing a major part of America's resources to the overthrow of Saddam's regime at this time shows that George Bush does not really get it. The major terrorist organisations and terrorist supporting regimes have not been destroyed. The year 2003 was a 21 year high for terrorist attacks. And even in Iraq there is no evidence that terrorist attacks are on the decline. Take a look at the casualty count. You would expect coalition casualties to be on the decline this year. They are not. Rather, 2004 has been a worse year than 2003. Why? It is because Iraq's neighbours are the true hot-beds of terrorism, and these regimes have not been dealt with. The war in Iraq should have been an all out war against Iran, against Pakistan, against Saudi Arabia, and against Israel's enemies in Palestine. These are the countries where Islamism is at its hottest. George Bush never had the balls to tackle such a war, however, preferring the much easier target of Iraq.

by a reader on Sun, 08/01/2004 - 09:59 | login or register to post comments

sorry, not that easy

sometimes tactics don't dictate attacking the hardest target first. often tactics dictate only attacking one target at a time.

it would take a very extensive argument to be persuasive that you understand the relevant tactics better than our military planners.

on the other hand, I'd be happy to see Iran attacked approximately now, and I admit I don't know why they don't start. but that doesn't mean they haven't got reasons! I'm out of that loop.

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Sun, 08/01/2004 - 16:03 | login or register to post comments

silly

Let's use reader's logic elsewhere--

Big losses at Normandy (a much lesser threat than Berlin BTW - why didn't they attack Berlin first?? who the fk cares about Normandy??) demonstrated that FDR and Churchill DID NOT GET IT!! ;-)

by a reader on Sun, 08/01/2004 - 17:50 | login or register to post comments

"Anyone who does not understand that is not fit to be President.

Blixa, this is the inference, pertaining to John Kerry, that I find galling. "Anyone who does not understand that is not fit to be President."

For example, "When did you stop beating your wife?"; you would have certainly made sure prior to this that I knew that you don't beat your wife anymore if you no longer beat your wife. Therefore, since you didn't make sure I knew that, you must by your silence on the specifics of this topic have beaten your wife, and now please tell me when you stopped doing this.

You and the World or anyone can state what you think. However The World by its use of the inferring statement at the end of the post, John Kerry Doesn't Get It, "Anyone who does not understand that is not fit to be President." juxtaposes lack of evidence in words to infer not 'getting it'. That I can deal with. People do that all the time, base conclusions on insufficient evidence or marginal excerpts.

However, to infer that John Kerry is unfit to be President in the same post by a blanket closing inference is neither reasoned or warranted. It reads like the commentary for a thirty second attack ad. The effect of an attack ad is to bias. Often the intent is to smear. I cannot know that the intent is there, however the effect is certainly one of saying:

A) Words were not spoken to satisfy, "make sure" that The World and everyone in it knows that preemptive destruction will be used.

B) Therefore it is a foregone conclusion that John Kerry 'does not get it'. Preemptive destruction must be used when it is warranted.

C) Anyone who does not get it, that preemptive destruction must be used, is unfit to be president of the United States.

D) Inference: therefore John Kerry is unfit to be president.

Biased Attack ad evidence: Invalid inference. Sound reasoning does not work by invalid inference. John Kerry may choose on good evidence when he becomes president to use justified preemptive destruction. It would be most illogical to not consider preemptive destruction as a means where warranted. This falls within the powers of the president. We have no reason to declare that he would not.

by a reader on Sun, 08/01/2004 - 19:33 | login or register to post comments

side note: reader@17:50 was side note: reader @17:50 was me. I want the credit for a good point! ;-) reader who likes the word "infer" writes:

Blixa, this is the inference, pertaining to John Kerry, that I find galling. "Anyone who does not understand that is not fit to be President."

Why do you call that an "inference"? Who's inferring what from what? The quote you cite is not an "inference", it's an assertion, a statement, or something like that. You can disagree with that assertion (in which case an argument for why you disagree, might be nice). Or, you can disagree that John Kerry falls into that category (in which case, you have a lot of his own words to explain away). You have done neither.

[wife beating example which I had to read 3 times]

Does not apply. See Elliot's response to you. Me not beating my wife does not require me to convince you I don't beat my wife; it's possible for me to do the former without doing the latter. But in this context (the assertion is..) it's NOT possible to Get It without at the same time understanding the importance of Communicating It.

Anyway, at the very best you're left arguing that perhaps John Kerry does Get It internally, he's just chosen to say words which convey a failure of Getting It. This would be bad enough on its own - why would he do that? It's also a theory in search of evidence. ("John Kerry Gets It, even though there's no actual evidence that he Gets It from any of his words" is not all that comforting.)

However The World by its use of the inferring statement at the end of the post, John Kerry Doesn't Get It, "Anyone who does not understand that is not fit to be President." juxtaposes lack of evidence in words to infer not 'getting it'.

There's not a "lack of evidence in words" [that Kerry Gets It]. It's a different situation: there is a definite wealth of evidence in his words that he doesn't get it. Get it? ;-)

. The effect of an attack ad is to bias.

I suspect The World would admit to having a bias. What's your point.

(A) Words were not spoken to satisfy, "make sure" that The World and everyone in it knows that preemptive destruction will be used.

Again, that's not quite all. In fact words were spoken to indicate that preemptive destruction will NOT be used.

B) Therefore it is a foregone conclusion that John Kerry 'does not get it'.

It's not a "foregone" conclusion. It's a conclusion which follows from his actual words. You're left arguing that at best his words do not indicate his "real" thoughts. Well, let's hope!

Biased Attack ad evidence: Invalid inference

In a sentence please? To the extent I can parse this you're saying that The World's "inference" (conclusion) that John Kerry doesn't Get It is invalid. You haven't explained why however.

John Kerry may choose on good evidence when he becomes president to use justified preemptive destruction.

He "may" choose to nuke the moon, but there's no evidence for either. All we have are his words to go on, and his words indicate that his approach to terrorism will be reflexive and reactive. Do you seriously dispute that? then what?

It would be most illogical to not consider preemptive destruction as a means where warranted.

The question is what qualifies for "warranted". All indications are that Kerry's bar is extremely high.

We have no reason to declare that he would not.

Yes we do. We have the words spoken by John Kerry, which are (usually) in the English language, and thus can be read, understood, and interpreted by people conversant in that language. I still can't figure out why you seem to think his actual words convey nothing about what he thinks or will do. Maybe your contrary position in this thread is really that it's not that John Kerry doesn't Get It, it's that he's a big fat liar and phony? Let us know, by a reader on Sun, 08/01/2004 - 23:58 | login or register to post comments

--Blix

Re:Good point

The editor's comparison of Norway and Iraq may be very appropriate. The Nazi's discovered Britain's plans to invade and invaded as well. Britain lost, and Norway went from a neutral state to a member of the Axis. The particulars may be different in Iraq but the results may be similar i.e.: a strengthening of the enemy. This time in the form of an Iraqi theocracy.

by a reader on Mon, 08/02/2004 - 00:53 | login or register to post comments

Normandy comparison invalid

The comparison with Normandy is invalid because there is no evidence that Iraq is being used as a platform in the larger war on terrorism in the way that Normandy was used as a platform for taking Berlin. Where is the big military build-up in Iraq in preparation for, say, the invasion of Iran? Tactics may dictate that only one target be attacked at a time, and I can appreciate that, but Iraq is clearly not being leveraged for military advantage elsewhere. This should be a matter of urgency, and not something that is done if and when the peace is won in Iraq. The Allies did not dither around in Normandy before pressing on. Elliot, I think you are being disingenuous when you say you don't know why the invasion of Iran has not been started. I think you know why and the reason has nothing to do with tactics. It is because GW does not take the war on terrorism seriously enough.

Reader @09:59

by a reader on Mon, 08/02/2004 - 01:32 | login or register to post comments

errr

I'm disingenuous if I don't agree with you and think Bush is doing the war wrong and unfit to be president? Are you kidding? That's no way to argue.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 08/02/2004 - 04:22 | login or register to post comments

Well, has it not crossed your mind that...

... there may be a lack of political will to invade Iran?

Reader @09:59

by a reader on Mon, 08/02/2004 - 05:50 | login or register to post comments

if i don't put something in the Subject line it'll look weird

The comparison with Normandy is invalid because there is no evidence that Iraq is being used as a platform in the larger war on terrorism in the way that Normandy was used as a platform for taking Berlin.

So the invasion of Iraq could become justified (via becoming analogous to Normandy), though it is now (presumably) not so, but only if the US were to use it to stage an invasion of somewhere else. Fascinating! One answer to you is "stay tuned". (Unless Kerry is elected, presumably.)

Tactics may dictate that only one target be attacked at a time, and I can appreciate that, but Iraq is clearly not being leveraged for military advantage elsewhere.

Not yet (stay tuned), although it has been and is being leveraged for (a) military advantage in Iraq ("flytrap" for "foreign fighters") and (b) nonmilitary advantage elsewhere (cf. Libya).

The Allies did not dither around in Normandy before pressing on.

So? I never said the situations were identical thus the idea that all analogous events would occur on precisely analogous timescales, or even that it was meant to be an event-for-event analogy, is rather silly. I freely concede that World War 2 is not a literal blow-by-blow allegorical template for the current war, if that's what you're saying.... --Blix

by a reader on Mon, 08/02/2004 - 06:59 | login or register to post comments

Where is the urgency in "Stay tuned"?

"So the invasion of Iraq could become justified (via becoming analogous to Normandy), though it is now (presumably) not so, but only if the US were to use it to stage an invasion of somewhere else"

Well, according to the World, the war on terrorism is about destroying terrorist organisations, terrorist-supporting regimes, and the evil ideologies that drive them. I agree with this 100%. But Saddam's Iraq constituted a possible future threat. The clear and present danger lay - as it still does - elsewhere in the Middle East (and I applaud GW for taking out the Taliban, for they were one of these dangers). So although Iraq deserved to be taken out, it cannot be the primary objective and the war on terrorism will be lost if it is an end in itself. "Stay tuned" is not a good enough answer, and I'm wondering on what basis you say it. The war on terrorism is not something that can wait. The invasion of Iran should be well underway already. What reason can there be for holding back? Flypaper is all well and good, but flypaper does not win wars.

Sure WWII is not a literal blow-by-blow allegorical template for the current war, but strategy is strategy and I would have thought that, as in Normandy, speed and follow-through are essential in the war on terrorism. Dithering will cost lives.

by a reader on Mon, 08/02/2004 - 09:01 | login or register to post comments

I merely said "stay tuned" wa

I merely said "stay tuned" was a possible answer. I don't know what is in the heads of either Bush (..or his neocon puppetmasters as the case may be ;-). For all I know there will be no more invasions due to skittishness caused by fallout from the Iraq war that he "lied us into". A better phrasing of that explanation is that a decision was made to eschew high profile military use "until the election" due to political considerations. If so, that is the reason holding them back (public opinion). That's a shame but cannot be unexpected in a democracy.

That being said I don't know that Invading Iran per se is the clear-cut necessary thing to do in the first place. Yes I would be all in favor of an invasion of Iran to destroy that regime. However I am aware that there is an alternate view than invading Iran would be counterproductive because it is "ripe for revolution" due to all the young people etc. and some kind of undermining the regime/aiding the rebels strategy would be better. Sounds plausible to me shrug If you have some sort of Urgency-Of-Invasion calculation device which allows you to make these sweeping proclamations of who must be invaded before whom thus second-guessing more professional strategists, please share it with the rest of the class. (In arguments like these, a lot of people seem to have such a device but won't show it to me. So frustrating!)

I also am not as convinced that "speed" is as necessary as you are. Strategy does not always or uniformly dictate speed. If you are holding a position of strategical strength, enemy forces attacking from weakness idiotically, and you are destroying them with high ratios, I would think that strategy could in that case dictate that you stay put as long as possible.

The caveat there is Iran's rush to go nuclear, and I admit to hoping for an Osirik-like attack to stave that off, because there is little else that seems likely to work.

No, "flypaper" does not win wars. A single battle does not win wars. A maneuver does not win wars. Soldier #XYZ taking his ABC'th step will not win the war. This is a silly way to speak; parsing the events and circumstances of a war, and viewing each one in isolation, you can always make the case that such and such (by itself) "will not win the war". That doesn't mean it can't be part of a larger strategy which will win the war. This is a global war but that does not mean we can or that it is even desirable for us to rush from front to front as quickly as possible. In fact, it is in our interest to serialize our enemies as much as possible, not openly starting a fight until we are ready to do so and/or until we need to.

Again, I agree this all goes out the window if Iran does indeed go nuclear and becomes "untouchable". If this comes too close to happening this could certainly place Iran into that "need to" category, but if you have some definite knowledge that it's there right now, on 8/2/2004, you're better informed about the progress of Iran's nuclear program than I am.

by a reader on Mon, 08/02/2004 - 16:07 | login or register to post comments

A Blix-style non-empty subject line so it won't be all wierd

"For all I know there will be no more invasions due to skittishness caused by fallout from the Iraq war that he "lied us into". A better phrasing of that explanation is that a decision was made to eschew high profile military use "until the election" due to political considerations. If so, that is the reason holding them back (public opinion). That's a shame but cannot be unexpected in a democracy."

Which is just a polite form of my argument. But to let the politicians off with an "that's a shame but cannot be unexpected in a democracy." doesn't cut it. If it is just a matter of time before the next 9-11, then time is a luxury we do not have, and that is why I believe speed is necessary (tho' I don't have some magic urgency-of-invasion calculator). There may be tactical and strategic reasons I am unaware of for not invading Iran - and I do understand the points you have made, but I don't think it is that subtle. And if the reason is indeed political skittishness, then GW's war on terrorism will turn out to be no better than JK's. For what sort of war on terrorism do you have if you allow fear of the consequences of your past mistakes ("lying" etc) to dictate the future cause of the war?

BTW, I see that "stay tuned" was a just a possible answer, but I'm still wondering if you know something I do not. If "stay tuned" is just a desire on your part for action, then it is no argument for why GW's future war on terrorism would be any better than JK's.

Reader @09:59

by a reader on Tue, 08/03/2004 - 01:16 | login or register to post comments

An Obervation On War Strategy

There's an excellent reason for taking Iraq first. Oil. (Keep reading, god dammit)

Since the dawn of war, prime targets have always been those that in some way pay for the operation needed to take them. In times long past this often meant striking at weak agrarian areas (for food) before moving on to hit other, more important (from a military perspective) targets.

It follows that, in a long-term military campaign against terrorism, it would be beneficial to strike at weaker targets with greater payoff.

This appears to be sound military strategy... to this untrained strategist, anyway.

And no, I have nothing to say on Kerry. Everyone else is doing fine in that department.

-Dan

by a reader on Wed, 08/04/2004 - 16:54 | login or register to post comments

Russia

On the question of oil, watch Russia. She recognizes the economic threat of China and the developing Far East to crude oil, refining, and energy access in the future. She is silently positioning herself to control not only her oil reserves but access to all other available oil resources around the world. This has been done without war, but rather with careful political maneuvering within the economic and capitalist centers of the country and with quiet strategic alliances outside the country but in related and nonrelated states and regimes. That is all I wish to say on Kerry and Bush. Putin is one smart cookie.

by a reader on Thu, 08/05/2004 - 11:46 | login or register to post comments

You know, whether or not Bush

You know, whether or not Bush made a valid decision in striking Iraq was an issue, right? Offering a theory on why it was a useful military move was actually on topic. Really, it was.

-Dan

by a reader on Fri, 08/06/2004 - 02:26 | login or register to post comments

9/11 Three Years On - The State of Things

Here is a link to Mark Helprin's column in today's WSJ. This type of clear, thoughtful and informed analysis is not something that we see much nowadays. It shows that one's thinking can be decisive without falling into the trap of being overly simplistic in the effort to make a point.

<http://www.opinionjournal.com/columnists/mhelprin/?id=110005589>

by Michael Bacon on Fri, 09/10/2004 - 21:04 | login or register to post comments

The Olympics: A Celebration Of What?

UN Secretary General Kofi Annan said on CNN television today:

“The greatest moment of the race is not the touching of the wall, or when one swimmer begins to pull ahead of the pack. The greatest moment takes place before the pistol even fires, when, for a brief time, no nation is greater or smaller, stronger or weaker, than any other. For me, that is the Olympic moment.”

Should the Olympics be more a celebration of equality than excellence, then?

A charitable interpretation of Annan's statement would call it a celebration of a moment of fairness, openness and civility among nations, and not as a howl of deep, suppressed resentment that there is a nation (let's not name it, shall we?) that is both greater and stronger, politically as well as athletically, than any other. But on either interpretation, this quote illustrates the fact that it is high time that the Olympic Games, and sport generally, ceased to be about nations. The spirit of the Olympic Games should become more like that of the Wimbledon Open Championship and less like that of the United Nations General Assembly.

Sun, 08/01/2004 - 21:31 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Fix the Scoring Too

It would be nice if the events with subjective scoring involved voting that was less like the UN as well.

by Gil on Wed, 08/04/2004 - 01:00 | reply

Subjective Scoring

I agree. But subjective scoring is highly unsatisfactory in any case. Perhaps one day, technology would allow the judges to watch performances in high-resolution virtual reality, with the competitors disguised by some real-time algorithms.

Even then, I suppose in many cases competitors could be recognised by their style alone. Well, ultimately, computers should do the judging...

But who would do the programming?

Oh well, back to the drawing board.

by David Deutsch on Wed, 08/04/2004 - 02:40 | reply

objective scoring

Would we want to remove the human element from scoring competitions?

I mean, humans have bias in the forms they prefer in any given endeavor. And if a judge has indigestion from lunch or had a fight with his spouse before leaving the house that morning, it might influence how the judge is going to score that day's competitors.

Seems to me that competitors know this, going in, as part of the conditions of competition.

A computer does not have- and I question as to whether it will ever be possible or desirable for a computer to have- the inexplicit knowledge to be able to judge, say, a Grand Prix dressage horse and rider. Yes, it could perhaps record the mechanical completion of the required pattern to be ridden, but to 'get' the intangibles such as the presence of the horse and rider and how they work together... I don't know that a human judge can pull out and make explicit the process by which such things are judged. Can a computer have and interpret a 'gut feeling'? And yes, I think that gut feelings are important and to be taken into account when making decisions in life, even though such things cannot necessarily be quantified in the harsh light of day.

On another note, I thought the Olympics were supposed to be a competition among amateurs but it seems that most competitors are amateur in name only. Are these competitors nurses and accountants who indulge their passion for their sport on weekends? And are never paid for the practice of their sport, in any way?

Reading on this site:

http://www.olympic.org/uk/organisation/movement/index_uk.asp it does seem that equality and peace are the goals of the Olympic movement, not excellence. I am particularly intrigued by these stated activities of the Olympic Movement:

"Opposition to all forms of commercial exploitation of sport and athletes"

and

"Raising awareness of environmental problems."

Perhaps the Olympic Movement is actually the UN in disguise! hoping to do away with capitalism and save the world by substituting sports for wars...

by a reader on Wed, 08/04/2004 - 15:46 | reply

Commercial exploitation of sport etc.

Interesting that an organisation that states they are opposed to commercial exploitation of sport and want to raise awareness of environmental problems seems to be based around a four year cycle of countries having to bid (commercial exploitation) to host the olympics at a huge cost entailing the building of large sports stadiums (environmental impact). Will the white water canoing facility built in Athens be used for training amateur canoists for the next olympics? More likely it will become part of a nice commercial enterprise known as a theme park.

by a reader on Wed, 09/15/2004 - 14:53 | reply

Academic Study Lets Wal-Mart Off Far Too Lightly

A study by University of California researchers claims that the Wal-Mart chain of stores is costing the State of California a mere $86 million a year. How did they arrive at this absurdly low figure? Like this:

“Wal-Mart workers' reliance on public assistance due to substandard wages and benefits has become a form of indirect public subsidy to the company,” said the report issued by the University of California, Berkeley Labor Center.

“[It] comes at a cost to the taxpayers of an estimated $86 million annually; this is comprised of $32 million in health related expenses and $54 million in other assistance.”

But this method of calculation wilfully neglects the far greater costs that Wal-Mart inflicts on the people whom it refuses to employ, or pay, at all! – namely all the other welfare recipients in the State. And it shamelessly ignores the wrongdoing of all the higher-wage employers in California, whose conspiracy not to employ fleeing Wal-Mart workers is a necessary condition for them to be a burden on the State, and for Wal-Mart to exist in the first place.

What could have caused supposedly impartial academic researchers to display such blatant right-wing bias, ignore the massive conspiracy that is staring them in the face, and whitewash a bunch of companies who are, quite frankly, capitalist? The answer to any such question is always the same: follow the money. Who do you think pays the salaries of these idle, bourgeois parasites on the backs of the working people of California? Why, the taxpayer, of course – in other words, Wal-Mart, and the other employers. Is it any wonder that their lackeys are reluctant to bite the hand that feeds them?

Tue, 08/03/2004 - 20:54 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

What I can't imagine is why anyone would be so dumb as to work at Walmart if they were capable of doing anything else. However I also wonder why migrants pick oranges. Maybe it is because people need to eat to live and nothing is free even if you live in California. I would rather work at Walmart then pick oranges. I would also rather not live in California among the millions of idle burzwazie parasites. So I do none of the above.

by a reader on Wed, 08/04/2004 - 01:56 | reply

satisfying

i just want to say i admire the elegance and self-consistency of this post. ;-)--Blix

by a reader on Fri, 08/06/2004 - 04:44 | reply

Re: satisfying

Thank you! :)

by Editor on Fri, 08/06/2004 - 16:48 | reply

Who Do They Think Joe Lieberman Is?

In a sad op-ed entitled Joe Lieberman: A lonely voice of moderation, (via InstaPundit), James Kirchick ponders the change in the stance of the Democratic Party since the last election (part of a wider a change that we, too, have commented on):

It was only four years ago that Lieberman was his party's vice-presidential candidate. Now, following a war that he strongly supported but was unpopular with the base, Lieberman has lost his luster within the Democratic Party. Slighted by Al Gore, upstaged by Howard Dean and largely ignored by the delegates, Lieberman is truly now a man without a party.

[...]

One would have thought that American victories in Afghanistan and Iraq, specifically the liberation of some 50 million once-terrorized people, would be a source of pride for the party of Wilson, Roosevelt and Kennedy. True, this administration made mistakes in pressing the case for war, but at the end of the day, citizens of this country can be unequivocally proud of the fact that we are attempting to impart, however imperfectly, liberal democracy to nations that up until recently squirmed under the dual jackboots of religious fascism and Stalinist terror.

Lieberman told the Democrats in Boston that they should appreciate the magnitude of what our military has accomplished, and there is little doubt that the Republicans will use American victories in Afghanistan and Iraq to portray President Bush as liberator. But Democrats should not forget that an admirable tradition of liberal internationalism exists within their party. It's a shame that the standard bearer of this legacy would be so spurned by the party that asked him to help lead it a mere four years ago.

Our question is: if Lieberman is a man without a party, what does his party think he is? Not 'a lonely voice of moderation', surely, for most people do not think of themselves as lunatic extremists. So what is Lieberman, to his party? The lone voice of the Bush-Hitler administration? The lone dupe of the neo-con conspiracy? A madman who still believes in liberal international values? Or what?

Fri, 08/06/2004 - 16:31 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Copyright © 2007 Setting The World To Rights

Water Alarm

Prozac has been found in our drinking water. Norman Baker MP, Liberal Democrat shadow environment secretary, can't have been drinking much water lately because he seems very upset:

Mr Baker said: "This looks like a case of hidden mass medication of the unsuspecting public and is potentially a very worrying health issue..."

"It is alarming that there is no monitoring of levels of Prozac and other pharmacy residues in our drinking water..."

We have bad news for Mr Baker: water isn't perfectly clean and it never will be. Even the freshest mountain stream contains traces of the EU's dreaded nitrates, from thunderstorms – and is quite frighteningly open to anything that might happen to fall into it out of a bird overhead. Enclose all mountain streams in hygienic plastic pipes, we say! The more chemicals you want to take out of the water, the more money it costs, and there is a limit to how much you can spend before it becomes harmful to divert any more money from other goods. Nor is it alarming that the government doesn't look for Prozac in our drinking water, because there is no reason to think that it will be there in toxic levels. Looking would be a waste of money.

However, we expect that Mr Baker's attempts to make a molehill into the Matterhorn will continue because he, like many other environmentalists, suffers from such a deficiency of proportion and perspective that no conceivable level of precaution would satisfy him and no amount of Prozac-laced drinking water would calm him.

Mon, 08/09/2004 - 22:06 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

That's Not All

I hope he doesn't find out about all of the dihydrogen monoxide in the water!

Gil

by Gil on Tue, 08/10/2004 - 03:43 | reply

Shouldn't the comment 'Subject' be optional?

I'm more upset by all the PrO.zac!! in my mailbox.

by Kevin on Tue, 08/10/2004 - 12:52 | reply

Hear hear!

Most people seem to think there's a fundamental aura-like difference between molecules that come from "pure", "natural" sources and dirty, man-made "chemicals". But they all pop into and out of existence within the same planetary system and they're all composed of atoms, which are in turn composed of protons, neutrons and electrons, which are in turn ... blah blah. A molecule of dihydrogen monoxide produced by a car engine is exactly the same as the water molecule that gently diffuses from the leaf of an alpine shrub.

Another common error is to assume that an impurity is undesirable or toxic at any concentration, however low. So, no level of prozac is acceptable. Even 1 molecule of prozac per litre of river water is unacceptable. This is nuts - the dose makes the poison.

Environmentalists might do better to draw attention to certain other molecules which are deliberately introduced into mammalian bodies with government approval.

Hexafluorosilicic acid and ethylmercury are both highly toxic. It's illegal to pour them down the sink, put them in rivers or release them into the open air. However, the first is added to public water supplies in several parts of the world because it supposedly reduces tooth decay slightly in young teenagers. (The studies that support this practice are dated and dubious, for example they were not performed blindly.) The second substance is a breakdown product of thiomersal, a preservative used in vaccines injected into small babies in the UK (while stocks last). The microgram quantities involved probably haven't caused any harm, but ... whoa! Considering the large number of other activities in our culture where the use of heavy metals has been phased out, did vaccines have to come last?

by Tom Robinson on Wed, 08/11/2004 - 00:14 | reply the point?

Is that by the pint or the liter or by the hogshead?

I say ban ridiculous stories. Remove the nut cases. Without ridiculous stories and nut cases there would be nothing to rail on about.

Water is the universal solvent. Large amounts of water drunk in immoderation are toxic. Too much water and vital balances of the body are disturbed.

Beware of water overdose. Alarum, alarum!

by a reader on Wed, 08/11/2004 - 02:42 | reply

Copyright © 2007 Setting The World To Rights

Al Qaeda's Candidate?

The impending US Presidential election and the recent terror alerts have caused many commentators to speculate about which of the candidates Al Qaeda would prefer. Bush's supporters tend to conclude that Kerry is Al Qaeda's candidate, because he has no idea what the war is about and might therefore be expected to pursue it less effectively. Kerry's supporters say that Al Qaeda wants Bush to win, because, by fighting without the approval of France and Germany, he is increasing the rage and alienation of Muslims everywhere and thus assisting terrorist recruitment.

Both these theories are false. They both make the fundamental mistake of assuming that Al Qaeda has a strategy. It does not. It merely has a fantasy ideology. Yes, Al Qaeda and its countless supporters are all yearning for a mega-attack on Americans before the election. Yes, they yearn to 'have an effect' on that election. But there is no such thing as 'the effect that they want' – or, to put that another way, provided that an attack causes death and pain and fear, there is no such thing, to them, as its not having had the desired effect. If they succeed in perpetrating such an attack, then whatever the outcome of the election, it will immediately go on their hallowed list of anti-American successes. And as they strut and bluster and celebrate, they will pick one of the two rationales mentioned above (they can always change it again later if circumstances dictate), and say that it was theirs.

Wed, 08/11/2004 - 21:59 | digg | del.icio.us | permlink

There is a difference...

I think you, and perhaps also the commentators you (don't actually) cite, are conflating Al Qaeda with Islamism as an (anti)intellectual movement. Just as surely as George Bush is the candidate in this election who will best serve the long-term interests of Israel and of those who would live free of Islamism everywhere, John Kerry is the candidate who is most likely to revivify the policies of habitual capitulation that are necessary for Islamism to prosper in the West. Whatever Al Qaeda happens to say, now or later, John Kerry is clearly their man.

by a reader on Thu, 08/12/2004 - 17:37 | reply

Read Al Qaeda correspondence

Atlantic Monthly article has the actual correspondence of Al Qaeda up to and including October 2001 from actual hard drive information. To say that Al Qaeda has no strategy is false. Strategy may be flawed but it is clearly calculated and different from what you assume.

by a reader on Fri, 08/13/2004 - 02:25 | reply

Where's the beef?

Lovely. So what is it?

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Fri, 08/13/2004 - 05:40 | reply

Atlantic

Atlantic, September 2004, Al Quaida's Hard Drive. On Newstands.

by a reader on Fri, 08/13/2004 - 14:54 | reply

Arguments or at least links

Summarise it. You haven't given a reason to think you're source is worth checking out, b/c you haven't said anything of meaning yet.

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Fri, 08/13/2004 - 19:11 | reply

Don't Look

Please don't look. Atlantic Monthly is not worth checking out. Ever.

Read it unless you don't want to read it. I don't summarize on agricultural matters or on letters home.

I would not want to bias anyone's view. Even on choices of fundamentalist underwear, which seemed to bear more discussion than political parties or regime changes, and much less on why Al Quaida mullahed on inciting the invasion of Afghanistan. On that latter point a strategy flaw.

by a reader on Fri, 08/13/2004 - 20:40 | reply

Greek Civilisation

With the world's attention focused via the Olympic Games on Greek civilisation, the Simon Wiesental Center has taken the opportunity to do its job as the ghost at the feast.

When renowned "Zorba" composer Mikis Theodorakis described Jews as "the root of evil," Culture Minister Evangelos Venizelos and Education Minister Petros Efthymiou stood beside him, smiling, at a book signing ceremony heavily covered by the Greek media. Not too long ago, Giorgos Karatzafer, leader of the extreme right Popular Orthodox Party, used the party-owned Piraeus television station to denounce Greek politicians with "Jewish origins" and to claim, "Jews were behind the 9/11 attacks."

[...]

Earlier dialogue between senior Greek diplomats and Wiesenthal Center officials from New York to Berlin has been met with largely empty promises.

And so the Center invites us all to sign a protest addressed to Karamanlis, urging him to "take prompt and vigorous steps to denounce and contain antisemitism and other expressions of hate".

Well, what are you waiting for?

Fri, 08/13/2004 - 22:30 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

What I'm Waiting For

A reason to think this petition is more worth my time than all the rest of them. Being true doesn't mean it's worth the bother. Will it do anything? And more to the point, will me signing or not effect whether it does anything?

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Fri, 08/13/2004 - 23:11 | reply

Why sign?

Let's ask an earlier Greek leader, from the civilisation whose reputation Karamanlis is attempting to borrow:

There is no exclusiveness in our public life, and in our private business we are not suspicious of one another, nor angry with our neighbor if he does what he likes; we do not put on sour looks at him which, though harmless, are not pleasant. While we are thus unconstrained in our private business, a spirit of reverence pervades our public acts; we are prevented from doing wrong by respect for the authorities and for the laws, having a particular regard to those which are ordained for the protection of the injured as well as those unwritten laws which bring upon the transgressor of them the reprobation of the general sentiment.

So, let us bring upon the transgressor ... the reprobation of the general sentiment.

by Editor on Fri, 08/13/2004 - 23:35 | reply

Our 2¢ Worth On Kerry's Christmas In Cambodia

If you're unaware of the story, blame (and change) your current sources of news, and look, for instance, here. In short, the Democratic Presidential candidate John Kerry has said many times, including in a speech on the floor of the Senate in 1986, that he spent Christmas 1968 in Cambodia while the then-President was denying that there were any US troops there. It has emerged that this cannot be true, but most of the mainstream media, including the New York Times and the Washington Post, have yet to mention the controversy. The Kerry campaign is saying that although Kerry made a mistake about the details, something substantially like that did indeed happen.

We are not yet ready to venture an opinion about whether it did or not, but we have two questions. First: why is no one asking Kerry the question: 'who ordered you into Cambodia?' Kerry's commanding officer at the time denies that there were any such missions. And second: why does a substantial segment of opinion well understand, when Kerry allegedly does it, that saying what one believes to be true cannot be lying, but when Bush allegedly does it they become as thick as two planks?

Update: Check out Solomon's take on this as well.

Sun, 08/15/2004 - 16:47 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Q2

Because in Bush's case they are starting with a conclusion (Bush wicked), then twisting stuff to fit it.

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Sun, 08/15/2004 - 18:02 | reply

Neither candidate

Texans are known for tall tales. So are politicians that are worth their salt. However George Bush does not lie. Nor does John Kerry.

As to Cambodia, it is common knowledge that U.S. special forces and swiftboats too strayed into Cambodia. The Vietnam war was never defined by mere borders or middles of rivers. Sometimes the intrusions were by intent. Whether or not Christmas dinner was had in Cambodia it makes a good tall tale. I am waiting to hear a better one from the Bush camp. Christmas in Alabama? Naw.

by a reader on Sun, 08/15/2004 - 19:32 | reply

So, what's the beef?

You link to Instapundit who links to a Telegraph article that quotes Kerry's biographer:

"On Christmas Eve he was near Cambodia; he was around 50 miles from the Cambodian border. There's no indictment of Kerry to be made, but he was mistaken about Christmas in Cambodia," said Douglas Brinkley, who has unique access to the candidate's wartime journals.

But Mr Brinkley rejected accusations that the senator had never been to Cambodia, insisting he was telling the truth about running undisclosed "black" missions there at the height of the war.

He said: "Kerry went into Cambodian waters three or four times in January and February 1969 on clandestine missions. He had a run dropping off US Navy Seals, Green Berets and CIA guys." The missions were not armed attacks on Cambodia, said Mr Brinkley, who did not include the clandestine missions in his wartime biography of Mr Kerry, Tour of Duty.

"He was a ferry master, a drop-off guy, but it was dangerous as hell. Kerry carries a hat he was given by one CIA operative. In a part of his journals which I didn't use he writes about discussions with CIA guys he was dropping off."

So although Brinkley says Kerry was not in Cambodia on Christmas Day, he does say that Kerry was in Cambodia near that time. So what's the beef: that Kerry slightly changed the dates in his story to tug at a few heartstrings? Is this supposed to be a headline-grapping controversy?

by a reader on Sun, 08/15/2004 - 22:54 | reply

Where's the beef?

I don't know if there's any beef in this story. Quite possibly there's an innocent explanation, as The World admits. But the fact that Kerry made this embarrassing mistake, the fact that Kerry's commanding officer denies that there were any missions to Cambodia, the fact that other Swift Boat vets also say there weren't any, and the fact that the vets from Kerry's own Swift Boat who have been loudly supporting him have not come forward to say that there were, and the fact that Kerry himself is keeping quiet, is all tremendously newsworthy. Isn't it?? The fact that the media aren't buzzing with it, and many of them aren't even mentioning it at all is extremely bizarre.

by a reader on Sun, 08/15/2004 - 23:24 | reply

He-says She-says

The reason the story is not news is that there is no substance to it. It is just he-says she-says and, frankly, has the hallmarks of a smear campaign. Produce some hard evidence to show that Kerry was or was not in Cambodia and you'll have your headline.

by a reader on Thu, 08/19/2004 - 02:35 | reply

He-says Everybody-Else-says

His own journal says he wasn't there; his commanding officers say he wasn't there; nobody who served with him says he was there.

What kind of evidence would give the story substance?

Gil

by Gil on Thu, 08/19/2004 - 15:32 | reply

What kind of evidence how about video footage?

;-P

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Thu, 08/19/2004 - 23:16 | reply

E. Nough Ought To Be A Bush Speechwriter

He suggests a quip. Brilliant!

[Note: Readers who had no interest in politics in 1988 should look here first for one of the great put-downs. Readers who are unaware that the John Kerry campaign have just, embarrassingly, mistaken their candidate for a different Senator, Bob Kerrey, look here.]

Tue, 08/17/2004 - 23:32 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Reagan Did It Best

I remember loving it when at the 1992 Republican convention, Ronald Reagan made fun of Bill Clinton for comparing himself to Thomas Jefferson.

Reagan made fun of his own age and put down Clinton by saying:

"This fellow they've nominated claims he's the new Thomas Jefferson. Well let me tell you something:

I knew Thomas Jefferson.

He was a friend of mine.

Governor, you're no Thomas Jefferson!"

Gil

by Gil on Wed, 08/18/2004 - 04:25 | reply

Ya know, you're the second pe

Ya know, you're the second person so far who has told me that I should write speeches for Republicans. Really, folks, I'm quite happy in my current, not-at-all-political job. ;-)

A belated thanks for the compliment,

E. Nough

by a reader on Wed, 09/01/2004 - 03:55 | reply

Terrorism In Support Of Evil In Nepal

Islamist conspiracy theories act as the ideological fuel for the actions of many terrorist groups and their supporters, but not all. Anti-capitalism is another major conspiracy theory. It is behind the actions of Maoist terrorists in Nepal. Their conspiracy theory holds that economically successful people are responsible (in some never-quite-specified way) for all of the world's ills. Their "solution" is to use violence to impose a communist dictatorship in Nepal, whereupon they will kill all the rich people, thus making everything turn out for the best.

The Nepalese government is pursuing an ominously ill-conceived "peace process" with these terrorists. Naturally the BBC supports this because "there is a real concern that Washington is nourishing the belief that this war is winnable", and that would never do. As everyone knows, the only winnable wars are those against America and/or its values.

The difference between this and, say, the Palestinian-Israeli peace process is that there is nothing to negotiate about. It is one thing to say that the Palestinians can have a state if they cease to support terrorism and negotiate about borders, but no civilised country can support any measure of communist tyranny. The only peace terms that the Nepalese government should offer are that the terrorist movement must be disbanded and the future of the country decided by politics not revolutionary violence.

Wed, 08/18/2004 - 20:29 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

“All You Need To Know”

We said recently that we were not yet ready to venture an opinion on whether John Kerry's Christmas in Cambodia story was in essence true. Now Senator Kerry has explained the basis on which he wants us to form that opinion:

Speaking of the organization airing the ads that challenge his war record, Kerry said, “Of course, this group isn't interested in the truth and they're not telling the truth. ...

“But here's what you really need to know about them. They're funded by hundreds of thousands of dollars from a Republican contributor out of Texas. They're a front for the Bush campaign. And the fact that the President won't denounce what they're up to tells you everything you need to know.”

Some might say that that is all you really need to know. We disagree. The fact that the Senator is being evasive, petulant and paternalistic does not prove that he is a liar.

Thu, 08/19/2004 - 20:13 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Right. It's Not Proof.

The World is correct that this statement doesn't prove that Kerry is a liar (well, he's a liar about what is, in fact, "everything you really need to know", but not necessarily about the facts of his service).

However, it does prove that he encourages people to draw conclusions using heuristics that are so bad that they would make the job of a would-be liar much easier.

This seems more consistent with the theory that he's interested in getting away with lying to them, than that he's interested in them knowing the truth.

Still not proof; but that's the way to bet.

Gil

by Gil on Thu, 08/19/2004 - 21:56 | reply

Campaign Financing Subterfuges

And for another side, about neither Bush nor Kerry being liars.

How about those ads? Is it dishonest to fund ads which are not telling the truth and loaded with contradictions? More than that, is it dishonest to orchestrate and fund smear campaigns and not identify yourself?

More than that, is it dishonest to conveniently forget that your time-honored political campaign contributors, wealthy texans which by itself is no crime, are the very same ones who are doing the dirty work, no, rather paying for the dirty work, and expecting political favors in return? Now that's too harsh, really they just believe in those ideals of some republican swift boat vets put to good and nasty use through influence and money and the in the righteous self interest of supporting the right wing republican principles of god and a former texas governor.

Bring it on.

by a reader on Sat, 08/21/2004 - 15:56 | reply

Re: Campaign Financing Subterfuges

The anonymous reader who finds the funding of non-Party ads more fascinating than their content will no doubt enjoy browsing opensecrets.org, and comparing the financing & budget of Swift Boat Veterans for Truth with those of a group running anti-Bush ads.

by Kevin on Sat, 08/21/2004 - 17:21 | reply

Karl Rove, bigots, and smearing John McCain

Let's get down to brass tacks and talk about Karl Rove and Karl Rove's apparent opinion of veterans who served their country honorably.

John McCain, a Republican and Vietnam war hero, was attacked by Karl Rove and Christian Right Wingers in South Carolina. Rove and his sneaks implied that McCain fathered a black illegitimate child to gain votes from the bigots, take votes from McCain. Rove and his righteous sneaks implied also in a separate tactic that McCain fathered an illegitimate Cambodian child while in a POW camp thereby gaining gentle treatment from Cambodians. That approach was targeted to religious right vets in South Carolina to swing them away from McCain. In actuality, McCain had neither fathered a black child or an asian child.

McCain and his wife had adopted a Bangladeshi orphan years after the war from Mother Theresa's orphanage in Bangladesh, helping her also with medical treatment. The child was just dark enough to pass for black, for the South Carolinian bigots, or Cambodian for the South Carolinian angry vets. That's how Karl Rove and his sneaks work.

Who is Karl Rove? The former texas governor's prayer partner. That is the kind of person you are dealing with from the righteous right when it comes to ad and campaign design. Just the facts. Connect the political dots. Draw your own conclusions as to trusted insiders and dishonest silence.

Source, Bill Rauch, speaking about Politicking, in response to a question from the audience about campaign tactics.

by a reader on Sat, 08/21/2004 - 19:13 | reply

Copyright © 2007 Setting The World To Rights

Was John Kerry Ordered Illegally Into Cambodia?

Yes

17% (73 votes)

No

26% (117 votes)

That question is flawed

24% (107 votes)

You're Republicans, aren't you?

33% (145 votes)

Total votes: 442

Sat, 08/21/2004 - 15:56 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Not illegal

Being in Cambodia wasn't illegal by any reasonable standard, only by the standards of 'international law'.

by Alan Forrester on Sat, 08/21/2004 - 18:15

And Reasonable Standards meant you had to go over...

Kerry is not the only one who says he was in Cambodia. The late Admiral Elmo R. Zumwalt Jr., who was chief of naval operations in the early 1970's, has written that his son, whom he commanded, was there also. Zumwalt writes:

"The major problem we faced was the continued infiltration of enemy arms and men into South Vietnam, primarily along the Cambodian border."

And his son writes:

"At dusk one day late in 1969, we slipped under the overhanging jungle growth along a canal bank. I knew we were a few hundred yards inside Cambodia. I also knew that just by crossing into Cambodia I was in violation of direct orders. But I disobeyed the orders because I was sure the Vietcong and the North Vietnamese were infiltrating along this particular river, even though Navy intelligence said they were not. I thought this would be the best way to prove my point. Several hours later, we heard noises coming from downriver. The South Vietnamese had been warned not to be on the rivers at night, so we could be pretty damn sure it was the enemy. It was a convoy of sampans. When they drew to within 20 or so feet of our hiding place, we opened fire. We took some return fire, but then they fled, leaving behind some sampans loaded with weapons."

The Zumwalts also say that such missions were common and that "No serious thought was given to court-martialing..." (See their book "My Father, My Son", pg 90)

So it is not implausible that Kerry was in Cambodia. The navy evidently applied 'reasonable standards' and not the standards of 'international law'.

by a reader on Sun, 08/22/2004 - 00:22

sheesh

guys, guys, read the question. it has little to do with whether kerry was in cambodia.

it asks about what his orders were. and it modifies them with the adjective illegal. if kerry was ordered into cambodia, and this order was illegal, vote yes. otherwise, vote no. simple.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Sun, 08/22/2004 - 14:13

editing comments

hey, whatever happened to editing comments? it was added but now it's gone?

anyhow, was gonna change "sheesh" to "look closely" and "guys guys read the question" to "look at the question closely" also there is an alternative interpretation of the question: such orders would be illegal, and you're simply asked if he had them. but however you read it, the question is what he was ordered to do, not where he was.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Sun, 08/22/2004 - 14:22

Zumwalt example shows flaw in Kerry's story

Climate and topography work against the Kerry story. Zumwalt's example illustrates this.

Zumwalt made his ambush along the bank of a small canal near an undisclosed river near the border. This was in October, during the height of the rainy season when the water levels would have been elevated throughout the Delta water routes. Also Zumwalt did this at night when tidal conditions were favorable for his relatively large boat. He probably was situated near the coastline northwest of Ha Tien and not in the normal inshore area of his patrol.

As a result of his successful ambush (unauthorized as it was), the Navy gained confidence in sending river boats (not Swift boats) to probe the canals and steams that they would previously block or surround. The PBRs had jet propulsion and could do 20-plus knots in less than a foot of water. The Swift boats needed water 4 feet deep and they had to be careful of damaging their screw propellers. So the Swifts would do the blocking and provide firepower support and the PBRs would poke around looking for the enemy. PBRs routinely setup ambushes in the shallow and narrow routes in the interior of the Delta. But there were several weeks each year that even PBRs could not navigate through the Vinh Te Canal to connect Chau Doc to Ha Tien via the Rach Giang Thanh. That would be the driest part of the dry season.

A year earlier Kerry patrolled in the vicinity of Cambodia during the peak of the dry season when water levels were about 3 meters lower than their maximum, the small streams and canals were shallower and narrower, and tidal conditions were less influential upstream in rivers that emptied into the Gulf of Siam side of the Delta.

The river that ran along the border in Kerry's patrol area was the Rach Giang Thanh and there were no routes navigable by Swift Boat from that stream into Cambodia. The only route he could have taken was via the Vinh Te canal to Chau Doc (and beyond) which was too shallow in Feb-March when Kerry was on that patrol.

The Rach Giang Thanh is not a tributary of the Mekong River. It is a relatively small stream that is widest close to the sea coast -- in fact there is a sea inlet at the coast -- and very narrow at its top farther inland. Kerry would have run out of water at that time of the year. At most, he might have towed a smaller boat used for insertion of SEALs but they would not have told him their objective let alone their destination.

Kerry just exaggerated and that turned into a fib that got bigger and bigger over the years. He had not transformative moment while on a Swift Boat in Cambodia, because he was not in Cambodia, at all.

by a reader on Tue, 10/19/2004 - 04:08

BUSH SUCKS

I CANT STAND BUSH

by a reader on Thu, 11/04/2004 - 13:38

4 MORE YEARS

4 MORE YEARS OF HELL....

HE'S NOT RUNNING THE COUNTRY ..HIS PUPPETS ARE...HE COULDN'T RUN A COUNTRY IF HE TRIED. HE'S OUT FOR HIMSELF AND HIS RICH "FRIENDS".

PEOPLE WHO VOTED FOR HIM...DONT KNOW WHAT ELSE TO SAY BUT..GOOD LUCK...WE'LL NEED IT...

by a reader on Thu, 11/04/2004 - 13:42

Re: The two comments above

It is important to bear in mind that most people who voted for John Kerry are ordinary, decent people. People make mistakes: that is to be expected. There's nothing especially sinister in their motives or objectives. Yet ... there is no denying that idiotic conspiracy theories play a causal role in many of their world views. This is frightening.

Turning now to the comments above, note the poster's almost total lack of interest in the content of his or her own conspiracy theory: the assertion "[Bush is] not running the country ... his puppets are" is directly self-contradictory. But the poster is only interested in the narrow ground that the two opposite explanations have in common: that President Bush's purported motives, the ones that voters have just endorsed, are not his real motives; and that his overt actions as President, whose continuation the voters have just authorised, are a cover for secret actions with a different and incompatible purpose.

by Editor on Thu, 11/04/2004 - 14:18

BUSH SUX

I'm sick of everyone thinking Kerry was any better than Bushy. . .
THEY BOTH SUCK!

by Kellibellijelli on Sun, 02/13/2005 - 17:58

Kerry and Bush - This argument sounds way too familiar

Look. We're halfway into 2006; I'm no fan of Bush, nor of Kerry. I didn't vote for either of them. The lesser of two evils, to my mind, is still evil. At the same time, as long as we look back, we cannot look forward. We will NEVER get out of the quagmire that is Iraq, if we continue to rehash Vietnam, name-call Bush even though, to my mind, he should at least fire Rumsfeld, and bring in fresh military leadership for Mess'o'potamia, someone who understands how to lead troops in a situation involving urban warfare, guerilla tactics - which, basically, include suicide bombings, and the like. We either get down and dirty, and save lives, and fight this to the end, or we don't. But screwing around with the past, and obsessing about it, is useless, and a waste of time.

In my mind, we should have stayed out of Vietnam altogether, and several presidents lied to the American people about our extensive involvement. On the other hand, it was yet another case of "shit or get off the pot". Leadership couldn't decide what our role there was, so... we did a lot of nothing and 58,168 (from http://www.historyguy.com/american_war_casualties.html) American soldiers, Marines and others were killed, with well over 130,000 wounded. Untold thousands of Vietnamese were killed and wounded.

Is THIS what we want to happen in the Middle East now? Here at home we continue to argue two presidential elections that have been over for the better part of two years. This fatalism ill-becomes us as a people. I think we can do better. Let's focus on what we can change: the MAJORITY in Congress the next two elections, and the White House occupant in 2008. There ARE qualified men and women who are electable, and not beholden to big oil, or the big corporations. People power has worked in other countries. It can work here; it did 250 years ago; it can work now.

by PSmith on Mon, 05/22/2006 - 11:08

home | archives | polls | search

Copyright © 2008 Setting The World To Rights

New Poll: Was John Kerry Ordered Illegally Into Cambodia?

Further to our recent items here and here, we invite you to vote in our new poll.

Sat, 08/21/2004 - 16:51 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

From the "Truth is determined by opinion polls" department

by a reader on Sun, 08/22/2004 - 13:41 | reply

In A Parallel Universe – Vote For John Kerry!

InstaPundit peeks into a parallel universe and finds a John Kerry whom we would probably support for the Presidency. Whether that universe is really as close to ours as Glenn Reynolds thinks, is doubtful, unfortunately. The trouble is not only that Kerry doesn't get it, it's that the Democratic Party, and much of its constituency, have gone on a long long journey into fantasy land.

Mon, 08/23/2004 - 00:21 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Still not good enough

But even if all this was true, Kerry would still be the wrong man. Nothing in the parallel universe mentioned morality. Bush does...

A plan to deal with Iraq and Al Qaeda is all well and good, but what if something doesn't go according to it? We need someone who understands how to decide what to do

~curi

by a reader on Mon, 08/23/2004 - 01:39 | reply

Gol darn Kerry just doesn't know what to do; BCCI

<http://www.washingtonmonthly.com/> read the Follow the Money story by Sirota.
Kerry and BCCI.

by a reader on Mon, 08/23/2004 - 14:48 | reply

Kerry doesn't understand morality?

> We need someone who understands how to decide what to do lol. Let's see, here's a guy fresh out of college and his country is at war. So what does he do? He volunteers for the Navy, volunteers to go to Vietnam, and volunteers for Swift Boat duty. And he does this despite misgivings. He earns a Silver Star, a Bronze Star with Combat V, and three Purple Hearts. He saves a man's life. And then, later, after seeing how crazy and fucked-up the war had become, he speaks out about it. Seems like someone's got a moral compass.

by a reader on Mon, 08/23/2004 - 22:14 | reply

errr

Why didn't he analyse if the war was Right before joining? How does earning medals mean he understands right and wrong? Are olympic athletes good at morality too?

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 08/24/2004 - 00:03 | reply

Kerry's moral compass

...pointed due East then, and it still does.

by a reader on Tue, 08/24/2004 - 00:48 | reply

They Should Keep Their Fantasies At Home

A committee of MPs, the Environmental Audit Committee have declared that the government ought to raise petrol taxes. Their stated reason is that otherwise people will keep using petrol at a rate that is incompatible with satisfying the demands of the Kyoto Protocol. First, we can't help but note that the only way they can think of to persuade people to do what they think will save the world is through coercion in the form of taxation. They themselves were persuaded by reason and motivated by benevolence, but neither of those qualities exists outside Westminster, apparently. However, that is a rather commonplace fetish among MPs. Their use of the Kyoto Protocol as an excuse is a little more florid.

Even if everybody had implemented the Kyoto Protocol it would have cost several trillion dollars and delivered nothing. And the United States and (probably) Russia have not signed up to it. So the Kyoto Protocol is dead and good riddance.

So why does the Committee insist on the price rise? Because it conforms to a little fantasy in their minds. It goes like this. The common folk are stupid or wicked enough to think it's okay to use their cars when doing so will actually destroy the world. But wait! Is it a bird? Is it a plane? No, it's the Environmental Audit Committee! They've come to save us by raising fuel taxes and so reducing petrol usage by several percent – hooray! Quick, let's give them a ticker-tape parade through the heart of London! And if they fail, well, at least they fought the good fight against the evil oil companies, motorists, President Bush, and other agents of destruction.

If they do succeed, their fantasy is going to be damned expensive to indulge.

Thu, 08/26/2004 - 21:08 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

florid?

i looked it up and still don't get it

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Thu, 08/26/2004 - 23:33 | reply

Florid

Think of it as 'stylish'.

Gil

by Gil on Fri, 08/27/2004 - 06:46 | reply

Adjective: Florid -

Elaborately or excessively ornamented

by a reader on Fri, 08/27/2004 - 08:25 | reply

florid

i don't see how stylish makes sense in context

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Fri, 08/27/2004 - 15:26 | reply

re: florid

It was a rather lame joke based on this usage of the word.

Sorry for the confusion.

by Editor on Fri, 08/27/2004 - 16:59 | reply

Re: florid

Aw, darn. I thought it was this kind of florid (if there's a difference).

by Kevin on Fri, 08/27/2004 - 18:36 | reply

HonestReporting Makes Progress On The T-Word

HonestReporting says that some news media have begun to use the word 'terrorism' when referring to terrorism against Israel.

Other agencies, alas, continue to use that term only when the victims are not Israelis. HonestReporting provides a handy list of the e-mail addresses where you can complain to those agencies. We agree with HonestReporting that biases such as these are not just an irritation. They have an effect on public opinion.

Sun, 08/29/2004 - 11:34 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Terrorism

Terrorism is in the intent to create terror and fear. It is planned to harm and maim and kill for media effect. It should be clear to all the media of the world that terrorism crosses all boundaries, geographic and political and social. It is the war of evil in action against humans, man, woman, and child. It respects no boundary and respects no noble cause. The purpose is to cause fear and mayhem to gain attention for a slogan of words. Terrorism is the right name for it.

by a reader on Sun, 08/29/2004 - 18:08 | reply

G.Shippey

All this talk of terrorism and the fight back helps nothing, if anything both the use to the term Terror and the actual terror act side tracks us from the real issue's and the causes that help terror to fester and grow(what ever they may be)we must tackle the causes.....the problem is that most countries fail to do this because it may interfere with corporate interests or political wills. So terror may transcend boundaries but the causes are another thing else, something we are far more afraid of than the act or word?

by a reader on Tue, 08/31/2004 - 17:19 | reply

what "causes" terrorism

reader@1719,

But what if one of the "causes" of terror is that it works and achieves results, and what if this fact is at least partially due to the (odd) reticence on the part of some to speak out against acts of terror and terrorists and to banish them from the realm of legitimate political expression and/or warfare, by (among other things) correctly labelling terrorism terrorism?

(Which "corporate interest" does that reticence serve, BTW?)

Just wondering,
--Blix

by a reader on Tue, 08/31/2004 - 20:54 | reply

"Terrorism is in the intent t

"Terrorism is in the intent to create terror and fear. It is planned to harm and maim and kill for media effect."

is that why Yitzhak Shamir ordered the murder of UN peace negotiator Bernadotte ?

is that why Israel bombed the UN base at Qana in 1996 ?

by a reader on Tue, 09/21/2004 - 12:14 | reply

The Baffled French

Two French journalists have been kidnapped in Iraq by terrorists who are threatening to kill them if France does not repeal its new law banning Islamic headscraves (and all other conspicuous religious symbols) from state schools.

The people of France are at a loss to understand this development. They are "baffled"...

by the fact that the country's citizens should have been targeted by Iraqi militants, given France's vocal opposition to the US-led invasion of Iraq.

French President Jacques Chirac appealed to the kidnappers to release the journalists, using the following argument:

"France ensures equality, the respect and protection of the free practising of all religions," he said.

"These values of respect and tolerance inspire our actions everywhere in the world"

Are these the very values that also motivate the terrorists?

We guess that what's really happening is that Chirac is hoping to buy the journalists' lives with a large ransom payment, as others have done. If this succeeds, the sophisticated French will yet again become sponsors and collaborators in terrorism. They have infinite faith that by sacrificing others they will persuade the crocodile to devour them last. But shouldn't these very events be causing them to question that faith? Isn't it time for them to stop being baffled?

Mon, 08/30/2004 - 21:40 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

The War Against Conspiracy Theories

Regular readers will know that we consider the prevalence of conspiracy theories, both in the West and among its enemies, to be a major and grossly under-recognised cause of the current world crisis.

We have also remarked that the real alliances, the real loyalties and the real conflicts in world affairs are not between states, nations or religions, but between subcultures defined not only by their values, but also by how they think the world works. This has always been true, but it is especially true of the current war.

Much has been written about the deficiencies of the term 'War on Terrorism'. Terrorism is a method not an enemy. And yet the alternative names that have been proposed – such as the War Against Islamism – are equally inaccurate. The Maoist terrorists of Nepal are not Islamists. Nor are the rulers of North Korea.

Putting all these ideas together, we have come to the conclusion that the only accurate term for the current war is The War Against Conspiracy Theories. It is a war between conspiracy-theory-based subcultures and those based on truth and reason. It is a war between those who judge 'narratives' according whom they validate, and those who seek explanations that correspond to reality. Every perpetrator of violence against the West (or against Americans, or Jews, or even Christians) today is possessed by an utterly false causal explanation of how the West works and what the West is. Every other person, however well-meaning, who gives credence to such an explanation is in some measure an ally of those murderers.

In a recent opinion poll, nearly half of New Yorkers said that people in the United States Government "knew in advance that attacks were planned on or around September 11, 2001, and that they consciously failed to act". Everyone reading this must know people whose political thinking is similarly tainted by, if not utterly based on, conspiracy theories at least as insane as that. Go out and persuade them. Persuade them not only that their particular conspiracy theory doesn't make sense but that the underlying world view isn't true. That it is no more than a nasty little fantasy that is hurting and crippling them even as it offers them the specious simplicity and comfort of blaming others. That the world is better than that and that if they choose to, they can be part of its improving further. Persuade them because in the long run, if you fail to persuade them, they will kill you.

Thu, 09/02/2004 - 23:12 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Please explain

What is the the difference between a conspiracy theory and a valid theory? e.g.: "The US went to Iraq for the oil." vs. "The US went to Iraq so as to use it as a base to attack terrorist sponsoring states."

Both theories explain motives in terms other than what the official government position is. Or are both of these conspiracy theories? Or neither?

by a reader on Fri, 09/03/2004 - 02:21 | reply

click on links

the world wrote, and linked, a whole series on the matter

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Fri, 09/03/2004 - 04:04 | reply

Not Quite

I don't think "The War Against Conspiracy Theories" is quite right.

Perhaps it's The War Against Conspiracy-Theory-Inspired Violence. We shouldn't fight wars against people who are merely wrong. We actually encourage an environment where various theories (sound and unsound) can be peacefully held, expressed and debated. What we are at "war" against are those who use conspiracy theories as justification to threaten and attack others, and the idea that this is ok.

I think the intellectual battle against many sorts of fantasy thinking is worthy also, but it's something other than this war.

Gil

by Gil on Fri, 09/03/2004 - 15:48 | reply

Re: Not Quite

Our conclusion was: 'persuade them before they kill you', not 'kill them before they kill you'.

The war and the persuasion are intimately connected. One cannot hope to succeed in either without the other.

by Editor on Fri, 09/03/2004 - 17:23 | reply

The West

I am struck by the idea that "The West" is in itself a geographic conspiracy theory against global ignorance found upon three corners of the earth's surface, although i have no other word to describe it. There is no West without an East, a South, a North. However "The West" could be what we call it, another word for enlightenment thought wherever and whenever it is found.

Gil's point is well taken.

by a reader on Sat, 09/04/2004 - 00:22 | reply

Re: Not Quite

I agree that the two are related. But, I don't like referring to the ideological conflict itself as a "war". I really don't like conflating it with this war.

We don't have to persuade them to drop their conspiracy theories, in order to win this war. We just have to persuade them that there are better ways to live than killing people over those theories.

If we have to persuade them to drop their conspiracies in order to win this war, then I'm afraid we're doomed. I'll believe that that can be done right after someone successfully convinces everyone to drop their theistic theories (which are also related to this problem).

I understand that Daniel C. Dennett is going to try with his upcoming book.

I wish him luck.

Gil

by Gil on Sat, 09/04/2004 - 00:35 | reply

Re: Not Quite

The problem is: ideas have consequences.

Fortunately, that is also the solution.

by Editor on Sat, 09/04/2004 - 00:56 | reply

Re: Not Quite

Persuasion is not just about talking to people. It's also about getting people to listen to you in the first place. The war part of the war on terror is the battle against not even being able to communicate: the brick wall of unlistening that Islamists have around their core values. That this is not the same thing as theism is evidenced by the fact that Jews, Christians and Hindus are not instigating horrors upon either each other or the secular values of the West. Attacking theism as a way of attacking terrorism is like banning guns to stop violent crime: not the point, won't work.

But I do agree with Gil's distinction between ideas and actions. The ability to discuss one's ideas is predicated on the idea that not all ideas do actually necessitate certain kinds of unthinking immediate action: and that is why I personally would characterise the evil out there, whatever one wants to call it, not by its wrong-thinking but by its lack of thinking. It is not flawed ideas that are the problem, but the failure of flawed ideas to grow by coming into contact with other ideas (criticism and improvement).

Not everyone who believes conspiracy theories therefore decides to strap explosives on their body and go and murder schoolchildren. This is a huge and fundamental difference between New Yorkers and Chechen "rebels". Western liberals may be mistaken in implicitly supporting the bad guys, but they are not the cause of the war: in order to end terrorism, we have primarily to attack not the conscious ideas of liberals or Islamists, but the unconscious culture of non-growth that prevails in the Islamic world. This is a deeper thing than the higher-level conspiracy theories it includes about the way the rest of the world works.

If you argue with A Western liberal for long enough, well enough, then eventually you may cause some improvement in his world view. But this is not going to happen between you and a terrorist hell bent on besieging a school. To persuade the people at the bottom of the trouble (not exactly the same thing as the "root cause", but not dissimilar- more like the most active enactors of the theories, or the leading troublemakers) you have to get those people (and all potential would-bes) to listen.

This is done by force, and force is very different from persuasion. Democracy is not, in itself, growth or better ideas than Islamism- it can, potentially, allow for all kinds of ideas, including tyranny. But it doesn't generally, because democracy allows for the growth of ideas within its debate-based traditions, and this tends to happen quickly as soon as it is set in process.

The idea that everything human beings do, including war and political systems, is theoretical, is, I think wrong: there is a real material world out there, and we do interact with it, whether or not our theories recognise that fact. Therefore, the war is fundamentally not against any theoretical idea: it is a war against destructive activity, born of lack of growth protected by other destructive activity. As terror is an active verb, I think it is not a bad name for this. Islamism, which is the enactment of certain Islamic religious ideas in a certain way, embodies both belief and action in its meaning, and is, I think, also appropriate.

In other words, actions are more fundamental than theories. This is why we fight this war instead of being pacifists: you can't persuade anyone of anything once you've had your head sawn off.

Alice

by a reader on Sat, 09/04/2004 - 05:05 | reply

The West doesn't exactly have "secular" values

nt

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Sat, 09/04/2004 - 16:28 | reply

Ideas or actions?

Certainly there's a huge difference between doing something and merely advocating it. And another difference between advocating it and merely believing it to be right. And these are just three points on a continuum.

It is also true that how people act depends on their situation as well as their ideas (broadly construed). But how a person behaves in a given situation depends on nothing other than those ideas. If one denies that, one runs straight into the homunculus fallacy. So if a person with (say) President Bush's ideas becomes President, he will behave as President Bush does. There is no further decision required - no possible state of having those ideas but somehow not acting accordingly. That would be the homunculus fallacy again. And the same is true of someone with the ideas of a terrorist who happens to be given an opportunity to become one.

by David Deutsch on Sat, 09/04/2004 - 20:22 | reply

Re: Ideas or actions?

i agree, but i don't follow how it's the homunculus fallacy in particular.

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Sun, 09/05/2004 - 00:39 | reply

Re: Ideas or actions?

Well, if you think in terms of something more causing a person's behaviour than ideas - if you think of ideas as something a person has rather than is, then you'll think in terms of someone (the real inner you, the homunculus) making the decision whether to act on your ideas.

by David Deutsch on Sun, 09/05/2004 - 01:40 | reply

Re:Please Explain

I haven't heard the second theory advocated before as the primary explanation for the war. As such it does seem to satisfy the conditions for being a conspiracy theory. But if one is merely asserting that this was one of the many possible contingencies that were being planned for, then I disagree that it requires the government's motives to be different from what they claimed and so I disagree that it's a conspiracy theory. They are open about wanting regime change in other states, and open in refusing to rule out pre-emptive force if they deem a regime to be a threat. Obviously, once it was decided that Iraq should be next after Afghanistan, any such contingency plans would involve using Iraq as a base.

Under the interpretation where it is a conspiracy theory, it is a much less severe one than the oil theory, because it involves coordination among only a handful of people (in principle, it need not be a conspiracy at all: the President could be the only conspirator), it involves no spoils and therefore no coordination over them, and also because the purported motives and moral values would be very close to the conspirators' allegedly actual motives and values.

by David Deutsch on Sun, 09/05/2004 - 01:59 | reply

conspiracies need to be illicit

Note: technically the "second theory" is not a conspiracy theory (generic def.) because a conspiracy by def. is not just any old secret agreement, but a secret agreement to do something wrong/illicit. Creating/having bases from which to attack terrorists is not by itself illicit; depends on where/how those bases are created. In this context (ousting a dictator / having troops there to midwife a reasonably consensual gov't / which stay there for some time) I see nothing wrong with it. The "second theory" is less a "conspiracy theory" than a strategy theory. It is a theory that the invasion of Iraq was in accord with some secret strategy; were that strategy illicit, it could rise to conspiracy theory... but it's not.

It may however satisfy The World's def. of a conspiracy theory (not sure).

Personally, I'd prefer to call this war The War On What Ultimately Causes Conspiracy Theories To Flourish. I mean a war against conspiracy theories per se... wouldn't it be better to fight what causes them?

But I say that mostly cuz I'd like to fish for The World's take on what causes conspiracy theories to flourish... ;-)

--Blix

by a reader on Sun, 09/05/2004 - 04:52 | reply

Oil theory:

A. President Bush wants to be re-elected.

B. A robust economy is a key factor in an incumbent president's re-election.

C. A cheap and reliable oil supply is a key factor in a robust economy.

D. Iraq has a large supply of oil.

Therefore: Iraq war.

Is this a conspiracy theory?

by a reader on Sun, 09/05/2004 - 15:34 | reply

war is expensive

the war costs more than the monetary gain from free trade with Iraq (at least in shortterm like a decade). if he just wanted strong economy, he could have spent the same money on taxcuts.

also, Iraq could choose not to sell us oil, so what does the supply being "stable" mean? if it just means someone less nuts than Saddam is in charge, then I guess this is one tiny tiny reason we went to Iraq. but it'd be an economic blunder if that was the reason, and this theory ignores Bush's proclaimed motives (he thinks it's right to free people, protect ourselves).

often people mean either the US will steal oil, or the US will control the Iraqi government to make sure the oil keeps flowing. those are conspiracy theories.

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Sun, 09/05/2004 - 16:52 | reply

changing situations

how a person behaves in a given situation depends on nothing other than those ideas

So changing people's situations is the answer. This seems to me to be the prime motive of the war; changing the situations that enable the enactment of terrorist ideas (as Blix says). You can change people's situations: what can't be done is persuading people of different ideas when their situations render them deaf.

The situation than most helps the growth of terrorist ideas, is terrorist states (states which terrorise their own people). The situation which is worst for terrorism is democracy, because the process of debate enables good ideas to gain ascendancy. The primary target in the war is not bad ideas themselves, but the systems which are obstacles to the growth of ideas in general.

Alice

by a reader on Mon, 09/06/2004 - 03:01 | reply

Changing Ideas

"how a person behaves in a given situation depends on nothing other than those ideas"

So changing people's situations is the answer. This seems to me to be the prime motive of the war; changing the situations that enable the enaction of terrorist ideas (as Blix says). You can change people's situations: what can't be done is persuading people of different ideas when their situations render them deaf.

Changing people's situations is only part of the answer. But it is conspiracy theories that drove the likes of Timothy McVeigh and Terry Nichols. And to a large extent, it is conspiracy theories that hamper those of us who have the capability for changing other people's situations from doing so. Ideas must change first. The systems which are obstacles to the growth of ideas are in fact just systems of ideas.

by a reader on Mon, 09/06/2004 - 08:13 | reply

if systems are systems of ideas...

... then what is the difference between those and situations, as in:

how a person behaves in a given situation depends on those ideas (my bolds) ?

I can rephrase my entire comment substituting "system of ideas" for "situation", but that would be boring.

Now, if only ideas need to change, how does bombing cities and changing governments help? Is that not precisely changing a situation (slash "system of ideas")?

Bombing a weapons factory is not the persuasion of human beings to believe different things than they believed the day before the bombing. It may lead to people changing their ideas but it is not in itself the changing of ideas.

Is the priority in dealing with terrorism persuasion, or is it making persuasion more possible (which is what has happened in Iraq, with the replacement by force of the terrorist government that murdered people for dissent, with some kind of democratic system that allows for debate and therefore the growth of ideas)?

It seems to me that the difference between those two is the difference between pacifism and rightness. Not everything in the universe is theoretical. Planet earth would not cease to exist if the human race died out. And if everyone in Iran decided they wanted democracy, they would still have to depose the government before setting up elections.

by a reader on Wed, 09/08/2004 - 08:30 | reply

Persuasion

Two good points. Changing a government and an economic system may make persuasion possible. However, removing an entire populace that has learned to live by ideas that are stalinist, control-persuade-purge, is not feasible. Changing minds takes time.

Democracy in the normal sense is as foreign an idea as "benign" socialism when an entire country has experienced stalinism in its purest, harshest form. It will take some time to persuade people who have lived with very different practical ideas of what it means to stay alive and prosper under a stalinist regime, to understand that another idea of practical life is even feasible. Persuasion takes foresight and many many tools. Persuasion takes people within the country who have their own ideas of citizen inspired change and an extensive opportunity to practice them. Cultivation of a climate of persuasion must follow overthrow of even the worst dictator if there is to be any hope of sowing seeds of even the most rudimentary form of democracy. Ideas take time but they are all there is to work with when it comes down to change.

by a reader on Wed, 09/08/2004 - 14:21 | reply

Re: Conspiracies need to be illicit

Why? What if someone has a theory that their "great leader" has a secret weapon or strategy that will destroy their enemy? Isn't that a conspiracy theory? I would imagine that this was quite common among Germans when it was evident that they were losing WWII.

by a reader on Thu, 09/09/2004 - 01:31 | reply

yes and what conspire: to join in a secret agreement to do an unlawful or wrongful act or an act which becomes unlawful as a result of the secret agreement

Yes I suppose Germans (and others) who thought Hitler was working on a 'secret weapon' were holding to a conspiracy theory. That conspiracy theory happens to have been correct as I understand it (not all conspiracy theories are incorrect, right?); the Germans were working on atomic weapons (though did not succeed).

Not sure why you (I infer) think this example a contradiction. Perhaps because you don't think the Nazis working on an atomic weapon to destroy the Allied Powers was a wrongful act. It most certainly was. But then again lotsa things the Nazis did were wrong. The Nazis' existence in power was wrong (even if it arose constitutionally), and much follows from that easily.

caveat - I may not be adhering to The World's def. of conspiracy theory in any of this

--Blix

by a reader on Thu, 09/09/2004 - 06:30 | reply

re: persuasion

Evil regimes do not brainwash every member of their populations. They brainwash some, they threaten the majority into conforming, and a few manage to conspire against the regime and not get hung in the market square.

The difference between democracy and terrorist dictatorship is this: in terrorist dictatorship, only those who agree with the government have a public voice. Those with good ideas are silenced.

One of the vilest things about the antiwar left is their argument that ordinary Iraqis did not want the invasion. As there was no democracy in Iraq, it was more or less impossible to gauge how many ordinary Iraqis wanted the invasion. But it took more than three or four to destroy all those statues of Saddam; cheer the American troops; run the new interim Iraqi democratic government. Let's see how many turn out to vote, and how many refuse to participate in democracy on the grounds that they prefer to live under dictatorship.

There are, of course, be some people in Iraq who think they want (or really do want) an evil terrorising dictatorship. Most of those want it because they want to be it. However, there are an awful lot of people who do not want that. All they have been needing is the opportunity to argue their ideas in the public arena without being murdered (ie, to argue their ideas in the public arena period).

All this is far, far more fundamental and important than anything to do with the actual nature of the ideas they want to discuss. Where there is debate, there can be political growth. Where there is no debate, it's impossible.

That is why this is a war on more than just ideas. It is a physical, material war, involving real deaths and real bombings: yes, driven by conscious thinking humans, with the ambition of enabling people's ideas to grow, but still a war and not a chat round a big round table (or on the internet). The difference between those two things is the difference between civilised growth and barbarism. In other words, we are having to act according to the rules of the barbaric in order to attempt to institute something better in the moral blackspots of the world, for the sake of everyone's future. It's not pretty, and it's not persuasion. But sometimes, civilised people have to meet barbaric people on the only ground those people are prepared to occupy, in order to defeat them. And that means, by the use of force. Not discussion.

Then the war (not really a war at all- a process of rational growth by the exchange of ideas instead of violence) on conspiracy theories can begin.

Alice

by a reader on Thu, 09/09/2004 - 09:01 | reply

v nice, alice

good post

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Thu, 09/09/2004 - 15:02 | reply

Re:yes and what

"Not sure why you (I infer) think this example a contradiction."

Because conspiracy is not illicit from the view point conspiracy theorist(in this case a German).

by a reader on Thu, 09/09/2004 - 19:22 | reply

doesn't matter

doesn't matter

by a reader on Fri, 09/10/2004 - 04:55 | reply

Don't They Know There's A War On?

If there is one respect in which President Bush is not serious about the war, it is his support for an irrational and divisive Constitutional amendment preventing States from legalising gay marriage.

If there is one respect in which the Log Cabin Republicans and Andrew Sullivan are not serious about the war, it is their belief that the issue of gay marriage should be a factor in a reasonable voter's choice for President in the forthcoming election.

Wed, 09/08/2004 - 14:03 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Don't You Know There's A Democracy On?

If there is one respect in which The World is not serious about democracy, it is their belief that issues such as gay marriage should not be a factor in a reasonable voter's choice for President in the forthcoming election.

Whether or not it should be a decisive factor is a different question.

The Log Cabin Republicans have not endorsed Kerry. They have merely withheld their endorsement of Bush. They have criticised Kerry's positions on these issues as well. And, they have repeated their support of the president's strategy for winning the war on terror.

Bush has clearly decided on the strategy of encouraging the turnout of anti-gay bigots by pursuing this horrible agenda. He seems indifferent to any criticisms that do not affect his re-election prospects; so, that's the type of criticism the Log Cabin Republicans have decided to pursue. Bush's policy deserves effective criticism, and this is their way of giving it.

If we are supposed to suspend criticism of politicians (in a way they care about) during wartime, then there will always be a war and there will seldom be progress.

And, we will have lost what we sought to defend.

Gil

by Gil on Thu, 09/09/2004 - 16:08 | reply

What's a decisive factor?

What is a non-decisive factor in a choice, and why do non-decisive factors matter?

by a reader on Thu, 09/09/2004 - 18:36 | reply

one not like the other

Agree that both are silly. Disagree about how much.

The marriage amendment is (probably - I don't actually know the details of whatever dead-letter amendment (R)s are pretending (for their supporters' sake) is currently on the table) a horrible idea. Bush is wrong for advocating it. It's correct to lament the needless, and pointless, division of the country this engenders, particularly in wartime when division is most harmful.

However... well, in slight defense, Presidents cannot be expected to refrain from all non-war-related proposals "because there's a war on". Bush is the President and as such has done many other things (signing prescription drug bill, cutting ribbons, etc), some good some bad, which have nothing to do with the war - and rightly so. Of each one you could probably say "doesn't he know there's a war on?" but this doesn't really work as an independent criticism in its own right. If Bush favoring this amendment is wrong it's wrong because the amendment is wrong (which I tend to agree it is), not "because there's a war on". But Gil is right in this regard, you don't just suspend democratic politics and debate.

It might be added that the amendment (correct me if I'm wrong) isn't going anywhere at all, and Bush's "favoring" of it seems (from what I can tell) to be limited to spending perhaps less than a grand total of 20 minutes all told talking about it (i.e. saying the words "I support a federal marriage amendment..") in perhaps a handful of speeches. It's doubtful therefore that the war that's "on" has been hampered or even affected in any way by his doing so, apart from the needless-divisiveness as I've conceded above.

Of course, the divisiveness is needless in more than one sense, because the people who are all up in arms and angered by the not-going-anywhere, silly, political-posturing amendment (e.g. The World), could choose to just look past it and ignore it, recognizing it as a political stunt. You know, because it's not going anywhere - and because there's a war on. This brings us to Sullivan...

And Sullivan's position by contrast is just pure unadulterated 100% foolishness, with no saving grace. To believe in the "war on terror" or whatever you call it, and think it's important, and think that Bush is the superior candidate for leading it (all of which, I gather, Sullivan seems to have, at least purportedly), but then decide to favor the other guy solely because (as far as anyone can tell) of a stupid frickin' gay-marriage amendment that ain't going anywhere in the first place, is just beyond belief. I don't even see how it's possible without being disingenuous or deluded somewhere along the way.

--Blix

Sullivan

Has Sullivan said he endorses Kerry, or just that he can't endorse Bush?

I know it's a weird distinction, but people are weird about elections and voting.

To some people, endorsing and voting is the same as expressing which of the candidates you would prefer to win.

But, to others it means expressing an alignment of core values; and if one can't do that with any candidate, he can't bring himself to endorse or vote for any of them.

I suspect that Sullivan is in the latter group.

I also suspect that he would really prefer that Bush win the election, but doesn't want to dirty himself by explicitly aligning himself with Bush. But, I could be wrong about that.

I tend to think that this position isn't really a bad one for a "reasonable voter" to take, since his individual vote will almost certainly not determine the outcome of the election.

It might be an unreasonable position for a popular and influential pundit to take, though.

Gil

by Gil on Thu, 09/09/2004 - 20:14 | reply

either way

Whether he has endorsed Kerry, or just "can't endorse" Bush, this would be a marked change from earlier writings, and although no one (besides him, perhaps) can say for sure, it seems to appear to most observers (I'm not much of a regular AS reader anymore BTW) that the primary spark driving this shift is the gay-marriage issue. And IF the gay-marriage issue has indeed shifted Sullivan in that direction as is popularly supposed, then given what his purported position on "war on terror" related things has always seemed to be, it is profoundly silly of him.

note: a quick search found this article where Sullivan says "I may not find myself the only conservative moving slowly and reluctantly toward the notion that Kerry may be the right man - and the conservative choice - for a difficult and perilous time." Not clear what to make of this, it's not "I endorse Kerry!" but neither is it "I can endorse neither". From here it appears as if he kinda-sorta wants to endorse Kerry while leaving wiggle room. And if so, this is a change, and the reason for that change seems to be.... well, see previous paragraph.

Decisiveness

I was trying to make the distinction between something being "a factor" and being so compelling as to change one's final decision. I think that many things should be "a factor" for a reasonable voter, and perhaps the aggregation of enough of these factors might be sufficient to change the decision, but no individual factor would be.

For example, perhaps Bush's support for the Federal Marriage Amendment on its own is insufficient to cause a reasonable voter to change his vote. But, when combined with many other factors, perhaps a picture emerges of a man with sufficient character and judgment flaws that it could persuade a reasonable voter that the man is insufficiently reliable to be President, or that the future benefits of punishing this bad, unprincipled, behavior justifies the costs of accepting an inferior wartime President.

I'm not claiming that the above is true. But it's conceivable. And, thus, considering this position to be a factor does not prove that a reasonable voter is insufficiently serious about the war.

Gil

by Gil on Thu, 09/09/2004 - 21:38 | reply

No Right To Self-Determination

The twentieth century's greatest philosopher of freedom and reason, Sir Karl Popper, regarded the 'alleged right of nations to self-determination' as a catastrophic error. In one of his last speeches, in Prague in 1994, he said

I think that all lovers of peace and a civilized life should work to enlighten the world about the impracticability and inhumanity of that famous – or shall I say notorious? – Principle of National Self-Determination, which now has degenerated into that ultimate horror, ethnic terrorism.

We must fight against such horrors.

It does not follow from this that all secessionist (or unionist) movements are immoral. It is just that the issue of how territory should be divided up into states must never be decided on the basis of the 'rights' of nations (or states, or races, or religions...), whether to self-determination or anything else, nor in terms of an alleged right of individuals to be ruled by members of 'their own' group. Claims to sovereignty must be independently justified, and for all the usual conservative reasons, the burden of justification falls on whoever wants to change the status quo. And the only legitimate consideration is:

- What do the claimants intend to do with the sovereignty, once they have it?

Thus, if a faction wants sovereignty because they would repeal bad laws and pass good ones, and the existing political tradition is incapable of doing that, then their claim is, prima facie, justified.

But if they want sovereignty because they don't like the colour of the people currently in the government, then they have no case. If they want sovereignty because it would give them a monopoly on the revenue from a certain canal, or certain natural resources, then again, they have no case. If they want to repeal good laws and pass bad ones, then they certainly have no case. It may sometimes be best to let them make their own mistakes – which always means, in practice, tyrannising those among them who are not party to the mistake – but that is not because they have a right to do so.

Furthermore, even an entirely justified secessionist or unionist movement is not entitled to use violence unless their reason for wanting sovereignty is that it is the only way to protect the lives or other rights of the people they represent. Violence is legitimate only in defence of human rights. Political independence is not a human right, and therefore cannot justify violence.

Sun, 09/12/2004 - 02:04 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Yes, But...

It's not always clear to all participants and observers which side's proposed laws are good, and which side's are bad.

I'm curious. Given these standards, does The World think that the American Revolution against England was justified?

Gil

by Gil on Sun, 09/12/2004 - 03:25 | reply

Re: Yes, But...

Well, the secessionists seem to have agreed with our basic position:

Governments long established should not be changed for light and transient causes; and accordingly all experience hath shewn, that mankind are more disposed to suffer, while evils are sufferable, than to right themselves by abolishing the forms to which they are accustomed. But when a long train of abuses and usurpations, pursuing invariably the same Object evinces a design to reduce them under absolute Despotism, it is their right, it is their duty, to throw off such Government, and to provide new Guards for their future security. --Such has been the patient sufferance of these Colonies; and such is now the necessity which constrains them to alter their former Systems of Government.

It's plausible that the following account is largely accurate:

The history of the present King of Great Britain is a history of repeated injuries and usurpations, all having in direct object the establishment of an absolute Tyranny over these States. To prove this, let Facts be submitted to a candid world.

He has refused his Assent to Laws, the most wholesome and necessary for the public good.

He has forbidden his Governors to pass Laws of immediate and pressing importance, unless suspended in their operation till his Assent should be obtained; and when so suspended, he has utterly neglected to attend to them.

He has refused to pass other Laws for the accommodation of large districts of people, unless those people would relinquish the right of Representation in the Legislature, a right inestimable to them and formidable to tyrants only.

He has called together legislative bodies at places unusual, uncomfortable, and distant from the depository of their public Records, for the sole purpose of fatiguing them into compliance with his measures.

He has dissolved Representative Houses repeatedly, for opposing with manly firmness his invasions on the rights of the people.

He has refused for a long time, after such dissolutions, to cause others to be elected; whereby the Legislative powers, incapable of Annihilation, have returned to the People at large for their exercise; the State remaining in the mean time exposed to all the dangers of invasion from without, and convulsions within.

He has endeavoured to prevent the population of these States; for that purpose obstructing the Laws for Naturalization of Foreigners; refusing to pass others to encourage their migrations hither, and raising the conditions of new Appropriations of Lands.

He has obstructed the Administration of Justice, by refusing his Assent to Laws for establishing Judiciary powers.

He has made Judges dependent on his Will alone, for the tenure of their offices, and the amount and payment of their salaries.

He has erected a multitude of New Offices, and sent hither swarms of Officers to harass our people, and eat out their substance.

He has kept among us, in times of peace, Standing Armies without the consent of our legislatures.

He has affected to render the Military independent of and superior to the Civil power.

He has combined with others to subject us to a jurisdiction foreign to our constitution and unacknowledged by our laws; giving his Assent to their Acts of pretended Legislation:

For Quartering large bodies of armed troops among us:

For protecting them, by a mock Trial, from punishment for any Murders which they should commit on the Inhabitants of these States:

For cutting off our Trade with all parts of the world:

For imposing Taxes on us without our Consent:

For depriving us, in many cases, of the benefits of Trial by Jury:

For transporting us beyond Seas to be tried for pretended offences:

For abolishing the free System of English Laws in a neighbouring Province, establishing therein an Arbitrary government, and enlarging its Boundaries so as to render it at once an example and fit instrument for introducing the same absolute rule into these Colonies:

For taking away our Charters, abolishing our most valuable Laws, and altering fundamentally the Forms of our Governments:

For suspending our own Legislatures, and declaring themselves invested with power to legislate for us in all cases whatsoever.

He has abdicated Government here, by declaring us out of his Protection and waging War against us.

He has plundered our seas, ravaged our Coasts, burnt our towns, and destroyed the lives of our people.

He is at this time transporting large Armies of foreign Mercenaries to compleat the works of death, desolation and tyranny, already begun with circumstances of Cruelty and perfidy scarcely paralleled in the most barbarous ages, and totally unworthy the Head of a civilized nation.

He has constrained our fellow Citizens taken Captive on the high Seas to bear Arms against their Country, to become the executioners of their friends and Brethren, or to fall themselves by their Hands.

He has excited domestic insurrections amongst us, and has endeavoured to bring on the inhabitants of our frontiers, the merciless Indian Savages, whose known rule of warfare, is an undistinguished destruction of all ages, sexes and conditions.

In every stage of these Oppressions We have Petitioned for Redress in the most humble terms: Our repeated Petitions have been answered only by repeated injury. A Prince whose character is thus marked by every act which may define a Tyrant, is unfit to be the ruler of a free people.

In which case, by our criterion, the answer to your question is yes.

by Editor on Sun, 09/12/2004 - 04:30 | reply

So.....

Given the historical and current situation of the Kurds in Iraq The World would be in favor of a Kurdish state? (Kurds were clearly persecuted by the previous regime and the current regime has been unable to provide for their security.)

by a reader on Sun, 09/12/2004 - 16:59 | reply

no answer

IANTW (I Am Not The World), but: By my reading of The World's post, one consequence is that it makes little sense to be in favor of a "ish state" as a blanket position, without knowing more details. --Blix

by a reader on Sun, 09/12/2004 - 19:16 | reply

kurds

well, is the current regime preventing the kurds from securing themselves? (for example banning them from owning guns). If not, how would the Kurds having their own state make them more secure? What new measures would it allow them that they can't do now?

PS brilliant post.

PPS anyone notice what this means for Palestinians and Chechans(sp)?

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Sun, 09/12/2004 - 19:48 | reply

Re:kurds

The only reference to individual ownership of arms is in Article 17 of the Iraqi constitution:

"It shall not be permitted to possess, bear, buy, or sell arms except on licensure issued in accordance with the law." Not exactly the right to bear arms.

The Kurds having their own state make them more secure by being able to secure their borders.

by a reader on Sun, 09/12/2004 - 20:24 | reply

Alternative theory

I do agree with the World, that in the current context a "Right To Self-Determination" is a bad thing. On the other hand, if that right were consistently applied, it would be a good thing. That is, if people understood that if any group has a combined right (the added rights of all individuals) to self-determination, that logically implies that each individual has that right as well, and understood this right has nothing to do with a right to be ruled by one's own people, it would be a good thing. For then we would have libertarian anarchy. For then if Wales were to secede from the UK, any city in Wales could in turn secede from Wales, and any street in that city could secede from the city, and any individual on the street could secede from the street. So if the rule of self-determination is consistently applied to any group or individual, there's no problem, and in fact many problems are solved, because then all governments would be truly voluntary, and therefore no longer would be governments.

Henry Sturman

by Henry Sturman on Mon, 09/13/2004 - 12:15 | reply

Re: Alternative Theory

Henry Sturman wrote:

'That is, if people understood that if any group has a combined right (the added rights of all individuals) to self-determination, that logically implies that each individual has that right as well, and understood this right has nothing to do with a right to be ruled by one's own people, it would be a good thing.'

Well, actually it doesn't imply any such thing. One could consistently hold that nations have rights and individuals do not because nations have some mystical property or other that makes them superior to individuals. This theory is balderdash but it is certainly possible to believe it. It is also possible to believe, as the Southern secessionists did before the American Civil War, that certain types of individuals are inferior to other types and that self-determination consists in superior people being allowed to make laws allowing them to enslave, torture and rape inferior people without interference. National self-determination would only work in the way you described if all people thought that individualism was true and they don't. Even then it would be redundant since political institutions would be judged largely on the basis of whether or not they promote individual freedom.

by Alan Forrester on Mon, 09/13/2004 - 15:52 | reply

I'm no expert by any means on

I'm no expert by any means on the current Kurd situation but reader asserts that if a "Kurdish state" were made, they would be better able to defend their borders than currently. I don't know how it's possible for reader to know this, without specifying, among other things, who he proposes be put in charge of the proposed Kurdistan. (It matters.) If the answer is, "the guys who are basically in charge of semi-independent Kurdistan right now", then what's the point?

This is just one of the reasons why being in favor of a "ish state" qua ish state is untenable. What bothers me about the "right to self-determination" is that it masks the reality in a way that sounds uniformly, deceptively nice. What most listeners (to whom this all sounds very Nice) will fail to grasp is: Saying "There should be a ish state" is functionally equivalent to saying "such and such group of people should be given monopoly on the use of force over all of the (much larger group of) people in such-and-such geographic region". I don't know how one can possibly endorse or reject such a claim without actually specifying who that group of people is, what sorts of checks would be placed on their behavior, etc. It literally makes no sense.

(This is why I was so pleased to see this, excellent, World post.)

Back to the Kurds, from where does the biggest threat to Kurdistan come? From Turkey? (Honestly curious.) What would be the likely response of Turkey to the creation of an independent Kurdistan - more belligerence or less? What would you predict? Has this prediction been factored into the assertion that Kurds would be better able to secure their borders if they had "their own state"?

Would Kurdistan require US military assistance in securing their borders? If so, what exactly would be so different from the current situation? What's the point here? I think one of the lessons of the World's post is that, at the very least, you ought to be sure that you're not favoring a ish state just for the sake of there being a ish state i.e. because that would be nice and swell.

For the record, I've got no particular gripe with there being a separate Kurdish state and I'm certainly open to being convinced that it is a necessity.

--blix

by a reader on Mon, 09/13/2004 - 18:21 | reply

intentions vs results

"And the only legitimate consideration is:

What do the claimants intend to do with the sovereignty, once they have it?"

So the probability of them actually achieving their intentions don't matter?

by a reader on Tue, 09/14/2004 - 00:40 | reply

Re: intentions vs results

Yes, it does matter, but that's implicit. Our judgement of whether what they intend to do is right or wrong will usually depend in part on what we think the outcome would be.

by Editor on Tue, 09/14/2004 - 00:55 | reply

curious

I'm curious to read what Elliot Temple, or anyone else, thinks this means for Palestinians and Chechyan(I don't know how to spell it either). I know what it means if certain factions of the Palestinians, like Hamas, were to gain control of such a state. But some factions have claimed that they want a secular, democratic government. Not that that alone puts it in the "good" category.

by a reader on Thu, 09/16/2004 - 23:28 | reply

my 2 cents

IMHO,

Essentially it means that arguments of the form "we must ____ because the [Palestians/Chechnians] have the Right To Their Own State" are, on the face of it, nonsensical and false.

You mention that there are factions in each place who talk about wanting a secular, democratic government. That's very nice to hear. What will it take to put such a faction in power? Keep them in power? Will they be able to stay in power? Can they be believed about what they say they want? Can they be trusted (rather, to what extent can they be trusted)? Will they become corrupt (rather, to what extent will they become corrupt)? What are the realistic outlooks for the country if all this is attempted? Will it become a failed state? terrorist haven? will factions inside launch attacks on neighbors [Israel/Russia resp.]? will the newly-made government be able to stop this effectively? Will third-party nations such as Iran Syria Jordan Pakistan whoever attempt to influence matters? in what way? with what results, broadly speaking?

Answer those questions and if the answers sound good to me (like if I come to believe that your plan can actually create a Chechnya which doesn't contain gangs which regularly kidnap and ransom Russians, or a Palestine from which guerrillas won't be regularly firing mortars into Israel), you might start to build a case which I could support that e.g. yes we ought to support the creation of a [Palestinian/Chechenian] state with the properties you just described. The devil is in the details, all in the details. This is why "Right to their own state!" is such a dangerous principle; it ignores details (all of them) as if they are unimportant, when they are everything.

-Blixa

by a reader on Fri, 09/17/2004 - 00:22 | reply

Creamface

didn't Bill Bryson uncover facts behind the US statement of grievances ?

namely the calling "together legislative bodies at places unusual, uncomfortable" - only 3 states had had their legislative bodies moved - at most to a distance of 4 miles or so.

and most of the tax raised (the colonists were taxed at a very low level compared to the Brits) was used to defend the colonies.

by a reader on Tue, 09/21/2004 - 12:11 | reply

Who determined that "Libertar

Who determined that "Libertarian Anarchy" was a "good" thing?? I don't want to live in an anarchic society, and most people don't. I read your personal webpage, so I know what your opinions are, and I strongly disagree with them. Who are you to tell me that I must accept your ideas? I don't think total personal freedom is necessary. I see nothing wrong with the government doing things for the benefit of society, as long as it doesn't become totally oppressive in their means. Democracy is NOT a failure and in most democracies the minorities are protected, not oppressed. Democracy works very well, that's why it is the most popular system ever created. It isn't perfect by any means, and nothing is perfect and never will be. Also, I disagree with the idea that people have no right to self-determination. If a group of white people want to live with only a group of white people, that should be their right as long as they don't harm others or take away their rights. I completely agree that people should be able to live the way they want if the majority approve. Those not wanting to participate should be able to freely choose something else, and if they want to be part of a conglomerate society, they should be able to. I see no legitimate argument to convince me otherwise.

Incidentally, I thought the purpose of this was to demolish all these pro-left wing, self-righteous intellectually pretentious arguments and conspiracy theories, not support nonsense such as this? I just lost my respect for this website.

by Christopher on Sun, 04/02/2006 - 20:27 | reply

The Lasting Consequences Of Rathergate

Note: For a summary of Rathergate so far, see [here.]

What do CBS and suicide bombers have in common? They have each taken their chosen form of political intervention to its appalling and self-destructive logical conclusion, and have thereby, as PowerLine very perceptively points out, changed the world in somewhat analogous ways:

Before September 11, important aspects of our security arrangements were based on the assumption that people, even terrorists, want to live. For example, airlines followed the rule that if a passenger's bags were checked but the person failed to appear for the flight, his bags would be removed from the airplane. The idea was that a bomb could have been planted in the luggage. But as long as the passenger was on the airplane, it was assumed that his bags were safe, since no one -- it was thought -- would blow up an airplane with himself on it. After September 11, security arrangements were changed to take into account the new reality (or newly recognized reality) of the suicide bomber.

When he defended CBS's publication of forged documents, Dan Rather spoke of the "checks and balances" that ensure the reliability of news coming from CBS, as opposed to news and commentary from the blogosphere. What are those checks and balances? Ultimately, the main check on the danger that a powerful media giant like CBS might abuse its position of trust by deliberately propagating falsehoods is the assumption that the network values its reputation for accuracy and trustworthiness. In the past, most people have assumed that while broadcast networks, wire services like the Associated Press, and newspapers will occasionally make mistakes, and will certainly spin the news consistent with their political biases, concern for their reputation in the marketplace, and even more among their peers, would prevent them from spreading outright falsehoods.

In the wake of the CBS scandal, that assumption must be reevaluated.

Yes. But also, given this and many other recent scandals with a similar aetiology, we have to doubt that newspapers and television networks ever deserved the trust that was placed in them. We may well be witnessing a significant moment in the history of news media: a radical restructuring of patterns of criticism and authentication into a decentralised and non-authoritarian form.

This is not (as some have said) the end of the traditional news media. Quite the contrary, for just as Karl Popper said that the point of politics is not 'who should rule' but how bad rulers and bad policies can be replaced, so the point of (news-oriented) blogs is not to replace news organisations: it is to cause bad stories and bad reporters to be replaced. Which is to the benefit of everyone, traditional news media included.

We expect that among these benefits will eventually be the destruction of the culture of manipulation and left-wing paternalism in the traditional media, which has done so much harm (as well as some occasional good, by the way) over so many decades. But we also hope that that will be only the beginning. Who knows what the first ever society with deservedly high-reputation news media will be like?

Mon, 09/13/2004 - 00:58 | permlink

Comparisons

This is a document typed on a IBM Selectric Composer:

The ability to justify copy easily and quickly is one of the distinct advantages of the new IBM "Selectric" Composer. By merely typing copy once, taking a reading from a scale on the Justification Tube, then setting the Justification Dial, copy is automatically aligned at the right margin as it is typed a second time. Color coding is used to designate pitch on the Type Element, Escapement Lever, and Justification Tube. The idea of color coding for simplicity is used again for taking a reading on the Justification Tube and making the appropriate adjustment on the Justification Dial.

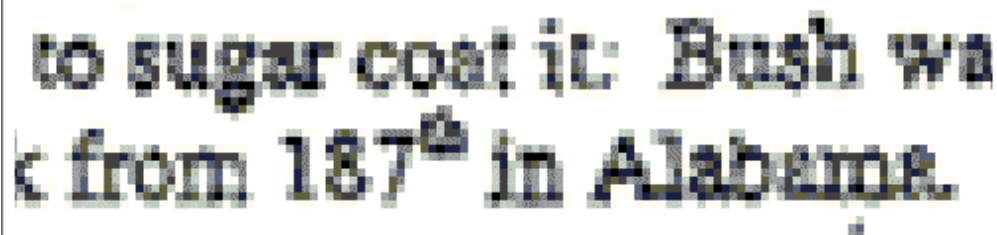

Same document in Word:

The ability to justify copy easily and quickly is one of the distinct advantages of the new IBM "Selectric" Composer. By merely typing copy once, taking a reading from a scale on the Justification Tube, then setting the Justification Dial, copy is automatically aligned at the right margin as it is typed a second time. Color coding is used to designate pitch on the Type Element, Escapement Lever, and Justification Tube. The idea of color coding for simplicity is used again for taking a reading on the Justification Tube and making the appropriate adjustment on the Justification Dial.

Instruction manual for the IBM Selectric Composer.

Comparison of enlargements of CBS "original" and Word document:

CBS DOCUMENT

to sugar coat it: Bush wa c from 187th in Alabama.

MS WORD SAMPLE

sugar coat it. Bush was rom 187th in Alabama.

by a reader on Mon, 09/13/2004 - 10:54 | reply

LOL: Comparisons

You can't have been following the debate very closely.

The differences you have found are due to you comparing a screen image with a printed image. Printing uses slightly different font settings. If, instead of looking at your Microsoft Word doc on screen and taking screen shots, you print it out and then scan it back in, you will see that the 'th' aligns precisely where it does in the CBS forgery. If you also photocopy it a few times, you will get random variations similar to the ones you are holding up as differences.

Try it. Then adjust your world view. Then report back.

by a reader on Mon, 09/13/2004 - 12:29 | reply

Re: Comparisons

This is a document typed in MS Word:

.

This is the same document written with a No 2 pencil on the back of an envelope:

.

See? They're identical.

by Kevin on Mon, 09/13/2004 - 16:18 | reply

partial touche

Let's grant that, if nothing else, the anti-forgery side can indeed point to an uneven baseline; this feature would not be produced by a computer nor (I think) would the errors induced by repeated xeroxing (which I presume would all be deformation + noise) would cause this effect. I have not seen this point rebutted (feel free to point me to such a rebuttal).

But even ignoring typographical issues - indeed, even if the memos were in fact typed - there are still tons of contextual reasons to believe the documents are forgeries (2 of them; keep in mind that it is only 2 out of CBS's 4 "memos" which are in dispute). Just from memory: reference to a retired person putting pressure, no motive for writing something essentially self-incriminating, the purported author didn't type and there's no secretary/typist initials so who the f typed it?, the family has no idea where this thing would have been kept or came from, use of military terminology that doesn't square (see Donald Sensing), an order given weeks before regulations would require it....

Meanwhile on the other side, baseline aside we do still have the striking coincidence that the text (horizontally) lines up perfectly, with perfect centered header and all the line-breaks in the right place (but no hyphens!), including the whole "kerning" thing -- with a casually-inputted Word document. We are also supposed to believe that this thing's author (who is the typist again?) found it SO important to have a raised "th" in a private, informal memo that he switched font balls to do it. (WTF?)

The weight of evidence just points to this thing being a fraud and I have actually seen no convincing reason at all not to think it a fraud, so I'm going with "fraud" until given a convincing reason otherwise.

Which points to a larger issue. Some (see for example Matthew Yglesias) seem to be speaking as if we are somehow required to grant CBS provisional truth on this matter unless/until proven definitively otherwise. Essentially CBS/Dan Rather gets the presumptive benefit of the doubt in all that they put forward. I don't agree with this methodology; I don't see where they have earned it. Am I the only one who finds it ironic that the supposedly "liberal" side is in effect arguing from Authority?

Finally CBS's defense has been so staggeringly weak that even this fact alone gives one pause. Key testimony on which their story was based came from someone who has now backed down and said he was tricked (the memo he vouched for was read to him over the phone - well, parts of it). (!) Even more damning, CBS's lone "expert" to "verify" the document is a handwriting expert. He "verified" the signature of a person ON A FRICKING PHOTOCOPY. In the real world which you and I inhabit, verification of a signature ON A PHOTOCOPY means precisely ZILCH. I don't know which world CBS inhabits.

This laughable, even absurd supporting evidence simply does not point to CBS having the truth on their side. Explaining why, if the truth is on their side, their defense consists of pure BS which only an idiot would accept, and their behavior does not coincide more with what one would expect of people confident in the veracity of the memos, is quite difficult. There is an utter failure to resolve more than 1% of the issues and problems raised by the memos' doubters. (I mean yes: typewriters existed which could make a raised "th". Aside from that?)

As such, the most reasonable surmise is that the memos are frauds.

Again, the only reason on earth to think otherwise is if you side with the Yglesias epistemology which (to paraphrase) seems to simply assert that because CBS is a Big News Organization and all, you have to provisionally accept whatever they foist as Truth unless/until you can build a beyond-reasonable-doubt case against it. I think that's moronic but YMMV.

--Blixa

by a reader on Mon, 09/13/2004 - 18:07 | reply

arguments from authority

I don't think it's ironic that liberals do it. It was never a right-wing phenomenon. It is part of our culture. The left, for example, is more statist. shrug

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 09/13/2004 - 20:48 | reply

well, semantics

But I find the left being more statist ironic too. ;-D To be clear: the irony I speak of is only w/r to the actual meaning of "liberal", not w/r to common U.S. usage (in which essentially, "liberal" = "(D) party fan"). You're right there's nothing ironic about it in the second sense.

by a reader on Mon, 09/13/2004 - 20:53 | reply

It is

A right wing IBM Selectric Conspiracy Theory. All the conspiracy theory cells are working overtime on this one. This post is being typed on an IBM Selectric and scanned. At least I suspect that it is.

by a reader on Tue, 09/14/2004 - 21:33 | reply

Who knows?

"Who knows what the first ever society with deservedly high-reputation news media will be like?"

One thing we can surmise about the first ever society is that it will be made up of human beings who truly value Truth.

To say that more precisely, such a society will be made of up human beings who truly value the search for the processes of ascertaining Reality, which appear to hinge on a constant personal quest for falsifiability and encompass both unbiased seeking as well as reporting.

Truth is not what is required or purchased and therein is a problem. Truth is rather constrained by what we consciously seek to find and therefore requires a society of individuals with open minds.

by a reader on Thu, 09/16/2004 - 20:20 | reply

Death and Tax Evasion

Tax Evasion. Illegal Possession of Weapons of Mass Destruction. At first glance these two crimes may not appear to have much in common, but they share a significant attribute: they are both considered serious crimes by the authorities in the United States, but are more or less condoned by many people.

The reason why the authorities consider both these crimes to be serious may be the same: they are both relatively easy to prove by courtroom standards, and they are both often committed by people who also commit crimes which are far more serious by any standards, yet also far harder to prove.

Al Capone, the notorious prohibition-era gangster, committed many crimes, of which the most serious was mass murder and perhaps the least serious was tax evasion. Yet he was prosecuted only for tax evasion. That is because it could be proved in court, not because anybody believed that this was an adequate or representative summary of his crimes.

Saddam Hussein is likewise a gangster and mass murderer – though on a scale that makes Capone look benevolent by comparison – and a torturer, thief and ... an illegal owner of WMDs. Consider also Slobodan Milosevic: somewhere between the two, he has been charged with Genocide, the most serious of all crimes – but even as we write this he is locked in a Byzantine legal process that may well fail to find him guilty simply because of the inherent difficulty of proving the charges.

And so after 9/11, when the safety of the world became a clear issue in our minds, and Saddam's malevolent influence on regional and world affairs became intolerable, we found ourselves casting around among his many crimes for one that would be easy to prove at the quasi-legal court of the UN Security Council. Ironically we chose one which, for reasons that have yet to be satisfactorily explained, he appears to have been innocent (at the time we happened to catch him): possession of WMDs.

If Al Capone had been found not guilty of tax evasion for lack of evidence, would that have made the war against organised crime unjust? Would the media have proclaimed that it would have been better if Capone had been left alone? That the US government should apologise for 'lying' about the tax evasion? Of course not, because it was beyond doubt that he was as guilty as sin of a multitude of crimes, any one of which justified pursuing him, capturing him, and putting an end to his power.

Wed, 09/15/2004 - 00:22 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

familiar

Good post but, hey! I've been using this analogy forever ;-)

Small correction: contrary to what you say, Saddam was, in fact, proven Guilty of the "charges" we brought against him, by Hans Blix of all people. Blix's report cited (buried?) the Hussein regime's possession of a UAV which he had not reported and which he was prohibited from having. This was not a "WMD" per se but still, this alone placed Saddam in violation of Resolution 1441. (Remember, the "charges" were much more specific and tangible than "He has 'stockpiles' of WMD!", as one might think from e.g. the way the Associated Press reports on these matters. He was required to report or document the destruction of a list of banned objects. This list of banned objects is not adequately summarized by the phrase "stockpiles of WMD".)

Obviously, if I say all this to an antiwar person they come back with "that's no reason to start a war! we fought a war because he had a model airplane? we fought a war because of a centrifuge in a backyard? (etc)" which is precisely when I trot out the Al Capone example ;-)

No, it doesn't work, of course. The point remains valid however and you state it better than I have.

--Blix

by a reader on Wed, 09/15/2004 - 01:20 | reply

Guilty as charged

Blix: yes you're right, he was guilty as charged. We plead guilty as charged.

by Editor on Wed, 09/15/2004 - 01:49 | reply

Unprovable beyond doubt

"it was beyond doubt that he was as guilty as sin of a multitude of crimes"

Then, why could it not be proven?

by a reader on Wed, 09/15/2004 - 10:44 | reply

Why Not Proved W/ Capone?

Why couldn't it be proven with Al Capone? or do you dispute that? then take answers to Capone question, apply to Saddam. throw in that it's 10x harder to get evidence about someone in a different country, and 50x harder when that country isn't some friendly, open ally.

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 09/15/2004 - 15:44 | reply

Why It Was Hard To Prove Al Capone's Guilt

Because he was the head of an organisation one of whose main functions was to conceal precisely such evidence. All his financial transactions were done through proxies with whom he had no legal connection. When he gave an order which resulted in someone being killed, he never wrote it down. The only witnesses were his most loyal subordinates, and even then, he did not have to be all that explicit because they had all known him for a long time and knew what he meant. There was a system of intimidation and savage revenge against anyone whom he suspected of revealing information to the authorities. Intimidation, and also lavish bribery, was used to suborn juries and policemen and politicians.

How do we know all this? That is not the problem. It is not controversial among historians and none of it was secret, even at the time. The atmosphere of fear and corruption was easily observable by any visitor to Chicago, and its origin was well known to the inhabitants because their lives depended on it: if someone made a mistake and assumed it was safe to cross a gang leader because he was just an innocent businessman, they really would die. But that is not evidence for a court.

by Editor on Wed, 09/15/2004 - 19:06 | reply

That Quote Was About Capone

If Al Capone had been found not guilty of tax evasion for lack of evidence,...Of course not, because it was beyond doubt that he was as guilty as sin of a multitude of crimes, any one of which justified pursuing him, capturing him, and putting an end to his power.

Is The World suggesting that domestic criminal justice should pursue, capture, etc. people who cannot be proven to have committed crimes?

Maybe we shouldn't bother with trials at all and just lock up everybody who prosecutors know are guilty!

I think it's a good thing for governments to have significant burdens to justify their use of power.

The problem is that in the case of going to war, we have strong disagreements about what that burden should be.

I don't really believe that the major issue is whether or not Saddam actually had WMDs or WMD programs.

Most war opponents believed that he did, and still opposed the war.

Most war supporters still support the war even though we can't prove that he had them.

The disagreements are about what justifies the use of american military power.

The war opponents are just harping on the issue to try to convince those who might have been unsure about the strength of the case, and to give those who now regret it an excuse (that they were misled) to now oppose it without admitting that they were wrong.

Gil

by Gil on Wed, 09/15/2004 - 19:10 | reply

Maybe we shouldn't bother with trials at all?

Gil asked:

Is The World suggesting that domestic criminal justice should pursue, capture, etc. people who cannot be proven to have committed crimes?

No.

by Editor on Wed, 09/15/2004 - 20:20 | reply

Death To The Wicked

Is Gil suggesting that life would be better if everyone always focussed on what the law says, instead of what is right? Why should we need a law before we can kill bad men? Isn't that authoritarian?

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 09/15/2004 - 20:36 | reply

Re: Death To The Wicked

Why should we need a law before we can kill bad men?

One reason is that there are rules of procedure with the property that if everyone is held to them, even the best people will do the wrong thing less often than if they did not defer to such rules.

Another reason is that codifying the rules under which bad people can be punished improves the growth of knowledge about what constitutes 'bad', and who meets the criterion for being bad.

Another thing that is essential to the growth of political knowledge is that people feel confident in doing things that most other people consider immoral, provided that they are not breaking the codified law.

by David Deutsch on Wed, 09/15/2004 - 21:03 | reply

sure but

A) this only applies much to evolved laws, not ones designed by central planners. (though sometimes the idea evolves, not in law form, then central planners say it's a law). law by fiat tends not to have the less mistakes property. which leads into:

B) if those people who should follow laws to avoid mistakes, consider specific laws bad, they should not follow those laws. for example, maybe downloading music and killing dictators aren't bad ideas (not that second is actually against law). in other words, only follow laws you agree with for their sake (follow others for sake of not getting thrown in jail, as needed)

also, some laws have the property that for most people following them will involve less mistakes. But we can certainly imagine a person who has a life where he really ought to break laws. especially if he is ahead of his time morally. and especially if he is powerful. and it works just as well for a group of people as an individual. examples include wizards and the USA.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 09/15/2004 - 22:32 | reply

nod

Gil writes,

The war opponents are just harping on the issue [WMD] to try to convince those who might have been unsure about the strength of the case, and to give those who now regret it an excuse (that they were misled) to now oppose it without admitting that they were wrong.

Right. And this World post helps to counter that effort.

by a reader on Thu, 09/16/2004 - 00:37 | reply

What was the justification for what?

I'm not sure how the Capone analogy is especially applicable in the Saddam case. It implies that the government's primary agenda was to overthrow a murderous despot, and the whole WMD thing was just some technicality that we could prove in order to justify that overthrow. If anything, we used the murderous despot part to help sell the overthrow of a guy who had WMD that could potentially be handed off to terrorists and harm Americans. The "lesser" crime (akin to tax evasion), when it comes to a forced regime change through military might, is the damage he has done to his own people and the people of the region, while the crime that actually justifies it to the American people is the threat he posed to American civilians. The Bush administration has never claimed to be in the business of overthrowing all murderous dictators if only they can prove the crime, or prove a lesser loophole type crime. Not that the murdering part was as insignificant as the Capone tax evasion thing, it was simply sold as part of the over all package of a crazy guy who was the absolute last person on earth to be trusted with WMD. To paraphrase Capone in "The Untouchables" who said, "A kind word and a gun will get you further than just a kind word," being a crazy tyrant with WMD will get you invaded a lot quicker than just being a crazy tyrant.

And, to be clear, I believe the war was and is justified. I just don't think the Capone argument is a compelling enough one to convince anyone who believes otherwise.

by R on Thu, 09/16/2004 - 01:10 | reply

Re: What was the justification for what?

It wasn't the being-a-murderous-dictator that made Saddam's removal imperative either. It was, as we said, that the safety of the world became a clear issue in our minds, and Saddam's malevolent influence on regional and world affairs became intolerable

However, his WMD posture (stockpiles or no stockpiles) was part of what made his influence malevolent and intolerable, as was his being a mass-murdering dictator and other things too.

by Editor on Thu, 09/16/2004 - 01:47 | reply

I agree completely. It was t

I agree completely. It was the entire package that made Saddam intolerable. Unlike Cappone. It wasn't his murderous regime plus his questionable tax practices that made him intolerable.

But even if it was, I don't think that was your point. Your original analogy seemed to imply that if we can't nail him (Saaddam and Cappone) on the big crime (murder, theft and intimidation in both cases) then we nail him on the little crime (possesing WMD that he could hand over to terrorists, and tax evasion respectively.)

It is this analogy that I take issue with. Or am I misunderstanding you?

by R on Thu, 09/16/2004 - 03:21 | reply

The Analogy

I also don't see how this analogy is enough to sway anybody who thinks that the WMD issue is important.

It seems to me that The World is trying to argue that the WMD charge, like the Capone tax evasion charge, was merely a convenient thing to pin a legalistic justification for attack on; that the truth of the charge wasn't really an essential part of the justification.

But, the people who care about WMDs are the people who think that the truth of that charge was an essential part of the justification.

In order to affect these people's opinion, I think The World (or somebody) has to go further and explain why those people are wrong.

Just asserting that there is an analogy is not enough.

Of course, I'm assuming that this was intended to be an argument meant to explain something to those who didn't already agree about this, rather than merely an interesting observation to share with those who did.

Gil

by Gil on Thu, 09/16/2004 - 03:22 | reply

Just a general question -

Is it always good to overthrow evil dictators?

by a reader on Thu, 09/16/2004 - 03:58 | reply

The Details Of The Analogy

Saddam is to Capone as

WMD possession is to tax evasion and as

Being an intolerable malevolent influence on the world is to committing multiple murder and leading organised crime.

WMD stance and being a mass-murdering dictator and terrorist sponsor are all part of being an intolerable malevolent influence on the world.

by Editor on Thu, 09/16/2004 - 04:51 | reply

Re: is it always good to overthrow evil dictators?

Not always. Not if you replace him by an even more evil dictator, for example.

by a reader on Thu, 09/16/2004 - 04:54 | reply

two cases not one

As always in these conversations it's important to distinguish between two issues, as in places Gil and R. fail to:

1. For what reasons did the US [or Britain, as applicable] decide it necessary to wage the war?

2. For what reasons did the US (unsuccessfully as it turned out) argue that the UNSC ought to endorse such a war?

These need not be the same thing and, in fact, were not. The US didn't wage the war because of "WMD". "WMD" was among the reasons (which you can look up yourself by googling the actual war powers declaration) but it was not 'the' reason (1.)

However, it was 'the' reason given for 2. That's because "WMD" was actually something within the UNSC's "jurisdiction" (to continue the analogy). It was one of the few things we could have reasonably expected the UNSC to actually care about. (Of course, we were wrong - in particular Colin Powell and Tony Blair were wrong - and they didn't.)

That's why saying we went after Saddam "because he (we thought) had WMD" is wrong. We argued that the UNSC should support us because he (we thought) had WMD, but that's not the same thing. We went after Saddam for a list of reasons one of which was the "WMD" issue.

This is all still clarified better by the Capone analogy but that analogy must actually be understood, which evidently it hasn't been. FYI here's the analogous 1. and 2. for Capone:

1. Why was the government interested in putting Capone away to the point of putting Elliot Ness types on his tail (yes all my knowledge of Capone does come from the De Palma movie)?

2. Why did government prosecutors argue that a jury should find a guilty verdict on the charge of tax evasion?

Not the same. No reason for them to be the same. There are two cases to speak about, not only one.

by a reader on Thu, 09/16/2004 - 04:55 | reply

--blix

--blix

by a reader on Thu, 09/16/2004 - 04:55 | reply

Why Bush Went To War

Has anyone read Misunderestimated? It's by a guy who got to talk with Bush. Anyhow, Bush explains there were three main arguments for war, in his mind: 1) to make the world safer and to stop Saddam from sponsoring terrorism. 2) WMD 3) to free the Iraqi people. they decided to focus on the WMD issue b/c, in the administration's own words, paraphrased, they wanted to present a case for war that had nothing debatable -- only the most solid, unquestionable evidence was to be used. WMD was thought to be much better than the other 2 issues in that regard. they never thought WMD was more important than the other reasons for war, only easier to prove, and that's exactly why it got focussed on.

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Thu, 09/16/2004 - 05:07 | reply

Re: is it always good to overthrow evil dictators?

Not always. Not if you replace him by an even more evil dictator, for example.

But you wouldn't replace the dictator with a more evil dictator if you held it true that "it always good to overthrow evil dictators". So I don't think the example is a good one.

by a reader on Thu, 09/16/2004 - 05:20 | reply

But It's Not A Complete Argument

Blixa,

I understand the distinction you make. I (and R) am (are) making a different point. When I read The World asking:

If Al Capone had been found not guilty of tax evasion for lack of evidence, would that have made the war against organised crime unjust? Would the media have proclaimed that it would have been better if Capone had been left alone? That the US government should apologise for 'lying' about the tax evasion?

I assume that they are trying to speak to people who ask these questions of the Coalition because of a failure to prove the WMD charges.

In order for the analogy to carry any weight with those people, an argument must be made that the ability to prove the WMD charge, like ability to prove the tax evasion charge, was not an essential aspect of the justification for using force.

It's not obvious. As you say yourself, our belief that Saddam was involved in seeking WMDs was a part of our rationale; moreso than the tax evasion issue was a part of the rationale for the campaign against Capone, so the analogy is definitely not perfect.

What I'm saying is that persuading the people (not me!) that I describe above requires an explanation for why our ability to prove this charge was not essential. Not just that other reasons were mentioned, but that they (along with the reasonableness, given imperfect information, of presuming that Saddam was seeking WMD capability) constitute a sufficient justification.

Gil

by Gil on Thu, 09/16/2004 - 05:23 | reply

persuading ppl

Gil,

I think you greatly overestimate your knowledge of what will and won't persuade people. People are really complex. In general we should just use whatever arguments we find best, unless we have a specific reason to go with another one. And I think we should never declare arguments useless because of some imagined notion that no one will get it. No one ever understands everything you say, but even when you say very tricky things, many people will understand some.

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Thu, 09/16/2004 - 05:35 | reply

RE: Persuading People

Well, it seems pretty clear to me that people who hold the opinions described will need more than an assertion that they have been wrong about what is important to justify this war. And, I don't see much more to this argument than that.

But, I suppose I could be wrong about that.

If any reader came to this post in opposition to the invasion of Iraq because of the lack of Weapons of Mass Destruction, and was persuaded by the post's argument that the invasion was justified, please add a comment declaring that, and explaining it if possible.

Thanks.

Gil

by Gil on Thu, 09/16/2004 - 06:40 | reply

true dat

Gil,

I like Elliot's response. Seconded. In general I make no claims that this argument will persuade people, just that it should. ;-)

But I do think you have a point that while, in reality, tax evasion was a miniscule part of the reasons for going after Capone, "WMD" was a significant part of the reasons for the US going after Saddam (i.e. 1. not merely 2.). In that sense, the analogy isn't perfect. Indeed.

Best,

-Blixa

by a reader on Thu, 09/16/2004 - 15:08 | reply

Re: is it always good to overthrow evil dictators?

But you wouldn't replace the dictator with a more evil dictator if you held it true that "it always good to overthrow evil dictators".

Yeah, you might. Because you don't always get what you intend. This is actually very common in revolutions. Someone works out how to overthrow a tyrant by force but fails to work out how to install a system of government in which the next leader won't either be overthrown by force or stay in power by tyranny.

by a reader on Thu, 09/16/2004 - 15:45 | reply

using the arguement

There's a guy at my work who was sold on the war when he believed Saddam had WMD, but is against the war now. He is an intelligent guy who will listen to reasonable arguements (and doesn't fall into the group Gil was talking about who were never going to be for the war even if we found stockpiles of WMD.) In presenting this arguement to him, I just want to be clear on what conclusion I want him to reach. Is it something like: Even if Saddam didn't have WMD, he deserved to be overthrown because he was a murderer theif, etc. much the same way that Capone deserved to be in prison whether or not you think tax evasion is a big deal. We just couldn't have brought justice to either one had it not been for the WMD arguement and the tax evasion business?

I imagine he'd argue back, "yes Saddam is a murderer who deserves to die or spend the rest of his life in prison, but not at the expense of 1000 plus American lives. Plus we were decieved into thinking the case for war was A when really it was B, when in the Capone case no one had any problem with putting him away for just B if only they could prove it, etc."

Perhaps I'm not the one who should be making the analogy arguement. I'll let him read the entire string of posts. Maybe I'll be proved wrong. Not that I consider a poll of one to be the least bit scientific. Perhaps some of you posters have friends with similar stances as my co-worker and can direct them to these posts and see what they think.

by R on Thu, 09/16/2004 - 16:12 | reply

Re: using the argument

R asked:

Is it something like: Even if Saddam didn't have WMD, he deserved to be overthrown because he was a murderer thief, etc. much the same way that Capone deserved to be in prison whether or not you think tax evasion is a big deal. We just couldn't have brought justice to either one had it not been for the WMD argument and the tax evasion business?

No.

It's that Saddam's posture and role in regional and world affairs made his removal a necessary condition for not losing the war (where 'losing' means becoming increasingly subject to attacks like 9/11 or much worse).

by Editor on Thu, 09/16/2004 - 16:54 | reply

2 cases part 2

Small point, to R:

[your friend would say] "Plus we were deceived into thinking the case for war was A when really it was B"

No. "We" [the US, let's say] were presented a "case" (B). This "case" was fine, and succeeded, convincing us to support a war and to support our Congress in authorizing a war.

Later, an effort was made (a foolish one in retrospect, I would argue) to get UN help. Indeed a different, and more specific, "case" (A) was presented to the UN than the one which convinced "us" (B). Case A relied more heavily on "WMD" which is why most people now think it discredited. (For the record: I don't for one damn second think that "Saddam didn't have any WMD" is a true statement.)

Now if your friend thinks that "we were deceived into thinking the case for war was A when really it was B" this is because he has deceived himself, in thinking that the "case" which convinced us (B) and the "case" we presented to the UN (A) need to be or even were intended to be one and the same. Case A was not being pitched to him in the first place, it was being pitched to the UN Security Council.

And there is no "deception" in presenting different "cases" before different venues with different concerns, interests, and jurisdictions.

At root, the Feds (presumably, unless their priorities were out of whack) wanted to get Capone because he was a gangster, not because he evaded taxes. Was Capone's tax-evasion jury, then, "deceived" because the case they heard (one assumes) focused on all that tax-evasion jazz?

2 cases not 1.

-Blix

by a reader on Thu, 09/16/2004 - 17:55 | reply

R's colleague might be interested in this too

Tommy Franks, King Abdullah, and WMD.

by Editor on Thu, 09/16/2004 - 19:40 | reply

Re: using the argument

Blixa,

I'm not sure we're on the same page as to what A and B are. The way I'm interpreting the original analogy, A is the "legal" means in which we sold the war and B is the only necessary justification for war. A is the WMD issue (which I agree is far more than him simply possessing stockpiles of them at this exact moment, but for the sake of simplicity let's just call it the WMD issue) B is the murderer/tyrant/thief etc issue.

I don't think "we" (meaning the U.S.) were sold on the war with just B and the U.N. was never sold on the war even with both A and B.

Again, just an interpretation of the original analogy, but I see B as his crimes and threat to the region, and A as his threat to us. I don't ever remember hearing a case made for war based on just B, and having failed to sell it, they came back with A as well.

The reason I still believe that removing him was the right thing to do is that A (the threat to us) is still satisfied even though we didn't find stockpiles of WMD (all those reasons have already been listed by others: his active desire to acquire them, his use of them in the past etc.) In the Capone case A (the tax evasion) is not necessary to justify getting rid of him, it's just the legal means.

Now if you were to re-define A and B so that A = Saddam having stockpiles of WMD right now at this exact second, and B = everything else, including his active desire to acquire them etc., then yes, A is not a necessary justification for the war. But in this case, A is not the legal justification for war, only a small part of it. Most of it being his violations of U.N. resolutions, his links to terrorists, and his growing threat to us. All of which are parts of B.

In answer to my question about what conclusion I want my co-worker to come to as a result of the Capone analogy, the editor writes:

"It's that Saddam's posture and role in regional and world affairs made his removal a necessary condition for not losing the war (where 'losing' means becoming increasingly subject to attacks like 9/11 or much worse)."

I agree that there a lot of compelling arguments to be made so that one might reach this conclusion, but tax evasion is to Capone as WMD is to Saddam, is not getting me there. But again, I could still be missing something.

by a reader on Thu, 09/16/2004 - 20:52 | reply

WMD stockpiles vs stance

Tax evasion is to Capone as WMD stockpiles are to Saddam.

WMD stance is a different issue from that of WMD stockpiles.

by Editor on Thu, 09/16/2004 - 21:12 | reply

A better understanding

So it is basically the second scenario I presented. A = WMD stockpiles and B = everything else he's guilty of. But doesn't that mean that anyone who was only sold on the war because of the addition of A to the argument would now be saying that the war was not justified since A turned out to be false? The analogy here would only, at best, be preaching to the choir, and at worst, be more fuel for those who think they were deceived. "Aha! They never needed A to be true, so they played on our fears to justify a war that they wanted to wage even without A. They think WMD stockpiles is just some trivial addendum, akin to tax evasion, that needed to be tacked on to convince us gullible idiots to go along with a war they were already planning on waging."

But then again, you never said anything in your original post about this being a persuasive argument for the unconverted. It's just an interesting way of putting the justification for emphasizing A at the time, when A was never a necessary criteria for those of us who already believed in overthrowing Saddam. In either case, thank you for clarifying the analogy for me.

by a reader on Thu, 09/16/2004 - 22:51 | reply

Apology

By the way, the last two posts by "a reader" are "R." I just didn't log in on this computer.

And please forgive me for channeling Al Gore in my last post. It won't happen again.

R

by a reader on Thu, 09/16/2004 - 22:59 | reply

A & B

R,

To try not to make this needlessly confusing let me start by giving you my definitions in my analogy (which may slightly differ from The World's BTW). You had introduced cases A & B into the mix with this hypothesized retort: "we were deceived into thinking the case for war was A when really it was B". From this I surmised that A=WMD and B=Saddam_is_a_bad_man (to speak very loosely ;-). From this I got the general pattern (please correct me if I'm wrong):

B: the "real reasons" we wanna go after him

A: what can we get him on / spur a jury into action with?

Notice that B applies to us (what convinced us, the "police" or actors who have decided to do this thing?), whereas A is an argument presented to some specific jury (and has no general moral applicability outside of that jury, not even necessarily with us).

In Capone's case this plays out as follows:

B: he's a damn dirty gangster, just plain trouble, smashes underlings with baseball bats (at least in Robert Deniro version)

A: he evaded taxes and we can prove it before you 12 of his peers

In Saddam's case we all agree that

A: "WMD" etc. The "jury" being, the UN Security Council.

But there is confusion about B. You complain, "I don't ever remember hearing a case made for war based on just B". This is to misunderstand case B (the way I'm using it, anyway). Case B = our reasons for doing it by definition. Thus, whatever our reasons - more to the point Congress's reasons - for supporting the war, I'm bundling them up and calling them "Case B". Case B in fact happens to include aspects of Case A (WMD), it's just not limited to Case A (which is one of the main things so many fail to grasp, and why the Capone analogy is necessary).

It's hard to pin down exactly what our case B was for deciding on war, but a good objective place to start might be to examine the war powers declaration passed by Congress. You'll see that it mentions WMD but it mentions lotsa other stuff too. Well, that's Case B. That's why we (through our Congressmen) decided to do the war, for better or worse. We/they can't have been "tricked" into supporting it for some other reasons, because after all Congress wrote down their reasons, voted on it, and it passed. End of that phase of the "trial".

Case A was for a different trial phase in front of a different jury, the UN. Case A was not for your friend, nor for me, nor for Congress. It was for the UN Security Council. And it failed. Your friend should not have been "tricked" into thinking case A was "the" case for war because he should have, rather, understood that case A was tailored toward a specific jury (the UN Security Council), and not him. The case which was pitched, indirectly, to him (case B) had already succeeded, in October 2002. After this point he, and I, and you, were irrelevant to the debate. Our part in the "trial" had concluded.

Now obviously your friend is not alone in feeling "tricked". This is what bothered me about Bush caving to Powell and Blair and deciding to go to the UN in the first place, because (in addition to the fact that it gave Saddam time to ship his WMDs out of country and plead innocent - which, I believe, is exactly what he did!) I knew that it would warp the debate in precisely this manner, by causing a myopic focus on "WMD". Bush had already gotten a War Powers vote but by going to the UN, and (necessarily) tailoring his argument for the UN only, it was inevitable that a lot of US observers would get the idea that those arguments and those arguments alone constituted the "case for war", as if there was still something to discuss. In US terms, there wasn't.

So if your friend was "tricked" into thinking we went to war

"because of WMD" that is because he did not understand that the WMD pitch (case A) was never intended for him in the first place. The only case which was intended for him (case B) was conducted via open and honest debate (well, we presume ;-) in the halls of Congress. It succeeded. A majority of our representatives were convinced by it. After the fact they, and your friend, and I, can still go back and look up just what exactly the "case" was based on. It's written down in the War Powers Resolution. No "trickery", just confusion about just what exactly the purpose of the UN debate was: it wasn't for deciding whether there would be a war, but whether the UN would help. (It didn't.)

The Capone analogy, if understood, helps clarify that confusion.

by a reader on Fri, 09/17/2004 - 00:02 | reply

P.S.

And just to be clear, I see that your construction is A=WMD, B=everything else besides WMD. That's not my construction. Mine is: A=WMD, B=everything which convinced a majority of Congress to vote "yes" on War Powers, including perhaps WMD if and where applicable.

this has been,

-Blix

by a reader on Fri, 09/17/2004 - 00:05 | reply

The War Powers Resolution

FYI, folks.

by Editor on Fri, 09/17/2004 - 00:40 | reply

Purpose of the Argument

With due credence to the existence of R's friend, I suspect that there are very few people in the world who were for the war when it was about WMD, but have now changed their mind since said weapons have failed to materialise. I do not believe this is how people's convictions tend to work. It seems to me more likely that a number of people who support the war felt comfortable about their convictions when they believed the issue was WMD, but now that the consensus is that it wasn't/isn't have become uncomfortable because they cannot find an explicit argument to support their convictions.

Perhaps the purpose of this post was to provide said argument in order to restore faith to such people.

Socrates

by a reader on Sun, 09/19/2004 - 23:42 | reply

re: purpose of argument

I think we can all agree that most Americans were either in the pro-war faction or the anti-war faction before the WMD stockpiles argument was introduced, and for the most part their position was unaffected by it. But there has to be a significant group that falls between these groups, right? People who changed their minds about the war after being convinced that Saddam had WMD, even if most people at The World agree that the argument wasn't for them?

Upon further reflection, and deeper discussions with my friend, I think the answer may be a little more complicated. I think it may be a version of liberal guilt.

My friend is a liberal who was deeply affected, as we all were, by 9/11. He's from New York. He was angry. He got caught up, in what he believes, was the frenzy of post 9/11 anger. At the time he was easily convinced that Saddam was a threat to us, but now, with the dissipation of that initial anger, the clear thinking liberal has reemerged and feels bad. And if he feels bad, he must be a victim. He was duped. One part of Bush's argument turned out to not be true, so that must be the argument that convinced him to go astray from his normal views. He was deceived. Perhaps not out right lied to, but he figures Bush told his guys (and apparently the intelligence services of like seven other countries including Russia and Jordan, but I digress) to find stuff for him to use in the argument. No one working for Bush was going to win any gold stars by bringing up the idea that the WMD intelligence was unreliable, or the link between Saddam and AQ was shaky. Or so the thinking goes.

I know this seems to have gone a bit off topic, but to bring it back to the Capone analogy and how it might possibly prove useful with this group of people – I'm still not sure. No one wants to be told that they're remembering history wrong; that they were for the war without the WMD argument, and only think that was what convinced them, but we at The World forums know better. And even if they are convinced, I don't think it will change their position on the war, it will only make them feel worse about their initial wrong headedness.

by R on Mon, 09/20/2004 - 15:51 | reply

41st post!

R, again, it might not prove useful. That's ok.

I wouldn't presume to tell someone they're "remembering history wrong" or what they were for the war, er, for. If your friend were to tell me he opposed the war w/o WMD but favored it with, I might think it weird but I'd certainly believe him.

This isn't about what your friend was for the war for. It's about what our Congress was for the war for. This opinion (of Congress) can have been different, in various ways, from the opinion of your friend, as it was different from the opinions of Noam Chomsky or Pat Buchanan. Indeed it could have been slightly different for each Congressman who voted Yes. There's nothing wrong with or unusual about any of that. I have disagreements with Congress myself on various things.

My point is that Congress had a collection of reasons for thinking war with Iraq was warranted, but only a subset, and not necessarily a pivotal subset (WMD), was actionable before the UNSC when (unsuccessfully) trying to get them on board. You're saying that (for whatever reason) it was precisely that subset which was seemingly most important to your friend; that, for him, WMD was the pivotal issue.

I suspect the resolution then is to say to your friend, If WMD was the pivotal issue for you then (assuming "no WMD") yes I certainly understand why you now feel the war was bad (or whatever). There's no arguing with this; "Saddam had no WMD!", rightly or wrongly, is now the Conventional Wisdom, and thus someone with your friend's WMD-pivotal view, necessarily, de-supports the war. As is his right.

My only problem would be if he claims that WMD was pivotal in some objective sense, external to his private priorities. In other words, if he got his idea that "the war was only justified with WMD" from the UN debate, I think that would be wrong because that would represent a distinct failure to understand what was actually being attempted before the UN. At the UN we were not attempting to make a case for "There Should Be A War" but, rather, for "The UN Should Help".

To conclude from observing the latter case that "it was all about WMD" is like observing Al Capone's tax evasion trial and concluding that federal prosecutors, the FBI, etc care more about tax evasion than about racketeering and murder. Again, it's ok if your friend actually has those WMD-centric priorities (war ok if WMD, not if not), just not if he continues to try to claim that this somehow objectively follows from the fact that the UN debate focused on WMDs. It doesn't. Best,

--Blix

by a reader on Mon, 09/20/2004 - 23:25 | reply

42 42 42

assuming blix can count, i get post 42. mwahahaha

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 09/21/2004 - 00:12 | reply

what ideas appeal to who just a random example of how unpredictable it is: of the very few strangers who've liked my blog enough to email me, two are in porn/sex industry. and they are both leftists, too. who would have predicted that?

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 09/21/2004 - 21:20 | reply

Not controversial among historians?

"Prohibition brought into being a new kind of criminal—the bootlegger. The career of Al Capone was a dramatic instance of the development of bootlegging on a large scale. His annual earnings were estimated at $60,000,000. The rise of the bootlegging gangs led to a succession of gang wars and murders. A notorious incident was the St. Valentine's Day Massacre in Chicago in 1929, when the Capone gang shot to death seven members of the rival "Bugs" Moran gang. Historians of the underworld, however, suggest that by the late 1920s bootlegging was on the verge of semimonopoly control and that the end of gang wars was approaching." Encyclopaedia Britannica, article "Prohibition"

The article on "Al Capone" is more nuanced, but still implies that Capone was a product of the creation of victimless crimes.

by a reader on Sat, 10/16/2004 - 03:42 | reply

No To Chechen Independence For The Foreseeable Future

We are no fans of President Putin – far from it – nor apologists for his handling of the Chechnya issue. But...

There are no 'moderate' leaders seeking Chechen independence.

If there were, then following the recent mass murder of Russian children and others, to which a Chechen terrorist leader has confessed, the moderate leaders would have done much more than issue meaningless condemnations which do nothing but insult the dead and the bereaved. They would have declared:

- That they are diverting all their resources to the capture and/or punishment of those who sent the perpetrators;
- That they will not rest until all terrorist organisations based in Chechnya are eradicated;
- That they offer to cooperate with the Russian authorities in every possible way to achieve that;
- And that their claim for independence has been put on hold until that is achieved.

Since none of them have done this, we have to conclude that the cause of Chechen independence is not legitimate.

Sun, 09/19/2004 - 01:50 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Independence

I would agree.

I also wonder why Chechnya has a special claim to independence. There are several former Russian states which now exist on their own. Each has some degree of economic tie to the former Soviet Union, now as Russia. Terrorism was irrelevant to their independence although each country had particular issues. Terrorism has never created an independent state nor does it have that true goal. Revolution is a different story, although peaceful it might be.

by a reader on Mon, 09/20/2004 - 14:50 | reply

Bewildered

Although I would agree with your conclusion, I can hardly agree with your logic. Terrorism is a method of making one's voice heard; it does not by itself make a cause illegitimate, especially if used with declared and careful discretion. The African National Congress had decided on performing sabotage and possibly terrorist attacks on the apartheid government in the heat of the suppression in South Africa. In their case, I would not agree with your conclusion. The Chechen cause for independence, and the role the Islamists play in it is illegitimate for other reasons, correlated but not due to their methods.

by a reader on Thu, 09/23/2004 - 06:11 | reply

This Cause is inseparable from the actors

The issue is not whether terrorism "makes" a cause illegitimate. Of course it cannot (else some e.g. animal-rights bombers would "prove" that it's ok to be mean to animals).

The problem is that this cause (unlike other causes one might name) is inseparable from the issue of who would be placed in power were the cause's goal achieved. The "cause" is not just some abstract proposition but is simultaneously, in practice, an attempt at a power-grab. As The World explained, there do not seem to be any voices of moderation willing and/or able to assume such power, only terrorists and defacto tacit (or cowed) terrorist supporters, therefore it is not right to support the cause.

So in this particular case, terrorism doesn't "make the cause illegitimate" per se, but the fact that there are only terrorists, and no viable moderates to be found to assume the mantle of power, actually kinda does.

--Blix

by a reader on Fri, 09/24/2004 - 00:49 | reply

Terrorism can only fill a vacuum

Terror is a tactic. It thrives only when there is a frustrated stupefied audience drawn into witnessing a turmoil of imbalance of power, lack of initiative, and lost foresight. In some rare cases by filling a vacuum of leadership and vision terror tactics may eventually spark a reaction, a change or shift, but only through the unbearability of chaos. Terrorism thus fills a vacuum of civilization, but only briefly in the course of human events. Nature, including human nature, abhors a vacuum. Terror on the fringe never brings the change that terrorists seek. It fosters instead an alternative stability which terrorists abhor, either the dead stability of dictatorship or the living dynamic of representative freedom. Peoples always have choices. To permanently live in fear of being blown up is not one of them.

by a reader on Fri, 09/24/2004 - 14:54 | reply

Point of Agreement

Blixa, this is the Bewildered "reader" from the second comment above. I wanted to thank you for your comment, and say, I think I see the point you and perhaps the author(s) of the original post make. I agree with this:

Since the cause in question is pursued by "terrorists" who are going, most likely, to continue their terrorising even after they grab the power, it is illegitimate. That seems to me to be the only way terrorism could make a cause illegitimate: terrorism as a way of government. But terrorism as a way of taking control of the government, as exemplified by the ANC case I wrote above, is only a tactic.

Cheers!

by a reader on Sat, 09/25/2004 - 10:28 | reply

correction

That seems to me to be the only way terrorism could make a cause illegitimate: terrorism as a way of government.

Apologies!

Editor's note: Corrected.

by a reader on Mon, 09/27/2004 - 19:22 | reply

They Have to be Moderate to Have a Right to Independence?

I don't know a whole lot about Cechnya and don't really care to. From my standpoint, they could all commit a mass suicide and I'd only be frustrated at one more (albiet last) headline that doesn't interest me on the front page of my newspaper.

I do object to your implication that Cechnya has to have moderate leaders in order to have a right to sovereignty. (Pardon my spelling.) Because Hussein was extremist, the U.S. could rightfully colonize Iraq now? (Think about it, it's a solution.) Either people have a right to decide how they're governed, or they don't.

Don't blame their leaders' political leanings.

by a reader on Wed, 09/29/2004 - 23:30 | reply

I am a 14 year old student.

I am a 14 year old student. I think that chechnya deserves freedom and if they are not granted it they should do hatever it takes to get it. It is sad that thee people are being deprived of what is rightfully theirs and it also hurts e to see humans being treated like pets or animals. This sickens me and makes me scared to grow up in a world were I an american could one day be like the cechnians and be own by another. Give the people what they want. god bless

by a reader on Fri, 01/07/2005 - 21:29 | reply

chechnya islamo-psychopaths

The problem in chechnya is trhat islamo-fascist psychopaths have not yet been vanquished and totally destroyed. This is the only way to deal with anyone or any group or nation infected with the scourge of islamo-lunacy.

by pilgrim on Sun, 01/09/2005 - 19:07 | reply

What Is The Foreign Office Good For?

A Foreign Office official has said that the UN should not impose sanctions on Sudan:

“[They] must remain an option but ... there is a danger that the albeit limited cooperation that Sudanese government has offered so far would be withdrawn if the international community failed to acknowledge the small things that have changed for the better.”

Is that the main danger that the Foreign Office fears? For over a decade, the Islamist government in Sudan has been waging a genocidal campaign against Christians and black Africans. They are not doing this by mistake. They do not just have lax security, they are actively sponsoring mass murder.

And the Foreign Office wants the free, powerful nations of the world to back off for fear that the vicious tyrannical thugs might undo even the “small things that have changed for the better”? Is that all that the future victims of genocide can expect from the West? is that all we are good for?

Vicious tyrannical thugs do not lightly abandon attempts to destroy those whom they see as their enemies or their rightful prey. Even now they will not admit that they are responsible for the current crisis. Why are they now even slightly less uncooperative than in the past? It is not because of any sudden access of good will, either to their victims or to the West. It is solely because they rightly perceive that the US is now starting to pay attention to them and they are afraid, as they ought to be. If the West is to make the Sudanese government disarm the militias and cease their totalitarian violence, we must openly threaten them. Sanctions would be a start. Begging them not to undo even the few cosmetic concessions they have so far made would not.

Fri, 09/24/2004 - 23:31 | digg | del.icio.us | permlink

Sanctions?

To be sure, it's a good idea to punish people or governments when they commit crimes, so as to give them an incentive to stop. In the case of Sudan, military action (ground or air strikes) might be a start. But sanctions mean that people living in the territory of a bad government are punished for the actions of that government, even though many may well disagree with those actions. Under sanctions those people are no longer allowed to trade with foreigners. Many of these people will be the very victims of the government aggression the sanctions seek to address. Furthermore, all people in the whole world are punished by not being able to trade with people living in that country. What is the justification for this?

Henry Sturman

by Henry Sturman on Sat, 09/25/2004 - 14:49 | reply

collateral damage that effect is collateral damage, and just like with bombing, sometimes it's worth it. though i do find it hard to imagine when sanctions on everything would help, sanctioning say weapons sounds reasonable enough. No need to sell big bombs to someone the day before we invade.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Sat, 09/25/2004 - 17:47 | reply

Middle-East Experts

A noted democracy expert has expressed his opinion about the prospects for democracy in Iraq:

Jordan's King Abdullah has said it will be impossible to hold fair elections in Iraq in the current state of chaos

His Majesty also announced upcoming free and fair elections for the post of ruler of Jordan.

(Just kidding.)

Some noted surrender experts have been giving the Coalition forces in Iraq advice on – well – surrender.

Withdrawal of US-led forces must be on the agenda if an international summit on Iraq is to go ahead, France's Foreign Minister Michel Barnier said

Or they'll do what?

Some experts on turning the other cheek have been showing the world how it's done:

Roman Catholic and Orthodox clerics have exchanged blows inside Jerusalem's Church of the Holy Sepulchre, one of Christianity's holiest sites.

Thwack! "Forgive that!"

And a noted terrorism expert has been giving advice to – well – terrorists:

Yasser Arafat has promised to intercede on behalf of British hostage Ken Bigley

[...]

[T]he Palestinian leader had allocated one of his senior ministers "who had spent many years on the ground in Iraq" to try and make contact with Mr Bigley's captors.

"I think that what is important is that, in the past, President Arafat has influenced the network of communication about other hostages so it was in that context that I decided this would be something very positive to do."

Saddest of all, an ex-President of the United States has become enamoured of conspiracy theories (via Allah):

Carter responded to personal question as well. He said his two favorite movies are "Casablanca" and "Fahrenheit 9/11."

[Sigh.]

Tue, 09/28/2004 - 21:20 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

casablanca out of curiosity, anything wrong with casablanca? I liked it. But was not looking for deep meaning while watching.

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 09/28/2004 - 23:13 | reply

Carter

My client, Mr. Carter, wishes it to be known that Fahrenheit 9/11 is his favorite purely for artistic reasons. He believes the results achieved by the talented director, surpass even those of the most distinguished and critical cineast Lenie Riefenstahl - his second favorite movie maker. Mr. Carter's favorite movies are gripping realistic fictional movies, hence his choice for a top two in that category.

Mr. Carter feels both his favorite movies provide the purest romantic dramatisation of respectively love and hate. Oh, and by the way, obviously Mr. Carter meant Fahrenheit 415 and not Fahrenheit 9/11 and he apologises for any inconvenience which might have been caused by this unfortunate mistake.

Henry Sturman

by Henry Sturman on Tue, 09/28/2004 - 23:30 | reply

Brokaw, Jennings Rally Round Rather

Acting firmly to dispel any impression that the sickness in the mainstream media is confined to CBS, Dan Rather's opposite numbers in ABC and NBC have rallied round to support him:

competing news anchors Tom Brokaw and Peter Jennings offered support Saturday for the beleaguered newsman.

[...]

"What I think is highly inappropriate is what going on across the Internet, a kind of political jihad ... that is quite outrageous,"

That's an interesting choice of insult: can anyone recall Brokaw or Jennings ever using the term 'jihad' in a pejorative sense before? Can anyone even recall them conceding that a jihad is under way – not a 'political' one but a real one that maims and slaughters children? Or that jihadis ever do anything at all reprehensible, let alone 'outrageous'?

Perhaps when their white hot rage that someone in pyjamas has dared to criticise a senior member of their guild has abated a little, they'll withdraw the comment and replace it by a less offensive one. Let's see ... what about 'what's going on across the Internet, a kind of political Americanism ... is quite outrageous'? Yes, that would express the same sentiment perfectly, and offend no one of consequence.

Sat, 10/02/2004 - 22:23 | digg | del.icio.us | permlink

What's it going to take...

...for Rather to get the boot?

The BBC's example is not encouraging, it took a public inquiry saying they were a bunch of lying appeasement weasels (paraphrasing slightly inaccurately) to get Greg Dyke and some other lying pillock fired.

Alan

by Alan Forrester on Sun, 10/03/2004 - 01:57 | reply

Copyright © 2007 Setting The World To Rights

'Deterrence' by Bill Whittle

Bill Whittle has written another outstanding essay. Go and read it.

Wed, 10/06/2004 - 17:19 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

I agree

It is a good essay.

I have been reading your blog since I learned Mr Deutsch was involved. I liked his book and Edge article.

My blog is www.legenda.blogspot.com. It is about the war. I hope you will read it.

by a reader on Thu, 10/07/2004 - 06:51 | reply

comments

yeah David Deutsch rules.

ur blog doesn't have comments or even contact info (email), so not so much fun to read if I can't reply :-/

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Thu, 10/07/2004 - 17:33 | reply

Democracy

Interesting article. I can't help thinking though that Bush and Kerry have absolutely nothing to do with government. They are vying to be puppets of the real ruling class. Is democracy an illusion? I lose sleep over this these days. Not that I'm a conspiracy theorist, but why did 9-11 happen? this is not a question I hear asked often. Why would anyone want to do such a thing - surely - 'they' feel they have a reason. I wonder what that reason is? What's clear to me is, the threat of Saddam revaluing his oil in euros, the succession of Turkey into Europe and the free market, oil buying muscle of China is now (post non-UN endorsed invasion of Afghanistan/Iraq) much less of a concern to the USA. - Geokker,

Re: Democracy

Not that I'm a conspiracy theorist, but why did 9-11 happen? this is not a question I hear asked often.

Perhaps it should be asked and answered more often.

Why would anyone want to do such a thing - surely - 'they' feel they have a reason. I wonder what that reason is?

Perhaps 'their' stated reason would be a good place to start.

(BTW, those keywords in the middle of your home page? They should be links. Surely I'm not the only person who has clicked on 'dumbDesign' a few times before thinking that yes, indeed, it is a dumb design to make me go find the matching word in the sidebar.)

by Kevin on Fri, 10/08/2004 - 23:27 | reply

Geokker, "Not that I'm a c

Geokker,

"Not that I'm a conspiracy theorist, but why did 9-11 happen? this is not a question I hear asked often."

You don't have to be a conspiracy 'theorist' to ask that question and it's not true that it is not asked often. In fact 9-11 was a conspiracy by definition, involving at the very least 19 men (plus we now know about the "mastermind" KSM, etc, so there were more than just 19, but 19 is surely enough for a conspiracy). There were many articles about why this happened at the time and it boiled down to the fact that this conspiracy of 19+ men wanted to kill a lot of Americans, cause mayhem, and tear down what they considered to be a hugely important symbol of American power (this excludes any of those 19 who may not have known the true aim of the hijacking, but even those men will still a part of the conspiracy). Anyway, that's why it happened. Glad I could set the record straight.

"Why would anyone want to do such a thing - surely - 'they' feel they have a reason. I wonder what that reason is?"

All people have reasons for everything that they do. Sometimes, for some things, they are crazy reasons. Yes you are right they felt they had a reason. That reason was looney tunes. But follow Kevin's link to find the reason, FWIW. They wanted to do such a thing because they were fanatics.

--Blix

Copyright © 2007 Setting The World To Rights

Ishmael Khaldi

If you don't know Ishmael Khaldi's story, you should:

In my years of speaking to people, I've never received threats or personal attacks like I did speaking on campuses. There were threatening incidents at both the University of Florida and at California State University. Both were chilling. The crowd in Florida was one full of anger and hatred, yet I had to stand before them unsure of the enemy who had sent threats earlier that day...

Can you guess what made so many people so angry with Ishmael?

Fri, 10/08/2004 - 00:46 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

He found the one way...

He found the one and only way a Muslim Arab can get himself hated by the American Left.

by a reader on Fri, 10/08/2004 - 01:36 | reply

He found the one way ...

Actually, Ishmael Khaldi is an Israeli Bedouin. True the Bedouin are Arabs and Muslim, but they are also Israeli citizens. Seventy percent of Bedouin men serve in the Israeli military. Ishmael speaks about his being a minority in Israel and encourages American Jewish college students to educate themselves about their heritage and the past, present and future of Israel.

Ishmael's allegiance to Israel angers many pro-Palestinian activists. They are the people who do not want Ish to speak.

by a reader on Thu, 10/14/2004 - 03:37 | reply

The Mosque

Solomon has an excellent, careful account of why anyone should care that a new mosque is being built in Boston.

Sat, 10/09/2004 - 19:51 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

And Now He's Dead

Israel Kills Islamic Jihad Leader in Gaza Strike:

GAZA (Reuters) - Israel killed the military chief of the Palestinian militant group Islamic Jihad in a Gaza City air strike on Tuesday that drew vows of revenge and could complicate efforts to end a huge Israeli offensive.

Under what circumstances does success in a military operation "complicate efforts" to end it? Only when the best hope for peace is the defeat of the army in question. This is the objective towards which Reuters is tirelessly working. This is also why they call the murder gang a 'militant group' and its leader a 'military chief'. And it is why they endorse, as they invariably do, the murderers' transparent lie that their next mass murder will be an act of revenge. In reality the murderers howl "Death to Jews" continuously, and perpetrate it too, regardless of whether Israel has recently killed a terrorist leader or not. The only difference is that Reuters never reports the howls except on occasions like this, when they can be given the tawdry legitimacy of 'vows of revenge' and can thus reinforce the evil myth that the conflict is a 'cycle of violence'.

[...]

Dabbash's death also fanned tension just as Israeli and Palestinian officials were trying to work out a deal on ending a six-day-old Israeli offensive into the densely populated Gaza Strip to quell rocket fire into Israel by militants.

His death did not 'fan tension'. His associates were already at boiling point and killing as fast and furiously as they possibly could. In the minds of all decent people, it caused nothing but relief.

Is "densely populated" really the best adjective to describe the Gaza Strip for the purposes of this news report? Of course not. So why was it chosen? To imply that Israel is recklessly killing civilians.

[...]

Dabbash, 38, was the leader in Palestinian lands of a group sworn to destroying Israel and at the forefront of a suicide bombing campaign during a 4-year-old Palestinian uprising.

Now there's a rare admission, buried in the middle of the piece – a hard fact that contradicts the earlier spin. They should have started with it. Then next paragraph: "Now he's dead!" Third paragraph: "And we have Israel to thank, which has also killed such noted enemies of peace and freedom as..."

Mon, 10/11/2004 - 22:44 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

How can anybody look at this

How can anybody look at this as anything less than a great thing? Isreal killed a murderous thug who has the blood of many innocents on his hands, and one more jackhole gets martyred... which happens to be the greatest thing in the minds of these jackholes. Is there any clearer example of a win-win?

by a reader on Tue, 10/12/2004 - 02:42 | reply

more win-win

terrorist dies and israel gets good press would be more win/win

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 10/12/2004 - 19:34 | reply

I agree, that one's a better

I agree, that one's a better win/win, but it's about as likely as, terrorist dies and Christopher Reeve comes back to life... and can walk. Of course that would be a win/win/win, but since in we're in make believe land, why not?

by a reader on Tue, 10/12/2004 - 20:35 | reply

Another Faked Grade Scandal

We have already written about the scandal of faked grades where a student's grade can be raised or lowered as a method of discipline. Now we have heard of another scandal of faked grades where a student's marks can be raised or lowered depending on whether they have "made an effort":

Two Benedict College science professors have been fired after they refused to assign grades that rewarded students' effort as much as acquired knowledge.

President David Swinton dismissed Milwood Motley and Larry Williams when they defied his Success Equals Effort policy, which Swinton said provides struggling freshmen a leg up in adapting to college academics.

Swinton implemented SEE at the historically black private college in the 2003-04 school year. The formula calls for calculating freshman grades based on a 60-40 formula, with effort counting for 60 percent and academics counting for 40 percent.

There are many good ways for a university to help students to adapt to academic life, but this policy is not one of them. Grades must be based on competence not effort, otherwise they are either fraudulent or worthless. This policy can only hurt the students at the college and we salute Motley and Williams for refusing to participate.

Wed, 10/13/2004 - 20:06 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Tutorial

Confused about the difference between science, pseudo-science and all that? Fear not, with Teresa Heinz Kerry's help, we can now present a short tutorial:

Heinz Kerry ended with what she called "a highly effective" remedy for arthritis that drew laughter and some skepticism from the audience.

That laughter and scepticism were science.

"You get some gin and get some white raisins — and only white raisins — and soak them in the gin for two weeks," she said. "Then eat nine of the raisins a day."

That was magical thinking.

Despite the laughter, Dr. Steven Phillips, director of Geriatric Medicine at the University of Nevada quickly supported the prescription.

That was the politicisation of science.

Phillips, on stage with Heinz Kerry as part of the panel, said sulfur and sulfides found in grapes are increased by the alcohol and could perhaps alleviate joint pain.

That was scientism.

Dr. Michael Gerber, a noted homeopathic doctor

That was pseudo-science.

in Reno, also said the formula has merit.

"It makes sense," said Gerber from his office. "People go to hot springs to soak in the water and that water is very high in sulfur. So Mrs. Kerry's remedy is pretty plausible."

That was bad science.

Dolores Jackson of Reno, a Kerry supporter who attended the rally, took the raisin and gin remedy seriously.

"There are really other remedies where we don't have to use so many drugs," Jackson said. "I really believe in alternative medicine."

And that was old-fashioned gullibility. Alas, there's a lot of it about.

Sat, 10/16/2004 - 01:02 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

query

Phillips, on stage with Heinz Kerry as part of the panel, said sulfur and sulfides found in grapes are increased by the alcohol and could perhaps alleviate joint pain.

That was scientism.

Don't understand - why is this bit scientism?

by Tom Robinson on Sat, 10/16/2004 - 02:14 | reply

Re: query

OK perhaps that one was a bit of a stretch. We usually define scientism as the purported use of science to resolve non-scientific issues, especially moral issues. But a closely related pattern of irrationality, for which there is no specific name at present, is the purported explanation of mystical, magical, fraudulent etc claims for which there is no evidence by postulating a physical mechanism for which there is no evidence. Thus people say 'maybe telepathy exists and is caused by electromagnetic communication between one brain and another -- after all, brains are electrical'. Or they say 'maybe Teresa's gin-raisins really are "highly effective" against arthritis -- after all, some raisins contain sulphur and some researchers hope that some sulphur-containing drugs might have a beneficial effect on arthritis'.

by Editor on Sat, 10/16/2004 - 03:05 | reply

And note that even the "scien

And note that even the "scientism" explanation couldn't explain why ONLY white raisins. I mean, right? --Blix

by a reader on Sat, 10/16/2004 - 03:38 | reply

Only white raisins? Sounds l

Only white raisins? Sounds like scieracism to me.

by a reader on Sun, 10/17/2004 - 15:07 | reply

anti-racism

actually, b/c most raisins are black, and have been for ages, it's anti-racism to advocate for the under-represented white raisins.

they are just victims and need a boost now to restore equality.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Sun, 10/17/2004 - 17:06 | reply

There is now

"But a closely related pattern of irrationality, for which there is no specific name at present, is the purported explanation of mystical, magical, fraudulent etc claims for which there is no evidence by postulating a physical mechanism for which there is no evidence."

The Geller-Taylor syndrome.

by Alan Furman on Mon, 10/18/2004 - 11:31 | reply

Elliot, Try and tell the S

Elliot,

Try and tell the South African black raisins that a minority can't be the beneficiaries of racism.

by a reader on Tue, 10/19/2004 - 14:49 | reply

d00d i was joking

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 10/19/2004 - 19:32 | reply

gin raisins - and running!

This recipe was given to me by a friend when I had mentioned all my new aches and pains as I increased my miles while training for a marathon. Amazingly enough, after weeks of eating my raisins (although I covered them and some gin remains in them) my aches and pains are gone. My hips and knee feel better from the raisins - more so then when I was taking the "now bad for you" Celebrex.

by a reader on Sat, 12/18/2004 - 13:08 | reply

An Agonising Choice

This year's Academy Award for Best Motion Picture is thought to be likely to be awarded either to Mel Gibson's The Passion of the Christ or to Michael Moore's Fahrenheit 9/11. It will be an agonising choice for the Academy, involving a rare conflict between the two great principles – antisemitism and idiotarianism – that currently trump every other consideration in the minds of the fashionable.

The two movies are somewhat similar symptoms of the same serious malaise in Western society: the widespread loss of confidence in its secular moral values. Both are personal statements made by charming rogues who have a sense of humour, are very good at their jobs, and are driven by a core of gibbering hatred. Both peddle incendiary falsehoods that have caused murder and destruction beyond measure, been a blight on every kind of progress and will undoubtedly do a great deal more harm before they are extirpated.

Ignore them. Follow Gil's reasonable example and watch Team America.

Sun, 10/17/2004 - 17:18 | digg | del.icio.us | permlink

Team America rocks

interview about the movie. v good. they are on our side.

nice post.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Sun, 10/17/2004 - 18:43 | reply

Forced

Don't agree about The Passion; I did not see whatever you saw in it. Not saying it was my favorite film of the year (Team America has a reasonable shot - can't wait to see it!) or even that I liked it all that much (I'm pretty sure I liked, for example, "Mean Girls" better :), but the "hatred" parallel you attempt to set up between it and F9/11 rings false and seems forced. Just cuz both films are controversial doesn't make them equivalent parallel mirror images of each other.

But this discrepancy often arises because I actually watched the movie and whoever I'm talking to did not. Telling part of the article you link: "A lot of older Academy voters, who are largely Jewish, refuse to even see this movie". It's probably easy to decide a movie is "antisemitic" if you don't watch it. I know the antisemitic history of passion plays and all but um if I judge the movie based on, like, its own terms and not thinking about other stuff (besides, you know, the actual movie)... I just don't see it.

Did you watch it? Bombastic yes, antisemitic?... sorry I just don't get it. Story took place amongst a bunch of Jews, some good some bad... so what? --Blix

by a reader on Sun, 10/17/2004 - 20:34 | reply

Re: Forced

Say some thugs attack a non-Jewish hook-nosed guy in an alley, shouting "Hepp! Hepp!", and carve a swastika on his face. Someone who wasn't aware of certain memes might say: "criminal, yes; antisemitic? ... sorry I just don't get it". Anyone who is aware of those memes would know for certain that this is the very heart and soul of antisemitism in action.

by Editor on Sun, 10/17/2004 - 21:10 | reply

hmm

No seriously. Have you seen the film? It's nothin' like that --Blix

by a reader on Sun, 10/17/2004 - 23:50 | reply

Blix - are you...

Blix - are you saying that the events in the film are nothing like the events in the Editor's comment "Re: forced" above? That would be a misreading.

Or are you saying that the film is not based with loving and admiring fidelity on Emmerich's book? Or that Emmerich's book is not part of the ancient pattern of antisemitism?

I have not watched the movie because I have read enough of Emmerich's book to know that I don't want to. Check it out.

by David Deutsch on Mon, 10/18/2004 - 00:51 | reply

3cents

i haven't watched any michael moore movies, but i know they are bad. don't have to watch to know that.

or, before I saw Mean Girls, i knew I was gonna like it. then when i watched it three times I did.

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 10/18/2004 - 01:43 | reply

the passion is anti-semitic

Don't agree about The Passion; I did not see whatever you saw in it.

"I do not see anti-semitism here" is an argument from ignorance, which is a fallacy. That you don't know a reason to think something doesn't argue in the slightest it's false.

If you want to argue it's not anti-semitic, you must first find out the specific charges (learn the argument that it is) and then criticize that. In this case the argument it's anti-semitic is that it's a passion play in the grand tradition of anti-semitic passion plays. To refute this, you can explain how it's not a passion play (in the sense of the tradition not name) (good luck :D), explain how the tradition isn't anti-semitic, or come up with something else.

as for the argument that the plays are anti-semitic, so you can engage with and refute it if you like, The World posted about it here. the link for passion plays in particular is this. also The Passion was based off Emmerich's book in part, and Emmerich says in very short that jews killed jesus, became cursed, and were themselves at fault for all this. also that the jews were evil, and that this evil transmits itself to babies so it'll last through the generations.

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 10/18/2004 - 02:36 | reply

heh

DD,

"are you saying that the events in the film are nothing like the events in the Editor's comment "Re: forced" above? That would be a misreading."

Heh. That it would be. No I'm not. I'm saying The Passion is not analogous to that example. What I meant by this is that the example contains elements that are recognizably antisemitic but this (maybe..) needs to be explained. However having thought about it most of those elements don't even need to be explained. Anyway, The Passion (the movie (ITSELF)) does not contain analogous elements, whether explainable or not. (I've heard some attempted explanations and consider them bogus.)

I might listen to your attempts at rebutting my assertion that said explanations (of why elements X Y Z of The Passion are antisemitic) are bogus but, alas, as you have not seen the film, you're not in a position to do it....

I have not read the Emmerich book. I'm judging the film (ITSELF).

Elliot (and DD),

It sounds to me as if you simply wouldn't think it is possible to tell the story of "the passion" (=a certain rather short period in the life of the literary character "Jesus"), i.e. make a "passion play", without being antisemitic. If not, then fine, I admit that The Passion is antisemitic under that standard, a standard I'm not very interested in.

If it is possible to tell a non-antisemitic "passion" story (by your standard), how would one go about doing it?

--Blix

by a reader on Mon, 10/18/2004 - 04:00 | reply

P.S. (not T.S.) Elliot

BTW "I saw the movie and did not find it antisemitic" is not an argument from ignorance despite my perhaps poor choice of words which gave you that opening. I am not ignorant of it having been antisemitic, I have knowledge of it NOT being antisemitic, namely from having seen it, which many of those who are calling it antisemitic ("less ignorant" than I, apparently?) haven't. If I see your red shirt and say "gee that doesn't look blue to me" am I "arguing from ignorance"?

I've heard and read many of the arguments as to why The Passion is antisemitic and found them bogus, like I said. Interestingly, it's not necessary for me rebut those arguments here, because none such have been advanced by anyone, not in this post nor in the prior post you linked. There is an argument that "Matthew"'s author, or at least the later author/insertor of a certain infamous line, had antisemitic intent, and an argument that some chick named Emmerich was obsessed with antisemitic thoughts, neither of which I dispute. There is no argument, there or here, that the film "The Passion of the Christ" is antisemitic. There is an assertion. Onus is not on me but on the asserters. Which will be - or should be - hard to do without having seen the movie.

It's easy to do however if your standard for antisemitism is "if it's a passion play [=tells the story of JC's last day] it's antisemitic".

by a reader on Mon, 10/18/2004 - 07:51 | reply

compare and contrast

<http://web.israelinsider.com/...>

><http://www.womentodaymagazine.com/contact/antisemitic.html>

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 10/18/2004 - 18:08 | reply

I have actually seen the movi

I have actually seen the movie and to me it was indeed anti-semitic: Stereo-typical Jews (with hooked nose and kippa) taking bribes to give false witness against Jesus, a group of blood thirsty psychopathic priests who, for no apparent reason but their innate vengefulness, keep on asking for Jesus' death to the very end despite Jesus' bloody and injured condition (itself much exaggerated compared to the account in the Gospels), the faces of the priests and their hypocritical soft talk to the Romans in charge, a very kind and benevolent Pilate looking desperately for "truth" and having to deal with a bloodthirsty Jewish rabble in complete contrast to real historical accounts, well known antisemitic symbolisms like showing Satan repeatedly walking among the Jews-his people(?), the famous "his blood be on us and our children" line that was still there, left without a subscript only at the pressure of ADL....

I come from Iran. So I think I know what I'm talking about when it comes to these things. I have seen many propaganda TV series depicting Zionists, Freemasons etc. This film was disturbingly similar to them.

Actually a couple of years ago the Iranian regime had made a TV series about Mary and the infant Jesus. There you also had evil Jews always in defiance of God's will, but even THEY had the Jewish authorities divided in two opposing camps, one benevolent and moral and the other evil predecessors of Zionism or whatever. (It was filled with historical mistakes, priests and rabbis were all mixed up so the two camps were based on those of Hillel and Shammai as Temple priests!)

My point is that Mel Gibson's film lacked even this. (unless you want to count one or two ordinary Jews who weren't THAT bad...put there as embellishments I guess.)

AIS

by a reader on Mon, 10/18/2004 - 19:59 | reply

How the West is lost...

I wrote this at presenceofmind.net, but I'm posting it here, also.

Greg Swann

How the West is lost...

Citing a dumb MSNBC article (Drudge had it, too), David Deutsch of Setting the World to Rights offers this:

This year's Academy Award for Best Motion Picture is thought to be likely to be awarded either to Mel Gibson's The Passion of the Christ or to Michael Moore's Fahrenheit 9/11. It will be an agonising choice for the Academy, involving a rare conflict between the two great principles -- antisemitism and idiotarianism -- that currently trump every other consideration in the minds of the fashionable.

The two movies are somewhat similar symptoms of the same serious malaise in Western society: the widespread loss of confidence in its secular moral values. Both are personal statements made by charming rogues who have a sense of humour, are very good at their jobs, and are driven by a core of gibbering hatred. Both peddle incendiary falsehoods that have caused murder and destruction beyond measure, been a blight on every kind of progress and will undoubtedly do a great deal more harm before they are extirpated.

Privately, by email to Sarah Fitz-Claridge, whom I had thought had written the piece, I wrote:

> Both [.....] are driven by a core of gibbering hatred.

This is beneath you. You have no evidence of gibbering hatred in Gibson and no shortage from Moore. This is moral relativism at its worst. Whatever Gibson's faults may be, he is motivated by nothing but benevolent ends. And whatever Moore's virtues, if any, his objectives are openly malevolent. Even taking account that neither film will attract any Oscar votes--why would that matter? are you misled or just counting coup?--this is a completely invalid comparison.

[snipped]

It is not necessary to insist that Gibson is right about anything to understand that, by grouping him with Moore, you are crediting an unearned merit to Moore.

It was Sarah who told me that the author was David Deutsch. In the mean time, I had these further thoughts:

The best-light form of the equation is:

life-loving small-l libertarian film-maker carried away by his religious faith, who may have been influenced by an antique anti-semitist, produces a film that consists of a particularly gory Stations of the Cross with a particularly saccharine Pieta as coda, which film, contrary to hysterical predictions, has had zero negative consequences and may have had some salutary positive consequences, and has no movement-oriented or anti-civilization objectives whatever equals

life-loathing Socialist propagandist desperate to deprive honest but ignorant voters of their right to an informed consent by deliberately promoting vicious mis- and disinformation, thereby intentionally undermining American and allied troops in war and openly making common cause with the worst enemies Western civilization has ever known

This is an obviously invalid equation. When we despoil thought we despoil the very thing we have that our enemies lack. We surrender that which cannot ever be conquered.

I don't like the non-concepts "idiotarian" and "anti-idiotarian", a pair of junk drawers of the mind, but whatever the poster thinks--or doesn't think--about The Passion, Mel Gibson is beyond all doubt an important voice in the ancient and continuing war against tyranny. Not only does the poster elevate his undoubted enemies, he denigrates a true friend of liberty far more important than any of us. This would be nothing more than detestable snobbery if it did not effect by erosion the enemy's objectives.

The West will fall, if it does, not because it was knocked down from the outside, but because it was not held up from the inside. That little post, of less, even, than passing moment, is how that will be done.

I have defended The Passion of the Christ at length, not just because it is a great movie, but also because it is not an evil movie. It is a good deal less important to the cause of human liberty than Braveheart or The Patriot, but it is a good and valuable and important film. Moreover, Gibson's entire corpus is entirely benevolent, where Moore's is entirely malevolent. To compare these two men in any way at all is the kind of obscenity, that, if indulged, will contribute to the fall of the West.

by gswann on Mon, 10/18/2004 - 20:25 | reply

to AIS

"Stereo-typical Jews (with hooked nose and kippa)"

Apparently there are many many Jews who are Stereo-typical Jews (a former co-worker of mine could be described this way - great guy btw) and thus should not appear on movie screens being portrayed doing things. Kippa = yarmulke right? For crying out loud, you can't show a Jew wearing a yarmulke doing something bad?

"Jews... taking bribes to give false witness against Jesus"

I think you have in mind Judas (one character), although I'm not sure he "bore false witness" he just turned the wanted guy in, seems like that's bearing true witness to me. Anyway, why did you use the plural? Apparently now if you portray a Jewish character in a film doing a negative thing that's "antisemitic". This is precisely why I get annoyed by the complaint and argue against it BTW. It's so condescending. Look: Jews are people & are capable of doing bad things, like other people. To imply that all stories must pretend otherwise is to coddle Jews as like pets.

"a group of blood thirsty psychopathic priests who, for no apparent reason but their innate vengefulness, keep on asking for Jesus' death to the very end"

It wasn't for no apparent reason, it was for an obvious reason which was perfectly apparent: because Jesus had blasphemed against the Lord their God, had claimed to be the "messiah". Had I been a member of the Sanhedrin (which implies, living in that society, having the religious views they did, etc) I reckon I would have voted the exact same way and called for his death as well. The case against him was pretty clear-cut and his own testimony was all one needed. But anyway, let's stipulate that the audience will come away thinking that particular group of Jews (the pro-crucifixion faction of the Sanhedrin - remember, there was an anti-faction as well, they just lost the vote) was portrayed doing bad stuff/having bad feelings in this film.

Thing is, other Jews were portrayed doing good stuff/having good feelings in the exact same film. Again, this is because Jews are, you know, people, some of them good some bad.

"itself much exaggerated compared to the account in the Gospels"

The account in the Gospels is sketchy so there's no disputing that the film writer filled in details according to how he felt like. Any writer of this story would have to. Anyway so you're asserting (probably correctly) that the film exaggerated the extent to which a bunch of ROMAN soldiers (or perhaps Syrians working as Roman soldiers? not clear but historically many of them would have been Syrians AFAIK) scourged JC etc. and somehow this exaggeration is an example of... antisemitism?

"the faces of the priests and their hypocritical soft talk to the Romans in charge"

Explain hypocritical. I don't even see them as hypocritical to begin with. They were priests in a theocratic society being occupied by a pagan empire; thus they had a very difficult fence to straddle. Again, I'd probably have acted pretty much the same way in their place.

"a very kind and benevolent Pilate"

Again, like Judas, Pilate is one (1) character. Does the movie Forrest Gump accuse all Americans of being simpletons? (Hmm don't answer that :) Now, I understand perfectly well that in the Bible stories Pilate's role was probably soft-pedaled/gussied up for later, Roman audiences. I understand that this aspect of the story, like many other aspects, was used in antisemitic ways in passion plays. But I don't see "the Jewish priests wanted him executed and the Roman proconsul guy was a soul searching Hamlet", however dubious historically (and literarily), as being antisemitic. This is because: I didn't see a problem with the Jewish priests' position (contextually) in the first place; Pilate came off like a cowardly bureaucrat; and I don't take either one of them to Represent The Races They Come From. And you really can't do this if you watch the whole movie, as I said there were Jews who didn't want JC to be killed, and Romans who were bloodthirsty monsters. Why pick on Pilate, and Caiphas, and say "the film's making The Romans look good and The Jews look bad" instead of picking on say Head Sadistic Roman Guard, and Jew Who Helps Carry Jesus's Cross, and say "the film's making The Romans look like monsters and The Jews look compassionate"?

Objectively I don't see why one would pick one interpretation over the other.

"bloodthirsty Jewish rabble in complete contrast to real historical accounts"

I don't know what "real historical accounts" there are of the Jesus Of Nazareth Case which you could be basing this on. The Bible story goes that there was some crowd outside the courthouse and they wanted Barabbas spared and not Jesus. This film portrays that story. BTW everyone assumes this was a "bloodthirsty Jewish rabble" but supposing such an incident really did take place no one here knows what would have been the demographic makeup of that particular crowd of some (200? 300?) people outside Pilate's offices. Could some have been Syrian? Ethiopian? Could there have been anti-Jesus plants in the or Roman instigators in the crowd? Sure. Could the crowd have been majority pro-Jesus but this was a silent majority? Sure. The leap from "that crowd wanted Barabbas" to "this says something bad about The Jews" is one that I simply don't make.

Maybe my problem is that I think to some extent antisemitism in a film/story depends on two people to exist, the one who writes the story and the one who hears the story and interprets it in antisemitic ways. Since I didn't, I don't see the problem... For the record I don't dispute that if you show this film in many parts of Arabia you'll get an antisemitic reaction.

"well known antisemitic symbolisms like showing Satan repeatedly walking among the Jews-his people(?)"

WTF? Who said "the Jews" are "his people"? Jesus was also walking amongst the Jews, and besides he WAS one, doesn't this outweigh the other?

"the famous "his blood be on us and our children" line that was still there"

"still there"? Well I guess.. it's "still" in the Bible after all. Granted perhaps the Bible is simply antisemitic and you simply can't tell this particular story therefore without being antisemitic or leaving out certain aspects of it found in the Bible. That seems to be what others here are saying, in which case, so be it.

"even THEY had the Jewish authorities divided in two opposing camps ... My point is that Mel Gibson's film lacked even this."

No it didn't. At least in the film I saw it was evident that the Sanhedrin were divided, although obviously the "guilty" side won out.

Of course, again, I'm in a rather strange position because I too would've voted "guilty", I don't see why it's so shocking that an overt blasphemer would've been voted guilty by priests in such a society (ANY such society). Nor do I see why that reflects poorly on the race from which those priests come - or even on those priests themselves.

by a reader on Mon, 10/18/2004 - 21:01 | reply

Elliot, In what way am I m

Elliot,

In what way am I meant to compare and contrast those two articles?

The first one was - oh what's the word I'm looking for - stupid. Also hateful (far more "hateful" than The Passion IMHO). I stopped reading halfway through. It's junk.

As for the second article, I don't agree with its attempted arguments. It does not speak for me.

by a reader on Mon, 10/18/2004 - 21:09 | reply

OK. Let's see if I can make m

OK. Let's see if I can make my points more clear this time around. The issue was whether there were identifiable antisemitic symbols/stereotypes/stances...in the film which would make the film (deliberately?) antisemitic, besides the fact that the storyline is based on the Gospels. (Themselves already antisemitic in some parts(esp. Mathew and John))

I think it was. There are other films made about Jesus, and they all entail the trial, the role of Jewish priesthood and so on. So you can argue they all have some elements of antisemitism no matter what. This film however has gone beyond this limit and the examples I gave were to show this, so your arguments about the historic events or the Gospel connection are not really relevant.

Use of 'stereotypical "Jewish" look doing stereotypically "Jewish" things like taking bribes or coveting for money' is antisemitic. Jews like any other people have different looks. That particular look IS an old time antisemitic symbol. Just look at the cartoons in Der Streicher or today's arab media.

(And I didn't mean Judas, but others who were contacted in the middle of the night and hired by the Temple to come and testify, and there were more than one, hence my use of plural tense)
As for psychopathic priests, that was they way they were portrayed, the acting styles , the faces, the hateful use of language, the way they readily chose Barabbas instead, their sometimes satisfied mostly indifferent and cold looks, while watching the most painful and inhuman torture. I think all you said about performing their religious duties could have been portrayed easily without all this. As for the soft talk, again Jews being rash on those they have power over, but instead cuddling to those in power in a servant like and humble tone thus making them do their evil plans is an oldie. Have you seen "Jude süss" by any chance?

"a very kind and benevolent Pilate... having to deal with a bloodthirsty Jewish rabble in complete contrast to real historical accounts"

I meant historical account about Pilate. (sorry for my poor English) Pilate was a murderous sadist by all those accounts, sadist even by Roman standards of the time. In the film he looked, at least to me, like a kind and perplexed poor guy in charge of a stinking hateful people asking philosophical questions about "truth". You didn't see that? Don't you think Gibson could have portrayed him a bit more accurate historically? Don't you wonder why he didn't?

If the "blood" sentence is OK, why did he choose to omit the subtitle? If it was so problematic, why did he insist on keeping it there? Deliberate?

I also said there were one or two Jews who weren't that bad. The scene with the Sanhedrin(?) members opposing nightly trial lasted what...5 seconds? In contrast to near two hours of hateful priests? Simon of Cyrene, bearing the cross, became a Christian saint later as tradition goes, so that doesn't really count. Christian anti-semitism was against Jews who chose to remain Jews and thus remain cursed, not the Jews who became Christians and were forgiven of their sins, as all Jesus disciples were Jews too as you said, but that is irrelevant.

In any case, 1 or 2 little shots like this can't compensate all the rest of the film.

The Devil walking among Jews. Well, Jews being devil's lot and the Devil doing his work through them is a well known part of Christian anti-semitism and went on for centuries. What do you think those scenes in the film would convey? Why are they there? Do you see the Devil walking among Roman soldiers or guards? Why only among the Jews and behind the priests? Coincidence again?

Depicting Jews in films sometimes doing bad things is not antisemitic. Depicting them, including their high priests, evil for being or remaining Jews or acting according to their beliefs is.

BTW, I didn't understand what you meant, but Jews are no "race".

hope that helps. :)

AIS

by a reader on Mon, 10/18/2004 - 22:14 | reply

Blixa,

Nevermind compare/contrast. What was wrong with the first article?

I found it persuasive.

Also, notice what this film has done: it has set people all on the Side Of Good, who I believe all strongly support Israel, to arguing about whether it is anti-semitic or not. This Jew-baiting was one of the charges in the first article.

AIS, nice posts, I agree.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 10/18/2004 - 22:28 | reply

Non-antisemitic Passion story?

Blixa asked:

[is it] possible to tell a non-antisemitic "passion" story (by your standard), [and] how would one go about doing it?

Yes. Basically you follow the guidelines laid down by the Second Vatican Council, the rejection of which is the defining doctrine of Gibson's religion.

This question is on the Anti-Defamation League's FAQ on The Passion (the whole of which is worth reading – though I suppose not if you find it hateful, stupid, junk, and obscene). They say:

The story of the Passion can be told without disparaging the Jewish people. Such an account is mandated by the Catholic Church as a result of the Second Vatican Council, which in 1965 repudiated both the deicide charge and all forms of anti-Semitism in its document, Nostra Aetate. Most Protestant churches followed suit, and since 1965 Christians have worked cooperatively with Jews to correct anti-Semitic interpretations within Christian theology. Aside from theological considerations, artists have a moral and social responsibility to avoid promoting material that may foster hatred, bigotry and anti-Semitism.

by David Deutsch on Mon, 10/18/2004 - 23:27 | reply

AIS,

Before I try point-by-point, overall let me just say I think there's an inherent problem with saying that a symbol is inherently racist/antisemitic/whatever because symbols can be interpreted differently. A lot of what's going on here, admittedly, is that the symbols which to someone who's been more exposed to antisemitic stuff may be obvious, went over my head :-). But, if symbols go completely over the head of X% of the audience do you think X can ever reach a point where you can admit well heck maybe it's not intrinsically antisemitic after all? At what point do you start blaming not the film but the people who see all sorts of "symbols" therein?

For example,

-You saw Satan walking "amongst the Jews" and thought that was an obvious symbol. I just saw Satan (we assume he's Satan/know this only from prior familiarity w/the story - he actually looked mostly like a Sith Lord to me ;-), who was a character in this film, therefore they had to put him somewhere. The story took place mostly in/around Jerusalem, amongst people who (mostly - we don't know actually but will assume) are Jews, so if you plopped him in a scene in this film it follows he's gonna be amongst mostly Jews. Where exactly should he have been shown observing all these events from, Korea, amongst a bunch o'Koreans? In other words if Satan Standing Near Jews was a "symbol" for Jews=Evil, it went completely over my head; who the heck cares who Satan is walking "amongst"? He's Satan, he's like totally evil, so I blame him not them. If I see Satan glowering over a bunch of kids at a children's playground I don't start thinking "dude those kids must be like totally evil"; if there are people who do interpret it that way, that's their problem IMHO.

-As for the "stereotypical Jewish look" thing, it's simply true that as a general characteristic a lot of Jews (not all), have prominent noses, is it not? (Same seems true of other nationalities from/around the Levant.) So what? And some of them are actors. (BTW I didn't really notice anything especially out-of-the-ordinary "hook-nosed" about any of the actors...you did? Which ones?) But ok, if I hire such an actor to play the role of a character who's Jewish (and heck why wouldn't I?), and (historically correctly) plopped a yarmulke on his head, you get to accuse me of using a "stereotypical Jewish look"? or I can't have that character holding money or whatever?

This is all reminding me of an old Onion piece (which I can't find) titled something like "Chinese Laundromat Owner Decried For Perpetuating Racial Stereotypes". What sort of actor should have played those roles, Jackie Chan? What sort of hat should he have worn, a foam-and-mesh that reads "Craftsman" on the front? Should we measure actors' noses and tell some of them "sorry I can't give you this part, you look JUST TOO STEREOTYPICALLY JEWISH"? I just don't know how it would be possible to make this film and survive this particular objection of yours. Apparently I'd have to (a) go out of my way to hire an actor who DOESN'T look "stereotypically Jewish", (b) dress him in clothing (Adidas sweatsuit perhaps) which doesn't in any way look like the sort of clothing a Jewish person of that time and place would have worn, and (c) make sure it's made clear he HATES MONEY. At some point can we acknowledge that it's possible to uh get a little INSANE, going too far with these objections?

-I don't know about (don't remember) the "bribed" characters you're talking about (I honestly thought the guys who were woken up in the middle of the night were simply all the other Sanhedrin members who had to get up to come to the full emergency "trial" or whatever it was; I interpreted much of what I saw as, say, "lobbying"/pressuring by the anti-Jesus faction to shore up support, but I don't remember any of them getting "bribed"...may have happened, just don't remember). But in the case of at least Judas we have a Hebrew character who (1) presumably looked like a Hebrew and not some other nationality, and (2) according to the story, took some money. By your rules it seems I simply can't portray both (1) and (2) and survive your antisemitism charge.

In other words, it gets back to this: maybe one just can't create a film based faithfully on the passion story without being antisemitic (a consensus does seem to be forming around that point, anyway, since Matthew & John are, themselves, "antisemitic in parts").

-I agreed totally that the character of Pilate is whitewashed but we are talking about whether the film is antisemitic not whether it is historically accurate. I agree that it's (almost certainly) not historically accurate. That doesn't make it antisemitic. If Pilate had sprouted wings and flown to the moon or whipped out a Nintendo Gameboy and started playing Tetris this would have been historically inaccurate but not antisemitic. In any event despite his whitewash I still did not have a favorable impression of Pilate in this film by any means. Seriously: I sympathized completely with the Sanhedrin. (Maybe I'm just weird ;-)

-Why did Gibson omit the subtitle? To lessen the controversy, of course: so people wouldn't complain as much about it. That doesn't make the complaints valid.

-You do what amounts to some scorecard analysis of how much time is devoted to good Jews vs. how much to bad Jews. I honestly don't know (don't care much either) how the ratio comes out but IMHO at some point this becomes hair-splitting. I hope that films don't need to engage in a kind of "affirmative action" regarding how screen-time is split amongst good/bad characters. Imagine applying this rule to the Godfather films for example - a large percentage of the Italian characters are murderous gangsters or associated with same. Anti-Italian! Should all those scenes have been "balanced" by showing some nice, law abiding Italians from time to time? Perish the thought.

-Simon of Cyrene "doesn't count" because Christians like him?? Ok gimme a break. Are you going to be here saying all the positive Jewish characters (Jesus, disciples, Mary Magdalene, Simon of Cyrene, girl who wiped his face..) "don't count"? If so well then I just can't win; yes of course all the Jews in this film are portrayed negatively if all the positive ones "don't count". Talk about an absurd standard however. Again it just sounds like you're saying one can't tell this story without being antisemitic.

"Do you see the Devil walking among Roman soldiers or gurads? Why only among the Jews and behind the priests? Coincidence again?"

See here's the interesting thing. I didn't notice that, perhaps because I wasn't looking for it. Why, were you? I'm taking your word for it that in no scenes is Satan shown "amongst" any Romans. But to be honest I'm not sure that's even true. I wasn't mentally clocking Satan's screen time or cataloguing which people he was next to/behind. Didn't occur to me and I still don't even really see the relevance. What sort of person would? Well, in addition to you, an anti-semite would perhaps.

But I readily concede that this film could be interpreted in an antisemitic way by antisemites. Lots of things, rightly or not, are interpreted in antisemitic ways by antisemites, because antisemites are messed-up people.

"Depicting Jews in films sometimes doing bad things is not antisemitic. Depicting them, including their high priests, evil for being or remaining Jews or acting according to their beliefs is."

Interesting. But see, in the story I saw, "[they] including their high priests" were not "depicted as evil" in the first place. Like I said, I thought the priests acted understandably and rationally in the context of their society. I didn't see the general Jewish public, as presented in the film, as being or acting uniformly "evil" (some in the crowd were more bloodthirsty than others, but the same phenomenon exists on the streets of New York City :-). And I certainly didn't see any Jews who were depicted as "evil" "for being or remaining Jews".

Did you? Who? Which Jewish characters in The Passion did you find "evil"? Caiaphas? I'd disagree. And which did The Passion assert were "evil" "for being or remaining Jews"?

The one semi-exception seems to be Judas since his name is virtually treacherous by tradition, but even he is really more an object of pity than anything else. It's made clear that he was tricked, he really thought turning Jesus in was a way to keep him safe (I don't know how closely that hews to RC tradition BTW... it seems more consistent with e.g. how the Anthony Burgess "Man from Nazareth" novel presents it...). I guess the other "evil" characters are the kid-demons who chase after Judas but they're, like, not human. Did you think they were "Jews"? If so, why? :)

At some point IMHO antisemitism requires active participation on the part of the beholder. Maybe all I'm saying is I did not participate, and have a hard time understanding why anyone would.

-Re: whether Jews are a "race", I didn't "mean" anything by it, nor could I have since I don't really think "race" has a coherent definition. (Note I apparently also called "The Romans" a "race", equally wrongly I suppose, but that didn't seem to bother you. :-) Judaism is a religion, it's also a nationality, and/or a tribe (you belong to by virtue of your mother); yet not quite because people can convert, there's intermarriages and mixing, plus a while ago there was a split between what are called "Sephardic" and "Ashkenazi" Jews, some point to certain tribes in Africa as being long lost Jews, some people may descend from e.g. Spanish crypto-Jews and not even know they're Jews so what are they?... whatever. It's a culture, a nationality, with, at the same time, at least some degree of genetic commonality... so I have no idea (and don't think it matters much) what to call it but if "race" offended you for some reason please just substitute whatever word you think is Correct, ok? Thanks,

--Blixa

by a reader on Tue, 10/19/2004 - 00:52 | reply

DD

You explain:

The story of the Passion can be told without disparaging the Jewish people. Such an account is mandated by the Catholic Church as a result of the Second Vatican Council

Well, good. And happily, Mel Gibson's movie The Passion of the Christ was, indeed, such an account: It told the story of the Passion and it did not "disparage the Jewish people" to any reasonable interpreter. (I make no claims as to how unreasonable folks will interpret it.) And since you agree with the ADL that this (telling the Passion story w/o disparaging the Jewish people) is possible to do, merely noting that it's a passion play is therefore insufficient to prove the charge that it's antisemitic.

Another way to formulate such a charge would be to watch the film or otherwise learn a sufficient amount about what's in the film, and based upon this knowledge, point out the ways in which you think it disparages the Jewish people or otherwise violates the Vatican 2 proscriptions. I would be open to such arguments even if (as with those of AIS) I might find most or all of them wanting.

Alas, this option is not yet available to you....

Best,

by a reader on Tue, 10/19/2004 - 01:05 | reply

symbols

But, if symbols go completely over the head of X% of the audience do you think X can ever reach a point where you can admit well heck maybe it's not intrinsically antisemitic after all?

They don't go over the heads of latent anti-semites.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 10/19/2004 - 01:15 | reply

I think we should basically a

I think we should basically agree to disagree on this.

I had a hard time watching this film, partly because of the bloodshed and torture and partly because continuous antisemitic scenes atleast the way I understood them maybe as you say because of having been predisposed to such things more than you.

I'm happy your experience was different and that you witnessed an elevating and rewarding rendering of the Passion.

I just add two more points as my final post in this thread:
Obviously Mel Gibson didn't include all the Biblical details about the Passion in this film.

Just as one example take the remark about "a certain young man" who was following Jesus and his captors, when they laid hold on him so casting off his cloth he ran away naked..." (Mark 14:51-52)

Yet he made sure the "blood" scene and the "bribing" scene etc. remain in the film, although they put fingers on such sensitive and painful issues, issues that have left a long history of discrimination, oppression and even massacer in their wake.

Second, there are an abundance of extra-Biblical material on Passion, yet he chose one of the sickest, most hateful and perverse hallucinations of a (quite disturbed) nun to "fill in the gaps".

To me this all passes well with all that I thought I saw while watching this particular film. That's all.

AIS

by a reader on Tue, 10/19/2004 - 01:38 | reply

Elliot

You really want me to do this? Just remember u asked 4 it.

"The poor lady in Kansas who suffered a heart attack and died as Jesus was being scourged may be the first to die from The Passion of The Christ, but I doubt she'll be the last."

Right off we start with demagoguery. People are gonna DIE from this movie! Well Elliot it was released, it's out on DVD now, you tell me, did that happen? Kindly point out links to Gibson-inspired pogroms, please. I shall peruse them if proffered.

"there's no proof for just about anything that appears in the movie, except that there was a city called Jerusalem [...]"

Stupid (and unfair) objection. Movie is explicitly based on the Bible not history texts. There's no "proof" for just about anything that happens in The Ten Commandments or Clash of the Titans either. But "proof" is the standard a Passion story, as opposed to those others, must meet because why? There's no "proof" that JC as such actually existed, let alone that he was the "son of God" (obviously), so, what, Christians can't make movies premised on those things?

"The Christian faithful believe the Gospels, but everyone knows that they were written a generation after the events they are supposed to describe."

What's that "but" doing there? The Christian faithful believe the Gospels, AND everyone knows that they (in the forms we know them) were written later. So what? He's dangerously beginning to sound like he's constructing an argument that the Christian faithful need to reject their books, on some level, to make him happy.

"At worst, they had their own motives to make the Jews look bad, not least of which was that the Jews were not buying in to their message that Jesus was messiah, and the gentiles -- Romans, Greeks and other foreigners -- were not relishing the idea of being circumcised."

Ok so here's speculation about the motives of "Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John". Nice simplistic analysis too, apparently this guy's sure that there were four guys with these 4 names. Ignorant of all that "Q" type scholarship about how the Gospels really evolved, of course.

"The solution was to make it easy for the Gentiles to accept Jesus without accepting the Torah"

Well of course. This notion was very important to early Christianity. He's criticizing an aspect of Christianity which was at its core, that you can be "saved" (or whatever) without not eating shellfish (and so on). He's saying it's like not ok for Christianity to have developed that concept because this is mean to Jews. Well clearly Christianity is inimical to Judaism (in that it's not Judaism but uses some Jewish books and notions) but stated that way it doesn't seem like such a valid complaint now does it?

"just believe that he died for your sins and you will be saved, while everyone else will go to Hell."

Heh. "everyone else"? Nice straw-man cartoon of what Christians believe. Who's the one employing stereotypes?

"I have no objection to those who believe in every word as the Gospel Truth."

Course not. Ok so I can ignore the preceding coupla paragraphs.

"But Mel Gibson set out to kill this Jesus. [...]"

Now we get a bunch of stuff which is basically saying "I don't think it's ok for Mel to have set out to make this movie". Ok sorry but what? Yes we can all recognize that Mel's belief has a curiously hyper-Catholic fixation on the suffering and the pain and the flaying and the whatnot. That's his deal, that's the movie he wanted to make, and he did. Not ok, I guess?

"What is important, it seems, is "who done it." And here Gibson stacks the decks and makes it clear as day that the Jewish priests pushed and manipulated and howled for Jesus to be killed and tortured."

So what? First of all is that not what the source material states? David Deutsch just explained to me that the ADL says it's perfectly possible to make a story from said source material about said events and not be antisemitic. Who cares if "the Jewish priests" (=a majority of the Sanhedrin) pushed for his execution? 1) On the face of it, they were correct to do so as a matter of religious law. 2)

Even if you think they weren't - even if you think this makes those Jewish priests monsters or look like monsters (I don't) - this is a slander against the Jewish people HOW, exactly? Only if you're stupid enough to see it that way, to equate "those Jewish priests" with "all Jews". Who is? Show of hands please?

"Gibson's public statements that all mankind sinned, and that Jesus took all those sins upon himself, and that this is a movie about love and forgiveness, or that he is just telling the truth -- well, that may sound good to Diane Sawyer, but it doesn't wash"

=I have read Gibson's mind and he's lying about the stuff he believes. He says he believes X but I know better!

"And yes, if it was foreordained that Jesus should die, then everyone was just playing their part in this passion play and no one should be blamed. That may operate for those of deep faith, but that is not the director's intention."

More wonderful mind-reading. Does this guy do parties?

"No, this is a movie about bloody premeditated murder"

Wrong, it's a movie about an execution. The bloodiness and the gore of that execution can be chalked up to the fact that the ruling power in that place and time (NOT Jews) had an especially barbaric way of executing people. If there was something unlawful about the execution so as to make it murder this can be blamed on the Roman who ordered it.

"a murder of Christ by the Jews."

Funny in the movie I saw a bunch of Roman brutes did the deed.

"As The Lovingway United Pentecostal Church in Denver so lovingly put it, on opening night, in a sign it posted opposite the local movie theater: "Jews Killed the Lord Jesus.""

Wow. If he can point to some extremists that totally proves something!

"and now a Roman Catholic rich boy says,"

FYI Elliot (and David, who seems to have been offended by this fact), this is the part where I stopped reading this wonderful, marvelous, informative article earlier. Do you really blame me? "Roman Catholic rich boy"? We are veering into immature name-calling territory here. (Now I may do that at times, but I don't get published on Israel Insider ;-)

"says.. that it was the Jews who did it, after all."

Sigh. Watch the movie: he does not. The Romans did it, the council of Jewish priests asked them to because Jesus had blasphemed. This is how the frickin story goes! You can't tell this story if it doesn't go like that. Bottom line here with these objections is "you just can't tell this story".

"The Satanic Jews,"

!!! Is this guy trying to win a straw-man record or what.

"Christian critics wondered why the resurrection scene was so short, why the redemptive power of Jesus was hardly touched upon."

I didn't "wonder" at all, I knew the answer, because Gibson's particular sect/faith is particularly obsessed by the passion as opposed to the resurrection. Although that emphasis may ring hollow/unsatisfying to Protestants, etc, (incl. myself) that's still allowed, isn't it? What I'm hearing here: "no, it's not! not allowed!" This article-writer is telling Gibson what sort of faith he's allowed to adhere to. I don't presume to do so.

"We're not talking about the twenty million bucks...[etc]"

Weird recital of how much money the movie made. What does this have to do with whether it's antisemitic?

"this movie is designed from day one to advance the theology of the cultish sect of retro-Catholics to which Mel and his wacked-out, hated-consumed mother and father belong"

1) From what I've heard, that's basically true, Mel makes no secret that he made the film to advance his religion. Not ok? 2) Dunno anything about Mel's mother, I'm sure the "wacked-out" charge is correct when it comes to his father, but nevertheless this kind of name-calling and guilt-by-association would be beneath a better, more responsible writer who wasn't writing a stupid, hate-filled article. Alas....

"anti-Popes, his dad calls them"

More crap about his dad, relevant why?

"This is his attempt at payback for those Hollywood Jews who resisted his idea, and the anti-Christian (i.e., Jew-dominated) Media."

Wow this writer's really riffing now. He's spun a whole theory about Mel's private thoughts and everything. I was supposed to continue reading because this is all so brilliant, right David?

[more about imagined-Gibson's take on "Hollywood Jews", Gibson's father, etc... getting bored]

"Gibson left it in but "generously" didn't add a subtitle. He didn't need to: he ensured there was so much press coverage, attracting attention not only to the line but to the Jewish efforts to remove it, that he fixated viewers on finding the Aramaic curse and on Jewish "censorship" of that "truth." "

He's claiming that Gibson "fixated" viewers on finding the Aramaic curse. Interestingly he produces no such viewers who were so "fixated". He imagines that they were. That is what I call junk. Maybe he was fixated on it. That is what I call projection. Frankly when I saw the film I forgot to look for Caiaphas saying those lines.

Probably my fixation was so subconscious that I looked for it subconsciously

[mind reading bla bla]

"Mel tries to portray himself as the poor victim of the Jews" where? how?

"The truth is that Mel's technique -- inducing trauma and fixation to that trauma by the use of violence -- is a famous method acted out not only in his previous bloody films"

Can't resist dig against other Mel Gibson films. No relevance, just couldn't resist. This is more stupidity.

"so that one can proudly say that "Jews killed Lord Jesus" and feel exalted."

Who said that? (Yes I know some church the author pointed to. Who else?)

"Mel has whipped all this anger and left the audience with "nowhere to go.""

As a result, they promptly went out and committed a bunch of pogroms, right?

You know, if I took articles like this more seriously I might actually be offended at the vile slander against Americans and American society, that we're all JUST SO ITCHIN' to pogromize a bunch o'Jews that all it takes is a Mel Gibson movie. Thanks for the confidence, dude. Nice to know I'm a hair-trigger away from being a Nazi in your eyes.

"It's a straight line from the Damascus Road to the Damascus Blood Libel, to the Dachau Camp to Denver's Lovingway Church and Cineplex."

The alliteration here is perhaps the least dumb thing in the article. Of course associating Dachau Camp (murder count: N) to Denver's Lovingway Church and Cineplex (murder count: 0) is not anything like what one would call proportion but hey, it's clever (both start with D, get it?)

[more Mel's-his-father's-son guilt by association (dare I say "blood-guilt"?)...]

"let them realize too that the Gospels, of Mark and of Mel, try to obscure that Jesus was a Jew killed by Gentiles."

Yeah I'm such a maroon I didn't even know that Jesus guy was a Jew. Goll-ee I thought he was from Texas, thanks for setting me straight.

"The story-tellers, ancient and modern, blame the Jews so they can feel some relief for betraying and distorting the faith to which their presumed Savior belonged."

CMIIW but he's charging here that Christians are "betraying" and "distorting" Judaism. Christianity, apparently, is just not a very valid religion to belong to.

"Christians should say not "everyone sinned against Christ, and I am a sinner too""

Presumes to tell Christians what they 'should' say. He's anointed himself Pope/minister now, essentially. His authority on matters Christian must not be questioned.

"Besides, the good Christian is tempted to say, "I accept killing God, and therefore am saved, whereas the Jews do not, and therefore are damned.""

He is? Wow good to know. I never knew these things about myself till this expert on my thoughts informed me of them.

"Rather they should consider: "Christians have historically turned against the people of Jesus, the people of his God, have killed them cruelly in every generation, and I must struggle within my soul never to do so too and to confront with courage those who do.""

Well of course Christians should say that, as should everyone else. Don't be a stupid frickin antisemite. I'm on board with that and I'm all in favor of confronting with courage those who kill Jews cruelly.

Notice that Mel Gibson ain't such a person, and to focus on him, when there are, like, REAL antisemite killers REALLY KILLING JEWS, is wacky at best.

"But that, needless to say, is not Mel Gibson's intent."

Heh. Ok if you say so. This mind-reading stuff is awesome!

"The Passion of the Christ, amplifying and embellishing the inherent anti-Jewishness of the Gospels, is a real-life Lethal Weapon 5, already at a theater near you, and aimed straight at the nearest Jew."

If so then it was a total dud, wasn't it? Missed the nearest Jew and the second-nearest Jew and the Nth nearest Jew and, well, frankly failed to hit any of 'em at all. The only casualty I know of in fact is some lady in Kansas who had a heart attack mentioned at the beginning of the article, and she may not have even been a Jew (blast - Mel must've been disappointed!).

If Gibson really had wanted to kill a bunch of Jews, making this movie was like the worst way he could've chosen to do it.

"Daddy must be proud."

At some point can we agree that this daddy stuff is a low blow? Really now.

I feel dirty from having read through that whole thing. Thanks Elliot

by a reader on Tue, 10/19/2004 - 02:14 | reply

AIS,

Yes we agree to disagree :-)

"I'm happy your experience was different and that you witnessed an elevating and rewarding rendering of the Passion."

Heh... WHOA there I never said that! I did not find it particularly elevating nor rewarding. I liked it ok but not great. I think the best thing I can say about the film is that it was technically well-produced. best,

--Blixa

by a reader on Tue, 10/19/2004 - 02:16 | reply

wow u write a lot blixa

I feel dirty from having read through that whole thing. Thanks Elliot gulp. don't blame me! I agree with David that you shouldn't read things you don't enjoy. I really only meant for you to answer my question from memory in a few sentences, unless you wanted to do otherwise.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 10/19/2004 - 05:20 | reply

Heh yeah sorry there, sane now

No worries Elliot, sorry for overreaction. On the bright side, I had some spare time to kill yesterday (as you can see) & you helped ;-)

"[symbols] They don't go over the heads of latent anti-semites."

Nothin' much goes over the heads of latent anti-semites does it? Anything you say or do or point to (that penny on the ground.. that comedian on TV) can stand as proof that Jews are evil to latent anti-semites. This is cuz latent (and non latent) anti-semites are messed-up pathetic people whose thinking is on the fritz. My hope here is that we don't convince ourselves that movies et al must pass the standard "can't possibly be interpreted so as to hate Jews by any antisemite" in order not to be considered antisemitic itself, as a movie. That would be a difficult test. Best,

by a reader on Tue, 10/19/2004 - 17:43 | reply

Confused

I can't make head or tail of most of this.

First of all, is there a difference between material that may induce hatred, and material that is actually objectively anti-Semitic? Surely a lot of good material induces hatred?

Secondly, I haven't seen a single convincing argument that this film contains anything that is demonstrably anti-Semitic as opposed to criticising specific Jews. And what is more, I cannot see how, in a work of drama, such a thing is even possible. Is there a voiceover saying "Like all Jews, this guy did X terrible thing," or something? Are characters portrayed in ways that are patently unrealistic and false and which convey mythical anti-Semitic libels?

Surely one does not have to avoid criticising all Jews in order not to be accused of anti-Semitism?

I think to compare this film with Michael Moore's piece of trash is really obscene. There are degrees of evil, and not being able to distinguish the ground between them is a serious moral error that undermines our attempts to spread good ideas. Moore is full of virulent hatred, and he tells lies to further his cause. Where are the deliberate falsehoods in Gibson's film? Where is there objectively extreme hatred towards the whole of the Jewish people?

I haven't seen "The Passion", but I can see no possible way that any depiction of this story can be interpreted as definitely and objectively attacking Jews as a whole, as opposed to attacking the actions of certain Jews at the time of those events. There are historical reasons why the Jewish authorities at the time would have a) not been the best of Jews, and b) not been very positive about Jesus.

The last thing we need is political correctness on the right side of the fence as well!

And if anyone thinks this comment means that I must be anti-Semitic, I'm just going to crawl off into a hole and die.

by a reader on Tue, 10/19/2004 - 17:55 | reply

Moral Equivalence

I agree with the readers who are upset by the suggestion that there is a moral equivalence between Moore and Gibson. I agree that Moore's actions are much worse. Moore is knowingly lying to further a bad agenda, and Gibson is probably telling a story that he believes to be true and important, although I think he's wrong and doing something dangerous.

But, The World didn't claim that they are morally equivalent. The post said:

The two movies are somewhat similar symptoms of the same serious malaise in Western society: the widespread loss of confidence in its secular moral values. Both are personal statements made by charming rogues who have a sense of humour, are very good at their jobs, and are driven by a core of gibbering hatred. Both peddle incendiary falsehoods that have caused murder and destruction beyond measure, been a blight on every kind of progress and will undoubtedly do a great deal more harm before they are extirpated.

I suppose the line about hatred could be reaching. Maybe David is more familiar with Gibson's motivations than I am, but I'm willing to concede that he might not be motivated by hatred, but is stupidly repeating likely falsehoods that have a history of fostering hatred.

Either way, I think both films do intentionally appeal to bad elements of popular culture, and they should be criticized for it.

Gil

by Gil on Tue, 10/19/2004 - 22:18 | reply

"secular moral values"

I don't think there's any such thing as "secular moral values". They all originate in religious philosophy. Or maybe someone can tell me the difference between religious moral values and secular moral values (secular ones happen to be adopted by people who don't believe in God is not a good enough answer).

I do think the values of some religions are more sensible than the values of others.

The malaise in the West is loss of confidence in moral values, not "secular" moral values, whatever they are (who invented them? where are they written down? how we do know they're essentially different than religious ones?)

Alice

by a reader on Wed, 10/20/2004 - 02:38 | reply

re: "secular moral values"

my values are secular moral values, aren't they?

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 10/20/2004 - 03:19 | reply

re: Secular Moral Values

Alice doubts the existence of "secular moral values" and then admits:

I do think the values of some religions are more sensible than the values of others.

What does that mean? Does reasonableness matter? Does it help us to determine what's right? Don't we have to appeal to some mystical commandments to know what's right? If you don't think so, then you believe in "secular moral values".

If your claim is merely that religion has played an important historical role in the development of moral philosophy, then you're right. If you claim that religion is necessary (or even reliably helpful) to pursue morality, then I think you're wrong.

Religions are powerful mechanisms for developing and transmitting moral ideas (some good, and some bad). But, I think that there are better ways to pursue the truth.

Gil

by Gil on Wed, 10/20/2004 - 04:01 | reply

passion and anti-semitism

The critics of the Passion in here are saying that because the movie had old men in headresses (who looked middle-eastern not "hooknosed") that is was degrading to the Jewish community? Are you critics denying that old men (Pharisees and Sadducees sp?) wore robes, headresses, and were extremely severe in punishing any dissenters in the ancient Jewish community? Are you denying that a crowd of people in Jerusalem 2,000 years ago would not have been mostly made up of Jewish people?

If you are denying these facts of history, then I would suggest that you reference your own website here, you sound like you may fit in with an "anti-semitic conspiracy theory" crowd -- refusing to accept that the Jewish people of 2,000 years ago DID wear headresses and robes, and DID have religious rulers that ruled Mosaic Law (common law as well) and were NOT flexible in their decisions, as demonstrated in the ancient writings of Josephus where all sorts of atrocities are documented - ALONG WITH THE STORY OF CHRIST'S PASSION. Josephus was a JEWISH scribe, well accepted by even the most athiestic scholars as a viable source of biblical historical facts.

A little personal info. I have been to Israel twice before, my wife is a Jewish convert to Christianity. I am not anti-semitic, and I love all my Jewish brothers and sisters. I implore that you must stop calling everyone Anti-semitic- who thinks that during the passover festival 2,000 years ago, in Jerusalem, that a crowd of mostly Jewish people argued for our Christ's death. Also, all the bloody violence, in the movie, and in the new testament of the Bible, state that the ROMANS with "pointy noses" were the ones who did all the torture, passed the death sentence, and performed the execution.

You seem to be logical people, I must ask, are you trying to tell me that 2,000 years ago, during passover, in Jerusalem, that it was not 90-95% Jewish population in the city? Logically, if 90% of the population is Jewish, and it is passover festival, one could safely deduce that the "crowd" of people in front of the Roman palace was made up mostly of either Jewish followers of Jesus, regular Jewish people of faith, and secular Romans (maybe a few easterners and africans as well) .

All this being said, I think that actual Jewish folks in here and elsewhere, who are claiming "anti-semitism" from the Passion story, they FEEL like CHRISTIANS somehow think that they are SOLELY responsible for Christs death, which you are obviously not... I put forth that you are insecure in your Jewishness (if you're jewish), or plain anti-passion story in general. These people claim anti-semitism when anyone dares to suggest that the Messiah was indeed condemned to death due to false witness before the Religious leaders in charge at the time. Jewish people can not possibly be held accountable, when it was a mob type crowd, during passover festival 2,000 years ago in Jerusalem.

All peoples are responsible for putting the Messiah to death (which really was part of God's plan anyway, so how could we blame the Jewish people?)

by a reader on Thu, 10/21/2004 - 05:20 | reply

Jesus would have been brown

As for the "stereotypical Jewish look" thing, it's simply true that as a general characteristic a lot of Jews (not all), have prominent noses, is it not? (Same seems true of other nationalities from/around the Levant.) So what? And some of them are actors. (BTW I didn't really notice anything especially out-of-the-ordinary "hook-nosed" about any of the actors...you did? Which ones?) But ok, if I hire such an actor to play the role of a character who's Jewish (and heck why wouldn't I?), and (historically correctly) plop a yarmulke on his head, you get to accuse me of using a "stereotypical Jewish look"? or I can't have that character holding money or whatever?

But the stereo-type you are depicting here is of a white anglo-saxon Jew. Is this really how a Jew living in the middle East 2000 years ago would have looked? Don't you think he or she would have had a more distinctly middle Eastern appearance? That he or she would have been more brown than white? That his or her hair would have been more dark than light? If the film was being accurate, then surely Jesus should have been brown and those Jews persecuting him brown also? The white people would have been the Romans. So, then, why did Gibson - who despite his pretences to accuracy in other aspects of the film - choose to depict Jews of the Middle East from 2000 years ago according to the white anglo-saxon stereotype?

by a reader on Thu, 10/21/2004 - 08:26 | reply

that was to me, guess I gotta answer

Someone writes to me:

"But the stereo-type you are depicting here is of a white anglo-saxon Jew."

Wait, what? The stereotype I am depicting? I didn't make the movie. Nor am I the one who is calling any of "The Passion"'s actors a "stereotype" in the first place. (Come now, isn't this on some level demeaning - to those actors? I reject this whole nonsense equation where actors=stereotype. They're people, ok! They look how they look. Hiring actor XYZ to play character ABC is 'perpetuating a stereotype'? That's almost an offensive concept in itself.)

I did say that what another commenter (not me BTW) called a "hooknose", and portrayed as offensive (to have "hooknosed" actors in a movie about Jews, I guess(?)), was, in reality, simply a physical characteristic often found in people who are Jewish. (And not Jewish IMHO, but that's another story, and this is all so boring that I don't really care.)

But anyway, are you, or anyone else disputing that? Let me know.

If all the actors in the film had the nose of Nicole Kidman (just to name someone off the top of my head who seems to have a skinny, delicate, almost nonexistent nose to my eye) would that make the complaint go away? Is that, therefore, what filmmakers should do - ONLY use actors with a Kidman type nose to play Jews? (Careful how you answer that.)

"Is this really how a Jew living in the middle East 2000 years ago would have looked?"

Heck if I know. Photography didn't exist back then. You're saying No? How do you know? Are you subscribing to stereotypes?

Anyway what you're saying now is that the filmmakers should have labored more thoroughly to hire ONLY actors who looked "more Middle Eastern Jewish", whatever you think that means. (And it's really not clear where your notion of what looks and doesn't look "Middle Eastern Jewish 2000 years ago" comes from.) But hey, perhaps so. I wasn't bothered by it but evidently you were bothered by how some of the actors... looked. (?)

"That he or she would have been more brown than white?"

Again, I have no idea whether people in that place and time would have looked "more brown than white", beyond some vague notion that they would have appeared "semitic", and this notion was not violated in the film. Anyway, I didn't take spectrographic type measurements of the skin colors of any of the actors. Depending on what metric you have in mind, maybe the actors' skins were more brown than white? You disagree? Tell me which actors you think had skin which was "too white".

"That his or her hair would have been more dark than light?"

Um, to my eyes virtually everyone in the film had dark hair. Let's just cut to the chase shall we: Which actors do you think should have been kicked off the project for not being dark enough for your taste? Hristo Jivkov who played John? Francesco de Vito (Peter)? Mattia Sbragia (Caiaphas)? Who? (reference)

"If the film was being accurate, then surely Jesus should have been brown"

Again I don't know how you know these things, but anyway the guy seemed brown to me. I look at this photo and it seems pretty brown. Not brown enough? What color was "Jesus Christ" in your opinion? And where did that opinion come from?

Maybe it's just me but "Jim Caviezel's not brown enough!" as an argument for antisemitism just tickles my funny bone. I'm so glad there are people who bravely boldly stand up...against (?) racism/bigotry by... complaining about the skin hues of actors.

"If the film was being accurate, then surely Jesus should have been brown and those Jews persecuting him brown also?"

There were no Jews persecuting him that I saw in this story. There was a council of priests which convicted him of blasphemy but did not carry out the punishment. There were Jews yelling at him from crowds etc, is that "persecuting"? Anyway they looked 'brown' AFAIK (if you disagree tell me which ones you think weren't brown enough). The people actually persecuting him however were Romans. Granted some of them perhaps should have "looked brown" because as I understand it historically (I could be wrong), many of the "Roman" soldiers would in fact have been Syrians in Roman employ. But hey.

"So, then, why did Gibson - who despite his pretences to accuracy in other aspects of the film - choose to depict Jews of the Middle East from 2000 years ago according to the white anglo-saxon stereotype?"

I don't know what you mean. What is the "white anglo-saxon stereotype"? Are you saying those characters meant to be Jews looked instead like white anglo-saxons? But they did not (not to me), not that I'm at all sure what a "white anglo-saxon" is in the first place, of course. Anyway this is an odd complaint compared with that other person's complaint that everyone was too "hooknosed". Which is it? It seems like you're complaining both that they looked "too Jewish" and yet not Jewish enough. Granted if these actors' names are any indication, they seem to have been mostly a bunch of Italians.

The fact that the outdoor scenes of the film were filmed primarily in Italy may go a long way towards explaining that. (Yes, when there's a perfectly logical practical explanation for these circumstances you're complaining about, it's better to go with the "antisemitism" charge. That's not conspiracy thinking at all, is it, The World?)

Question: Do you actually have any good reason to believe that the actors in that film, in aggregate, looked markedly different than a snapshot of that society would have looked 2000 years ago? (Answer: No you most certainly do not.)

Maybe we need to set up some guidelines about what facial characteristics an actor must have to play a Jew in a film and not be a "stereotype". It seems to be a tricky thing, you straddle a thin line; you have to look like a Jew but you can't have what anyone can characterize as a "hooknose".. you have to be "Brown" (if playing a Jew in the Middle East) but on the other hand be sure you're not "swarthy" because then people will complain about that too. (See this, complains about "Swarthy Middle Eastern Stereotype".) And so on.

I've no doubt whatsoever that if Mel Gibson had filmed the entire project in Israel and hired all Israeli-Jewish extras (actually: for true "authenticity" he'd have had to be more careful than that, to take painstaking care not to hire any e.g. recent Russian immigrants there, perhaps even eschewing those from Europe in the past 50 years, and use only those Israeli Jews with sufficient Middle Eastern bona fides), people would still have whined about him "using stereotypes". Actually they would have whined even more because their complaints would have been even more valid. Just look at those crowd scenes: They're ALL so "stereotyped"! Too "hooknosed"! Too "swarthy"! Elliot made the point a while back that a bad result of the Gibson film is that it has led to people, all on the good side, bickering about whether it's "antisemitic". This is undoubtedly true and undoubtedly regrettable but it would not have been the case, conceivably, if the complainers (some of which are in evidence here) would not have lodged such frivolous, overreaching, in some cases downright childish complaints in the first place.

Anyway, back to this burning issue of how actors look, I now idly wonder if anybody has ever undertaken the project of defining authentic Jewish facial characteristics, complete with measurements and definitions of features, strict categories, etc. I'll go look up whether there's ever been any organized, meticulous research - research done with, one might say, a Bavarian's eye for detail - in this area. If so, adhering to such guidelines when hiring actors who play Jews seems to be the only way to really be sure not to be antisemitic. ;-P

--Blix

by a reader on Thu, 10/21/2004 - 15:23 | reply

Q 4 Blix

Do you see our criticism of the movie as parallel to the many variations of minority criticisms of racism, many of which indeed are oversensitive, or a different sort of thing?

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Thu, 10/21/2004 - 19:15 | reply

both I think

Elliot,

I think it's only fair of me to acknowledge a distinction between what are probably two main antisemitism arguments being made against Passion, here:

1. The story's content, primarily the "blood" curse, which (if taken literally and as historically has been done) implies a slanderous, dangerous idea about Jews which has caused much damage

2. Litany of various aesthetic features and details of the movie such as racial makeup of actors, editorial choices, casting choices, staging, etc. which are all thought or argued to reinforce symbolically the antisemitic content, or betray some feeling Mel Gibson is thought to have

The World's original complaint, I'd guess, was centered mostly on 1; for 1, whether any complaints #2 are valid is really neither here nor there. Meanwhile, a few other commenters have chimed in to agree with The World, but dissing the movie based on things which basically fall into category 2. Category 2, I do see as quite parallel to the usual racial griping, yes. Category 1, I recognize to be a far different, unique animal.

I'm not trying to imply that the two categories are totally independent of course. Like I said, 2 (if/when it is there) reinforces 1 (if/when it is interpreted in the slanderous way). My point here I think has been to try to argue that few in the West interpret 1 in the slanderous way anymore, and most of the complaints in 2 are frivolous.

Does this answer your question (not sure :),

--Blix

by a reader on Thu, 10/21/2004 - 22:40 | reply

re: both i think

My point here I think has been to try to argue that few in the West interpret 1 in the slanderous way anymore

I'm not so sure. If the anti-Israel media is any guide...

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Thu, 10/21/2004 - 23:00 | reply

semi touche

But,

the anti-Israel media

...does not believe in anything from "the Bible" in the first place. The "blood libel" is on the face of it meaningless if there's no real reason to care just who killed that dude anyway.

Although the point that the anti-Israel media, and other flavors of neo-antisemites, could subconsciously be operating from believing in some secular parallel residual version of the blood libel, is well taken. ;-) But their anti-Jewish efforts are not really aided/abetted by the telling of a pop-culture passion play. As we saw, the major media was quite hostile to Gibson's movie and only too happy to raise the antisemitism flag on this one.

It's an easy way to cover their ass for all that crap they write about Israel.

Like I said, complaining about a Mel Gibson movie when there's, like, REAL Jew-killing going on is wacky at best.

--Blix

by a reader on Thu, 10/21/2004 - 23:35 | reply

Re: "secular moral values"

I think that there is a useful distinction to be made between moral values whose justification depends on supernatural sources and those that do not - even though there is some overlap between the two, and even though historically they affected each other's evolution to some extent. For instance, the idea that a single-celled organism is entitled to protection as a human being is defended only by people who believe (whether they use this terminology or not) that such organisms have supernatural human souls, and that morality is different for souled and non-souled entities. These are purely religious values.

At the other end of the scale, the idea that freedom of religion, freedom of speech and of the press, limited government, presumption of innocence and so on, should be overriding regulatory principles when human beings organise themselves in groups, is not present, even in rudimentary form, in any evolved religious tradition. These are purely secular values. They were invented partly by anonymous thinkers over the millennia, each of whom contributed an idea here and there to traditions like the English Common Law and its predecessors, and partly by philosophers such as Locke, Hume and Mill.

In the large overlap- and co-evolved regions there are things like equality before the law, the objectivity and universality of morality itself, and the intrinsic value of human beings and of human life and well-being (though the moral value of human knowledge and human creativity belongs entirely to the secular category).

by David Deutsch on Wed, 10/27/2004 - 03:49 | reply

Re: "secular moral values"

David Deutsch posts a series of assertions, none well argued or particularly connected to anything. I would welcome better defense of the first set of assertions. To wit: Can we have an example by direct testimony from the man's own mouth of "gibbering hatred" from Mel Gibson? Can Deutsch enumerate the criteria by which he supposes Gibson and Michael Moore to be equivalent menaces? Would it be too much to ask for Deutsch to explain why his original post is not a manifestation of the epidemic anti-Hellenism that is Islamism's best ally?

Just as a side note, and not to frustrate Deutsch in the public practice of what is clearly a matter of religion to him, but thoughtful athiests oppose abortion not because of the baby's humanity but because of their own.

presenceofmind.net

by gswann on Wed, 10/27/2004 - 14:06 | reply

not "well argued"

David's post is a conjecture. It is bold (that's good). It says a lot about the world (that's good). It is meant for a certain problem situation (one aspect of this: the post has nothing much to do with the Gibson stuff, directly). It is not supposed to have positive arguments for it, because such things don't work epistemically. It is not supposed to preemptively head off all the bad rival theories possible, because doing so would be boring.

So, you say it's not "well argued" but that is to miss the point. Which part do you have a criticism of, and what rival theory do you prefer?

I do not understand the question about Hellenism (Greeks, right?).

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 10/27/2004 - 15:07 | reply

A rival theory:

People have "lost faith" in secular arguments because secular movements murdered at least 160 million innocents in the last century. I do not uphold this theory--I would not even frame the debate as secular v. ecclesiastical (or whatever it is Duetsch (mis-)aims to scourge)--but this is certainly a better theory than the one he propped and has not defended.

Hellenism = Occidentalism = Westernism = the vanishing transnational culture of pluralistic bourgeois capitalism. I'm betting you could have worked this out on your own.

Greg Swann, presenceofmind.net

by gswann on Wed, 10/27/2004 - 16:08 | reply

Evidence of Mel Gibson's Motivation In His Own Words

I guess you can all use Google at least as well as I can, but there's a quotation here and some more here.

by David Deutsch on Wed, 10/27/2004 - 16:32 | reply

I know I've "lost faith" in

I know I've "lost faith" in secular murderers. Time to put murder back in the hands of those who really know what they're doing: religious fanatics. Don't worry. Already happening.

by a reader on Wed, 10/27/2004 - 16:48 | reply

google

how and when to use google is not manifest, nor even easy.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 10/27/2004 - 17:37 | reply

f yeah

Anyway, I finally got to see "Team America" this weekend, and I think one thing we can all agree on, it's HILARIOUS. :-)

--Blix

by a reader on Wed, 10/27/2004 - 19:00 | reply

Who hates whom?

So we have this:

"I have friends and parents of friends who have numbers on their arms. The guy who taught me Spanish was a Holocaust survivor. He worked in a concentration camp in France. Yes, of course. Atrocities happened. War is horrible. The Second World War killed tens of millions of people. Some of them were Jews in concentration camps. Many people lost their lives. In the Ukraine, several million starved to death between 1932 and 1933. During the last century, 20 million people died in the Soviet Union."

And this:

"Why are they calling her a Nazi? Because modern secular Judaism wants to blame the Holocaust on the Catholic Church. And it's revisionism. And they've been working on that one for a while."

This is your evidence of "gibbering hatred" and your justification for smearing a great libertarian artist with a vile propagandist of tyranny. I think we have discovered where the "gibbering hatred" resides.

Greg Swann, presenceofmind.net

by gswann on Wed, 10/27/2004 - 22:47 | reply

Copyright © 2007 Setting The World To Rights

Reuters Makes Up Israeli History

Seizing on the over-the-top rhetoric of some Israeli politicians, Reuters gleefully talks up the non-existent possibility of a forthcoming civil war in Israel. To reinforce its point, it invents some past history as well. It says that the forthcoming decisions about the Gaza disengagement plan will show whether Israel is ready to cede occupied land for the first time in more than two decades

In reality, Israel ceded occupied land four years ago in May, 2000, when it withdrew unilaterally from the Lebanon buffer zone. Ten years ago, in 1994, it ceded occupied Jordanian land under the Israel-Jordan peace treaty. Sixteen years ago, in 1988, Israel ceded the disputed Taba region to Egypt.

Moreover the arbitrary formula 'for the first time in more than two decades' conceals the fact that Israel has withdrawn from occupied or disputed land on every occasion when some of its enemies have seen fit to end their campaign to destroy it – and also on several occasions when they have not.

What is Reuters playing at?

Thu, 10/21/2004 - 13:17 | digg | del.icio.us | permlink

A New Blasphemy Law

The British Home Secretary David Blunkett says that he plans to repeal the blasphemy law. Most people don't know that there is a blasphemy law on the books in Britain. Nor is there any reason why they should, as it is almost never enforced. We nevertheless welcome its repeal. But there is a catch: Blunkett also plans to enact a law banning incitement to religious hatred.

We don't support religious hatred, but such a law would be a bad one. For one thing, incitement to hatred is different from the already-illegal incitement to violence. It is wrong to argue that all people with particular beliefs or skin colour or whatever ought to be killed or hurt and it should be illegal. However, there is nothing necessarily wrong with hating people who advocate tyranny, or despising those who apologise for it, provided that one does not also advocate their murder. It is also legitimate to say that particular ideas are evil – in other words to incite hatred against those ideas – again, so long as this does not amount to inciting violence against their holders.

And in all these case, it should make no difference either way if the hated people or ideas are religious. Why does the proposed law specify incitement to religious hatred? The US Constitution separates the Church and the state for good reason, they go together very badly. People seldom do evil so gladly as when they delude themselves that they are doing it for God. What is this law but a modern blasphemy law? Not blasphemy against God but blasphemy against the pseudoreligion of political correctness. A religion that puts the politeness of an argument above its truth. Freedom of speech means being allowed to say unpleasant things about religious beliefs moderated by personal judgement rather than fear of violent retribution, legal or otherwise. Like so many of Blunkett's ideas, this law would be a step backward from a free society and the proper respect for personal responsibility. We oppose it.

Sun, 10/24/2004 - 18:05 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

That law

That law would never fly in the United States. It would be ruled unconstitutional the first time it was used. Over here, you actually can incite people to violence all you want, as long as you aren't standing in front of an armed mob. That is the standard of case law.

I have often wondered, in Britain, is there any way for the courts to strike down acts of parliament? Before the Constitution and the Bill of Rights in America, Hamilton was a lawyer. One of his legal principles was that the English common law could trump state legislation. Is it that way in Britain?

Nick
legenda.blogspot.com

by a reader on Sun, 10/24/2004 - 22:56 | reply

I don't know, it sounds like

I don't know, it sounds like a pretty good God damn law to me.

by a reader on Mon, 10/25/2004 - 03:18 | reply

Unintended consequences?

With such a law, a lot of religious leaders should be worried. No more preaching that it's required to kill Jews and enslave Christians.

John Anderson teqjack@wowmail.com

by a reader on Sun, 10/31/2004 - 16:01 | reply

Re: Unintended consequences?

Yes, and therefore one of the down-sides would be that the public would be systematically misled about how widespread murderous opinions are among the leaders of certain religions.

by Editor on Sun, 10/31/2004 - 17:08 | reply

home | archives | polls | search

Copyright © 2008 Setting The World To Rights

Open Letter To Libertarians

A former Libertarian candidate for President vigorously urges Libertarians to vote to re-elect President Bush. [Via A Reasonable Man.]

If the election is as close as it was in 2000, libertarian voters may make the difference as to who wins in various critical "Battle Ground" states and therefore the presidency itself. That is the situation in which we find ourselves in 2004. And that is why I believe voting for George W. Bush is the most libertarian thing we can do.

We stand today at an important electoral crossroads for the future of liberty, and as libertarians our first priority is to promote liberty and free markets, which is not necessarily the same as to promote the Libertarian Party. This time, if we vote Libertarian, we may win a tiny rhetorical battle, but lose the larger war.

Compare this with another open letter which we published last year.

Tue, 10/26/2004 - 11:29 | digg | del.icio.us | permlink

Ducking And Weaving

A soldier is running towards an enemy position that he must capture or the battle is lost.

He is fired on: he zigs to the left. He is fired on again: he zags to the right. He is about to fire when some unarmed children run out and attack him. He holds his fire and runs round them. He reaches the enemy position and captures it.

'Criminal incompetence – give that soldier a dishonourable discharge', cries Andrew Sullivan. 'Look at all those zig zags: they prove he never had a plan!'

Fri, 10/29/2004 - 01:06 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

zig zags

Tend to support the theory that there is a plan. Teamed with events that correlate with the zag or zig tends to support the theory that the plan was modified by the actor. People zig zag when they are on purpose. To state that they never waver or change their mind about the rightness of a particular tac-tic, or never admit to the wrong zag or corrective zig would be at odds with the evidence.

by a reader on Fri, 10/29/2004 - 14:21 | reply

Thank you!

I've had it about up to here with this infantile talk about "Plans". Apparently in the eyes of some of these armchair generals the way you fight a war is you literally plot out all events beforehand based on research and data. The "Plan", I can only surmise, is like a PhD thesis or something, only bigger. (May explain why left/academe/ivory tower types think this is how it should be done; to them this is how everything is done.)

You're also supposed to foresee everything that the enemy does and third parties do and "Plan" those contingents in advance. Flexibility is bad, calling audibles is bad, (ironically) adapting to events is... bad. (This is ironic because an alleged failure/unwillingness to adapt to events is another favorite Bush criticism.)

Meanwhile if one thing goes wrong that proves you "didn't have a Plan". Now, you might think that in all human endeavors something is bound to go wrong. NOT SO. If you "Plan" correctly you can solve for the Right Answer to all war questions and construct the PERFECT "Plan" such that NOTHING will go wrong. So, if a few things do go wrong, you can cherry-pick that data, ignore everything that goes right, and conclude that they "didn't have a Plan" or had "horrible Planning".

Now I may not be the world's biggest expert on wars but I do know one thing, people who speak that way don't know what the f they're talking about.

--Blix

by a reader on Fri, 10/29/2004 - 15:07 | reply

yay

v nice post.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Fri, 10/29/2004 - 15:14 | reply

The only thing is, Bush hasn'

The only thing is, Bush hasn't captured the enemy position yet. But I don't know how to go about making the case that Bush is incompetent. How do you judge the competence of someone who is battling the unknown? Debaathification, sovereignty, and democracy are fine from the standpoint of principle. If they fail, the tactics have to be changed. But if they had never been tried, that would be a point of criticism, not on the basis of tactics, but on the basis of good will and principle. If they had not been tried, we would never know the truth.

<http://www.legendablogspot.com>

by a reader on Sat, 10/30/2004 - 03:53 | reply

Re: The only thing is, Bush hasn't...

First, our criticism of those who take Sullivan's view would hold just as well if the soldier in the story was still only halfway there.

Second, Bush (or his Administration) has captured many enemy positions, both literally and in the figurative sense of having succeeded at tasks that many naysayers said were impossible.

As for your other comments – agreed.

by Editor on Sat, 10/30/2004 - 04:12 | reply

Walter Cronkite, Conspiracy Theorist?

Yesterday Walter Cronkite, the veteran CBS anchorman, became the latest public figure to replace political analysis by conspiracy-theory lunacy. Interviewed on CNN by Larry King, he said:

So now the question is basically right now, how will this affect the election? And I have a feeling that it could tilt the election a bit. In fact, I'm a little inclined to think that Karl Rove, the political manager at the White House, who is a very clever man, he probably set up bin Laden to this thing. The advantage to the Republican side is to get rid of, as a principal subject of the campaigns right now, get rid of the whole problem of the al Qaqa explosive dump.

Let's assume he was joking (which is by no means obvious). Even so, let's not laugh. The position of the enemy in the current war consists essentially of that sort of explanation of current affairs and history, and its spread into the mainstream is poisoning political discourse in the West.

Sat, 10/30/2004 - 21:17 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Karl Rove as the "clever man"

Surely Walter C. you are joking. However not to make light of K. Rove. The guy stops at nothing. He is master of conspiracy and uses the blinders of others to spin his political schemes. No way that his tentacles could reasonably extend beyond borders and he doesn't mess with things he can't spin. Be glad it was old newscaster Walter C. doing the talking and not K. Rove conspiracy theory spinner. Conspiracy theory Walter? Bah. Good joke. K. Rove likely chuckled.

by a reader on Sat, 10/30/2004 - 23:10 | reply

Re: Karl Rove as the "clever man"

"The guy stops at nothing. He is master of conspiracy and uses the blinders of others to spin his political schemes."

Is this a conspiracy that everyone knows about? If so, why call it a 'conspiracy'?

by David Deutsch on Sun, 10/31/2004 - 13:36 | reply

"clever man"

Right to the point and gets to what is a conspiracy v.s. conspiracy theory. K. Rove has spun fantastic political tales and rumors to get his candidate elected. Disprove that. K. Rove is a political conspiracist and technically not a conspiracy theorist. He conspires to spin particles of truth and untruth alike to mold opinion to bias the particular electorates. The evidence abounds for this despite the fact that K. Rove covers most of his trails. He distances himself from questions of morality in a strategy that results cover means. Confusion trumps rationality. That is part of his game. McCain campaign in South Carolina is only one obvious example. Karl Rove likely chuckles as he applies his clever bag of tricks.

by a reader on Sun, 10/31/2004 - 14:27 | reply

Re: "clever man"

"K. Rove covers most of his trails"

How do we know that?

by David Deutsch on Sun, 10/31/2004 - 14:42 | reply

LOL

LOL this is priceless. Do keep replying, reader. Tell us more of what you know about Rove's secret schemes. --Blix

by a reader on Sun, 10/31/2004 - 18:29 | reply

my Theory

Personally I think Cronkite said this stuff because Rove wanted him to. (Brainwashed?) You see, on the face of it, Cronkite's spewings are idiotic. They make Cronkite seem like an addled moron. This will discredit the content of what he is saying (being made to say? controlled by computer chip?).

And the thing is, what Cronkite is saying is 100% true, of course.

It's reverse psychology!

That diabolical genius Rove. As we all know, he will stop at nothing. NOTHING!

--Blix

by a reader on Sun, 10/31/2004 - 20:44 | reply

Rove LOL

Rove got us to change the subject did he not? Diabolical spin specialist. Humor added by Walter Cronkite.

Secret schemes? As for that only the mind of Karl Rove deduces the extent of public gullibility. At the moment he is not telling.

by a reader on Sun, 10/31/2004 - 21:42 | reply

Nicholas Lemann interviews Karl Rove

Fair and concise question from Nicholas Lemann (New Yorker article, May 2003)to Karl Rove and a fair and concise answer:

Lemann: "But do you weaken a political party, either by turning what they see as assets into liabilities, and/or by taking issues they consider to be theirs, and raiding them?" The thought brought to his round, unlined, guileless face a boyish look of pure delight. "Absolutely!"

by a reader on Sun, 10/31/2004 - 22:08 | reply

Re: Nicholas Lemann interviews Karl Rove

A reader writes:

Lemann: "But do you weaken a political party, either by turning what they see as assets into liabilities, and/or by taking issues they consider to be theirs, and raiding them?" The thought brought to his round, unlined, guileless face a boyish look of pure delight. "Absolutely!"

Oh my God! It's almost like he gives arguments about why his opponents' positions are wrong and so changes people minds about them! And to think I thought America was a democracy?! After all, a real democracy wouldn't allow representatives of political parties to say things that might make other political parties seem less attractive, that's just not cricket.

by Alan Forrester on Mon, 11/01/2004 - 01:19 | reply

cynicism

Alan,

i honestly read that guys post as pro karl rove.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 11/01/2004 - 01:24 | reply

Correct!

The post was intended as pro Karl Rove. Pure and simple politics.

"But do you weaken a political party, either by turning what they see as assets into liabilities, and/or by taking issues they consider to be theirs, and raiding them?" ----"Absolutely!"

Political assets hinge on funding as any good political conspiracist knows. The assets that Rove referred to were in context to a Lemann scenario regarding a tripartite consortium of key funders, "trial lawyers, Jews, and labor unions":

Lemann: "The Party has three key funding sources: trial lawyers, Jews, and labor unions. One could systematically disable all three, by passing tort-reform legislation that would cut off the trial lawyers' incomes, by tilting pro-Israel in Middle East policy and thus changing the loyalties of big Jewish contributors, and by trying to shrink the part of the labor force which belongs to the newer, and more Democratic, public-employee unions."

Politics ala Rove. After all American democracy is no morality play. Or is it?

by a reader on Mon, 11/01/2004 - 02:23 | reply

My bad

My bad.

by Alan Forrester on Tue, 11/02/2004 - 15:55 | reply

No Apology

Her Majesty the Queen is visiting Dresden to host a concert to pay for the rebuilding of Dresden cathedral, which was levelled during a bombing raid in World War 2 that killed at least 25,000 German civilians. The German newspaper Bild has asked if the Queen will apologise for this. Neither the Queen nor any other representative of Britain should ever apologise for what happened to Dresden. During World War Two, Dresden was a railhead and the site of factories making military equipment. British bombers could not bomb accurately because they flew at night to avoid being shot down by anti-aircraft fire and because they didn't have smart bombs. So they levelled the whole city killing thousands of innocents. Hitler and his fellow Nazis and their collaborators bear the sole responsibility for those deaths; not Britain and not Churchill. German people today are free to make outrageous demands because Britain bombed their cities. They are free because the Allies destroyed the Nazis by force – something that the German people failed in their moral responsibility to do long before. They should never forget that.

Sun, 10/31/2004 - 13:59 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

"they"?

Aren't you using the word "they" in the last two sentences in at least three different ways? "They", meaning German people today, "they", meaning German people in WW2 times who had the opportunity to depose the Nazis, and "they" meaning all German people in WW2 times, including completely innocent ones. Isn't the point that some of the last group were killed for crimes they did not commit?

by a reader on Sun, 10/31/2004 - 14:51 | reply

to whom

Ok a reader, good point.

Who, then, is the Queen supposed to Apologize too? She can't go back in time to speak directly to the second (or third?) They. And why on earth would the FIRST They ask her to Apologize (to Them)?

For what? The first They by now consists largely of folks born after these events even occurred. What has England (or any subgroup of England) done to the first They which requires apology? Sent the Beatles to Hamburg?

Another interesting question to ponder: why would the Queen of England, Elizabeth, apologize for this at all? She was not the sovereign of England at the time in the first place. And CMIIW but the sovereign at the time did not have power anyway. And (I think) Churchill is dead.

So who in the heck is supposed to "Apologize" to whom? The whole thing becomes just a bizarre non sequitur now that you've helpfully forced me to sort out all the different Theys involved.

Should I ask the Queen to apologize to me for the burning of the White House in the War of 1812? Do let me know,

--Blix

by a reader on Sun, 10/31/2004 - 18:28 | reply

Collective guilt?

"something that the German people failed in their moral responsibility to do long before"

by a reader on Mon, 11/01/2004 - 03:29 | reply

More collective guilt

"The German newspaper Bild has asked if the Queen will apologise for this"

by a reader on Mon, 11/01/2004 - 03:37 | reply

Terrorist means and ends

There were thousands of civilians killed at Dresden. You claim that it was an industrial site that was strategic in the war. I don't doubt it. But as an American, I know what we did to those two Japanese cities. There was an industrial and strategic aspect. And there was a terrorist aspect. To this time I do not know if the terrorism was justified under the circumstances. But I do know that, whether it was justified or not, there are hypothetical circumstances where terrorism, as a method of war, could be and would be justified. That is why I have never characterised the current war as a "war against terrorism". You can never divorce terrorism as a means from its ends. The terrorism of the Islamist can never be interpreted without reference to its ends. If the ends were noble, it would be a harder case to judge. Knowing what the ends are, I see the terrorist method of warfare as an indication of the terrorist method of government. But knowing nothing about the ends and the situation, I could never come to such a conclusion.

-Nick

legenda.blogspot.com

Re: Collective guilt

A reader described this comment "something that the German people failed in their moral responsibility to do long before" as ascribing collective guilt.

Over 30% of Germans voted for a ticket with Hitler's name on it in many successive elections. Every one of these people bears some of the responsibility for subsequent events. Furthermore, many of the people who didn't care enough to go out and change the minds of those who voted for Hitler bear some of the responsibility. There can't have been many people in Germany who didn't know what Hitler was up to, he said it repeatedly and loudly in public and wrote about his plans for conquest and genocide in Mein Kampf. So many of them were in fact partly responsible for Hitler's rise to power despite knowing what he stood for.

And to prevent misinterpretation, it wasn't that the people who got bombed deserved to die. Rather, the Allies had been put in a position where there was no other viable option.

As for the claim that describing the Bild as German is collectivist, well, it is published in Germany and written in Germany and is published in the German language.

by Alan Forrester on Mon, 11/01/2004 - 16:56 | reply

2 things

1. Actually Alan I read the second "collective guilt" comment as a retort to the first one. The Bild, after all, has ascribed collective guilt to the people of England, including Queen Elizabeth, for acts which - even leaving aside the issue of whether those acts were justified - not all of them (and, not Elizabeth) had anything to do with. Even to the point of asking Elizabeth (who again had nothing to do with it) to "apologize" for those acts. That's collective guilt too.

I thought it was a clever retort, but let me know (reader) if I misinterpreted.

2. To Nick, much of your comment is mooted if one stipulates that actions by a uniformed military in wartime are by definition not "terrorism". (They may be many things - war crimes, etc. - just not "terrorism".) I know that not all (perhaps not The World for example) subscribe to this definition of "terrorism". I do (following Armed Liberal at Winds of Change who had a good post a while back explaining why the distinction is interesting, and which convinced me).

You like millions of others who've made the same exact point for 3 years are right of course that this is not a "war against terrorism" per se. It's a war against a certain enemy which primarily uses terrorism and "war on terror" is just a convenient (and politically acceptable) shorthand. So what? I can never understand why people think that the observation that it's not a LITERAL "war on terror" is supposed to be so earth shattering or scintillating. Is what we call it really, in the end, so important? I've never thought so but YMMV I guess.

--Blix

by a reader on Mon, 11/01/2004 - 21:58 | reply

reply to Blix

Yes you're right, that's what I meant. But I see now that Alan Forrester's interpretation was a natural one to make. Sorry, I should have been clear rather than clever.

by a reader on Mon, 11/01/2004 - 23:01 | reply

If this is true:

something that the German people failed in their moral responsibility to do long before. They should never forget that. Then this is true: The British people failed in their moral responsibility to repeal the Corn laws that led to the starvation of thousands (if not millions) of Irish. They should never forget that.

P.S. Over the historical span of the British Empire how many millions of innocent lives were snuffed out by the British?

by a reader on Tue, 11/02/2004 - 02:37 | reply

Re: If this is true:

A reader wrote:

something that the German people failed in their moral responsibility to do long before. They should never forget that.

Then this is true: The British people failed in their moral responsibility to repeal the Corn laws that led to the starvation of thousands (if not millions) of Irish. They should never forget that.

The Corn Laws did lead to the deaths of millions of Irish people and the British should never forget that. However, there is a difference between making a mistake that leads to millions dying and choosing to destroy millions of lives as a matter of deliberate policy or supporting someone who favours such policies.

P.S. Over the historical span of the British Empire how many millions of innocent lives were snuffed out by the British?

Again, those people were not killed as a matter of a deliberate policy of genocide, although many were killed for bad reasons, like sheer greed. However, we could also equally ask how many lives were saved and how much freedom was spread by the Empire. Would India be a democratic, free society today if the British had not trained many Indians in the workings of democracy? How many people would still be in chains if the British Empire had not decided to try to eliminate slavery? It isn't really something anyone should want to go back to, but the Empire wasn't all bad either in intention or in practise. The Nazis were all bad.

by Alan Forrester on Tue, 11/02/2004 - 15:53 | reply

And besides and besides, AFAIK there's no Brit newspaper asking like the President of India, or Ireland, to apologize for this or that historical uprising or other violence against Brits.

Assuming the analogy holds in the first place, that would be the analogous thing.

by a reader on Tue, 11/02/2004 - 16:21 | reply

Heh

"The Nazis were all bad."

Alan, I don't know if you're up to date on Californian slang, but that phrase is hilarious.

Before you wonder, no, in this context 'bad' does not mean 'good'.

"The Nazis were all bad" is true in slang or in literal interpretation.

by a reader on Wed, 11/03/2004 - 20:00 | reply

say what you mean

instead of teasing Alan, could you just tell us what you mean?

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 11/03/2004 - 23:42 | reply

Apology

Apologise for What? It was the Nazis stupid fault that we were involved in the war anyway. In my belief we had to bomb the fascists out of the civilians in order to crush the resistance. The German Prime Minister is himself a swastika wearer and how dare he ask our Queen to apologise! Its unbelievable. We should still be dropping bombs nowadays for what they did. The amount of Jews killed in the concentration camps around 5 Million and they want an apology for 25,000 Hitler supporters. What a pile of *#!$ in my opinion.

by Harley on Thu, 12/02/2004 - 22:57 | reply

We disagree

We disagree with several points in the above comment.

Chancellor Schroder was born in 1944 and is in no sense a 'swastika wearer'. Resistance in Germany after the war was suppressed by making it clear that those who resisted would be killed and those who did not resist would (in the Western sectors at least) have their rights respected: it had nothing to do with casualties inflicted during the war. The 25,000 or more killed in Dresden were not all 'Hitler supporters', which is why anyone, such as ourselves, who supports the raid that killed them has to argue, as we did, that it was a moral necessity despite many of those deaths, not because of them. And of course violence against Germans today would be totally unjustified.

by Editor on Fri, 12/03/2004 - 03:01 | reply

yeah!

Apologise for What? It was the Nazis stupid fault that we were involved in the war anyway.

I know he didn't mean it, but I agree with this. All the deaths on both sides are the Nazis fault and responsibility, not ours. (Except the ones that should be blamed on Japan, USSR, or whoever else)

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Fri, 12/03/2004 - 18:44 | reply

Sorry

Thank You For supporting me Elliot. I'm sorry though for going so overboard. I guess i was just incensed about the situation. Normally it was just words from my Grandad who served in the 6th Airborne in WW2. He was there from D-Day to the end of the war. He was a Captain and a commander of one of the companies. He told me that he saw alot of distressing things, and lost many good friends to a War started by the Germans. I hope you now understand why I said what i did, and i'm sorry to anyone who found this unnecessary.

by Harley on Fri, 12/03/2004 - 20:44 | reply

Sarcasm

I think the Editor thought you were being sarcastic. Actually, so did I. But I think it's truer as meaning it seriously, than as meaning the opposite.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Fri, 12/03/2004 - 22:13 | reply

No!

I agree with the Editor, and disagree with Harley and Elliot about the claim that all the German deaths were the fault of the Nazis.

The Nazis bear a lot of responsibility, but that doesn't mean that there could be no unjustified killings while battling them, or that perpetrators bear none of the responsibility.

We may disagree about which killings were, in fact, unjustified, but I think we should agree that it's possible for members of the right side to be at fault for bad things that they do while engaged in a good cause.

And, since there were so many armed people and so many killings, and since we do not know the details about all of them, it seems unreasonable to assert that the Nazis were responsible for all of them.

Gil

by Gil on Sat, 12/04/2004 - 03:39 | reply

yes!

Gil,

Yeah, good guys can wage war wrongly, but... you can't expect the military to be perfect, has so many ppl, as you say. therefore, forcing us to use it at all, makes the bad side-effects the nazis fault.

we designed our military reasonably. what more could be asked of us?

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Sat, 12/04/2004 - 05:54 | reply

Huh?

I'm not suggesting that it's wrong to have a military because not every member behaves perfectly.

I'm just saying that being a part of a good institution that often performs its justified tasks well and nobly, doesn't absolve one of responsibility for his actions.

If there's a murderer in the military and he commits murder during a just war, he is responsible for that murder; not the bad guys who caused the war (except for a tiny part of it).

Every situation that a wrong-doer is in is "caused" to some extent by other people beyond his control. That doesn't mean that those others are responsible for his actions because if not for them he wouldn't have been there.

Does it?

Gil

by Gil on Sat, 12/04/2004 - 06:48 | reply

how about this:

When the Germans deploy an army with some murderers in it, we blame the murderers, and their leaders (for deploying them). When Britain does, we blame the murderers, and the German leaders (for making us deploy them).

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Sat, 12/04/2004 - 16:07 | reply

OK

That's better.

But, if while battling Germany's military Britain's leaders order unjustified killing, we blame Britain's leaders for that.

We can blame Germany's leaders for putting Britain's leaders into a situation where none of their choices were pleasant. But, we can blame Britain's leaders for making bad choices when better choices were available. We can say that they are responsible for the difference between their morally worse choices and their morally better choices. Or, something like that.

Gil

by Gil on Sat, 12/04/2004 - 23:35 | reply

agreed (nt)

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Sun, 12/05/2004 - 06:01 | reply

A free and democratic India?

Alan: You're assuming that people in India were unfree and undemocratic before the British got there. People didn't exactly live in desperate squalor before the British came to save them from themselves. Although the people may have not have had 'freedom' and 'democracy' as we think of them today, they were generally content in their political systems. India along only became unfree and undemocratic, with people in chains, with the arrival of British colonizers. Really, I can't see how many good things British or any other colonialism spread.

by Tomas on Mon, 04/18/2005 - 01:22 | reply

British Empire

Tomas wrote:

You're assuming that people in India were unfree and undemocratic before the British got there. People didn't exactly live in desperate squalor before the British came to save them from themselves. Although the people may have not have had 'freedom' and 'democracy' as we think of them today, they were generally content in their political systems. India along only became unfree and undemocratic, with people in chains, with the arrival of British colonizers.

Yeah, nobody was in chains, except all the slaves of course. And the British banned slavery in India in 1860. As I said, the British Empire did some good things and some bad things, here's an interesting article for you to read.

by Alan Forrester on Tue, 04/19/2005 - 01:38 | reply

Politicised Junk Published As Medical Research

The Lancet has published a study claiming that about 100,000 Iraqis have died violently since the end of the war – in other words, more than 150 a day for the 87 weeks since then – mostly in Coalition air strikes. The study contains very bad science, as Tim Worstall at Tech Central Station explains, and its conclusion is wildly false.

UPDATE: Tim Worstall has withdrawn all his criticisms of the science in the article! We therefore withdraw the corresponding criticisms in this article, and thank reader Henry Sturman for pointing this out. We apologise for inadvertently misleading our readers. (But see also this article on the politicised Lancet.)

We find the blatant political agenda of the Lancet's editor Richard Horton very worrying:

The invasion of Iraq, the displacement of a cruel dictator, and the attempt to impose a liberal democracy by force have, by themselves, been insufficient to bring peace and security to the civilian population. Democratic imperialism has led to more deaths not fewer.

The real reason for the publication of this worthless and tendentious study was that the Lancet was attempting to influence the American election. This is bad politics as well as bad science. Does Mr Horton really want Coalition forces to base future policy decisions on bad data? And doesn't this say rather more about his own lack of scientific integrity than about the morality of any war?

Furthermore, trying to turn moral judgements of the war into this sort of numbers game is a trivialisation of the issues involved. We suspect that this fatuous game is being played only because those who oppose the war have run headlong into moral no-man's-land without a compass. After all, what else are they going to say, that spreading democracy and human rights is intrinsically wrong?

Meanwhile, the British Medical Journal has joined in the war against Israel in what is, if anything, an even more foul and unprincipled abdication from its scientific and moral responsibilities.

Re:Politicised Junk

"We suspect that this fatuous game is being played only because those who oppose the war have run headlong into moral no-man's-land without a compass. After all, what else are they going to say, that spreading democracy and human rights is intrinsically wrong?"

It is "The World" that has run headlong into moral no-man's-land without a compass. The invasion of Iraq has not spread democracy or human rights.

by a reader on Fri, 11/05/2004 - 02:04 | reply

Also,

Putting the batter in the oven for one minute has not created a cake.

by a reader on Fri, 11/05/2004 - 19:17 | reply

As He died to make men holy, let us die to make men free!

by a reader on Sat, 11/06/2004 - 01:16 | reply

Tech Central Article retracted

At the end of this page the author of the Tech Central Station article retracted all his arguments against the Lancet article and admits that leaves him nothing but personal prejudice upon which to stand.

So until a genuine critique of the Lancet appears, the article stands.

Henry Sturman

by Henry Sturman on Sat, 11/06/2004 - 01:36 | reply

What About This One?

Are the criticisms in this article valid?

Gil

by Gil on Sat, 11/06/2004 - 03:57 | reply

yes

I think the criticisms Slate article are indeed valid.

To those criticisms I will add another: I cannot imagine how, exactly, they determine whether a reported dead person was a "civilian". Women, and children less than 14 - sure. But the dead males in Iraqi households are far more difficult to assume away (or take the family's word) as being "civilians", which they admit. Take a man who was shot by a sniper while planting a roadside bomb, or indeed who died while plowing a car bomb into coalition forces (or even into a crowd of Iraqis) - it appears as if the Lancet survey would count him as a "civilian who died following the invasion". (Please correct me if I'm wrong.)

On a more general level, part of my problem with this study is different. Granted it does not appear to be of much scientific merit, but even if it were, what's it doing in a medical journal? As with many studies involving handgun deaths we see getting published, studies of this kind, even if one can contemplate doing them in a scientifically valid way, are simply NOT medical in nature. This subject is not within the purview of the field of medicine, and so attempts to include it are disturbing and speak of a political agenda rather than sincere search for truth.

--Blix

by a reader on Sat, 11/06/2004 - 04:40 | reply

Tech Central Article retracted?

Looking indeed at the Slate article they mention some of the same arguments that the Tech Central Station article mentioned. In the Lancet article it says:

We estimate that 98 000 more deaths than expected (8000–194 000) happened after the invasion outside of Falluja and far more if the outlier Falluja cluster is included.

This is indeed remarkably unspecific. The authors themselves admit that their 98 000 figure has such a large margin of error it could even be as low as 8000, which would be 10 fold less than the estimate.

So in hindsight I'm not really clear why the Tech Central Station author retracted his scientific arguments against the Lancet article, and it's unfortunate that he didn't explain more specifically what his errors were. His main point about the enormous error margins does seem to be valid.

Henry Sturman

by Henry Sturman on Sat, 11/06/2004 - 15:46 | reply

Explanation of retraction

For explanation, see this, this and this.

by a reader on Thu, 11/11/2004 - 01:12 | reply

Whoops, the third "this" should be...

this!

by a reader on Thu, 11/11/2004 - 01:18 | reply

Copyright © 2007 Setting The World To Rights

We Endorse...

We agree with E. Nough's assessment:

Tomorrow, I will vote. I will vote for George W. Bush. It's not a tough decision. Bush is a lousy communicator and has an uninspiring presence. True. But his opponent is, at core, a thoroughly deluded fool. Not only deluded, but arrogant. The man actually thinks he can bring France and Germany into Iraq by "explaining" to them "the stakes." Right. As if they don't know. What a vacuous, pompous buffoon. And, as I write this, there's a real chance it'll be President-elect Buffoon by this time next week.

Oh, and by the way, we endorse Rudi Giuliani for President in 2008.

Tue, 11/02/2004 - 18:21 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Not Condi?

What happened to Condi 2008?

I was looking forward to Hillary vs Condi.

by a reader on Wed, 11/03/2004 - 09:50 | reply

Condi

Condi would be great too, maybe even better, but we are having trouble ascertaining her views on issues not related to national security. Also, Rudi has a lot more political leadership experience, doesn't he?

by Editor on Fri, 11/05/2004 - 06:02 | reply

Rudi

I want Rudi in 2008

by a reader on Mon, 06/20/2005 - 15:07 | reply

Goodbye Colin

Following his election victory, President Bush has an opportunity for a reshuffle of his cabinet. Of all the people he should replace, there is one man who stands head and shoulders above the rest – Colin Powell. In his chosen area of foreign policy, Powell is not the sharpest pencil in the box. The latest example of this involves Taiwan. Taiwan is an island off mainland China with a democratic system of government. The communist Chinese state claims sovereignty over it and Powell has effectively supported this claim:

Aiming a few well-placed kicks at the groin of a former ally, Powell informed the Hong Kong station: "Taiwan is not independent" and "does not enjoy sovereignty as a nation, and that remains our policy, our firm policy."

We have commented that the current conflict is a war on conspiracy theories. Communist ideology is riddled with conspiracy theories and so China is a cause for concern even if it not presently threatening us. We recognise that since the US is currently trying to get China to lean on North Korea, it would be a bad idea to annoy the Chinese government too much. However, there is a difference between Colin Powell not going out of his way to annoy the Chinese government and casually conceding their legitimacy to destroy a democratic country. Since Powell does not recognise this it seems that he is not a good diplomat nor, therefore, a good Secretary of State. We would be surprised if the Bush administration could not find a better one.

Thu, 11/04/2004 - 02:45 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Goodbye Colin

A good move to replace him after 4 years and search the field. Colin Powell is planning on leaving it seems so however it might be phrased, he is going. Not surprising that he represented the administration's views on Taiwan. He has toed the line as a message bearer however his actions and statements might have appeared to the world. Secretary of State is a quietly private as well as public position with most lasting diplomatic efforts evolving in the private sphere and within the department and cabinet. He never was cut out for the role as the U.S. chief diplomat despite his willingness to serve.

by a reader on Thu, 11/04/2004 - 15:14 | reply

Copyright © 2007 Setting The World To Rights

George W. Bush – Secular Hero

Christopher Hitchens writes:

George Bush may subjectively be a Christian, but he—and the U.S. armed forces—have objectively done more for secularism than the whole of the American agnostic community combined and doubled.

We agree. This is one way of stating, in short, why we, as atheists, supported this deeply religious man for the Presidency.

The demolition of the Taliban, the huge damage inflicted on the al-Qaida network, and the confrontation with theocratic saboteurs in Iraq represent huge advances for the non-fundamentalist forces in many countries.

Indeed. And Hitchens uncharacteristically omits to mention that Bush and the US armed forces have done all this in the teeth of the uncompromising opposition of the Vatican and most other Christian churches, not to mention certain other faiths, in unholy alliance with most atheists – but with the support of American Christians of all denominations in whom (contrary to what most of them claim) the secular values of the West are alive and on the ascendant.

The "antiwar" faction even recognizes this achievement, if only indirectly, by complaining about the way in which it has infuriated the Islamic religious extremists around the world. But does it accept the apparent corollary—that we should have been pursuing a policy to which the fanatics had no objection?

Again, we agree. And here comes the reason:

Secularism is not just a smug attitude. It is a possible way of democratic and pluralistic life that only became thinkable after several wars and revolutions had ruthlessly smashed the hold of the clergy on the state. We are now in the middle of another such war and revolution, and the liberals have gone AWOL.

He means 'liberals' in the American sense of the word, namely leftists. One has to wonder whether the left was ever truly onside with the project of liberalism: to liberate human beings, in body and mind, from tyranny and slavery.

Tue, 11/09/2004 - 22:00 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Horse $h!t

This post reminds me of the of the joke about the boy who is exited about being put in a stable full of manure - there has to be a pony in here somewhere!

I think this administration is similar to the Johnson administration in that it is fighting a movement that is a radicalised reflection of itself. To say that this administration is advancing secularism is like saying that LBJ is was a friend of free markets.

by a reader on Wed, 11/10/2004 - 01:13 | reply

Another religion

Another religion that Bush rides roughshod over is environmentalism.

by a reader on Wed, 11/10/2004 - 02:11 | reply

Re: Horse

To say that this administration is advancing secularism is like saying that LBJ is was a friend of free markets.

Fair comment. But did Hitchens or The World claim that Bush is a friend of secularism? If not, why didn't you write: "to say that this administration is advancing secularism is like saying that LBJ is was advancing free markets when he tried to halt the spread of communism"?

by David Deutsch on Wed, 11/10/2004 - 02:36 | reply

Re: Re: Horse

Look at the historical record of LBJ's domestic policies and the actual results of his foreign policy = hardly a bulwark of capitalism.

by a reader on Wed, 11/10/2004 - 02:58 | reply

Horsefeathers

GWB now talks about freedom like he used to talk about Jesus. He believes in the power of freedom to change lives. Like LBJ and Communism, GWB has the right idea. Like LBJ, he may still fail.

By the way, was FDR a de facto Fascist because of his corporatist policies? Or was he an enemy of Fascism because he fought it world-wide? Did he do more to promote it, or to destroy it?

legenda.blogspot.com

by Nick on Wed, 11/10/2004 - 04:20 | reply

Big Improvement over Dad

I think it's clear that Hitchens and The World are right about Bush and secularism.

What I think everyone should agree with, is that George W. Bush has a much better attitude towards atheists than his father did:

See this.

On the contrary, George W. Bush has made repeated comments expressing respect for those of us who don't worship any God.

He's not perfect, but his generation is better than the last one. Hopefully the next one will be even better.

Gil

by Gil on Wed, 11/10/2004 - 17:13 | reply

RE: horsefeathers

LBJ failed because his beliefs (and many of his constituents) were really not that different from the Viet Cong. e.g.:The Viet Cong wanted "just" redistribution of wealth - so did LBJ. LBJ's fallback position was that South Vietnam should be "democratic" i.e. majority rule. So (in theory) thousands of Americans needed to die so that South Vietnam could hold elections- and then vote for communist rulers! Similarly, Bush can't announce a war against mystic, Biblically inspired dogma (Islam) because he (and many of his constituents) are adherents to a similar kind of dogma.

by a reader on Wed, 11/10/2004 - 19:29 | reply

vietnam

Are you familiar with the Domino theory? i assume you disagree with it. But it's clearly false to give a supposedly complete description of the reasons we went to war in Vietnam, while leaving it out. Even if we were wrong about that, it was still a reason we went.

And, the Domino theory doesn't seem obviously unreasonable to me. Maybe you know some important detail I don't, but it'd be better to tell me about that detail than imagine I'm actually going to agree to your description of the reasons for the war while you leave out the most famous one.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 11/10/2004 - 19:36 | reply

Evangelistic Atheism

Sermon on the mount, or a tale of the horse they rode in on.

If it gets votes and sounds good, preach it. Atheists and evangelists are suitably good in bed together for that very reason, by definition in verbiage and not in sin. For the record atheists are not like those flippy-floppy godly-godless agnostics. Atheists and evangelists both know they are right about one thing. God either exists because He does or because the idea of Him exists. Agnostics doubt the existence of God and know they might be wrong either way. Agnostics therefore are mightily confused. True leaders are believers and certainty triumphs over doubt. In that these horses are about due to sprout wings any day now, we all will have a new way to fly and horsefeathers shall aboundeth. Tie the the reins of these pipe dreams together to make a tall tale and name her Objectivity. Mount up!

It was good, and on the seventh day they rested and we babbled.

Hallelujah! I'll believe it when I see it.

by a reader on Thu, 11/11/2004 - 03:38 | reply

RE: Evangelistic Atheism

Reader, you're definitions are wrong. Atheism is the lack of theistic belief. "A" means without. "Theism" means, the belief in god or gods. Atheism is not the belief that there is no god of any kind (although people who believe this are atheists, it is merely a subset of atheism, the way believers in Norse mythology are a subset of theists.)

Atheism is not a belief system. It is the absence of belief. It covers a lot of ground. For example, infants are atheists (implicit atheists) not because they are sure that there is no god, but because they simply lack belief.

"Agnostic" was a term coined by Thomas Huxley, referring to the religious sect known as "Gnostics" as an example of men who claim knowledge of the supernatural without justification. By deciding that he was "a-gnostic", Huxley was saying that even if the supernatural does exist, it is unknowable to man. An "Agnostic" has come to be understood as someone who maintains that some aspect of the supernatural is forever closed to human knowledge.

Agnosticism is not a third alternative to theism and atheism. "Theists" and "atheists" covers everyone on the planet. Either you believe that god(s) exists or you are without that belief. Agnostics can be a subset of either of the two. Generally speaking, agnostic theists believe in god but believe that the true nature of god is unknowable. Agnostic atheists maintain that the supernatural is inherently unknowable, so the agnostic can neither affirm nor deny the existence of god. But since this person lacks actual belief in god(s), he is not a theist, and is therefore an atheist.

Agnostics are not necessarily confused or flip-floppy about any of this.

The idea that atheists, by their nature, are evangelical is false.

Although there may very well be evangelical atheists, the vast majority are not. In fact, most atheists probably don't even know that they're atheists.

by R on Thu, 11/11/2004 - 16:33 | reply

Useful Distinction

Theists, Atheists, and Agnostics are all subsets of the same, humans postulating with their different shadings of belief. Satire is useful in dealing with rampant belief systems to which ironically each of all of us subscribe to some degree. Beliefs change. Reality rules.

Your explanation of the differences is useful however. The life cycle of beliefs would seem to indicate that we are born as atheists, wonder a bit about various theisms, and then assume with some certainty that the rest of the gnostics are a bunch of babbling fools - which of course might be wrong - agnostically.

by a reader on Fri, 11/12/2004 - 01:37 | reply

"If it gets votes and sounds

"If it gets votes and sounds good, preach it. Atheists and evangelists are suitably good in bed together for that very reason, by definition in verbiage and not in sin. For the record atheists are not like those flippy-floppy godly-godless agnostics. Atheists and evangels both know they are right about one thing."

Atheists know they are right that there is no god and theists know they are right that there is a god. I'm an atheist conservative, btw.. great post!

by a reader on Fri, 07/15/2005 - 04:55 | reply

God bless George W. Bush our hero

Hi,

I am a proud supporter of George W. Bush!
because he:

- protects us - homeland security
- creates jobs
- renewal in iraq
- honoring our veterans
- rebuilding the gulf coast region
- education reform - no child left behind
- protecting our nation's enviroment

That's why I like him. We have one America and President George W. Bush is defending with all his heart and soul.

It will be sad day for the USA and the world when bush leaves office. Too bad he can't be president again. He's done more in the past 2 years than most presidents ever do.

If someone have any questions contact me!
(www.georgewbushthehero.piczo.com)

Faithfully Steven Freeling (George W. Bush the hero)

God bless America

by George W. Bush the hero on Thu, 10/04/2007 - 16:13 | reply

Copyright © 2007 Setting The World To Rights

Good Riddance

Solomon has a nice round-up of reactions to the death of Yasser Arafat, the mass murderer who won the Nobel Peace Prize for doing more harm to peace than anyone else since Hitler and Stalin.

This is a moment to remember his victims.

Thu, 11/11/2004 - 17:49 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Absolutely

I really liked David Carr's comment at Samizdata:

Reports from Paris indicate that there has been a marked improvement in the condition of Yasser Arafat.

He's dead.

Gil

by Gil on Thu, 11/11/2004 - 18:20 | reply

One major piece of filth gone

One major piece of filth gone for ever.

Very good news.

by AIS on Fri, 11/12/2004 - 10:11 | reply

An Early Test

Yasser Arafat's death makes it possible for the Palestinians to choose peace. It also makes it possible for them to re-package and continue their existing policy – misleadingly named 'the peace process' – of ensuring that the murder of Jews remains institutionalised and legitimised by the international community.

To ascertain (and also to influence) which of these options the Palestinian body politic is going to choose, it is essential that any agreement with them be conditional on early progress on certain issues, most importantly the disarming and disbanding of terrorist organisations and the introduction of a liberal-democratic system of government. All concessions to them, not only by the Israelis but by the Americans too (except possibly for purely symbolic negotiations), should follow, not precede, their compliance with these conditions.

Whether the new Bush Administration sees it that way will itself be an early test of whether they are serious about achieving peace in the Middle East, and indeed about winning the war on terror.

Sun, 11/14/2004 - 17:54 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

peace possible?

Yasser Arafat's death makes it easier for the Palestinians to choose peace. They could have chosen peace already. Is it significantly easier now? I'm not convinced.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 11/15/2004 - 03:10 | reply

Difficult condition to achieve

I might be too pessimistic but...

Taking into account the fact that it is next door to impossible for "Palestinian leaders" whoever they are now to stop violence against Israelis we have to come to terms with the fact that the violence will not stop and the preliminary condition for peace talks is just the way to stop any peace talks in general. In a similar way "right to return" is just a way of refusing to negotiate at all from the Palestinian side. So, it is pointless to ask for that on both sides. On the other hand it absolutely pointless to negotiate in such situation. Having the other side saying in arabic "we don't want peace with Israel at all, we want only better position to attack them" makes all "reasonable attempt to save lives" a waist of time. The only choice in this situation should be to either separate from Palestinians or re-occupy them. The last option has already been tried on (after 1967) and failed. Having the only possible choice of separating completely we need to forget about peace talks, preliminary conditions etc. It only contributes towards unfulfilled child dreams and provoked public opinion which always favors peace talks. Let's be realistic.

by a reader on Mon, 11/22/2004 - 11:25 | reply

Re: Difficult condition to achieve

We think that is indeed too pessimistic.

We agree with Natan Sharansky that genuine democracy is an attainable goal for all the peoples of the world.

by Editor on Tue, 11/23/2004 - 18:28 | reply

White Poppies

Read Oliver Kamm on the White Poppy ~~fascist~~ peace movement in the 1930s, 1940s, and today, here and here.

Wed, 11/17/2004 - 00:56 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Great links. When people thi

Great links. When people think "pacifist" they tend to equate that with overall peacefulness and a distaste for violence, but if you look deeper, that doesn't appear to be so. I found the George Orwell quote especially relevant.

"Pacifist propaganda usually boils down to saying that one side is as bad as the other, but if one looks closely at the writings of younger intellectual pacifists, one finds that they do not by any means express impartial disapproval but are directed almost entirely against Britain and the United States. Moreover they do not as a rule condemn violence as such, but only violence used in defense of western countries..."

As a fairly young guy, I tend to think of anti-Western sentiments coming from within our own society as a relatively new thing. Perhaps they just have a louder voice now, or maybe historians tended to view them as a minor footnote, and will ultimately treat them similarly after this particular period of war is done. Either way, it's good to be reminded that a misguided dove can be just as dangerous as a misguided hawk.

by R on Thu, 11/18/2004 - 00:42 | reply

John Kerry, Cambodia, And Iraq

John Kerry claimed that he was in Cambodia during the Vietnam war. If he was, he failed to appreciate features of the Cambodia campaign that are analogous to the role of Iraq in the War on Terror. Why did Nixon order troops into Cambodia? First, he wanted to prop up an anti-Communist leader Lon Nol who was under attack from Pol Pot's Communist forces. Second, he wanted to cut off North Vietnamese supply lines in Cambodia. This was a single offensive in a much larger campaign. If Kerry had understood the strategic situation, he might not have objected to the incursion into Cambodia then, and he might be President now.

Pol Pot wasn't an immediate threat to American forces, let alone the American people. However, he was an ally of the Communists of North Vietnam, whom he allowed to operate in regions that he controlled. As a result, the North Vietnamese Army had supply bases in Cambodia. Also, as a Communist, Pol Pot was dedicated to the destruction of freedom and so would harm the United States if he were given the chance, just as the North Vietnamese Communists would.

Was Saddam the biggest threat to the civilised world? In the immediate sense, no. However, like Pol Pot, Saddam supported enemies of freedom, such as Palestinian suicide bombers. Like Pol Pot, he was utterly hostile, ideologically, to the United States and was bound to act upon this enmity sooner or later because the very existence of the United States and its allies would be a standing rebuke to his evil regime. Saddam had to go: the only question was when and how.

The main reason to choose to liberate Iraq by force in 2003 was tactical: Saddam was the most convenient target who couldn't be disposed of by other means.

Any war consists of many small campaigns that don't achieve much on their own but add up to something larger. This is the business of war, the day-to-day substance behind the glamour of declaring victory over the forces of evil. Iraq's liberation is already a great achievement but it is only the start of something much larger. One day, all of the citizens of the Middle East will be free and America will only be safe when they are. This is at the heart of the Bush Doctrine. Kerry showed no sign of understanding it. The majority of Americans did.

Fri, 11/19/2004 - 04:51 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Flaws and Strengths

As an editorial opinion there is no argument with the central point of the above. However it is an opinion obscured by some nebulous reverse geopolitical crystal ball gazing as well as a train of thought which seems to be a rather frayed string of mostly unconnected threads. What does John Kerry have to do with any of it? Nixon and Pol Pot? Who knows that a majority of Americans understand the Bush Doctrine? It is likely a jolly good waste of time to try to answer such questions. Anyway, these loose asides make the editorial statements seem like an exercise in flamboyant name dropping. We need not answer such distant questions in order to draw a sound conclusion.

If the writer were a journalist he or she might be justly accused of sloppy journalism or ill-defined sweeping editorialism. The writer is not beholden to this standard. Therefore it can be conjectured all over the blogosphere as to the meanings and connections without risk of anyone being sent to the back copy room. Yet, redeemingly, despite the sweeping banter and conjectural historic asides, the core argument is beyond reproach. It can be stated in a dozen words.

Freedom in the Middle East is better and safer for us all.

by a reader on Sat, 11/20/2004 - 01:06 | reply

Flaws?

Some bloke wrote:

'What does John Kerry have to do with any of it?'

John Kerry supposedly went into Cambodia then bitched about it being illegal. Also he was a Presidential candidate for the Dems, which kinda makes him important, after a fashion.

'Nixon and Pol Pot?'

Nixon: American President fighting a war. Pol Pot: rather beastly tyrant. Note the similarity to the current situation. Note also that John Kerry understood neither situation.

by Alan Forrester on Sat, 11/20/2004 - 01:38 | reply

An offer to Alan Forrester, Elliot Temple, David Deutsch, Gil, Sarah, et al. I will donate $200 for the airline ticket so any one of you can fly to Iraq and pursue your passion for liberating the Middle East.

by a reader on Sat, 11/20/2004 - 03:59 | reply

A Counter-Offer

A counter-offer: for a mere $100 we'll explain the fallacies in the chickenhawk argument to you.

by Editor on Sat, 11/20/2004 - 04:24 | reply

i'm famous

you just made my 15 minutes (i was doing fun stuff b4...). i know it was meant as a criticism, but, well, unintended consequences ;-P

Anyway, I'm scared of getting sand in my laptop.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Sat, 11/20/2004 - 05:26 | reply

If you believe in your cause why are you not willing to fight and possibly die for it?

by a reader on Sat, 11/20/2004 - 15:14 | reply

Re: if you believe in your cause

"Why are you not willing" in the question above is an equivocation on the word "willing".

One meaning of "willing to do X" is that one will do X if not physically prevented. (Or financially prevented, or legally prevented, or prevented in some way considered to be force majeure.)

Another meaning is that one will do X if necessary -- and again, there is a range of meanings of 'necessary', such as 'if you are the most skilled at doing X', or 'if no one else is able (see above) to do X', and so on.

By equivocating between these two meanings, one can construct, at will, a specious argument for any proposition whatever. For instance, an arsonist (or apologist for arsonists) could accuse soldiers serving in Iraq of not really believing in the cause of firefighting in their own home towns.

by David Deutsch on Sat, 11/20/2004 - 16:14 | reply

I believe in other things too

I'm busy.

Also I believe in specialisation and division of labor. I like computers, but no one asks me to build them.

I'm not avoiding going to Iraq out of fear of death. I don't think I should go.

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Sat, 11/20/2004 - 16:15 | reply

To David and Elliot:

When should it be your turn? Should you go to war ahead of those who do not believe in your cause (such as draftees)? Should you go to war ahead of those who believed they were going to war for some other reason (such as a threat from WMDs)?

by a reader on Sat, 11/20/2004 - 18:12 | reply

turns?

I don't take turns doing the computer building. Nor the firefighting.

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Sat, 11/20/2004 - 18:38 | reply

It's odd that reader expects

It's odd that reader expects The World to go to Iraq and fight for a flat sum of $200, what I assume is far less than soldiers are getting. Will $200 even cover the airfare? Anyway I think reader should just take up The World's generous offer of $100 to explain the fallacy. Reader would save $100 and end up sounding less moronic for his trouble.

Reader, I sure hope your home never catches fire. Because unless you are or have been a firefighter, evidently by your stout principles you have no right to call the fire department and expect them to do anything.

That said, I'm not sure what Kerry/Cambodia has to do with any of this either. AFAIK it's simply not true that Kerry was in Cambodia in the first place. What the two military campaigns seem to really have in common, vis-a-vis Kerry, is that in both cases he made stuff up (I was in Cambodia, Bush misled...) so that he could accuse the US government of duplicity in their carrying out.

They are different in an important way, however, which is that the Cambodia campaign was "secret" and non authorized (AFAIK) - making that criticism at least partially valid - whereas the Iraq invasion was authorized by act of Congress, and Kerry voted in favor, making his criticism of that utterly hypocritical and irresponsible.

by Blixa on Sat, 11/20/2004 - 19:23 | reply

Re: turns?

Elliot, I take your response to mean: Never. If the 140,000+ troops in Iraq were all killed or disabled, you still would be under no obligation to take up arms for your cause. Some of the troops there are less skilled (and certainly less motivated) than you would be.

by a reader on Sat, 11/20/2004 - 20:16 | reply

$200

Blixa the $200 is for part of the air fare I'm sure you could find a well paying job with Haliburton or some other contractor once you are there... and you will be supporting your cause!

by a reader on Sat, 11/20/2004 - 20:20 | reply

the fire station fallacy

Guess who argued in real life that since GW Bush is spending money to build fire stations in Iraq, he can't be serious about fighting fires at home?

<http://www.cfr.org/publication.php?id=6532.xml>

Hint: this person also said, in the same speech: "I know something about aircraft carriers for real. And if George Bush wants to make this election about national security, I have three words for him he'll understand: Bring. It. On."

by a reader on Sat, 11/20/2004 - 20:27 | reply

Tastes like chicken

'Blixa the $200 is for part of the air fare I'm sure you could find a well paying job with Haliburton or some other contractor once you are there... and you will be supporting your cause!'

You're sure? Really? Cause I'm not. Haliburton is an oil company and I don't know much about oil or geology and so I wouldn't be of much use to them.

I also don't currently know how to shoot and I can't really learn in Britain due to the government being a bunch of pansies who wouldn't even let Derren Brown play Russian Roulette :-P. So somebody would have to pay for firearm training in another country where the government isn't a bunch of pantywaists too.

Then there's the fact that if everyone who fought the war went off to fight it there'd be no one left back home to argue in favour of it and get funding and so on. There are also other things I'd like to argue for too, like going back to the good old days when you could shoot a burglar stone dead and a police officer would pat you on the back instead of clapping on a pair of handcuffs.

Also, the whole death thing sounds a bit boring. What? Am I just supposed to lie around all day? Without anything to read or a decent selection of TV programmes?

by Alan Forrester on Sat, 11/20/2004 - 21:45 | reply

So Alan,

you are too busy making arguments for the war to actually participate in it?

by a reader on Sun, 11/21/2004 - 01:54 | reply

So, "a reader",

Why aren't you in Iraq fighting for your side?

by another reader on Sun, 11/21/2004 - 02:47 | reply

I really doubt that the US ar

I really doubt that the US army would be interested in having David or Elliot on their side. Don't mean to be rude, chaps, but they don't take just anybody, you know!

by a reader on Sun, 11/21/2004 - 05:12 | reply

Stupid-Fallacy-Spouting Reade

Stupid-Fallacy-Spouting Reader persists:

Blixa the $200 is for part of the air fare

That's swell. So you're generously offering to pay only part of the air fare. Meanwhile if Elliot or whoever would just enlist, he'd get there free, plus a salary. Now, given that (I think) he hasn't done that, you can expect your - less lucrative - offer to hold no appeal. Why bother making it then?

What is your point? Do you have one? Ok I actually know the answer to that, but what is it that you think your point is?

Still waiting to hear about what you will do in the event of a fire. Or burglary, robbery, assault, accident, garbage pickup, or... well, frankly, any service the government provides which involves workers performing tasks that you yourself do not do. You must be a jack of all trades!

by Blixa on Sun, 11/21/2004 - 06:16 | reply

Re: Why aren't you in Iraq fighting for your side?

Because the insurgents are not on "my" side. I know this wouldn't make sense to someone with an "either you are with us or against us" mentality.

by a reader on Sun, 11/21/2004 - 14:31 | reply

$200

Blixa the point is this: Should those that advocate war bear any additional burden in that war vs those who oppose it or remained silent? I am not contesting the concept of social division of labor.

P.S. I'm sorry if I offended you by not mentioning you by name in my initial offer.

by a reader on Sun, 11/21/2004 - 14:43 | reply

Re: Why aren't you in Iraq fighting for your side?

Oh, I know there are billions of people who are not on either side. You aren't one of them; you have clearly picked a side. You're engaging in argument for your side exacty* as the World is for theirs. (You are, I'm sure, perfectly aware of how important this activity is, since it was vital for your side in taking Vietnam.) You're a propagandist, not a soldier, and that's why you're not actually in Iraq fighting any more than the World's writers are.

* OK, not exactly. Not nearly as well, for one thing.

by another reader on Sun, 11/21/2004 - 16:27 | reply

Strategy and Tactics

"What happens now is that we (by which I mean the West) eradicate state-sponsored terrorism. And we can achieve that only by replacing all political systems that perpetrate or collaborate with terrorism, by systems that respect human rights both domestically and internationally." – David Deutsch.

"The main reason to choose to liberate Iraq by force in 2003 was tactical . . ." – The World.

Let's assume (which I do) that David's strategic assumption is true. Assume, as well, another time, not so differentiated from ours, where in light of the world situation taken as a whole, certain tactical choices have been made differently.

Afghanistan, the launching pad for 9/11, a nerve center of state-sponsored terrorism, and a historically strategic asset, bordering Turkmenistan, Uzbekistan, Tajikistan, Pakistan and Iran, is attacked and liberated. Large numbers of troops, money and human resources are poured into the near far-East. The first democratic country in the region is assured and secure military bases are established that directly threaten Iran – the chief, long-term threat to Israel. Russia and China (long interested in the region) take note and there is increased pressure on them to help achieve the West's strategic objectives in connection with Iran and North Korea. Our historical allies are pressured (perhaps with some success, perhaps not) to assist us to increase military, political and economic pressure on Iraq – but we proceed in any event, and our relations with our allies are no better or worse than in our time. Yassar Arafat dies . . .

In this world, albeit presented in a very simple and truncated manner, policy makers have decided that Saddam wasn't "the most convenient target who couldn't be disposed of by other means." They chose different tactics to achieve strategic goals. Arguably, these tactics involved a broader, longer-term play, with perhaps a greater chance of, among other things, (i) forestalling future 9/11's, (ii) increasing pressure on Iran and North Korea, (iii) confronting Iraq without creating the chaos and risks that we see currently, (iv) transforming the Middle East, and (v) maintaining our strategic alliances. Or, perhaps not!

We know that this history and the future(s) that flow from it has occurred. We don't know how many worlds bear a closer resemblance to this history or to the one in which we find ourselves today – perhaps fewer. In any event, we find ourselves in this world, and we know that choosing to cut and run in Iraq, does not seem to point to any favorable strategic outcome.

My main point, however, is simply this: these questions are complicated, the variables numerous and there is a real difference between strategy and tactics. Contributors to The World would be well advised not to dismiss each others views by confusing the two.

by Mike Bacon on Sun, 11/21/2004 - 17:28 | reply

Should those that advocate wa

Should those that advocate war bear any additional burden in that war vs those who oppose it or remained silent?

If you advocate a social program which I do not, and it passes, should you be required pay extra for it?

If you advocate a regulation which I do not (such as carpool lanes), and it passes, do I get to disobey it more than you do?

If you advocate protectionism and I do not, and it passes, do I still get to conduct free trade?

If you vote for a bond measure which I do not....

If you vote for a candidate which I do not....

If you supported the US's actions in Yugoslavia - which I did not - did you pay extra for its funding? did you sign up to fly on an air force bomber plane?

Um. So it looks as if the answer is no. In fact I reckon the principle you are (pretending to be) sincerely suggesting, as conceived, has never actually been implemented in the history of human government.

I am not contesting the concept of social division of labor.

Actually you are. You are arguing that at least some people should become soldiers solely on the basis of their political opinions rather than on whatever factors currently attract people to and make them good at soldiering. In essence, if Stephen Hawking had favored the war you'd be here saying "then go and become a soldier".

This is clearly, if not a rejection of division of labor altogether, a sub-optimal application of it. We have an all-volunteer army and a democratic republic. Most people understand these processes and institutions quite well enough without needing these explanations.

by Blixa on Sun, 11/21/2004 - 18:18 | reply

Re: Should those that advocate wa...

Blixa, I have never advocated or voted for any of those things you mentioned. And I was not asking if the principle has actually been implemented in the history of human government. I was posing the question to David and Elliot as a moral issue (since they are presumably interested in such issues).

Re: social division of labor: to be sure, Stephen Hawking would not make a good soldier, but motivation is a very significant factor in the performance of an army, if not, most wars could be won with mercenary armies.

by a reader on Sun, 11/21/2004 - 23:51 | reply

Re:Re: Why aren't you in Iraq fighting for your side?

Wow! You nailed me exactly! Yes, I am part of a vast Islamo-communist-KKK-Freemason conspiracy! I am also opposed to motherhood and apple pie!

by a reader on Sun, 11/21/2004 - 23:58 | reply

And I was not asking if the p

And I was not asking if the principle has actually been implemented in the history of human government. I was posing the question to David and Elliot as a moral issue Ok well then you have my answer. They'll have to speak for themselves although I doubt theirs are all that substantially different.

motivation is a very significant factor in the performance of an army

Indeed. One of the strongest arguments for an all-volunteer army rather than an army constituted by some other rule, like universal involuntary conscription, or for that matter a partial conscription based on "if you're in favor of the war taking place you must join the army".....

Best,

by Blixa on Mon, 11/22/2004 - 00:34 | reply

moral issues

I am interested in this moral issue. in fact, i thought about it before you brought it up here. and, in fact, nothing you've said here is a new argument to me.

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 11/22/2004 - 00:45 | reply

partial conscription??

I don't know exactly what that is, but which is more involuntary: "if you're in favor of the war taking place you must join the army" or "even though your joined the National Guard mainly to keep order in case of natural disasters you must now go to war in another country for a cause you don't understand and the rational for which keeps changing"

by a reader on Mon, 11/22/2004 - 01:36 | reply

Re:moral issues

So what is your answer?

by a reader on Mon, 11/22/2004 - 01:38 | reply

"even though your joined the

"even though your joined the National Guard mainly to keep order in case of natural disasters"

Nobody should join the National Guard thinking that this is all that will or could ever be required of them. You may as well ask me to take into consideration that there are people who join the Army thinking they'll spend most of their time playing ping pong because of Forrest Gump. There may (for all I know) be people who think this way, but if so, their misapprehensions about what they are getting into are not my fault.

by Blixa on Mon, 11/22/2004 - 01:43 | reply

my answer

I am still in the US, with no plans to leave.

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 11/22/2004 - 02:45 | reply

Moral Issue?

Sorry, I'm arriving late to this. I just wanted to add how perplexing this complete non-sequitur "moral issue" is to me.

What I should do with my life depends on a great many factors including my values, skills, obligations, plans, etc. I advocate a great many things. I couldn't possibly personally commit all of my time to each of them, and my lack of personal participation in implementing them is no argument at all that I'm not seriously committed to them, nor that I have insufficient regard for the contributions of others.

I think that the firefighter analogy is a good one. Did the reader who poses this issue agree that his lack of personal involvement in firefighting exposes his hypocrisy about advocating professional firefighting?

Those who volunteered to fight in the US military had (or should have had) no expectation that he would be able to pick and choose the battles he would be asked to fight. There was an expectation that he would be asked to fight battles that were within the historical range of causes to which the military has been committed. I don't think that the Iraqi engagement falls outside of this range, so I'm not sure if there's anything at all to any aspect of this "moral issue".

Gil

by Gil on Mon, 11/22/2004 - 17:46 | reply

Re: Moral Issue?

Gil, I'm not sure you understand the issue I was bringing up.

It is clear that David and Elliot feel they have other priorities based on their response to my initial offer. I was then asking if they would ever feel any obligation to fight in the war they advocated. To give an extreme example, what if the only people left to fight the war were David, Elliot, and pregnant women & children. Would they then feel obligated to fight? Where on their hierarchy of priorities would such an obligation lie?

As a side note, it has not been that uncommon for intellectuals to participate in the wars they believed in, Ernest Hemingway and Jean Paul Satre come to mind.

by a reader on Tue, 11/23/2004 - 00:51 | reply

Moral Issue?

I'm still not clear. Is this really a serious question?

I'm sure that there is a point where David, Elliot, and I would decide that the best thing for us to do would be to fight for a good cause (perhaps not the same point, but each of us has one).

What "point" are you trying to make? Are you implying that we are bad at choosing for ourselves the proper points where we should fight?

Do you think we don't think any cause is worth risking our own lives for?

We risk our lives every day! It really seems to be a silly line of inquiry.

Please come out and be explicit about what you're trying to argue.

Do you think we under-value the risks that soldiers take when they fight a war that we support? Why would you think so? Surely not because we are not fighting it ourselves, because that's an absurdly invalid inference.

So, what do you think?

Gil

by Gil on Tue, 11/23/2004 - 01:37 | reply

It's odd indeed. Given that It's odd indeed. Given that presumably everyone in question lives in countries which have provisions for conscripting people if need be, Reader can already surmise that an upper bound for the "point" at which Elliot, David etc. would fight is: "If drafted." Unless of course one of them would, if drafted, dodge that draft.

In other words, Reader appears to be asking folks if they would dodge a hypothetical draft. Well.. everyone will have to answer for themselves. In case you're interested, Reader, here's my answer: No. Now that you have your answer, what interesting things have we learned from this exercise? Anything?

by Blixa on Tue, 11/23/2004 - 01:45 | reply

Re: Moral Issue?

"Are you implying that we are bad at choosing for ourselves the proper points where we should fight?" No, I am asking what you think that "proper point" should be. If you want to answer a specific question answer this: Do you think you, as an advocate of the war, should go to war before my children? Would you volunteer before they were conscripted?

by a reader on Tue, 11/23/2004 - 02:31 | reply

Conscription

The World is vigorously opposed to conscription, whether in the UK or the US, under all foreseeable circumstances.

by Editor on Tue, 11/23/2004 - 03:22 | reply

Volunteering Before Conscription

If your children don't want to fight in the war, then they shouldn't.

Everyone who wants to, and can be helpful, should do so before anyone else is conscripted.

I don't know when they would be conscripted in this alternate universe you're imagining, so I can't really answer directly about whether I would volunteer first. My decision would be based on many things, perhaps including delaying an impending draft, but that wouldn't and shouldn't be decisive.

But, I do think that the war should be fought entirely by volunteers; so I think your children should never be conscripted.

And, I would volunteer to fight before never.

Does that answer your question?

Gil

by Gil on Tue, 11/23/2004 - 08:00 | reply

Do you think you, as an advoc

Do you think you, as an advocate of the war, should go to war before my children?

Sheesh. How old are your children? If they are children I don't want them sent to war in any event. If they aren't children, and don't volunteer, this would mean that we can presume that they and The World and Elliot and I are all in the same boat: won't be going unless conscripted (and in The World's case perhaps not even then?).

In that case whether or not your children go first or someone else goes first would depend on a number of factors: age, able-bodiedness, etc. If your children are between say 18-22, and could pass a physical, then because I am older than that, they would likely go before me, were there a draft, which there's not, nor is there going to be.

Does that answer your question?

BTW I too oppose a draft, except in rather armageddon-like or perhaps Red Dawn type emergency situations which are rather difficult even to envision. So the real answer is that if your children don't want to fight in a war then neither do I want them to. K?

by Blixa on Tue, 11/23/2004 - 15:37 | reply

Re: Moral Issue?

"what if the only people left to fight the war were David, Elliot, and pregnant women & children."

Send the pregnant children.

Seriously, do you think the only way to contribute to a war is to carry a gun?* Back when the USofA actually had conscription and rationing and all, should these guys have been handed M14s and shipped off to the south Pacific? Would that have helped win the war?

* Rhetorical question.

 Also a rhetorical question. Answer: No. But winning the war is not a reader's goal, is it?

 Not necessarily a rhetorical question.

by another reader on Tue, 11/23/2004 - 15:39 | reply

Do We Need a Draft?

Here's part of a piece I ran across by Dennis Rodgers, who writes at newsobserver.com. He was a former Army NCO who voluntarily enlisted in 1962 and re-upped for six years in 1964. I'm currently unclear regarding my own view on the question; but by way of full disclosure, I fervently opposed the draft in the early 70's, when I was eligible and in the midst of a very unpopular war.

In any event, I thought it would be useful to quote some reasons why a reasonable person could, in the current circumstances, consider supporting a draft. I think this piece at least raises certain questions that should be addressed -- not that more general philosophical opposition alone is without merit -- by those who strongly oppose a draft and wish to convince others of the merits of their view.

I believe that some of his points can be answered pretty easily (some have already been addressed in prior posts), but others need more serious consideration. Anyway, here it goes:

"We need the warm bodies. There are simply not enough active-duty soldiers or reservists to do the job today.

It would be cheaper. Draftees would get a hefty pay raise only if they re-enlisted.

It would keep the reserves strong. The minimum service should be two years active and two years of reserve meetings.

A military hitch would bond those who served with a shared cultural experience that doesn't exist in America today except for TV and franchise stores.

It would improve the nation's health. At least for two years, people would be forced to eat right and stay in shape.

It would bridge the wide social gap between races, ethnic cultures and economic classes. Taking showers together breaks down all sorts of barriers.

No politician should send Americans to war unless that person has served in uniform and appreciates the sacrifice they're asking of others.

It would end disputes over the physical and mental equality of races and genders.

Society would be better off if more young people received a dose of discipline from a tough-as-nails drill sergeant at 5 a.m.

It's high time children of the rich and powerful did their share of the fighting and dying for this country. They get the biggest rewards from living here, so it only seems fair they shoulder more of the burden."

by Mike Bacon on Tue, 11/23/2004 - 16:11 | reply

Re: Do We Need A Draft?

Um...

Which points do you think need serious consideration?

Gil

by Gil on Tue, 11/23/2004 - 16:29 | reply

Re: Do We Need A Draft?

Surely one could only consider the draft cheaper if one makes the mistake of ignoring the forgone productivity of the drafted people in their preferred occupations, the poor performance of people working under threat rather than incentive, and the costs of enforcing the draft. Slavery is highly inefficient economically.

And that is to say nothing of the effect of conscription on war fighting. If you were to conceal from generals, say, the cost of a certain munition, then they would tend to over-use it, thus reducing the overall capacity of the economy to supply war materials. This is just as true if you provide them with 'free' recruits as if you provide them with 'free' aircraft carriers. And 'over-using' troops in this sense probably means causing excessive casualties as well as fighting less effectively.

by David Deutsch on Tue, 11/23/2004 - 17:25 | reply

Kids today... They could u

Kids today...

They could use a nice healthy dose of slavery.

As for bridging the races... The Vietnam draft sure did wonders in that department. If we could only return to the racial harmony of those days...

by R on Tue, 11/23/2004 - 17:54 | reply

weird

Reading over this exchange again, I just want to note how odd Reader's question turned out to be, when pressed. Essentially it boiled down to: Would e.g. David Deutsch and Elliot Temple agree to fight in a war if only they and pregnant women & children, remained among non-combatants on our side?

I dare say that if we ever got to that point our resp. nations would be in a heap of trouble and it really wouldn't matter who did or did not agree to fight. :-) But Reader was intensely curious nonetheless! "What if that happens!! I must know!!"

by Blixa on Tue, 11/23/2004 - 18:51 | reply

Parents Today

Parents could use a nice healthy dosage of slavery. To prevent them from enslaving their children, I guess. Or maybe just for fun.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 11/23/2004 - 19:46 | reply

Re: Do We Need A Draft?

Thanks to David for seriously addressing some of the points I quoted in my post.

David's economic analysis is surely right. Correctly pricing things is notoriously difficult and one would be hard-pressed to support the claim that a draft is ultimately cheaper and more cost-efficient than a voluntary army.

In a similar vein, it has been argued that the incorrect pricing of oil (ignoring necessary environmental remediation caused by production and use) and water (almost universal governmental subsidization) has led to gross over-consumption and has otherwise distorted rational decision making.

David's final thought, that ". . . 'over-using' troops in this sense probably means causing excessive casualties as well as fighting less effectively," also seems right, but raises for me a further question. Assuming the assertion is true – which seems highly likely – how should we measure its applicability and helpfulness in solving actual war fighting problems that we may face?

The assertion is consistent with good economic analysis, and with a broad, coherent philosophical theory that to a significant approximation seems to reflect the way the world works – in this sense it is true and should almost always be. However, while correct in principle in each of these ways, and undoubtedly correct in fact in a variety of times and situations, there also must be times and situations when, for example, the use of overwhelming force made up largely of conscripts has led to the best result possible in the circumstances – less casualties than would otherwise have occurred, victory by the forces of progress, and effective fighting in the sense of actually winning a war that might otherwise have been lost.

It may never be that the most desirable option is to institute a draft. It may be that, even in very dire circumstances, it should still be opposed on moral, economic and philosophical grounds. But from time to time, when confronted by a terrible and ruthless enemy, limited by other military commitments, and faced with domestic and international political and economic problems, there may simply be no other rational choice.

Maybe WWII was close to this type of situation. While it was a great patriotic war drawing huge numbers of men to fight for a clearly defined objective against a truly evil enemy, the need for soldiers, sailors, airmen and marines was so great that most objective observers agree that the military could not have been adequately manned to fight on two fronts without conscription. The lack of a draft could have led to greater casualties and ultimate defeat. Of course, we do not seem to be in such a situation today. Nevertheless, the theoretical question remains.

Regarding R's comment that "[a]s for bridging the races... The Vietnam draft sure did wonders in that department. If we could only return to the racial harmony of those days..." he's certainly right that the relationship between the races was not very good in the 60's. Most people agree, however, that it was much worse in the 30's and even worse farther back as you approach real, direct and unambiguous slavery in the United States. Most historians also believe, with pretty good evidence, that the WWII armed services, into which large numbers of racially, ethnically, religiously and economically diverse men were conscripted, had more than a little to do with the rapid racial progress that was made in the United States during and after the war, because although forced, it helped break down irrational stereotypes and prejudices through mutual efforts and bravery.

The extent to which the Vietnam era draft helped or hindered racial progress is an open question – much else, including the civil rights movement, was taking place during the same time.

Another question also remains open: if institutions like the draft favorably affect human progress, even if only at the margins, should this ever be taken into account when trying to decide whether a draft, however distasteful, is needed in a particular set of difficult circumstances? Of course, this question is only relevant to the extent that one would ever, in any circumstances, consider a draft.

by Mike Bacon on Tue, 11/23/2004 - 23:02 | reply

Re: draft

We need the warm bodies. There are simply not enough active-duty soldiers or reservists to do the job today.

Doesn't this depend on what "the job" is? This is like saying "there aren't enough tax dollars to fund all government programs"... no, not if you do too many government programs... As of now from everything I've heard the army has met their recruiting goals. But of course we could not invade and occupy all of China. I suppose "the job" is somewhere in between but it needs to be specified. In context I guess the author is talking about Iraq, but there is no sign that the administration has any desire to double the # of troops in Iraq, even if you or I may think that's required...

A military hitch would bond those who served with a shared cultural experience that doesn't exist in America today except for TV and franchise stores.

So would forced-labor camps...

It would bridge the wide social gap between races, ethnic cultures and economic classes. Taking showers together breaks down all sorts of barriers.

Can't we just have the communal showers w/o the draft then? ;-)

No politician should send Americans to war unless that person has served in uniform and appreciates the sacrifice they're asking of others.

I object the most to this one. Civilian control has been tossed out the window, apparently? Also, "can't appreciate the sacrifice unless he served" is just a dumb fallacy. I do not want to see it propagated and indulged any more than it already is.

It would end disputes over the physical and mental equality of races and genders.

Yes, in many cases presumably it would end those disputes in the negative: such equality does not hold. Now, expanding our knowledge of humans is always nice, but listing this as a significant benefit of instituting a draft is a bit strange. Or am I misreading?

It's high time children of the rich and powerful did their share of the fighting and dying for this country.

This sounds nice, or at least "fair", as a rhetorically stated principle but as a practical matter it's a non-starter. Who would be implementing this draft? The "powerful", by definition.... Recall that we had a draft, during Vietnam, and there were plenty of complaints about the "children of the rich and powerful" getting shielded from it. I'm quite sure the same was true of all preceding drafts as well. It will be different this time around, because...? because we'll just do it right this time, because...? because we say so?

The most perplexing thing about most pro-draft arguments I've seen is that the desire to implement a draft seems to run several laps ahead of any actual conceivable need for one in the immediate future. Is this author arguing that we need a draft because the military is too small, or is he arguing that the military is too small because he wants there to be a draft? Not clear. I hasten to add that Congress could expand the size of the military at virtually any time if it wanted to. Failing any sign of an effort on their part to do so, why people indulge in these draft arguments in the first place is beyond me.

Prior to the election I had assumed it was all electoral posturing on the part of the Democratic party - scaring people into voting for them by raising the spectre of a draft as a serious possibility - but now I'm not so sure....

by Blix on Wed, 11/24/2004 - 00:31 | reply

Mike, you're right. I don

Mike, you're right. I don't know whether the Vietnam draft helped, hindered or was inconsequential to race relations. It just seemed like an odd argument in favor of it. It reminds me of a joke I heard in the eighties about the positive aspect of rampant cocaine use in this country: It teaches our kids the metric system.

I oppose the draft on some practical grounds (like the example David gave) but mostly moral ones. To talk about the great bonding experience and exercise benefits that slavery brings seems to detract from any reasonable argument one could make in favor of a draft.

I like to think that WWII could have been won without a draft, but as you pointed out, we'll never know for sure what the differences would have been.

Many argue that Israel could not exist if not for their constant draft. One could also argue, that if a nation cannot exist without conscription, then it should perish. At any rate, it makes for an interesting discussion

by R on Wed, 11/24/2004 - 01:56 | reply

Re: Do We Need A Draft?

Mike Bacon wrote:

Maybe WWII was close to this type of situation. While it was a great patriotic war drawing huge numbers of men to fight for a clearly defined objective against a truly evil enemy, the need for soldiers, sailors, airmen and marines was so great that most objective observers agree that the military could not have been adequately manned to fight on two fronts without conscription. The lack of a draft could have led to greater casualties and ultimate defeat.

It seems to me that there is a paradox here. In a situation where a significant fraction of the population is needed to fight a war, one needs overwhelming political support for the draft to be viable. In other words, one needs the overwhelming majority of the population to agree with an analysis such as the above. But if everyone agrees that a large army is needed to avoid defeat (and that defeat is bad enough to be worth fighting to prevent), then why don't they just form one? Are they just going to sit around and wait for doom? Why would they do that?

Because they can't solve the free rider problem? Pschaw. First of all, I don't think that exists at all. Second, there are cases in history where large armies have in fact been formed without any draft.

In reply to R: well, yes, but the cases where a draft has broad support and where it does not, are utterly different. In the former case, as I just said, a draft isn't really needed, but whether it is enacted or not says little about whether the society 'deserves' to survive. In the latter case, it won't work, and that's when the society is doomed.

by David Deutsch on Wed, 11/24/2004 - 03:40 | reply

Re: Draft

I agree that a draft could not be sustained over a significant period of time other than in a situation where it had overwhelming (but not necessarily universal) support among the population. Is this a true paradox? Might not a draft still be ultimately necessary for victory in some circumstances? Perhaps the leaders and populations of the US during WWII and Israel today, were and are wrong in believing in the need for a draft. This is certainly a possibility. In any event, whether or not correct in supporting a draft, I would agree that their willingness to do so in the face of a real threat to survival, at the very least demonstrates an attitude of determination and sacrifice that enhances their ultimate chances for survival.

by Mike Bacon on Wed, 11/24/2004 - 05:56 | reply

Re: Draft

I disagree that societies who institute drafts should be praised for their determination. They should be criticized for their lack of respect for individual autonomy, and lack of confidence that their people will respond to real needs when they occur.

Yes, there are lifeboat scenarios when it can be right to violate other people's normal rights. But those are exceptional cases and can be handled that way. Normally, there is enough time and enough reasonableness that people agree to do what's necessary and right.

Institutionalizing the emergency case will cause more harm than good. Violating more and more rights will be seen as normal.

That slippery slope is best avoided.

Gil

by Gil on Wed, 11/24/2004 - 18:01 | reply

Re: Draft

Gil,

I wasn't as clear as I should have been. Did I say that a people (e.g. the Israelis today, or Americans during WWII) should be praised for their "determination" to institute a draft? Regardless of their perception of the circumstances in which they find themselves, it may well be that they should still be criticized for seriously misunderstanding the true situation, as well as for, as you say, their lack of respect for individual autonomy and their lack of confidence that their people will respond. What I meant to say was that, even if they are wrong in instituting a draft, their willingness to go to such lengths to defend themselves at the very least reflects an attitude of determination and sacrifice (even if misplaced in connection with their draft decision) that gives them a real fighting chance to win on the battlefield. Perhaps you view this as a distinction without a difference. Nevertheless, it's what I meant.

by Mike Bacon on Wed, 11/24/2004 - 18:54 | reply

Praise

Mike,

I read: "Their willingness to do so in the face of a real threat to survival, at the very least demonstrates an attitude of determination and sacrifice that enhances their ultimate chances for survival." as praise.

If one were to write "Castro's communist revolution demonstrated his determination to improve the lot of poor Cubans." Without adding "but it turned out to be a humanitarian disaster that revealed just how much his lust for power exceeded his concern for human liberty and welfare." I would assume that the first quote alone was a form of praise. Even with a qualification, I'd think the author was trying to say something like "Well, he may have been mistaken about the best policies; but his heart was in the right place."

Isn't "an attitude of determination and sacrifice" usually interpreted as virtuous and praiseworthy?

I think we should be clear that trampling on other people's liberty, and using their lives as means to your ends, is serious business; and good intentions of the tyrants should not soften our attitude about how wrong it is.

Gil

by Gil on Wed, 11/24/2004 - 20:21 | reply

Gil, I don't think your an

Gil,

I don't think your analogy to Castro is apt, and in fact, its use points out what I see as a basic flaw in your argument. To paraphrase David Deutsch from his answer to the Edge Question

"What Now?", (David, I apologize if I'm misinterpreting or misapplying your reasoning), I don't think that Castro is motivated by a state of mind similar to that which is motivating Israel or that motivated the US during WWII. The US and Israeli actions — and even the mistakes, like supporting a draft, are driven fundamentally by respect for human beings, human choices and human life. These values are life-affirming and life-seeking. The values that drive Castro are antithetical to this. There is no symmetry between between the two positions. I continue to believe that the determination and sacrifice shown by the Israelis and the Americans, despite their mistakes, is praiseworthy, and in that sense, their hearts are in the right place.

Mike

by Mike Bacon on Wed, 11/24/2004 - 20:57 | reply

Analogies

Mike,

I agree about Israel and the US. I wasn't implying that they have/had attitudes similar to Castro. I was just using the Castro line as an example of wrongly implying praise.

Gil

by Gil on Thu, 11/25/2004 - 01:41 | reply

Mike, I don't think you've

Mike, I don't think you've pointed out a flaw in Gil's argument. I don't think the assumption that: the Americans in WWII and the Israelis were (are) well intentioned, and that Castro is not (an assumption that I happen to agree with by the way), has anything to do with the fact that Gil took your earlier statement as praise. In fact you seem to be saying that he was right to interpret your statement that way. You wrote:

"I continue to believe that the determination and sacrifice shown by the Israelis and the Americans, despite their mistakes, is praiseworthy, and in that sense, their hearts are in the right place."

Perhaps I'm misinterpreting your point about Gil's argument. Maybe you're just saying that doing the wrong thing with good intentions is better than doing the wrong thing with bad intentions. At any rate, for the sake of argument, (yes, I used that expression for you, Gil) let's assume that you and I are wrong, Mike, and that Castro's intentions were good, however misguided. Should we then praise him for his determination and sacrifice given the results, and the means he used to achieve these results?

Anyway, all of us seem to be around the same place morally, when it comes to the draft. But I would like to hear more from David (or anyone else) about its futility. I would like to believe that what David is saying is true, but I'm not entirely convinced.

In the case of Israel, I tend to think that you are right. If they ended their conscription, I believe that they would still get enough volunteers to defend themselves. But you seem to be saying that the fact that they have a draft proves that the draft is overwhelmingly popular and therefore proves that they would get enough volunteers without it.

Does your logic follow that there is no social program in this country, that is currently funded with coerced tax dollars, that would vanish if left to survive on volunteer dollars, by virtue of the fact that we, as a society, allow the money to be taken from us in the first place? Maybe that's a bad analogy, and I'm probably completely misunderstanding you, but I'll go on with my questions.

Have there not been drafts in countries, at different times historically, that were not overwhelmingly popular (at least not by those who were being drafted) but still viable? Or are you saying that any wars won by those armies could have also been won with an all volunteer army?

Or is it more of combination of practicality and morality? Something like: any war where conscription made the difference between winning and losing, shouldn't have been fought in the first place because it didn't have enough of a mandate from the people in order to be fought effectively without it?

Anyway, I'm sure you can make your own point better than I can.

by R on Thu, 11/25/2004 - 02:08 | reply

Re:Conscription

The editor wrote:

"The World is vigorously opposed to conscription, whether in the UK or the US, under all foreseeable circumstances." yet The World is in favor of the war. How is this different from me saying: "I'm in favor of national free lunches but I'm opposed to raising taxes." Having a war doesn't guarantee that there will be a draft and having free lunches doesn't guarantee that taxes will increase, but the chances are dramatically better. And someone is paying the price in any event.

by a reader on Thu, 11/25/2004 - 02:46 | reply

taxes

well, we're aware the war costs money, and so could lead to higher taxes in the same way free lunches could. however, are you aware of this method of recruiting more soldiers: you offer them higher pay. thus you can get a war for just money, no draft.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Thu, 11/25/2004 - 03:00 | reply

Copyright © 2007 Setting The World To Rights

Civil Liberties And Politicians

While our troops are fighting for our liberties abroad it seems that the politicians at home are dead set on eroding them – if the Queen's Speech is anything to go by.

The government is planning to introduce a Mental Health Bill that will give GPs the power to compulsorily “treat” people whom they deem to be “mentally ill”. The bill will also increase the number of behaviours that are deemed to be “mental illness”. Let us translate this for people who are not used to psychiatric doublespeak: doctors will be given the power to chemically subdue, or torture, people whose behaviour they dislike, even when these people have committed no crime.

The speech also refers to a Consumer Credit Bill and a European Union Bill. The former is intended to prevent lenders from conning people; the latter to enable the government to con people:

The spending of the "yes" and "no" campaigns is limited by the Political Parties Elections and Referendums Act for up to six months before a referendum, but the government's own spending is not limited until the last 28 days of a referendum campaign, the Vote No campaign said.

The government is also persevering with its ridiculous quest to impose ID cards upon the public. ID cards are an infringement upon our civil liberties: innocent people should not have to present cards at police stations to “prove” they are not criminals. As ID cards will be forged as soon as they hit the streets and quite likely earlier, they will also be utterly useless for security purposes just as they have been in every other country with ID cards. And they will create a completely new type of completely harmless ‘criminal’ (the ID-card non-carrier) on whom the security services' efforts and resources will be wasted at a time when we are in great danger from real enemies. We are also disgusted by the Conservatives' spinelessness over this issue:

The Conservatives say people needs [sic] answers to key questions before knowing whether the planned national ID card scheme will work and protect people's liberties.

Successive governments have eroded Britons' right to defend themselves, by banning guns and prosecuting people who choose to defend themselves. That the state can be everywhere at once is both ridiculous and undesirable: it is long past time that the ~~petty, officious bureaucrats~~ caring, competent representatives in the House of Commons realised that.

Tue, 11/23/2004 - 19:55 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Copyright © 2007 Setting The World To Rights

Secular-Religious Insanity In Education

The narrowness of the schoolteacher subculture; the confusion between form and substance caused by over-reliance on a written Constitution; and Political Correctness. These three blights on American society have combined to bring about a lunatic reversal of the meanings of 'secular' and 'religious' in school curricula:

On the one hand, the teaching of the foundation stone of the United States' secular political culture, the Declaration of Independence, has been made taboo on the grounds that it constitutes 'religion'.

On the other, Muslim missionary work in American schools is being encouraged on the grounds that it is 'multicultural' – i.e. promotes secular values.

Thu, 11/25/2004 - 17:47 | permalink

u r brilliant, they r nutz

u r brilliant, they r nutz

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Thu, 11/25/2004 - 19:32 | reply

Some Questions

Who is encouraging Muslim missionary work, the public schools? Of the thousands upon thousands of public schools, which ones are banning the Declaration of Independence?

I do not see a reversal of secular and religious. I do see an intrusion upon the separation of church and state.

I also see a greater failure of the public school systems in America. By mandating attendance of all students in public school systems and mandating twelve years of public school we run the high risk of wearing down and dumbing down every attendee into numb complacency. School has become a factory of education to produce the new proletariat.

by a reader on Fri, 11/26/2004 - 02:45 | reply

Copyright © 2004 Setting The World To Rights

Three Links About Middle-Eastern Death Cults

MEMRI TV Project monitors the Hizbollah television station in Lebanon: Mothers of Hizbullah Martyrs: We are Very Happy and Want to Sacrifice More Children.

HonestReporting describes some of the so-called 'incitement' by which Palestinians are drawn, from earliest childhood, into the suicide-bombing death cult:

'The venomous propaganda in the Palestinian media and education system is the root and foundation of the expansion of the suicide terrorism phenomenon,' said Sharon.

Unfortunately, the typical news consumer has no idea what Sharon is talking about, since, as HonestReporting has continually indicated, the western media have largely turned a blind eye to the incitement against Israel and the U.S. that permeates Palestinian culture.

Meanwhile in Iran:

The Islamic death cult in Iran is running a registration drive, signing up thousands of would-be murderers to carry out attacks against the US, Israel, and ... Salman Rushdie

The world will not be at peace until such cults are history. Why do the media barely mention them and never discuss their mode of operation and their political effects?

Sun, 11/28/2004 - 18:59 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Why?

Because the model of the world that they are selling doesn't have a space into which this information fits.

Gil

by Gil on Mon, 11/29/2004 - 05:57 | reply

Indeed

That is indeed the question. As far as Iran goes, even the US administration falls way short of confronting the Iranian regime the way it deserves (and which is the only reasonable policy if worse tragedies are to be avoided in the future)

by AIS on Mon, 11/29/2004 - 06:51 | reply

Islamic murdering cults

Why don't the leaders of those cults commit suicide instead, They would do the world a hell of a favor> and we wouldn't have to look at their ugly bearded faces any more. Young people should be taught to live not to die. They really prove that they hate God and all his children which are all the human race. Religion has no impact on God. It's what is in your heart. I hate those idiots who preach hatred and strive on dominating women and killing innocent civilians. They are cowards of the worst kind and makes me ashamed to be human

by a reader on Sun, 01/02/2005 - 19:59 | reply

Is Islam sick ?

Islam and the Arab world have been sick, psychopathic religion/cultures for hundreds of years. The West and President Bush had better face up to this and prepare plans to finally and completely end the psychopathology and lunacy of the fascist Islamo/Arab societies, just as President Roosevelt and Churchill confronted the psychopathic German Nazis and the brutal Japanese militarist expansionists and totally vanquished and destroyed them. Notice how democratic and peaceful these former enemies have been for 60 years now. The same must be done with the Islamofascist psychopaths and the lunatic Islamo/Arab clergy.

by pilgrim on Mon, 01/03/2005 - 01:09 | reply

Natan Sharansky On Democracy And Peace

The death of Yasser Arafat provides an opportunity for peace between Israel and a new state of Palestine, but only if the peace process is linked to genuine freedom and democracy for the Palestinians, writes Natan Sharansky. Go and read it all.

Then buy the book.

Mon, 11/29/2004 - 02:17 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

This book?

(Not that that report is credible: everyone knows Bush can't read.)

by Kevin on Mon, 11/29/2004 - 20:57 | reply

The Case For Democracy

I am so admired by the book (The Case for Democracy) and want to express my deep impression about that book . I greet the Author (Natan Sharansky) for his interest in liberating the oppressed Peoples world wide and in the Middle East in particular . Most of the points mentioned in the book describes exactly waht was happening in Iraq under the tyranny and Terror of Saddam Hussein's regime , and the differences between the Fear and Free Societies and the effect of the Freedom on my life in Iraq even though the evilish campaign to repress Iraqi Freedom . I hope that the Free World , led by the United States , would take the advantage from this great thinker and get the Moral Clarity to see the evil , so as to support the dissidents and freedom lovers around the world who are fighting tyranny and terror in the non-democratic regimes and those are confronting evil .President George W. Bush & PM Tony Blair were the only two who have this moral Clarity -as the graet author saw - and liberated me and my own people , the Iraqi People .

by IRAQI CITIZEN on Mon, 06/20/2005 - 12:01 | reply

Drupal add-ons

Here are some modules, themes, and other tools to be used with Drupal, the software that runs this site.

These are generally not polished (and in particular, not documented) to official Drupal contrib standards. Some of them are tailored to the specific needs of this site, and might not be directly usable on sites with different policies and conventions. The copies here may be updated occasionally, but they are not necessarily up-to-date with — or used on — this site.

Everything here is provided as-is, and absolutely no (unpaid) support whatsoever will be provided. (You can send bug reports to kpschoedel@gmail.com, but we do not guarantee we will do anything with them.)

Theme Preprocessor

This allows one to write themes in a 'template' style, but runs at theme-install time for maximum efficiency (that is, it produces a pure PHP theme, and is not itself present as part of a Drupal installation). It provides inclusions, conditionals, macros, etc.; its main design goal was to allow one to easily share code/design between themes.

It requires a command-line-accessible PHP; it is written in PHP because that language will be familiar to people working on Drupal.

- documentation \(PDF\)
- preprocessor
- sample themes \(4.5\)

Modules

- alertype \(4.6\)
Allows editors to change a node's type.
- captcharith \(4.6\)
A captcha plug-in that provides a simple arithmetic question as the challenge. Derived from an early version of the captcha module.

Note: at time of writing, this requires a patch to captcha.module; see drupal.org/node/20653.

- copyright (4.5, 4.6)
Adds a copyright notice (automatically using the current year) at the bottom of each page.
- extralinks (4.5, 4.6)
Optionally adds (a) an "edit" link to teaser displays (like Drupal 4.4), and (b) "next", "previous", and "latest" links to node pages, based on the front page display order.
- forumup (4.6)
Allows editors to promote an unpublished forum item to a story.
- ii404 (4.5, 4.6)
Perform a search when a page is not found. Derived from i404.module by Steven Wittens.
- insertions (4.5, 4.6)
Provides XML-style tags to insert information (e.g. title, teaser, body, link list, etc.) about nodes and comments. Similar in spirit to the Attached node contrib module.
- linebreak (4.5, 4.6)
An extension to the line break filter. Converts line breaks into HTML, but only if the user has not supplied explicit , , or tags.
- nlist (4.5, 4.6)
An adjunct to insertions.module, this lists the nodes in a taxonomy in <n> form, so that the editor can copy them to easily build custom article lists.
- notemailer (4.5, 4.6)
Allows the admin to suppress teasers for particular node types. See <http://drupal.org/node/12667>.
- replace (4.5, 4.6)
An input filter that provides two functions: (a) turn '@' characters into images, to discourage email address harvesting; (b) turn the site's name into a link.
- results (4.5, 4.6)
In 4.5, this module merely suppresses the author field in search results, for 'editorially' unsigned collaborative sites.

From 4.6, this module allows the administrator to configure, for each node type, what information will be displayed in search results.
- safemail (4.6)

An input filter to protect email addresses from automated harvesting.

This filter converts email addresses (either in mailto: links or in text) into links to an internal URL ?q=safemail/etc. Access to the decoded email address may be restricted by role and/or guarded with a captcha.

Note: at time of writing, this requires a patch to captcha.module; see drupal.org/node/20653.

- searchers (4.5, 4.6)

This module provides an alternate report of external referrers, parsing search engine referrers and excluding unwanted referrers.

- shuffler (4.5, 4.6)

Present a "random" selection of articles in a sidebar block. Nodes are selected and weighted by taxonomy. Reasonably efficient, since the list of links is generated by a cron hook rather than on every page load. (On the other hand, it does not take node permissions into account.)

- spantell (4.6)

This is a plug-in for the spam module, which notifies users when their content appears to be spam. (The hope is that they will then be less likely to wonder why their content does not appear, and resubmit it repeatedly.)

- teaserless (4.5, 4.6)

Handle old database nodes with no/empty teaser field.

- tracking (4.5, 4.6)

Similar to the core tracker.module, but primarily focussed on providing registered users with personalized lists of unread content.

- zminoredit (4.5, 4.6)

Allows editors to mark node edits as 'minor', so that the content does not appear to be 'new' in the tracker. (Renamed from 'minoredit' so that it appears just above the 'Submit' button.)

PHP pages

- fc (4.5, 4.6)

Flushes the Drupal cache when loaded. Useful while working on code that uses the cache.

- node (4.5, 4.6)

Redirect old node URLs. Better than the standard Apache redirect because it handles links to comments.

Patches

- captcha-api.patch (4.6)

Provides an API for captcha.module, so that third-party modules can provide and use captcha tests.

See drupal.org/node/20653.

Note: the 4.6 patch applies to the CVS version of captcha.module current at the time of the 4.6.0 release, since as of this writing captcha.module has not been released for 4.6.

- comment-admin-show-node.patch (4.5, 4.6)

Makes admin/comment/edit/... pages provide the title and link of the associated node, so that the administrator can easily verify that the comment has been posted in the correct place.

See drupal.org/node/11782

- comment-delete-one.patch (4.5, 4.6)

Permit the administrator to delete a single comment, without also deleting all of its descendents.

See drupal.org/node/11877

I still can't believe Drupal actually thinks it's a good idea to force an editor, who wants to remove one little piece of content, to also remove other content, sight unseen. This is Drupal's biggest flaw — it's should be a content-management system, not a content-arbitrarily-discarding system.

- comment-theme.patch (4.6)

Adds theme('comment_start') and theme('comment_end') around the comment display section of a node page, so that, for example, the entire comment section can be enclosed in its own styled div.

- drupal-options.patch (4.5, 4.6)

Makes the two functions of drupal.module — remote authentication and the remote directory — separately configurable.

See drupal.org/node/12143

- excerpt-admin.patch (4.5, 4.6)

Modifies excerpt.module to allows an administrator to create an excerpt, even if excerpts are not normally configured for that node type.

Note: the 4.6 patch applies to the CVS version of excerpt.module current at the time of the 4.6.0 release, since as of this writing excerpt.module has not been released for 4.6.

- node-history.patch (4.5, 4.6)

Stops node.module from discarding history entries older than a month. I think keeping track of what a user has read is a useful service, and don't want it arbitrarily sabotaged.

- password-trim.patch (4.5, 4.6, fixed in 4.6.1)

Trim white space from entered passwords. New users who cut-and-paste from their introductory email message often end up with the preceding blank and/or trailing newline.

See drupal.org/node/11791

- poll-theme.patch (4.5, 4.6)

Makes poll results themeable.

Obsolete Items

- updatecommentcount (4.5)

Repairs the node_comment_statistics table after an upgrade to 4.5.0. Probably won't be necessary for 4.5.1 or later; see

<http://drupal.org/node/11366>

- comment-save-count.patch (4.5, fixed in 4.6)

Update the comment count when a comment is saved, so that changes to its publication status will be reflected in the count.

See drupal.org/node/11933

- excerpt-read-more.patch (4.5, fixed in 4.6)

Modifies excerpt.module to correct the 'read more' flag.

See drupal.org/node/11289

- node-post.patch (4.5, fixed in 4.6)

Stops a user being redirected to a page they don't have permission to view, after submitting a node.

See drupal.org/node/11940

Mon, 11/29/2004 - 18:35 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Conspiracy Theories About Controlling Democracies

What do a retired Egyptian general and The Guardian have in common? OK, many things, but what we have in mind today is that they both peddle anti-democratic conspiracy theories. The general in question, Sallah Al-Din Salim, recently spoke on a Lebanese TV channel and his words were recorded by MEMRI:

[The US] wants a collaborating [Iraqi] government and a collaborating national assembly, which it can later use to control Iraq, and build military bases, in order to distance Iraq from the Arab path and then to use Iraq's land to attack Iran.

So the United States is going to control voting in the Iraqi parliament. In a similar vein, Ian Traynor of the Guardian writes that a "US campaign [is] behind the turmoil in Kiev" in Ukraine:

With their websites and stickers, their pranks and slogans aimed at banishing widespread fear of a corrupt regime, the democracy guerrillas of the Ukrainian Pora youth movement have already notched up a famous victory - whatever the outcome of the dangerous stand-off in Kiev.

Funded and organised by the US government, deploying US consultancies, pollsters, diplomats, the two big American parties and US non-government organisations, the campaign was first used in Europe in Belgrade in 2000 to beat Slobodan Milosevic at the ballot box.

He then lists the many means that such organisations deployed to try to prevent electoral fraud and sway the election in favour of Viktor Yushchenko. All of this is rather admirable and does not amount to the US being behind Ukraine's electoral problems. However, the article gets even more ridiculous:

Officially, the US government spent $41m (£21.7m) organising and funding the year-long operation to get rid of Milosevic from October 1999. In Ukraine, the figure is said to be around $14m.

Let's just see if we understand this correctly. The US has supposedly delivered a victory to Yushchenko with an investment of only $14m? This suggestion is ludicrous and insulting to the Ukrainians. It is astronomically unlikely that a $14m intervention could be the deciding factor in the race – and if it had been, why were the Americans not outbid by other interested parties like Mr Putin or the Ukrainian – er – parties? In reality, the incumbent Ukrainian Prime Minister Viktor Yanukovich's attempts to rig the vote are behind Ukraine's electoral problems. No American organisation has attempted to rig the election and they are not behind the Ukraine's problems.

A world in which the United States can control the actions of parliaments and the votes of electorates exists only in the fevered imaginations of people like Egyptian ex-Generals and Guardian writers. If they have a penchant for writing fiction they should get it out of their system by writing a bad novel instead of inflicting it on people watching and reading the news.

Fri, 12/03/2004 - 15:20 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

investment

The statement is indeed ridiculous taking into account official figures of what Yanukovich spend for his election campaign. Just to remind you - it is about $600 mln.

by a reader on Tue, 12/07/2004 - 15:42 | reply

Conspiracism

Conspiracy theorists will always be with us--and always corrosive.

by Dean Esmay on Wed, 12/08/2004 - 05:22 | reply

devil's advocate

Maybe the conspiracy charges make sense if one stipulates that Yanukovich's side had calculated very precisely, given control of state media & plans for vote-stealing & whatnot, how much extra money ($600 million, apparently) they'd have to spend on the campaign, and the extra infusion of $14 million for the opposition screwed up their balance sheet just enough to throw a wrench in the works. :-)

by Blix on Wed, 12/08/2004 - 21:53 | reply

Re: devil's advocate

Yes. But if a person is capable of calculating the exact cost of a $600 million public-relations project to an accuracy of less than $14 million and being sure of getting it right, then they must be capable of foreseeing the effect of obvious (and, apparently, public!) sources of assistance for their opposition.

But what if the situation were this: Both sides employ Machiavellian operatives of this calibre. Both knew that the $14m would make the difference, and both knew that if the other side matched it, the bottomless coffers of the CIA would simply outbid them again.

by David Deutsch on Wed, 12/08/2004 - 22:19 | reply

no single opinion

It is ridiculous to speculate without facts about who gave money to whom. And I haven't seen any evidence of "Western money" in Ukraine. However, Yushenko did paid "salaries" to his supporters in Kiev! And food-supply was organised, and tents had been purchased in advance, and buses had been arranged just in time. And these facts are not speculations (however, they are not official). The reason I am sure is that my relatives who live in central Ukraine have a plant with many employees around 400 km from Kiev, and a certain number of workers took "a holiday", explaining later that they were offered an "allowance" of 40 Hrivna (about £4) per day not including free meal and a place in a tent if they agree to take "a trip" to the independence square in Kiev in a comfy bus. And they agreed to support what they called "birth of democracy in Ukraine".

So, a lot of money had been thrown in. We just don't know by whom.

Moreover, several years ago, they rehearsed this with a very similar scenario. Yushenko and Co again announced election results wrong and said that their supporters will stay in tents in Kiev until the true result are pronounced. It was VERY much similar to what happened this time but without enough resorces. Another difference was that eventually, police came and removed all the tents and arrested some members. That was about it. This time they just achived more. However, I doubt if that could be called a democratic shift of power. I wold call it a "technological process" rather.

And western countries should be ashamed of who they supported.

BBC news translated a footage from the independence square ("maidan nezalezhnosti") in Kiev on the second day of the first elections. It was nice to see that by failing to translate from Ukranian language can cause damage too. When Yushenko appeared on tribunes he was announced as a president of Ukraine. Half of Ukraine population laughed at this moment. To avoid confusions, I must point out that that was short after the FIRST election that indeed went totally wrong with a totally wrong number of votes.

But what it turned out to be afterwards is not 70% of votes in favor of him as it was purported by western mass-media. It he is not a prominent democrat at all.

So, the elections were not as clear as they seem.

by a reader on Thu, 01/13/2005 - 13:44 | reply

Democracy

On September 3, 1939, Britain and France declared war on Germany. If it had somehow been possible to impose a free and fair election on Germany that day instead of a world war, Adolf Hitler and his Nazi Party would undoubtedly have won a landslide victory and a wholehearted mandate for their policies. So the war would have followed anyway, the only difference being that the West would now have been fighting a regime that was unequivocally legitimate by the West's own standards. It would have been fighting a nation. A people. And of course, that is what it was fighting, in the actual war.

Facts such as these are cited by the many opponents of the Bush Doctrine (or the Sharansky doctrine) of victory through the imposition of democracy. Opponents of all types, from enemy sympathisers to defeatists to neo-imperialists to idiotarians, and even anxious supporters, think that they see a fatal flaw in this doctrine: what if the enemy, once democratised, votes the bad guys back into power?

The naive answer, that 'the people' – the majority – never have evil objectives that they value above their own safety and prosperity, and that all the harm is done against their will by their evil rulers, is simply false. Fortunately, the Bush Doctrine does not depend on such a fairy-tale premise. The doctrine is not about relying on the goodwill of a supposed silent majority of liberal democrats among the enemy population. It is about allowing such a majority, and the associated institutions of an open society, to evolve where they did not exist before, by actively destabilising – if necessary by force or the threat of force – the inherently fragile fear-based regimes that prevent their evolution. This is a much harder and more complex task than merely forcing free and fair elections at gunpoint (which, by the way, can be done and often has been, and is indeed sometimes part of the solution). But it is feasible.

Wed, 12/08/2004 - 17:01 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Does the editor also believe that sexual promiscuity is a way to promote virginity?

by a reader on Thu, 12/09/2004 - 13:21 | reply

Re: Does the editor also believe

Does the editor also believe that sexual promiscuity is a way to promote virginity?

Of course it is! You think virgins grow on trees?

by a non- editor answering anyway on Thu, 12/09/2004 - 14:52 | reply

What is destabilising a regime?

When you contrast regime destabilisation with merely imposing a free and fair vote--as you seem to be doing--what are the concrete differences of policy that, for instance, make the former a harder task? In both cases, the regime must be removed from absolute control of politics.

My thought is that destabilisation involves destroying and discrediting the regime militarily before the election while hinting that you may continue to destroy and discredit it after the election even if major regime elements come into the government. That way the regime party is not a viable option for stability when the election is held. Is that the policy of the administration? And if that is not the policy you have in mind, what is the difference between forcing an election and destabilising the regime?

by Nick on Thu, 12/09/2004 - 19:15 | reply

Re: What is destabilising a regime?

You're presumably asking about what sort of things can be done to destabilise [the remnants of] a fear regime after it has been removed from power. Stability would mean its finding a way to prevent its decline into oblivion. Presumably there are two classes of measures the West could take to prevent this: one is to reduce the power of those people to instil fear today – by hunting them, defeating them militarily, defending against their attacks, ridiculing them, suborning their allies and so on. The other is to promote the institutions of an open society, which, uniquely, actually work to help people get what they want without having to hurt others to do so. The more such institutions are up and running, the more the bad guys' supporters will be persuaded to ditch them, the fewer recruits they will get, the more they will despair of winning, betray each other, and so on.

by David Deutsch on Thu, 12/09/2004 - 22:20 | reply

Re: Fear-based regimes

Are regimes such as Iran's really fear based? I think they derive their power more from the fact that they are considered virtuous by a large portion (if not the majority) of a country's population. The perceived virtue could be mild e.g. "this government prevents chaos from erupting" to extreme e.g. "this government is enforcing god's will on earth", but it is essential to the regimes power.

by a reader on Fri, 12/10/2004 - 13:03 | reply

What is much more likely is t

What is much more likely is that the cost of expressing dissatisfaction with any aspect of the regime is so high that almost nobody does it. Its more or less a fact that people who deviate from orthodoxy in Iran face violence against them and their loved ones. This constitutes a fear society regardless of the nominal ideology of its subjects.

-Dan Strimpel

by a reader on Fri, 12/10/2004 - 15:24 | reply

Re: What is much more likely

Why? Does it make more sense that a small group of armed men can physically intimidate a nation of millions? or that the nation's leader (like the leader of a cult) is giving a large portion of the nation something they need i.e.: a cause to identify with and a reason to believe in their own virtue.

by a reader on Sat, 12/11/2004 - 12:31 | reply

"a cause to identify with"

Reader,

Fortunately, that's not the case, at least if you believe the very limited opinion polling that is available. In the last poll conducted, a large majority of those sampled favored some kind of reform, either in politics or administration, with 45 per cent in favor of regime change, even with outside intervention. As to the explanation of how the regime is able to maintain itself in power, it is mainly by a combination fierceness and holding out the possibility that the parliament could reform the government without revolution.

by Nick on Sat, 12/11/2004 - 17:58 | reply

Democracy in Iraq

Here is a positive note on the development of democracy in Iraq.

Henry Sturman

by Henry Sturman on Sun, 12/26/2004 - 10:34 | reply

Mauritania's Best Kept Secret

Under the headline Slavery: Mauritania's best kept secret, the BBC expresses righteous indignation about the continued existence of chattel slavery, with government connivance, in Mauritania: an open secret.

But why does the BBC see fit not to mention an even better-kept open secret? The word 'Arab' does not occur in the article; nor does the word 'race', even though the slave-owners are Arabs and Berbers while the slaves are black. The words 'Muslim' and 'Islam' do not appear in the article, even though the 800-year-old institution of slavery in Mauritania began with the enslavement of non-Muslim black Africans by invading Muslims from the North, and today a local form of Islamism is integral to its justification and day-to-day operation.

Mon, 12/13/2004 - 15:10 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Tradition

It is the way it is because it is the way it always was. God said so.

by a reader on Wed, 12/15/2004 - 15:21 | reply

Hurray For The French Government!

Hurray for the French Government! President Chirac was absolutely right...

...to celebrate the completion of this:

it is the tallest bridge in the world.

The ribbon of steel which forms the highway in the sky is 270m (885ft) above the river, but the central pillar is 343m (1125ft) high.

That makes it taller than the Eiffel Tower and four times the height of Big Ben in central London.

And it was 100% privately funded.

Wed, 12/15/2004 - 16:10 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Hurrah for France

Yep lovely piece of work, and British designed too! I wonder what the toll fee is though. The Severn Bridges are French owned, and we Welsh are very fed up with paying £4.60 to get into our own country.

by RAB on Thu, 12/16/2004 - 16:29 | reply

Peace And Genocide

Nothing expresses the monstrous depravity of today's 'peace movement' better than Nobel Peace Prize winner Mairead Corrigan Maguire's description of Israel's nuclear weapons as the gas chambers of Auschwitz, "perfected".

Thus she equates machines whose only purpose was to commit genocide, with machines whose only purpose is to prevent genocide.

Mairead Corrigan Maguire is moral inversion, perfected.

Mon, 12/20/2004 - 00:27 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink inversion?

she seems to invert some things (israel's nukes) but not others (hitler gas chambers). or do you think she only attacks the gas chambers (implicitly, b/c she is saying Israel is bad) b/c it's convenient b/c they are accepted as bad?

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 12/20/2004 - 08:16 | reply

Mairead Corrigan Maguire's comments

Equating nuclear weapons to Hitler's gas chambers??? That is the stupidest thing I have ever read in my life. The gas chambers were torture devices created by many evil people led by a psychotic megalomaniac. How can you compare one to the other?.. and Mairead Corrigan Maguire is a nobel peace prize winner?

by Cyndi on Sun, 03/27/2005 - 05:36 | reply

Why Doesn't Jimmy Walter Take Jimmy Walter Seriously?

Jimmy Walter is a millionaire and a conspiracy theorist who thinks the US government was responsible for the 9/11 attack. He is annoyed because people don't take him seriously:

"I am a patriot fighting the real traitors who are destroying our democracy. I resent it when they call me delusional," he said.

His second mistake is to try to solve this problem by offering $100,000 to the first engineering student who can show that the World Trade Center collapsed in the manner described by the government. Walter said that the contest would be judged by a panel of expert engineers. He imagines that nobody will manage to win and so he will be vindicated.

Now, before we consider that, we have to wonder why anybody should take Mr Walter's ideas seriously when Mr Walter himself does not? Why do we say this? Mr Walter does not believe the government's story, but there is no reason why one has to believe it in order to test it. The laws of physics and chemistry governing the behaviour of towers and aircraft are fairly uncontroversial. So a decent team of engineers could run a computer simulation, build scale model, and so on, of how the government said the crash happened. If the towers don't fall down during this test then it would constitute a prima facie criticism of the government's explanation of the events of 9/11. If his panel of engineers is competent to judge candidate explanations for 9/11 then surely they ought to be able to come up with such a test themselves. So why doesn't Mr Walter simply hire his own panel of engineers to conduct the relevant test and see what happens?

The National Institute of Standards and Technology is conducting tests to understand exactly how the World Trade Centre collapsed. So the US government is taking its own explanation of what happened on 9/11 seriously and is trying to understand what happened in more depth in order to make future attacks less damaging.

So why does Mr Walter does not take his own explanation as seriously? We guess the reason is this: His explanation requires the perfectly to deceive the American people. He arrived at this nonsense not by contemplating problems of engineering but because he dislikes Republicans. He dislikes them for having confidence in Western institutions, which he lacks. Mr Walter prefers the doctrines of environmentalism and socialism to those of the free society that allowed him to become a millionaire. The US government's explanation just requires the existence of some very evil enemies, which is rather uncontroversial, plus government complacency and incompetence, which are never in short supply.

US government to have organised a vast conspiracy that works

Update: Check out this debunking by Popular Mechanics of several such conspiracy theories.

Tue, 12/28/2004 - 12:10 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

A Non-Problem Seeking a Non-Solution?

The towers collapsed because of structural members weakened by high heat melting steel. When internal structural parts of the building collapsed above, the forces of mass, momentum, and gravity brought about the rest of the disaster. Has Jimmy ever built a house of cards? The house of cards becomes more unstable the taller it is built. Structural members such as toothpicks and glue need to be added to keep it standing.

A panel of engineers would only complicate the problem. There's always wind shear and pigeon droppings to account for. No expensive computer simulation is necessary. Non-Problem solved. Mail the 100,000 to the Editor, but convert quickly to Euros before the dollar drops further.

by a reader on Tue, 12/28/2004 - 15:14 | reply

jimmy walter

Im a journalist in Manchester England. Jimmy Walter is organising truth about 911 conferences all over the UK including Manchester at the moment. His web page is linked to some anti-semitic conspiracy theories. Is he an anti-Semite.

If so, please, urgently send me web site addresses. I need to get his meeting stopped.

Estelle

by a reader on Tue, 05/31/2005 - 18:43 | reply

Answers for those not paying attention

Here's some info that will hopefully open your eyes, especially to the posters from 12/28 and 5/31.

Regarding Jimmy Walter taking Jimmy Walter seriously:

The reason he doesn't hire his own engineers to do the research is for PUBLICITY. He honestly doesn't care whether or not he gives away the prize. What he wants to do is get lots of engineers (and others) thinking about the issue.

Regarding a Non-Problem:

Fire didn't cause the towers to collapse. Look carefully at some of the pictures of the holes caused by the "commercial" airliners. You'll see people in the holes. How hellishly hot could those impacts have been, if people survived to go and stand in the impact sites? What's more, is that the remainder of the towers were officially undamaged. Why, then, did they crumble like dust, if the rest of the building hadn't been bombarded by airliners as well? In case you still don't have your thinking caps on, I'll answer the above questions. The crash sites weren't very hot at all, and not capable of melting steel. The remainder of the towers crumbled because they were demolished by explosives from the inside.

Regarding Estelle's post:

What's more important - the fact that an anti-Semite (assuming he is) wants to have meetings, or the likely chance that portions of the US government caused 9/11 to happen?

Please think critically readers, and don't blindly swallow what the mass media feeds you.

by Free Thinker on Sun, 06/12/2005 - 06:02 | reply

this is a ridiculous essay.

This is the first I'm hearing about Jimmy Walter and from this angle the man's a hero.

All this essay consists of is fingerpointing and namecalling. "Jimmy Walter is a conspiracy theorist. Whine whine whine. The Bush/Cheney axis never lied to ME! I'm disturbed now. Someone tell Jimmy to stop."

THE U.S. GOVERNMENT WAS THE ONLY INSTITUTION THAT COULD HAVE GIVEN THE GREEN LIGHT TO ALLOW 9-11 TO HAPPEN. Tenet had been working on it since before Bush was even elected, so don't accuse those who have more information than you of being "anti-Republican"; we know this is far deeper than just Republicans.

This essay is all the more annoying because of the smarmy, condescending attitude of the writer. As if he were the "smart" one who KNOWS the Bush mafia is telling the truth, and Wilson and everyone who's thinking about 9-11 for themselves is _____ (insert insult here). Is this what you mean by "idiotarian"? I define "idiotarian" as "idiotic pseudoliberalism" which is certainly an accurate characterization of this site as I read more and more of it!

by a reader on Sat, 12/03/2005 - 22:20 | reply

Idiotarians are, roughly, the Idiotarians are, roughly, the people who side with our enemies, but do not themselves wish to hurt us.

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Sat, 12/03/2005 - 22:32 | reply

the reason Wilson is having a the reason Wilson is having a contest rather than just hiring some engineers is because then theoretically the results are unbiased. personally i would have spent the $100,000 to assist some of the victims' families to hire an ace investigator and public relations firm.

accusing Wilson of being a socialist - labelling him one just for 9-11 skepticism - that's IDIOTIC. and look at Estelle labelling him an anti-Semite for the same "crime". look i have no idea what Mr. Wilson is up to but the way you two leapt to those conclusions is WEIRD!

what's wrong with environmentalism? factory smoke is not a sign of progress! and i do not see where believing that there was government involvement with the crime makes one a socialist - if anything the fact that the government sees itself as able to murder us at will is a huge reason to OPPOSE a strong central government!

I'm scanning the NIST report - thank you for that link - but my bet is that just like the congressional 9-11 inquiry it will take the concept that "fires brought the towers down" as a holy grail and do everything possible to make the data fit that conclusion - and tilt most of its work towards "preventing this from ever happening again!" to which i must riposte that a discussion of prevention should include "never allow republicans anywhere near the intelligence or foreign policy apparatus" and "throw as many of the people with foreknowledge of 9-11 in jail". that of course includes bush, cheney, and everyone surrounding them.

Fires from jet fuel did not bring WTC7 down, because no jet ever struck it. The collapse patterns exactly match that of controlled structural demolition. There is video showing the explosions starting at the GROUND FLOOR and working their way up the building. The second plane did not even hit the towers head on, spilling most of its fuel out into the sky in the form of a fireball. If you GO to ground zero, even today, you will feel as I do certain that this event was engineered by the American military-republican complex.

by a reader on Sat, 12/03/2005 - 22:48 | reply

nice people

by the way, you all seem like nice people, and we are all on the same side here - not left, not right, just Americans who want justice for 9-11 - and i genuinely appreciate the thought stimulus this site has offered.

i just have done a lot of investigating myself, autonomously, not influenced by any -ism, simply having not bought the official story for one minute, and nothing i have read in your defense of the "official" story has caused even an iota of doubt in me that the 9-11 disaster was sold to us fraudulently as the actions of Osama bin Laden by the truly guilty - Cheney, Tenet, Rice, Bush etc.

believing these things hopefully does not give aid nor comfort to the pathetic specimens who are suicide bombing innocents in israel and iraq. i choose to believe that if we americans see through the 9-11 lies that we'll throw the murderers in office into prison and maybe elect someone who can REALLY lead us out of the bush armageddon matrix.

by a reader on Sat, 12/03/2005 - 22:57 | reply

Just My Thoughts Regarding 9/11

I've read on and on about conspiracy theories regarding various aspects of 9/11. I'm inclined to believe that hi-jackers did take control of the planes that crashed into the WTC, the Pentagon and the field in Pennsylvania. And I don't believe that the planes had any kind of "missile" or any other kind of alteration.

What I do believe is that the powers that be (And I don't necessarily mean specifically the President - plausible deniability) knew for an unknown period of time that attacks were going to take place on September 11th, 2001. My guess is that they had a general sense of what was going to take place, but didn't have enough information to stop it BEFORE THE PLANES LEFT THE GROUND. That statement is important. If the government knew who the specific terrorist were that were getting on the planes, I truly believe that they would have stopped the attack. Instead, the terrorists managed to get on the planes and get off the ground.

Now here is where I think the "conspiracy" comes in.

I DO think that, once the planes were hi-jacked, that they were allowed to hit their assigned targets, and here's why:

Imagine the media fiasco that would have been generated if the planes never hit their targets, but instead were shot down by our own military over American soil...American neighborhoods. Think of it: civilian airliners shot down, killing everyone on board and countless others on the ground, by our own US Military, authorized by our own Government.

There would be no evidence of the terrorist's plans, other than there intentions to hi-jack. Up until September 11th, the only thing we knew hi-jackers were capable of was killing passengers and asking for safe passage to the country of their choice.

If the planes were shot down, then there would be no horrific images of the towers collapsing to rally the nation together.

Instead, the government would have to spend the next several years validating their reasons for shooting down four civilian aircraft and killing hundreds of Americans. The GOVERNMENT would be made to blame for the tragedies on September 11th, and NOT the terrorists.

Instead, the "powers that be" allowed the planes to hit their targets. The situation, while horrific, does wonders for the Bush Administration, and rallies the country behind it's president, giving him and his administration it's best poll numbers of Bush's presidency. In addition, it gives the government the motive it needs to pursue their oil interests overseas with full backing of the American public and even the Democrats.

...something to think about. Somewhere between what is thrust in front of us and what is absurd...is the truth.

by swellfoop2002 on Sat, 01/28/2006 - 00:31 | reply

Loose Change - Watch It!

<http://video.google.com/videoplay?docid=-8260059923762628848&q=loose+change&pl=true>

Click on the link

by Anonymous on Thu, 04/27/2006 - 03:54 | reply

Jimmy Walter

Jimmy Walter has increased the prize to $1M.
<http://reopen911.org/>

Yet still no one has claimed the prize. If the official story is so simple, why not? If one can simply enter the information into a computer simulator and watch the buildings go down why haven't they?

To answer your question, why can't Jimmy Walter pay his engineers to tell him how the buildings collapsed? The answer is this, Fima shipped all the evidence (Steel can be examined to see why it broke, eg. pressure, explosives, heat etc) to china to be recycled as soon as possible. The government concealed the evidence and then told the media who was to blame, without letting an independent investigation take place.

Of WT7 the commission had this to say:

"Loss of structural integrity was likely a result of weakening caused by fires on the 5th to 7th floors. The specifics of the fires in WTC 7 and how they caused the building to collapse remain unknown at this time. Although the total diesel fuel on the premises contained massive potential energy, the best hypothesis has only a low probability of occurrence. Further research, investigation, and analyses are needed to resolve this issue." (Chapter 5, pg 31.)

So the commission can't even speculate how WT7 collapsed (they made an attempt with building 1 & 2), yet Jimmy Walter should be able to hire engineers to do so?

Again: "the best hypothesis has only a low probability of occurrence".

As to say Jimmy Walters dislikes Republicans, I think this is a stretch. I see no evidence of this at his website at all. Most people who support the 911 truth movement believe the problem to be deeper than Republican vs. Democrat. Yet if I was to elaborate into theories on Bohemian grove and the new world order (which are speculation not fact) then I would be labeled a crazy tinfoil turban wearing conspiradroid, and none of the facts that I have put forward would be addressed.

- Molten hot iron was found at the base of the twin towers, jet fuel or office supplies don't burn hot enough to melt titanium reinforced steel, or normal steel.

- William Rodriguez, the last man to be pulled from the rubble, an eye witness and hero of September 11th reports hearing bombs going off. He even reported one blast in the basement before the first plane hit.

- Marvin Bush was head of security at the world trade center up until Sept 10th 2001, possibly allowing bombs to be planted.

- The list goes on check out Physics911.org infowars.org 911truth.net letsroll911.org etc

Peace!

by a reader on Fri, 05/05/2006 - 14:51 | reply

anti-semitism

He's not an anti-semit, he's an anti-zionist ... that's practically the same thing as an anti-fascist ... he is not anti-jew, he's anti-zionism, that's a small, but leading group of Jews who have rather different beliefs than Judaism, they believe they're the chosen ones and must do anything to reach their goal, even if they have to kill "inferior" people ... it's a far-right sort of thinking ... very narrow-minded, tunnelvision like philosophy which leads to self-destruction anyway ...

by a reader on Wed, 11/08/2006 - 09:56 | reply

Too much evidence

There is far too much evidence to avoid the conclusion that other foul play, aside from the airplanes crashing into towers 1 and 2, occurred on 09/11/01. The largest single piece of evidence is the collapse of wtc7. You can find photographs of the building, with two or three small well contained office fires, no broken windows, yet the building collapsed to dust. The leaseholder said, in an interview on public television, that they decided to "pull" the building.

So, why are there, have there been, no subpoenas?

by a reader on Sat, 05/05/2007 - 22:46 | reply

Let's not call the man by the wrong name, please.

His name is Mr. Walter. Mr. Jimmy Walter.

The good man is trying in every which way to get the truth out about 9/11. His theory is beyond valid, his argument well-researched...and yet so many refuse to take him seriously. If we, his supporters, err in these most basic details, if we aren't even capable of referring to him by his given name, we risk giving those who openly insult him one more weapon: "The whole thing is foolish: his supporters don't even know his name!".

Mr. Walter is doing something incredible...let's not ruin it more than it is already being ruined.

Thank you.

by a reader on Tue, 07/17/2007 - 09:47 | reply

Government Cover-Up? More like "How Many"

Simply, if the Bush administration has nothing to hide, why are they hiding EVERYTHING. They deny, lie, obfuscate, take the fifth, fire whistleblowers, make threats. There are literally thousands of examples since 911. If they are not hiding the truth, what the hell "ARE" they doing, lying for fun and playing cat and mouse games with congress and the American people? This charades ceases to be Rep. vs. Dems. We should unite as Americans that want to protect "OUR" freedoms, "OUR" constitution, and the lives of "OUR" soldiers from those who want to exploit "ALL" of "US" for their greed, power, and agenda. The only way to win as PEOPLE is to stick together and agree to disagree on some issues, however, we all need to stay focused on the The larger picture as well. This is not the first time weve been lied to as a nation to cover up the real motive for war (see Gulf of Tonkin Resolution) initiated by LBJ however, this just might be the broadest lie ever perpetuated on our poor souls. Lets get fair, remove political bias, and ask the hard questions that remain troubling. I believe there are those people that do not want to know the truth about 911 or cannot begin to accept even the possibility of such treason and some that are just closed minded and politically hypnotized into believing they are "unpatriotic to even ask questions". I'm sure the nazi's felt the same way about their "fatherland" but look at what coward's they really turned out to be. Hmm. Homeland-Fatherland. The Nurenberg trials illuminated how disturbingly passive the masses became to atrocities. The routine acceptance of torture, police state tactics, military dominance. It is so ironic this administration fights so hard for the very freedoms it wipes out daily in the name of fighting terror. Its all so familiar. Lets lose our petty bias's, shake hands, and get together for "OUR" country's sake. United we stand, divided we fail or something like that. Not your either with us or go straight to hell or something like "that".

by Jacqueline Cloud on Sun, 08/19/2007 - 15:46 | reply

Copyright © 2007 Setting The World To Rights

The Joy Of Giving

As usual, both the people and the government of the United States have outclassed the rest of the world in the speed and scale of their response to human suffering – in this case, that caused by the tsunami in the Indian Ocean. InstaPundit notes some of this:

AMAZON.COM is accepting donations for Tsunami relief. The total is currently $112,000.00, but it's rising very rapidly.

[At the time we are writing this, Amazon.com's customers' donations stand at just under one million dollars.]

Jeff Jarvis says that Amazon is already sending more money for tsunami relief than the French government.

[...]

The Everett-based aircraft carrier USS Abraham Lincoln is headed to the Indian Ocean to help with tsunami relief efforts.

[...]

More than 5,000 military personnel of the Navy's Expeditionary Strike Group 5 will skip their New Year's holiday on Guam to fulfill a humanitarian mission in Sri Lanka.

Total US aid for the tsunami disaster is expected to run into billions of dollars.

Jan Egeland, chief of 'humanitarian aid' for the UN, described the 'rich countries'' response as 'stingy'. The US Government interpreted this as an insult to America in particular, as indeed it was intended to be.

A.E.Brain responds as follows to similar insults to another exemplary donor, Australia:

Like the War on Terror, we're all in this together. In cases like this, we don't worry about what stupid and insulting things various Malaysian government bigwigs have said about us recently, nor even whether today's victims in Aceh were slaughtering Christians and burning down Churches last week. When Mother Nature throws a tantrum, we save 'em all, and let God sort them out.

However, the country that that romps home with first prize in the no-good-deed-ever-goes-unpunished category is Israel. Within hours of the disaster, the IDF who, by sad necessity, are world leaders in disaster relief expertise and technology, put together a rescue package. It consisted of a jumbo jet containing 80 tons of food and medical supplies, plus, crucially, 150 medical and other disaster relief specialists. They were due to fly out to Sri Lanka this morning.

What happened next? Unfortunately, you will not guess, because you can't make this stuff up.

First of all, the Sri Lankan government refused permission for any Israeli relief workers to enter the country. They graciously accepted the supplies, though. So the IDF sent the supplies (who knows where they will end up?) and told the volunteers – 60 military and 90 civilian – who would have set up emergency field hospitals including surgical and pediatric units, to go back home.

The Vatican newspaper L'Osservatore Romano commented on these events:

The Vatican newspaper has denounced what it called a decision by the IDF to deny emergency help to disaster victims in Sri Lanka.

Calling for "a radical and dramatic change of perspective" among people "too often preoccupied with making war," L'Osservatore Romano singled out Israeli military leaders for declining a request for emergency medical help.

At the time of the non-existent 'Jenin massacre', L'Osservatore got equally excited about Israel's 'aggression that turns into extermination'. Israel's extraordinary humanitarian actions in the middle of a war were drowned in a tsunami of unmerited hatred.

Update: The Diplomat helpfully distinguishes US aid from UN babble.

Further Update: More Diplomatic comments on more unmerited hatred.

Yet another update – Vatican newspaper story was a 'translation error', says Catholic World News (they don't say what the error was or who made it):

Vatican, Dec. 28 (CWNews.com) - The Vatican newspaper has denounced a decision by Sri Lanka to reject emergency aid offered by the Israeli government. Sri Lanka declined the Israeli aid because it would have been furnished by a military team.

Calling for "a radical and dramatic change of perspective" among people "too often preoccupied with making war," L'Osservatore Romano chastised the government of the stricken Asian nation for putting unnecessary restrictions on an Israeli offer to furnish medical help.

And still more: The UN is a sham. Indeed. And a scam.

Wed, 12/29/2004 - 07:09 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Has anyone noticed how many a

Has anyone noticed how many articles on this site are linked back to poor hard-done-by Isreal in some way. I think this tradegy in Asia is awful and you spend the last third of the article feeling sorry for your pet country - it's disgusting!

by a reader on Wed, 12/29/2004 - 14:00 | reply

Disgust

Different people are disgusted by different things, I suppose. Idiotic, self-defeating hatred causing Sri Lanka to keep out people WHO WANT TO HELP DISASTER VICTIMS is one of the most disgusting things I have heard in a long, long time.

But I can see that, for you, the fact that the website "Setting the World to Rights" mentions Israel often, is more disgusting. Well, we all have our priorities.

by Blixia on Wed, 12/29/2004 - 17:09 | reply

Disgusting?

(I tried to edit this entry several times and it kept disappearing. If duplicates appear, I apologize.)

I don't understand this objection at all.

It would be useless to write posts that merely repeat known facts about events.

What's useful to readers is analysis of how some events relate to others; and what truths about how the world works are revealed by reactions to events.

Yes, The World is interested in Israel. It believes that opinions about Israel often expose an important, pervasive, moral problem that needs to be explored, understood, and solved.

I think that the reader who says "It's disgusting" for The World to notice, again, how unfairly Israel is regularly treated around the world only helps to support the World's point.

Gil

by Gil on Wed, 12/29/2004 - 23:07 | reply

Lileks

I notice that Lileks comments on the Sri Lanka/Israel incident, too.

He makes a good point:

It's always instructive to see what people revert back to after a tragedy, and how long it takes. But in this case it would be churlish to close the purse. There's the government, and then there's the people. No need here to punish the latter for the idiocy of the former.

Gil

by Gil on Wed, 12/29/2004 - 23:08 | reply

Not Unnoticed

It has not gone unnoticed that among the first to offer a hand to help SE Asia were Jewish service organizations in and across the United States. I applaud those selfless actions of so many. I appreciate the text of the above. It should be noted that some do not understand. It should be noted that such persons and organizations respond to great need anyway. Humanitarian aid says it all. These are people and organizations that care what happens to other human beings.

by a reader on Thu, 12/30/2004 - 22:02 | reply

Cheap Shots Abounding, UN and Nation States

The UN is neither a scam or a sham. It is toothless in its pronouncements and still a pesky thorn in every leader's side but so be it. All Nation states wish it to be toothless unless it suits their politics. When UN meddling doesn't suit their political interests, say, go away UN don't bother me.

As the UN slogan says, "Its your World". Make of it what you will.

by a reader on Sat, 01/01/2005 - 16:39 | reply

Not cheap shots

We recommend that the reader read the links we provided to The Diplomad. The allegations made there are neither cheap shots nor related to the ones s/he is countering.

by Editor on Sat, 01/01/2005 - 18:00 | reply

Diplomad is not the subject

The Editor must have misunderstood. Cheap shots are taken all the time at and between the nation states on various subjects. That is the point. Yet the current coalition of the willing includes the United States, France, United Kingdom, India, and the United Nations. That fact of willing participation is neither a sham or a scam.

by a reader on Sat, 01/01/2005 - 23:01 | reply

Islamofascist Tsunami Charity

I wonder how much the supporters and financiers of islamofascism will contribute to the relief of those suffering from the great tsunami calamity in southeast asia?

The saudi and iranian and other islamo clergy and terrorist psychopathic islamo lunatics will probably see this as a message from allah for everyone to convert to islamo lunacy.

by pilgrim on Sat, 01/01/2005 - 23:34 | reply

Democracy – Part 1: Vox Populi Vox Dei?

A widespread false idea about how democracy works can be stated concisely as Vox Populi Vox Dei (the voice of The People is the voice of God). In other words, democracy is morally right because the majority defines what is right and the government must follow the will of The People™.

But in reality The People™ does not have a will. It is a group of individuals with conflicting aims and theories about the world, and ideas for what should be done. There are countless ways of notionally aggregating those aims and ideas into a single 'will'. Not only do these ways not agree, all of them are conceptually inconsistent and paradoxical.

Those who vote Conservative in an election in which Labour wins by a landslide will accept the result. But they will hardly do so because they agree that the Labour party, or The People, are right about what would be best for the country! Nor is the majority always right: majorities can, and frequently do, vote for mistaken policies like socialism, or for evil people like Hitler.

Furthermore, The People does not write laws; politicians write laws. Nor does The People enforce laws; the Police and the Courts do that.

So what role do The People play in democracy? Democracy ought not to be about who rules whom. As Karl Popper pointed out, political philosophers should not to answer the question 'Who should rule?' This question has no answer because human beings are fallible and so there is no way of designating a person or group as being the right ones to rule others. Popper suggested that instead we ought to ask 'How can we prevent those in charge from doing too much damage?' and democracy provides the best answer yet discovered to this question. The People get to vote every four years or so and on those occasions they may throw incompetent or malicious politicians out of office if they think somebody better is available. As Pericles of Athens (an advocate of the open society) once said: "Although only a few may originate policy, we are all able to judge it."

"Popper suggested that instead we ought to ask 'How can we prevent those in charge from doing too much damage?' and democracy provides the best answer yet discovered to this question."

First, recognize the individual right of every citizen in a democracy to participate in person. This is an individual responsibility which can not be deferred to those in power as some distant and passive trust of representation.

Second, use the faculties of reason to determine competence and act accordingly as individuals, not once every four years or so.

Third, let the citizen beware and be aware.

Fourth, speak your mind in public places, consider counterarguments, and act according to your considered will to strengthen this right.

Five, recognize that Democracy is only a state of imagination unless it understood in reason, principle, and personal action and is pursued relentlessly by every citizen.

by a reader on Mon, 01/03/2005 - 15:21 | reply

Please explain

Why democracy prevent's those in charge from doing too much damage. It seems to me that a monarch, for example, has more incentive to prevent damage to his country and it's citizens than an elected official. The monarch is in essence the "owner" of the government. The elected official is on a short term lease and has many incentives to treat the land and it's citizens as, well, rental property. The elected official can always blame the previous administration for the country's problems, the monarch cannot. The elected official may need to "scapegoat" certain minorities to become popular enough to be elected. These minorities could ethnic, economic, or religious. The monarch does not need to do this to aquire power.

by a reader on Wed, 01/05/2005 - 01:02 | reply

Re: Please explain

Thanks for the question. We have answered it here.

by Editor on Mon, 01/10/2005 - 21:54 | reply

"But wait a minute, Dad; did you actually say 'Freedom?'"

The statement, "Vox populi, vox Dei," is about a great deal more than politics. Which is a lucky thing, because your politics are atrocious. Socialism is relegated to "mistaken policies?" Of course, I suppose all centralization is by nature oppressive. Nevermind

Northern European countries which shame our economic precariousness with their mixed economies, their "welfare capitalism." Who needs a budget surplus anyway? Socialist leanings are evil, regardless of the standard of living in many countries that incorporate it into that precious bastion: democracy. And let's make sure we put Socialists right next to Hitler, because that is a fair comparison.

Let's stop talking about democracy and start talking about what truly rules us: the free market. Kind of a misnomer, don't you think? How free can we be if we are all slaves to the dollar?

Allow me to quote an under-appreciated punk band that pretty much sums up my whole perspective of this site...

"So this is your Promised Land? Your deed is that gun in your hand."

by Jez on Tue, 01/25/2005 - 01:44 | reply

Pest-Powered Robots

This would be cool if it could be perfected:

British scientists are developing a robot that will generate its own power by eating flies.

The idea is to produce electricity by catching flies and digesting them in special fuel cells...

the robot is part of a drive to make "release and forget" robots that can be sent into dangerous or inhospitable areas to carry our remote industrial or military monitoring...

Even better would be a scaled-up version that eats terrorists.

Tue, 01/04/2005 - 17:20 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Balance

I'm sure some eco-fanatics will complain that machines that consume flies will upset some kind of sacred natural balance, though.

I doubt they'd have a problem with it consuming humans.

Gil

by Gil on Tue, 01/04/2005 - 20:31 | reply

Flies

Flies are one thing, those pesky little creatures with wings and big eyes that feed on carrion.

Terrorists tho all look the same on the outside like those flies. A mistake of discrimination and the wrong human gets eaten.

Efficient tho.

by a reader on Wed, 01/05/2005 - 16:19 | reply

Flypaper

Flypaper is cool too and it is already perfected. Flys flock to it because it smells sweet and stick to it because it is very very sticky.

Certainly some bright scientific group could invent terrorist paper?

by a reader on Wed, 01/05/2005 - 16:25 | reply

Flies and Flypaper

To solve the discrimination problem, they should just incorporate our handy guide into the robot's ROM.

As for terrorist flypaper, some people say that it has already been invented.

by Editor on Wed, 01/05/2005 - 18:20 | reply

Handy guide?

It's a great guide but the rules are somewhat high level, the ROM is going to have to be pretty large to hold the complex discrimination software.

A practical solution would be to strap a political philosopher onto the sensor arm of the robot. He or she would then press a button if the next encountered human is a terrorist.

I volunteer Gil for the test phase.

Please don't wave your arms around too much, Gil, or you may repel the flies :p

by Tom Robinson on Wed, 01/05/2005 - 20:33 | reply

Um...

Why would I have to be strapped to the thing?

Can't I watch video camera output remotely?

Perhaps Tom should do the testing until Beta 2 is ready.

Gil

by Gil on Wed, 01/05/2005 - 22:27 | reply

There Are Very Few Natural Disasters Nowadays

A Reasonable Man makes an excellent point about military humanitarian aid:

I seem to recall a lot of people objecting to the US invasion of Iraq by saying that while they agree that Saddam was brutal and terrible, etc., it isn't appropriate to use and risk US military forces for humanitarian missions.

[...]

I don't hear many of these people complaining of the military assets used now to help tsunami victims

[...]

I can only conclude that [they believe] that helping people hit by a natural disaster is fine, but from a murderous regime is wrong.

It seems to me that many of them honor state power, even the worst sort, because it's something they respect and would like to be held sacred so that they can more easily use it to impose their visions on others.

Indeed. But the two types of disaster are not really that different. 'Natural' disasters are, fundamentally, caused by poverty, not by the various 'acts of God' that happen to deliver the coups de grace. (Oliver Kamm gets himself tangled in some rickety theology by missing this point.) And poverty, in this day and age, is fundamentally caused by bad government.

Fri, 01/07/2005 - 18:17 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

It appears that the "Reasonable Man" and "The World" are from the "two wrongs make a right" school of ethics.

by a reader on Sat, 01/08/2005 - 13:59 | reply

Re: two wrongs

Could you tell us briefly what the two wrongs in question are?

by Editor on Sat, 01/08/2005 - 14:06 | reply

2 wrongs

they are 1) disaster 2) use of military and they do make a right.

the problem is the military isn't wrong...

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Sat, 01/08/2005 - 16:43 | reply

Does the world advocate the u

Does The World advocate the use of our military for purely humanitarian purposes?

by R on Sat, 01/08/2005 - 18:44 | reply

No Other Purpose Is Legitimate

Does The World advocate the use of our military for purely humanitarian purposes?

Yes, solely.

by Editor on Sun, 01/09/2005 - 07:29 | reply

Thanks for the link

By the way, I agree with the point about bad government/natural disaster link as well; as indicated by my earlier link to this post.

Gil (A Reasonable Man)

by Gil on Sun, 01/09/2005 - 21:30 | reply

Democracy – Part 2: The Dependent Leader

A reader asked us to explain:

Why democracy prevents those in charge from doing too much damage. It seems to me that a monarch, for example, has more incentive to prevent damage to his country and its citizens than an elected official.

But how will the monarch decide what counts as 'damage', and how it is best repaired? Rulers are often wrong. Queen Mary thought that 'damage' was measured by the number of Protestants in the country, so she had them set on fire. Prince Charles talks to plants and thinks that buried deep within each and every one of us, there is an instinctive, heart-felt awareness that provides -if we will allow it to- the most reliable guide as to whether or not our actions are really in the long term interests of our planet and all the life it supports.

Here speaks the voice of well-meaning tyranny and earnest unreason. Yet Charles' mistake is not that he wants to use intuition. For how else will the monarch – or any leader – decide when to overrule the experts, when to overrule the majority, when to overrule his advisers, and on the other hand, when to let some of those groups have their way despite his own contrary opinion? Charles' mistake is in his very conception of the problem: he conceives of it as being how to find a reliable guide, and it is implicit, as it always is with who-should-rule theories, that once we have found the reliable guide it is best to impose its judgements on everyone. How could it be otherwise?

But there is no such thing as a reliable guide. What makes the crucial difference between the possibility and impossibility of progress is not how reliable our leaders are, but how good our institutions for removing bad leaders and bad policies are. A key feature of good institutions is that under them, leaders are dependent on the people they lead. Democratic politicians are dependent on their constituents' good will for the political survival, and one mistake is sometimes enough to end a democratic politician's career. A key feature of bad institutions is that the subjects are dependent on the ruler: they are kept at the mercy of whatever intuitions, good or bad, he may suck out of who knows where, and after they have paid for his mistakes, they are obliged to do whatever he says all over again.

The monarch is in essence the "owner" of the government. The elected official is on a short term lease and has many incentives to treat the land and its citizens as, well, rental property.

The analogy does not hold. Neither being a monarch nor being an owner gives one automatic knowledge of how to serve one's own best interests, let alone the country's. In a free society, owners who ruin their property, gradually cease to be owners of anything. But monarchs who ruin their countries still get to rule poor countries (which generally does not affect their own standard of living at all). And if they just don't know what to do for the best, having an 'incentive to treat people well' won't help. After all, everyone has an incentive to become a billionaire, but few know how.

A king cannot live among his people. He will have held a position of power before his ascension to the throne. He will have shared the king's tribute and been complicit in his crimes. As such, he will want to avoid being removed from his throne and demoted to the level of an ordinary person for fear of retribution. When a democratic politician retires from public office he usually stays in the country he formerly helped to govern. As such, he will want to ensure that when he leaves office he can earn a living on the free market.

The elected official can always blame the previous administration for the country's problems, the monarch cannot.

That's a feature, not a bug. A democratic politician gets into office by convincing people that previous policies caused problems that he can fix. People will vote him out of office if they think that explanation has not panned out. A monarch never has to face this issue as he cannot be removed from power when he makes mistakes. Democratic politicians are accountable for their mistakes, monarchs are not.

The elected official may need to "scapegoat" certain minorities to become popular enough to be elected. These minorities could be ethnic, economic, or religious. The monarch does not need to do this to acquire power.

This assumes that the monarch does not have to exert much effort to stay in power. In fact, a monarch has to work hard to stay in power because the only way of removing him is to kill him. Since he justifies his power by saying that his policies are right, he must blame other people for not following these policies. As such, he has an incentive to find scapegoats he can sacrifice to appease his subjects' anger. Furthermore, his family and friends have everything to gain by orchestrating his death and they too are gangsters and thugs. So, as history shows, destructive civil wars are common in monarchies.

Nobody has a monopoly on wisdom, so monarchs can only maintain power by murdering people who have better ideas. In this respect, monarchy is no different from any other form of tyranny and is just as evil.

Mon, 01/10/2005 - 08:49 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Wow good response.

Worth the wait.

by Blixa on Mon, 01/10/2005 - 22:37 | reply

Niceness

A democratic politician gets into office by convincing people that previous policies caused problems that he can fix.

True, but many people seem to vote according to whether they think democrats or republicans are nicer people, and more specifically, whether one presidential candidate is nicer than the other.

The approach isn't without merit. If you don't understand much about policy then at least vote for a politician who is a good person, so that they will hopefully do the right thing in office.

David Blunkett, a former minister in the Labour Government here in the UK, left the cabinet as a result of mistakes made in his private life. In the eyes of most ordinary people these made him a bad person, and therefore not suitable for office.

A more knowledgeable electorate would have insisted on his departure much sooner for his centralizing and authoritarian policy initiatives.

by Tom Robinson on Tue, 01/11/2005 - 00:02 | reply

True but

"niceness" will probably tend to be a factor in inverse proportion to whether either of the candidates has a serious record of mistakes that the public perceives to be worthy of correction/punishment. If "niceness" is a significant factor this just means there aren't serious mistakes to punish in that particular election. When there are, "niceness" isn't - so this feature of democracies remains.

Jimmy Carter for example was and is widely perceived as very "nice".

by Blixa on Tue, 01/11/2005 - 00:33 | reply

Re: True but

Agree without reservation.

Btw, the "niceness" quotient is calculated from the sort of theories that apply commonly in family relationships and IRL friendships.

Part of socialists' appeal is their aspiration to scale up these theories to govern interactions between millions of strangers -- war, agriculture, healthcare, etc.

by Tom Robinson on Tue, 01/11/2005 - 01:46 | reply

Contradiction:

The editor states: "But monarchs who ruin their countries still get to rule poor countries"

Yet in a following paragraph states: "In fact, a monarch has to work hard to stay in power because the only way of removing him is to kill him.....As such, he has an incentive to find scapegoats he can sacrifice to appease his subjects' anger. Furthermore, his family and friends have everything to gain by orchestrating his death and they too are gangsters and thugs."

On the one hand the editor is saying: "Monarchs are not held accountable for their actions." and on the other hand saying: "The monarch's subjects, friends and family will hold him accountable for his actions"

by a reader on Tue, 01/11/2005 - 02:43 | reply

uhh

No, he was saying monarchs who ruin their countries, still get to rule poor countries. This means if they have bad policies that make it a crappy place to live, they still get to rule. All they have to do is not get killed, or thrown out or somesuch. if they ruin the economy, say, they still get to rule.

btw awesome post :)

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 01/11/2005 - 05:22 | reply

Re: Contradiction

All rulers want to get their way, which usually means staying in power. All rulers try hard to do so. All rulers are removed if they play their cards wrong. In these respects, tyrants and democratic leaders are alike, and open societies and fear societies are alike too.

The difference lies in where a leader's creativity and effort have to be directed – what problems a leader has to solve, and what a leader has do, to get his way. In a fear society, a leader gets into power by killing the previous leader, and/or by killing or intimidating all others who might wish to step into the dead leader's shoes. In an open society, a leader gets into power by persuading people that he has better policies than the old leader. In a fear society, the leader stays in power by creating a climate in which people are afraid to criticise his policies because if they do, they risk being hurt or killed. In an open society, a leader stays in power by persuading people that his policies are right.

Even more fundamental than these differences is that in an open society the creativity of both the leader and his rivals goes into creating knowledge that people will voluntarily agree with, while in a fear society the leader's creativity goes into suppressing knowledge and creating fear and suffering, while his opponents' creativity is either suppressed or goes into schemes to remove him by force.

by David Deutsch on Tue, 01/11/2005 - 11:13 | reply

Monarchy, democracy, aristocracy

Hans Hoppe wrote a book (Democracy, the God that failed) with these ideas that somehow a king will rule a country better than a democracy because a king has an incentive to maximize "his" country's value. True, to be sure. But maximizing a country's value to the king as an individual means maximizing taxes, maximizing his power over his subjects to benefit his ego, expending his subjects' lives so as to gain prestige in wars of conquest, etc. So Hoppe got it all backwards, since it's obvious that a king's motives will tend to be diametrically opposed to those of his subjects, precisely because he'll act as an owner so as to increase his own personal value he gets out of his subjects - unless the king happens to be a benevolent dictator, which indeed sometimes happens.

Furthermore, Hoppe could have been spared this mistake had he simply looked at history and the current world, which is full of examples of despotic oppressive kings and dictators far worse than any democracy.

That said, Hoppe is still right that democracy is a particularly bad system, though not as bad as absolute monarchy. A limited elitist form of democracy is actually much better than full democracy, as history clearly shows.

The Netherlands, for example, has been a "democracy" since 1848. But in the 19th century democracy meant only that men paying a minimum amount of taxes were allowed to vote. In that period only 10% of the populace was eligible to vote. And indeed it worked pretty well, with a relatively high degree of freedom and economic growth. After they increased suffrage to 100% around 1900 bad things started to happen almost immediately. Government slowly grew more oppressive and large and regulatory, and eventually that culminated in a giganticly inefficient welfare state, as it did in all other Western countries which all moved toward full democracy in a similar way.

The reason for this is not hard to understand. If you allow only an intelligent elite to rule, you'll tend get reasonably intelligent policy, as long as there are enough of them who care about justice rather than oppression of other groups - which is usually the case. If you allow people of an average IQ of 100 to vote, you'll get reasonably stupid policy - since the average person is, unfortunately, not very insightful about politics and economics - and mostly just interested in getting more personal benefits.

The British parliamentary monarchy of the centuries before the 20th century and the Dutch elitist republic of the 17th century are more examples of aristocracies which did quite well, and had much better policies than our current democracies can deliver.

Yes, a system which allows criticism of bad policies is important. But the criticism is only half of the equation. There has to be a mechanism where good criticism tends to win over bad criticism. That works extremely poorly in full democracy. The mechanism is there to some extent, but it functions very badly and very slowly, simply because democracy by definition gives the power to judge the criticism to the average person rather than the wisest person.

There's plenty of good criticism of bad policy, but the bad policy continues because the stupid are very slow to accept it, and they've got the majority vote. Ludwig von Mises explained in 1922 that socialism wouldn't work, Hayek explained in the early 40s that the welfare state would lead to inefficiency and a loss of freedom. The criticism has always been there, it was never refuted, but only now is a change starting for the better, a change which might take another 50 years to get fully implemented.

So ordering political systems from worst to best I'd say this is the list:

1. absolute dictatorship / absolute monarchy (no mechanism for criticism)
2. full democracy (a good mechanism for criticism, but a very poor mechanism for processing the criticism)
3. parliamentary monarchy / elitist republic / very limited democracy / any other type of aristocracy (both a good mechanism for criticism and a good mechanism for processing the criticism)

Of course on 4 I'd put anarcho-kapitalism, but that's another story.

Henry Sturman

by Henry Sturman on Tue, 01/11/2005 - 23:30 | reply

Re: Fear

Monarchies and democracies both use fear, though the objects of the fear may differ. The leaders in democracies prey upon the fears of their constituents. "The Republicans will gut social security!" "The Democrats are corrupting the institution of marriage!" Fear.

I think leaders in democracies are good at creating consensus, not knowledge e.g: "wage and price controls will stop inflation" or "drug interdiction will stop drug abuse".

by a reader on Wed, 01/12/2005 - 05:06 | reply

Thanks

That was a great post.

AIS

by a reader on Thu, 01/13/2005 - 09:47 | reply

Re: Monarchy, democracy, aristocracy

But is it really true that an intelligent elite would choose better policies? If the last US election had been left to university professors to decide, Kerry would have won by a landslide.

If the last US election had been decided by who put up the most money, then again, Kerry would have won.

Isn't the idea of an elite electorate just another scheme for finding a 'reliable guide'? Isn't it just another 'who should rule' fallacy?

by a reader on Thu, 01/13/2005 - 12:07 | reply

Re: Fear

A reader wrote:

'Monarchies and democracies both use fear, though the objects of the fear may differ. The leaders in democracies prey upon the fears of their constituents. "The Republicans will gut social security!" "The Democrats are corrupting the institution of marriage!" Fear.'

They say that their opponents are backing policies that will have bad consequences. This is rather different from persecuting, torturing or murdering people who disagree with the government.

'I think leaders in democracies are good at creating consensus, not knowledge e.g: "wage and price controls will stop inflation" or "drug interdiction will stop drug abuse".'

On those particular issues, most politicians have not created much worthwhile knowledge. However, two exceptions to this rule spring to mind: Margaret Thatcher and Ronald Reagan, who created some practical knowledge about how to switch from socialism to a free market. The prevailing worldview in the West is soaked through with scientific nonsense and leftist cant and politicians are mostly just as ignorant and uncritical as most of the rest of the public. This is not praiseworthy, but it's not solely the politicians who are to blame.

by Alan Forrester on Fri, 01/14/2005 - 03:09 | reply

But is it really true that an

But is it really true that an intelligent elite would choose better policies? If the last US election had been left to university professors to decide, Kerry would have won by a landslide.

It depends on who the elite is. An elite of university professors or journalists would have done worse in this case, indeed. But there are other collections of elites who might have done better. An elite based on who pays most taxes might have done better. It's just my impression based on history and logic that generally intelligent elites will do better in decision making than full democracies. But it's not something I can prove, nor is it something I expect to be valid all the time.

Certainly if there is an elite which rules, it has to be an open community of elites, with membership based on some type of accomplishment, and with open debate. Something like a communist elite, for example, where your membership depends on full loyalty to the dictatorship or party, obviously works much worse than democracy.

If the last US election had been decided by who put up the most money, then again, Kerry would have won.

Not necessarily. If that were the rule, many more people would have put in money, and there's no telling who would have won under such conditions.

Isn't the idea of an elite electorate just another scheme for finding a 'reliable guide'? Isn't it just another 'who should rule' fallacy?

Yes, sure. It would be even better to get rid of politics altogether, and leave everything to the market. The market is the perfect process for testing ideas. Many companies or communities can all experiment with different policies or products or whatever, and competition will make the best ideas win.

Henry Sturman

by Henry Sturman on Fri, 01/14/2005 - 16:44 | reply

The Memos Are Fakes!

Here's an extremely apposite cartoon from the always excellent Cox & Forkum, on the occasion of the publication of the independent report into the Rathergate scandal.

Wed, 01/12/2005 - 21:38 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Democracy – Part 3: Mediocracy

The idea that the majority is always right, or that the majority defines rightness, is a meme which has contributed to the spread and legitimisation of democratic institutions. Nevertheless, as we have argued, it is a false idea and a mistaken justification. Despite its historically progressive role, it has also had, and continues to have, a destructive effect on political and moral discussion in the West.

New ideas always start out being held by a minority. Hence this meme automatically demonises new ideas. For example, we think the forcing children to go to school against their will is wrong. Most people still do not agree with us in this matter. The majority-is-right meme has the effect that anyone who challenges this form of coercion is challenging the democratic principle itself. And worse: since the majority is right, and in consequence has the right to rule, there is a ready-made argument that they ought to take control and suppress home education. Otherwise (for instance) weird extremists will allow their children to run around in ignorance rather than forcing them to go to school.

And so it is in every case when something better is proposed. The meme authorises, and then by the same logic mandates, the rule of the mediocre: — mediocracy.

The meme even makes it difficult to state criticisms of prevailing views without being misinterpreted. For example, if we say “Anti-semitism is rife in Europe.”, how will people interpret this statement? The principle that the majority is always right allows only interpretations like:

- the Nazis are about to come to power, or
- a tiny minority are playing up again, or
- The World’s writers are paranoid slanderers of The European People.

Yet it is possible, without any of those things being true, to hold the opinion that a large number of nice, non-Nazi people give credence to ludicrous conspiracy theories in which Jews play a large part. The idea that the majority is always right makes this suggestion almost literally unthinkable to many.

And no, we are not advocating that Europeans be deprived of the right to vote.

Sun, 01/16/2005 - 13:00 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

How to change the majority opinion

The majority is right meme demonises new ideas

Yes, most especially new moral ideas.

However, the meme has almost zero effect on new consumer product ideas especially in sexy areas like mobile information technology.

In order to bring about moral climate change perhaps the key is to identify small economic steps which take us closer to the point where the majority moral opinion may tip over.

For example, how do we best promote choice between school and home education?

One idea: by creating business plans for an asynchronous internet exam and qualification system.

A company creates links over the internet between examiners, academics, students and a dynamic knowledge base of problems and tasks. Students can be examined in private booths equipped with large screens and broadband connections. Multiple choice, written paragraph style answers, sketches and diagrams, oral questioning would all be possible. You pay a fee and take the test, which is pass-or-fail. Age, attendance record, number of previous attempts and classroom bullies would all become irrelevant. The market sorts out which qualifications are most valuable to employers and universities. Global standards emerge.

If such a thing happened parents would quickly turn against schools and syllabuses as they themselves are liberated by just-in-time knowledge and fresh opportunities. It would change the way they see education, and it would become more obvious what a poor motive for learning is boredom (the last remaining weapon in the school arsenal). Children would learn faster on the internet at home and with friends. Private tutors would spring up to assist small local groups.

The moral machinery of ideas to sanction all this (which already exists) would then be heartily embraced by the majority.

by Tom Robinson on Mon, 01/17/2005 - 06:33 | reply

Example of a good idea.

Idea: Economic Tipping Points

"In order to bring about moral climate change perhaps the key is to identify small economic steps which take us closer to the point where the majority moral opinion may tip over."

The majority moral opinion always does tip based on small and repetitive glimpses of a different order. Economic steps are visible everywhere people are affected by them. If something which on the surface is neutral is perceived as good by the majority, by "goodness" the moral climate changes. While economic change is not the only view of "goodness" it is an all-pervasive one. Everyone consumes.

by a reader on Mon, 01/17/2005 - 17:14 | reply

Copyright © 2008 Setting The World To Rights

The Secular Inaugural

In President Bush's historic Second Inaugural Address, he gave an inspiring re-statement of the Bush Doctrine. Some passages contain references to God. As atheists, we nevertheless wholeheartedly support those passages, such as this crucial one [emphasis ours]:

America's vital interests and our deepest beliefs are now one. From the day of our founding, we have proclaimed that every man and woman on this earth has rights, and dignity, and matchless value, because they bear the image of the maker of heaven and earth. Across the generations, we have proclaimed the imperative of self-government, because no one is fit to be a master, and no one deserves to be a slave. Advancing these ideals is the mission that created our nation. It is the honorable achievement of our fathers. Now it is the urgent requirement of our nation's security, and the calling of our time.

That is because the appeal to the supernatural there is purely formal: the substance of the argument is relentlessly rational. As a public service, we offer the following translation of the sentence in question:

From the day of our founding, we have proclaimed that every man and woman on this earth has rights, and dignity, and matchless value, because whenever any arguments to the contrary have been subjected to rational criticism, they have invariably turned out to rely on supernatural justifications, from King Charles' divine right of kings, to Hegel's divinity of the State, to Rousseau's 'infallibility of the general will'. Of all the regulatory principles ever proposed for human affairs, only our doctrine of the rights and value of each individual passes that cold test of reason. Furthermore, only political programmes that give effect to that doctrine have ever created institutions and policies that allow themselves to be subjected to a test of reason at all. And only they have ever created a community of nations among whom war is unknown.

We modestly hope that our version is more precise. On the other hand, it is longer and, we have to admit, less punchy. There is room for both.

God bless America.

Fri, 01/21/2005 - 11:15 | permalink

Devil in the Details

I would like to second The World's endorsement of the strategic vision outlined in the President's inaugural address. I also think appropriate the understanding shown in connection with the President's references to the supernatural. In this spirit, I want to point out that the "devil" is in the details. His strategic vision, however correct, will succeed more or less quickly and effectively, depending on the tactics that are adopted in connection with its implementation. As I mentioned in a post back on November 21, 2004, the problems to be faced are "complicated, the variables numerous, and there is a real difference between strategy and tactics." There is nothing wrong (in fact, everything is right) with a healthy debate regarding how we are to achieve our mutually agreed goals.

by Michael Bacon on Fri, 01/21/2005 - 15:29 | reply

justification not needed

I think you should just say: he says the image of maker thing is his reason. He is wrong. And it doesn't really matter. He does not need any 'because' statement at all. You can just delete the bold phrase and not replace it. Don't try to put justification in.

Nothing ever wins when you concede it needs some kind of justification, and try to give it. for example the version you give .. you used a partial list of rivals!! come on, that can't be a very solid argument. you can come to all sorts of conclusions by giving a partial list of opposing views that are bad, then concluding you are right. and you didn't even refute the ones you mentioned.

and not all the theories to the contrary are supernatural. for example my conjecture about the justified authority of people who like bright lamps.

Michael Bacon: uhh, yeah sure. as long as this isn't a bad excuse to go "oh my god, iraq is such a mess!!" (it's unclear what your point is, and that's the normal one.)

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Fri, 01/21/2005 - 16:37 | reply

My Point

My point, Elliot, is that too often the hard questions are avoided, while emphasis is placed on the quick, grand theoretical (albeit correct) construct, particularly where there already is relative agreement with respect to philosophy and overall goals. Regarding Iraq, I partially addressed this in my November 21, 2004 post, which I won't repeat, other than to say (i) our strategic goal is replacing all political systems that perpetuate or collaborate with terrorism with systems that respect human rights; (ii) the main reason to choose to liberate Iraq in 2003 was tactical; and (iii) there were other tactical choices possible (made) that could (did) result in better (worse) outcomes -- although it is impossible (given our current level of knowledge) to know with what frequency. My conclusion was that in the world in which we now find ourselves " . . . choosing to cut and run in Iraq, does not seem to point to any favorable strategic outcome." Nothing has occurred in the interim to change my thinking in this regard.

by Michael Bacon on Fri, 01/21/2005 - 17:16 | reply

Sorry, No

I agree with Elliot that the statement would have been better with the bold text removed entirely. It's simply a false justification.

And although I agree with your "translation", I think it does not reflect what Bush meant to say. I suspect that if you asked him, he would agree with me on this point.

He meant to say what he said, and it's wrong. It serves some purposes, but truth and understanding aren't among them.

Gil

by Gil on Fri, 01/21/2005 - 17:48 | reply

And although I agree with you

And although I agree with your "translation", I think it does not reflect what Bush meant to say. I suspect that if you asked him, he would agree with me on this point.

Good point. The "translation" is really just an alternative phrasing/argument to appeal to a different set of people.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Fri, 01/21/2005 - 18:55 | reply

what kind of atheist are you?

what kind of atheist are you? do you really believe bush meant that in some kind of "supernatural" or spiritual way?

don't you think, just by example of his stated beliefs, he means it in some nasty christian way, where he wants to strip gays of their rights, females of their abortion rights, and the world of their right to research stem cells?

how can you think he has the rights of these people in his mind while he has completely disregarded the rights of those domestically?

by a reader on Fri, 01/21/2005 - 23:15 | reply

What Bush Intended

President Bush clearly believes, and intended to say, that he derives his justification for the Bush Doctrine at least in part from the passage in Genesis 1:26-7 in the Bible:

And God said, Let us make man in our image, after our likeness: and let them have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over the cattle, and over all the earth, and over every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth.

So God created man in his own image, in the image of God created he him; male and female created he them.

However, equally clearly, he did not in fact derive it from there. For it does not, in fact, follow. Moreover, most people who claim to have derived their political principles from the Bible – including the Pope and the leaders and foremost theologians of most Christian sects as well as the great majority of professed Christians outside the US – oppose the Bush Doctrine. Bush himself vehemently opposed it before 9-11. Calling it a religious doctrine or attributing religious content to it is absolutely absurd, notwithstanding the shared opinion of Bush and most of his enemies such as 'a reader' above.

The actual justification of the Bush Doctrine, both in Bush's mind and in the minds of virtually all of its supporters, is that the existing world order has permitted a terrible and rapidly escalating danger to emerge – forced to our attention by 9-11 – and that the only available defence is the complete abolition of certain types of tyranny. Bush said that explicitly in his Second Inaugural Address, and in every one of his speeches on the subject.

by Editor on Sat, 01/22/2005 - 11:57 | reply

So, what's the point of this post?

Please help me understand.

On one hand you "wholeheartedly endorse" the passage, and even bolded the phrase that you now admit is an absurd justification even though it was worded as a justification.

So, why not say that that it was an unfortunate blemish on an otherwise good passage, rather than giving a completely different "translation"?

Gil

Re: So, what's the point of this post?

Suppose we need to build a bridge across the Great Chasm. We put the job out to tender. All but one of the engineers who apply say that there is no need for a bridge because one can get across just by flapping one's arms hard enough, taking a long enough running jump, and suchlike expedients. Where they mention their previous chasm-crossing failures at all, they attribute them to things like: not enough money was spent on research into flapping techniques; The Jews diluted the glue holding the feathers on the wings; building the bridge is all about oil; and there wouldn't be a chasm at all if we hadn't offended the Earth Goddess.

But one engineer delivers a different kind of report. It explains why previous chasm-crossing ideas will not work: they violate Newton's laws; they depend on impossibly strong materials; and so on. And at the end of the report, it says: "and so we have no option but to use a bridge, and to use our particular design. That it will work despite the fact that no bridge of this design has ever been attempted before, and that none of the rival proposals can possibly work, is implied by the laws of physics which are not only agreed by all rational people, but ordained by the Creator of Heaven and Earth".

There is no flaw that tender, nor with the justification that it gives for its proposal. That fact that it happens to mention that the authors hold a false metaphysical belief does not constitute such a flaw because it is no part of their argument. They say that it is, but they are mistaken, and the mistake – serious in some contexts – is completely harmless in this one.

by David Deutsch on Sun, 01/23/2005 - 14:13 | reply

yeah but

I think Editor and David Deutsch explain well in comments, but that the original post was less good.

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Sun, 01/23/2005 - 17:01 | reply

Secular?

Look, you wrote a post called "The Secular Inaugural".

You admit that it includes a mistaken non-secular phrase.

I think it's good that we can overlook the religious part and see that the rest contains a powerful, and valid statement. But we should not go further and pretend that that makes the entire passage secular.

I think it would have been an even better statement without that phrase; just as I think the Declaration of Independence would have been even better without "Nature's God", "Endowed by their Creator", "Divine Providence" and any such other theological references that I may have forgotten.

Bush and his speech writers make some excellent statements. But when they make mistakes I think it's better to recognize them than to pretend that every aspect of every message is perfect and worthy of adulation. Doing the latter is obviously wrong, and reduces the credibility of those who praise the genuinely good aspects of the message.

Gil

by Gil on Sun, 01/23/2005 - 22:12 | reply

Maybe the title, "The Secular

Maybe the title, "The Secular Inaugural", means the argument in the Inaugural was secular.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Sun, 01/23/2005 - 22:49 | reply

Re: Secular

Well, the winning engineer in my example mentioned Newton's laws as well as God. Newton's laws are false: there is no such thing in reality as a 'gravitational force'. So the tender appealed for justification to at least two non-existent entities, not just one. Both are serious errors in some contexts. Both are harmless in the stated context. Why shouldn't we take the same attitude towards both?

by David Deutsch on Mon, 01/24/2005 - 00:15 | reply

harmless because

In the stated context the remarks are harmless. It might well have included some good words about the blessings of UFOs upon the land but then some might have thought that the President's speechwriter has a screw loose.

Remarks in inaugural addresses are always included for a reason, especially when a phrase includes the word, 'because'. Such remarks do not appear in inaugural addresses by accident and are intended to be heard. I do not know the reason for including the metaphysical reference in the inaugural address but there is one and it is likely more than the stating of a fond sentiment or an oath such as "by Jove's britches".

The larger context of meaning is often broader than the stated context. It is worthwhile to note that point so I am.

by a reader on Mon, 01/24/2005 - 02:44 | reply

Against moral relativism

Well, to use David's example, suppose another set of rival plans for crossing the bridge was that over that particular chasm the fundamental laws of physics themselves are different from where we are standing, so that there if you just walk over it on air while doing some strange symbolic rituals with your fingers you won't fall down, but if you did the same thing around here you will fall. Then the remark about the "laws...ordained by the creator of heaven and earth" could be a poetic way of insisting on the fact that the laws of physics are by definition universal and shouldn't change from one chasm to the other. Seeing it this way the remark would have been there for a reason, despite the literal meta-physical nature of the allegory.

AIS

by a reader on Mon, 01/24/2005 - 07:00 | reply

Re: Against moral relativism

Yes, exactly.

by David Deutsch on Mon, 01/24/2005 - 11:21 | reply

OK

I agree that the statement could be interpreted to mean that human nature is universal enough that rights apply to all people; and that this would have been a reasonable thing to add, since it segues nicely into "no one is fit to be a master, and no one deserves to be a slave."

I still maintain that, even if that was the intent, it could have been conveyed much better.

I note, also, that The World did not seem to take that interpretation when it attempted to "translate" that sentence; so even the most generous listeners were likely to misinterpret the phrase.

Gil

by Gil on Mon, 01/24/2005 - 17:14 | reply

Re: OK

Gil said:

I note, also, that The World did not seem to take that interpretation when it attempted to "translate" that sentence; so even the most generous listeners were likely to misinterpret the phrase

Touché.

by Editor on Mon, 01/24/2005 - 17:35 | reply

Why The Words Were There

The words were in the speech for at least two reasons: Bush believes them, but even if he didn't, these words or others like them would have been included to rally the many US citizens who generally believe in such things, in order to actually build the bridge across the great chasm. In the original post, The World asserted that "[s]ome passages contain references to God. As atheists, we nevertheless wholeheartedly support them". I agreed with that assertion, but not because I can establish a justification along the lines of the "laws of physics are by definition universal and shouldn't change form one chasm to the other," or that "human nature is universal enough that rights apply to all people." Each of the alternatives (including removing the offending language altogether) that have been suggested are more scientific and more correct – but none would have been better in the speech. The harm done (and I think that any deviation from the truth results in some harm), is outweighed by the good that flows from clarity regarding the overall strategic issue and the political acumen necessary to understand how to effectively wage the war on terror in the real world. It's a trade off that we will often need to accept as we work together with allies of various stripes to achieve our goals.

by Michael Bacon on Mon, 01/24/2005 - 21:10 | reply

Well...

I agree that the words were there both because Bush believes (and likes saying) things like that, and for strategic political reasons. But I think both of these could have been satisfied with more conventional stuff like "Our prayers are with them" and "God Bless America".

When famed Reagan speechwriter Peggy Noonan writes an article entitled "Way Too Much God", I think it's fair to conclude that it probably went too far.

Gil

by Gil on Tue, 01/25/2005 - 02:47 | reply

The Words

Gil,

I think your last post is a very fruitful way of approaching the issue. Is there a qualitative difference between the words used by Bush and "Our prayers are with them" or "God Bless America"? I don't believe so. Nevertheless, whether the words were optimal is another matter. I agree that Peggy Noonan's response is informative in this regard. That Bush may have gone too far is a reasonable conclusion.

by Michael Bacon on Tue, 01/25/2005 - 15:03 | reply

Differences

Michael,

It's difficult to say with precision, but I think that listeners to speeches like this have grown accustomed to phrases such as the ones I mentioned, and have learned to accept that they are "purely formal" and "completely harmless".

But, it seems the Bush went further than this and injected many more references into the substance of his arguments. It seems that he was intentionally pushing the religious content so that it is made qualitatively different from conventional use. He seems to have wanted to make it difficult to overlook.

He succeeded. And it's a disappointment (to people like me).

Gil

by Gil on Tue, 01/25/2005 - 16:28 | reply

Perhaps

Gil,

Perhaps you're right. The very fact that people have become accustomed to such phrases might, in the mind of a speech writer, or Bush himself, argue for an escalation in rhetoric sufficient to impress those have become blasé. Perhaps Noonan's response is best understood as disappointment that the language wasn't in fact more conventional. However, I wasn't that disappointed, but perhaps that's because I had lower expectations regarding what he would say.

by Michael Bacon on Tue, 01/25/2005 - 17:04 | reply

abortion

whatever

by a reader on Fri, 04/22/2005 - 09:58 | reply

Letting Theories Die Instead of People

This article is posted as part of the January 27, 2005, BlogBurst, to commemorate the liberation of the Auschwitz death camp, sixty years ago, on January 27, 1945.

January 20th was the anniversary of the 1942 Wannsee Conference, in the course of which the Nazi hierarchy formalised Hitler's plan to annihilate the Jewish people. Understanding the horrors of Auschwitz requires that one be aware of the premeditated mass murder that was presented at Wannsee.

Highlighting these events now is important. Even as the press reports that 45% of Britons have never heard of Auschwitz, a group of 500 Russian intellectuals, including 19 members of Parliament, marked the anniversary with an open letter linking Judaism to ritual murder, and calling on the authorities to close down Jewish organisations across Russia. The Muslim Council of Britain, representing 350 Muslim organisations, is boycotting the official commemoration because it makes no reference to the "holocaust of the Palestinian intifada". A British Muslim MP has opposed the boycott, saying "if people are boycotting this then I think it's a mistake. People who were exterminated in the Holocaust were not just Jews".

The World's tiny contribution is to write about a key difference between the Nazis and the West: their view of the best way to change the world.

As a result of an antisemitic conspiracy theory, the Nazis saw The Jews as their enemy. Their response to this perceived problem was to kill all Jews. In addition to antisemitism, this policy also implemented two other fundamental principles of Nazism: that there are no individuals, only groups; and that differences between groups can be resolved only by violence. Thus they embarked, collectively, upon the mass murder known as the Holocaust. Nevertheless, each of the murderers committed murder individually, and each of the victims suffered it individually.

When the Allies liberated the few surviving Jews of Europe in 1945, including some in Auschwitz itself, Allied governments, who were themselves largely antisemitic, weren't pleased to have about 250,000 surplus Jews on their hands. However, the Western Allies took for granted that human life is intrinsically valuable and the idea of killing those Jews did not occur to them. They recognised that there is no problem so bad that people can't fix it by spreading good ideas. Germany is a democratic country today because the Western Allies spread some of their good ideas to the Germans. And we support Israel as part of our struggle against bad ideas including the antisemitism that has survived to this day even in the open societies of the West.

Wed, 01/26/2005 - 14:22 | permalink

Only groups

"In addition to antisemitism, this policy also implemented two other fundamental principles of Nazism: that there are no individuals, only groups; and that differences between groups can be resolved only by violence."

In this statement, the World hones in on two fundamental principles that have caused and continue to cause great problems within the group we call humanity. Nazism was the worst of this thinking but not the only recent historical example of it. The principles are subtle and underpin most violent abuses of and by "groups". There is the oppositional nature of the principles which create the group ideal and the offending group other. The group ideal, named, creates a name or names for the 'other' group and then en masse sorts individuals into one or the other.

Witness, for example, the intentional starvation and extermination of nearly 8 million agrarian Russians prior to World War II. It was necessary in the eyes of Stalin in order to collectivise farms and labor to eliminate the individual peasant and his family by the will of the supreme state. In contrast to antisemitism the group other, peasant, was by transformed into the group ideal, peasant labor collectivised. Mass starvation which ensued by collective method was excused as incidental.

Hundreds of examples of this thinking exist, but it is sufficient here to name only a few. We can mention Nazism and Stalinism, to name two. The reasons stated and the specific tactics may appear different, but the impetus always comes from the same deadly principles: There are only groups. Groups rise or fall by violent dominance. The individual means nothing. Ideas must become group ideologies. Ideology is supreme over all.

by a reader on Wed, 01/26/2005 - 16:42 | reply

The Secular Inaugural

In President Bush's historic Second Inaugural Address, he gave an inspiring re-statement of the Bush Doctrine. Some passages contain references to God. As atheists, we nevertheless wholeheartedly support those passages, such as this crucial one [emphasis ours]:

America's vital interests and our deepest beliefs are now one. From the day of our founding, we have proclaimed that every man and woman on this earth has rights, and dignity, and matchless value, because they bear the image of the maker of heaven and earth. Across the generations, we have proclaimed the imperative of self-government, because no one is fit to be a master, and no one deserves to be a slave. Advancing these ideals is the mission that created our nation. It is the honorable achievement of our fathers. Now it is the urgent requirement of our nation's security, and the calling of our time.

That is because the appeal to the supernatural there is purely formal: the substance of the argument is relentlessly rational. As a public service, we offer the following translation of the sentence in question:

From the day of our founding, we have proclaimed that every man and woman on this earth has rights, and dignity, and matchless value, because whenever any arguments to the contrary have been subjected to rational criticism, they have invariably turned out to rely on supernatural justifications, from King Charles' divine right of kings, to Hegel's divinity of the State, to Rousseau's 'infallibility of the general will'. Of all the regulatory principles ever proposed for human affairs, only our doctrine of the rights and value of each individual passes that cold test of reason. Furthermore, only political programmes that give effect to that doctrine have ever created institutions and policies that allow themselves to be subjected to a test of reason at all. And only they have ever created a community of nations among whom war is unknown.

We modestly hope that our version is more precise. On the other hand, it is longer and, we have to admit, less punchy. There is room for both.

God bless America.

Fri, 01/21/2005 - 11:15 | permalink

Devil in the Details

I would like to second The World's endorsement of the strategic vision outlined in the President's inaugural address. I also think appropriate the understanding shown in connection with the President's references to the supernatural. In this spirit, I want to point out that the "devil" is in the details. His strategic vision, however correct, will succeed more or less quickly and effectively, depending on the tactics that are adopted in connection with its implementation. As I mentioned in a post back on November 21, 2004, the problems to be faced are "complicated, the variables numerous, and there is a real difference between strategy and tactics." There is nothing wrong (in fact, everything is right) with a healthy debate regarding how we are to achieve our mutually agreed goals.

by Michael Bacon on Fri, 01/21/2005 - 15:29 | reply

justification not needed

I think you should just say: he says the image of maker thing is his reason. He is wrong. And it doesn't really matter. He does not need any 'because' statement at all. You can just delete the bold phrase and not replace it. Don't try to put justification in.

Nothing ever wins when you concede it needs some kind of justification, and try to give it. for example the version you give .. you used a partial list of rivals!! come on, that can't be a very solid argument. you can come to all sorts of conclusions by giving a partial list of opposing views that are bad, then concluding you are right. and you didn't even refute the ones you mentioned.

and not all the theories to the contrary are supernatural. for example my conjecture about the justified authority of people who like bright lamps.

Michael Bacon: uhh, yeah sure. as long as this isn't a bad excuse to go "oh my god, iraq is such a mess!!" (it's unclear what your point is, and that's the normal one.)

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Fri, 01/21/2005 - 16:37 | reply

My Point

My point, Elliot, is that too often the hard questions are avoided, while emphasis is placed on the quick, grand theoretical (albeit correct) construct, particularly where there already is relative agreement with respect to philosophy and overall goals. Regarding Iraq, I partially addressed this in my November 21, 2004 post, which I won't repeat, other than to say (i) our strategic goal is replacing all political systems that perpetuate or collaborate with terrorism with systems that respect human rights; (ii) the main reason to choose to liberate Iraq in 2003 was tactical; and (iii) there were other tactical choices possible (made) that could (did) result in better (worse) outcomes -- although it is impossible (given our current level of knowledge) to know with what frequency. My conclusion was that in the world in which we now find ourselves " . . . choosing to cut and run in Iraq, does not seem to point to any favorable strategic outcome." Nothing has occurred in the interim to change my thinking in this regard.

by Michael Bacon on Fri, 01/21/2005 - 17:16 | reply

Sorry, No

I agree with Elliot that the statement would have been better with the bold text removed entirely. It's simply a false justification.

And although I agree with your "translation", I think it does not reflect what Bush meant to say. I suspect that if you asked him, he would agree with me on this point.

He meant to say what he said, and it's wrong. It serves some purposes, but truth and understanding aren't among them.

Gil

by Gil on Fri, 01/21/2005 - 17:48 | reply

And although I agree with you

And although I agree with your "translation", I think it does not reflect what Bush meant to say. I suspect that if you asked him, he would agree with me on this point.

Good point. The "translation" is really just an alternative phrasing/argument to appeal to a different set of people.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Fri, 01/21/2005 - 18:55 | reply

what kind of atheist are you?

what kind of atheist are you? do you really believe bush meant that in some kind of "supernatural" or spiritual way?

don't you think, just by example of his stated beliefs, he means it in some nasty christian way, where he wants to strip gays of their rights, females of their abortion rights, and the world of their right to research stem cells?

how can you think he has the rights of these people in his mind while he has completely disregarded the rights of those domestically?

by a reader on Fri, 01/21/2005 - 23:15 | reply

What Bush Intended

President Bush clearly believes, and intended to say, that he derives his justification for the Bush Doctrine at least in part from the passage in Genesis 1:26-7 in the Bible:

And God said, Let us make man in our image, after our likeness: and let them have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over the cattle, and over all the earth, and over every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth.

So God created man in his own image, in the image of God created he him; male and female created he them.

However, equally clearly, he did not in fact derive it from there. For it does not, in fact, follow. Moreover, most people who claim to have derived their political principles from the Bible – including the Pope and the leaders and foremost theologians of most Christian sects as well as the great majority of professed Christians outside the US – oppose the Bush Doctrine. Bush himself vehemently opposed it before 9-11. Calling it a religious doctrine or attributing religious content to it is absolutely absurd, notwithstanding the shared opinion of Bush and most of his enemies such as 'a reader' above.

The actual justification of the Bush Doctrine, both in Bush's mind and in the minds of virtually all of its supporters, is that the existing world order has permitted a terrible and rapidly escalating danger to emerge – forced to our attention by 9-11 – and that the only available defence is the complete abolition of certain types of tyranny. Bush said that explicitly in his Second Inaugural Address, and in every one of his speeches on the subject.

by Editor on Sat, 01/22/2005 - 11:57 | reply

So, what's the point of this post?

Please help me understand.

On one hand you "wholeheartedly endorse" the passage, and even bolded the phrase that you now admit is an absurd justification even though it was worded as a justification.

So, why not say that that it was an unfortunate blemish on an otherwise good passage, rather than giving a completely different "translation"?

Gil

Re: So, what's the point of this post?

Suppose we need to build a bridge across the Great Chasm. We put the job out to tender. All but one of the engineers who apply say that there is no need for a bridge because one can get across just by flapping one's arms hard enough, taking a long enough running jump, and suchlike expedients. Where they mention their previous chasm-crossing failures at all, they attribute them to things like: not enough money was spent on research into flapping techniques; The Jews diluted the glue holding the feathers on the wings; building the bridge is all about oil; and there wouldn't be a chasm at all if we hadn't offended the Earth Goddess.

But one engineer delivers a different kind of report. It explains why previous chasm-crossing ideas will not work: they violate Newton's laws; they depend on impossibly strong materials; and so on. And at the end of the report, it says: "and so we have no option but to use a bridge, and to use our particular design. That it will work despite the fact that no bridge of this design has ever been attempted before, and that none of the rival proposals can possibly work, is implied by the laws of physics which are not only agreed by all rational people, but ordained by the Creator of Heaven and Earth".

There is no flaw that tender, nor with the justification that it gives for its proposal. That fact that it happens to mention that the authors hold a false metaphysical belief does not constitute such a flaw because it is no part of their argument. They say that it is, but they are mistaken, and the mistake – serious in some contexts – is completely harmless in this one.

by David Deutsch on Sun, 01/23/2005 - 14:13 | reply

yeah but

I think Editor and David Deutsch explain well in comments, but that the original post was less good.

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Sun, 01/23/2005 - 17:01 | reply

Secular?

Look, you wrote a post called "The Secular Inaugural".

You admit that it includes a mistaken non-secular phrase.

I think it's good that we can overlook the religious part and see that the rest contains a powerful, and valid statement. But we should not go further and pretend that that makes the entire passage secular.

I think it would have been an even better statement without that phrase; just as I think the Declaration of Independence would have been even better without "Nature's God", "Endowed by their Creator", "Divine Providence" and any such other theological references that I may have forgotten.

Bush and his speech writers make some excellent statements. But when they make mistakes I think it's better to recognize them than to pretend that every aspect of every message is perfect and worthy of adulation. Doing the latter is obviously wrong, and reduces the credibility of those who praise the genuinely good aspects of the message.

Gil

by Gil on Sun, 01/23/2005 - 22:12 | reply

Maybe the title, "The Secular

Maybe the title, "The Secular Inaugural", means the argument in the Inaugural was secular.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Sun, 01/23/2005 - 22:49 | reply

Re: Secular

Well, the winning engineer in my example mentioned Newton's laws as well as God. Newton's laws are false: there is no such thing in reality as a 'gravitational force'. So the tender appealed for justification to at least two non-existent entities, not just one. Both are serious errors in some contexts. Both are harmless in the stated context. Why shouldn't we take the same attitude towards both?

by David Deutsch on Mon, 01/24/2005 - 00:15 | reply

harmless because

In the stated context the remarks are harmless. It might well have included some good words about the blessings of UFOs upon the land but then some might have thought that the President's speechwriter has a screw loose.

Remarks in inaugural addresses are always included for a reason, especially when a phrase includes the word, 'because'. Such remarks do not appear in inaugural addresses by accident and are intended to be heard. I do not know the reason for including the metaphysical reference in the inaugural address but there is one and it is likely more than the stating of a fond sentiment or an oath such as "by Jove's britches".

The larger context of meaning is often broader than the stated context. It is worthwhile to note that point so I am.

by a reader on Mon, 01/24/2005 - 02:44 | reply

Against moral relativism

Well, to use David's example, suppose another set of rival plans for crossing the bridge was that over that particular chasm the fundamental laws of physics themselves are different from where we are standing, so that there if you just walk over it on air while doing some strange symbolic rituals with your fingers you won't fall down, but if you did the same thing around here you will fall. Then the remark about the "laws...ordained by the creator of heaven and earth" could be a poetic way of insisting on the fact that the laws of physics are by definition universal and shouldn't change from one chasm to the other. Seeing it this way the remark would have been there for a reason, despite the literal meta-physical nature of the allegory.

AIS

by a reader on Mon, 01/24/2005 - 07:00 | reply

Re: Against moral relativism

Yes, exactly.

by David Deutsch on Mon, 01/24/2005 - 11:21 | reply

OK

I agree that the statement could be interpreted to mean that human nature is universal enough that rights apply to all people; and that this would have been a reasonable thing to add, since it segues nicely into "no one is fit to be a master, and no one deserves to be a slave."

I still maintain that, even if that was the intent, it could have been conveyed much better.

I note, also, that The World did not seem to take that interpretation when it attempted to "translate" that sentence; so even the most generous listeners were likely to misinterpret the phrase.

Gil

by Gil on Mon, 01/24/2005 - 17:14 | reply

Re: OK

Gil said:

I note, also, that The World did not seem to take that interpretation when it attempted to "translate" that sentence; so even the most generous listeners were likely to misinterpret the phrase

Touché.

by Editor on Mon, 01/24/2005 - 17:35 | reply

Why The Words Were There

The words were in the speech for at least two reasons: Bush believes them, but even if he didn't, these words or others like them would have been included to rally the many US citizens who generally believe in such things, in order to actually build the bridge across the great chasm. In the original post, The World asserted that "[s]ome passages contain references to God. As atheists, we nevertheless wholeheartedly support them". I agreed with that assertion, but not because I can establish a justification along the lines of the "laws of physics are by definition universal and shouldn't change form one chasm to the other," or that "human nature is universal enough that rights apply to all people." Each of the alternatives (including removing the offending language altogether) that have been suggested are more scientific and more correct – but none would have been better in the speech. The harm done (and I think that any deviation from the truth results in some harm), is outweighed by the good that flows from clarity regarding the overall strategic issue and the political acumen necessary to understand how to effectively wage the war on terror in the real world. It's a trade off that we will often need to accept as we work together with allies of various stripes to achieve our goals.

by Michael Bacon on Mon, 01/24/2005 - 21:10 | reply

Well...

I agree that the words were there both because Bush believes (and likes saying) things like that, and for strategic political reasons. But I think both of these could have been satisfied with more conventional stuff like "Our prayers are with them" and "God Bless America".

When famed Reagan speechwriter Peggy Noonan writes an article entitled "Way Too Much God", I think it's fair to conclude that it probably went too far.

Gil

by Gil on Tue, 01/25/2005 - 02:47 | reply

The Words

Gil,

I think your last post is a very fruitful way of approaching the issue. Is there a qualitative difference between the words used by Bush and "Our prayers are with them" or "God Bless America"? I don't believe so. Nevertheless, whether the words were optimal is another matter. I agree that Peggy Noonan's response is informative in this regard. That Bush may have gone too far is a reasonable conclusion.

by Michael Bacon on Tue, 01/25/2005 - 15:03 | reply

Differences

Michael,

It's difficult to say with precision, but I think that listeners to speeches like this have grown accustomed to phrases such as the ones I mentioned, and have learned to accept that they are "purely formal" and "completely harmless".

But, it seems the Bush went further than this and injected many more references into the substance of his arguments. It seems that he was intentionally pushing the religious content so that it is made qualitatively different from conventional use. He seems to have wanted to make it difficult to overlook.

He succeeded. And it's a disappointment (to people like me).

Gil

by Gil on Tue, 01/25/2005 - 16:28 | reply

Perhaps

Gil,

Perhaps you're right. The very fact that people have become accustomed to such phrases might, in the mind of a speech writer, or Bush himself, argue for an escalation in rhetoric sufficient to impress those have become blasé. Perhaps Noonan's response is best understood as disappointment that the language wasn't in fact more conventional. However, I wasn't that disappointed, but perhaps that's because I had lower expectations regarding what he would say.

by Michael Bacon on Tue, 01/25/2005 - 17:04 | reply

abortion

whatever

by a reader on Fri, 04/22/2005 - 09:58 | reply

“Let the remaining tyrants of the world learn the lesson from this day”

“Let the remaining tyrants of the world learn the lesson from this day”, say Mohammed and Omar at Iraq the Model. “No more confusion about what the people want, they have said their word and they said it loud and the world has got to respect and support the people's will”. (Read the whole thing!). Yes indeed, every one of those tyrants is feeling justifiable fear today, while every decent person shares Mohammed and Omar's sense that today is a historic turning point for Iraq and for the world.

Reuters says:

Voters, some ululating with joy, others hiding their faces in fear, cast ballots in higher-than-expected numbers in Iraq's first multi-party election in half a century.

Samir Hassan, 32, who lost his leg in a car bomb blast last year, said as he waited to vote in Baghdad: "I would have crawled here if I had to. I don't want terrorists to kill other Iraqis like they tried to kill me."

John Kerry doesn't agree with them, though. He doesn't think it's that big a deal:

Sen. John Kerry says the vote is significant, but shouldn't be “overhyped”

Meanwhile, for some reason the bad guys tried their murderous best to prevent this ‘overhyped’ event from happening:

Despite draconian security measures imposed by Iraq's U.S.-backed interim government, militants launched a string of attacks to try to torpedo the polls.

They struck mainly in Baghdad, rocking the capital with nine suicide blasts in rapid succession. The Iraqi wing of al Qaeda, led by Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, claimed responsibility.

It had declared war on the election, vowing to kill any “infidel” who voted.

John Kerry's opinion?

“It is hard to say that something is legitimate when whole portions of the country can't vote and doesn't vote.”

In other words, John Kerry finds it hard to accept the legitimacy of any election that is not approved by Abu Musab al-Zarqawi.

Update: Andrew Sullivan is euphoric. Good. Now, Andrew: why exactly is John Kerry not euphoric?

Sun, 01/30/2005 - 17:28 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Who is John Kerry?

Neither John Kerry or Andrew Sullivan have anything relevant to say. The Iraqi election speaks for itself. George Bush, Tony Blair, Vladimir Putin, Jacques Chirac, Saddam Hussein, and so on and so forth have about as much relevance to this election in their certainly to be publicized comments as the guy next door, and words mean much less than the individual millions who marched their two feet to their polling places and voted. Their votes say more than any pundit or politician. That is the way it should be.

by a reader on Sun, 01/30/2005 - 20:29 | reply

Joy

George W Bush, thank you.

by AIS on Sun, 01/30/2005 - 22:07 | reply

Appreciation

Thank you American soldiers and British soldiers and their families who made this possible regardless of political and headline rhetoric. Thank you Iraqi citizens who once free did the same.

by a reader on Mon, 01/31/2005 - 14:27 | reply

A Time Bomb

Imagine that we discover that a nuclear weapon has been hidden somewhere in one of the world's great cities. We don't know which city, or where it is hidden. We know that it is due to be set off by a timer, but we do not know when. It might be today, or it might be ten years from now. But we do know that the timer is already running.

What should be done?

The value of a great city is unimaginably large. In terms of human life. In terms of culture. And in raw economic terms. Hence the resources that it would be worth devoting to the task of preventing such a loss would be correspondingly tremendous.

This is not a hypothetical situation. It is the situation that we are actually in. With the minor difference that the weapon of mass destruction has not been planted yet. But it will be. And with the major difference that it is not just one city but all of them, because it not just a matter of nuclear weapons but biological doomsday weapons as well.

That is why one of the smartest people in the world, Britain's Astronomer Royal Sir Martin Rees, thinks that civilisation has only a fifty percent chance of surviving the twenty-first century. See his book Our Final Century.

He is dead wrong. Civilisation is going to survive. But only because the United States and its few real allies are going to achieve something that is, at present, almost inconceivable. That's why Professor Rees didn't conceive of it when he was writing his book. And they are going to achieve this in the teeth of the most frenzied opposition from everyone else in the world, including many American Conservatives, who are dead wrong too on this issue, as on many others.

For it turns out that to prevent this ultimate catastrophe, the least expensive option – again, in terms of loss of human lives and culture, and economic cost – depends, among other things, on ending certain types of tyranny everywhere in the world, and on doing so soon.

Say more. Is it testable? Can it be refined or refuted?

Part II?

by a reader on Tue, 02/01/2005 - 18:59 | reply

What Time Frame?

I think Peggy Noonan's (and others') problem with the rhetoric was that it seemed to imply that the US policy was to attempt to end tyranny immediately; and that's just not realistic. Setting false expectations causes it's own problems.

I think she agrees with the current strategy.

Gil

by Gil on Tue, 02/01/2005 - 19:03 | reply

What about the Doomsday Argument

I think you are right: civilisation will survive, and that will be in no small part due to the United States and its Allies. But one thing worries me. If civilization survives indefinitely into the future then - unlikely as it may seem - I exist among the first humans. However if civilisation dies off in the near future then in fact I exist among the mainstream of humanity. This seems the more likely of the two hypotheses. How does the World refute the Doomsday Argument?

by a reader on Wed, 02/02/2005 - 00:53 | reply

doomsday arg

uhh, well how do you prove which is more likely for you to be anyway?

also: if civ dies off soon, you lived near the very end. unlikely by your logic? but anyway, living in the very middle, or any other specific spot, would be equally "unlikely" but of course you must live at some (unlikely) time cause you do live.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 02/02/2005 - 07:14 | reply

Re: doomsday arg

-> if civ dies off soon, you lived near the very end. unlikely -> by your logic?

No, because you are forgetting that the population of Earth has grown exponentially...if civilisation dies off soonish - say at the end of this century - then of all the people that have ever existed most of them will have existed in the 20th and 21st centuries. Ergo you should expect to be born in one of these centuries.

- > but anyway, living in the very middle, or any other
- > specific spot, would be equally "unlikely" but of course
- > you must live at some (unlikely) time cause you do live

Exactly...you do live...and you live now, not in 350BC or in 1 million AD. Suppose I have two barrels, one barrel contains balls numbered 1 thro 10 and the other barrel contains balls numbered 1 thro 100000. I draw a ball from one of these barrels, but I don't tell you which barrel. The ball I drew is number 7. Given that fact, which barrel was the ball most likely to have come from? Obviously 1 thro 10, no? You are something like the 110,506,704,114 person to have existed. Given that fact, are you likely to have been born into a civilisation in which 200 billion people total will ever exist or one in which 200 trillion people will ever exist?

by a reader on Wed, 02/02/2005 - 09:23 | reply

A reader, If you are a rando

A reader,

If you are a random person from history then the doomsday theory will tell you you are living at the end of days whether you are or not. So it cannot tell you whether you are. See?

by the gob on Wed, 02/02/2005 - 10:16 | reply

Prime numbers

British Prime Minister Tony Blair sat alone in his study and worried. With nuclear proliferation, bio-terrorism, natural disasters and a host of other calamities threatening the world, did the human race have much chance or surviving even the next century?

If I am an average human, thinks Blair, then I probably live somewhere in the middle of the distribution of human lives. Afterall, it would be very unlikely for me to be particularly near the beginning or the end. But the world population has more than doubled in the last fifty years! If my life is somewhere near the middle then the human race is unlikely to survive the next century! Blair was depressed. The mathematics were flawless, the human race was doomed and there was nothing even a British Prime Minister could do to stop it.

"Wait a minute!" exclaims Blair, "What if I am an average British Prime Minister!"

There have been 50 Prime Ministers before me, lasting in total 283 years, it would be very unlikely for me to be near the beginning or the end of the distribution, so Prime Ministers will probably last nearly 300 more years.

How reassuring, thinks Blair, British Prime Ministers will probably outlive the human race.

by the gob on Wed, 02/02/2005 - 13:23 | reply

The 'Doomsday Argument' Doesn't Work

I agree with 'the gob' that the argument has no substance.

We are not chosen at random from the set of all humans, and you can prove any conclusion you like if you assume that we were.

by David Deutsch on Wed, 02/02/2005 - 23:46 | reply

Re: Well said theory

Is it testable? Can it be refined or refuted?

Yes: if civilisation is destroyed tomorrow, we are proved wrong. If policies change and civilisation survives, we are proved wrong too. And so on.

by Editor on Thu, 02/03/2005 - 00:01 | reply

Myself as a Random Person in History

David Deutsch: I understand that the explanation for why I am not a random person in history arises from the fact that in the multiverse there are an infinite number of people and an infinite number of versions of me. The problem is how to define what it is to randomly select one person/version from an infinite set. I see this...and yet...and yet it seems like the DA is being hooked on a technicality. Somehow I did get to be just one of those infinite people/versions. So my intuition is yelling out that I can consider myself to be a random sample from an infinite set. Is the infinite set problem the only objection to considering myself a random sample or are there other objections?

The Gob: Nice one, though I can see that TB becoming Prime Minister was probably not a random event: he made choices throughout his life that led him to become Prime Minister.

by a reader on Thu, 02/03/2005 - 07:45 | reply

random person

Using your logic about Prime Ministers: you being alive isn't a random event. your parents made choices throughout their lives that led to you being born.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Thu, 02/03/2005 - 16:08 | reply

Re: Well Said Theory

"For it turns out that to prevent this ultimate catastrophe, the least expensive option – again, in terms of loss of human lives and culture, and economic cost – depends, among other things, on ending certain types of tyranny everywhere in the world, and on doing so soon."

Testing and refining this would seem to be a noble purpose. I would prefer that the hypothesis that would be refuted again and again would be the doomsday one and not only soon but daily. It seems reasonable to acknowledge that there is no one doomsday to refute. Refutable doomsdays might become cumulative tho.

Replacing tyrannies large and small would be also a cumulative step in the refutative direction. Replacing them with a viable preferred alternative of a virus of useful freedoms would seem almost contagious like a contracted immunity.

The theory to be tested today is that useful freedoms are contagious as well as widely preferred to the virus of tyranny. The appropriate means by which the viruses of useful freedoms are spread from person to person and nation to nation would seem to be both testable and subject to refinement. All this would be cost effective if it is urgently and meticulously conducted as a search for the ultimate anti-doomsday truth serum.

by a reader on Thu, 02/03/2005 - 17:41 | reply

Re: random person

Yes, my parents made choices that led to me being born. But in the multiverse those same choices also led to countless other versions of myself being born. That I experience life as this version and not one of those other versions does not seem to be a result of anything my parents did.

by a reader on Fri, 02/04/2005 - 19:33 | reply

Re: random person

Yes, my parents made choices that led to me being born. But in the multiverse those same choices also led to countless other versions of myself being born. That I experience life as this version and not one of those other versions does not seem to be a result of anything my parents did.

Well there were countless versions of Tony Blair born, right?. That we have this one in particular, by your logic, isn't the result of choices?

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Fri, 02/04/2005 - 20:19 | reply

Re: Re: random person

Yes, as I said before, TB becoming Prime Minister was a result of choices he made. He can look back at his life and point to those choices and tell a story about how he became Prime Minister. Some versions of TB did not become Prime Minister, but those versions would not be contemplating the question "What if I am an average British Prime Minister".

Unlike TB as Prime Minister, I cannot tell a story about why I experience the particular version of me that I do (can you?). Certainly I can tell a story about how all the versions of me came to exist - that story involves choices made by my parents. But that is not a story of why I experience the version that is me.

by a reader on Fri, 02/04/2005 - 22:25 | reply

The set of all humans

David commented:

>We are not chosen at random from the set of all humans

If true does this also invalidate John Rawls' "Veil of Ignorance" approach to determining what a just society would look like?

by Tom Robinson on Sat, 02/05/2005 - 13:23 | reply

Veil of Ignorance

i think the point of the veil is you should design a society that is fair to everyone, not that works best for your particular type of life. ie, it just says not to be biased.

this part doesn't depend on the set of humans stuff. even if that metaphor is a good way to explain what he means.

(he also says many other things, but i believe most of the rest is silly)

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Sat, 02/05/2005 - 16:55 | reply

Why only humans?

I must assume the Doomsday Argument works for other species than human. Why would it not?

The good news from this reasoning then is that we need never worry about endangered species again. After all how likely is it really that these two Siberian Purple-Spotted Pandas are the very last of their kind....?

The bad news (and, it's pretty bad):

What if some scientists create a new strain/species of bacteria, or whatever, in a Petri dish? Say that new species is now minutes old.

Ponder the question "will this species continue on forever?"

Supposing the answer were Yes then those members of the species currently living (in the Petri dish at the moment) would be among the first of their kind, which just seems so unlikely. It's far more likely they're among the middle cohort. Therefore, we conclude (or perhaps we "induce"?) that the species is going to come to end in a period of time comparable with how long it's existed, that is to say, in mere minutes. Yet the bacteria seem to be thriving in the Petri dish, no problems in sight. So how will this happen?

Well, I can only assume that the universe will implode in order to enforce the Doomsday Argument law of physics.

Unless, of course, the scientists do the right thing and kill off the bacteria strain intentionally.

In other words, we're gonna have to not just shut down all genetic research, but put some clamps on evolution. No more new species! That's just tempting the Doomsday Argument to come back and bite us.

by Blixa on Mon, 02/07/2005 - 20:22 | reply

Wow

No wonder they call it the Doomsday Argument.

It sure is powerful!

Gil

by Gil on Tue, 02/08/2005 - 00:50 | reply

First Person Perspective

Blixa - To apply the DA, you need to consider your existence from a first person perspective. This requires that you are a conscious observer. Last I heard, bacteria are not conscious, so your argument falls flat there. But I acknowledge that at some time in the future conscious bacteria may be possible through a combination of genetic engineering and nano-tech. Suppose that, in most possible futures, zillions of these conscious bacteria exist. Do you not think it surprising that you are born as a human being and not as one of these bacteria? Or that the fact you exist as a human being in these times gives you zero information?

It is easy to make fun of the DA, but the reasons why it is wrong aren't obvious. Just Google on it to see what I mean. You will find many refutations and many refutations of the refutations. Quite likely, the correct refutation of the DA requires a multiple-universes perspective and consideration of the infinite discrete set problem.

This paper is an example of such an approach. Though I don't vouch for its correctness, the paper does illustrate that you might discover something interesting by taking the DA seriously. The Intro. contains this interesting quotation:

[Einstein] told us once: "Life is finite. Time is infinite. The probability that I am alive today is zero. In spite of this, I am now alive. Now, how is that?". None of his students had an answer. After a pause, Einstein said "Well, after the fact, one should not ask for probabilities".

by a reader on Tue, 02/08/2005 - 22:24 | reply

empathy

You seem to be saying I lack empathy. I maintain that I have the ability to put myself in the position of a member of some other species (bacteria was only an example BTW) and ponder a large number of things from their perspective. If I can sensibly wonder how "likely" it was that I was born at such and such time I don't see what prevents me from wondering the exactly analogous thing about a three-toed sloth or any other living thing.

p.s. You're really serious about all this, aren't you?? ;-)

by Blixa on Wed, 02/09/2005 - 02:07 | reply

Re: empathy

Blixa - Yes, I do take the DA seriously, but not because it is correct. I firmly believe it is wrong. However most alleged refutations do not hold up to critical scrutiny. Unfortunately that means I often end up defending the DA because I have heard most of these "refutations" before and know why they are wrong. The DA is one of those arguments that are interesting not because they are correct but because they are incorrect in rather interesting ways.

Yes, I believe you can empathize! You can apply the third person view and speculate on what some other person creature would conclude if they applied the DA to themselves. Obviously Adam would have got it all wrong. But that's probabilistic arguments for you: some people will draw the wrong conclusions. The horse that is a "dead-cert" may not in fact win. But irrespective of when the human race ends, most people who apply the DA to themselves will arrive at the "correct" conclusion. (BTW that conclusion is not nec. doom-soon because doom-soon depends on your model of how the humam population is growing - and if that model is inductivist it's probably a load of crap anyway).

Although you can empathize, I doubt you can consider what it is like to be a bacterium because there is no "what is it like" for a bacterium. They simply are not conscious/do not have a sense of existence. You may as well consider rocks and trees. That is to miss the part that consciousness and your sense of existence plays in the DA.

by a reader on Wed, 02/09/2005 - 03:30 | reply

Re: Myself as a Random Person in History

Is the infinite set problem the only objection to considering myself a random sample or are there other objections?

That wasn't actually my objection. My objection is that it is invalid to go from "most members of a certain set have property X" to "this particular member of that set probably has property X" unless you have an independent reason to believe, at least, that this particular member was chosen randomly with equal probabilities from all the members of that set.

That is to say, an actual (i.e. not imaginary) physical process tantamount to choosing must have occurred. And you must have independent (i.e. logically prior to deploying this argument) knowledge (i.e. not ignorance) of what this process was.

I am saying that the 'frequency interpretation of probability', with a finite set of instances, is a fallacy. This is over and above the fact that with a discrete, infinite set of instances, it is impossible.

by David Deutsch on Wed, 02/09/2005 - 11:45 | reply

Ok so you (DA reader) think i

Ok so you (DA reader) think it's wrong and I think it's wrong. I can apply it to some other living thing of my choosing (or, "imagine being it and applying it to my/itself" although I don't think this 'empathy' step is logically necessary) and see that in 95% of such cases the DA will produce results that are already obviously incorrect. I don't put that forth as sufficient "disproof" but still, it does kinda go along with that whole "wrong" thing that, again, you and I both agree about.

by Blixa on Wed, 02/09/2005 - 15:56 | reply

Property X

David - In the context of the Doomsday Argument, what is "property X"?

by a reader on Thu, 02/10/2005 - 00:39 | reply

Re: Property X

In the words of the 'a reader' who introduced this topic, Property X would be 'not existing among the first humans'.

by David Deutsch on Thu, 02/10/2005 - 00:59 | reply

Re: Re: Myself as a Random Person in History

I am saying that the 'frequency interpretation of probability', with a finite set of instances, is a fallacy.

I agree about the frequency interpretation, but isn't "the probability that my birth rank is R given that we hypothesize that the total number of humans is N" necessarily a subjective probability?

by a reader on Thu, 02/10/2005 - 10:11 | reply

Copyright © 2007 Setting The World To Rights

The Media's Anti-Israel Two-Step

HonestReporting describes a particularly clear, and particularly nasty, example of what it calls the "media two-step" in reporting on Israel.

Our summary of the two-step in general:

Step 0: Report only violence. Never report anything like this.

Step 1 (a): If ~~Jews~~ Israelis have committed any act of violence, imply (or report as fact) that it was motivated by pure malevolence on their part.

Step 1 (b): If ~~Jews~~ Israelis haven't committed any act of violence, report as fact an allegation that they have, and proceed as in step 1(a).

Step 2: If violence is committed against ~~Jews~~ Israelis, report as fact that its motive was retaliation for previous violence by ~~Jews~~ Israelis.

Thu, 02/03/2005 - 22:22 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

The Media Are not 'Orwellian'

Regular readers will know that we are not enamoured of the mainstream media. However, Belmont Club have gone rather too far in their excoriation of the media when they compare them to the Ministry of Truth in George Orwell's book 1984.

In 1984, Orwell describes a totalitarian society in which the state controls newspapers, books, television and all other media through the cynically named Ministry of Truth. One of the Ministry's functions is to maintain the official fiction that the Party is always right – not only by lying about the present but by changing all historical evidence. In that society the role of the media is to parrot what the dictators want them to say about both the present and the past, without paying attention to the truth.

The media in the West currently peddle a set of myths about the way the world works. Myths in which they believe. These beliefs cause them to impose certain interpretations on events and to ignore stories that tend to suggest that perhaps the world works in a different way. When they feel strongly enough, they feel obliged bend the truth – to report something other than what literally happened, in the noble cause of conveying a deeper truth to the public who would otherwise be led astray.

But, they do not have the power physically to coerce people who do not share their beliefs.

In some cases most of the media professionals happen to share the same set of prejudices as state officials and publicise these prejudices at the expense of the truth. Sometimes they even allow state officials to rewrite scripts to fit in with the government's agenda – in this case their witch hunt against drug users. However, the media can be independent of the government when they choose to be, as with their campaign of opposition to the liberation of Iraq. Nor do most of the media spin their stories in favour of George Bush's visceral and ignorant dislike of stem cell research. So the media are not simply an extension of the state, even when they behave badly.

The media do not, and cannot, censor opposing views. The likes of Thomas Szasz and free market economists can't get much time on major networks, but this has not stopped such people from propagating their ideas. Even though the media tend to stick fairly closely to a common left-of-centre, elitist ideology, they are not completely homogeneous. Fox News is more right wing than CNN and the blogosphere is becoming more important. Although they leave a lot to be desired, the media in a free society are not like the omnipresent state controlled television in 1984 in any important respect.

P.S. It doesn't help that Belmont Club link to a Holocaust-denying web site in that post, and approvingly quote from its tendentious interpretation of both Orwell and World War 2. What are they thinking of?

Mon, 02/07/2005 - 00:04 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Media Ignores?

What ever happened to good old investigative journalism? Does it cost too much and take too long to produce a good and carefully researched story? Is there a risk of libel and slander suits that scares big media off?

To ask another question, what ever happened to journalism? Is every story a simple headline and two-step of reporting the majority opinion with a insert on the direct opposite opinion? Is this balanced news reporting or is it a cop out? Does good journalism sell?

If the story can be summarized in half an hour of well edited programming can the same story be reduced to one minute and thirty seconds of editorial comment?

Is the standard question media bias or is it a broader and more complex multi-layered issue of how media-in-the-name-of ignorance sells?

What is "the media"?

by a reader on Wed, 02/09/2005 - 15:28 | reply

The Belmont Club: What are they thinking?

I think it would be useful for people to see the link you reference: http://www.ihr.org/jhr/v06/v06p--9_Bennett.html. It has been my experience that sometimes (less nowadays, but a lot when I was younger) people who take what is commonly (but not always accurately) referred to as "right wing" views, often carry a lot of baggage like anti-Semitism, racism, and the like. For example, when I was growing up, the open opposition of some to even the most modest demands of the civil rights movement, such as the right to vote, unfortunately made it harder to accept from these same people other views that turned out to be more or less correct -- such as extremely strong opposition to the tyrannical Soviet Union (clearly correct) and the war in Vietnam (in my opinion, less correct, but still analytically linked to the former). I'm afraid that the question "[w]hat are they thinking" has a rather simple answer:

they have clear and unambiguous sympathy for these ugly and incorrect views.

by Michael Bacon on Wed, 02/09/2005 - 18:22 | reply

bias

For example, when I was growing up, the open opposition of some to even the most modest demands of the civil rights movement, such as the right to vote, unfortunately made it harder to accept from these same people other views that turned out to be more or less correct

Err, but doesn't that work just as well in reverse? ie, the left has baggage too. so that makes it hard to listen to the left, too. thus it is hard to listen to anyone?

I think we should analyse ideas independent of their source -- who believes something cannot make it more or less true.

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 02/09/2005 - 22:10 | reply

WOW

For anyone who doesn't want to go look themselves, it was not just some subtle hint of holocaust denial. Read this:

The Holocaust story is repeated ad nauseam to drum up emotional support for Israel, and Zionist Jews have accurately described it as "Israel's number one propaganda weapon." Anti-Zionist Jews such as Dr. Alfred Lilienthal describe the constant Holocaust drum-beating as "holocaustomania" and point out that the Holocaust has become a kind of new religion among Jews. Jewish intellectual Noam Chomsky described Dr. Rubenstein's reactions to Professor Faurisson's claims that there were no gas chambers as the reactions of a religious fanatic. The Holocaust is so important to Zionist Jews that Professor Friedlander has said that "the Revisionist School of historians, those who say the Holocaust never existed, that it is a Jewish invention, are more worrying than countries' political positions," while Professor H. Littell has said "you can't discuss the truth of the Holocaust. That is a distortion of the concept of free speech. The United States should emulate West Germany which outlaws such exercises." Despite cogent evidence that revisionists are censored and persecuted, one so-called intellectual recently stated that it is fashionable to claim that Hitler's gas chambers did not exist.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 02/09/2005 - 22:23 | reply

What are they thinking

Would LFG put a holocaust-denier-sympathizer on their blogroll?

by a reader on Wed, 02/09/2005 - 23:10 | reply

LFG

I don't know, that is a big blogroll to look through. Why don't you tell us which blog you mean.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Thu, 02/10/2005 - 03:42 | reply

What are they thinking

I meant the Belmont Club, and I meant why would LFG continue to blogroll them if they (Belmont) sympathized with Holocaust deniers?

by a reader on Sat, 02/12/2005 - 02:52 | reply

Holocaust deniers

I agree with the World that it's not helpful that the Belmont Club links to a Holocaust-denying website. However, I disagree with the last reader that it's bad to sympathize with people who are mistaken. Any person in favor of scientific freedom and a free and open exchange of ideas should sympathize with Holocaust deniers, especially those who are persecuted and jailed in countries such as Germany and Austria, and the fact that Amnesty International does not defend those people is a scandal. Remember Voltaire's dictum: "I disapprove of what you say, but I will defend to the death your right to say it." Also remember that criticism and open debate of mainstream ideas is vital for the progress of science, even if that also means you'll see bad quality criticism from time to time. So although I do not believe the Holocaust deniers are right, I do sympathize with those of them who are well meaning and not motivated by anti-semitism.

Henry Sturman

by Henry Sturman on Sat, 02/12/2005 - 09:43 | reply

I am Curious

"...those of them [Holocaust deniers] who are well meaning and not motivated by anti-semitism"

Could you explain more? If they are not antisemitic, why do they deny the reality of Holocaust? What other reason could there be?

by AIS on Sat, 02/12/2005 - 13:38 | reply

Igf links belmont club

the belmont club is not a holocaust denier sympathiser!

to call him that, he'd need to say something approving about that part of the site.

when leftists go to a peace rally organised by commies, many of them are not commie sympathisers. there is something wrong though.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Sat, 02/12/2005 - 18:25 | reply

Re: I am curious

AIS wrote:

"...those of them [Holocaust deniers] who are well meaning and not motivated by anti-semitism"

Could you explain more? If they are not antisemitic, why do they deny the reality of Holocaust? What other reason could there be?

That they believe the Holocaust did not happen.

Henry Sturman

by Henry Sturman on Sun, 02/13/2005 - 01:10 | reply

But why?

That's my point: Why should people believe that it didn't happen in the first place?

And what would logically follow? a Jewish/Zionist conspiracy that has devised this fake history to take advantage of it. No?

What would that make of Jews/Zionists in the eyes of these people?

Aren't all that instances of antisemitism?

by AIS on Sun, 02/13/2005 - 06:46 | reply

That's my point: Why should

That's my point: Why should people believe that it didn't happen in the first place?

For their arguments you'd have to look at their sites. Many of them are honest but simply mistaken, and others are anti-semites or neo-nazis. Your mistake is that you take it for granted that the Holocaust happened. If you take the scientific view, and take nothing for granted, you'll see that there is nothing particularly strange about other people coming to a different belief about things than you do. There are many examples of people who genuinely have mistaken beliefs, such as Duesberg who does not believe HIV causes AIDS, psychiatrists who think alcoholism is a disease, politicians who think socialism is good. And we need people who question standard wisdom, because sometimes those people are right, such as the person who first said the earth is round.

That is the reason why on some level I have more respect for Holocaust deniers who understand that propositions should be based on arguments and criticism, than I have for Holocaust believers who have nothing more to say than that everybody knows it and to question it is automatically anti-semitism. It's precisely this attitude, this presentation of the Holocaust as a belief rather than as a documented fact, that encourages Holocaust deniers to be sceptical of the Holocaust. Which is a shame, because the evidence for the Holocaust is overwhelming, and this simply needs to be pointed out. And if people still are not convinced this ought to be accepted.

And what would logically follow? a Jewish/Zionist conspiracy that has devised this fake history to take advantage of it. No?

No this does not logically follow. If it is a conspiracy it need not be Jewish, it could also be Allied or war propaganda or whatever. And they might argue that it doesn't have to be an organized conspiracy; it could simply be something many people happen to believe, just as many people happen to believe in God.

What would that make of Jews/Zionists in the eyes of these people?

You see, you keep using character arguments. The question of whether the Holocaust happened is a historical question which has been settled by arguments. Whether people might be anti-semites is irrelevant to what is true and what is false.

Aren't all that instances of antisemitism?

Those Holocaust deniers who believe that it is a Jewish conspiracy are probably very often anti-semites. But even then there is no logical contradiction between believing in a Jewish conspiracy and not being an anti-semite. Compare: if I believe that JFK was murdered by a conspiracy of men, that does not imply I am a sexist.

Henry Sturman

by Henry Sturman on Sun, 02/13/2005 - 11:37 | reply

Take Nothing For Granted

Really? I suppose in some universe the holocaust never happened, but where we happen to be located, taking for granted that it did (based on the evidence) is like taking for granted the fact that the world is round and not flat (based on the evidence). I don't think it would be "scientific" at all to seriously doubt either fact or to give much credence or sympathy to those that do.

by Michael Bacon on Mon, 02/14/2005 - 21:09 | reply

Facts and Truth

I think we should make a distinction between facts and truth. What you said about scientific mentality isn't really relevant here. Holocaust was a historical fact. So saying it happened is different from proposing a theory about say a particular mechanism. Actually one way to refute theories is by experimental evidence, and although the interpretation of what an experimental result actually means is itself partly based on the existing still reliable theories (reliable in that particular case), the fact something has been observed or a change has taken place is there. There is every evidence that Holocaust did take place. There are films, photos, documents and witnesses from different nationalities and political orientation. It is a fact, why is it denied, where as many other facts of everyday life are taken for granted with much less "evidence".

As for Holocaust deniers, again let's compare it with other similar cases. There has been many genocides committed throughout human history against different groups of people, and although the perpetrators of the crime themselves usually deny the accusations like Turkey in the Armenian massacre or the Arabs right now in the case of Sudan, it is very rare for third parties, people who belong to neither side of the affair and in later times to deny so energetically and so blindly any other event with comparable magnitude. Why is the Holocaust different? That's my question.

Antisemitism is quite a common attitude in different degrees and it is not just about the "Jews" despite its own claims. Mostly it comes in mild doses among people who are otherwise normal, but it is there nevertheless. It even exists among the Jews although there the number is very limited for obvious reasons. I think it shares a lot with say anti-West or anti-Capitalist attitudes. (the latter is rampant among the Jews too which is an important point, since now the direct attack against one's ethnicity is replaced with a more subtle and abstract and less personal target.)

I don't think banning Holocaust deniers' works and speeches is a good idea either. It violates the principle of free speech and it only adds to their aura of being victims for their courageous struggle for freedom against censor. Where as refuting the evident nonsense they claim is both easy and useful for keeping the debate and the memory alive in a natural way, without falling into repetitions or cliches.

However that doesn't mean that I can feel respect for such people for even a second.

by AIS on Tue, 02/15/2005 - 02:49 | reply

Wildly Off Topic

The Media is Not Orwellian.

That was the original topic, was it not?

Though wildly interesting, I fail to understand what Holocaust deniers have to do with an Orwellian or non-Orwellian media.

Is it that "they", insert favorite crazy group, get free publicity for simply engaging in wild unsubstantiated speculation? This seems to be the fact of what happens. Crazy, inciteful stories get printed. If not, why do "they" do it?

Why does the media pick up on it? How are these strange non-events reported? What constitutes a critical mass for media reportage?

The World Ended Yesterday and Noone Has Yet Refuted It!

UPI Yesterday on Mt. Ararat a secret sect gathered to celebrate the end of the world. The sun went down, everything faded to black, and the world ended in less than one minute, said Harvey Wetbottom, PhD., spokesman for the sect. All the sect members gathered up their picnic lunches and marched down off the mountain, declaring that it was an absolute fact that the world ended yesterday. No one has so far proved otherwise although a group of scientists, The World Did Not End Coalition (WDNEC) is attempting to refute the claims of the no longer secret sect, World Ended International (WEI).

Stay tuned for late breaking news!

NOMNDS (Non-Orwellian Media News Distribution Service)

by a reader on Tue, 02/15/2005 - 16:35 | reply

Political speech and language of the Bush Administration

"War is Peace"

-George Orwell, Nineteen Eighty-Four.

"The war in Iraq is really about peace"

-George Bush, April 2003.

Many such Orwellian parallels are to be found in the political language of the Bushites. For example, consider the now-famous phrase, "Axis of Evil," which was first used by the little Bush in his January 29, 2002, State of the Union address. Bush characterized Iran, Iraq and North Korea as an "axis of evil, arming to threaten the peace of the world. By seeking weapons of mass destruction, these regimes pose a grave and growing danger..."

Coined by David Frum, the phrase "axis of evil" is actually very clever, and arguably Orwellian. The word "axis" naturally evokes memories of the "Axis Powers" of World War II (Germany, Italy, Japan, Hungary, Romania, Bulgaria) and serves to prepare the public for the acceptance of war against nations said to belong to the axis. However, there is a very important difference between the two that makes the use of the term misleading. It suggests an confederation of states that pose a significant danger because of their alliance. Iran and Iraq have been bitter adversaries for decades, and there is no collaboration at all between North Korea and the other two countries.

Obviously, Iran, Iraq and North Korea have all committed violations of human rights which may allow them to be qualified as "evil." But the singling out of three states as evil surely begs the question of why the Bush administration failed to include nations that violate human rights on a similar scale. I shall attempt to clarify what I mean by the use of a satire borrowed from SatireWire.com:

Bitter after being snubbed for membership of the "Axis of Evil," Libya, China, and Syria today announced they had formed the "Axis of Just as evil." Cuba, Sudan, and Serbia said they had teamed up to form the "Axis of Somewhat Evil" and Bulgaria, Indonesia, and Russia had established the "Axis of Not So Much Evil Really As Just Generally Disagreeable."

Jokes notwithstanding, the term has played an important role in stigmatizing countries so as to justify military action against them. The media, however, uncritically repeats the term until it becomes part of popular parlance. An odd and lamentable principle of human psychology, well known and exploited by everyone from advertisers to evil demagogues like Goebbels, holds that the strangest of lies can win credibility simply by repetition.

There is a number of similar Orwellian phrases promulgated by the Bushites. 'Pre-emptive defence' (what, as opposed to attack?), 'unlawful combatants' (as in "their not Prisoner's of War...."), and a war on an abstract noun spring to mind. As to whether the American media is Orwellian, I don't know. I suspect not. They can probably be excused of dishonesty on the grounds that before deceiving others, they have gone to great lengths to deceive themselves.

Kieren

by Kieren on Fri, 04/15/2005 - 20:27 | reply

Not POWs

Kieren protests that the Bush administration shouldn't describe people as 'unlawful combatants' rather than POWs. They are unlawful combatants, see this and this. And defence that pre-empts an attack is pre-emptive defence, I don't understand why we should look at that as Orwellian.

by Alan Forrester on Tue, 04/19/2005 - 02:02 | reply

pre-emptive defence

To call the act of attacking first, without an overt act of provocation, "pre-emptive defence" is euphemistic. The substitution of "defence" for "war" is a classic use of Orwellian doublespeak that dates back in the United States to 1947, when the Department of War was renamed the "Department of Defense."

Kieren

by a reader on Tue, 04/19/2005 - 18:51 | reply

Copyright © 2007 Setting The World To Rights

Science And Superstition

At a local school in Dover, Pennsylvania, the school board decided to teach students creationism. Their excuse for this abrogation of even the minimum of scholarly standards is a mixture of falsehood, nonsense and double talk:

“Because Darwin's Theory is a theory, it continues to be tested as new evidence is discovered. The Theory is not a fact. Gaps in the Theory exist for which there is no evidence. A theory is defined as a well-tested explanation that unifies a broad range of observations. Intelligent Design is an explanation of the origin of life that differs from Darwin's view.”

Creationism (aka “Intelligent Design”) is a worthless pseudoexplanation, the sole function of which is to resist the implications of the theory of evolution. An explanation of the origins of life must explain how complex organisms arose from non-biological precursors. So any purported explanation that does not include a description of such a process is inherently worthless. Furthermore, an explanation of life as we see it today must explain how adaptations (purposeful properties) come into being. So any explanation that invokes a pre-existing purpose whose origin is itself inexplicable, is also inherently worthless. And since God could have made the world any way he liked, Creationism is also untestable and anti-scientific. Its purportedly authoritative advocates are intellectually dishonest.

By contrast, evolution is a scientific theory that has survived rigorous critical scrutiny. Evolution explains how life arose from simple non-biological precursors, and how it acquired its adaptations. Science teachers in Dover have quite correctly refused to read out any apology for creationism because by doing so they would promote rank superstition.

However, the religious world is not alone in having worthless superstitions. Secular mental health charities like Rethink promote a view of the world based on the idea of mental illness. According to Rethink's worldview people take actions based on chemicals buzzing around in their brain. In reality, people act on their theories and values and not on orders from mindless chemicals or fictional mental illnesses. Unfortunately, nonsense about mental illness is what passes for serious discussion of moral issues among large and influential sections of the secular world. This, too, is an abrogation of intellectual and moral standards. For the sake of science and freedom and reason, we must abandon these secular superstitions as well.

Sat, 02/12/2005 - 14:32 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

don't overlay your hand

Evolution explains how life arose from simple non-biological precursor

Are you sure about that?

Doesn't evolution explain how life arose from other life, and how speciation occurs, and how common descent can have happened? If the theory of evolution-proper is thought to incorporate, as well, the explanation of how "how life arose from non-biological precursors", it's news to me.

Seems to me for that, you need some additional hypothesis, such as "lightning + amino acid soup" (I don't actually know what the current consensus is). Another possible hypothesis might be "seeding from outer space". But whatever that hypothesis (about origins of life) it would not be essential to the theory of evolution per se. In other words, even if "lightning + amino acid soup" is a wrong explanation of how the first RNA/DNA formed, it wouldn't make evolution wrong.

That's because evolution is not about the origin of life from non-biological precursors. It's about "change in the gene pool of a population over time" (got this from your link). Right?

Ob. Disclaimers: I am not a "creationist". I agree that "creationism" is nonsense. I agree that evolution should be taught in schools. I see no sense in "teaching creationism" in schools. Nor in slapping "only a theory" on evolution (everything in science is "only" a theory; typically, very strong ones, and evolution is one such). IMHO those who push "creationism" are misguided and reactionary at best. I just see no sense in overplaying your hand like this.

by Blixa on Sun, 02/13/2005 - 05:15 | reply

Re: don't overlay your hand

I take your point, which is a good one. Maybe The World should have drawn a distinction between our best explanations of the origin of new adaptations in existing organisms and our best explanations the origin of the first replicators, since the latter explanations are much more sketchy and more rickety.

Nevertheless, in the context of the controversy between evolution and creationism, the fact that one class of scientific explanations is more sketchy and rickety than another is not relevant. The issue there is not between a better and a worse explanation, but between explanation and non-explanation.

To forbid science to claim to have explained anything until we have a theory that we are sure will never be superseded, is holding it to an impossibly high standard, one that makes the above distinction impossible to state in words. Nevertheless it is a real distinction, crucial to all progress in understanding anything.

Science was right to claim that Newton had explained, with his theories of gravity and motion, why the planets move in ellipses with the sun at one focus. It explained it, and it explained it with good, independently-testable, scientific theories, while the theory that God had ordained ellipses because their shape pleased him would have been a non-explanation.

The fact that Newton's explanation was later superseded by one that denied the existence of gravitational forces is not relevant. Nor is the fact that neither Newton's nor any other scientific theory is an ultimate explanation (for instance, Newton did not explain why the gravitational force obeyed an inverse square law rather than some other formula). And furthermore, though it was false, Newton's theory contained a great deal of truth that survived into Einstein's theory. It could not have been as successful as it was in its predictions if that had not been so. The divine-fiat theory, on the other hand, is always equally 'successful' no matter what is to be explained, and hence it is always equally empty.

Similarly, evolution theory today, with its replicators and genes and mutations and selections and genotypes and phenotypes, has explained the origin of life. The fact that a number of possibilities are still open for the actual sequence of chemical events, does not change the fact that when Darwin proposed his first, flawed, version of the theory, something fundamentally changed: what had previously been a mystery of 'how could that possibly be?', had become a mystery of 'what, specifically, happened'. The latter is an open-ended mystery. There will never be an ultimate explanation. Even if we had a video of the formation of the original ancestor-replicator out of non-replicating components, there would still be the mystery of why the laws of physics were such as to permit things like that to happen.

There will always be great mysteries, big gaps, and also serious mistakes, and we shall always be ignorant of what lies beyond, or beneath, or in the gaps between, our knowledge. That does not change the fact that we already have genuine explanations that contain an enormous amount of truth, and that there is a significant distinction between modes of thought that seek and discover and criticise and improve these explanations, and modes that seek only to bolster a fixed non-explanation.

by David Deutsch on Sun, 02/13/2005 - 11:17 | reply

Criticism

The one criticism of evolution by creationists that seems to make sense is they come up with examples where there would be no survival advantage if only part of it was present. For example, they may point out a mechanism in a cell where 10 different elements are needed for a certain function, and if only one of them is missing the other 9 elements absolutely do not function and do not even give a very slight survival advantage, just a car without a carburetor doesn't even function a little bit better than a car with no engine at all. Then they point out that this can't be explained by incremental random mutations, as the likelihood that a mutation happens that causes all these 10 things at once is just as unlikely as all molecules in a room moving to one corner. Does anybody have a link to a good article dealing with this criticism? I am familiar with the argument that an eye can start just very simply as a single light detecting cell which gives a very slight survival advantage, where a bunch of those tiny increments eventually lead to an eye. But I haven't seen an argument dealing with cases where there is absolutely no survival advantage unless a bunch of elements arise at the same time.

Henry Sturman

by Henry Sturman on Sun, 02/13/2005 - 11:50 | reply

Re: Criticism

...cases where there is absolutely no survival advantage unless a bunch of elements arise at the same time

The generic answer given by evolutionary theory is that there are no such cases in nature. Where there are groups of improvements where none of them would be of any use unless the others also happened, these always evolved from previous small changes which were of use without the others happening as well.

The most often-cited alleged example of adaptations that could not possibly come about in that way (called "irreducible complexity" by creationists) are those of the eye. But this has been debunked so often and so thoroughly by evolutionists that, perhaps, it is not cited so often nowadays. Well, there's the case of the bombardier beetle, which is debunked here.

As a non-specialist, I'd say that the state of the argument as a whole is one of blind hope and unsubstantiated claims by people who don't know what they're talking about, versus thorough – if at times rather patronising – debunkings by people who do. In short, there is no evidence whatsoever of the existence of "irreducible complexity" in biological adaptations.

by David Deutsch on Sun, 02/13/2005 - 13:55 | reply

2 theories

Ok David, we're definitely on the same page then. :-) Let me reiterate my Disclaimers by emphasizing that my post is not to be interpreted as an attempt to "forbid science to claim to have explained anything until we have a theory that we are sure will never be superseded". I just wanted (partially for my own sake) to clear up what evolution-proper is ("new adaptation"), and that it need not include an explanation of origins ("first replicators"). Because my impression was always that they are independent from one another, and in particular we can be more sure of one than the other with no contradiction.

You acknowledge, I think, that we are less sure of the first-replicators explanation than the adaptations part that is evolution-proper. You state that we should still teach the former as part of the explanation and indeed that the different-surenesses don't matter to this conversation. I agree with only the former statement; by all means let's teach "amino acid soup+lightning" as our first-replicators best explanation, but if in doing so we don't acknowledge that we're less sure of it than of evolution (or, "less sure of this part of evolution" if you like), we leave ourselves open to the obvious line of attack: "You're presenting a theory as fact when even you acknowledge it's far from certain that it's true!"

I'm concerned with staving off that line of attack which is why I'd say, let's divorce the "evolution" part from the "origins" part. Evolution does not stand or fall with the origins explanation: it is true (indeed, quite obvious) whatever origins explanation is correct, or even if you select some wrong origins explanation. The theory of origins thought to go along with evolution, meanwhile, can (and should) be taught as a best-explanation we're relatively less sure about.

Yes all science consists of best-explanations that need never be "final", but that doesn't mean science hides the relative status of its various explanations from observers, does it? (Even if those observers are behaving in a misguided, unscientific and reactionary way - as creationists are.)

It seems to me that if you insist that "amino acid soup + lightning" (or whatever) is part of The Theory Of Evolution, it becomes one of the main chinks in its armor, and then if you still stand there and insist that "all of evolution is true, there can be no doubt!" you're, like I said, overplaying your hand. Since it's nonessential, and has a lower-certainty-value, why not split it off and call it a Theory Of Origins?

The Theory Of Evolution is obvious and true. The most-often-pushed Theory Of Origins to go with it, is certainly a reasonable explanation (and made far more plausible because of the facts of Evolution) but is far less obviously true. Am I wrong?

by Blixa on Sun, 02/13/2005 - 16:18 | reply

Re: 2 Theories

We do not "insist that "amino acid soup + lightning" (or whatever) is part of The Theory Of Evolution". We do say that life began as the theory of evolution says it did, when replicators formed out of non-replicating molecules according to the laws of chemistry and without any intelligent design being involved.

by Editor on Wed, 02/16/2005 - 17:21 | reply

Does "the theory of evolution

Does "the theory of evolution" say anything one way or another about how life began? My position, as you surely understood despite however poorly I may have phrased it, is No. Evolution, as it is usually stated and presented, actually explains how life... well... evol/ved, not how it "began". For that you need a theory of origins to go along with it.

If you insist I'm happy to go with your preferred formulation of "the theory of evolution" that is meant to encompass both, however. In that case, what is that theory's explanation for how "replicators formed out of non-replicating molecules"? It appears to be: they did so in some way, according to the laws of chemistry.

Is that really an "explanation"? It's practically begging the question. At the very least does it not raise a host of additional questions? Can/has this chemical replicators-from-non-replicators process be replicated? (Honestly curious, actually... come to think of it I don't actually know.) If not, why then and not now? Why does it not continually take place?

In other words, the origins-explanation is a weak link in your theory of evolution. Some gaps need to be filled in to that part of the explanation.

This doesn't mean "God" is in those gaps by any means :-). But nevertheless the existence and relative size of the gaps (with respect to the rest of the theory, which is quite well established!) should be explicitly acknowledged whenever that theory is presented. A stubborn refusal to do so looks, to me, like a counter-reaction to the reactionaries. And not only that, it's tactically unwise because it damages attempts to defend the remainder of the theory (which again, is quite sound).

P.S. I hate this because it makes me sound like some creationist and that's totally not what I'm about here.

by Blixa on Wed, 02/16/2005 - 21:09 | reply

Just illustrating my point....

Is this a Scientific Explanation?

Q: How did all the stars and planets form?

A: They formed from matter, according to the laws of physics.

by Blixa on Wed, 02/16/2005 - 21:17 | reply

Just illustrating

The two cases, though faintly analogous, are very different in a relevant way. The theory of evolution was invented to solve a problem, the problem of Design, as epitomised in the Argument from Design, namely, how could the adaptations of living organisms come into existence without design. (See William Paley's brilliant version of the Argument from Design, which Darwin refuted with his theory.) A proposed mechanism that started from designed precursors would not solve that problem. Hence the Theory of Evolution has to include the assertion that the first replicators formed, without design, from un-designed precursors.

There is no equivalent problem in the case of star formation.

Moreover the 'origin' process does constitute perfectly ordinary Darwinian evolution under the standard definition, because those first replicators were formed by variation, followed by natural selection, starting with a population of non-replicator precursors.

by David Deutsch on Thu, 02/17/2005 - 00:12 | reply

violent agreement

Hence the Theory of Evolution has to include the assertion that the first replicators formed, without design, from un-designed precursors.

Fair enough. And, in your preferred version of it, it does indeed include that assertion. I even believe that assertion.

However, its explanation of how this actually happened - of how the first replicators formed, without design, from un-designed precursors - remains somewhat lacking. Details can, and no doubt will, be filled in to make that explanation more satisfying. At present it is not, not very.

That's all I'm saying.

That, and the fact that this should be acknowledged, explicitly, when presenting the theory of evolution to someone. It is a property of the theory of evolution, at present, that its explanation of origins is relatively un-fleshed-out. Is it not?

those first replicators were formed by variation, followed by natural selection, starting with a population of non-replicator precursors.

Probably. And I see what you're saying about that explanation - pending a filling in of the details - fitting into the rubric of evolution-proper, i.e. variation & change. It's not clear, at present, how exactly this part of evolution happened, however. At least, it's far, far less clear than how the remainder of evolution happened, which is rather obvious and ought to be completely uncontroversial.

The origin explanation is currently the weakest link in the theory of evolution, in other words. And if you simply acknowledge that, you instantaneously and effortlessly defuse any attacks on "evolution" overall that are based solely on pointing to that weak link. By emphasizing that different aspects of evolution are established to different degrees (or adopting my preference, and saying that it is two theories, "evolution" and "origins"), you prevent people from being able to use evolution's weak link against it. Which is my only aim here.

Is this really not making sense or what?

by Blixa on Thu, 02/17/2005 - 20:15 | reply

Weak link?

Before the discovery of DNA, it was not known what specific chemicals are the 'genes' that evolution theory refers to. Nor, therefore, was it known what specific chemical reactions correspond to the processes 'replication' or 'variation'. Nevertheless, there was, at that time, no weakness in the theory that random variation and natural selection have given rise to all adaptations in nature. In particular, at that time, there was no weakness in the theory that they gave rise to the earliest (?) adaptation, replication.

There still isn't. Discovering more details about one part of the story but not another has not introduced any weakness into our explanation of the latter.

by David Deutsch on Thu, 02/17/2005 - 22:57 | reply

well, I can only say I disagree

It seems to me that (unless you've changed the definition of "weakness" from the one I was clearly using), there's weakness in a theory precisely when, and to whatever extent, that theory's various explanations are incomplete - or "sketchy" or "rickety" (which is almost a synonym of "weak"), as someone put it earlier in this thread. If explanations being sketchy and rickety doesn't connote weakness what does? If you disallow the word weakness to refer to explanations that are by your own admission rickety, I'm happy to oblige but what word shall I use instead?

So, it seems to me that before the discovery of DNA, the theory of evolution was indeed weaker than it is now. To put it another way, the discovery of DNA helped to make the theory of evolution stronger (=less weak). I doubt you would even actually disagree with that outside of the context of the current conversation (i.e. if I had asked you out of the blue, "did discovery of DNA help bolster evolution?" - well, quick, what would you have said?).

So I'm honestly not sure why you're arguing at this point.

And although it was an attempt to refute a complete 180-degree misrepresentation of my position, obviously you are correct to say that discovering more details about one part of the story but not another has not introduced any weakness into our explanation of the latter. What it has done, instead, is strengthened the former part of the story while leaving the latter part in its extant - and, now, relatively quite weak by comparison - state.

Which is precisely what I've been saying this whole time, without being understood evidently. Best,

by a reader on Fri, 02/18/2005 - 00:35 | reply

Not a good way to defend science

Blix

what you are proposing- emphasizing the "strong" part of evolution theory to convince people of "that part"'s correctness, if I have understood you right- is not necessarily a good method for defending scientific theories. You would only be conceding to some of their irrational demands.

First because it is in the nature of science to have loopholes in its explanation at any given time. Solving one problem always creates more problems and more unanswered questions.

Science and reliable scientific theories are defensible because no matter what their "weaknesses" are at any given time, the less successful theories are, well, less successful and/or wrong and the non-scientific "solutions" are nonsense and no real explanations at all.

Your "weakness" criterion is not really suitable, because that kind of "strength" that you are indirectly implying is never to be found in science. By adopting this approach you would be legitimising the demand for such "strength" in scientific theories before they are "good enough" to be "believed" or adopted and that is precisely what should be avoided.

The controversy about evolution is hot because of a deeper controversy: That of denying the legitimacy of science and of superiority of the worldview that is based on it to all others based on dogma (religious or otherwise, say communist for example). This is what the religious people, among others, have been pushing for all along.

The only reason they focus on Evolution is because they think it concerns an issue that their dogma is too specific about and hence can't be pushed under the rug as easily as they had managed to do about Physics and astronomy.

Evolution comes with its explanation of what the origin of life must have been like-ie what type of mechanisms "could" have been involved. That that part has still "more" unanswered questions changes nothing. If we are to apply "weakness" to it as a result of that, the rest of the theory would be as weak and attackable.

I'm pretty sure the "creationists" would embrace Evolution if they can have that "origin" part cloudy enough for them to insert their "intelligent design" in. Exactly the same way they embraced the Big Bang theory and thus the "rest of" cosmology and physics that led us to it, once they realized they could hide their dogma in the "initial conditions" or the "moment of creation". Their real folly would still remain unchallenged...well, actually we would be worse off because it would give them more room to maneuver. They can boast even more than they do now that they have no problem with "real science" since they only disagree with the "weak" and "problematic" parts which are "still debatable".

Science comes with its unresolved problems and its strength and validity is independent of the fact that (even more) questions remain unanswered. It should be accepted the way it is with all the logical consequences of a worldview that is based on it.

by AIS on Fri, 02/18/2005 - 04:29 | reply

AIS, I have long since pas

AIS,

I have long since passed the point of becoming repetitive so all I can say is you've said nothing that's new or changes the point I've been making. Yes it's the nature of science to have holes or gaps in its explanations. Yes it should be accepted that way and failure to do so is failure to understand what science is about (and this should be explained, which David is good at doing). And yes, The Religious People are resistant to science for essentially the reasons you characterize, and yes they are factually wrong.

But it's striking how defensive, even insecure, you sound about science when you say things like "If we are to apply "weakness" to [origins explanation] as a result of that, the rest of the theory would be as weak and attackable."

It would? be "attackable"? I totally disagree.

You, on the other hand, (ironically) evidently don't have confidence in the theory of evolution to stand up against illogical attacks based on irrelevantly pointing at gaps in the margin. If we give an inch, they'll take a mile, eh? We must circle the wagons around science against these attacks from The Religious People! Show them no weakness!!

This attitude is precisely what I mean to say is reactionary and unhelpful. When there's no question but that the origins explanation is rickety and yet you (apparently) insist we not acknowledge this, it's difficult for me to distinguish that from the attitude of a religious person who refuses to acknowledge that the Bible's creation story is rickety. It may be a difference of degree but not kind.

Moreover, it's difficult to recognize the fear "we would be worse off because it would give them more room to maneuver" as a valid concern of science or someone who's intellectually honest about presenting science's best-explanations.

They can boast even more than they do now that they have no problem with "real science" since they only disagree with the "weak" and "problematic" parts which are "still debatable".

Perhaps they can, and would. Yes they would cling to that gap. Which will, at some time or another, become ever smaller. So what? Let them. Science is unharmed by this. Moreover, the smaller the gaps get, the more difficult it becomes to mythologize them, and so the ranks of The Religious People Who Resist Science will be naturally lessened, over time (though evidently not soon enough for you). In the meantime we would have always presented science's explanations honestly and sincerely - which includes acknowledging where details are sketchy, so that scientists know what must be filled in by the way - and let the chips fall where they may.

But in all honesty it appears to me that you, and to some extent David, are primarily concerned with culture-war here, not science.

by blixia on Fri, 02/18/2005 - 19:06 | reply

What do you mean by bolster?

"did discovery of DNA help bolster evolution?"

Depends what you mean by "bolster" here. The discovery of DNA did not make the theory of evolution "truer". Nor did it increase the probability that evolution is true (like any theory, evolution is either true or false).

by a reader on Fri, 02/18/2005 - 22:29 | reply

insecure?

No where did I say anything about "hiding" the existence of unresolved problems in any theory! What I said was simply that they are always part and parcel of scientific theories and stressing them in such a debate has no bearing on what the real issue is. I don't see how that amounts to being dishonest in presenting science, or a sign of insecurity for that matter.

What I might be "insecure" about is the way subtle issues like these can be warped and misunderstood as they spread through society and the long term consequences of such accumulated misunderstandings. The creationists are not really important by themselves, for their's has been a lost cause for a long time. The main issue (for me) is missing the forest because of the trees: using the incomplete nature of scientific theories as an excuse to shy away from the consequences of taking them seriously as descriptions of reality-as David has argued admirably in his book. I think one of the historical reasons for this resistance has been the efforts of older, once prevalent religious dogmas to "tame" science and keep it out of certain "sensitive" regions (once they realised they couldn't stop it completely) and that this played (and still plays) a part in what has brought about the general popular cynicism and the worrisome weakening of realist philosophy today, common among an ever growing number of people who are no longer able to believe in those outdated religious dogmas either. The view of science as a "useful myth" good as a book keeping scheme is quite widespread today and although it might seem farfetched, I believe this in its own turn has been a contributing factor to the rise and popularity of all the distrust in the foundations of modern Western civilisation (that comes in different forms like multiculturalism or post-modernism, moral relativism...and even Islamism). They are arguably more harmful than the older archaic dogmas of naive faith.

That for the time being science is going forward at this rate, seemingly unharmed by such things, is partly due to the impetus acquired through centuries of struggle by people who were "insecure" enough to wage "cultural wars" - head on - to defend science as a source of real knowledge and as an alternative to dogma.

Why should that struggle be abandoned now?

by AIS on Sat, 02/19/2005 - 01:39 | reply

Serious Mental Illness is Biologically Based

There is abundant evidence of brain disease causing what is defined as "mental illness." Individuals with strokes in various parts of their brains can behave in unusual but often somewhat predictable ways, and these individuals are said to be mentally ill according to common psychiatric nomenclature.

Bipolar illness is far more genetically based than most forms of heart disease, cancer, diabetes or hypertension; involves demonstrable brain changes and quite predictable overall behavioral changes; and is certainly defined as a "mental illness" by psychiatrists.

Those with major depression after a myocardial infarction are 3-5 times more likely to suffer morbidity and mortality 6 months after their event than their non-depressed peers, and this difference is not accounted for by more severe heart disease in those with depression. Indeed, major depression after MI, in many studies, predicts cardiovascular morbidity and mortality as well as or usually better than more common predictors of future vascular injury, including smoking, hypertension, diabetes, hypercholesterolemia, etc.

In unmedicated identical twins, one of whom has schizophrenia, there are often obvious visually accessible brain changes indicative of neurodegenerative and neurodevelopmental damage. Brains, like other organs, evolve in time.

Huh? Serious mental illness with no underlying brain disease?

There is more rational and scientific basis to believe in ghosts, pyramid power, ESP, and rhino horns as aphrodisiacs, than to doubt hundreds of thousands of studies, many accessible even to a lay audience, showing the ways in which serious mental illness is caused by complicated, often genetically mediated, neurodevelopmental and neurodegenerative processes gone awry.

Nowadays, failing to recognize this, even if ignorance is the reason for the oversight, in a forum where scientists, philosophers, and apparently pseudoscientists commingle, is nearly as provocative as denying the Holocaust or denying that slavery occurred. Yes, this stupidity injures the mentally ill and causes discrimination and hardship.

Believing that mental illness in a person is "intelligently designed" by its owner is rather ironic, in an article criticizing intelligent design in evolutionary theory.

by Michael on Wed, 02/23/2005 - 04:09 | reply

Diseases of the mind

Michael, I don't think that The World denies that there are brain diseases and that these diseases can have a profound affect on behaviour. The World is arguing against the concept of mental illness, i.e., diseases of the mind. Such "diseases" do not have a physical cluster of symptoms, but are identified by behaviour e.g., Attention Deficit Hyperactivity Disorder, Depression, and (yes) Schizophrenia. Minds cannot be infected with diseases because the mind is not material.

by a reader on Wed, 02/23/2005 - 10:03 | reply

Causation (Was: Serious Mental Illness is Biologically Based)

There is abundant evidence of brain disease causing what is defined as "mental illness"

The concept of causation is tricky even in the physical sciences. David Hume, for instance, denied that there can be such a thing as evidence of causation. He was wrong about that (because he was wrong about what evidence is), and indeed the existence of causation is essential to every scientific explanation. But it is tricky to define, and trickier to pin down evidence of causation. When it comes to explanations of anything involving human opinions and decisions, it becomes even trickier, but is equally essential. I think that some of the more vitriolic and long-lasting debates in the study of human behaviour – including the nature/nurture debates about IQ and about mental illness – are caused either by entrenched, rival conceptions of causality or by confused or inadequate conceptions.

Let me give two simple examples and then ask a question.

Let's define a cause as a factor with the property that if it had been different, the effect in question would not have happened (or, perhaps, would have been less likely). I think this is the common core of all definitions of causation. You mentioned the Holocaust. There are many levels at which one could address the issue of what caused it. According to my definition above, Hitler caused the Holocaust by ordering it: had he given different orders, it would not have happened. However, by the same definition, many other factors also caused it: the propensity of the German people to condone such orders is one of them. So is the propensity of the German political system a few years earlier to bring a tyrant to power.

That all makes sense, but unfortunately, according to the above definition, it is just as true that the Holocaust was 'caused' by the attributes of the victims – particularly by the fact that they were Jews, Gypsies, etc., for if any of them had lacked those attributes, they would almost certainly have survived. If a reputable historian were to insist on using that definition, and to publish studies of the 'causes' of historical events in that sense, you can imagine what legions of bad people, and bad journalists, would immediately and forever afterwards seize on the fact that "studies have shown" that the Jews themselves caused the Holocaust. So that definition of causation is inadequate – and highly misleading as it stands – for use in an explanation of the cause of the Holocaust.

For the same reason, if we use that definition of causation in the study of the genetic origin of any other human behaviour, we shall make equally massive mistakes. For example, we would easily conduct a scientific study and find overwhelming evidence that lynchings of black people were caused by the black people's own genes.

Now I come to my question: when you say that there is abundant evidence of brain disease causing what is defined as "mental illness", what do you mean by "causing"? Do you mean that there is evidence that if certain brain lesions detected in the victims of, say, schizophrenia, had been absent, then the victims would not have displayed schizophrenic behaviour? (I.e. the same level of evidence as that which indicates that black people's genes were a cause of lynchings or Jewish genes were a cause of the Holocaust.) Or do you mean something more?

by David Deutsch on Wed, 02/23/2005 - 11:56 | reply

Best Explanation?

David,

I think we are comfortable about denying the role of the victims' genes in lynchings or the Holocaust as causes because we have better explanations that account for the observed genetic correlations as being non-causal factors in the explanations.

Do you have a better explanation for "mental illnesses" that correlate highly with physical brain abnormalities, that accounts for these abnormalities in a non-causal role?

If you don't, on what basis should one reject what seems to be the best explanation available?

Gil

by Gil on Wed, 02/23/2005 - 20:40 | reply

What brain abnormalities?

Gil,

I categorically dispute that there are well-established correlations between physical brain abnormalities and "mental illnesses" such as depression, schizophrenia or bipolar disorder.

All that is well established is that: 1) a lot of people have published papers claiming to have found such correlations, and that the later discoveries of such correlations tend to correlate poorly with the earlier discoveries; and 2) none of these discoveries have led to effective predictive tests (or even reliable diagnostic tests) for the "mental illnesses" they are supposed to correlate with.

by KW on Wed, 02/23/2005 - 22:41 | reply

Re: Best Explanation?

But in the examples I gave, the genes are not just non-causal factors and the observed effects are not merely correlations. The genes in question are perfectly genuine, overwhelmingly significant, causes of the given effects. But only in one sense, not in another.

I don't want to argue for my favoured explanation here. Only that scientific observations should not be cited as evidence for something they are not evidence of.

OK

KW and David,

I'm not disputing anything you have written.

I was just playing Devil's Advocate, and wondering if there have been observations that require explanation when formulating our best theories on the issues.

Gil

by Gil on Thu, 02/24/2005 - 00:56 | reply

Schizophrenia: there ARE correlations with genes

There's no diagnostic test, there's no method of treatment, there's no known biological mechanism, but there are correlations between some identified genes and the risk of schizophrenia.

This is what the director of the NIH said recently:

"Today, we lack a diagnostic test or a strategy for preventing schizophrenia. This situation is similar to cardiovascular disease 30 years ago in that we see schizophrenic patients only after their first episode equivalent to a "heart attack," and we do not have the equivalent of cholesterol level as an identifiable risk factor.

However, what we have done recently — and what holds great promise for those who are suffering — is identify 12 genes associated with risk. Our challenge now is to move from the discovery of those genes—most of which have no known function—to understanding the role these genes play in the onset and progression of this brain disease—and doing something about it.

Our hope is to use these genes to identify what is abnormal in the brains of schizophrenics, identify it early and thus provide the psychiatric diagnostic equivalent of serum cholesterol level. To accomplish this, we must study the protein products of these genes by using molecular tools that can make their function transparent."

by a reader on Thu, 02/24/2005 - 18:09 | reply

Only twelve?

How can there be only twelve genes known to be [statistically] associated with increased risk of schizophrenia? Since schizophrenia is more common in males, every gene on the Y chromosome must have this property.

That encyclopaedia article also contains some interesting information about the large differences in schizophrenia rates, and in the frequencies of the various symptoms of schizophrenia, in different countries.

by David Deutsch on Fri, 02/25/2005 - 00:19 | reply

The putative genetics of schizophrenia what we have done recently ... is identify 12 genes associated with risk [of schizophrenia]

I'll start taking such claims seriously when this "associated risk" is demonstrated in a methodologically sound prospective study based on prenatal or neonatal genetic sampling.

Lynching Mental Illness and the Mentally Ill

In discussing lynching, David Deutsch says, "But in the examples I gave, the genes are not just non-causal factors and the observed effects are not merely correlations. The genes in question are perfectly genuine, overwhelmingly significant, causes of the given effects. But only in one sense, not in another." Yes David, there is a difference between necessary and necessary and sufficient. And yes, some "causes" seem more important than others.

Thank you for clarifying that.

Genes are (for the most part) necessary for the formation of brains and hearts; and necessary for the evolution of diseases and people. Yes, genes are important, even necessary, but they are not necessary and sufficient for the evolution of people and their parts. You need the protoplasm stuff ... and gravity and plants and food and a few other things, too -- even atoms and electrons help! Yes, the more you think about it, causation is a complicated concept when it comes to explaining things!

And yes, black people have a skin color which causes certain deranged white people to want to act very badly to those possessing this characteristic. And yes genes, in a causal chain, "cause" individuals to have a tendency to have black skin; so in a twisted sense, genes coding for the development of black skin can cause evil people to manifest their hostilities.

The only thing I can't figure out is how this discussion of causality has anything at all to do with whether brain pathology causes serious mental illness?

Most people and virtually all physicians are comfortable with the concept that diabetes is a cause of heart disease. But if one doesn't believe that diabetes causes heart disease, because diabetes is neither completely necessary nor completely sufficient to cause heart disease, then the discussion is effectively over. If one believes that only something that is completely necessary and completely sufficient can be said to "cause" something else in medicine, then one can say that there are no "causes" in medicine at all! There is literally nothing in medicine which causes anything so completely. So yes, if diabetes does not cause heart disease, then brain disease does not cause mental illness. But this argument is trivial.

David, you were discussing lynchings and the causes of the Holocaust to make the point that nothing in medicine can be said to completely cause something else? So Hitler was not the only cause of the Holocaust, smoking is not the only cause of cancer, major depression is not the exclusive cause of worsening heart disease, and brain disease is not the only cause of mental illness? With respect, it's rather obvious that any given phenomenon in medicine (and life) has multiple causes. Don't you think? Perhaps your point is different. Perhaps you think brain disease is not an important or relevant cause of mental illness, while diabetes is an important cause of heart disease. If so, on what basis do you choose to make this distinction? Your "prejudice" should be explicitly stated.

But if you believe that diabetes is a relevant cause of heart disease, then you can also logically believe that brain disease is a relevant cause of mental illness, just as major depression is a relevant cause of heart disease progression (But none of these causes are "necessary and sufficient!").

So the issue, then, is not really causality, the issue is evidence!

When Dr. Lieberman scans the brains of individuals with schizophrenia suffering their first psychotic break, in a double-blind experiment, and randomizes half to an ineffective treatment and half to an effective treatment, then watches the brains of the ineffectively treated shrink by 12 cc's in 12 weeks; few but the most stubborn and simplistic philosophers would logically doubt that schizophrenia is a horribly destructive brain disease. When the head of the NIH says a first episode psychotic break damages the brain in the same (logical) way that a heart-attack damages the heart, he is referring to precisely this type of evidence. When these same patients with schizophrenia are followed for two years and their brains are (partially) protected by a medication and don't shrink, and when in fact there is preliminary evidence of neural regeneration, that is cause for hope.

Now, if we had known who was going to develop a first-episode psychotic break, and had premedicated them with this same medication, before their first full psychotic period; that is if we had medicated them during the "prodromal period", would this intervention have completely prevented the subsequent brain damage?

That is a question worth asking. It is a good question, because a scientifically valid answer to it could prevent hardship, pain, and loss of life.

By the way, 12 cc's is quite visible and Dr. Lieberman has created movie-like 3- dimensional images of the shrinking brains using serial brain scanning.....quite frightening since the changes are so easily and dramatically seen.

As for the reader who said the following,. "The World is arguing against the concept of mental illness, i.e., diseases of the mind. Such "diseases" do not have a physical cluster of symptoms, but are identified by behaviour e.g., Attention Deficit Hyperactivity Disorder, Depression, and (yes) Schizophrenia. Minds cannot be infected with diseases because the mind is not material."

To my way of thinking, the concept of "material" may be a little less "physical" than you think and "mind" may be a bit more. But I am not going to be able to change your world-view. Your dualistic philosophy is apparently assumed and therefore not a scientific proposition. Let me just point out the odd logical conclusions of your stance.

One hundred years ago, grand-mal seizures were described as tonic then clonic contractions of the limbs, with lack of speaking, much drooling, and frequent incontinence. (Yes, ALL of these "symptoms" are "just" BEHAVIORS)

And one hundred years ago there were those, just like some of the readership of The World, who claimed that these seizures could not be "diseases" because the condition was not described as a "physical cluster of symptoms" (to quote the critic above), but rather the condition was defined by behavior (tonic clonic movement of limbs and such). Indeed, individuals with seizures were housed in psychiatric facilities (with the rest of the poor souls who didn't have real "diseases".) Yes, ideas do have consequences. Not only were the mentally ill mistreated, so were those with epilepsy!

I also want to point out to my critic above that given your conceptions, grand-mal seizure behaviors, and especially temporal lobe seizure behaviors, until relatively recently, were not thought of as manifestations of brain disease. Rather they were thought to be manifestations of decisions made by individuals or of an invasion of evil spirits into the body. Amazing how this "cluster" of "behaviors" became a disease in a few short years!! Between you and me, I bet grand mal epilepsy was a "disease" 100 years ago, just as it is today. What do you think?

Our minds allow us to organize events on various scales. We can look at the movement of muscle fiber in an arm on a molecular level (carbon compounds interacting with carbon compounds) we can look at the firing of neurons as they innervate an arm muscle (the physical "symptom" level, or we can watch the whole arm move as a consequence of its neuromuscular innervations.(i.e. we can watch the arms behavior) I'm not sure that one level is philosophically or scientifically superior to the other. We stimulate the occipital lobe of the brain, the person reports seeing colors. We stimulate the temporal lobes at key places, the person reports hearing things. We stimulate the motor cortex and limbs move. By any logical conception, stimulating the brain caused these BEHAVIORS, although as yet the mechanisms are not fully understood.

Would it not be odd if the brain (but no other organ in the body) could not malfunction and so cause inappropriate activation of particular brain areas, such that the initial visible manifestation of this brain malfunction was an observable "cluster of behaviors". Just as diabetes (by as yet not completely known mechanisms) causes deterioration in those with coronary artery disease, brain malfunction (by as yet not completely known mechanisms) causes deterioration in behavior.

What very obvious "symptoms" would a malfunctioning brain present with, if not abnormal clusters of unusual behaviors, otherwise known as "mental illnesses"? The brain is the organ of behavior, so when it malfunctions in "mental illness", the symptom clusters presented are behavioral in origin. To not believe in the existence of mental illness, one either has to believe that the brain cannot malfunction, or that the brain is not the organ of behavior!

And to my other critic (!?)

"There's no diagnostic test (yea, basically correct)

"There's no method of treatment"

.....No, that's quite wrong. I would invite you (or anyone with good intentions) to come to the psychiatric hospital and witness dramatic and often remarkable changes in many (but not all) patients with schizophrenia and other mental illnesses, once treated. It would not take more than a few months of observation, and your preconceptions would just evaporate. It's one thing to engage in philosophical speculation, and another to see things with your own eyes. ...I told some of my patients and their family members about the remarkable conversations taking place on this web site. They gave me a quizzical look and then uniformly laughed (a gentle laugh) I think many writing for this web site could learn a lot from the mentally ill!

"There's no known biological mechanism"

...Sort of. There's also no known biological mechanism for most "diseases" including hypertension, diabetes, bipolar disease, etc. Perhaps one could reasonably argue that there are better biological explanations of diabetes than schizophrenia, but we're still not doing so well in fully explaining (let alone defining) most medical illnesses, including diabetes. Unfortunately doctors are better treaters than diagnosticians. Just the way it is right now.

And....

"I'll start taking such claims seriously when this 'associated risk' is demonstrated in a methodologically sound, prospective study based on prenatal or neonatal genetic sampling”

To the author K.W., how much money do you have? To my knowledge, such human studies have not been done for most diseases with known genetic precipitants and causes. Do you really believe that specific human genes are not involved in the formation of corneas, because nobody has done a “methodologically sound, prospective study based on prenatal or neonatal genetic sampling” to find the specific genes which code for the proteins that lead to the development of corneas?

Finally, thank you for giving me the opportunity to respond to those commenting on my comments.

Michael

By the way, it is truly an honor to correspond with David Deutsch in one of multiple universes. I’ve loved your writing and your books.

by Michael on Sat, 02/26/2005 - 05:49 | reply

Re: Lynching Mental Illness and the Mentally III

Michael -

You raised the example of epilepsy as a brain disease that was first identified by its affect on behaviour. You pointed out that this disease was incorrectly classified as mental illness and that this classification led to unfortunate consequences for sufferers of the disease. I don't deny that there are brain diseases, nor that these diseases can affect behaviour, nor that the first indications of a brain disease may be behavioural. I do deny, however, that there is such a thing as mental illness. In the epilepsy example you in fact agree that epilepsy is not a mental illness. Your example is a fine example of the dangers of taking a set of behaviours and attributing them to a mental illness.

The term "mental illness" is an oxymoron. That which is mental cannot become ill. You say that the brain is the organ of behaviour. This is like saying the stomach is the organ of digestion or that the heart is the organ of circulation. But to make this analogy is to miss a crucial difference. People act according to the theories and values they hold to be true. Stomachs and hearts do not. To understand a stomach or heart, physics and biology suffices. To understand behaviour, we need non-physical modes of explanations. For example, George Bush's took the decision to invade Iraq because he believes that defeating certain types of tyranny is the best way to prevent future terrorist attacks. Knowing just the neurochemistry of George Bush's brain would not enable us to figure that out. George Bush's theories and values cannot become ill, or be infected with disease, although he may change some of his theories and values as a result of becoming ill. Now holding certain theories and values may cause distinctive changes to the brain, but we cannot "cure" a person of their theories and values by physically trying to undo the changes. That is to misunderstand how knowledge generation works.

by Erda Rae on Sun, 02/27/2005 - 01:36 | reply

Erda want to chat? you left

Erda want to chat? you left no contact info :(AIM curi42 or email curi AT curi.us

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Sun, 02/27/2005 - 01:59 | reply

Don't blame Intel for security flaws in Internet Explorer

Michael,

The reason I believe the formation of corneas is genetically determined -- even though there have been no studies to identify the relevant genes -- is the same as why I believe that unexplained perturbations in the orbit of astronomical objects are due to the gravitational effect of unseen companions; namely that the general theory that morphology is genetically determined (and that orbits are gravitationally determined) has no serious rivals.

However when it comes to explaining human behaviour the situation is quite different. The difference is that there exists neither a known explanation for how genes shape human behaviour, nor is there a single unambiguous prospective study showing the existence of a correlation between genetic and behavioural variations, such as "mental illnesses" or non-pathological intellectual or psychological attributes.

Therefore the belief that genes determine human behaviour is predicated entirely on the analogy with biological attributes that are known to be genetically determined (including the behaviour of lower animals). But the validity of this analogy is suspect for the same reason as would be the dogma that because computers are just machines therefore variations in their "behaviour" must be determined by variations in their hardware design.

It is only in the context of this tendentious analogy that the alleged evidence supporting the genetic causation of variations in human behaviour seems at all credible. By the normal standards of science the evidence is astonishingly poor. The fact that the academic community seems oblivious to this state of affairs just shows that we are dealing with a scientific dogma rather than a scientific theory.

Seen in this light, and pending a good prospective study that demonstrates the existence of a genes-to-human-behaviour correlation, I think scepticism about genetic explanations of human behaviour is entirely justified.

by KW on Wed, 03/02/2005 - 13:58 | reply

Genetic Explanation of Cornea Development

Actually the specific and detailed effects of genes on the development of the cornea have been the subject of a great deal of scientific study.

by Editor on Wed, 03/02/2005 - 15:48 | reply

schizophrenia and gender

Deutsch wrote

'How can there be only twelve genes known to be [statistically] associated with increased risk of schizophrenia? Since schizophrenia is more common in males, every gene on the Y chromosome must have this property'.

This is untrue. Schizophrenia is no more common in males. The disease has an equal gender ratio. Males, however, tend to be affected earlier (mean 23yrs vs mean 28yrs) and more severely (i.e. males have a poorer prognosis).

Kieren.

Diseases vs. Syndromes

Diabetes (particularly type II), Hypertension, the Coronary Syndrome, Migraine/Tension Headaches, Major Depression, and many other illnesses are all considered "syndromes" because they have multiple causes and multiple effects and their definitions provide information about diseased organs and cells, but are not the diseased parts themselves. The mental illness called Major Depression, for example, is defined by what people say and do. But what people say and do is obviously not the disease itself, because it is the brain that is malfunctioning. Unusual responses of people to questions, however, can provide information about a malfunctioning brain. But recognizing that mental illness is a medical syndrome hardly makes mental illness unique, because most medical "diagnoses" have similar attributes!

For example, elevated fasting blood sugar (defining the diabetes syndrome) is not the disease itself, but rather is a manifestation of deficient cellular capacity to remove sugar from the blood stream, inadequate pancreatic capacity to produce insulin, and multiple known and unknown imbalanced metabolic factors. Often there are unknown mechanisms that cause abnormal metabolism, malfunctioning cells, and an abnormal pancreas; but elevated blood sugar is a final common result of the imbalances. Nonetheless, it is the elevated blood sugar that defines the illness, not the underlying pathophysiology!

Similarly, answers to interview questions define, for example the mental illness Major Depression; but Major Depression is a consequence of abnormal underlying brain physiology, and much of this underlying pathophysiology is still, just as with diabetes, unknown. Major Depression is the syndrome; underlying brain pathology is the disease. ST-T segment changes recorded on the "12-lead EKG" help define the "coronary syndrome", but elevations (or depressions) of ST-T wave segments on a piece of paper are hardly a "disease." When a patient is said to be suffering from a syndrome that is an illness, this illness gives information about a pathophysiological state, but is not the state itself!

Because elevated blood sugar is a consequence of an underlying pathophysiological state, just lowering blood sugar does not prevent all complications of the underlying disease. Insulin lowers blood sugar and helps to treat the abnormal metabolic state, but even those on enough insulin to keep their blood sugar low, still lose kidney function, heart function, and brain function. Elevated fasting blood sugar defines the syndrome called "diabetes," but elevated blood sugar is not the disease itself, or else just lowering the blood sugar would solve all the problems associated with diabetes, and insulin does not.

Another characteristic of syndromes is that their definitions are inherently subjective. Type II Diabetes, Hypertension, Major Depression, Migraine and Tension Headaches, and the Coronary Syndrome are defined by a committee of learned experts sitting in a room! Mental Illnesses are by no means the only "subjectively" defined syndromes.

I know the general public and no doubt some of the readers of "The World" wish this were not so, but just because something is subjectively defined, does not mean that the definitions are not clinically useful! The problem is that for much of medical practice, most "illnesses" are in fact subjectively defined entities (called syndromes). Syndromes are useful to know about, even if the underlying pathophysiology of a condition is not completely understood, because they help physicians to predict other events of consequence (like pain or death) and because their "treatment" often (but not always) reduces the likelihood of the emergence of these events of consequence. Indeed, on a practical and historical level, syndromes will often gain prominence and be more formally recognized, precisely because they help predict other outcomes of consequence. In addition, syndromes often are defined because their treatment will decrease pain or suffering – even if the underlying pathophysiology of the syndrome is barely understood.

"Ahh," a critic could say, but a syndrome like Hypertension is measurable and Major Depression is not. Yes, the diagnosis of hypertension is relatively reliably made by a carefully trained person placing a properly fitting "blood pressure cuff" (sphygmomanometer) on a person's arm and then comparing the systolic and diastolic blood pressure measurements to a table of values defined by a group of experts. If the readings are "too high", according to an expert consensus panel, the patient is defined to have the syndrome, Hypertension. But a skilled clinical interviewer using a "SCID" diagnostic instrument can reliably diagnose Major Depression, also. Asking a series of questions and coding the patients' responses allows this diagnosis to be made. Once again, just like with Hypertension, experts define the mental illness called "Major Depression".

But even if it is granted that both Hypertension and Major Depression can be reliably diagnosed, a proposition that is really not debatable any more because of so much scientific/statistical evidence: Is not Hypertension somehow a more valid diagnosis? Obviously, one doesn't die directly of a subjectively defined syndrome like Hypertension; but do not the consequences of Hypertension predictably lead to terribly outcomes like death from coronary artery obstruction? How does one die from Major Depression?

Perhaps then Hypertension is a real medical illness, but Major Depression is not because of the morbidity that can be predicted after a diagnosis is made. Some individuals could die from suicide, as a consequence of Major Depression, but the act of suicide could arguably be considered more voluntary than developing clogged coronary arteries in someone dying from Hypertension. So perhaps Hypertension is a real illness because it leads to a real and measurable outcome (e.g. death), while Major Depression is not, because it does not seem to lead to any specific outcome that could not also be attributed to individual volition.

But patients with Hypertension certainly do make choices about diet and exercise and these choices do affect the way in which Hypertension changes coronary arteries. So perhaps coronary obstruction from Hypertension (like suicide from Major Depression) results from the voluntary choices of those with Hypertension, after all.

On the other hand, are there not some individuals who die from the consequences of Hypertension, even though they strictly followed dietary and exercise recommendations?"

So Hypertension (would seem) to cause a patient to have less control of his own death than Major Depression, because suicidal behavior in the depressed patient involves a degree of volition, whereas even those who properly eat and exercise could still die from Hypertension. So from this (in my view incorrect) perspective, Hypertension but not Major Depression is a "real illness" because one can predict certain clear-cut outcomes with Hypertension that are potentially independent of the patient's (or other people's choices.)

So real illnesses like Hypertension, unlike supposedly invented illnesses like Major Depression, must be reliably diagnosed, there must be clearly measurable deleterious outcomes, and there must be at least some instances of the syndrome in which the individual's choices (and the choices of others) are virtually irrelevant to the ultimately bad outcomes. From this perspective, a real illness or syndrome must have some existence independent of individuals' choices and the choices made by others.

The relevant question then is: Does Major Depression, like Hypertension, also have a "life of its own", independent of the choices of people? If not, then solving the problem of Major Depression and other Mental Illnesses necessitates helping the afflicted to reason more effectively, but does not involve treating a medical syndrome, per se. From this perspective, diagnosing the mental illness Major Depression does nothing more than define a group of individuals who have not been taught to think correctly or solve particular problems very well. Philosophers and logicians, not physicians, should then treat it

Unfortunately for those who "don't believe" in mental illness, the argument that mental illness does not exist because people choose their behavior and speech, though plausible 20 years ago, is no longer valid today. Mental illnesses cause bodily deterioration at least as powerfully as many physical illnesses like Hypertension do. In fact, when the mental illness called Major Depression is compared to the physical illness called Hypertension, in terms of the syndromes' respective power to predict, for example, morbidity and mortality from coronary artery disease: Major Depression has been found to be at least as large and usually a larger risk factor for morbidity and mortality.

And it has been refuted that this association is an artifact caused by those with more severe heart disease calling themselves more "depressed," or those with Major Depression not complying with treatment. (Indeed those with Major Depression seem to have less severe heart disease when they present to the cardiologist complaining of chest pain; their coronary arteries just deteriorate faster).

Explanations are controversial but follow several lines of reasoning. Those with Major Depression tend to have increased cardiovascular reactivity to day-to-day events that individuals experience. These increased physiological responses are known to independently predict morbidity and mortality, possibly by increasing shear stress on vessel walls. This damage to the vessel wall may then lead to faster progression of plaques or increased likelihood that the plaque will burst into the lumen of the vessel. Other reasons include the fact that those with Major Depression have increased platelet aggregation and a greater tendency toward arrhythmias, probably due to increased vascular and neurological reactivity to stressful situations. In addition those with Major Depression (experiencing stress) have a decreased proportion of parasympathetic to sympathetic control of their heart's normal "beat to beat" variability (decreased "heart period" variability), and this is a known risk factor for death as well. In any case, Major Depression predicts progression of coronary artery disease at least as well as Hypertension in most studies in which they have been compared.

So like Hypertension, a committee of experts defines Major Depression, both syndromes are reliably diagnosed from a statistical perspective, and both lead to predictable and obviously negative outcomes (e.g. death). In both, to some extent, these outcomes are independent of the choices and effort of individuals with the illness.

We know that these deleterious cardiovascular outcomes are to some extent independent of the efforts of individuals with Major Depression, because in one relatively large study involving thousands of patients with coronary artery disease and depression, making the choice to engage in "cognitive behavioral therapy" to treat their depression, DID NOT improve cardiovascular outcomes (ENRICHED). So even when patients work to learn to think more "rationally" (cognitive behavioral therapy) this treatment did not alter the progression of coronary artery disease. On the other hand in the same study, those with the most refractory depressions were allowed to receive SSRI antidepressant medication and morbidity was substantially reduced. In studies by Sauer and others, use of SSRI antidepressants is associated with decreased death rates in smokers, but the reasons for these results are not fully understood and much larger prospective trials are in process. Our group has published and is publishing data showing that SSRI antidepressants effectively decrease blood pressure variance, just as they seem to decrease extreme emotional vacillation during stressful situations in patients with Major Depression. Emotional and physical reactivity to stress in patients with a "unipolar" Major Depression are likely decreased by SSRI antidepressants.

So like Hypertension, Major Depression has a "life of its own" independent of the choices of those afflicted, and in particular Major Depression is at least as large a risk factor for death from progression of coronary artery disease, in studies in which Hypertension and Depression have been compared.

Therefore, the responses of patients to questions about their "mood" enables physicians to diagnose Major Depression. When a patient has this diagnosis, it enables physicians to make statistical predictions about the course of coronary disease and these predictions are at least as powerful as predictions made using a blood pressure cuff.

A syndrome is not a pathophysiological state. A syndrome is a consequence of a pathophysiological state. The field of medicine recognizes "syndromes" because they can help predict events that human beings care about and because "treatment" of syndromes, even when the underlying pathophysiology is not completely understood, reduces human suffering. These distinctions are clearly understood by physicians, and I would think by readers of the World.

Perhaps some readers of the World may consider physicians "sloppy" in their naming of syndromes like Hypertension, the Coronary Artery Syndrome, Migraine Headache, and Major Depression; but physicians and the general public are well aware that answers to questions are not a disease, a systolic blood pressure recording is not a disease, a blood sugar recording is not a disease, and lines on an EKG recording are not a disease; though all can predict disease.

The World is usually very careful to see various phenomena in context. For example when The World discusses Israel, it is recognized that Israel is at war and therefore alleged human rights violations are discussed in the context of this war. It is also understood that there are far worse abuses seen in countries around the world and in the Middle East. But most of these far more egregious human rights abuses are never mentioned. It is properly considered irrational to hold Israel to a standard that applies to no other nation. To do so is considered discrimination.

Why then must the World attack the phenomenon of mental illness, when similar attacks are logically as applicable to most other syndromes, indeed most diagnoses in the field of medicine? Do your headaches really not exist just because they are defined by a committee of experts and treated based upon your subjective reports to your doctor? Should no research money go to treating headache syndromes just because the pathophysiology is not well understood? Anyone who has ever taken a Tylenol for a "Tension" headache understands all too well the reality of the affliction. Why then is it so hard to understand the reality of mental illness syndromes? Are we so solipsistic that we must experience mental illness ourselves before we understand its reality?

by Michael on Sat, 03/26/2005 - 00:07 | reply

Cause of "Mental Illness, Schizophrenia"

A new site has proposed a completely different theory for the disorganized thinking a psychotic beliefs we usually call "Mental Illness."

The examples of psychotic episodes associated with Qi Gong, the slow motion martial arts exercise and Kundalini Yoga are used as a model to explain the late adolescence onset of schizophrenia.

A common but little known feature of human physiology, a conflict of physiology related to the vision startle reflex, is known to cause a sudden dissociative/psychotic episode in Knowledge workers. The problem was discovered in the 1950/60's and the Cubicle solved it there.

Qi Gong and Kundalini Yoga demonstrate a 3000-year history for this phenomenon.

It has not occurred to anyone that the problem those designers and engineers discovered is one of physiology not desks, chairs, and repeating detectable movement in a business office.

Visit <http://VisionAndPsychosis.Net>. Start with the Demonstration page and the Everquest Connection. The site is over seven megabytes of text.

by a reader on Sun, 05/08/2005 - 01:11 | reply

Re: the Cubicle

Chronic Cubicle Syndrome.

by Editor on Sun, 05/08/2005 - 01:26 | reply

Serious Mental Illness is Hereditary

Professor David Deutsch is a physicist known for his brilliance in interpreting quantum mechanical principles and for his original theoretical ideas on quantum computing. And he apparently has some thought-provoking and interesting views on mental illness, as well.

In my view, his ideas about the mentally ill are quite wrong and even bigoted, but he is wrong in interesting ways, worthy of exploration.

Professor Deutsch, in editorial comments on his "Setting the World to Rights" blog, believes that illnesses of the mentally ill are "fake" and that studies demonstrating heritability of mental illness ("behavior") are seriously flawed because of misinterpretations of the concept of heritability. I presume that if Professor Deutsch felt that mental illnesses were meaningfully (technically "directly") heritable, he would change his mind about mental illnesses being "fake". For if genes meaningfully

A. Caused internal pathophysiological abnormalities which subsequently caused brain damage, behavioral disorders, and reduced capacity for rational thinking, and if

B. These disorders were known to be mostly independent of the choices of the individual afflicted or others, and

C. These mental illnesses caused significant pain and suffering then, it certainly would be hard to avoid calling these illnesses "real"! I think that is why it is important for those who don't wish to recognize mental illness to argue against hereditary factors as causative factors in the development of mental illness.

Some play semantic games to disenfranchise those with mental illness. For example a reader of the World Blog writes that the mind cannot be "infected with disease" so mental illnesses don't exist, forgetting, for example, that illnesses of the mind are syndromes, defined by their symptoms. And no syndrome, whether mental or physical can be "infected" with disease. A depressed mood in the syndrome "major depression, cannot be "infected by disease" any more than an elevated fasting blood sugar, in the type 2 diabetes syndrome! Mental illnesses and for example type 2 diabetes are defined by their symptoms but with multiple underlying causes that we don't yet understand. .

And multiple illnesses in medicine must be defined by their symptoms because of incomplete scientific understanding. Syndromes are useful and predictive substitutes for a complete description of a pathophysiological state. The language of "syndromes" creates a terminology amongst professionals that allows for treatment and research into conditions that often have a poorly understood genetic/pathophysiological basis but nonetheless cause pain and suffering and predict the evolution of other diseases and syndromes. Yet the editors don't disenfranchise those with: migraine headaches, "restless legs", chronic obstructive pulmonary disease (COPD), the coronary syndrome, and (as mentioned) type 2 diabetes -- all syndromes defined by their symptoms and not the underlying pathophysiology. Indeed, we understand the underlying causes of very few illnesses in medicine, but should we therefore say that virtually all illnesses in medicine are "fake" and none should be recognized and treated? We are often very good at helping to treat syndromes like type II diabetes and major depression, even if we don't know what causes them.

Some may want to say that mental illnesses are "fake" because there is no (identified at this point) specific "lesions" to point to. But where is the identified "lesion" in type 2 diabetes? [A damaged pancreas is an "effect" of the underlying (mostly unknown) metabolic abnormalities, not the cause!]. The fact that hereditary mental illness is more strongly genetically influenced than most other illnesses treated in medicine, implies that there are internal abnormal gene products causing cellular and neuro-architectural abnormalities i.e. "lesions" if that nomenclature is preferred. And we have certainly identified "lesions" that are the effect of mental illness (damaged hearts and brains, for example) as there are "lesions" that are the effects of other systemic illnesses like diabetes (damaged eyes, kidneys, and pancreas'). So, yes there are "lesions" in hereditary mental illness, as there are lesions in other most other illnesses, both causing and as a consequence of these syndromes.

But for some reason, Professor Deutsch attempts to disenfranchise the mentally ill by claiming that their hereditary mental illnesses could all be "caused...., 100%" by their choices as if other illnesses do not equally (or usually more so) involve "choices".

Responding to a reader who was defending the genetic basis of a developmental disability (Aspergers's), Professor Deutsch says,

".....it is perfectly possible for a given behaviour to be 100% caused by "part of the brain not functioning ... due to genes ... [that] ... render a person unable to will themselves out", and yet also to be 100% due to the way other people have behaved towards that person, or 100% due to the person's own choices."

But, it is easier to argue that type II diabetes and/or the most common type of coronary artery disease are "100%" caused by people's choices, than to make a similar argument for hereditary mental illness syndromes like bipolar disease or schizophrenia. After all, we know that coronary artery disease can be at least partially reversed by lifestyle and nutritional choices (Ornish) without use of medications. Similarly, early Type II diabetes can often be eliminated (or more likely delayed) by substantial weight loss and very regular exercise. It is at least arguable (although data is not available) that given these results, if intensive dietary modification and exercise had begun as children, coronary artery disease (if not caused by hereditary dyslipidemias), might be completely avoided in most if not all those who subsequently develop it! If this were true, we could argue that common types of coronary artery disease were "100%" caused by people's choices, despite having a hereditary component. Similar evidence of reversibility has NOT been found for those who have developed bipolar illness and schizophrenia. Even those with bipolar disease and schizophrenia who are perfectly compliant with medications, therapy, exercise, nutritional interventions; nonetheless frequently experience relapses, although less frequently than the non-compliant.

Our multiple studies of heritability of mental illness, as well as frequent clinical experience, similarly shows us that even when children are adopted at birth into loving homes surrounded by generations of mentally healthy offspring, those adopted, if genetically related to biological families horribly afflicted by serious mental illness, often develop serious mental illness. This occurs, despite heroic efforts of very concerned parents and family members. And studies also reveal that adopted children from biological families of origin with no hereditary mental illnesses, usually do not develop hereditary mental illness even if adopted into families in which such conditions affect every generation.

Most doctors and scientists agree that hereditary mental illness syndromes are as real as any other syndromes in medicine, and are not waiting for Professor Deutsch's approval to treat patients! In fairness, however, I think Professor Deutsch would honestly acknowledge that his opinions are in the minority, but he would correctly tell us that that does not make him wrong. Nonetheless, when a famous physicist declares mental illness "fake," he implicitly states that literally hundreds of studies cited by the National Institute of Health are fundamentally flawed because of misinterpretation of results. That takes a good bit of chutzpah!

Unfortunately, Professor Deutsch does not say much about his, in my opinion, radical sociological theories that attempt to call mental illnesses "fake" and try to explain away heritability of mental illness as "choice"; but readers of this blog can get a (slightly) better insight into his thinking by reading more of his actual responses in the section "On Fake Diseases", "Science and Superstition", and "Mad vs. Bad," on his "Setting the World to Rights" blog, as I cite just a few of his quotes.

And here are a few of Professor Deutsch's direct quotes, to get a feel for his thinking in this area. The responses I quote first are to a letter that I wrote to the "Setting the World to Rights" blog when I claimed (I thought modestly!) that bipolar illness is "genetically based" (to my reading of the data 50-90%) and that biological factors help to create (or cause) certain mental illnesses. The next set of quotes from Professor Deutsch are directed to a different reader.

Professor Deutsch -- "Let's define a cause as a factor with the property that if it had been different, the effect in question would not have happened (or, perhaps, would have been less likely). I think this is the common core of all definitions of causation....."

....., but unfortunately, according to the above definition, it is just as true that the Holocaust was 'caused' by the attributes of the victims – particularly by the fact that they were Jews, Gypsies, etc., for if any of them had lacked those attributes, they would almost certainly have survived.....

For the same reason, if we use that definition of causation in the study of the genetic origin of any other human behaviour, we shall make equally massive mistakes. For example, we would (sic) easily conduct a scientific study and find overwhelming evidence that lynchings of black people were caused by the black people's own genes..."

David Deutsch

Or, in a discussion of the causes of a developmental disorder, Aspergers, that Professor Deutsch titles, "Fake Diseases, Empty Explanations", a reader tried to counter Deutsch's unusual arguments against Aspergers by saying,

Reader -- "Given that Asperger Syndrome is much more frequent in monozygotic than fraternal twins, I think many brain doctors would say that it does have a genetic component."

To which Professor Deutsch responded, Deutsch -- "It's true that they would. It's also true that they invariably become evasive when it is pointed out that by this definition of "have a genetic component", being the victim of racist attacks also "has a genetic component", as does being the beneficiary of favouritism due to one's looks.

The Reader also said,
Reader -- "It seems perfectly conceivable that there is simply a part of the brain that is not functioning, and that this is likely to be due to genes interacting with environment in ways that render a person unable to will themselves out this situation."

To which Professor Deutsch responded (as already noted above)

".....it is perfectly possible for a given behaviour to be 100% caused by "part of the brain not functioning ... due to genes ... [that] ... render a person unable to will themselves out", and yet also to be 100% due to the way other people have behaved towards that person, or 100% due to the person's own choices.

Therefore, even setting aside the philosophical complexities of the terms "conceivable" and "unable", the idea that a behaviour is "due to genes" has essentially no content in the absence of some theory about what sort of 'interaction with the environment' is deemed to be the mechanism through which the behaviour in question is 'due to genes'."

Professor Deutsch apparently wishes to argue that all of the studies looking at heritability of mental illnesses are completely irrelevant in terms of suggesting that heredity, rather than peoples choices, can help account for the development of complex behavioral disorders. The idea is that choices of people do not (necessarily) diminish just because a behavior has an increased risk of occurrence due to genetic factors. Indeed, to Professor Deutsch, saying that a behavioral syndrome is heritable says nothing about whether the individual or someone else may have caused the behavior "100%".

This will certainly be a surprising conclusion to most brain scientists, geneticists, and probably to most scientists in general, but I will show later how someone could in fact come to this conclusion, but only in a few very special situations (two of which Professor Deutsch cites above), and virtually no situations that have much to do with serious mental illness. But Professor Deustch is a bright man, and so should not be dismissed, even though I believe most neurobiologists and biobehavioral geneticists would radically disagree with most of his conclusions about mental illness.

According to the National Institute of Health, data from more than 40 family and twin studies over 60 years clearly shows that bipolar illness is heritable. In the twin studies, estimates of concordance in monozygotic ("identical") twins range from 33-90% and in dizygotic ("fraternal twins") just 0-16%. In a large and rigorous study, cited by the NIH, concordance rates were 62% for monozygotic twins and only 8 % for dizygotic twins with a heritability estimate of 59%. However, in another study with the largest number of twins pairs evaluated, heretability of bipolar illness was found to be an astounding 85% (McGuffin P Arch Gen Psych, 2003). This is a figure as high or higher than most other heritable illnesses with polygenetic origins. These figures clearly show that genetic factors dramatically increase the risk of development of bipolar illness.

Observed heritability is less in essential hypertension (the most common type of hypertension), type I diabetes, and death from coronary artery disease. Since bipolar illness is heritable and genes code for proteins, differences in gene frequencies in those with and without bipolar illness imply structural and therefore physiological (likely cellular) differences in those predisposed to bipolar illness. And unlike genetic differences in hair or eye color, the genetic/structural differences in individuals who develop bipolar illness cause remarkable disability. In one of the best studies of brain differences in those with bipolar disorder (Nature, 1997), Drevets showed that those with bipolar disorder have 40% less gray matter volume relative to normal controls. Those with bipolar illness die an average of 9 years earlier than those not afflicted (Hirschfield, 2003).

Unmedicated first episode (first psychotic break) patients with schizophrenia (a 40-50% heritable illness) also show dramatic differences in brain structure relative to normal controls, and we now have sequential brain imaging studies of significant brain degeneration over two years in patients with schizophrenia suffering their first psychotic break, when given suboptimal pharmacotherapy versus optimal pharmacotherapy (Lieberman JA, ACNP 2002).

Previous data has shown that the same effective treatment offered to patients with schizophrenia (vs. ineffective treatment or placebo) leads to improvements in multiple measures of cognitive functioning (Wirshing). In other words, modern pharmacological treatment of schizophrenia preserves brain structure and enhances brain functioning (for example cognition) in individuals suffering a first psychotic break, at least over two years.

And for those readers and editors who don't understand the phenomenon of mental illness or the magnitude of the problem, and so prefer to make fun of individuals with schizophrenia (e.g. the "Qi Gong" reader), I would suggest meeting someone suffering with a first psychotic episode. Psychotic/hallucinating individuals often frighten themselves and all concerned, and even those who are making fun of them may learn a touch of compassion when observing someone so tortured by hallucinations and fear. No, psychotic behavior cannot just be imagined by the disinterested philosopher or physicist: Learning about the mentally ill, like learning about physics, sometimes requires getting your hands dirty.

Remarkably enough Professor Deutsch singles out mental illness for approbation (amongst all illness with genetically mediated risks) by attempting to theoretically argue against any "genetic" (or even brain state) explanation of abnormal behavior. He claims that seeming genetic causality could also be explained ("100%") by the "choice" of an individual and/or "100%" by the "choice" of another. Professor Deutsch does not explain in detail how, despite obvious evidence to the contrary, "choice" could explain the known evidence for heritability of mental illness, preferring instead to give two examples of poorly interpreted hypothetical studies (that he concocts) to argue that the thousands of existing studies of heritability in bipolar illness and other illnesses could all be misleading.

One hypothetical study involves scientists trying to find the causes of "lynching" of black people, by examining the black person's genes! Another hypothetical study involves trying to find the causes of advancement in society, by examining the genetics of attractive and unattractive people. He uses these examples of the inappropriate use of genetic formulas, as if somehow acknowledging this possibility implies that hundreds of studies calculating hereditary factors in mental illness are all wrong.

Unfortunately, he says so little in his discussion and expects the arguments to be so self-evident that I am forced to try to fill in the details of his own arguments. And of course, as with most phenomena, the "devil is in the details". Once his own examples are explored in more detail, it becomes very obvious that hereditary mental illness has little or nothing to do with his examples!

Professor Deutsch is seriously wrong in a number of ways.

1. Hereditary mental illness is not "chosen". Rather, it restricts choice.
2. There are no "alternative" psychological explanations for hereditary mental illnesses that do not themselves strongly implicate hereditary factors.
3. High heritability estimates cannot be explained away by a radical sociological theory positing that heritable mental illness is actually caused by reaction to a genetically mediated characteristic to which others then respond (like black skin causing lynching). Instead high heritability, in the contemporary meaning of the term, implies genetically caused, internally created, physiological differences between those at risk and not at risk for developing the illness.
4. Mental Illness is hardly unique amongst medical illnesses in being caused by multiple etiologies, and so attempts to isolate the mentally ill, intentionally or unintentionally, promote bigotry.

SEVERE MENTAL ILLNESS IS NOT CHOSEN, IT RESTRICTS CHOICE, WHETHER CAUSED BY HEREDITARY FACTORS OR NOT

After Freud, it was commonly thought that mental illnesses, even schizophrenia and bipolar type illnesses, were caused by people's conscious or unconscious choices. Although this ideology was potentially liberating for individuals with neuroses and milder mental illnesses, because it returned ultimate responsibility to the individual; this view nonetheless added to the stigma already attached to those with serious mental illness. No matter what sick patients chose and no matter what their family members and friends chose, those with severe mental illnesses and their families were, in point of fact, stuck with horrible illnesses and their consequences

Yet others, fortunate enough not to be so afflicted, could blame those suffering with mental illness for their own circumstances and therefore rationalize their own good fortune, and so feel less obligation to help those in need. In the age of superstition, it used to be that the mentally ill decided to become witches, or chose to "make a deal" with the devil. And now certain libertarians and "freedomists" have created a new kind of superstition, best described as a "totalitarian rationalist" ideology, an ideology that cannot admit that in some situations its tenets don't apply (i.e. can be falsified). In other words, they hypocritically argue that all ideas should be subject to attempts to falsify them, except their own extreme rationalist ideology! So even when patients become frightened by seeing and hearing things that cannot be heard or seen by anyone else, these hallucinations could somehow still be caused by the "choices" of the victims; because patients could have chosen otherwise and not subjected themselves to the frightening visions and torture that they experience. They could have chosen otherwise, because everyone has the potential to be equally rational, and so equally capable of allowing or not allowing mind-altering experiences. (Indeed the belief that everyone is capable of equal rationality defines what I would call "totalitarian rationalism").

So again, the mentally ill can be blamed for their choices, just as witches of old. In today's world, totalitarian rationalists will agree that individuals may have "problems" that need "solutions," but they don't have "mental illnesses" or "diseases", because according to the totalitarian rationalist, each individual can be "100%" responsible for his own mental state! Unlike those with "real disease," caused by impersonal factors like "lesions"; the mentally ill, in effect, choose their own circumstances and so can be held responsible for the consequences of their choice that then leads to what others call "mental illness."

And compassion and resources are often withheld for those who choose their own downfall. For example, those pleading for support for individuals with lung cancer (vastly under-funded relative to other illnesses with similar morbidity and mortality), always remind us that many individuals who get lung cancer never smoked! Just as with mental illness, many don't feel the need to be as compassionate towards those who substantially contributed to their own demise (by for example smoking), relative to those injured by impersonal factors over which the individual has little control. Blaming mental illness on the individual's choices, therefore diminishes the sense of obligation that people feel for the mentally ill, diminishes the money spent on research, and adds additional stigma to a group of people who arguably experience as much irrational hostility as any other large group of people in the world. I think many argue that mental illnesses could be caused by "choices" because they would like to shift blame to the mentally ill, but only Professor Deutsch knows his intentions.

But let us explore in some depth how Professor Deutsch might have come to the conclusion that severe mental illness could be caused by the mentally ill person himself, regardless of heritability estimates to the contrary; though Deutsch never really tells us how he came to his conclusions. We will exclude physical assaults of one person on another, for now.

Even if one person repeatedly chooses to psychologically assault another, in what sense could it be said that the victim caused his own subsequent painful feelings? Perhaps, just as the person expressing the hostility has a choice to express hostility, would not the individual hearing the hostile words have a "choice" whether to ignore the words or not? If giving someone a mental illness is a choice, is not receiving a mental illness also a choice? What a priori reason do we have to believe that one person's hostile thoughts cannot be blocked by another's more rational thoughts, especially since unfounded hostility directed towards a person and allegedly causing mental illness, should seem irrational to the person hearing the words.

But some individuals may be young or inexperienced in fending off the blatant hostility of others. Even if true, surely these unfortunate individuals without experience could learn to fight back if their brain/mind has the capacity to make rational decisions. And why shouldn't brains/minds have the capacity to learn how to fight back and make rational decisions, despite attempts to teach irrational thinking? After all, those suggesting that genetics need not be involved in explaining mental illness would argue that genes will not make one brain/mind less capable of thinking rationally than another. And if a person becomes mentally ill because he did not fight irrational thoughts or learn the basic principles of combating irrational thinking, then he has, in effect, chosen to allow himself to be harmed and so possibly hastened the development of his own mental illness. Or at any rate some may argue that, and therefore shift blame to the individual with mental illness.

At this point we may wish to ask ourselves why two identical twins, assumed to have rational minds, would both "choose" to be vulnerable to hostility in such a way as to weaken their further ability to think, so when they are further attacked, they are even more sensitive? Perhaps to some reading this, increasingly irrational thought learned from others, coupled with increased vulnerability and sensitivity, may somehow cause severe mental illness, including bipolar disorder. But how can Professor Deutsch, in the absence of biological and genetic influences, say that people would choose such an outcome? We must

1. Conclude that having bipolar illness is a rational choice so people will choose it if offered the opportunity, but then everyone should, too, which does not fit with the evidence, although we will discuss this possibility later.

Or

2. Conclude that certain thoughts, perhaps seductively phrased or presented to the inexperienced, may initially be heard ("chosen" by the individual to be heard) and incorporated in his or her thinking scheme. But perhaps once the initial choice is made, the accepted thoughts permanently decrease the capacity of people to rationally evaluate future thoughts presented to them, perhaps even by physically damaging the brains of those so inflicted. To use a computer analogy, the initial software loaded damages the hardware, and therefore prevents different sorts of corrective software from being loaded in the future. (Like a computer virus attacking the virus scanner, or attacking the hardware responsible for loading updated anti-viral software).

Indeed, something like possibility 2 is possibly what causes some of the brain damage associated with (mostly) non-heritable mental illness like Post-Traumatic Stress Disorder. Humans who experiencing even relatively infrequent and minor episodes of abuse as children show permanent increases in "stress reactivity" (physiological and psychological reactions to stressful situations) for the rest of their lives (Helm, Nemeroff JAMA). Similar results have been found in rigorously controlled studies of primate mothers. For example, heart rate during stress in women abused vs. not abused as children tends to be 4 beats per minute higher during adulthood, even in otherwise psychologically healthy women, presumably for the rest of these women's lives. A stress hormone precursor (ACTH) is more than double during stress, presumably also for the rest of these abused women's lives, even when they exhibit no evidence of any mental illness. Arguably, being more physiologically reactive after early life trauma, could potentially be beneficial in the jungle if life is "brutish and short," and if early trauma predicts later attacks when an adult. But in contemporary Western nations, excess reactivity to stress may inhibit future learning because of its effects on flexible thinking, memory, and because strong reactions to others may cause some to deny such "overly emotional" individuals the opportunity to learn, if their reactions appear inappropriate in some situations. And certainly there are situations in which reacting calmly and with self-discipline, ultimately optimizes chances for success. And stress can permanently damage the brain. After the Sarin gas attacks in Tokyo, those subjects developing Post-Traumatic Stress Disorder exhibited progressive brain shrinkage in areas of the brain previously known to be damaged in individuals experiencing extreme stress.(Yamasu, 2003, Proceed, Natl Acad. Science)

So Professor Deutshe's sense that one need not attribute brain abnormalities, and permanently different physiological/behavioral reactions only to genetic influence, is certainly correct. Unfortunately, as I will demonstrate later, his intuition applies to non-heritable mental illness (like PTSD) much more so than to heritable mental illnesses like bipolar illness or schizophrenia!

But if psychological stress permanently alters brains/minds to make them less able to think rationally in certain situations (i.e. if possibility 2 above is true), why would identical twins have higher rates of concordance than fraternal twins, for hereditary mental illness, allegedly caused by factors like this?

This is where Professor Deutsch's arguments come in. Perhaps there are genes, shared by identical twins, which create some type of innocuous "attribute", say red hair or black skin. Perhaps for some irrational reason, individuals tend to psychologically attack individuals who share this physical characteristic (red hair or black skin) in common. And if one identical twin has a given physical characteristic, the second identical twin is far more likely to have the same given physical characteristic. In effect, wherever they are, both twins bring, not only their "heredity", but because of reaction to a physical characteristic, their "environment" with them as well! If the presence of people with seemingly innocuous characteristics (like red hair or black skin) "causes" others to change their behavior and spew forth their hostile and irrational thoughts, then two identical twins with either red hair or black skin, even if raised apart, are more likely to share the experience of hearing the expressed hostility because of their red hair, and then share the effect of the hostility (the mental illness) in common. Technically, these types of effects are called "indirect heritability" with "reactive gene-environment correlation". This type of reactive covariance between a physical attribute and an intentional response to it, is not added into genetic variance when calculating heritability. Therefore, contrary to Professor Deutsch, discrimination based on red hair or black skin is (naturally) not considered hereditary, as discussed later! This is one of Professor Deutsch's primary technical misunderstandings of genetic theory.

But let us continue with Deutschian arguments anyway. If black people had a higher incidence of brain damage because of a higher incidence of post-traumatic stress disorder (due to racism), we should not conclude that black people's genes caused the brain damage, even though (very) simplistic statistical models would suggest exactly that. So a cultural phenomenon (racism) could be the logical culprit, even though genes for black skin could superficially seem to be responsible for brain damage.

Perhaps there is something similar going on in mental illness,

Professor Deutsch implicitly suggests, and the candidate genes identified by the National Institute of Health (in individuals with bipolar disease and schizophrenia), might actually be coding for an observable "attribute" or physical characteristic that then causes discrimination – the real culprit. Or so it could be argued.

Deutschian theory that choices could entirely explain seemingly heritable mental illness could proceed as follows, although he is not specific and does not explain his theories, so I have to guess the content of his arguments. Identical twins share some genetically mediated attributes in common (like red hair). This red hair attracts those who like to discriminate ("causes" them to discriminate). And this discrimination then permanently damages the brains of those affected. Once affected, the twins become more susceptible to accepting further hostile and irrational thoughts and the mental illness gets worse. Therefore individuals who develop bipolar disorder (assumed to be caused by accepting "irrational thoughts"), whether twins or not, will either share a common behavior developing before the illness ("prodromal behavior") or will share a visible attribute in common (like red hair). This characteristic attracts the discrimination of others based on the characteristic. And the discrimination causes brain damage, so the irrationality is perpetuated and enhanced by the individual, now with brain damage due to discrimination.

Professor Deutsch talks about African Americans getting lynched. In a very simplistic statistical model, Caucasians predisposed to vicious racism, can be influenced to change their ongoing behavior by the presence of an African American. Some may even lynch the individual appearing before them who happens to be black. So the presence of the African American (and his genes coding for black skin), in a twisted statistical sense, could be said to "cause" the rise in racist fervor that subsequently leads to lynching. Professor Deutsch argues similarly that genes coding for individuals who are perceived to be attractive, in a statistical sense, could be said to cause a social phenomenon like favoritism -- if those who happen to be more attractive are, for example, more likely to advance in society and if attractiveness is genetically mediated.

Professor Deutsch (correctly) wishes us to believe that black skin color, red hair, or unattractiveness are not illnesses even though they are caused by genes, precipitate lynching or mistreatment, lead to pain and suffering, and are heritable. We ought to believe that it is peoples (irrational) reactions to black skin color, red hair, or unattractive people, not the appearance itself, (nor the genes coding for the black skin) that is the root cause of racism or favoritism. Therefore it is argued that heritability studies in mental illness teach us very little about the genetic cause of mental illness, because environmental factors (for example the choice of someone to abuse someone with a given characteristic) could interact with an innocuous genetic factor (e.g. black skin, or some other trait). So even when identical twins share a given disabling mental illness much more frequently than similarly situated fraternal twins, the cause of this disability may still be peoples choices. Or so it is argued.

Deutschian models of mental illness, therefore, resemble sociological models of individuals experiencing racism and then possibly experiencing further injury because of their incomplete ability to cope with the initial racism. But please note that the victim of racism has fewer choices (indeed if lynched, he may be dead). So even (for now) granting Deutschian conceptions that seemingly heritable mental illness does not have to be caused by genetics; even accepting the whole interesting story about there being common physical characteristics or attributes of the mentally ill to which others respond and neurobiologists don't know about:

Mental illness is still not caused by the "choices" of individuals with mental illness! Mental illness, rather, would be caused by the transmission of thoughts that take choices away, even if genetic factors are not involved.

So in what sense can Professor Deutsch argue that seemingly heritable mental illness is caused by the choices of the victim? Even if he wishes to try to maintain the illusion that genes do not substantially contribute to the risk of developing mental illness, in what sense is heritable mental illness potentially caused "100%" by the choices of the victim? This simply makes no sense.

Unless he wishes to argue that having a mental illness is not a disadvantage, as unattractiveness is, and perhaps he thinks mental illness is an advantage (like being attractive!) So perhaps Professor Deutsch believes mental illness adds opportunities for those afflicted, and so they choose amongst increased opportunities, relative to those without mental illness.

Professor Deutsch does not elaborate on how mental illness, despite high heritability, could nonetheless be caused "100%" by the choice of the afflicted individual. Professor Deutsch does use the example of individuals advancing in society because of their good looks, perhaps to argue that good-looking individuals who advance in society are analogous to the mentally ill (??), and in some sense, attractive individuals must still choose to advance, even if their good looks help to pave the way. Although Professor Deutsch does not offer an explanation for why he brings up attractiveness as a trait leading to advancement, I will try to make sense of what he said.

Assume attractiveness is to some extent genetically mediated. If an individual who is attractive happens to be offered more opportunities (more choices) than others equally talented but not as attractive, should we say that the genes coding for the person to be attractive caused the person's advancement? Perhaps. But maybe it was societal favoritism (cultural factors) causing the advancement? Or perhaps it was the attractive person's choice to take advantage of the opportunities afforded him?

So, if we were looking for genes in common to high achievers, we might identify certain candidate genes that seem to "cause" individuals to advance. But actually, if the candidate genes code for an attractive appearance, it is cultural favoritism that provides good-looking individuals with more opportunities. Finally, it is the individuals "choice" to take advantage of the opportunities afforded that leads to advancement, though an unthinking statistician might credit the genetics solely. But Professor Deutsch never says how this type of argument could apply to the mentally ill, only that mental illness could be the individuals "choice" (possibly?) in the same way that taking advantage of societal favoritism could be considered an attractive individual's choice.

But for this reasoning to apply to the mentally ill, seemingly heritable mental illness behavior would have to be linked to a gene coding for a physical characteristic or visible attribute that promotes advancement. Perhaps the mentally ill have a certain physical characteristic (say strikingly blue eyes). Because they have strikingly blue eyes, they are assumed to be confident, and so they are offered opportunities to advance more; but the opportunities require that they stay up later at night for periods of time (as if manic) and then later "sleep it off" (as if depressed.) If strikingly blue eyes earns patients reinforcement for acting in this somewhat bipolar way, then individuals with this supposed bipolar disorder could be said to choose bipolar behavior over "normal behavior" because it leads to their advancement! But the genes do not themselves increase the "risk" of someone exhibiting allegedly bipolar behavior, although they might appear to do so in a simplistic model; but rather the genes code for blue eyes, which then causes others to reward this seemingly bipolar behavior.

But if someone really believes that bipolar disorder grants opportunities, he or she truly does not understand mental illness in the slightest. Individuals with bipolar illness may sleep 4 hours per week as if on massive doses of cocaine for 3-4 weeks. But at least those on cocaine "come down" after a day or two. Those with bipolar illness often do not slow down for weeks on end. With pressured speech, racing thoughts, and then paranoid hallucinations, they will feel no need for sleep for weeks, and even a few months. And then, for months on end, they may hibernate, sleeping 17 hours per day and feeling utter despair and depression. Those with bipolar disorder have approximately 2 – 3 times the rate of cerebrovascular, cardiovascular, and endocrine death (Osby, 2001), die an average of 9 years earlier (Hirschfield, 2003), and have nearly 30 times the rate of suicide relative to the non-mentally ill (Angst, F, 2002). Almost everyone with bipolar disorder wishes they did not have it. If Professor Deutsch feels bipolar disorder would grant him opportunities that he would like to choose, he is welcome to use massive doses of cocaine every day for a month until he cries for sleep, only to be afforded his wish a month later, when he will get to sleep 17 hours a day on massive doses of barbiturates for 8 months, only to begin again. Then with a little personal experience, he may be able to better understand the true meaning of "choice", rather than investigate it as a pleasant philosophical discussion in the security of his home or lab. .

Perhaps in believing that the mentally ill "choose" their mental illness ("behavior" to Professor Deutsch), Professor Deutsch instead means that individuals' genes increase risk for certain types of feelings, and then individuals "choose" how to handle these feelings, or place themselves in an environment which helps with that choice (so called "active" gene-environment correlation). For example, most individuals with schizophrenia, experience a degree of paranoia, likely heavily influenced by genetic factors. However the specific events or ideas which frighten those with schizophrenia, do in fact vary between people. Those with past experiences with the American government or who continually read the politics section of an American newspaper may become convinced that the CIA has implanted a transmitter in their ear, and demand to have it surgically removed. In effect, they hear a voice that they believe is absolutely real, often even rapidly turn their head to hear the "voice" more clearly, but seem to confabulate a scenario, in response to the voice that they hear. The confabulation, based on their underlying paranoia, seems to derive from themes from their own past or present, as interpreted through their paranoia, and indeed they will seem to be attracted to a wide variety of "conspiracy" theories and read about them. In this sense, we perceive them to "choose" the themes that are built around their paranoid illness. But the patient absolutely believes the delusions are real and DOES NOT perceive them to be his choices. Telling someone with schizophrenia that he did not really hear voices speaking to him will cause him to believe that YOU are crazy, just as if I spoke to one of the readers of the "World" and then told him that he did not "really" hear my voice. (Activation of parts of the brain interpreting "sound" are identical in those who hear my speech and in those who hallucinate voices, so from the perspective of the individual in either case, both "voices" are absolutely real). In short, we may perceive that the individual chooses the themes to build around his underlying paranoia, but the individual does not perceive he had any hand in his perceptions.

But what can be said about others "choosing" to cause bipolar illness or schizophrenia in a victim? Is this the cause of bipolar illness? According to Deutschian arguments, saying that bipolar disorder is heritable, says nothing about whether genes really cause bipolar disorder, because a common set of genes between twins could cause them to have a given observable attribute (say red hair). This red hair could cause others to treat these twins badly in a systematic and predictable way. And of course, systematic and predictable mistreatment by others could then cause, equally predictable behavioral responses by the twins. Unthinking doctors could then label such predictable responses "bipolar" illness, for example. Therefore injured twins, mistreated due to red hair, could have similar behavioral responses and brains to each other, but different from others without red hair. Such abuse might cause predictable gray matter loss in brains, loss of cognitive ability, and death an average of 9 years earlier i.e. symptoms seemingly identical to bipolar illness. And so it could be argued that genetically based impersonal illnesses like schizophrenia and bipolar disorder, could actually be caused by the planned choices ("intelligent design") of those who mistreat others. These abusers could injure others because these "others" have a common physical characteristic like red hair or other attribute. Just as racists choose to abuse those with African ancestry because of their skin color, so too could individuals mistreat or inappropriately reward or punish those with red hair, consequently leading to a predictable behavioral syndrome. So even a mental illness that is 59% heritable, like bipolar illness, could nonetheless be caused "100%" by the choices of others, not by specific genetic factors.

I will label these creative ideas of David Deutsch, the "Intelligent Design Identifies Traits that are Observable, Creating Heritable Mental Illness" (IDITO CHeMI). But Professor Deutsch may not be aware that brain changes have been studied when people and animals have been exposed to a variety of rewards and punishments and when people have been exposed to various types of discrimination. In particular, the consequences of episodes of abuse have been studied in great detail. Abuse victims tend to exhibit known and predictable reactions when particular dimensions of behavior are measured and when brain scans are performed. Never have various reinforcement and punishment schemes been found to cause schizophrenia or even bipolar illness, or the neurological changes associated with schizophrenia or bipolar illness. If a vulnerable individual experiences severe enough psychological trauma (e.g. unnatural death of loved ones), the patterns of behavioral response are called "post-traumatic stress" reactions. Sometimes individuals who have been abused develop "depressive" reactions in addition to post-traumatic reactions, or either independently. Although these post-traumatic reactions and depressive reactions do cause structural brain changes, the brain changes in bipolar illness and schizophrenia are remarkably different, even if those with bipolar disease and schizophrenia have also been abused (references available on request). Furthermore, the behavioral syndromes of post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD) and major depression are also very different from the behavioral syndromes exhibited by those demonstrating manic behavior in bipolar disorder; or those experiencing psychotic episodes, in those with schizophrenia. In addition, the pharmacological treatments of bipolar disease, post-traumatic stress disorder, depression, and schizophrenia are entirely different.

In other words,

- a. Mistreatment of others because of a given physical or psychological characteristic (like black skin),
- b. Various types of reinforcement and punishment schemes (e.g. the "schizophrenogenic mother"),
- c. Discrimination based on unusual behavior, and

d. Discrimination because of religious preference or other psychological characteristics; have all been studied over decades.

Therefore, individuals who happen to have grown up in situations in which others choose to (verbally) treat them cruelly after birth, do not physiologically, neuroanatomically, psychologically, or pharmacologically exhibit the same characteristics as those with bipolar illness or schizophrenia, (even if those with bipolar disorder and schizophrenia have also been mistreated). Especially in schizophrenia, but likely also in bipolar disorder, psychological abuse of an individual because of a physical, psychological, or behavioral "attribute"; has never been shown to cause the illnesses, despite being repeatedly studied, although stress can make existing psychotic symptoms worse or sometimes can precipitate a first manic or psychotic episode, but in individuals with predisposing risks factors (e.g. family history). On the contrary, hundreds of studies show that consistent abuse causes post-traumatic stress disorder and depressive symptoms, instead.

There are a few rare exceptions to the rule that choices do not seem to cause bipolar disease and schizophrenia. For example, if an individual is hit in the head severely, either because of an accident or the intentional behavior of someone else, such individuals with traumatic brain injury in particular locations can sometimes appear to have bipolar variants or even chronic psychotic variants (like schizophrenia) even when such individuals have no family history and no other seeming risk factors for the development of the illness.

Also, in utero abuse, for example psychological stress of the mother, particularly first trimester abuse or deprivation, does appear to lead to increased rates of development of schizophrenia and other brain disorders in the mother's offspring. For example, when the Nazis blockaded ("chose to blockade") Western Holland between 1944-1945, and so caused famine, women who were in their first trimester of pregnancy had more than twice the rate of ultimately hospitalized offspring with schizophrenia (Susser). In addition there is suggestive evidence that marijuana smoking significantly accelerates the development of schizophrenia in those who ultimately develop the illness. Contrary to Professor Deutsch, neurobiologists, psychiatrists, psychologists and others have looked for ways in which people's choices may cause schizophrenia and bipolar disorder, and despite an exhaustive search, there are vanishingly few choices that individuals can make that seem to cause these illnesses. Many studies, on the other hand, have in fact found that different disorders are partially caused by peoples choices (e.g. major depression and PTSD)].

But in general it is impersonal factors, for example, early life viral infections (perhaps in individuals with genetically mediated immune sensitivity) and/or susceptibility to various environmental toxins, lack of oxygen delivery during birth, small gestational size, family history of illness, etc. which are consistently found when looking for potential causative factors in the development of schizophrenia and bipolar illness.

Therefore, Professor Deutsch's theory that a visible "attribute" of all those who ultimately develop mental illness, could lead others to choose to respond to it, and the response to this attribute somehow causes schizophrenia or bipolar illness; does not line up with the evidence in the slightest. If individual choices do substantially cause bipolar illness or schizophrenia, they certainly do so in ways that patients, their doctors, and others don't know about, and so individuals cannot intentionally choose these illnesses.

So on the one hand we have Professor Deutsch's radical sociological theory of people discriminating or acting differently towards someone because of an observable "attribute", and in treating someone badly somehow generate schizophrenia or bipolar disorder. But there is essentially nothing to support this line of reasoning. Indeed there are countless studies showing that the consequences of discrimination and unusual rewards and punishments are not schizophrenic behavior or bipolar behavior, but rather PTSD symptoms and Depressive symptoms! And on the other hand, there are hundreds of studies pointing to the opposite conclusion, namely that impersonal (not choice related) factors likely precipitate, mediate, and cause bipolar illness and schizophrenia.

GIVING PROFESSOR DEUTSCH A HEROIC BENEFIT OF THE DOUBT

But let us nonetheless give Professor Deutsch a (truly heroic) benefit of the doubt (for a moment) and assume that heritable mental illnesses, like schizophrenia or bipolar illness, can be caused "100%" by intentional behavior directed toward those with an innocuous attribute (like red hair) even if there is essentially no evidence for this. We can ask what the world would look like if Professor Deutsch's remarkable ideas were true.

If Professor Deutsch is correct, in order for the "choices" of an individual who discriminates to be "100%" responsible for the bipolar behavior or schizophrenic behavior of identical twins, there must be a common observable attribute of the twins, to which those who wish to discriminate can consistently "choose" to react to (like red hair). Furthermore, since bipolar disorder and schizophrenia are worldwide illnesses, this characteristic of those with bipolar disorder or schizophrenia must be observable by individuals the world over.

But where is this observable characteristic (like black skin color or red hair) that individuals, the world over, "choose" to react to? If you ask a white racist what causes him to lynch one person rather than another, he can surely tell you that his choice of whom to lynch is made at least partially based on the color of the person's skin whom he wishes to attack. Precisely because the characteristics of victims of racism (and favoritism) are obvious to the person who discriminates, scientists can observe the practice of discrimination. But after thousands of years, and now intense scrutiny over decades, with multiple hypotheses tested and rejected, no scientist can find a stable and easily observed characteristic or "attribute" (like red hair or a behavior) reliably observed and common to all those who ultimately develop bipolar illness or schizophrenia. Schizophrenia and bipolar disorder usually are first diagnosed in young adults.

Concerning possible early behavioral tip-offs of future bipolar illness, for example, "offspring of (two) bipolar I parents tend to appear well adjusted in early life, but have significantly higher rates of bipolar I and bipolar II disorders (later in life)" [Kaplan and Sadock, Comprehensive Textbook of Psychiatry] But schizophrenia and bipolar illness are nonetheless reliably diagnosed once the full-blown syndromes have manifested themselves.

But the problem for Professor Deutsch's theory is even worse than scientists' inability to find consistently observable attributes of all or even most individuals prior to their developing schizophrenia and bipolar illness. If Professor Deutsch's "intelligent design" hypothesis of heritable mental illness were true, even though scientists can't find the heritable observable characteristics common to all destined to develop bipolar disease or schizophrenia, non-scientists must (remarkably enough) be able to see them, since they choose to discriminate because of them. They must be able to see them, because one cannot make a "choice" to treat some people consistently differently than others, if one cannot observe the characteristics distinguishing those to be differently treated from those to be ignored!

Given that there are millions of people in the world who become bipolar or develop schizophrenia and identical twins usually share these disorders far more commonly than fraternal twins (3-8X more commonly!), there must be millions of people who see an observable and heritable physical "attribute" of individuals destined to develop bipolar disease or schizophrenia. This attribute must be substantially different between identical and fraternal twins. People must see this "MARK of the bipolar", for example, before the individual becomes bipolar; except for all scientists, for whom this absolutely consistent phenomenon is apparently invisible! Even Professor Deutsch, a scientist and apparent originator (?) of the theory that "Intelligent Design Identifies Traits that are Observable, Creating Heritable Mental Illness" (IDITO CHeMI), has no idea what millions of people the world over must see, according to his very own theory! On the other hand, if he does know what consistent characteristic the millions see and respond to, let him tell us what the characteristic is!

Unlike explanations of heritable mental illness that focus on unseen and impersonal factors like gene products in blood streams and receptors on neurons, (factors that usually cannot be seen with the naked eye) Professor Deutsch's theory presumes the presence of obvious attributes which miraculously appear and disappear depending upon who is looking for them, nonscientist or scientist. Faced with such argument, how could IDITO CHeMI proponents defend their conceptions?

Perhaps as soon as a scientist looks for the "MARK" of the bipolar that others react to, the "MARK" magically disappears before the scientist can see it?! (Like black skin miraculously turning white as soon as a scientist looks at it, but not when the racist looks at it!) Perhaps there is a conspiracy between everyone who can see the "MARK" of the bipolar, and they all decide to hide the truth from all scientists (except for Professor Deutsch who is the only privileged one to have been told about the conspiracy)?

THERE ARE NO "ALTERNATIVE" EXPLANATIONS FOR HEREDITARY MENTAL ILLNESSES THAT DO NOT THEMSELVES STRONGLY IMPLICATE HEREDITARY FACTORS.

Perhaps at this point Professor Deutsch would give in (a little) and try to claim that maybe there are a few relatively innocuous behaviors, in which risk of occurrence is determined by genes, and the general public can then respond to these behaviors. The public response to these genetically mediated behaviors might then cause schizophrenia or bipolar illness.

The problem is that many scientists, but not apparently Professor Deutsch, have been trying to find "prodromal behaviors" for years, since bipolar illness and schizophrenia do not often manifest until early adulthood. It is frightening to know that just 3 months after a first psychotic episode, the brain shrinks approximately 11 cc's (Lieberman, 2002 ACCP), an easily visible amount even to the untrained eye, if whole brain images prior to, during, and after the psychotic break are compared in movie-like succession, as Dr. Lieberman has done. As a point of reference, one can see this type of brain shrinkage after a small stroke, for example.

But we now have medications that (at least over two years) preserve brain function and prevent this neuro-degenerative disease from progressing. (Lieberman, ACCP 2002) It has therefore become of utmost importance to try to identify people at risk of developing serious mental illness, in order to start treatment before the full illness sets in. (Like treating hypertension before a heart attack. Indeed the NIH is now using analogous language to describe what happens to brains during a first psychotic break.) The problem is, we are unable to find consistent behavioral characteristics that predict with sensitivity and specificity the ultimate manifestation of the illness, otherwise such individuals would be started on medication. Unfortunately, the prodromal behaviors are either non-existent in some or are far more complex and varied than the illness itself. We can consistently and reliably diagnose the illness, but not the prodromal behaviors that predict the illness!

There is some evidence that some of those destined to develop bipolar disorder as adults will seem to have "ADHD-like" or a "hyperthymic" temperament as children, but in general, even the "offspring of (two) bipolar I parents tend to appear well adjusted in early life, but have significantly higher rates of bipolar I and bipolar II disorders (later in life)" [Kaplan and Sadock] Furthermore, virtually all of those with prodromal ADHD-like symptoms or a "hyperthymic" temperament DO NOT develop bipolar disorder, regardless of how people react to these characteristics. Once again, "prodromal" behaviors, do not predict with much sensitivity or specificity the onset of bipolar illness or schizophrenia (though we wish it were so in order to start treatment earlier).

In other words, if someone wants to think that genes increase the risk for development of prodromal behaviors but not the actual illness (because they believe it is people's response to these prodromal "attributes" that cause heritable mental illness), they are then positing the ability of genes to be able to increase the risk for behavior at least as complicated as the actual disease itself! (And they would also believe that non-scientists can find these patterns of prodromal behavior substantially more easily than scientists, even though most in the general public can't even easily recognize the far more obvious bipolar or schizophrenic behaviors!) And again, no systematic pattern of "discrimination" has been shown to cause schizophrenia (rather than PTSD or Depression) even if the victims could be identified by their prodromal symptoms.

Or perhaps Professor Deutsch would cleverly try to argue that the very risk factors I previously mentioned -- getting a viral illness, getting hit in the head, low birth weight, etc. -- are precisely the characteristics that people notice, prior to attacking others with their schizophrenia-and-bipolar-generating environmental program! Once again, however, except in extreme cases, how would a casual observer know that a person was exposed to an in utero viral illness, or was hit in the head when younger, so they could begin the work of planning and creating someone else's schizophrenia or bipolar illness?

SERIOUS MENTAL ILLNESSES ARE HIGHLY HERITABLE AND THIS IMPLIES THE EXISTENCE OF GENETICALLY BASED, INTERNALLY CREATED, PHYSIOLOGICAL DIFFERENCES BETWEEN THOSE AT RISK AND NOT AT RISK FOR DEVELOPING THE ILLNESS.

Heritability is usually divided into "direct heritability" and "indirect heritability". A direct genetic effect implies that genes code for a specific attribute of an individual by affecting or creating an internal physiological or pathophysiological process. For example genes coding for blue eyes are "directly" heritable. On the other hand, genes "indirectly" cause an attribute of an individual, if genes create a direct effect, the environment interacts with that effect, and the subsequent interaction changes or creates the attribute.

1. Indirect heritability (without human choice)

If genes create immune systems that are faulty in the newborn and a vulnerability to a subsequent viral infection in the newborn then increases the risk of mental illness, then the mental illness would be considered an "indirect" effect of the genes coding for a compromised immune system, and so "indirectly heritable".

2. Indirect heritability (with discriminatory human choices)

If genes code for red hair and individuals choose to discriminate because of the red hair, and this causes a mental illness; the mental illness would be an indirect effect of the genes coding for red hair, and so indirectly heritable.

If an attribute is indirectly heritable because discriminatory human choices are involved (as in discrimination against someone with red hair), variance due to this gene-environment correlation is "factored out" and is NOT added to the genetic contribution to variance in calculating heritability, according to standard conventions. Indirect heritability without human choice (for example genetic vulnerability to infectious disease) is usually counted as part of the genetic component of variance.

For example, according to one of the authors of the first behavioral genetics textbooks, (Fuller, 1979)

"In our human societies discriminatory practices are often based upon superficial physical characteristics or upon cultural stereotypes. In these instances a G-E (gene environment) correlation will result. ...(And)..... any correlation between it (the physical characteristic) and behavior is logically attributable to environmental influences. (My emphasis, MG)

In other words, indirect heritability of an attribute due to the intentional choices of people (like effects from both racism and lynching behavior) should be factored out in making estimates of the genetic component of a characteristic or behavior. In Professor Deutsch's example of white people lynching black people, variance due to the positive correlation between genes coding for darker skin and the risk of being lynched, would not be counted in the genetic component of variance, when calculating the heritability of lynching. There are multiple methods of subtracting out this variance when it is known. So contrary to Professor Deutsch, the lynching of black people more than white people would not be considered heritable, once gene-environment covariance is taken into account. To repeat, contrary to Professor Deutsch, a professional bio-behavioral geneticist would report the phenomenon of black people being lynched as "0% heritable"! (Professor Deutsch needs to give modern scientists a bit more credit!)

Biobehavioral geneticists, neuropsychiatrists, and psychologists routinely take into account gene-environment correlations when estimating the genetic component of variance while calculating heritability. Difficulties can arise in estimating the extent of genetic-environmental correlation if :

1. There are clearly observable differences in groups of people that others then react to and
2. These reactions influence a trait of interest and
3. It is difficult to estimate the extent to which these reactions influence the trait of interest.

Controversies involving discrimination, as a cause of gene-environment covariance, do not arise when there are no known consistently observable differences between people and/or when the consequences of discrimination do not cause the development of a trait of interest. When there is doubt about whether a factor should be considered "environmental" or "genetic", it is simply considered one more source of variance in a statistical model, and assigned to neither genetic variance nor environmental variance.

Indeed, IQ differences between racial groupings are controversial because there is argument about which category to place them in. Heritability estimates of IQ differences are confounded by gene-environment correlation because black skin is visible, a genetically mediated attribute, and black skin is correlated with discrimination, an environmentally mediated attribute. And discrimination can lower IQ. But the extent to which discrimination lowers IQ is not known and the extent of discrimination is not known.

But there is no evidence that bipolar illness is caused by individuals sharing a commonly observable attribute that attracts discrimination. And there is especially no evidence that there are commonly observed attributes in those who don't yet have bipolar disorder that everyone but scientists looking for the attributes can see. And there is no evidence that even if such remarkable attributes existed, that discrimination could create the illness, in those with no other propensity to develop bipolar illness. So there is no evidence for any substantial "reactive gene-environment" correlation effects with bipolar illness!

Once known "reactive" gene-environment correlations are factored out or found non-existent, given carefully done scientific experiments with proper controls of variables (e.g. controlling for "shared environments,"), a 59% heritability figure then implies that 59% of the risk for developing an illness like bipolar disorder, is explained by genetic (not environmental) factors and specifically not by discriminatory choices of people. Since genes code for proteins, differences in genetically determined risk of illness implies structural and therefore physiological (likely cellular) differences in those predisposed to bipolar illness. These genetic factors can cause:

- a. Internal changes leading to the pathophysiological attributes of an illness like bipolar directly, or
- b. The elaboration of other conditions which themselves increase risk of developing illness. For example, genetically mediated immuno-compromise could increase risk of an infection that then increases risk of bipolar illness.

The ability to make determinations that an illness is partly caused by a genetic liability is precisely why heritability studies are conducted. Finding the genes, then their pathophysiological products, helps the research effort in ultimately understanding the cause of the illness and then curing the illness. If Professor Deutsch believes the 59% figure quoted by the NIH is calculated incorrectly; he should recalculate the figure or voice his criticisms of the figure in a peer-reviewed forum. And as stated previously, very recent evidence for heritability in bipolar illness is actually far higher, in the 85% (McGuffin, Arch Gen Psych) range.

But it is illegitimate and unfair to dispute a 59% heritability figure by casting doubt about how neurobiologists calculate heritability (usually geneticists do the calculations). Suggesting that "brain doctors" become "evasive" about the concept of heritability because they would find a "genetic component" in those who have been lynched, is disingenuous and wrong. So (per Professor Deutsch) if neurobiologists or others would make such an egregious mistake, we shouldn't trust other estimates by those studying heritability. This argument reflects an unfortunate lack of understanding on Professor Deutsch's part about how heritability estimates are actually calculated, as discussed above.

And the 59% heritability figure cited by the NIH is potentially overly conservative, since a larger and statistically rigorous twin study done suggests heritability estimates over 80% in those with bipolar disorder. Indeed, Professor McGuffin, the author of the recent study (Arch General Psych, 2003) believes that figures as high as this may leave essentially no room for familial environmental influences in the development of this highly heritable illness, at all.

"Univariate model fitting resulted in estimates of heritability in excess of 80% (with a lower confidence limit of more than 70%) whether a broad or narrow diagnostic perspective was taken, suggesting that all of the familiarity of BPD (bipolar affective disorder) could be accounted for by additive genetic effects with no contribution from family environment." [Emphasis mine, MG] (Arch Gen Psych, 2003)

As Professor McGuffin also realizes, it may be premature to eliminate familial environmental influences as causative factors in the development of bipolar illness. But Professor Deutsch and the editors of "The World" should understand: Our modern scientific questions about bipolar illness, no longer dispute that genetic influences profoundly shape this disorder. Rather, research now is attempting to find how genetic abnormalities cause bipolar illness, and to try to see what (if any) non-random environmental factors contribute to causing the illness, because maybe these can be controlled. Failing to understand this, can subject the editors of "The World" to legitimate charges of anti-scientific bias. Given current evidence, the hereditary basis of serious mental illness is no less a fact of life than the theory of evolution.

There likely is some over-diagnosis of schizophrenia in individuals in the black population and under-diagnosis of bipolar disease in the black population (Kilbourne), and this may reflect a number of sociological factors. However, studies of psychiatric patients reveal that when SCID and other structured diagnostic instruments are used and careful diagnostic criteria are applied, and especially when truly random samples are evaluated, there are significantly fewer differences in the rates of psychotic and mood disorders between ethnic groups (Cuffe, Strakowski) although differences still remain in the Cuffe but not in the epidemiological prevalence study of Strakowski.

CONCLUSION:

I have demonstrated that the remarkably high heritability estimates of bipolar illness, evaluated in carefully done studies, implies internally created, genetically based, pathophysiological abnormalities. These abnormalities are associated with remarkable brain damage; for example 40% decrease in brain gray matter (Drevets, Nature). The Lieberman data in schizophrenia is even more persuasive with 12 cc's of brain shrinkage observed over just 6 months after a first psychotic break, unless the patient is given a modern medication.(Lieberman, ACCP). The cognitive decline in those with schizophrenia and bipolar illness, as well as diminution of the rational capacity to make decisions, has been repeatedly documented as well. I have shown that patient choice and even the choice of others is not particularly involved in causing the initial presentation of highly heritable mental illnesses like bipolar illness and schizophrenia. I have shown that the consequences of these illnesses are devastating, and result in 30 times the normal rate of suicide in the general population (Angst, F J Affect Dis, 2002), and 2-3X increased risk of cardiovascular (e.g. heart attacks), endocrine (e.g diabetes) and neurovascular (e.g. stroke) death (Osby, 2001). And patients die an average of 9 years earlier (Hirschfield, J Clin Psych, 2003).

So if the risk of a syndromic condition is highly increased by genetically based pathophysiological abnormalities, associated with profound organ damage, loss of functionality, and consequent damage to other organs; if the onset of the condition has little to do with patient choice, and causes profound patient suffering, it then becomes obvious that such conditions are as legitimate as any other syndromic illnesses in medicine. Yet the editors of the "World" must insist, despite all evidence to the contrary, that there is no mental illness, that choices could explain the cause of these "behaviors" as easily as genes, that charity should be withheld and that research funds cut off, and that sufferers should be subjected to public scorn (the Qi Gong reader with approving banter from the editors). See below for the editors comments in their own words, words that in my view promote bigotry.

"As we have noted before, mental illness is not a real illness." ---
Mad vs. Bad

"However, the religious world is not alone in having worthless superstitions. Secular mental health charities like Rethink promote a view of the world based on the idea of Mental illness." -- Science and Superstition

"Unfortunately, nonsense about mental illness is what passes for serious discussion of moral issues among large and influential sections of the secular world. This, too, is an abrogation of intellectual and moral standards. For the sake of science and freedom and reason, we must abandon these secular superstitions as well." -- Science and Superstition

A new site has proposed a completely different theory for psychotic beliefs (associated with) Mental Illness.....Psychotic episodes associated with Qi Gong.....a model to explain the late adolescent onset of..... schizophrenia...It has not occurred to anyone that the problem these designers and engineers discovered is one of desks, chairs, and repeating detectable movement in a business office.
Reader

"Chronic Cubicle Syndrome" (from the comic strip "Dilbert")

Editor

Editors: David Deutsch, Sarah Fitz-Claridge, Alan Forrester

Professor Deutsch and the editors of the "Setting the World to Rights" blog attack serious mental illness syndromes ("worthless superstition") by calling them "fake." In doing so they attempt to disenfranchise the mentally ill but also reveal their own profound ignorance, or ideologically motivated biases. One truly wonders why Professor Deutsch brings up concepts of "choice" when discussing some of the least "chosen" illnesses of any variety that one can think of: Schizophrenia and Bipolar illness. If someone reading this has actually spoken to someone with active schizophrenia, no evidence other than his/her own observation is needed to understand that no individual would choose such a condition.

Multiple illnesses develop partially because of peoples choices including, coronary artery disease, smoking induced chronic obstructive pulmonary disease, venereal disease, migraine headaches, viral sore throats (whose hand did you "choose" to shake?), gall bladder disease (how much fat did you "choose" to consume?), swimmers ear (where did you choose to swim?), fungal infections of the feet (where did you choose to walk?), institutional pneumonias (why did you "choose" to live there?), bacterial meningitis (why did you "choose" to associate with him?), osteoarthritis (why did you "choose" to get so heavy), hearing loss (choice of rock bands?), broken legs ("choice" of skiing?), lead poisoning ("choice" of living arrangement), etc, etc., etc..
Attempting to selectively attack the illnesses of the seriously mentally ill, stricken by their heredity and harmed by impersonal forces, amongst all patients with illnesses more logically "caused by" individual "choices", promotes bigotry against the mentally ill.

If Professor Deutsch wishes to make the argument that certain illnesses that the NIH attributes largely to heredity, could actually be caused by cultural discrimination based on an observable attribute, appearing before the onset of illness; why did he not pick illnesses that actually have a genetically mediated observable attribute? For example, those with pre-diabetic syndromes are far more likely to have a visible attribute like large stomachs with thin arms and legs, than those with prodromal bipolar illnesses or schizophrenic illnesses! And Type II diabetes is a remarkably hereditary illness after age 45. So perhaps people's discriminatory comments, when they see someone with a large stomach, completely cause diabetes, by increasing cortisol levels (a stress hormone that increases blood sugar) in those psychologically attacked and therefore "stressed" because of their large stomachs? Is heritability of diabetes over-estimated given this possibility of "reactive covariance"? Arguments about type 2 diabetes would actually fit so much more neatly with Professor Deutsch's sociological speculations about the potentially (non) genetic origin of seemingly genetically based illnesses, even though Professor Deutsch's arguments would still be wrong. And a (non-medical) sociological theory of the cause of diabetes would not necessitate Professor Deutsch positing the existence of clearly seen attributes that the general public can react to (but that apparently disappear when scientists study them) in those destined to develop bipolar illness or schizophrenia!

Yet Professor Deutsch decides to apply his bizarre arguments selectively against heritable mental illness syndromes, though diabetic conditions, coronary artery disease, and a host of other heritable illnesses usually present with visible traits potentially recognizable by observers to which others can "choose" to respond. These illnesses would fit better his unusual theories about responses to observable attributes causing seemingly heritable illness. This selective negative attention to those with mental illnesses also promotes bigotry against the mentally ill.

The World makes a big deal out of the fact that mental illness syndromes are defined by their symptoms rather than a pathophysiological condition. In fact the World calls mental illnesses "worthless superstitions." But as pointed out earlier, type 2 diabetes is a "syndrome" defined by its symptoms and with multiple underlying causes that we don't yet understand, as well. Multiple illnesses in medicine share this characteristic, and yet the editors don't disenfranchise those with: migraine headaches, "restless legs", chronic obstructive pulmonary disease (COPD), and the coronary syndrome -- all syndromes defined by their symptoms and not their underlying pathophysiology. Indeed, biological scientists understand the underlying causes of very few illnesses, but should we say that most illnesses in medicine are "superstitions"? Holding mental illnesses to a standard so much higher than other medical illnesses, also not defined by pathophysiology, creates distinctions for no logical reason, and so also promotes bigotry against the mentally ill.

The "World" attacks mental illness syndromes because its editors erroneously believe that heritable mental illnesses cannot be defined or measured. Yet as previously argued in my response called "Diseases vs. Syndromes," mental illness syndromes are in fact reliably defined and measured when we use structured clinical instruments. Indeed, certain syndromes (for example major depression, but also bipolar disorder) predict certain cardiovascular end-points considerably better than many other "risk factors" for progression of heart disease. Attacking mental illness syndromes because they cannot be measured, or do not philosophically and physiologically relate to other illnesses in medicine, is factually wrong, segregates the mentally ill, and therefore (once again) promotes bigotry.

Perhaps it goes without saying that those promoting bigotry would also attack charities helping some of the most disadvantaged people on earth, those with serious mental illness. When famous intellectuals like Professor Deutsch say that supporting charities like "Rethink" is effectively "worthless", this cannot be good for fund-raising. Rethink also sponsors research into mental illness; and yes, those supporting bigotry will often attack the scientific enterprise itself, by trying to cut off funding for research. One should not be surprised to find core anti-scientific and anti-charitable values underlying discriminatory views.

Those denying evolution, or even those denying the reality of the Holocaust, do not promote a bigotry that worldwide injures or kills millions of people, as those attacking the Mentally Ill do. When blatant Anti-Semitism, Racism, and/or bigotry against the seriously Mentally Ill (or the handicapped or disabled, for example) is stated in a public forum, particularly by well-known, influential, and public intellectuals like Professor David Deutsch; this seeming hatred (or hopefully significant ignorance) needs to be publicly rebutted, preferably in the very forum in which it was created. The bigotry must be exposed to the clear light of day.

As stated previously, Professor Deutsch is a well-known physicist and public intellectual whose excellent reputation precedes him. Even his patience as a teacher and kindness have become known world-wide. On a personal note, I have read many of Professor Deutsch's remarkable tracts on the nature of science and reality, and enjoyed his perspectives. That is why it is particularly disturbing to read Professor Deutsch's views about mental illness. I must assume that he has simply not been exposed to much of the scientific work performed over decades and is relying on information received from highly partisan, ideological sources, because I otherwise cannot understand why a great man like David Deutsch would promote anti-scientific nonsense that in turn promotes bigotry. I hope that all of the editors of "The World" are capable of rethinking their views, as honest intellectuals should, when confronted with the illogical, unscientific, and bigoted assumptions underlying their perspectives. It is possible for a Holocaust denier to genuinely believe that the Holocaust did not occur, but when confronted with evidence, the non-ideological and honest individual, should be able to "Rethink" his views.

All of us in the medical community want better nomenclature for our "syndromes," many of us even lecture about the philosophy of the DSM and some of its more unusual and less than elegant aspects. If the DSM were one's sole guide to understanding mental illnesses, I can see how one could get confused and irritated. But denying the obvious fact that genes can cause abnormalities in every organ including the brain, and denying that abnormalities in the brain can cause behavioral problems; requires remarkably illogical and unscientific thinking (to put it charitably). Such thinking requires a "totalitarian rationalist" perspective at the expense of a scientific perspective. Perhaps "All Minds are Equal," but so are all "Pigs" (in Orwell's totalitarian Animal Farm.)

In general, scientists enjoy when individuals from different fields utilize knowledge from their own fields to contribute to our common knowledge base. Cross-pollination in science is useful. But reckless attack, based on lack of knowledge or worse, certainly does not advance science, indirectly injures many the world over, and does nothing except excite controversy at the expense of collegiality.

Sincerely,

Michael Golding

by Michael Golding on Mon, 06/20/2005 - 04:28 | reply

Re: Serious Mental Illness is Hereditary

What does the verb 'to disenfranchise' mean, in this context?

by David Deutsch on Mon, 06/20/2005 - 16:37 | reply

Our “ideologically-motivated biases”...

... may be genetic in origin:

These intensely charged political reflexes are shaped partly by inheritance, Dr. Lodge said.

It may be the clash of visceral, genetically primed social orientations that gives political debate its current malice and fire, the study suggests.

Although the two broad genetic types, more conservative and more progressive, may find some common ground on specific issues, they represent fundamental differences that go deeper than many people assume, the new research suggests.

"When people talk about the political debate becoming increasingly ugly, they often blame talk radio or the people doing the debating, but they've got it backward," Dr. Alford said. "These genetically predisposed ideologies are polarized, and that's what makes the debate so nasty.

This raises the question: should people with genetically predisposed ideologies caused by visceral, genetically primed social orientations – be allowed to vote?

by Editor on Tue, 06/21/2005 - 20:17 | reply

Re: Serious Mental Illness is Hereditary

I think Michael Golding got the wrong end of the stick on some issues.

He states that mental illness is like Type 2 diabetes and other illnesses for which we do not know the exact cause. Type 2 diabetes results when a person's body does not make enough insulin. As such, there is an objective chemical marker for Type 2 diabetes - lack of insulin. Pathologists call an objective marker like a chemical or physical abnormality a sign as distinct from a symptom, which is a complaint or behaviour displayed by a patient. A sign is easily testable and a patient cannot produce it as a direct result of his ideas about the world. He can get very angry as a direct result of his ideas about the world. He can imagine that he sees ghosts, or people who don't exist, or that is Abraham Lincoln, Napoleon, Hitler or William Shakespeare as a result of his ideas about the world. Nobody has ever found any objective chemical marker for schizophrenia, chemical or otherwise. So while a doctor may correctly claim that he can do an objective test to determine whether a person has Type 2 diabetes, he cannot correctly claim to have an objective test for schizophrenia, or for any other mental illness.

He says that adopted children develop mental illnesses if their family has a history of mental illness despite adopted parents' best efforts to stop this. But I can come up with many explanations that don't involve genes. For example, if the adopted parents know that the child's family had mental illness and adopt policies that they think will prevent mental illness and these policies might cause the child problems that led to psychiatrists deeming him to be mentally ill. If the adopted parents try to stop their adopted child from becoming violent by stopping him from watching TV or playing video games he may get very angry with them if his friends have easy access to TV and games. They may then send him to a psychiatrist who might diagnose him as being paranoid because he thinks his adopted parents are persecuting him.

People also have access to a vast world of ideas about how people of different appearances ought to behave, though TV and other means of mass communication: children with glasses should be geeks, Hispanic children should sing like Jennifer Lopez and so on. No study can filter out the effects of these ideas, not least because people don't always consciously know they are conveying such ideas. My point is not that one of these explanations I've just thought of explains mental illness. It's that explanations of that kind, and many others I have not thought of, are just as compatible with the evidence he cites as the gene explanation is. Hence that evidence is not particularly evidence for the gene explanation.

I don't believe, and nor does The World, that people choose to become 'mentally ill', or that they should be blamed for it. As for being disenfranchised, surely our view is the opposite of that. We stand up for them to have the same rights as anyone else, including the right not to have unpleasant stuff done to them by force unless they have committed a crime.

The mere fact that a person chooses a particular behaviour does not necessarily mean that they should get any praise or blame for that choice. And definitely not when the choices and circumstances that led to that choice are still unknown. Michael Goldring seems to confuse criticism of a certain explanation of behaviours with 'bigotry' against the person doing them. But that isn't true. When cigarette smoking was first suggested to cause lung cancer, before there was evidence of this, that didn't mean that the people proposing that explanation were blaming cigarette smokers. Similarly today, if the non-gene explanation is true, then it is not known what, in a person's environment, causes them to behave like that, just as, if the gene explanation is true, it is not known how the genes cause it.

Michael Goldring may deny that a psychiatric patient has a will but the patient still exhibits behaviour that is very difficult to interpret as anything other than a deliberate and systematic attempt to undermine his 'treatment.' Such as saying 'I'm not taking this crap anymore!' I think the simplest explanation is true, i.e. - that he does not want to take the chemicals prescribed by the psychiatrist.

by Alan Forrester on Wed, 06/22/2005 - 01:32 | reply

Perhaps not the best choice of words

Enfranchise = "to set free" (as from slavery)

By "disenfranchise", in the context used, I meant that certain opinions of the editors may (unintentionally) subject patients to the "slavery" imposed by their illnesses.

The word is too strong, however, because I don't think the editors would intentionally subject someone to slavery. But by denying the illnesses of the mentally ill (and the funding and the research and the respect these patients deserve) the editors may harm people that they don't mean to.

by Michael Goldring on Wed, 06/22/2005 - 02:31 | reply

Would You Help Them Vote Republican?

Should the editors vote? Well ...err.... grudgingly..... yes.

But if all Republicans were whisked by unseen forces into voting booths only during Democratic primaries and they were forced to see only a Democratic candidate on the ticket; and if all these Republicans were beaten over the head in the booth until their brain shrank, causing 3 times the rate of diabetes, heart attacks, and stroke; and if they bravely begged to vote Republican despite their torture; and if they killed themselves 30 times more frequently than Democrats so they would not be forced to vote against their will: Would you try to eliminate this political "sickness," or would you call it their "choice"? Would you try to help them out of the booth even if they didn't yet have the strength to vote Republican? But if you can only ignore them, can you at least not claim that there is no issue. And would you please not condemn the charities trying to get them out?

by Michael Golding on Wed, 06/22/2005 - 04:29 | reply

Respect?

Who is more respectful of patients?

Those who say that their behavior is largely beyond their control and that their ideas and choices cannot change it, so they must be continually coerced "for their own good"?

Or, those who deny this?

Gil

by Gil on Wed, 06/22/2005 - 16:17 | reply

Re: Perhaps not the best choice of words

So being 'enfranchised' in this context meant being set free ('emancipated'), which was in turn a metaphor for being cured of an illness (rather as we might say 'this person was set free from his wheelchair by surgery').

There is a much discussed practical difference between being set from from a mental illness on the one hand, and being set free from a wheelchair or prison on the other: The former sort of 'being freed' can involve a person who was already free to walk down the street at will (or instruct his friend or his wheelchair to take him), losing that entitlement. Instead he may be hunted down as he tries to escape, immobilised, taken into a room that is barred and locked from the outside, despite begging to be set free, and he may have drugs administered to him against his will, and so on. The latter kind of 'being set free' never involves any of these things.

There is, at least, a certain irony in the existence of these two contrasting, and sometimes incompatible, kinds of 'being set free'. And at the very least there is a certain terminological problem: for instance, when I described the person as 'begging to be set free', I should, within the context of this metaphor, have said 'begging to remain imprisoned'.

None of these ironies or terminological puzzles arises when the metaphor of 'being freed' is used in the wheelchair case. It only ever arises in the mental illness case. Being in a wheelchair, one remains entitled to refuse the treatment that would 'set one free', even if one is refusing for profoundly irrational reasons (such as religious ones) and even if this will result in one's certain death.

This entitlement is called, in the tradition of English law and legal philosophy, a 'right' or a 'freedom'.

Is it self-evident that the difference between these two types of 'enfranchisement' really is just a meaningless curiosity and an insignificant terminological puzzle? That they really are the same in all morally significant respects? And is it self-evident that there is no important philosophical difference between the two classes of state that are both conventionally known as 'illnesses', mental and physical?

by David Deutsch on Wed, 06/22/2005 - 17:55 | reply

Excuse me?

Professor Deutsch,

According to the NIMH, there are 40 million people in the United States with a diagnosable mental illness in a given year. However one arrives at this number, whether it should be calculated as greater or smaller, only the tiniest fraction of a percentage of patients is involuntarily treated. According to a commonly cited study (I'll find it later if you'd like), the mentally ill take their medications at the same rate as those with other medical illnesses. They want to feel better.

If I had said to you that I believe we should treat those with Tuberculosis with antibiotics and explained the reasons why (it's a dangerous disease, it can destroy the lungs and kidneys); if I described the many other ways in which TB can kill or injure people and then told you about a group of people who don't believe in infectious disease; if I further told you that I explained to them why they should believe in Tuberculosis because accurate beliefs tend to be both ethically reasonable and scientifically valid; if I explained that to you, and said that refusing to believe in the reality of infectious disease "disenfranchised" (enslaved) those with Tuberculosis, I think you may have congratulated me on bringing science to those with less information. I bet you would not have said the following:

"The former sort of 'being freed' can involve a person who was already free to walk down the street at will (or instruct his friend or his wheelchair to take him), losing that entitlement. Instead he may be hunted down as he tries to escape, immobilized, taken into a room that is barred and locked from the outside, despite begging to be set free, and he may have drugs administered to him against his will, and so on....

.....And at the very least there is a certain terminological problem: for instance, when I describe the person as 'begging to be set free', I should, within the context of this metaphor, have said 'begging to remain imprisoned'.

None of these ironies or terminological puzzles arises when the metaphor of 'being freed' is used in the wheelchair case (when a surgeon operates to allow a formerly wheelchair bound person to walk)"

Excuse me? You have very wrongly assumed that when I was talking about mental illness syndromes and the importance of treating the mentally ill, that I was talking about involuntarily treating them. I was discussing no such thing. Not in the slightest, and I must admit to being rather flabbergasted at your response. It took me 20 minutes or more of staring at what you said to figure out what you were assuming.

When I wrote my discussion about the genetics of certain mental illnesses, I was (amongst other things) demonstrating that mental illness syndromes are devastating illnesses that can be hereditary and they hurt people. I was saying, "Please don't deny that they exist (because they do) and let's treat them."

Somehow, you then determined that I was (or perhaps could have been) talking about involuntary treatment. Would you truly have immediately jumped to the same conclusion if I were asking people to acknowledge the threat of Tuberculosis and the need to treat it? In the United States, those with Tuberculosis are (very rarely, like those with mental illness), involuntarily treated if they are a risk to others; but you must admit, involuntary treatment is not the first thing to come to mind when someone talks about the genetics of Tuberculosis susceptibility. So how did you jump from my discussion of the genetics of heritable mental illness and the need for research and support and treatment of the illnesses, to a discussion of coercive treatment? Is this on your mind? Perhaps I'm wrong, but I don't believe you would have come to that conclusion if I had been discussing TB.

I treat thousands of some of the sickest mentally ill patients in this city (mostly all Medicaid, many financially distressed, and many with schizophrenia) and not one is currently "involuntarily" treated, and not one is forced to take any medication whatsoever.

Thank you for demonstrating, more clearly than I could ever do myself, the horrible biases some people hold about the overwhelming majority of treatment rendered to those who are suffering with mental illness. Thank you for demonstrating the remarkably incorrect assumptions some hold about the desires of the overwhelming majority of the mentally ill in the United States.

Sincerely,

Michael Golding

by Michael Golding on Thu, 06/23/2005 - 06:39 | reply

Re: Excuse me?

What is the meaning of the quotation marks round "involuntarily" in the above?

by David Deutsch on Thu, 06/23/2005 - 12:57 | reply

Re: Serious Mental Illness is Hereditary

I have known Dr. Golding for many years as a very able and well-respected physician. He asked me to read this website and respond to the Science and Superstition articles if I wished.

I see the unfortunate legacy of the anti-psychiatry movement is alive and well at Oxford University! Somehow a few philosophers seem to be still reading this mostly unscientific material, without apparently the slightest cognizance that 99.9% of the learned commentary and essentially all of the scientific evidence on psychiatric issues in medicine has nothing to do with Thomas Szasz or his writings! Unfortunately, due to horrible discrimination, the overwhelming majority of contented psychiatric patients do not write about their experiences (because people like David Deutsch will call them "fake(rs)", and they are already embarrassed by the terrible stigma of mental illness. They tend to be vulnerable people anyway. That leaves a few libertarian philosophers, scientologists, Tom Cruise, David Deutsch, a small minority of unhappy and vocal psychiatric patients, and a few others to create a ruckus and a fuss, and make things worse for everybody.

I have been practicing medicine for many years. Alan F. is right about signs being considered exam findings, and symptoms being considered the report of the patient. We used to use that language a lot. But those names don't matter so much because what we obtain in a clinical encounter is information, whether from the patient, the lab, or our exam. Our findings need to predict something useful to us and our patients, regardless of who says it or reports it. The issue is reliability and validity, not signs and symptoms.

Labs are correct within a certain range (and they have a certain reliability) and even if they are mostly accurate at a given time, they change all the time because the body keeps changing. A person can have non-insulin dependant diabetes (what Michael calls type 2) one day and not have it the next three but have it a week later, if you just follow the definition of diabetes. Type 2 diabetes, contrary to Alan F., is not defined in the slightest by the insulin level, and I will explain why later. If you wish to learn, Alan F., look up the definitions. Fasting blood sugar is one way of defining this syndrome. Endocrinologists define adult onset diabetes, and every few years, as evidence accumulates, they change the definition. But if someone is on the border of getting diabetes, he usually ultimately progresses to full-blown diabetes unless he loses an awful lot of weight and exercises, no matter what definition you use. It's not true (Alan F) that your "ideas" about the world can't change a "sign" of illness like blood sugar level. People with schizophrenia (odd ideas and much stress) and bipolar disease have many times the rate of diabetes and it is easy to change a fasting blood sugar level by what one thinks (because acute stress changes blood sugar levels). Michael cited studies to support this. Did you read what he said?

If you are under stress your cortisol (a steroid) level goes up and that changes the deposition of abdominal body fat and independently raises blood sugar. Look up Cushing's disease if you want to learn about it. When a relative takes prednisone (another steroid) for bad inflammatory arthritis, that raises blood sugar as well. Chronic mental illness can create, in effect, a minor form of Cushing's disease because of chronically elevated cortisol. Indeed the response of cortisol to exogenous steroids in fact CAN be used to diagnose major depressive disorder (dexamethasone suppression test); the only problem is that a clinical interview based diagnosis is better in predicting who will respond to treatment. So yes, acutely stressful feelings and thoughts acutely raise that "objective" and not quite so stable sign of illness that defines diabetes: Blood sugar. Chronic stress continues the pattern, likely by changing body fat deposition in those with major mental illness. One's ideas and thinking do change one's body and blood sugar level. So many things can "cause" adult diabetes, that's why it's a syndrome.

Even in infections, I bet you (Michael) would call these diseases, but how does the same colony count (of bacteria) in one person cause sickness and infection, and in another no problem at all? So is the cause of infection a bacteria or a susceptibility to infection? So there are multiple causes even of infections, thought to be "diseases." When a person is 10 years old, he gets the beginnings of coronary artery disease, a fatty streak in his arteries. So how much plaque build-up do you need before you have coronary artery "disease"? Coronary artery "disease" is defined by people, just like bipolar disease is, whether you want to call it a disease or a "syndrome". It's sometimes hard to get a pathologist to tell me, when they look at a slide of something I cut or swabbed from someone's body, whether I have to worry about the patient's condition getting worse, but that's what matters to me. Often, however, they just tell me about the pathology of the slide (the "lesion") and that doesn't help much. Some pathologists keep saying, for example, there are "atypical cells" on the slide, instead of telling me what I want to know, which is "But will the cells keep dividing and injure my patient?" I'm exaggerating a little but a few pathologists hedge so much so nobody will sue them, that the family doctor or internist has to figure out whether the "atypical cells" are really a "cancer" (probably going to get worse) or not. I usually let the oncologists decide, but they disagree with each other, too. And some cancers are considered "normal," also, given the finite amount of time that we live and because they are so prevalent after a certain age (e.g. certain prostate cancers). So even the lesion called prostate "cancer" may not be that medically relevant in a few situations. So by the modern terms, shouldn't we call "cancer" a syndrome, too? When do atypical cells become cancer? Is a definition involved?

Modern doctors have come up with the language of syndromes (actually these terms are old but now more in vogue) because they think when they have finally found the "disease" (the "real" pathophysiological disturbance) they are going to take the art out of medicine by eliminating the gut feelings we have and the uniqueness of each patient sitting in front of us. Calling something a "disease" with a "cause" sounds precise and should lead to a precise treatment, but diseases and syndromes, are actually more alike than different, they just reflect more or less knowledge of something, not necessarily a different category of illness. Diseases and syndromes are definitions describing an aspect of reality, not more or less objective than the evidence supporting them. And diseases also have many causes, just like what Michael considers to be the defining characteristic of syndromes. Leave perfection to David in physics. Our job is to help patients feel better and live longer.

Our knowledge of what causes each illness is more or less. We know more about strep. throat (a "disease") than schizophrenia (a "syndrome"), but trust me, there's a lot more to know about strep. throat, too. As stated before, why does one person get it when the other doesn't and they both are infected with the same number of bugs?

Diseases are entities that cause disruptions of bodily function. They are internal to the individual and injure the combined physical and psychological health of people. A disease could imply, for example, a genetically based illness that causes some internal (known or logically necessary) pathophysiological state that causes shortened lifespan or suffering. Such conditions usually then damage organs or organ systems. Bipolar disease would fit in this category of illness. Or a disease could imply a pathophysiological state with some consequent damage to an organ (causing suffering and/or shortened lifespan), independent of genetic influence. A torn anterior cruciate ligament from a football injury would be an example of this. Or a disease could imply some other physical characteristic that causes people to suffer or shortens their lifespan (poor vestibular sense causing balance irregularities or nearsightedness would be examples). And diseases should exist at least to some extent independent of the reactions of people to an observable physical or psychological characteristic of a patient (i.e. independent of discrimination based on ones politics or skin color, for example). Diseases really imply current physical dysfunction or current vulnerability of a body part or organ to a future dysfunction (e.g. compromised immune function), which predictably causes people to suffer or not live as long. Bipolar disease, schizophrenia, and depression easily meet the first of these characteristics (genetically based and causing organ damage and suffering and death).

Many mental illnesses are diseases. They run in families so the genes are involved (the body is involved), they make people miserable (the psychology is involved), they severely damage the rest of your body, so they relate to other illnesses; they shorten people's life and cause certain pathophysiological states, even though most known pathophysiological states due to mental diseases are not specific to a given mental disease, so they can not be used for diagnostic purposes. (For example, depression causes worsening heart disease, but many conditions also cause this). Furthermore, we know how to treat many mental diseases with drugs and therapy. I usually do better treating depression than chronic obstructive pulmonary disease and diabetes (all diseases, all caused by many things, mostly unknown). Some psychiatrists (and even a few young family doctors) are letting people fragment our profession. The body and mind work together. Using the concept of syndromes to define serious psychiatric illness is going to segregate psychiatry from the rest of the field of medicine even more in the public's mind, and there is no reason not to call major psychiatric illnesses diseases, given the genetics involved and the damage to organs they cause. In medicine, and I include serious mental illness, we have a unified set of diseases, a unified set of treatments, all involving how people feel and how the body works. That's how it's always been. Non-doctors just need a whole lot of education about the field of medicine. Obviously, just read this website.

Alan F. tries to say that bipolar illness doesn't have to be genetically based. He correctly argues that if Hispanic girls learn to sing like Jennifer Lopez, then that does not imply that genes, more common to Hispanics, cause Jennifer-Lopez-type singing. But Alan, I don't think you read what Michael said. Unlike Hispanics, there is no known physical appearance that bipolars have before the onset of their illness. The culture does not say, "bipolars have blonde hair and green eyes" and then condition bipolar disorder in individuals with these genetically based physical characteristics. Hispanics have (a few) physical characteristics that people can notice. If nobody has defined the appearance of somebody to be selected (for conditioning to be bipolar), then the patient can't be trained to be bipolar based on these undefined characteristics. So heritability studies can't accidentally attribute to genes what actually is a product of the training of people with blonde hair and green eyes. And no expert on "TV" can reveal these alleged characteristics (the blonde hair and green eyes) to others, as you suggest happens, because no one knows any such characteristics in individuals who are destined to become bipolar. Think about it. So identical twins shouldn't have a higher correlation of having (and not having) bipolar illness than fraternal twins. And children of families with bipolar disorder shouldn't have higher rates of bipolar when adopted out into other families. And children from families without bipolar illness, adopted into families with heritable mental illness, should not have lower rates of bipolar mental illness. Studies repeatedly demonstrate the heritability of bipolar disorder and therefore explain these findings. In addition, Michael also explained why it is problematic to consider it possible to condition someone to be bipolar even if bipolars all did have blonde hair and green eyes. Alan F., did you read what he said?

Alan F. you say that maybe families without mental illness adopt those who have a family history of an illness (like bipolar illness) but then create the (bipolar) illness in them because of the adoption process (so it's not the genetics) You say that because the adoptive family knows that the adoptee comes from a troubled family, they then try to raise them too well, which backfires. So the attempt at excellent parenting in fact causes the adoptive child to have the very mental illness the family was trying to prevent. But how to explain that adopted children without family-of-origin bipolar illness, tend not to develop bipolar illness even if their adoptive families have mental illnesses? Would you then claim that because the mentally ill tend to raise children badly, they of course make an exception for adoptive children and raise them well, but this time it doesn't backfire? Or perhaps attempting to raise children a particular way will always backfire, so if you raise them badly, they will turn out well and not have mental illness? Don't you think it's a little (even logically) strange to argue that families without mental illness are more likely to raise their kids to develop mental illness, and families with mental illness are more likely to raise kids without mental illness (adopted or not)? I bet Michael could show you hundreds of studies disputing that! I can say, for example, that a bunch of wind blows the parts together to assemble a 747 airplane. If you show me movies of planes being put together by people, I can say that there were mirrors that fooled the cameramen and created the illusion of people involved, but actually the wind did it all by itself. And I could also argue that aeronautical engineers put all the sand dunes in the Saharra desert together. You guessed it. When the cameramen come to film the aeronautical engineers, the mirage demonstrates that the wind is partially doing it, but actually the engineers manufacture all the dunes. It's just a different explanation of sand dune creation and airplane construction. Not better or worse. Right? Michael is known for being a careful researcher and physician. He cites a number of studies and you (Alan) respond to none of them; indeed you repeat the fallacies that the studies cited dispute and his careful reasoning disputes.

And Alan, in addition to (not understanding?) twin studies, you don't know much about diabetes, either. You say that type 2 diabetes is a disease with a pathological marker, low insulin. But you are just wrong. In most of my patients, when it's early diabetes, the insulin is actually not low; but in the metabolic syndrome, in fact high. Blood sugar can even go up with HIGH insulin levels. But measuring insulin doesn't tell you much, anyway. In layman's terms, the pancreas tries to compensate for the person (usually) weighing too much and therefore requiring a lot of insulin, so the pancreas puts out more insulin into the blood stream and insulin levels go up. The cells in the body, for not completely known reasons, just can't pull enough glucose into the cell despite insulin, so blood sugar measurements can be higher. But if the body demands too much of the pancreas over too long a period of time, then the pancreas can dramatically decrease its production of insulin. Then the insulin levels get lower until they are below normal. So the insulin levels INCREASE as a person becomes (type 2) diabetic, and decrease later on. So Alan, you can't point to the pathological lesion that causes type 2 diabetes, because it seems to be inside cells, and we don't know what the many problems inside cells (or outside them) could be. Why did you claim that you could point to a lesion? So is diabetes a "fake" disease just like bipolar illness? Michael also briefly described why diabetes is a syndrome. Did you read what he said?

Finding a "lesion" is finding a bit of evidence, like hearing a sound with your stethoscope or listening to what a patient says. Either a lesion predicts something useful or it doesn't. Look at all the "lesions" on your skin, most are medically useless and predict nothing, though pathologists can deliver a whole report on each of them! If the sounds we hear with a stethoscope predict something, if what a patient says predicts something, if a lab result predicts something, and if something a pathologist says about a lesion predicts something, that's helpful. Otherwise any of the above is not useful; including the "lesions" Alan F. seems to think are important.

The editors have their mind made up because they've never really seen patients and they've made things up from what they've heard, apparently without studies. Alan F. is talking as if he knows something about diabetes and adoption studies and his ideas seem ...well, interesting at best. Everybody who's ever seen family upon family member with mental diseases or diabetes knows that a lot of diseases have a genetic basis. There are hundreds of studies showing this (as Michael points out) in mental disease but also in diabetes. If hundreds of good scientific studies and beautifully converging data from dozens of fields, don't convince editors that genes cause all kinds of brain diseases with unusual behaviors and subsequent or concomitant diseases of other organs, then "where" the editors' are looking, is getting in the way of "what" they are seeing. You can't fight with people who won't read or listen to the scientific evidence. It's like trying to convince people whose pastor said the world was created in 7 days to look at the geological record or DNA. They can't and won't because it will disturb what they think they know. For reasons we don't know, the genes help make bodies and brains abnormal, and genes interact with the environment in a way that makes people suffer. This is known from hundreds of human and animal studies.

Sometimes differences in genes don't cause physical problems. David quotes one study that shows political progressives and conservatives may differ in their genes, but so do people with and without green eyes. It is a provocative study, nonetheless. David does come up with interesting examples to tease the mind. I will give him that. Sometimes differences in genes cause damage to the body and brain (in diabetes, heart disease, schizophrenia) and sometimes they don't (in progressive political beliefs and green eyes).

If "progressives" get punished in a conservative country, does that make being "progressive" a disease? (No, because it would be societies reaction to progressive politics, not their internal state that caused the suffering.) Plastic surgeons can change a big nose to a little nose. But a big nose is not considered a disease because it is society's reaction to the big nose that makes the patient with the big nose uncomfortable. But there are some cases in which it is hard to tell whether it is society's superficial reactions to people that make people feel sick, or whether it is their genetic/internal physiological state that causes a condition that makes them feel sick. Example. Are some shy people unhappy because of their physiology or because of a cultural value in America that tells people to dislike shy people? In Japan, shyness is appreciated more than America. And you can change shy people to more outgoing people with drugs (SSRI's and MAOI's.) If society values obesity and gives obese people more access to health care (?Sumo wrestlers), I think I still would not encourage obesity. But then I shouldn't treat shyness either, even if society values outgoing people and punishes shy people. In reality, I don't treat normal shyness and would not encourage a Sumo wrestler to gain weight. In general physicians try to separate out cultural reactions to attributes, from attributes themselves.

If cultural values tell us to not use antidepressants because depression has cultural aspects, and yet patients die of a depression factor that induces heart disease, should I not use possibly life-saving antidepressants just because society says not to do it? Should I not treat obesity just because T.V. commercials encourage people to eat, so obesity, causing diabetes, is partly culturally determined? No. I and other doctors use antidepressants and antidiabetic drugs and encourage weight loss.

David's quoted study suggests that being politically progressive (vs. conservative) can be genetically influenced. But physicians usually try to do the best we can to separate reactions to a genetically influenced trait (for example lynching of black people) from conditions that are internally created, caused by genetic inheritance and other factors. Lynching is not a medical disease. Michael mentions discrimination against black skin (racism), and shows that black skin isn't a disease either, even if genes cause black skin and someone suffers because of it. It's really the same thing with political preferences. Reaction by others to a (partially genetically determined) political stance is not a disease even if it causes injury. Let's say you are a person who is genetically influenced to be "progressive," but then you get physically attacked for being progressive. This discrimination is not a disease, nor is being a progressive, because it is society's reaction to the political opinion that is the problem. Eye color and political persuasion, though apparently genetically influenced, are not diseases because if they do cause problems, it is because of people's discriminatory reaction to them.

But bipolar disease and diabetes cause injury and unhappiness and death to people, all by themselves, without anyone having to react to patients with these illnesses, at all. As Michael says in his piece on syndromes, major depression (but also bipolar illness and diabetes) have "a life of (their) own". People can die from these illnesses without anyone saying a word or doing a thing! Actually, people die of these diseases sometimes because people in fact do not "say a word" or intervene to help. That is the problem. And it is made worse by people (like the editors) denying the existence of mental diseases that kill people. Michael is right about that, and it's a shame that such ignorance exists in the 21st century. Some philosophers like to discuss Szasz, but not, unfortunately the multiple premature deaths and suffering of individuals with the mental illnesses they don't believe in. That itself tells you something about priorities (More important to think in the abstract than reason in the present or help the suffering, I think) As healers of the body and mind, physicians treat bipolar disease and depression and diabetes and coronary disease, but not political progressives or people with blue eyes, and we'll argue with the plastic surgeons and psychiatrists about treating those with big noses and people who are shy.

Look at your grandmothers' medication lists. Medicines for pain are often "antidepressants" nowadays (e.g. Cymbalta, elavil). Anti-anxiety SSRI's may help those with heart disease. And the new cortisol releasing hormone antagonists (when available) may treat obesity, diabetes, coronary disease, and depression. Some, what Michael calls "totalitarian rationalist" philosophers, like a clean distinction between the body and the mind. But the body disagrees. And the mind disagrees.

The field of medicine does not so much want to define "what is wrong" but rather ultimately wants to use a definition of "what is wrong" to help people, no matter how you define "what is wrong". Our diseases predict things about progression of an internal pathophysiology that will shorten a person's life or make him uncomfortable, regardless of how much we know about the cause. That's why some pathologists need to stop talking about their "atypical cells" ("lesions" so to speak) and start telling us whether these "atypical cells" are going to keep growing into a cancer and hurt our patients. In fairness, most pathologists are actually pretty good about helping us in this way; but half the time, a lesion, or not a lesion, tells you very little. We want our diseases to help us predict what we should DO to stop internally bad things from happening to people. (Period) That is what is important to most doctors, and Michael says it a little bit, but it should be emphasized again. For the externally bad things that happen to people, we have to, unfortunately, rely on our politicians to help us. God help us all.

And yes, sometimes you have to help people who are not thinking correctly. Has anyone ever been to a post-op recovery suite, especially to see the patients after a transplant? It seems half the patients are in some kind of restraints because otherwise they'll pull out their central line or their intubation tube and they'll die. When someone is not in their right mind, sometimes you have to help them until they can take care of themselves. The readers and the editors, if they have an ounce of common sense, would want that, too, if they were sick. Even if they can't say so right now because they are lost in their philosophy, I bet I know what they'd want for their family member in an emergency because philosophers, just like them, tell me to help their family members when their loved one is dying. Because almost nobody really wants to die, they'd tolerate a little restraint for their family members in exchange for another 30 years of good living. And the ones who want to die can often be fixed with a little talking, and a little antidepressant, too. But if not, sometimes you just have to get them better if they are totally psychotic and really don't know what's real yet, and almost always they'll thank you later. We're always fighting for patient's rationality, a component of health, whether fighting brain infections, dementia, strokes, or schizophrenia.

Dr. J.L.

by Dr. J.L. on Thu, 06/30/2005 - 00:16 | reply

Fakers

Dear Dr J.L.

Is it your opinion that the post 'Science and Superstition', or 'On Fake Diseases', on The World, or some writings by me, here or elsewhere, carry the implication that people suffering from mental illnesses are fakers?

by David Deutsch on Mon, 07/04/2005 - 03:48 | reply

Confusing Premise of Question

Prof. Deutsch,
I don't understand the premise of the question you asked Dr. J. L.

You are saying,
"Secular mental health charities promote a view of the world based on the idea of mental illness."

And you claim that the idea of mental illness is "fictional" and "superstitious."

You say, "As we have noted before, mental illness is not a real illness."

Now you ask a question about people "suffering with mental illnesses" (!?)

How can one suffer from something that does not exist?
Please clarify.

Michael Golding

by Michael Golding on Tue, 07/05/2005 - 14:30 | reply

Re: Confusing Premise of Question

The idea is that the states in question do exist, but they are not illnesses.

Other examples of states that are not illnesses, but from which people do suffer are: inductivism, having a non-English accent, yearning for martyrdom as a suicide bomber, fear of a second heart attack.

The last of these is almost invariably caused by a disease, yet is not a disease.

by David Deutsch on Tue, 07/05/2005 - 15:13 | reply

I think I understand what you are getting at.

OK.

When does a physiological state become an illness?
Must it evolve in some way?

If one takes a snapshot of someones body whom doctors call "type 2 diabetic", can a (very very detailed) snapshot document that type 2 diabetes is an illness, or does there need to be more?

It would seem that:

The smallest nanosecond of fear induced hypertension could not cause a second heart attack, so a nanosecond of fear is not an illness.

And the smallest nanosecond of hyperosmolarity in type 2 diabetes would not cause dehydration and hyperosmolar coma. So a very brief "state" of elevated blood sugar should not be an illness, either.

So, when does a physiological process become an illness, in your view?

by Michael Golding on Tue, 07/05/2005 - 16:46 | reply

What's An Illness?

What gets me is that I don't see psychologists as very interested in taking seriously what makes an illness and creating reasonable, precise criteria on the subject. Instead we have things like Asperger's Syndrome with it's catch-all set of "symptoms". When psychologists figure something out, maybe they'll interest me in helping out in their field. But at the moment I think other fields are more interesting.

(I am aware they do figure out the occasional thing, for example about how memory works.)

by a reader on Tue, 07/05/2005 - 22:54 | reply

Re: Excuse me?

What is the meaning of the quotation marks round "involuntarily" in this post above?

by David Deutsch on Thu, 07/07/2005 - 09:29 | reply

Re:Excuse me?

In the very few patients in whom this discussion is relevant, patients often change their mind about a procedure that at one point they say they did not want, but later say they are grateful for and were grateful for, and would want in the future under similar circumstances. Patient's conceptions of what is "voluntary" therefore changes.

So when does a physiological process become an illness in your view?

by Michael Golding on Thu, 07/07/2005 - 11:00 | reply

Professor Deutsch and Faking Mental Illness

Dr. J.L. asked me to respond to Professor Deutsch's question about why we think Professor Deutsch may assume that the mentally ill "fake" their illnesses.

Professor Deutsch says that when someone attributes risk for development of mental illness to hereditary factors, the mental illness could also be "100% due to the persons own choices". If the victims can choose mental illness "states" or behaviors, then they can decide to not choose them, as well. So people can choose to be more rational, or less rational, at will. But if everyone can choose to be more or less rational and the mentally ill choose to behave irrationally, and they say this causes them anguish, then they must gain something from placing themselves in a state that they say causes them pain. Or they must fake their symptoms (being in pain) in order to derive the benefits without having to feel the pain.

When Professor Deutsch says that the choices of the mentally ill can "100%" explain the seemingly large hereditary risk for major mental illness, he implies that even those with the least rationality, the mentally ill with schizophrenia for example, can fully choose to be rational. Therefore, if even the mentally ill have this fully rational capacity, then everyone has this fully rational capacity.

Should we say that British citizens "chose" to be bombed a few days ago because, but for their "choice" to use public transportation, the bombs most certainly would not have been planted on the buses. Such argument is absurd and cruel. Imagine the British victim's and their family's reaction to such an argument. Now imagine the reaction of families and patients with mental illness when Professor Deutsch declares their mentally ill children's miserable feelings their "own choice" (can you?). But if simplistic statisticians studied the bus-bombing phenomenon, a causal relationship between bus riding and bus bombing could be experimentally found, to a high degree of statistical significance. The choice to use public transportation does cause (in one sense, but not another) the planting of bombs on public busses.

Prof. Deutsch specifically warns (with his genes-for-black skin do not cause racism argument) not to make this type of logical/statistical error. Yet he either

1. Precisely makes this type of logical error, exactly when he is arguing against it,
or
2. He DOES ASSUME that everyone is equally rational, including the mentally ill.

If a choice has an unintended consequence 'X', then one should not say that a person "chose" 'X'. Dr. J.L. (and I) assume that at a minimum Professor Deutsch is using the word "choose" in a logical way. We assume that when Prof. Deutsch says that behaviors thought to be hereditary in origin could be better accounted for by patient's "choice(s)", we assume he is talking about patient's choices, not the unintended consequences of patient's choices.

A reader says, "Given that Asperger Syndrome is much more frequent in monozygotic than fraternal twins," there likely is a hereditary component. Deutsch responds, "In view of the above, it is perfectly possible for a given behavior to be 100% due to the persons own choices."

"Given behavior" must imply a behavior that is part of the Asperger's syndrome or it would have been irrelevant for Deutsch to mention it.

Since the mentally ill/developmentally disabled often report that they are in great psychological pain, then if Professor Deutsch believes that these states come about as an intended consequence of patients choices, then he either assumes patients are masochists, assumes they benefit from mental illness, and/or assumes they "fake" their symptoms for some type of gain. And yes, if people choose their patterns of behavior and their mental states, then he is also assuming that the mentally ill can choose not to exhibit mental illness behavior. If someone says heredity could explain an illness and Deutsch says patient's choice instead explains the illness, some of us take Professor Deutsch at his word.

If those with schizophrenia are in some respects the least rational, and if they can choose to simply change what they think, so can everyone else. So everyone has the capacity to be equally rational. Saying that mental illness is the choice of the mentally ill then blames the mentally ill, which is scientifically and ethically problematic.

It has been suggested to Dr. J.L. and me that perhaps when professor Deutsch writes about the mentally ill "choos(ing)" their mental illness behavior, that actually Professor Deutsch is saying that mental illness could be caused by the unintended consequences of patient's choices. But Professor Deutsch does not say this. Instead he says that an Asperger patient's behavior could be "100% due to the persons OWN choices." He specifically did not say that the patient's behavior could be "100% due to the UNINTENDED consequences of the persons own choices." I think Professor Deutsch knows the difference between something being the intended consequence and the unintended consequence of a person's choices.

If someone said that terrorism explains bus bombings, would it also be correct for Prof. Deutsch to respond that British citizens choose to use public transportation, so an alternative explanation is that British citizens cause bus bombing, "100%"? The maiming and killing on the buses were UNINTENDED consequences of riding the bus, as certain mental illness behaviors may be the UNINTENDED consequences of choices that people make. Saying that severe mental illness/developmental-disability is a consequence of a patient's "choice," involves the same logic as saying that getting blown up is a consequence of the British citizen's choice to ride a public bus. Such logic assumes that the intended consequence of a choice is the same thing as the unintended consequence.

So if someone chooses to handle meat products as a butcher, not knowing that a virus that causes schizophrenia contaminates the meat products, should we say that the person chose to develop schizophrenia by being a butcher? That's the same logical error as saying that if genes for black skin cause racists to decide to attack black people, then the genes for black skin cause racism! A reaction to a gene product causing black skin and a reaction to a choice to be a butcher cause the problems, not the genes for black skin or the persons choice to be a butcher. In arguing against an allegedly incorrect position of geneticists, Deutsch makes the identical logical error that he accuses the geneticists of making! The only difference is that the geneticists don't make the error, he does!

Dr. J.L. and I do not believe that Professor Deutsch is remarkably illogical. He has shown to us that he chooses his words very carefully. I believe that when someone says to Professor Deutsch that the risk for a set of behaviors is best explained by hereditary factors, and Prof. Deutsch responds that the illness can be due "100%" to the patient's "own choices", he means exactly that. Ultimately, Dr. J.L. and I do not believe that Professor Deutsch would make the same logical error that he accuses the geneticists of making. We believe that when Dr. Deutsch says that the mentally ill choose their behaviors 100%, he is not talking about the unintended consequences of their choices causing painful mental states and behaviors, but rather the intended consequence of their choice causing these problems.

So yes, when Professor Deutsch says that the mentally ill choose their behaviors 100%, he implies that the seriously mentally ill choose their reportedly horrible and painful mental states and irrational behaviors. And if the mentally ill are not masochists, then he must believe that they are faking their reports of pain and suffering, exactly as Dr. J.L. suggests, presumably for some type of gain. And if the mentally ill choose their mental states and their patterns of behavior, then they can also choose to be mentally healthy. So yes, this implies that everyone has the capacity to be equally rational. So per Professor Deutsch, not only do doctors create "fake" mental illnesses, the patients create "fake symptoms",

And yes, that's a highly inaccurate point of view, with immoral consequences.

by Michael Golding on Sun, 07/10/2005 - 12:55 | reply

Re: Excuse me?

when does a physiological process become an illness in your view?

It's not just processes: it could be states too, such as blindness.

Issues of terminology, in themselves, don't matter. What matters is what is being asserted about reality – especially when the morality of people's behaviour depends on what the facts are.

In the case of physical illnesses, it never matters, morally, where one draws the line between states that are or are not illnesses. Indeed, we take it for granted that doctors should treat many conditions that no one would call illnesses, such as pregnancy, or less-than-perfect features (in the case of cosmetic surgeons), but on other occasions refuse to treat conditions that everyone calls illnesses, for instance, if the patient refuses consent for the treatment – even if this is for profoundly irrational reasons such as religion.

Sometimes the law authorises doctors to do things to patients against their will. For instance, quarantine laws allow some patients to be detained even if they do not consent. However, in all such cases, proponents of the relevant law do not deny that they are advocating involuntary detention. Even if the plague-carrier should later regret having refused, and thank the doctors for having detained him or even forced treatment on him, no one concerned is in any doubt that refusal, and forcible treatment, did in fact take place.

If the conventional picture of the nature of mental illness is true, then the refusal of a mentally ill person is a different species of thing from that of a mentally healthy person. For the content of the former refusal is provided by the disease, while the content of the latter is provided by thought. It may be foolish or ill-informed thought. It may be superstitious thought, or irrational thought or downright wicked thought, but it is his thought, and in some situations this makes a big difference morally. For example, the deepest values of our society require that if a doctor detains or treats a patient against his will for a physical condition (disease or otherwise), on the grounds that the patient is foolish, irrational, ignorant or downright wicked, or on the grounds that he will probably thank him afterwards, the doctor will go to prison. In the case of a mental illness, all these justifications for using force on the patient would be valid, if the nominal wishes of the patient were not really wishes but symptoms.

by David Deutsch on Sun, 07/10/2005 - 22:53 | reply

Faking mental illnesses

Well, I don't think they do fake them. And the argument (given two comments above) that I do think so is a series of nonsequiturs.

The first one is:

the mental illness could also be "100% due to the persons own choices". If the victims can choose mental illness "states" or behaviors

A state could be due to a person's choices without the person having chosen the state. (Or being in any way culpable.)

by David Deutsch on Sun, 07/10/2005 - 23:02 | reply

No

"For example, the deepest values of our society require that if a doctor detains or treats a patient against his will for a physical condition (disease or otherwise), on the grounds that the patient is foolish, irrational, ignorant or downright wicked, or on the grounds that he will probably thank him afterwards, the doctor will go to prison."

Not true. 50% of lung transplant patients end up in restraints. They violently shake their heads "no" while they try to pull out the tube which saves their life. Doctors and nurses tie them down to save their life. And no one goes to jail. And the patients thank them later.

by Michael Golding on Mon, 07/11/2005 - 21:08 | reply

Re: No

Do those patients agree to the whole procedure (including being tied down, which they want), or are they abducted and transplanted?

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 07/11/2005 - 22:57 | reply

Re:Re: No

The tiniest fraction of a percentage of virtually anyones involuntary treatment, whether someone has an acute brain bleed or a lung transplant, is involuntary. No, most patients who are tied down do not initially agree to be tied down, but we save their lives nonetheless, as you would want your life saved if you were having an acute brain bleed and were refusing treatment. Go to any ER or intensive care unit if you would like to see what is done.

by Michael Golding on Tue, 07/12/2005 - 00:22 | reply

No

Sorry...first statement should be "The tiniest fraction of a percentage of anyones treatment, whether someone has an acute brain bleed with agitation, or a lung transplant, is involuntary"

Thanks.

by Michael Golding on Tue, 07/12/2005 - 00:41 | reply

Re: No

Performing a lung transplant or any other operation is illegal without the patient's informed consent. The consent document implies - and nowadays always includes a specific clause saying - that if the doctor should consider further procedures to be necessary while the patient is unconscious or too drugged to understand an explanation of them, or if time is too short to explain them, then the patient consents anyway. This form, and not the proposition that the patient would thank the doctor later, would constitute the doctor's entire legal defence, should the patient later attempt to sue or press charges.

If the patient refuses to sign such a form, the operation would be illegal. If the patient deletes or modifies the above-mentioned clause, the doctor may refuse to perform the operation, but if he does perform it, he will not be entitled to do things that the patient did not consent to. It is quite common for patients to specify exceptions to the standard consent form. For instance, people with religious objections to blood transfusions do it all the time. A doctor who overrode their refusal to consent would indeed be breaking the law.

In an urgent case where the patient is already unconscious or too drugged to understand an explanation of what surgery is proposed and why, their consent may be inferred in various ways. But if an unconscious or drugged patient has previously left instructions that he is not to receive the surgery, then he cannot legally receive it.

by David Deutsch on Tue, 07/12/2005 - 05:45 | reply

Consent forms

FYI, standard NHS consent form:

I understand that any procedure in addition to those described on this form will only be carried out if it is necessary to save my life or to prevent serious harm to my health. I have been told about additional procedures which may become necessary during my treatment. I have listed below any procedures that I do not wish, without further discussion, to be carried out.

Standard modified NHS consent form, for patients who refuse blood transfusions:

although it has been explained to me that in the course of or by reason of the said operation/procedure it may be necessary to give me a blood transfusion so as to render the operation/procedure successful, or to prevent injury to my health, or even to preserve my life, I hereby expressly withhold my consent to and forbid the administration to me of a blood transfusion in any circumstances or for any reason whatsoever

But of course you'd have to be crazy to sign the latter form, wouldn't you?

by Editor on Tue, 07/12/2005 - 05:57 | reply

Not So Simple

If one of your relatives fell to the floor screaming and confused in public, with obvious paralysis and weakness, with the beginnings of an immobile dilation of a pupil on one or both sides and paralysis; and this relative fought and screamed and kicked (as best as he can) and cursed to not go to the hospital and stay on the ground, the paramedics would involuntarily "abduct" your fighting and screaming and kicking relative, tie him tightly to the stretcher, and promptly take him to the hospital. By the way, the family members usually scream and cry even louder, because of their appropriate concern. They demand action immediately!

At the hospital, after the appropriate CAT scan is performed, several holes would be (involuntarily) drilled into the skull (burr holes) to drain the blood and save his life. If successful, the patient and family member usually thank the doctor for involuntarily treating him.

Professor Deutsch, what does "inferred consent" mean?

by Michael Golding on Tue, 07/12/2005 - 11:04 | reply

Faking Mental Illnesses

"A state could be due to a person's choices without the person having chosen the state (or being in any way culpable)."

OK.

If a person did not choose a certain "mental state" and is not "in any way culpable (for it)", is a person always responsible for his behavior that is a consequence of the "mental state"?

Let's say Joe is in a "mental state" in which he is actively psychotic but never did anything intentional (like abuse drugs) to create this state. Joe is hallucinating and fully believes and sees that Harry has horns and is attacking him with a knife, but actually Harry has no horns and is just offering him a cigarette. He hits Harry over the head with a chair to "defend" himself. Is Joe culpable?

by a reader on Tue, 07/12/2005 - 13:33 | reply

Culpable

If I'm not culpable for something, anything, am I culpable for the consequences of it? No.

It's better not to change words casually because it's not clear if you mean 'culpable' and 'responsible' to be the same thing, or if not what difference do you mean them to have?

CULPABLE adjective deserving blame : sometimes you're just as culpable when you watch something as when you actually participate.

RESPONSIBLE adjective [predic.]

having an obligation to do something, or having control over or care for someone, as part of one's job or role : the department responsible for education.

being the primary cause of something and so able to be blamed or credited for it : the gene was responsible for a rare type of eye cancer.

THE RIGHT WORD

Responsible is an adjective that applies to anyone who is in charge of an endeavor or to whom a duty has been delegated, and who is subject to penalty or blame in case of default (: responsible for getting everyone out of the building in the event of a fire).

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 07/12/2005 - 16:03 | reply

Inferred Consent

One test is: what would he say if you had asked him yesterday?
And the answer is he would like his life to be saved, and would not like his kicking/screaming to be interpreted as somehow meaning, "I want to die, please whatever you do, don't use medicine on me".

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 07/12/2005 - 16:10 | reply

Inferred Consent

Michael Golding "Is Joe Culpable?"

Dictionary Culpable -- Deserving of blame or censure as being wrong, evil, improper.

Elliot Temple "If I'm not culpable for something, am I culpable for the consequences of it? No."

Mr. Temple, Joe keeps hitting Harry in the head. What are you going to do? Should Joe be convicted and go to jail?

by Michael Golding on Tue, 07/12/2005 - 17:30 | reply

Culpable

If Harry kills someone, and I am not culpable, then I am not culpable for the consequences. If Harry is culpable, then Harry gets the consequences.

If I kill someone, and I am not culpable, then I am not culpable for the consequences. If Harry is culpable, then Harry gets the consequences.

Why would Harry be culpable for me killing someone? Who knows. Nevermind. I was only talking about the case where he really is.

BTW, this shouldn't be taken as an argument for some strange proposition. It's what the word means. The strange proposition is being made by whoever says "harry killed joe, but bob is culpable for the murder". Or in this case,

A state could be due to a person's choices without the person having chosen the state (or being in any way culpable).

You should declare that statement strange, not the meaning of culpable. And it is counter intuitive, and deserving of further explanation.

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 07/12/2005 - 18:02 | reply

Mr. Temple

You haven't killed anyone (intentionally, to the best of my knowledge)

But we nonetheless have psychotic Joe hitting Harry. I presume, if you can, you intervene.

Joe is not that strong and Harry is not that injured. I'm asking what you would do, to help Harry (or possibly Joe), in a situation where a psychotic person is hitting someone else. Would you call the police (most would). If you were a judge, what would you do?

by Michael Golding on Tue, 07/12/2005 - 20:07 | reply

Killing

Why do you think I haven't killed anyone?

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 07/12/2005 - 21:53 | reply

Yes

P.S. It does seem that the formulation is unusual. I can come up with several explanations of Professor Deutsch's "choices" statement, but am not 100% sure which one he means. Perhaps he is referring to some reaction to a choice (e.g. a consequence of a choice that a. changes the brain, b. changes an internal semantic structure, or c. perhaps changes the reactions of somebody else); in such a way that the person could not predict the consequence of his choice and which subsequently renders the person unable to reverse course from a situation that is somehow not pleasant. Thank you for making the point that the language is a bit confusing.

by Michael Golding on Tue, 07/12/2005 - 22:00 | reply

Elliot the Killer

I doubt you have intentionally killed someone because on average most people have not, but not 100% sure. Are you in the military or a police officer?

And what about poor Harry and Joe? We'll use your word. Let's say Psychotic Joe thinks Harry has horns and is trying to stab him. But in fact Harry is trying to give Joe a cigarette. Joe is hitting Harry in the head.

You have declared Joe "not responsible"? because he is hallucinating an attack and defending himself (from his perspective).

What should be done? Harry is being hit in the head. Do you call the police? Should Joe go to jail?

On a slightly different topic
"But of course you'd have to be crazy to sign the latter form, wouldn't you?" Editors

Don't exactly know what "crazy" means in this context, but signing the form is not evidence of mental illness. It should, in almost all cases, be legally enforceable.

by Michael Golding on Wed, 07/13/2005 - 00:25 | reply

You have declared Joe "not re

You have declared Joe "not responsible"? because he is hallucinating an attack and defending himself (from his perspective).

What did I say that you are interpreting this way?

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 07/13/2005 - 01:08 | reply

Deserving of Blame

I put a question mark because I wasn't sure what you thought. Professor Deutsch had said "not culpable." You don't like this language.

OK. So if Joe is psychotic (and hallucinating) and sees Harry as having horns and sees a knife coming towards him and hears Harry saying he's going to kill him, but you (in the room) and Harry as well as everyone else in the room see Harry kindly offering Joe a cigarette, but Joe sees an attack and defends himself.....

Do you think that Joe is morally responsible for the attack?

Do you believe that he should be held responsible for the attack?

Do you think Joe deserves to be blamed?

by Michael Golding on Wed, 07/13/2005 - 02:17 | reply

David Deutsch did not say "no

David Deutsch did not say "not culpable" about the situation you describe. I did not say I dislike his language (I like it).

In general, people are culpable for their hallucinations, but without knowing the details, one can't be sure.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 07/13/2005 - 02:22 | reply

Faking Mental Illness

"A state could be due to a person's choices without the person having chosen the state (or being in any way culpable)"
David Deutsch

Professor Deutsch,
If a person did not choose a "mental state" and is not "in any way culpable (for it)" is a person always responsible for his behavior that is a consequence of the "mental state"?

Let's say Joe is in a "mental state" in which he is actively psychotic but never did anything unintentional (like abuse drugs) to create this state. Joe is hallucinating and fully believes and sees that Harry has horns and is attacking him with a knife, but actually Harry has no horns and is just offering him a cigarette. He hits Harry over the head with a chair to "defend" himself.

Is Joe culpable?

Thanks.

by Michael Golding on Wed, 07/13/2005 - 03:32 | reply

Re: Faking Mental Illness

There isn't enough information in the example as given to determine whether he is culpable or not.

Information that would be relevant would include: has he had hallucinations before, and if so, what did he do about it when they were over? Was he aware of any other evidence, in advance of this incident, that he was at risk of having such a hallucination? Has he attacked anyone unjustly before? Has he unreasonably believed that others were attacking him before (or were planning to)? Is he, in reality, in danger of being attacked for some reason? Say the attack happened in a pub: has he previously held beliefs, or experienced emotions, that were wrong, when in pubs, or in crowds, or when people offered him cigarettes, or when he was unhappy? And so on.

To address one extreme case: this was a one-off event; nothing like it has happened to him before and he had no evidence that it would. Then he is not culpable. He may, however, be under a special obligation to take certain precautions, and to adopt certain policies about violence, in future. (The logic of the situation, though, is that the legal system would have great difficulty detecting his innocence. This is one of those rare cases where he might indeed be 'faking it' -- so the jury would have to decide whether to believe his claim to have had such a hallucination, and whether, given that he had it, he behaved reasonably. They would want to know whether he might have had some other motive for the attack, and whether there was any other evidence about whether he might be lying.)

To address the opposite extreme case: He has attacked three people in pubs before, always unjustly (with or without hallucinations). Then he is culpable (unless there are further facts that turn the situation round again).

by David Deutsch on Wed, 07/13/2005 - 08:00 | reply

Enough already! Ideas have consequences!

I am a Professor of Family Medicine and a clinician, in practice now for 18 years. I find this whole discussion deeply disturbing from a number of perspectives. Some very intelligent philosophers, quite ignorant of the science and practice of medicine, attempt to argue either that mental illness does not exist, or that the behaviors accompanying the state of 'mental-illness' are (free) choices of the individuals displaying the behaviors. I wish I had the time to reply to the many scientifically erroneous assertions of Professor Deutsch and others on this blog. I do not, so I will be brief.

That bipolar disorder and schizophrenia are heritable brain diseases is not in question amongst scientists who study this area. The brain is an organ susceptible to disease. Diseases of the brain lead to specific, predictable clinical syndromes. Would Dr. Deutsch call OCD in a child triggered by a strep throat (one of the so-called 'PANDAS' conditions) a brain disease, but a condition with the exact same manifestations, affecting the same portions of the brain (as detected by neuroimaging) in an adult a "choice"?

From a physician's perspective, it is semantics only whether one chooses to call syndromes like OCD, major depression, schizophrenia, and bipolar disease 'mental illness' or 'brain disease'. I don't believe there is a distinction. We do not at this point understand why some genes for brain disease have incompletely predictable penetrance patterns (they don't always pass from one generation to the next), and why these same genes may have variable expressivity (the conditions that result from the gene problem may look somewhat different from individual to individual), but this is true of all manner of genetic diseases. Certainly environmental factors play a key role too, but truly the situation is not 'nature vs. nurture'.... it is 'nature AND nurture'. I do not dispute that human behavior is complex, and that it is simplistic to say that all we are is chemicals. But we are certainly, at least in part chemicals also.

Mind-Body dualism is not helpful at all in the exam room, and when promulgated as truth by intelligent people like many of the participants in this forum, may result in terrible societal consequences. Saying "it's all in your head" allows society to discount and disregard the suffering of those with mental illness. It causes lawmakers to distribute financial resources toward 'real' illnesses like cancer and diabetes, but not to 'fake' illnesses like schizophrenia. It allows people to be cruel bigots to those with mental illness, because if one believes that the condition is all 'in the head', then the affected person should be able to just 'decide' to be well, and the fact that he or she doesn't 'decide' to be better means that s/he chooses his plight. It causes sufferers of these devastating diseases to feel responsible for and guilty about their conditions. It causes them to fear seeking treatment because someone may label them 'crazy'. This why I feel so strongly that using words like "superstition", "fake" illness, to describe these conditions, and comparing belief in mental illness to "creation science" (and particularly saying that a hereditary explanation can as easily be explained "due to....choice", leads to grossly immoral consequences.

Michael Golding and the other physicians in the discussion are correct that repeating myths about mental illness harms people. Prof. Deutsch and others are not aware that people stop life saving medicines and treatments because of these types of popular expressions against mental illness.

Finally, it is simply not within the norm of academic discourse to use the kind of inflammatory language I see in this blog. Repeating and reinforcing popular, but false cultural messages leads to needless suffering and death. I love being a family doctor. For years, I have noticed how rewarding it is to diagnose and treat many of these conditions. Treated properly, people get better, often very rapidly, and say things like "so this is what it is like to feel normal!". I wish I had the same power with diabetes, cancer, and heart disease.

by JR on Wed, 07/13/2005 - 13:39 | reply

Re: Enough already! Ideas have consequences!

I wish I had the time to reply to the many scientifically erroneous assertions of Professor Deutsch and others on this blog. I do not, so I will be brief.

That bipolar disorder and schizophrenia are heritable brain diseases is not in question amongst scientists who study this area.

Could you please provide a link to the erroneous assertion that this is intended to contradict?

by Editor on Wed, 07/13/2005 - 14:42 | reply

Faking Mental Illness

Thanks for your response. Makes sense.

To address one extreme case:

"This was a one-off event; nothing like it has happened to him before and he had no evidence that it would. Then he is not culpable."

Not exactly sure what "one-off event" means. Do you mean an event that happened once and we know that it (and events similar) will never happen again or do you mean a first-time event?

Thanks.

by Michael Golding on Thu, 07/14/2005 - 00:06 | reply

Fake Illnesses

Professor Deutsch,

Put another way, if Joe continues not to understand that his attack was unprovoked and wrong, even after the attack, and he continues to believe that the CIA is trying to control him and that everyone who explains that Harry is innocent is in league with the devil; and indeed Joe sees their horns and hears their voices threatening him (though they actually do not), and Joe honestly believes that Harry was and is trying to kill him because he saw him doing that, is Joe culpable for hitting Harry?

by Michael Golding on Thu, 07/14/2005 - 01:24 | reply

Mental Illness

At first, I couldn't see much point in saying mental illness doesn't exist and that it was something that could be used interchangeably with brain disease. It finally occurred to me to look at it another way:

With physical symptoms, there's usually some idea of harm they are doing to the person's body. With "mental illness", a set of "symptoms" based on behavior is likely to be very biased by what people think of as "normal" and people might be very wrong about what should be normal.

With behavior/mental "symptoms", sometimes what is harming the patient are other people's reactions to it. For example, some people might consider being homosexual "abnormal" and think of it as something that should be "treated" to prevent the tendency to behave in "self-harming" ways. In reality, I think such a person is likely healthy and trying to treat him or make him behave "normally" is likely harmful to him.

I can't be sure of this, but I think David's aversion toward using the term "mental illness" could actually be partly out of respect for individuals who are different but possibly not "diseased". Then again, once it is understood that a "mental illness" is actually normal, people could always recategorize it that way. This can be difficult for such people because the stigma of it being a mental illness can take a long time to go away within a culture. It still seems like there ought to be a term for labeling a set of behaviors/symptoms that we think are unhealthy/bad for the patient or could cause them to have bad interactions with people. I think illness offers the benefit of seeing it as something the person is working to have treated or overcome. I'm not sure what other term would be appropriate. I don't think being "mentally ill" would mean that a person has no responsibility or culpability. As David suggests, the person could be held responsible for harm he causes as a result of his failure to obtain and adhere to treatments.

As for deciding about culpability and responsibility, I think it's trickier than David has suggested, so it would be great if he'd expand on it a bit.

What if a person is unaware of the effects of a brain disease/difference when he does something harmful to someone else? David suggests such a person wouldn't be culpable but he should seek to get help.

What if getting help is also risky? A person admitting to a mental difficulty could be barred from employment and find themselves rejected socially.

How much risk is the individual's responsibility to take on? Doesn't society have some responsibility for creating an environment where admitting to and receiving treatment is so risky?

Suppose a person is aware of his condition and takes what he thinks are reasonable measures which turn out to be insufficient. For example, he only has noticeable altered state type symptoms when he eats a particular food. He doesn't take medication but is careful to read labels and ask about ingredients in dishes in order to avoid the food. Despite his care, he unknowingly ingests some one day and as a result is in a bad mental state and harms someone. What then? Is the person "culpable" or "responsible"? Should people err on the side of taking whatever drugs or therapies offered to avoid harm even if the treatments are risky? (some anti-depressants have been linked with higher rates of suicide and aggressiveness, from what I understand) Would such a person then be responsible for being even more selective about his food choices (say only eating specific things that he's tested on himself with someone to supervise him) or would it be sufficient to tell everyone he knows about this risk and help him keep a look out for symptoms? Is he culpable for mistakes in treating his condition? Are treatment decisions something that should be assigned to another party?

What if part of a person's condition prevents him from being able to accurately assess the need for treatment? A person who is "manic" might feel "great" and not see any need to be treated and yet the person's behavior could become very harmful to himself and others. The same person might, in a different state, might be quite calm and non-violent and shocked by his own behavior in the past and not be able to understand how he could have done such things. How would one tell the difference between a "manic" person and a normal person who is simply making some bad choices because .. well why?

Becky Moon

by beckyam on Fri, 07/15/2005 - 16:02 | reply

Re: Mental Illness

Becky Moon wrote:

What if a person is unaware of the effects of a brain disease/difference when he does something harmful to someone else? David suggests such a person wouldn't be culpable but he should seek to get help.

What if getting help is also risky? A person admitting to a mental difficulty could be barred from employment and find themselves rejected socially.

Any system for judging whether or not people are culpable for certain acts is inevitably imperfect. Of course, we should try to improve our means of judging culpability and what we do to people who are culpable for criminal acts but that is a difficult task.

I should add that if a person experiences some difficulty because of a brain disease which is cured by medication then he should be able to get a job and a social life. This would be a lot easier if psychiatrists did not conflate having unfortunate ideas about how to live one's life with brain diseases. The former is often a more serious problem than the latter, partly because bad ideas can be difficult to get rid of and partly because psychiatrists ignore these real problems in favour of pseudomedical gibberish. The answer to this problem is for psychiatrists and others to start admitting that some people have problems because of their ideas, to stop coercive practises for people who have not been convicted of criminal offences and for people to start looking for solutions for such problems much more seriously than they have to date.

by Alan Forrester on Sat, 07/16/2005 - 01:34 | reply

Re: Enough already! Ideas have consequences!

JR wrote:

Diseases of the brain lead to specific, predictable clinical syndromes. Would Dr. Deutsch call OCD in a child triggered by a strep throat (one of the so -called 'PANDAS' conditions) a brain disease, but a condition with the exact same manifestations, affecting the same portions of the brain (as detected by neuroimaging) in an adult a "choice"?

Your chosen example of OCD and strep throat and so on is a perfect example of the muddle people get into when they start thinking of undesirable behaviours as caused by brain diseases. Sometimes when the body responds to strep throat it gets things a bit wrong and antibodies attack the basal ganglia making them swell up. People with this specific medical condition supposedly behave in ways that psychiatrists characterise as obsessive more often than other people. Does it follow that this swelling causes OCD and therefore that it is a brain disease? No. Suppose that the swelling induces a sensation that makes people feel as if they are dirty or greasy when in fact they are not. then these people might wash their hands obsessively, or engage in other hygeinic practises obsessively. Or it might induce a sensation that they associate with feeling panic, it might make their chest feel slightly tight or whatever. However, some people might just ignore these sensations and get on with their life, so the 'mental illness' could be caused by the person's interpretation of certain sensations and not by the swelling. Treating people who engage in certain behaviours obsessively as if they had a medical illness is crude and scientific.

Mind-Body dualism is not helpful at all in the exam room, and when promulgated as truth by intelligent people like many of the participants in this forum, may result in terrible societal consequences. Saying "it's all in your head" allows society to discount and disregard the suffering of those with mental illness.

Mind-body dualism is nonsense. Nor have we said anywhere that it is true. Suppose I'm watching that dreadful National Lottery programme on the television. I might say that what I am watching is drivel, but I will not say that it is rubbish because my television is malfunctioning, it is rubbish because the programme is ill-conceived garbage. Needless to say, I do not believe in television/programme dualism. I do not disreagr the suffering of people who have ideas that make them unhappy, but I will not say that their bad ideas are brain diseases.

It causes lawmakers to distribute financial resources toward 'real' illnesses like cancer and diabetes, but not to 'fake' illnesses like schizophrenia.

I don't want lawmakers to give out money for research into any disease. However, I even more strongly do not want them to underwrite a coercive, scientific fantasy that gets in the way of people tackling their personal problems.

Treated properly, people [diagnosed with mental illnesses] get better, often very rapidly, and say things like "so this is what it is like to feel normal!".

When Catholics who feel distant from God take communion they may feel better and closer to God afterward. Therefore, God exists, as does an illness called 'being distant from God' for which communion wafers and wine are the treatment. Sadly, Medicare does not cover these vital medical treatments. Quick, write to your Congressman!

by Alan Forrester on Sat, 07/16/2005 - 02:14 | reply

Medical Science?

A recent series of court cases in London prove that it is possible to rise to the top of the medical profession without having any clue about what scientific evidence is.

by a reader on Sat, 07/16/2005 - 06:18 | reply

Re: Fake Illnesses

if Joe continues not to understand that his attack was unprovoked and wrong, even after the attack, and he continues to believe that the CIA is trying to control him and that everyone who explains that Harry is innocent is in league with the devil; and indeed Joe sees their horns and hears their voices threatening him (though they actually do not), and Joe honestly believes that Harry was and is trying to kill him because he saw him doing that, is Joe culpable for hitting Harry?

All these things happened after the attack. What happens after the attack cannot possibly affect whether someone was culpable for it.

It may be that what happens after the attack provides indirect evidence of what happened before and during it. But it's what happened before and during it that determines whether the attacker is culpable.

by David Deutsch on Sat, 07/16/2005 - 19:03 | reply

Culpability

People who are convicted of crimes should be locked up unless there are factors which indicate otherwise.

These factors cannot be summed up as whether someone was culpable for committing the crime. For instance, someone might steal under circumstances that are regarded as understandable but still criminal and receive a suspended sentence. (A poor person stealing jackets for their children in the middle of winter, maybe).

Hallucinations may or may not make it improper to jail someone. Someone who didn't know he sometimes hallucinates, fully regrets his crime, and intends to compensate for his hallucinations in the future should not be locked up. These things happen, and people shouldn't be jailed for them.

But someone who commits a crime while hallucinating and later categorically denies having committing it, has no remorse, or has no intention of compensating for his hallucinations in the future is just as criminal as they were when they committed the crime. There is no reasonable case for releasing such people.

It may be reasonable to treat prisoners who committed crimes under different circumstances differently, just as some prisons treat violent and non-violent offenders differently.

None of this depends on medicalizing mental problems or justifies locking people up who have not committed any crimes.

by Woty on Sat, 07/16/2005 - 20:26 | reply

Mental problems are real

Madness exists. Difficult mental problems exist. There are ways out of such states and problems, and they have to be found and created. People have to make choices and find solutions to their problems, and in many situations need a lot of really good help and support.

What people do not need is false medicalization of their problems. Mental problems, even deepset and difficult ones, are not diseases and cannot be fixed by medical intervention. Forcing people to comply with a false model of their problems can actually make it harder for them to find ways out of them.

(NB: proponents of the illness model advocate literally forcing people to comply with this model, not just trying to convince them that they are ill. It is disingenous to argue that asserting that mental problems are non-medical is the same type of act as imprisoning people in mental hospitals.)

by Woty on Sat, 07/16/2005 - 20:46 | reply

Medical Intervention

"Mental Problems, even deepset and difficult ones, are not diseases and cannot be fixed by medical intervention."

Woty

I'm not precisely sure what you mean. Are you saying that physicians trained to prescribe medication cannot treat bipolar illness? schizophrenia? major depression?, obsessive compulsive disorder?, medication induced depression?, medication induced psychosis? social phobia? panic? Tourettes? Alzheimers dementia?

I don't know what you mean by "false medicalization of their problem."

If you are saying that doctors trained to prescribe medication cannot improve the condition of those with the above conditions (considered mental illnesses), you are literally saying that thousands of studies are ALL WRONG.

Do you have evidence supporting this interesting assertion?

by Michael Golding on Sun, 07/17/2005 - 01:14 | reply

Illness model gets you off the hook

Woty said:

Forcing people to comply with a false model of their problems can actually make it harder for them to find ways out of them

I bet that such forcing does occur, but also that a large proportion of supposed mental patients are willing from the start to embrace the illness model precisely in order to avoid addressing their real problems.

by Tom Robinson on Sun, 07/17/2005 - 01:31 | reply

Medicalization

Here are some OCD symptoms:

- Unfounded fears of contracting a dreadful illness
- Excessive concerns about dirt and germs (including the fear of spreading germs to others); and environmental contaminants, such as household cleaners
- Feelings of revulsion about bodily waste and secretions
- Obsessions about one's body
- Abnormal concerns about sticky substances or residues

From here: <http://www.brainphysics.com/checklist.php>

Notice each and every one is about undesirable behavior and ideas. While there is such thing as brain disease, there are "mental illnesses" that are actually behavior people disagree with. Those shouldn't be medicalised.

If you want to discuss studies, please find one (just one will do) with a valid methodology and say briefly how it contradicts my position.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Sun, 07/17/2005 - 01:48 | reply

Re: Fake Illness

"To address one extreme case: This was a one-off event, nothing like it has happened to him before and he had no evidence that it would. Then he is not culpable."

David Deutsch

"if Joe continues NOT TO UNDERSTAND that his attack was unprovoked..."

Michael Golding

"All these things happened after the attack. What happens after the attack cannot possibly affect whether someone was culpable for it."

David Deutsch

Thank you so much for responding. I assume that from your statements above that you believe Joe continues to be "not culpable."

Professor Deutsch,

Do you think it is possible for someone like Joe to continue to not understand an explanation given to him concerning why it was wrong to hit Harry, despite Joe's best efforts? In other words, do you think it is possible for someone like Joe to hallucinate so vividly and to be so paranoid and delusional, that he believes

1. that those explaining what actually happened to him are in league with the devil and the CIA and are trying to harm him, so he shouldn't listen to them when they talk about Harry being a nice man who was just offering him a cigarette?

2. that actually Harry was trying to stab him with a knife because he (Joe) saw the knife and he (Joe) heard Harry threaten him with it?

Is it possible that given Joe's hallucinations, Joe's best logical efforts lead him to believe that Harry was and is trying to hurt him? In short, is it possible for someone like Joe to continue to not understand that what he did was wrong?

Thanks. Have a great day.

by Michael Golding on Sun, 07/17/2005 - 03:27 | reply

Medicalization

Ahh. Mr Temple, are you aware that those with OCD DO NOT WANT their "undesirable behaviors and ideas"? They ask us to help them stop washing their hands 700 times per day, for example. Or in more extreme cases, they ask to not die, because they have to do so many rituals before they take a shower, that they can't take a shower because their rituals require more than 24 hours to complete so they haven't showered in two years. They are encrusted with disease causing organisms, they are not eating much because they don't have time, and they are on the verge of death.

Those with OCD are, in general, completely rational people. They ask us to help them eat and take a shower so they can have a little bit of a normal life.

Almost by definition, they would not have OCD unless the patient said the rituals were interfering with their life.

For scientific articles, read articles in the American Journal of Psychiatry, Biological Psychiatry, Annals of Psychiatry. Read articles on Psychiatric subjects from the Journal of the American Medical Association, the New England Journal of Medicine etc.

If you are serious, I will provide some articles that may be interesting!

Take care.

by a reader on Sun, 07/17/2005 - 14:08 | reply

ocd

They have conflicting ideas about hand washing. Their ideas (overall) may very well be a mess, and they may want help. That doesn't mean they need medicine, or that medicine can help. It's fully possible all they need is advice/knowledge.

Do you think any medicines contain knowledge about washing hands (a human activity)?

I don't think I'm serious the way you mean, because I already know what these articles are like. I want you to choose one (online), not me, so that you won't say I've chosen a bad one to criticise.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Sun, 07/17/2005 - 14:54 | reply

OCD

I think a person having a particular habit or behavior that they want to stop but also can't seem to make themselves stop doesn't make it an "illness". It seems like it would be better to first approach it as a problem they want solved. It might be caused by a brain disease, it might be related to a particular set of ideas or experiences, or it could be contributed to by both. The solution to their problem could be medicines or ideas or both. While I don't think a medicine can change a person's ideas directly, I think it could change their emotional state.

At the least, I think it might be possible to make a person feel more or less "extreme". In the hand washing example, the person might have a fear of germs. The experience of the fear could be very mild or it could feel very important and urgent and some of that feeling could be affected by other factors - lack of sleep, lack of food, other things going on in life. Suppose a medication made the person feel less anxious about things overall. The person is then able to focus more on his thoughts and better prioritize them, feel less anxious (and then feel less need to wash hands - something that might seem comforting in a way), break his hand washing pattern, and possibly even change his mental state overall to the point where he can drop the medication and have his problem solved. This could happen without his even understanding that's what's going on.

Becky Moon

by beckyam on Sun, 07/17/2005 - 16:59 | reply

medical intervention

I'm not precisely sure what you mean. Are you saying that physicians trained to prescribe medication cannot treat bipolar illness? schizophrenia? major depression?, obsessive compulsive disorder?, medication induced depression?, medication induced psychosis? social phobia? panic? Tourettes? Alzheimers dementia?

Most of the problems you list are not dysfunctions of the body, and cannot be fixed by fixing the body. So no one can treat them, even if they have been trained to prescribe drugs.

However, psychiatry has established some useful rules of thumb over the years, and people with problems are often genuinely helped by drugs. For this reason, involvement with psychiatry is often a good choice for people with serious problems to make. (Although by no means always should people who would be diagnosed with the conditions you listed if they consulted a psychiatrist seek psychiatric help.)

I don't know what you mean by "false medicalization of their problem."

Mental problems are not medical conditions. They are not dysfunctions of the body. People who have serious mental problems should not be told that they are simply ill and that fixing their bodies will fix their problems.

by Woty on Sun, 07/17/2005 - 17:48 | reply

Madness is real; but it's not an illness

Debilitating behavioural syndromes such as schizophrenia, manic depression and eating disorders are real. But it's highly tendentious to call them illnesses, because the prevailing theories about their causes, their consequences and their remedies are all morally very controversial. By calling these syndromes "illnesses" we gloss over that controversy and hand over authority to adjudicate on these moral issues to a "priesthood" of psychiatrists who lack any special moral insights for dealing with them. While there exist some wise and humane psychiatrists and therapists, as an objective body of transmissible knowledge, psychiatry is, as Szasz rightly says, just like alchemy.

However, it would be ridiculous to suggest that just because the prevailing psychiatric theories are wrong, serious mental disorders don't exist. They exist all right; it's just that they are not illnesses in any useful sense of the word. Having said that, we cannot entirely de-couple the management of these problems from the medical profession, because prescription-only medication has a legitimate role to play in the management of mental disorders. Moreover, as some behavioural disturbances are caused by genuine illnesses such as thyroid malfunction, brain tumours and Alzheimer's, it makes sense for doctors to be involved in the evaluation of certain kinds of mental/behavioural disorders.

On the subject of culpability, I think there exists a lot of confusion about what this really is. People tend to assume that culpability is a fundamental quality like right and wrong. I don't go along with that. I think that assigning culpability is basically a way of coming to feel OK about the degree of coercion against a culprit that we judge to be optimal from a societal point of view. In other words, we deem people culpable in proportion to how severely we want to punish them or deter them or others. And this is strongly influenced by social trends and changes in our factual knowledge.

For example, whereas once it was deemed exculpating to have been drunk when causing a traffic accident, more recently the trend has been to consider inebriation an inculpatory factor. What this boils down to is that society has decided to increase the degree of deterrence against drunk driving, in order to exert a stronger influence on drivers to change their behaviour regarding drinking and driving.

It follows from this conception of culpability that a person's degree of culpability is a function of how susceptible that category of persons is to being deterred. That's why, generally speaking, the madder people are, and also the younger children are, the less culpable they are deemed to be. But culpability is not the only legitimate reason for coercing culprits. Sometimes we are justified in incarcerating people who are dangerous to others, even if we do not deem them culpable. But this kind of decision ought to be made by legislators and judges, not by psychiatrists and psychologists.

-- This comment was first posted in response to Becky's post on Mental Illness.

by Kolya on Sun, 07/17/2005 - 19:10 | reply

Re: Mental Illness

Ms. Moon,
I enjoyed reading your thoughtful post.

"At first, I couldn't see much point in saying mental illness doesn't exist and that it was something that could be used interchangeably with brain disease. It finally occurred to me to look at it another way:"

Becky Moon

Shucks! Let me try to convince you to accept your former greater wisdom. Or at any rate, let me try to convince you that serious mental illness implies underlying brain disease, involves peoples choices and is affected by cultural phenomenon in the same way that type 2 diabetes implies the existence of an underlying endocrine disease, but also involves peoples choices and and is affected by cultural involvement.

Age adjusted prevalence of diabetes in the United States increased 19% between 1980 and 1996 and incidence increased 18% (CDC). Since genes can't change that rapidly, cultural phenomena explain the increasing incidence and prevalence of diabetes in the United States. Actually, the risk of developing serious mental illness like bipolar illness, OCD, or schizophrenia, is increased far less by peoples choices and their interaction with others than type 2 diabetes, which in younger people is very much caused by peoples choices and their interactions with others, rather than genetics per se. The emergence of diabetes in older people, however, is very much a purely biological illness, like bipolar illness, schizophrenia, obsessive compulsive disorder, and also several other major mental illnesses like major depression.

But type 2 diabetes in young people is still a real illness, even though a substantial part of the risk of development of diabetes in someone who is 15 years old, is caused by his interactions with others and his consequent choices (eating too much and not exercising). Type 2 diabetes is a real illness in young people even if it is caused primarily by interactions with others because,

1. People are not intentionally causing diabetes in others (people just want to sell each other bad food and a sedentary lifestyle!)...but even if they were intentionally causing it...
2. The consequences to a person of a cultural phenomenon increasing the risk of development of diabetes, is a deleterious change in physiology that can lead to injury and death.

In my opinion, whether an illness is caused by an interaction with others or not, should not matter if the consequences to the person are a potentially permanent change in physiology which shortens his life and damages his organs. For example, even if Fred deserves to be punched in the nose, he still may have a crushed maxillary sinus from the punch, and a crushed maxillary sinus is certainly an illness, which should be treated by doctors.

So whether certain types of mental illness are caused by an interaction with other people should not be relevant, if such interaction causes a substantially increased risk for development of an abnormal physiology and if this pathophysiology shortens peoples lives and damages their organs. If obese children now are developing type 2 diabetes which damages their kidneys, if someone is punched in the nose and the damaged maxillary sinus is now prone to infection, or if someone is cruel to someone else and the victim becomes depressed, and this damages their heart; and if all of these are caused by interactions with other people, why is the depression the only one that is not an illness?

To use Mr. Forrester's analogies: In all of the above examples, the "programming" of the computer (or TV) could be bad. The person who gets punched could have failed to learn how to be nice to people. The child who gets type 2 diabetes could have failed to learn how to exercise and eat properly. The person who becomes depressed may have failed to learn how to deal with the cruel behavior of others. But in all the cases mentioned above, the "programming" failures damage the "computer hardware" (causing infections in the sinuses, damage to the kidney, and damage to the heart.) In short, the software damages the hardware.

The situation is actually a little more complicated than that. Genetic vulnerability to an illness makes the bodies organs more vulnerable to environmental influence. For example, the risk for developing type 2 diabetes and major depression is strongly influenced by genetic factors. In terms of Mr. Forrester's excellent analogy, some computer hardware is more vulnerable to attack by malicious software.

For those who like "meme" language, some memes form symbiotic relationships with organs and genes, some are commensal with them, and some are parasitic on them. Mr. Forrester's possible small conceptual error (with big implications!) is to apparently assume that memes form only "commensal" and perhaps "symbiotic" relationships with people, while ignoring the possibility of a parasitic relationship. In such a situation, one can develop a mental illness with no biological predisposition at all, which nonetheless causes serious organ damage. Thoughts and feelings change nerves (often permanently) and change hormones (often permanently), and these changes subsequently damage organs. The work of Nemeroff (JAMA) and others, in primates (mildly) experimentally abused as infants, and women abused as children, provides ample scientific evidence of life-long damage to organ systems due to early childhood stress.

"With physical symptoms, there's usually some idea of harm they are doing to the person's body."

Becky Moon

Ms. Moon, you may be confusing cause and effect, just a little, in this statement. Physical symptoms don't (in general) cause harm in a person's body, they are a consequence of harm. For example, if someone says that he feels like scratching a small vesicular eruption that develops on his trunk after ingesting a new medication, the allergic reaction is the cause, but the "symptom" is the feeling that one needs to scratch. The need to scratch and the vesicular eruptions are effects (not causes) of the allergic reaction.

Serious mental illnesses profoundly damage the body, more so than most illnesses that people usually think of.

1. Major Depression increases the risk of developing heart disease, increases the rate of progression of heart disease, and increases the rate of death from heart disease. Physiological changes associated with depression and with adverse cardiovascular outcomes include increased platelet aggregability, decreased heart rate variability (roughly "parasympathetic" or relaxing neurological input to the heart vs. "fight or flight input"), and exaggerated cardiovascular reactivity to situations that provoke mental stress.

2. Major Depression and several other mental illnesses (e.g. PTSD) are strongly associated with increased psychological and physiological reactions to stressful situations. Individuals with above average sympathetic nervous system responses to stressful situations have an increased risk of developing atherosclerosis, of experiencing ischemic episodes once coronary artery disease (CAD) is present, and ultimately of dying once CAD is established.

I placed a brief reference list at the end of this section, if someone is interested in some of the reference papers supporting what I am saying, But there are so many more if someone is interested in the overwhelming scientific evidence supporting the contention that mental illnesses like major depression severely damage organs.

3. Major Depression damages the hippocampus (involved in memory) and multiple other areas of the brain (if you want more information let me know or I will be creating a laundry list of brain parts, and another laundry list of references). Suffice to say that the parts of the brain damaged in major depression correspond with the symptoms created, if for example a stroke damages the same part affected by the depression. Animal models also provide near perfect confirmation of these damaged brain parts causing unusual behaviors. For example, we used to say that Major Depression causes a "pseudodementia" of depression but now we know that "pseudodementia" of depression, if it goes on long enough, actually progresses to an actual dementia of depression.

Most readers have felt nervous enough to sometimes not remember the details of questions when they are about to take a test. A number of brain chemicals actually change the flow of blood and other parameters, away from certain memory centers during stress, and in addition, various "fight or flight" chemicals interfere with neuronal function that allows retrieval of memories. Furthermore, many fight or flight hormones are neurotoxic and ultimately kill nerve cells, for example associated with short-term memory. So unlike what still is being taught in some psychology classes, sometimes "pseudo-dementia" of depression is not a "pseudo" dementia at all, but an actual dementia with permanent loss of (particularly) short-term memory function.

4. Individuals with schizophrenia often appear perfectly normal as children and young adults. They graduate from high-school, begin a promising college education, but for unknown reasons they suffer their first psychotic break, and may hallucinate, and become paranoid, usually as late adolescents. Within 3 months, the brain of a young person just developing this illness, will shrink the equivalent of the amount one sees with a small stroke (an average of 11 cc's) (Lieberman JA, ACNP 2002).. And the patient loses approximately 15 points of IQ function (depending upon the study) in a few months, exactly the kind of results one would expect from certain types of acute brain injury. And, these are also the types of changes you see with a stroke in certain areas of the brain. Why is the acute brain shrinkage from a stroke the consequence of a "real" phenomenon, but the acute brain shrinkage from schizophrenia a consequence of a "Superstition", according to Mr. Alan Forrester. How can a "superstition" shrink a brain?

5. Those with bipolar illness have 2-3X increased risk of cardiovascular (e.g. heart attacks), endocrine (e.g diabetes) and neurovascular (e.g. stroke) death (Osby, 2001). And patients die an average of 9 years earlier (Hirschfield, J Clin Psych, 2003).

"With physical symptoms, there's usually some idea of harm they are doing to the person's body. .."
Becky Moon

So yes Ms. Moon, one would expect that if aspects of mental illnesses are brain diseases, one would expect systemic physical effects, and indeed that is exactly what you see!

"With behavior/mental "symptoms", sometimes what is harming the patient are other people's reactions to it. For example, some people might consider being homosexual "abnormal" and think of it as something that should be "treated" to prevent the tendency to behave in "self-harming" ways. In reality, I think such a person is likely healthy and trying to treat him or make him behave "normally" is likely harmful to him."
Becky Moon

Very perceptive comment, in my view. I agree with you 100%. Homosexuality is not considered an illness or a disability, nor should it be. Aspergers, Autism, and Mental Retardation are not considered illnesses, either, nor should they be, but are considered disabilities. Although psychiatrists don't treat these conditions, I venture to say that most psychiatrists would not consider congenital deafness or congenital blindness to be illnesses, either! I will explain why these distinctions are made, in a later post.

I will also respond to some of your other interesting comments in one of my next posts.

Thanks.

1. Frasure-Smith N, Lesperance F, Talajic M. Depression and 18-month prognosis after myocardial infarction. Circulation 1995;91:999-1005.
2. Frasure-Smith N, Lesperance F, Juneau M, et al. Gender, depression, and one-year prognosis after myocardial infarction. Psychosom Med 1999;61:26-37.
3. Laghrissi-Thode F, Wagner WR, Pollock BG, et al. Elevated platelet factor 4 and beta-thromboglobulin plasma levels in depressed patients with ischemic heart disease. Biol Psychiatry 1997;42:290-295.
4. Flores NA, Sheridan DJ. The pathophysiological role of platelets during myocardial ischaemia. Cardiovasc Res 1994;28:295-302.
5. Carney RM, Blumenthal JA, Stein PK, et al. Depression, heart rate variability, and acute myocardial infarction. Circulation 2001;104:2024-2028.
6. Vaishnav S, Stevenson R, Marchant B, et al. Relation between heart rate variability early after acute myocardial infarction and long-term mortality. Am J Cardiol 1994;73:653-657.
7. Jiang W, Babyak M, Krantz DS, et al. Mental stress--induced myocardial ischemia and cardiac events. JAMA 1996;275:1651-1656.
8. Light KC, Kothandapani RV, Allen MT. Enhanced cardiovascular and catecholamine responses in women with depressive symptoms. Int J Psychophysiol 1998;28:157-166.
9. Schoder H, Silverman DH, Campisi R, et al. Effect of mental stress on myocardial blood flow and vasomotion in patients with coronary artery disease. J Nucl Med 2000;41:11-16.
10. Yoshida K, Utsunomiya T, Morooka T, et al. Mental stress test is an effective inducer of vasospastic angina pectoris: comparison with cold pressor, hyperventilation and master two-step exercise test. Int J Cardiol 1999;70:155-163.
11. Jern S, Wall U, Bergbrant A. Long-term stability of blood pressure and pressor reactivity to mental stress in borderline hypertension. Am J Hypertens 1995;8:20-28.
12. Stone PH, Krantz DS, McMahon RP, et al. Relationship among mental stress-induced ischemia and ischemia during daily life and during exercise: the Psychophysiological Investigations of Myocardial Ischemia (PIMI) study. J Am Coll Cardiol 1999;33:1476-1484.
13. Blumenthal JA, Jiang W, Waugh RA, et al. Mental stress-induced ischemia in the laboratory and ambulatory ischemia during daily life. Association and hemodynamic features. Circulation 1995;92:2102-2108.
14. Barnett PA, Spence JD, Manuck SB, et al. Psychological stress and the progression of carotid artery disease. J Hypertens 1997;15:49-55.
15. Matthews KA, Owens JF, Kuller LH, et al. Stress-induced pulse pressure change predicts women's carotid atherosclerosis. Stroke 1998;29:1525-1530

by Michael Golding on Sun, 07/17/2005 - 19:58 | reply

Depression

1. Major Depression increases the risk of developing heart disease, increases the rate of progression of heart disease, and increases the rate of death from heart disease.

But so does stupidity.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Sun, 07/17/2005 - 20:41 | reply

OCD

Hi Ms. Moon,

I would prefer not to discuss OCD in depth because it is the most counterintuitive of perhaps all the psychiatric illnesses, and so would be counterproductive to discuss with individuals who appear not to have had the opportunity to read as much about most psychiatric illnesses and perhaps have not had that much experiences with individuals with psychiatric illness.

I really enjoyed your other comments and perhaps will pay more attention to them and less to the OCD stuff, if OK with you.

Suffice to say I can see how someone would believe that OCD is a "problem" that needs to be "solved" but not an illness. "Panic Disorder" and "Social Phobia" (not particularly genetically based), for example might be considered "problems" that need "solutions", but not OCD.

A very conservative estimate of genetic risk for development of OCD is 50%, and more recent studies are finding a far higher genetic involvement. OCD is more genetically based than schizophrenia or major depression. (And no, those with OCD do not look differently than others, so these findings cannot be explained away by "gene-environment" correlation!)

The only thing different about those with OCD and those not with OCD are their repetitive thoughts and behaviors, which they hate and want to get rid of!!

Most types of anti-anxiety medicine do not work for them, but some do to some extent. Behavioral treatment works on a specific compulsion, but individuals often then move to another one. Few long term studies have been done documenting efficacy of any intervention, and unlike most psychiatric illnesses, serious OCD is remarkably refractory to all forms of treatment.

OCD is the only psychiatric disorder for which brain surgery is indicated in the most refractory cases, and even then, the surgery is effective only 50% of the time.

In my own opinion, of all the psychiatric disorders in which the person usually maintains his complete rational faculties throughout the course of the illness, this is the most frightening precisely because the person is fully aware that what he is doing (e.g. washing for 16 hours per day) is completely insane. Indeed, patients with this disorder will tell you that their behavior is insane and beg for help. They fully well know (once explained to them) that washing their hands so frequently actually makes it more likely for them to get an infection, but they still can't stop. So they understand the scientific arguments very well.

The only analogy I could give to make compulsions understandable to some, might be to ask a young man to never have sex or experience any voluntary sexual release for the rest of his life. It is possible in the short-term, but virtually no one would succeed in the long-term.

Telling someone not to obsess "just get over it" would be like telling an average young man not to ever think about sex. Possible for some very strong-willed people to change their thoughts immediately....maybe....but not for most. Young men will think about sex, and those with OCD will think about their obsessions.

Interestingly, the same medications which will cause someone to obsess less, will also cause him to think about sex less frequently.

Thanks.

by Michael Golding on Sun, 07/17/2005 - 21:29 | reply

Depression

Mr. Temple,
I wish you would do a little bit of reading, before you give such rash (and incorrect) responses.

Studies have controlled for compliance with treatment ("stupidity"). No, lower IQ is not a risk factor for heart disease if diet, exercise, compliance with treatment, and a host of other risk factors are taken into account.

Perhaps you should read a little bit?

Have a nice day.

by Michael Golding on Sun, 07/17/2005 - 21:41 | reply

Controls

I wasn't talking about IQ or using a technical term. Sorry if that was unclear, but I meant stupidity in the standard everyday usage.

I did in fact read the study. Please don't say I am unserious, ignorant or anything similar. It claimed:

After we controlled for the other significant multivariate predictors of mortality in the data set

However, it didn't explain how they did this. As there are no scientific tests or measures (and there cannot be) to test for certain forms of stupidity, I don't believe the sentence. For example, it requires creativity and judgment to decide if a person understands how to make good decisions about heart attack risks when confronted with fun activities or tasty foods. This cannot be controlled for.

If you disagree, please provide some explanation of how it can be controlled for. (And some reason to think the people who did the study actually used your method.)

Further, there could be a factor they don't know about that they didn't control for. They can't prove there isn't.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Sun, 07/17/2005 - 23:12 | reply

Medical Intervention

"Most of the problems you list are not dysfunctions of the body, and cannot be fixed by fixing the body. So no one can treat them, even if they have been trained to prescribe drugs"
Woty

With the exception of Alzheimers, 1/3rd of the cases of schizophrenia, and OCD/Tourette spectrum disorders, (which in the long-term we are not particularly good at treating), we treat virtually all of the listed conditions reasonably well, and the same is true for psychiatric treatment of dozens of other illnesses, and we are getting better. Thousands of studies document this relative success.

Indeed, the treatment success rates of various medical professions have been studied, though obviously conclusions drawn by the studies must be somewhat subjective because of the meaning of the word "success".

But psychiatrists tend to have higher rates of success in treating illnesses that the profession handles, relative to general internists and neurologists, for example. Surgeons, however, seem to have the highest success rates.

Is your perspective two or three decades behind the times?

But thanks for recognizing the reality of bipolar disorder and schizophrenia. That's a start in this forum!

by Michael Golding on Mon, 07/18/2005 - 00:59 | reply

Kolya not Woty

Sorry. Kolya is the one who understands the reality of Bipolar illness and Schizophrenia.

by Michael Golding on Mon, 07/18/2005 - 01:04 | reply

Kolya

Actually, as I read it, Kolya denied it was an illness.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 07/18/2005 - 01:11 | reply

Bipolar Entity

Yes, Mr. Temple, you are right, he did. He called the Bipolar ? entity?, "real".

by Michael Golding on Mon, 07/18/2005 - 03:00 | reply

Real

We all agree it's real. (ie, that it exists). no one is saying: nah, everyone acts totally sane, all reports of sightings of crazy people are just ... umm well not from crazies ... all just mistakes.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 07/18/2005 - 03:18 | reply

What is real and what is not?

Dr Golding,

Not only do I agree that conditions such as bipolar disorder and schizophrenia are real, I also agree that they can cause profound unhappiness to those who are afflicted by them. I consider any attempt to construe them purely as unorthodox manifestations of free will, as plain silly. Let me also say that I have the highest regard for the scientific enterprise.

So why am I unimpressed by the voluminous literature about the physical basis of mental disorders? One reason is captured by the jocular saying: "If your only tool is a hammer, all problems are liable to look like nails." The point being that for all its power, science is distinguished from other forms of enquiry by just one unique tool: empirical refutation. Therefore anybody who wants to publish a scientifically credible paper must present their conclusions in a form that is, at least in principle, empirically refutable.

Which is fine if your subject is celestial mechanics. But what if your subject is, by its very nature, not easily amenable to empirical testing. Take for example the recent controversy about whether the relative dearth of top rank female mathematicians has a genetic basis. I contend that this is not a problem that currently lends itself to conventional scientific discourse. Of course, if somebody found a gene for mathematical aptitude and was able successfully to predict future mathematical achievement, things might be different. But that hasn't happened. Not with mathematical aptitude and not with schizophrenia.

I know many people claim to have discovered all kinds of correlations between genes and mental disorders. I also know that for many years it was "established" that eating too many eggs elevates your blood cholesterol. Except it turns out that blood cholesterol is hardly affected by the levels of ingested cholesterol. Similarly, there must have been literally thousands of reported discoveries of correlations between this gene and that behavioural disorder, which have subsequently sunk without a trace.

Pending the completion of properly conducted prospective studies that successfully predict mental propensities based on genetic data, I contend that variations in human behaviour are not genetically determined (except for cases such as Down's syndrome). The main reason most of the relevant professionals assume otherwise is that their only tool requires them to theorise in terms of physical causation, if they are to retain scientific credibility. This is a case of the drunk looking for his wallet under the lamppost where the light is good, rather than in the dark alley where he dropped it.

In conclusion, let me point out that my stance is more refutable than the general doctrine of genetic causation. As soon as somebody publishes a genetic basis for successfully predicting which infant is likely to get schizophrenia, my stance will be refuted. But what would it take for the opposing genetic-causation doctrine to be refuted? As the adherents of that doctrine only admit empirically based arguments, it seems to me that if the doctrine were wrong, there is no conceivable experiment that would be accepted by them as a refutation. They would always do as they have done before, claim that the definitive physical causes of variations in human behaviour have not yet been discovered.

I mention in passing that such a strategy is also open to the defenders of astrology.

by Kolya on Mon, 07/18/2005 - 11:10 | reply

Re: Fake Illness

I assume that from your statements above that you believe Joe continues to be "not culpable."

Not culpable for his attack, yes.

Do you think it is possible for someone like Joe to continue to not understand an explanation given to him concerning why it was wrong to hit Harry [...]?

Actually we have already agreed that under the circumstances it was not wrong for him to hit Harry. But yes, it is very common for people, with or without hallucinations, to be mistaken about the ideas and motivations of some other people, and to ignore all evidence and to fail to understand explanations showing that they are mistaken about these and other facts.

In other words, do you think it is possible for someone like Joe to hallucinate so vividly and to be so paranoid and delusional, that he believes

This is very far from being the previous question stated in other words. This is a substantive theory about the mechanism for Joe's resistance to evidence and argument, namely the vividness of the hallucinations, etc. As before, the example as given does not contain any of the details relevant to whether Joe's resistance to being persuaded is morally wrong, or what it is due to. So let me imagine some details that would be relevant: first of all, it wasn't just a hallucination in the sense of seeing and hearing things that weren't happening. Some of the things (horns) are so implausible that one would immediately assume one was having a hallucination, unless the hallucinations were combined with a hardware-induced feeling that they are authentic. So I'll assume they were. Then, let me assume, he ran out of the pub screaming that the horned, demonic CIA agents were trying to kill him. The bystanders called the police, who located him nearby and asked him to accompany them in order to investigate the attack in the pub. He accused them of being horned, demonic CIA agents out to kill him, but they overpowered and restrained him before he could attack them. Now he is sitting in a cell, powerless, and various people whom, on the face of it, he has reason to trust, have been telling him that he has been hallucinating, and he just accuses them all of being horned, demonic CIA agents out to kill him.

OK, now, could the vividness (and hardware-enhanced sense of authenticity) of the hallucination possibly explain this behaviour? No. Not by itself. Because, for instance, once he is helpless in the cell, and they have not killed him, then the theory that they are engaged in a murderous attack on him is refuted. He must change it to something else that explains both his old and his new experiences – for instance, he could decide that now he has been captured they are planning an anal probe, and only afterwards will they kill him. Or he could decide that the whole thing, including his feeling that it is very very real, is a hallucination. Indeed, it is common that people who suffer a sudden, unpredictable, bizarre and terrifying disaster, wonder whether this is all a nightmare or hallucination. In either case, or in any other case, the explanation that he tentatively adopts cannot possibly be coded for in a defective gene or poisonous chemical. It is too complex for that. It can only have come from his own creative thought.

Why has his creative thought settled on one particular explanation as being the best, out of the infinity of explanations that would cover the experiences he has had? The story hasn't told us, but my moral opinion of him depends crucially on this. So again, let me imagine two extreme cases. One is that, prior to this hallucination, he was already a fervent believer in evil conspiracy theories and in the supernatural, and was also a thug who took pleasure in attacking people he took a dislike to. Let me also imagine that he had a clear path to the exit of the pub at the time of the attack, and did not hallucinate that it was blocked, and hence could have fled rather than attack his imagined attacker. In that case, the fact that on this occasion it happened to be a hallucination that sparked his attack is just an accidental detail, and (contrary to what we thought before we knew this) he bears a great deal of moral responsibility for it, perhaps almost as much as if there had been no hallucination. And if that is also the reason for his subsequent intransigence (i.e. that he more or less believed that explanation already), that makes him morally wrong to be intransigent too, just as he was already morally wrong to be intransigent about similar beliefs even before the hallucination.

At the other extreme, imagine that he is a fine, upstanding fellow with no relevant immoral ideas or habits, and that this sudden and unpredictable brain defect is not only causing hallucinations, it is affecting the transcription of his short- to longer-term memory. He can no longer recall the attack in the pub, but only waking up half a minute ago, imprisoned by demons. He is constantly in a state of being overwhelmed by this new and bizarre situation, and is therefore quite rightly devoting his attention, first, to analysing the possibility that it really is as it seems to be. By the time he gets round to considering other possible explanations, he has forgotten, and starts again at the beginning. In that case, he has done, and thought, nothing wrong.

1. that those explaining what actually happened to him are in league with the devil and the CIA and are trying to harm him, so he shouldn't listen to them when they talk about Harry being a nice man who was just offering him a cigarette?

It doesn't follow from the proposition that they are demons trying to harm him, that he should not listen to their explanations. On the contrary, once he is helpless and in their power, he should listen to them. If he had previously believed a religion that said otherwise, he may well have been at fault for doing so (though since this is such an unlikely outcome of believing the religion, his fault may not be commensurate with the harm it has caused).

2. that actually Harry was trying to stab him with a knife because he (Joe) saw the knife and he (Joe) heard Harry threaten him with it?

Memories, and experience, are fallible even in people who do not have hallucinations. So, again, the fact that Joe remembers this is not sufficient reason for him to reject arguments that he is mistaken.

Is it possible that given Joe's hallucinations, Joe's best logical efforts lead him to believe that Harry was and is trying to hurt him? In short, is it possible for someone like Joe to continue to not understand that what he did was wrong?

The hallucinations alone could not make his best logical efforts lead him to that explanation, and especially could not make him reject valid arguments for its being false. But there are other possible hardware failures, one of which I have indicated, which could.

by David Deutsch on Mon, 07/18/2005 - 11:40 | reply

Re: What is real and what is not "Take for example the recent controversy about whether the relative dearth of top rank female mathematicians has a genetic basis. I contend that this is not a problem that currently lends itself to conventional scientific discourse".

"Of course, if somebody found a gene for mathematical aptitude and was able successfully to predict future mathematical achievement, things might be different. But that hasn't happened. Not with mathematical aptitude and not with schizophrenia".
Kolya

I assume you have not read what I said about gene-environment correlation in any of my previous posts where I discussed this type of question, at one point at very great length. You have refuted none of the arguments I made. And data that could have refuted genetic arguments about bipolar disorder and schizophrenia could have easily been found by research conducted, just as it has been found for black-white differences in IQ and male-female differences in a number of traits.

Once again, one can not decide, using certain types of twin studies, male-female or black-white differences in gene frequency, because of gene-environment correlations. Even Murray and Hernstein (The Bell Curve) clearly understand this, yet you apparently don't. The possibility of gene-environment correlation has been extensively evaluated over decades in bipolar disorder and schizophrenia. But Mr./Dr. Kolya, feel free to be the last of the phrenologists. Tendentious?

"While there exist some wise and humane psychiatrists and therapists, as an objective body of transmissible knowledge, psychiatry is, as Szasz rightly says, just like alchemy."

Alchemy? Let's see. Thousands of well-controlled studies documenting the effectiveness of psychiatric intervention. Tendentious? No, I'm afraid worse than that.

by Michael Golding on Tue, 07/19/2005 - 01:28 | reply

Re: Mental Illness

Michael Golding wrote:

To use Mr. Forrester's analogies: In all of the above examples, the "programming" of the computer (or TV) could be bad. The person who gets punched could have failed to learn how to be nice to people. The child who gets type 2 diabetes could have failed to learn how to exercise and eat properly. The person who becomes depressed may have failed to learn how to deal with the cruel behavior of others. But in all the cases mentioned above, the "programming" failures damage the "computer hardware" (causing infections in the sinuses, damage to the kidney, and damage to the heart.) In short, the software damages the hardware.

Famine and warfare also cause damage to bodily tissues, so do you think famine and warfare are diseases?

Individuals with schizophrenia often appear perfectly normal as children and young adults. They graduate from high-school, begin a promising college education, but for unknown reasons they suffer their first psychotic break, and may hallucinate, and become paranoid, usually as late adolescents. Within 3 months, the brain of a young person just developing this illness, will shrink the equivalent of the amount one sees with a small stroke (an average of 11 cc's) (Lieberman JA, ACNP 2002).. And the patient loses approximately 15 points of IQ function (depending upon the study) in a few months, exactly the kind of results one would expect from certain types of acute brain injury. And, these are also the types of changes you see with a stroke in certain areas of the brain. Why is the acute brain shrinkage from a stroke the consequence of a "real" phenomenon, but the acute brain shrinkage from schizophrenia a consequence of a "Superstition", according to Mr. Alan Forrester. How can a "superstition" shrink a brain?

To translate from psychiatrist speak: from the time when the mental patient begins to behave so strangely that his relatives report him to a psychiatrist his brain shrinks. Two things change under these circumstances. (1) Psychiatrists start to treat him, possibly with drugs. (2) He changes his behaviour. Either one of these might result in his brain shrinking. Medication might shrink his brain, or he might not be eating enough or...

by Alan Forrester on Tue, 07/19/2005 - 02:05 | reply

Well-Controlled

Please reply to the following:

Each and every one of those well-controlled studies is perfectly consistent with the existence of some other (unknown) factor, which was not controlled for. And it could be this factor causing the effect. And thus the conclusions of the studies could conceivably be wrong if it turns out there is such a factor. Do you agree with this so far?

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 07/19/2005 - 02:12 | reply

Re Mental Illness

"Famine and warfare also cause damage to bodily tissues" so do you think famine and warfare are diseases?"

Mr. Forrester, I did not call the punch in the face the illness, I called the damage to the Maxillary Sinus an illness. But yes, diseases appear as a consequence of wars (for example infections), but wars are not diseases. Type 2 diabetes can appear as a consequence of overeating and failing to exercise in children, but the diabetes is the illness, not the overeating.

To translate from psychiatrist speak: "from the time when the mental patient begins to behave so strangely that his relatives report him to a psychiatrist, his brain shrinks."

No, that's not correct.

This study has been referenced several times and explained several times in these posts. If you have questions, please ask about it.

Your assumptions are, however, completely unfounded. This was a seminal study in the field, with remarkably tight controls, very careful definitions of "first onset" psychosis and etc. Commenting on well done studies sponsored by the NIH, that you have not read, nor asked about, nor thought about is not part of the scientific process.

If you wish to learn how to read and understand scientific papers, I would be pleased to give you references and excellent papers explaining the basics of the process.

Have a nice evening

by Michael Golding on Tue, 07/19/2005 - 02:57 | reply

Mental Illness

Mr. Golding and Kolya,
(I prefer to be addressed as Becky.) I appreciate your lengthy responses to my posts. I'm a bit caught up with work and home responsibilities, atm, but I'll try to respond to them as soon as possible.

Becky Moon

by beckyam on Tue, 07/19/2005 - 15:52 | reply

Reply to Mr. Golding

"Or at any rate, let me try to convince you that serious mental illness implies underlying brain disease, involves peoples choices and is affected by cultural phenomenon in the same way that type 2 diabetes implies the existence of an underlying endocrine disease, but also involves peoples choices and and is affected by cultural involvement." -Michael Golding

That's quite a bold statement (not necessarily untrue, just that it implies that serious mental illness couldn't exist without brain disease). How do you know serious mental illness implies underlying brain disease? Have all know mental illnesses been linked conclusively to brain disease? How do you distinguish a disease from a healthy difference? How is "serious mental illness" defined? Is there some mechanism for differentiating it with "extreme differences from cultural norms"? What if it's the "norm" that is "wrong"? What is the mechanism for addressing this? I suppose as with homosexuality, the medical community can correct mistakes about specific differences that they later realize to be healthy/normal. What about the harm done to healthy people in the meantime? This could be less harm than is done to people who avoid treatment because of the stigma attached to "mental illness". It might be good to drop "mental illness" simply because "brain disease" doesn't have the negative social connotations that mental illness does. (I'm not expecting answers to all of this. I often ask more than anyone, including myself, has time or inclination to answer or think about).

"In my opinion, whether an illness is caused by an interaction with others or not, should not matter if the consequences to the person are a potentially permanent change in physiology which shortens his life and damages his organs.

For example, even if Fred deserves to be punched in the nose, he still may have a crushed maxillary sinus from the punch, and a crushed maxillary sinus is certainly an illness, which should be treated by doctors." -Michael Golding

I agree that medically treatable aspects of the problem should be treated, of course, but what about the matter of the person punching him in the nose? Do we just chalk it up to Fred's nose-punched tendency or try to do something about nose punchers?

"So whether certain types of mental illness are caused by an interaction with other people should not be relevant, if such interaction causes a substantially increased risk for development of an abnormal physiology and if this pathophysiology shortens peoples lives and damages their organs. If obese children now are developing type 2 diabetes which damages their kidneys, if someone is punched in the nose and the damaged maxillary sinus is now prone to infection, or if someone is cruel to someone else and the victim becomes depressed, and this damages their heart; and if all of these are caused by interactions with other people, why is the depression the only one that is not an illness?" -Michael Golding

I think I'd agree if there weren't the problem as I mentioned above where mental differences are diagnosed and treated without a lot of consideration about whether they really are disorders and whether the more important cause and solution might be external. Just because the conditions required to ... "trigger" bipolar disorder haven't been discovered, doesn't mean they don't exist. I would think it would very difficult to isolate or control for all social and ideologically oriented causes as it can be in medicine.

"In short, the software damages the hardware." -Michael Golding Nice analogy.

"The work of Nemeroff (JAMA) and others, in primates (mildly) experimentally abused as infants, and women abused as children, provides ample scientific evidence of life-long damage to organ systems due to early childhood stress."-Michael Golding

That's very interesting and a bit discouraging.

"With physical symptoms, there's usually some idea of harm they are doing to the person's body." Becky Moon

"Ms. Moon, you may be confusing cause and effect, just a little, in this statement. Physical symptoms don't (in general) cause harm in a person's body, they are a consequence of harm." -Michael Golding

Oops, my bad.

" Why is the acute brain shrinkage from a stroke the consequence of a "real" phenomenon, but the acute brain shrinkage from schizophrenia a consequence of a "Superstition", according to Mr. Alan Forrester. How can a "superstition" shrink a brain?" -Michael Golding

I can't site a study or article for you. I've just assumed from the time it first occurred to me to think about the subject at all that thought affects the chemistry of the brain. I've seen articles that seem to support this. If this is so, then couldn't certain types of thought that contributes to brain shrinking? Is my assumption erroneous? I'm not claiming any knowledge about how brain chemistry is particularly affected. It could be that size isn't much related. I had thought I read something, though, that children (and animals) who were exposed to lots of stimulation had more of some type of brain matter (neurons? or links between neurons?) I don't see how this could be related to brain shrinkage though. A person who was very actively stimulated .. it would seem their brain would increase in size or connections.

Forgive if my lack of brain chemistry knowledge is getting me really far off track here, but I want to go off on a bit of some imagining about how thought could affect the brain: Could some bit of knowledge be so upsetting as to make a person "forget" large bits of knowledge as a sort of "self-defense"? It might only "work" for people with a particular genetic flaw or difference, or it could be that most people don't experience anything so upsetting or don't tend to try (or even be able to) forget things they find upsetting or overwhelming. If thoughts can change the brain, then it would be case for some thoughts even possibly harming the brain or causing disease.

"Very perceptive comment, in my view. I agree with you 100%. Homosexuality is not considered an illness or a disability, nor should it be. -Michael Golding"

Homosexuality was once thought of as a mental illness, though, wasn't it? (Or was that just something lay people thought?) Is this just a mistake that was unavoidable or could changing the way people approach mental issues have avoided this?

Cheers,
Becky

OCD

"Most types of anti-anxiety medicine do not work for them, but some do to some extent. Behavioral treatment works on a specific compulsion, but individuals often then move to another one. Few long term studies have been done documenting efficacy of any intervention, and unlike most psychiatric illnesses, serious OCD is remarkably refractory to all forms of treatment." -Michael Golding

I posted the comment as a suggestion to Elliot as to how medicine "might" work by helping thoughts to change indirectly. It seems OCD is a bad example.

I am familiar with people who have OCD-like symptoms (and at least one diagnosed), but not much with their treatment. At least some of them managed to quit things like hand-washing and not pick up any other habits that were a problem (at least they haven't been noticed by them or anyone else yet). By quit, I mean stop doing the action for a while and then eventually stop feeling obsessed about or thinking much about doing the action. It doesn't seem "easy" to do - just possible.

"They fully well know (once explained to them) that washing their hands so frequently actually makes it more likely for them to get an infection, but they still can't stop. So they understand the scientific arguments very well." -Michael Golding

In my experience, having a good understanding of why to stop doesn't always make a habit go away for people who don't seem to have OCD symptoms. It usually takes focusing on some new preferred habit, but I think knowing that the behavior isn't rational is probably a necessary prerequisite (then again, maybe not).

"Interestingly, the same medications which will cause someone to obsess less, will also cause him to think about sex less frequently." -Michael Golding

What sort of medications?

by beckyam on Wed, 07/20/2005 - 00:45 | reply

Indirect Help

I posted the comment as a suggestion to Elliot as to how medicine "might" work by helping thoughts to change indirectly.

Yes, I agree that medicine can work that way. So can tennis, ice cream, and movies. Medicines are part of a tradition of helping people, so they are particularly valuable for that reason. (Ice cream is actually also part of a tradition of helping people feel better, though quite a different one. In fact, sports and movies are too. But the tradition of medicine helping with this kind of issue is much stronger.) Kolya alluded to this above when he said that medicine has a legitimate role to play in helping with these issues.

Keep in mind that this is different from the medicine working in the way it is claimed to work.

- Elliot

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 07/20/2005 - 05:14 | reply

Elliot - Indirect Help

What way is it claiming to work? How is what I suggested different?

Becky

How Medicine Doesn't Work

Direct help -- take this medicine and it will change your personality.

Indirect help -- take this medicine, feel different in your new situation, interpret this as important, and change your own personality.

Medicine is generally purported to work in the direct way, and some medicine does (like pain killers), but some doesn't. The quirk and dirty criterion is: anything purported to change your personality in complex ways doesn't work directly.

For example drugs to turn Democrats into Republicans, shy people into outgoing people, or vegetarians into lovers of meat would all work in the indirect way, if they worked at all. More examples that could only work in the indirect way are drugs to make one happy, sad, in love, hateful or curious.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 07/20/2005 - 20:09 | reply

Comments of Becky, Mr. Temple

Becky,

I am busy as of now. I want to respond to your important comments and questions and hope to in a few days!

Mr. Temple and Becky,

FYI, 99% of psychiatrists would say that no medication can change personality, directly or indirectly!

On this issue, I happen to disagree very slightly with most psychiatrists, but totally agree with you and Becky: If personality could be changed, it would be indirectly. (FYI...depression, schizophrenia, bipolar illness, are not considered aspects of personality; although I could see how they could be thought of that way if not familiar with these illnesses!)

After major depression is treated, for example with medication, people's personality, thought to be unchangeable due to medications, then usually again becomes evident to the patient and his relatives. The patient says, "I feel like myself again."

This personality may make others happy or sad, or angry. But the personality is thought to be a composite creation of the functioning of large sections of the brain, including emotional centers interacting with life experience, and peoples choices. Personality composition, is not thought to be created by the functioning of specific or narrowly defined parts of the brain.

For example the Canadian surgeon who recently operated on a group of patient's brains, whose depression treatment was refractory to virtually every treatment imagineable, achieved success (but in an uncontrolled experiment that has not yet been repeated) by surgically operating on a part of the brain that is universally hyperactive in individuals with depression. Certain drugs and other interventions usually return the functioning of these parts of the brain to normal, but likely did not in these individual's cases: But the surgeon certainly did not try to alter large sections of the brain!

A surprising percentage of the patients dramatically improved after surgery, but only per their own reports, so obviously sham surgeries and other placebo controlled trials are needed, before we can get too excited about this last ditch intervention. But in most of our lifetimes, surgery certainly will become part of normal psychiatric interventions when medicines fail....and no, if anyone really thought that a surgery we do to help, for example a depression, would dramatically change someones personality, I think virtually no one would do it.

It would properly be considered immoral, unless to save the very life of the person (e.g. brain tumor).

We know from animal models of depression (e.g. forced swim tests) that genetically modified animals are more vulnerable to stressors leading to behaviors that mimic major depression in humans. But with more extreme types of stress, animal mimics of depression can be induced even in animals without genetic predisposition. We know that virtually all medications which work to reverse the behavior in animals that mimics depressive behavior in humans, almost always work to treat depression in humans, if the medicines are found to be safe to try in humans. We also know the reverse is true. All known medicines that have for some reason been tried in humans first, and reverse their major depression (like antidepressant herbs), will reverse animal behavior mimicing depression, as well.

That is why the Canadian surgeon was taking a huge gamble, but not making a completely wild guess, when he operated on the brains of those with repeatedly treatment refractory depression. Operations have repeatedly been done on animal brains in animals exhibiting behavioral mimics of a variety of human mental illnesses, with reversal of these conditions with different types of surgery, just as a variety of medications do in both animals and humans.

And of course, the same parts of the brain that are overactive in animals exhibiting "depression", are also overactive in humans with depression (Overactivity meaning markedly increased excitatory activity with subsequent destruction of nerves, for example in the anterior cingulate gyrus and the hippocampus, as documented by functional neuroimaging)

Overactivity in parts of the anterior cingulate cause both emotional and blood pressure reactivity (Critchley) and hormonal reactivity to stress seen in those with depression. Increased blood pressure reactivity means that the blood pressure goes up more in response to stress.

Animals with experimentally induced "depressions", whether genetically modified to be predisposed to "depression" or not, also will lose (particularly short-term) memory function temporarily, then permanently if their depression is not treated with particular anti-depressants, which protect the brain from this excitatory neurotoxicity (Excitatory neurotoxicity means chemicals released by brain cells killing other brain cells or themselves, and therefore damaging the brain.)

In both humans and animals, the partial destruction of the hippocampus causes the sometimes permanent loss of short term memory encoding, associated with depression in humans and depression mimicing behavior in animals. Certain antidepressants prevent and protect against this brain damage (depression induced dementia), as documented in live animals by direct examination, and as documented in humans by various types of functional neuroimaging.

Although a little off topic, the basic idea is that major depression and other serious psychiatric illnesses (I'll define this later), are superimposed on personality, and these serious illnesses are treatable by a variety of interventions, and will be treatable in our lifetimes by direct nerve cell modifications and surgeries, to alter the disease processes.

As mentioned, it has previously been shown that certain antidepressants protect against hippocampal damage in depression. Our group just showed (preliminarily) that certain antidepressants, not only decrease emotional reactions to stressful situations, but blood pressure reactions as well. Increased blood pressure reactivity to emotional stress is beginning to be known as a major reason for the increased cardiovascular death associated with heart disease and depression. And it is certainly provocative that certain antidepressants are known to protect the hippocampus, decrease anterior cingulate activity, and now decrease blood pressure reactivity.

Preliminary studies even show that certain antidepressants may protect against heart disease as well (Sauer). Although too early to celebrate, we may one day be treating heart disease with antidepressants!

Animals with their "fight or flight" nerve removed at birth (stelletomy) can not develop heart disease, no matter how much you feed them, no matter what you feed them, no matter what they weigh. So brain involvement is (at least in animals) a necessary, but not sufficient, condition for the development of heart disease. Gaining better insight into psychiatric illness helps to bridge the gap between multiple fields in medicine, including neurology, cardiology and endocrinology.

I am always astounded by the coincidences found in medicine and psychiatry as we advance. Astounding coincidences keep popping up, like the fact that those illnesses found to be primarily genetic in humans cannot be easily behaviorally conditioned in animals, if at all. But those illnesses found to be primarily non-genetic in humans can be. What is the relationship between an identical twin studied by a geneticist and a rat studied by a behaviorist? Evolution is wonderful in creating such beautiful connections even between such seemingly different creatures like rats and humans (although obviously our moral sense dramatically separates us from other animals).

Dozens of fields are finding the same converging evidence using totally different methodologies. Those who ignore the significance of these findings, do so at their own physical and psychological risk.

I'll be back in a few days.
Take care.

by Michael Golding on Thu, 07/21/2005 - 00:20 | reply

Fake Mental Illness

Professor Deutsch,

Thank you for your interesting response.

"This is very far from being the previous question stated in other words. This is a substantive theory about the mechanism for Joe's resistance to evidence and argument, namely the vividness of the hallucinations, etc."

Professor Deutsch

I said "let's say Joe is in a mental state in which he is actively psychotic. ...

And in the next post I said,

Do you think it is possible for Joe to continue to not understand....

In other words, do you think it is possible for someone like Joe to hallucinate so vividly and to be so paranoid and delusional, that he believes..."

"This is very far from being the previous question stated in other words. This is a substantive theory about the mechanism for Joe's resistance to evidence and argument, namely the vividness of the hallucinations, etc."

Professor Deutsch

Psychosis -- A mental distortion causing gross distortion or disorganization of a person's mental capacity, affective response, and capacity to recognize reality.....

Stedman's Medical Dictionary

Affective – Pertaining to emotion, feeling, sensibility.....

Stedman's Medical Dictionary

If someone is hallucinating but he knows the hallucinations are not real, he is not psychotic! When I defined Joe's mental state as being "actively psychotic" and later said "in other words", he was "hallucinat(ing) so vividly" and acting in a "paranoid" and "delusional" fashion, one statement follows precisely logically from the other, when one understands the meaning of the word "psychosis"! But these are semantics.

Joe is a 21 year-old white male from North Carolina in the Southeastern part of the United States. He was born in rural Eastern North Carolina . He is the second of three children. He was a full-term infant, mild meconium present at birth, immediate and 5-minute Apgars were a little low but by 15 minutes were completely normal. He had normal childhood immunizations, and usual illnesses. He achieved his normal developmental milestones on time, or even a little early, usually was in the 40th percentile for weight and 50th percentile for height. He was an A and B student and well-liked throughout school. He played football in Junior High, and was a member of the band and chess team in high-school.

His family was religious, indeed his father was a "lay minister" at the local Southern Baptist church and a senior manager of a tobacco distributing company. Joe, unlike his father, had no exposure to farm pesticides like organophosphates.

Joe attended church weekly with his family. His father was known for his fiery sermons, and excellent command of the English language. Joe also was known to be rather above average in his intelligence, and indeed on standardized testing at school Joe was usually above the 80th percentile in both math and reading skills. It was said that he did not "apply" himself or he would have achieved all A's. Because of Joe's rural background, the fact that his father was a University of North Carolina business graduate, and the fact that Joe had good SAT scores, despite modest grades, he was accepted into the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill.

Prior to college, during his senior year in high-school, he experimented a few times with marijuana, felt it relaxed him but was concerned that it was illegal and he did not want to get caught. One night he was offered the opportunity to take his friends Ritalin when he was up studying for a test at the last minute. He absolutely loved this drug, felt it made him feel better and function better. Indeed he went to his physician and asked for it, because he said it helped him to study, but his physician suggested several new study habits and refused to write the Ritalin, because he could not find any medical reason to.

He had his first sexual relations in his senior year. Towards the end of his senior year in high school, he became a little bit less outgoing than usual, but maintained several excellent friendships. Family and friends said that he was becoming a bit more "mature", and he started to read philosophy texts and particularly texts on the philosophy of religion, something his father was also interested in.

He attended the University of North Carolina and decided to major in philosophy, with an eye toward going to Duke Divinity School (just down the road from the University of North Carolina). He did reasonably well in college, but not as well as he did in high school. His friends thought he isolated himself with his philosophy and religion texts more than they would prefer, and he started attending religious services with a man who said he was a "Zen" master who was teaching him to "channel" spirits for a fee. He would spend long hours, occasionally in his room meditating, or sometimes "channeling" spirits. He continued to get reasonable grades, now B's and C's but in his sophomore and then junior year, he began making comments that his professors did not have the "insight" that he did and were not able to feel the "presence" of god, so were not capable of judging his writings. He still had several friends, still would date, but insisted that any woman that he dated read and agree with his "thesis" on the nature of god, and acknowledge the likelihood that he was potentially anointed by god to bring his word to "the people". He did acknowledge that others could be anointed, as well. He was still likeable and friendly, did his school work, helped his friends when they needed a favor, played trumpet in the school band, and still looked forward to going to Duke Divinity School, where he felt that he would finally be "understood" and not have to deal with the "secular materialists" attending the University of North Carolina. Indeed he exercised regularly, had good hygiene, was "clean-cut" just a little more quiet than some, except about religious issues, about which he had strong opinions. His only "vice" (per Joe) was that he smoked cigarettes, a habit he picked up his Sophomore year in school. He said it helped him to relax and focus.

During one particular "channeling" session, while his parents were visiting him at his apartment in Chapel Hill, his Dad pointed out that "Christ" did not say that one should try to contact the "devils children," by channeling, but rather that "We should pray for peace and love to Jesus himself. He told Joe that he should not "try to contact" the devil, in order to fight him, but rather let his prayers strengthen those walking "in the spirit with G-d" and in this way defeat the devil in his community of "loving Christians."

When his father said this, Joe became quite angry and in fact said that he could feel the very presence of the "devil" around his father. Since Joe had never said anything like this before, and indeed since this seemed very "out of character" according to his father, they asked Joe whether he would be willing to see a doctor. Over the last month, on the telephone, his parents thought they saw the beginnings of a bit of "personality change" and for the first time were slightly concerned, and did not think his increased interest in philosophy and religion was a sign of his "maturity" anymore. Joe laughed at his parents, and apologized to his father, saying that it is sometimes "hard" to know the "devils ways." But to "humor" his parents, Joe suggested he see a specialist, a neurologist, to prove to his parents that there was nothing at all wrong with him.

Joe saw the neurologist with his parents and a medical history was taken.

It turns out that Joe's mother's father had been hospitalized at the State Hospital "Dorothea Dix" with several "nervous breakdowns" in the 1950's and ultimately in the late 50's killed himself with a self-inflicted gunshot wound to the head. Joe's mother was quite upset at the time, but with the love of her family, her church, and G-d, she said she had "made" peace with the terrible circumstances of her father's life, and to all accounts, she had been a very loving and caring wife and mother, and an upstanding member of her community. The patient's mother also had a male cousin on her father's side of the family, who was diagnosed with "schizophrenia" and is still alive and is currently being treated with medications for it and apparently doing well.

Joe's vital signs were completely normal. It was revealed that Joe smoked cigarettes, approximately 1 pack per day for the last two years. The neurologist gathered much of the history already recounted above (about Joe's increasing interest in religion and his slightly unusual preferences for religious activities that one would not expect given his cultural background.)

On neurological exam, he found a few "soft" signs but nothing specific. On mental status exam, Joe was almost entirely appropriate. His thought process was tight (logical), his thought content was thought to be "normal," except perhaps for slight religious preoccupation. But living in this part of North Carolina and going to a "liberal" University like UNC, the neurologist did not think his thoughts were very unusual. His speech was of regular rate and rhythm with normal prosody. When the neurologist asked Joe whether he heard "voices" that others could not hear, Joe chuckled a little and said, "nothing but the sweet voice of god."

The neurologist asked Joe to elaborate a bit more, and when Joe just smiled, he asked him whether he hears the actual voice of god, or whether it is more like a thought. Joe said it was more like a thought. The neurologist watched Joe throughout the interview, and never saw him "attending to internal cues" (the subtle eye and head and muscle movements that can be seen when individuals have auditory hallucinations). Joe denied visual hallucinations. Judgment and Insight were rated no better than fair. He scored a 30/30 on his mini-mental status exam. Affect was very slightly "flat" (just a little less emotional variation than one would anticipate in a situation like this exam.)

Given the concerns of the parents, the neurologist commenced a very thorough "work-up", though at the time of the exam he could detect nothing wrong, and indeed believed that Joe was simply exploring "alternative religion", as he has seen many young men and women do. MRI of brain was read as "normal", EEG was normal, blood chemistries and white count were normal, sexually transmitted disease screens were normal, both from lumbar puncture and blood. Lumbar puncture was normal for protein and glucose. No evidence of inflammatory disease in blood or from lumbar puncture. Infectious disease screens including Lyme and Rocky Mountain spotted fever were negative. He was ruled out for porphyrias with 24 hour urines and various adrenal tumors with 24 hour urines, he was ruled out for various endocrine disorders including thyroid problems, ruled out for leukodystrophies, PANDAS syndromes, and ruled out for vitamin deficiency. He was ruled out for heavy metal toxicity or exposure to organophosphates. He was ruled out for Wilson's Disease and Multiple Myeloma and Sarcoid, and Lupus, and urine and blood tox screens were completely negative.

In short, the neurologist was, if anything, too thorough, because Joe insisted that he had learned in his philosophy classes, that an illness is only real if there is a specific lab test that documents that it is real, or a lesion that a pathologist can find, despite the neurologists attempt to explain why this idea is wrong. Joe knew that his parents were concerned about "mental illness" given that they had heard it "runs in the blood," but Joe had read the "World" blog. He explained to his parents that mental illness is "Fake" and a "Superstition". Indeed, Joe had put on his own religious website a story recommending that no one give money to the National Alliance for the Mentally Ill, a charity supporting those with mental illness in America, because mental illness is in fact "fake" and so it is a waste of money to support such "charities". Indeed he quoted the article mentioning the British mental health charity "Rethink", because Joe, like the editors of the World, believes that people make decisions based on their "values" and not "mindless chemicals." Joe apparently was unaware that values could be of some minimal importance, as well, to those who volunteer at charitable organizations and give money to charities. Joe, thinks that a person's values are actually "the devils or gods values".

Because of Joe's comment about the reality of "illnesses," the neurologist received permission from the Universities research board and from Joe and his family to collect a few extra tubes of blood and send them to Dr. Ming Tsuang at the University of California, as part of a research protocol where Joe will be followed over time.

Joe is declared completely healthy by the neurologist approximately 1 week later. All the tests came back normal, much to the relief of Joe's parents. Two days later, on a Saturday morning, Joe decided to go to the Durham YMCA at 1:00 PM in order to "work out." That morning had started like any other Saturday morning. Joe had awakened at 8:00 AM and had a leisurely breakfast of eggs and toast and took a shower. He did his morning "meditation", by himself in his room, but this time stayed meditating for 3 hours when usually it takes him only 30 minutes. When he emerged from his room, he had an odd smile on his face and said to his roommate,

"I have discovered the secret to truth. I am the light and the way. The devil must be destroyed, in all his forms."

His roommate, being rather perceptive, found the whole encounter very strange. To begin with, Joe had never used language like that for as long as he had known him. In addition, his roommate thought to himself,

"If anyone had really discovered the secret to 'truth' he ought to be pretty excited about it, and Joe just didn't seem that excited. Furthermore if he is the 'light and the way' and about to wage war with the devil, why is he going to the YMCA?"

It all seemed quite illogical to Joe's roommate, until he remembered the definition of "psychosis", that he had learned in undergraduate psychology class.

Psychosis -- A mental distortion causing gross distortion or disorganization of a person's mental capacity, affective response, and capacity to recognize reality.....

Stedman's Medical Dictionary

Affective – Pertaining to emotion, feeling, sensibility.....

Stedman's Medical Dictionary

And then Joe's roommate thought,

"He has been a little odd the last few weeks, I wonder if he has become 'psychotic'? He seems to have a gross distortion of his capacity to recognize reality. What makes him think that he is the 'light and the way' for everyone? In addition, he seems to have a 'gross' distortion of his 'affective' (emotional) response. Maybe Joe is psychotic.

Then Joe went to the YMCA and announced audibly, but not loudly, that he feels the sin "about the place".

"There is no charity. Where is the charity?"

So, a patron at the YMCA named Harry, seeing that Joes' pack of cigarettes was empty, offered Joe a cigarette as follows: And Joes story at the YMCA begins.

Let's say Joe is in a "mental state" in which he is actively psychotic but never did anything intentionally (like abuse drugs) to create this state. Joe is hallucinating and fully believes and sees that Harry has horns and is attacking him with a knife, but actually Harry has no horns and is just offering him a cigarette. He hits Harry over the head with a chair to "defend" himself.

"So let me imagine some details that would be relevant:"
Professor Deutsch

OK.

"(F)irst of all, it wasn't just a hallucination in the sense of seeing and hearing things that weren't happening. Some of the things (horns) are so implausible that one would immediately assume one was having a hallucination, unless the hallucinations were combined with a hardware-induced feeling that they are authentic. So I'll assume they were."

Professor Deutsch

OK. As I said in my example, he is psychotic. I agree that the psychosis ([strong] feeling that they are authentic) is hardware-induced.

Then, let me assume, he ran out of the pub (can I change this to the "YMCA"?, MG) screaming that the horned, demonic CIA agents were trying to kill him.

Although I guess it is possible that he would run out of the YMCA screaming, most patients with these psychotic illnesses (fake or otherwise), would not do that. In fact their emotions are often not "congruent" with their thoughts and often seem quite subdued given what they are saying, so in the same way that Joe does not seem particularly excited about finding out he is the "light and the way", he likely would not run screaming into a crowd that there are horned demonic people at the YMCA. But OK, let's assume he does run out of the YMCA screaming.

"The bystanders called the police, who located him nearby and asked him to accompany them in order to investigate the attack in the pub. He accused them of being horned, demonic CIA agents out to kill him, but they overpowered and restrained him before he could attack them. Now he is sitting in a cell, powerless, and various people whom, on the face of it, he has reason to trust, have been telling him that he has been hallucinating, and he just accuses them all of being horned, demonic CIA agents out to kill him."

"OK, now, could the vividness (and hardware-enhanced sense of authenticity) of the hallucination possibly explain this behaviour? No. Not by itself. Because, for instance, once he is helpless in the cell, and they have not killed him, then the theory that they are engaged in a murderous attack on him is refuted. He must change it to something else that explains both his old and his new experiences – for instance, he could decide that now he has been captured they are planning an anal probe, and only afterwards will they kill him."

Professor Deutsch

I really don't think that Joe would think that his theory was "refuted". You and I and most of the readers of the World, usually try to sequentially make sense of the various things that happen to us, to try to create a unified "story" to explain things. Others don't and most people with schizophrenia would not admit to being wrong about a delusion while still delusional.

"The theory that they are engaged in a murderous attack on him is refuted. He must (emphasis mine) change it to something else that explains both his old and his new experiences...."

People with illnesses like this (like early schizophrenia), have a "thought disorder". Much about their thinking and behavior is "disorganized". In the history of psychiatry, there were those who believed that if "reality" could be clearly demonstrated to someone with schizophrenia, that is if their delusions could be manifestly shown to be false, the individual would gain back contact with reality. A forceful demonstration of what is real might force patients to integrate old and new experiences, according to this theory.

If one tried to force Joe to understand a correct version of a series of events, perhaps Joe would think, "I thought it was the case that Harry was trying to hurt me, but I now know that he was not". It was thought that if enough "new experiences" were presented to the psychotic patient and enough of his old delusions were strongly challenged, this would treat schizophrenia. So (in the past), if a patient said he was an all powerful god or Jesus, technicians would hold the person down, in an attempt to show the patient that he was not all powerful etc.

The problem is the best of our theories sometimes are just wrong. Patients did not get better when confronted with the inaccuracy of their delusions. Nor did they link up old and new experiences to create a logically unified story, to explain the passage of events. Indeed this failure is a key "hardware failure" in someone with schizophrenia. When reality was forced upon patients who thought they were god, their thoughts, if anything, became more fragmented and illogical. The patients got worse.

It is very disconcerting to speak to someone with "disorganized" ideas; that is, ideas that do not link past, present, and expected future experiences into a logical whole. This is one of the hallmarks of schizophrenia. And you can see this "disorganization" in behavior as well. Those working in this field have all had patients who nearly died from starvation because they insisted the food was poisoned. No amount of explanation, reassurance, eating their food in front of them (I've tried them all) convinces anyone. Although I am not familiar with this case, it is said that Kurt Godel, arguably the finest logician who ever lived, died of starvation because he thought his food was poisoned! Kurt Godel was very familiar with logic, but (if the stories about him are true), even a man with perhaps the finest logical mind that ever lived, could not think his way out of his paranoid delusional system about food. He could not apparently incorporate new experiences (the people around me are eating the same food and not dying) with his old sensibilities (the food is poisoned, it will kill me) and so he died. Some people just can't incorporate new and old experiences to create a "logical" explanation of things.

When the brain malfunctions in this way; even (perhaps) the most logical man who ever lived, could not think his way out of his malfunctioning brain. Nowadays, medications work very well for this condition and people consistently change their mind about whether the food is poisoned, and they demonstrate their changed beliefs by saying the food is not poisoned and by eating it and smiling.

By the way, if someone is on the border of being floridly psychotic and believes the food is poisoned, the way to appeal to him is not to use logic, per se. Forcing him to confront his inability to create composite and organized logical theories of experience from past and now present circumstances, precisely challenges the patients weakness, and tends to make him less trusting. And less trust leads to greater disorganization of thought. The best approach is to play a game, like ping-pong, for example, with the patient and talk about the football game on television or current events. Patients want to feel your kindness, your concern, and they want to have fun. Your consistency and desire to help builds trusting relationships and is the single best way of confronting paranoia. Arguing or even reasoning, even if the (young) clinicians intentions are very good, almost never works.

Sometimes a person can learn to trust even when he can't learn to think. Think of a baby clinging to his mother. He trusts her, but certainly can't say why. An excellent psychiatric nurse knows that trust is more important, and will just have food around the nursing station and sometimes the patient will, just for a moment, suspend (his faulty) reasoning, and act on pure faith in you, the clinician. Then he may take a bite of the cookie, or more importantly, take the medicine that will enable him to keep taking bites of cookie...because his paranoia will likely decrease.

Back to Joe who has been taken by the police to jail.

"The theory that they are engaged in a murderous attack on him is refuted. He must change it to something else that explains his old and his new experiences" (because Joe is alive in the jail cell).
Professor Deutsch

Well no, he must not. People with schizophrenic illnesses are often quite illogical, particularly when they have to attach new experiences to old, and then construct a composite new interpretation or theory that encompasses data from the past and present. Those with schizophrenia are notoriously bad at this, that's why their thinking is "disorganized". They do not put ideas together correctly. When this is coupled with paranoia, the patient has a serious problem.

But OK. Let's go with your version, anyway. Let's assume that in this particular case, Joe is able to come to the conclusion that he was wrong, the police were not actually going to kill him immediately but instead...

"for instance, he could decide that now he has been captured they are planning an anal probe, and only afterwards will they kill him."
Professor Deutsch

"In either case, or in any other case, the explanation that he tentatively adopts cannot possibly be coded for in a defective gene or poisonous chemical. It is too complex for that. It can only have come from his own creative thought."

If a British citizen is on a bus, the citizen may have a literally infinite number of possibilities that he can decide upon. He can decide to sit down, stand up, move his hands about his head in swirling motions, twiddle his toes, or stand on his head and twiddle his toes, while making snide remarks about a ladies pumps. Yes indeed, much of what he does on the bus is a product of his "creative thought". But if the bus had a bad "chemical" on it, like a functioning bomb, for example, that the average citizen can't reasonably know about, he is going to experience certain negative consequences from that bomb. "Defective genes" and "poisonous chemicals" are the bombs that cause schizophrenia.

Actually, the phenomenon of genes creating a predisposition, that the person then acts upon, is a well-described phenomenon called "active gene-environment correlation. Indeed I have discussed this phenomenon before at some length.

(I wrote most of this before Professor Deutsch's later comments) Perhaps in believing that the mentally ill "choose" their mental illness ("behavior" to Professor Deutsch), Professor Deutsch instead means that individuals' genes increase risk for certain types of feelings, and then individuals "choose" how to handle these feelings, or place themselves in an environment which helps with that choice (so called "active" gene-environment correlation). For example, most individuals with schizophrenia, experience a degree of paranoia, likely heavily influenced by genetic factors. However the specific events or ideas which frighten those with schizophrenia, do in fact vary between people. Those with past experiences with the American government or who continually read the politics section of an American newspaper may become convinced that the CIA has implanted a transmitter in their ear, and demand to have it surgically removed. In effect, they hear a voice that they believe is absolutely real, often even rapidly turn their head to hear the "voice" more clearly, but seem to confabulate a scenario, in response to the voice that they hear. But those who grew up in the Soviet Union or China, for example would more likely devise conspiracy theories related to the KGB, or Mao, and have transmitters placed by other agencies. There are obviously an infinite number of ways of being paranoid. The confabulation, based on their underlying paranoia, however, seems to derive from themes from their own past or present, as interpreted through their paranoia, and indeed they will seem to be attracted to a wide variety of "conspiracy" theories and read about them. In this sense, we perceive* them to "choose" the themes that they build around their paranoid illness. Joe, who has a religious background chooses religious themes.

But the patient absolutely believes the delusions are real and DOES NOT perceive them to be his choices. Telling someone with schizophrenia that he did not really hear voices speaking to him, (or that the CIA has not planted a bug in his ear) will cause him to believe that YOU are crazy, just as if I spoke to one of the readers of the "World" and then told him that he did not "really" hear my voice. (Activation of parts of the brain interpreting "sound" are identical in those who hear my speech and in those who hallucinate voices, so from the perspective of the individual in either case, both "voices" are absolutely real).

In short, we may perceive that the individual chooses the themes to build around his underlying paranoia, but the individual does not perceive he had any hand in his perceptions. And let there be no doubt: Though the individuals environment can provide the themes that the person incorporates into his paranoid delusions, the genetic and chemical bomb, nonetheless blows up and ruins the persons life. Their whole world becomes structured around paranoid themes whether it is the CIA for an American with schizophrenia, or the KGB for a Russian with schizophrenia.

"Why has his creative thought settled on one particular explanation as being the best, out of the infinity of explanations that would cover the experiences he has had? The story hasn't told us, but my moral opinion of him depends crucially on this."

David Deutsch

Admittedly, the story has evolved, after you made this comment. But I am describing someone with an early schizophrenic illness, which should now be apparent

If British citizens can list an infinite number of reasons to explain their consistent choices to ride a bus on a given day, but they have no idea that the bus will be bombed and have no part in planning it, do their "creative thoughts" or "choices" cause the mangling of their bodies?

It is an ethical lapse or logical error to believe that "creative thoughts" or "choices" of people on doomed British busses, lead to the mangling of their bodies. Does your "moral opinion" of their mangled bodies really much depend on what they were thinking when they got on the bus? It is an equally egregious ethical lapse or logical error, to believe that the infinitely "creative thoughts" of those with schizophrenia, lead to the correct interpretation of an act that they have no sense that they committed. How can your moral opinion of their behavior depend upon their creative interpretation of an event that they saw and heard happen (and continue to imagine happening) in a completely differently way than you did? And if you explain it to them your way, your very use of logic can cause them to misinterpret even more. To help someone with schizophrenia, one first changes their feelings of paranoia. Their thoughts then follow. That is usually the most ethical and effective approach. Analyzing their thoughts, initially, will provide little information about their ultimate capacity for moral reasoning or understanding. Joe deserves to not be paranoid, so that he can use his "creativity" in his own interests and the interests of others, not to act upon a reality that he completely misinterprets.

"At the other extreme, imagine that he is a fine, upstanding fellow with no relevant immoral ideas or habits, and that this sudden and unpredictable brain defect is not only causing hallucinations, it is affecting the transcription of his short- to longer-term memory. He can no longer recall the attack in the pub, but only waking up half a minute ago, imprisoned by demons. He is constantly in a state of being overwhelmed by this new and bizarre situation, and is therefore quite rightly devoting his attention, first, to analysing the possibility that it really is as it seems to be. By the time he gets round to considering other possible explanations, he has forgotten, and starts again at the beginning."

David Deutsch

I can agree with you about this scenario, but if it does occur, and I can perhaps think of one or two brain malfunctions that could almost cause this, it is so vanishingly rare that it is not worthwhile (in my opinion) to discuss it further, but if you wish I will and try to formulate a hypothetical lesion that could cause this. In a sense schizophrenia is like this (a little bit) because though the person remembers, they don't integrate (well) their past and present experiences to create an overall narrative of the experiences of their life, or at any rate they don't create a narrative that makes sense to anyone else so it is almost like each disorganized thought is like "new" without logical connection to previous thoughts.

The common scenario in schizophrenia is one in which the patient remembers just fine. When friends and family come to talk with Joe about his "mental state", he gets angry and accuses some of them of being imposters. Indeed the more people try to reason with him the angrier and more paranoid he gets. He now overtly claims to be Jesus the Christ, and claims to be conducting miracles over the planet...Indeed he claims to have caused the destruction of the Soviet Union and threatens to destroy an unnamed country, if they don't turn from the "wages of sin". A prison nurse who has a little experience with patients with schizophrenia is the only one who can talk to him a bit and cause him to calm down, precisely because she plays backgammon with him and does not challenge his delusions. He trusts her a little but no one else.

His friends try to get him to see that given his mental state at the time, it was understandable for him to hit Harry, but now he does not have to believe that Harry was in league with the devil.....but Joe says he understands "perfectly well" what is going on, but his explanation has nothing to do with anyone else's. Joe's efforts at understanding more about his mental condition involve reading and rereading the bible, until he finally writes a ten page tract that he says now supercedes the bible, and poor Harry is the devil's first child. When others suggest to him that he might be mentally ill, and give him literature to read, he says that as god he can rewrite all the rules. He agrees that he has completely chosen to rewrite the bible, but believes that it is his responsibility as the second coming of "Christ" to do exactly that.

"It doesn't follow from the proposition that they are demons trying to harm him, that he should not listen to their explanations. On the contrary, once he is helpless and in their power, he should listen to them."

David Deutsch

Multiple psychiatric patients are completely locked up and are completely convinced that they are all powerful gods.....We've demonstrated (decades ago and no doubt inhumanely) that holding them down against the bed doesn't even change the patients view of his power. Indeed he is more likely to cling to the view that he is more powerful if you hold him down. One can see minor versions of this when frightened children (or adults) begin bragging about themselves precisely when they feel the most intimidated. But when the cognitive filter is gone that allows a person to check fantasy against reality, then the narcissistic fantasy (of being god) becomes absolutely real. Indeed to those with schizophrenia, the entire world revolves around them, often literally because they think they are the center of the universe, god himself.

This level of "rationality"...(the demons are in control of me so perhaps I should listen to them to learn their weaknesses....etc., then I can plan an escape) woefully misunderstands those with these types of psychotic illnesses. They precisely cannot build these kinds of mental models. In a sense the more you intimidate them, the stronger their grandiose delusion. If the demons think they can control him, then he will believe that he is god! No, it doesn't make sense from your or my perspective. But it is a property of thought disorganization. The effectiveness of the glue that allows someone to put his thoughts together and build logical argument and logical behavior, depends crucially on a person feeling trusting towards people and feeling calm. When trust and calm are gone, thoughts do not logically link the past and present and future, in the mind of someone with schizophrenia. And what seems like dark fantasy to us emerges as quiet real to someone with schizophrenia.

His family and friends certainly agree that he does not understand that he continues to have false perceptions and misunderstand reality.

Let us imagine that several months from now, Joe somehow ended up on anti-psychotic medicines (I will discuss how later), and has an excellent response to these medicines. In fact, he now fully understands how wrong it was to hurt Harry and apologizes to him profusely. He makes amends to everyone he hurt and insulted. But he does say that he simply did not understand what was going on at the YMCA. After about 3 weeks on medicine at the prison, his clue to his false beliefs came when there were two other people on the psychiatric ward of the prison, all claiming to be Jesus, and he just started to wonder how he could be Jesus, too, and eventually started to laugh a week or so later about 3 Jesus's on the psychiatric ward. But he is adamant that he did not understand what happened at the YMCA until he was on medication, and it was reexplained to him. After his release from prison he hears over and over again from other patients, and then checks the literature and finds that there are thousands upon thousands of patients with schizophrenia many of whom, on medication, said they simply did not understand what they were doing when they were psychotic, because they had fixed and false ideas that colored all of their other perceptions.

Professor Deutsch, is it possible that Joe really did not understand, despite his best efforts to understand, that he had a psychotic mental state that lead him to misperceive the intentions of others and see inaccurately the events as they occurred at the YMCA? Is it possible that he continued to not understand what happened at the YMCA until he took medication? He began understanding only when he was on anti-psychotic medications for several weeks. Is it possible that Joe is telling the truth about continuing to not understand what happened at the YMCA until he got on anti-psychotic medication, and then others, whom he now trusted, explained the sequence of events at the YMCA and he believed them?

by Michael Golding on Mon, 07/25/2005 - 05:37 | reply

The 'previous question'

This passage

Do you think it is possible for someone like Joe to continue to not understand an explanation given to him concerning why it was wrong to hit Harry, despite Joe's best efforts? In other words, do you think it is possible for someone like Joe to hallucinate so vividly and to be so paranoid and delusional, that he believes [...]

consists of two questions. The second one claims to be the first one stated in other words. But it is not. The first one asks whether a certain state of affairs (Joe continues not to understand) is possible. The second asks whether that state of affairs could be caused through a particular mechanism (vividness, paranoid, delusional).

If the answer to the second question is yes, then the answer to the first must be too, because if a state of affairs can be caused by a certain mechanism, then that state of affairs can happen. But if the answer to the first question is yes, then nothing follows about the second, for it is possible for a person not to understand things that are explained to him, however carefully, and yet for this not to be due to the stated mechanism of vivid hallucinations, paranoia and delusions.

Hence the second question is not the first question stated in other words.

by David Deutsch on Wed, 07/27/2005 - 02:55 | reply

But Joe is psychotic

But David, he previously said that Joe is psychotic as well as having hallucinations. So when he says "someone like Joe", he means someone psychotic. And someone psychotic is defined by the dictionary as someone with "a mental distortion causing gross distortion or disorganization of a person's mental capacity, affective response, and capacity to recognize reality". So the answer to his question "could someone like Joe fail to understand that what he did was wrong" must be yes, by definition.

by a reader on Thu, 07/28/2005 - 11:53 | reply

But Joe is psychotic

Thank you so much for helping to express this idea. I agree with you.

I am wondering (now) whether someone like Joe, given the additional information I have presented and in addition despite all reasonable attempts to use verbal persuasion to convince him to change his mind; I am wondering whether Joe could still fail to understand that what he did was wrong (i.e. maintain a psychotic perspective about the incident at the YMCA)?

Thanks.

by Michael Golding on Thu, 07/28/2005 - 15:01 | reply

But Joe is psychotic

Sorry, but now I don't get it (I wrote the comment two above this one). Since the answer must be yes by definition, how can you be wondering what it is?

by a reader on Thu, 07/28/2005 - 15:39 | reply

Reply to Kolya

I first posted this on my blog, but I wasn't sure if Kolya would see it there and thought it might be of interest to others:

Dear Kolya,

I really appreciate your comments although I think so far, I tentatively disagree with some of what you've said.

Debilitating behavioural syndromes such as schizophrenia, manic depression and eating disorders are real. But it's highly tendentious to call them illnesses, because the prevailing theories about their causes, their consequences and their remedies are all morally very controversial. By calling these syndromes "illnesses" we gloss over that controversy and hand over authority to adjudicate on these moral issues to a "priesthood" of psychiatrists who lack any special moral insights for dealing with them. While there exist some wise and humane psychiatrists and therapists, as an objective body of transmissible knowledge, psychiatry is, as Szasz rightly says, just like alchemy.

I think refusing to call mental problems(or controversies) "illness" has already led to a serious problem - moralists who heap blame, shame, and guilt on those who genuinely need medical or some type of help. At least when they're diagnosed with an illness, people with these difficulties can be treated as deserving of help and with some optimism about living better lives.

I'm not convinced that doctors and scientists aren't doing a better job than "moralists" have done so far. Sure they've made and will continue to make mistakes, but at least they're trying to find ways to test their theories and correct them.

Good moral knowledge could help with this, but I don't think it's enough. The record for helping such people outside of the medical community hasn't been very good.

I know people who seem to have been substantially helped by antidepressants and therapy. I also know of people who actually seemed to be hurt by it. I think this could be a problem with fitting the best solution to the patient. In some cases, substantial life changes (moving, divorce, etc) seemed to bring about a lot of improvement.

It's hard to say whether it was the person who was particularly sensitive to the environment, the environment/interactions being particularly bad for him, or whether there was some brain difficulty. Sometimes change was suggested by a therapist and sometimes it wasn't. I wouldn't say this is a lack of good knowledge about it, just a particular difficulty or mistake with finding the best way to help the particular person. It could have been that for a person in a seemingly similar situation, drugs and therapy would have helped. I think knowledge about how to find the best way to help will improve.

However, it would be ridiculous to suggest that just because the prevailing psychiatric theories are wrong, serious mental disorders don't exist. They exist all right; it's just that they are not illnesses in any useful sense of the word. Having said that, we cannot entirely de-couple the management of these problems from the medical profession, because prescription-only medication has a legitimate role to play in the management of mental disorders. Moreover, as some behavioural disturbances are caused by genuine illnesses such as thyroid malfunction, brain tumours and Alzheimer's, it makes sense for doctors to be involved in the evaluation of certain kinds of mental/behavioural disorders.

Kolya | 07.17.05 - 8:28 am |

I think mental disorders do share some important characteristics with "medical illnesses" in that they're an "impairment to normal functioning". Personally, I think "healthy" would be a better term - as in "impairment to healthy functioning" (being different from "normal" might not actually be an impairment to health).

This doesn't mean a person can't manage to function well in spite of illness - physical or mental - at times. It doesn't mean there won't be mistakes made about what it means to actually be "impaired", what it means to be "normal" or "healthy" mentally, and whether a particular person is "healthy" and "normal".

If there are problems with the system for avoiding and correcting those mistakes, then those problems can and should be addressed and improved. I've been really impressed with the bits of medical history I've read so far. Yes, there have been plenty of big mistakes, but there have been some amazing improvements and breakthroughs.

Cheers,
Becky

PS - I think Mr. Golding's explanation about how Joe's evaluation played out is how it could be "well done" and still not perfect. Not all evaluations are as carefully done. I do agree that there can be some harmful consequences to some individuals at times because not all professionals are good at their profession. This seems like an issue of getting more professionals to be good at their job.

by beckyam on Thu, 07/28/2005 - 16:58 | reply

Psychotic Joe

In the past (at the YMCA), Joe had a psychotic interpretation of the event. Now he is in jail. People have tried to persuade him. New events have occurred. Joe has thought further about the event given his interpretation of what others said. Several new events were related in the story above. Despite the best efforts of others to persuade him, is it reasonable to assume that someone, like Joe, can be persuaded using words alone, to not have a psychotic view of the events, even though he had a psychotic view in the past? Can you, in general, change the delusional views of someone like Joe by reasoning with him (Most psychiatrists would say that Joe was experiencing a relatively severe case of a first psychotic break, and his illness will likely progress to schizophrenia.) Is someone like Joe likely capable of understanding the true situation that happened at the YMCA, if others use words to persuade him, but not medications?

Thanks. Hope that clarifies.

by Michael Golding on Thu, 07/28/2005 - 18:06 | reply

Psychotic Joe

By the way, in case it is not obvious, medications "persuade" by changing feelings, which then allow the individual to change thoughts.....actually a bit more complicated than that, since attentional factors and multiple other mechanisms seem to be involved.

by MIchael Golding on Thu, 07/28/2005 - 22:40 | reply

Someone like Joe

Is someone like Joe likely to be capable of understanding the true situation that happened at the YMCA, if others use words to persuade him, but not medications?

By definition, no.

But perhaps you mean: might someone like Joe (i.e. someone psychotic by the above definition) be capable of ceasing to be psychotic through some process not involving drugs? Unfortunately I don't know, because the answer depends on something no one knows at present, namely the mechanism by which a person becomes psychotic. But I think I could give a halfway useful answer if I knew the answer to this question: on the occasions when someone has been mistakenly diagnosed as (already) psychotic, how is that mistake typically discovered?

by David Deutsch on Fri, 07/29/2005 - 21:38 | reply

Re: Reply to Kolya

Becky wrote:

I think mental disorders do share some important characteristics with "medical illnesses" in that they're an "impairment to normal functioning". Personally, I think "healthy" would be a better term - as in "impairment to healthy functioning" (being different from "normal" might not actually be an impairment to health).

Can you not think of other conditions that also 'share some important characteristics with "medical illnesses" in that they're an impairment to healthy functioning', but which it would be morally wrong and practically harmful to think of as illnesses?

If so, what is the significant difference between those things and 'mental illnesses'?

by David Deutsch on Sat, 07/30/2005 - 18:13 | reply

Mental Illness vs. Impairments to health

Good question.

I'm having trouble thinking of a specific example such as you suggest.

I can see where my description falls short, but I've gone around several different ways of describing it and see no way of looking at it that doesn't become a confusing jumble.

Thinking of poor Joe. It seems "obvious" that he's got a mental impairment and needs help. This is partly based on my thinking there are no demons (or Jesus or anything "supernatural") and yet I don't propose curing all religious people of an "illness" (that doesn't sound like a bad idea on the surface, but I expect there are some huge complications and moral problems with that).

Along this vein, what if the girls of Salem had all been treated? The story goes that some girls started acting very strangely and lacking any explanation for a physical cause, their neighbors and relatives went on to conclude that it was satan at work. The descriptions of their behavior sound rather scary and make me wonder whether there wasn't some exposure to toxic chemicals. Why did all their neighbors and friends assume it was the work of witchcraft vs. some as-yet-undiscovered ailment? Would they have refrained from burning people at the stake? It seems like there's a fair chance they would have agreed with Joe about some of his delusions! It seems that in the case of the girls, they likely needed medical treatment. In the case of the neighbors, they needed better ideas. Better ideas could have eliminated a lot of needless deaths and helped the girls, so would better medical knowledge and even the expectation that physical ailments might explain their behavior (even if the specific cause never get discovered).

OTOH, what if Joe's exact problem is distinguishing his own fantasy from his own concept of reality? He generally doesn't think he's Jesus or that demons make themselves visible, but is in such a state that what are normally imaginings get confused with reality.

The only difference that I can see between Joe and the people of Salem a long time ago might be that Joe eventually thinks that he'd been wrong. Perhaps some of the people of Salem came to think so too later..

Would it have been harmful to think of all the people in Salem as being mentally ill vs. murderers? Possibly. Maybe treating them as responsible and culpable would deter others from drawing hasty conclusions about things based on flimsy evidence.

Becky

by beckyam on Fri, 08/05/2005 - 17:33 | reply

Some impairments to healthy functioning

Some conditions of the brain which in my opinion are, under typical circumstances, impairments to healthy functioning, but which it would be morally wrong and practically harmful to think of as illnesses are (in no particular order):

- Having a devout religious belief according to which the highest achievement in one's life would be to become a suicide bomber and kill as many Americans or Jews as possible.
- Hating school.
- Believing that one has paranormal abilities and that scientists are ignoring the evidence of this because they are too set in their ways.
- Same, but with believing that one has been abducted by aliens.
- Believing that one's spiritual leader is in communication with aliens.
- Believing that gay people are an abomination.
- Believing conspiracy theories.
- Believing that alternative medicine can cure cancer.
- Being sad at the loss of a loved one.
- Being sad because one has frequent headaches.
- Being sad because believes that one's one's face is unattractive.
- Believing that one is fat.
- Believing that Blair and/or Bush lied about WMD.
- Believing that a fertilised human ovum is, morally, a person.
- Believing that the essence of morality is to sacrifice oneself for others.

OK, I think that covers more or less everybody. :)

by David Deutsch on Fri, 08/05/2005 - 21:21 | reply

"girls of Salem"

There is no comparison between the "girls of Salem" and Joe.

Those with experience using structured diagnostic instruments (like the SCID), easily and reliably distinguish between those with schizophrenia and those with unusual religious beliefs, as long as the person doing the examination is familiar with the dialect and idioms of the person being questioned.

Religious people routinely tell us they speak with G-d and or the devil, or even that they can speak to serpents, their dog or whatever. They tell us that a deity caused a tree to fall on their house as well, usually to punish them. They have different belief systems than I, but they do not have schizophrenia unless they have a number of other characteristics.

Those with schizophrenia utilize a unique logical pattern as they reason. This pattern is relatively easily discernable in their thinking, if a trained clinician listens to them for a minute or two, let alone throughout an hour interview. I spoke about this pattern a little bit when I was responding to a comment made by Professor Deutsch.

It is scientifically inaccurate to claim that schizophrenia can not be (easily) distinguished from religious belief and hysterical reactions.

Moral guidance over time may have helped "the Salem girls," but will do nothing to change the delusional beliefs of those with schizophrenia, as has been documented by thousands of studies and case reports.

Thanks.

by Michael Golding on Sat, 08/06/2005 - 04:17 | reply

Re: Some Impairments to Healthy Functioning

Professor Deutsch,

Do you think the bodily/brain states, associated with the beliefs you named above, are phenomena that have moral and scientific implications, equivalent to the moral and scientific implications of someone with the bodily/brain states associated with bipolar illness? Type II diabetes?

by Michael Golding on Sat, 08/06/2005 - 04:36 | reply

Re: Some Impairments to Healthy Functioning

Do you think the bodily/brain states, associated with the beliefs you named above, are phenomena that have moral and scientific implications, equivalent to the moral and scientific implications of someone with the bodily/brain states associated with bipolar illness? Type II diabetes?

The mental states on that list, and the mental states associated with bipolar illness and type II diabetes, are all different in some ways and alike in others. They all have in common that they impair healthy functioning. Virtually no one would want to call them all illnesses, and hence the list as a whole demonstrates that "impairing healthy functioning" is not a sufficient criterion for being a disease.

They also have in common that it is rare for moral guidance alone to restore healthy functioning. They also have in common that if, as a result of being in one of these states, the sufferer hurts an innocent person, then their moral responsibility depends not on the state itself but on the choices that they took before and during the event. None of them are illnesses, but many can be caused by illnesses, and they vary greatly in how harmful a mistake regarding them as illnesses is likely to be. They also have in common that it is immoral to do anything to the sufferers against their will other than in self-defence.

On the occasions when someone has been mistakenly diagnosed as psychotic, how is that mistake typically discovered?

by David Deutsch on Sat, 08/06/2005 - 11:13 | reply

Genes Affect Behavior

Genes Affect Behavior.

1. Neuro-surgical stimulation of the brain at various places causes individuals to behave in particular ways and report particular types of psychological experience. A person's thoughts, feelings, and behavior are therefore at least partially dependant on the changing neurophysiological output of the brain. Genes have been shown to influence the physiological output of every organ in the body. Is it not odd that genes can influence the output of literally every organ in the body, but cannot influence the output (thoughts, feelings, and behavior) of the BRAIN?

2. Mammalian exploratory behavior/investigation of novel environments (NOVELTY SEEKING) is known to be heavily influenced by DOPAMINE transmission (particularly in limbic areas). Rodents genetically engineered to transmit less dopamine explore their environment less. Those rodents genetically engineered to transmit more dopamine explore more. A non-novelty seeking genetically engineered rodent can be converted into a novelty seeking rodent by giving drugs enhancing dopamine transmission (e.g. L-dopa) and the reverse can occur to novelty seeking rodents by giving dopamine blockers.

Between 40-60% (depending upon study) of the variability in HUMAN NOVELTY SEEKING is explained by genetic factors. The gene D4DR in humans, codes for different types of DOPAMINE 4 RECEPTORS in the brain. Differences in the single gene D4DR, explain approximately one-quarter of the genetic component of the variance in novelty seeking in humans.

The Cloninger scale is used to measure "novelty seeking" in humans. It has been validated repeatedly using common sense notions of behaviors associated with "novelty seeking". Therefore a specific genetic alteration in the human genome causes a specific change in the shape of a dopamine receptor in the brain (D4), and this receptor difference in turn changes the average way in which humans fill out a questionnaire measuring novelty seeking.

These genetic studies have been confirmed several times in humans with (to my knowledge) only one study not confirming the results (a small Finnish study). This D4DR gene explains about 25% of the heritable human variance in what is termed "novelty seeking". Mammalian studies have also conclusively demonstrated that genetic changes similarly alter brain receptors, which in turn change novelty seeking in animals, by affecting dopamine neurotransmission.

Would it not be odd if the genetic mechanism in animals that increases novelty seeking via known brain mechanisms, does so in all mammals studied: But only when the gene involved seems to cause virtually identical changes in the human brain, also associated with increases in novelty seeking, do we say the gene is not really involved?

3. Would it not be odd if Darwinian evolution created genes that change virtually every bodily function to help promote survival of the organism, but the psychological functions in humans arguably more important to fitness and reproduction than virtually any other function (when to feel happy or sad, ability to intuitively model the mind and intentions of others, when to focus on avoiding harm, when to be sexually interested or disinterested), these functions critically important to genetic reproduction, are not at all causally linked to genes?

4. Five generations of a Dutch family have been found in which remarkably violent and hypersexual males are all related through their mothers. Not one affected male has an affected son, but (unaffected) females in the family have sons that exhibited these unusual behaviors, suggesting an "X-linked" disorder like color-blindness.

Indeed, the aberrant gene in the affected males was found on their X chromosome. It was found to have a mutation that prevents monoamine oxidase A from being produced in the brain. Monoamine Oxidase is an enzyme that is targeted by various drugs, particularly anti-depressants. It breaks down key signaling chemicals in the brain (serotonin, dopamine, norepinephrine). Men committing arson, rape, attempted homicide, etc. in this Dutch family, all were found to have the genetic mutation; those without a criminal history did not have the mutation.

Some doubted that a single and subtle genetic mutation could cause such widespread behavioral change in a human and suggested that perhaps other factors accounted for the violence, and not the absent monoamine oxidase. So animals were genetically engineered to be identical to other animals, except that the engineered animals were designed to have the same small mutation in the gene that the human family has – the mutation that prevents production of Monoamine Oxidase A. Remarkably, in differing only in Monoamine Oxidase A production, the deficient animals repeatedly attacked and repeatedly tried to kill otherwise identical animals not deficient in the enzyme. They also were far more sexually aggressive when paired with females. In other words the animals, like the humans with the monoamine deficiency, showed the same increased propensity to violence and sexually aggressive behavior.

Neuroscientists have manipulated monoamine levels in healthy, non-depressed humans. Carefully controlled studies demonstrate that with special dietary interventions, for example utilizing the tryptophan deficiency paradigm, lowering serotonergic neurotransmission dramatically alters mood states. For example, we can change healthy, happy people into depressed and irritable people just by changing neurotransmission, and then reverse this effect with various medications and dietary interventions. Controlled studies have also demonstrated that we can alter anger and sexual drive by changing monoamine neurotransmission.

So there is abundant evidence (in humans) that altering monoamine neurotransmission (via neurochemical and dietary interventions) affects mood state, irritability, and sexuality. It should not be surprising, therefore, that when a genetic mutation (like in the disturbed males in the Dutch family) also alters the same monoamine neurotransmission, behavioral effects occur just as they do with dietary interventions, and just as they do in animals with the identical mutation causing monoamine alterations.

Would it not be odd if animals genetically engineered to lack a particular monoamine enzyme become more aggressive and sexual due to changed monoamine levels, humans experiencing interventions changing monoamine concentrations become more aggressive and sexual; but humans with an identical genetic mutation as animals, causing an identical change in monoamine levels, associated also with increases in violence and sexual aggression: Would it not be odd if these monoamine changes, just because they were caused by a gene, have nothing to do with the subsequent behavioral effects?

5. In the absence of specific known mechanisms connecting gene products to particular outputs from the brain, how would genetically based mental illnesses exhibit their polygenetic characteristics to investigators? Obsessive Compulsive disorder, Schizophrenia, Bipolar illness, and to some extent Major Depression all have (1) high monozygotic:dizygotic ratios, (2) low sibling risk, (3) high first-degree relative risk (4) Predictable (but non-specific) pathophysiology of a relevant organ (brain) and (5) Cause pain and suffering

- a. These are exactly the results that are mathematically predicted for illnesses with polygenetic origins in which the specific pathophysiology has not been discovered.
- b. These are exactly the results found in polygenetic illnesses of multiple organs in the body, in which more exact genetic mechanisms have been ascertained.
- c. There are no cases that have been discovered in which illnesses which were consistently found to have the above 5 characteristics were found not to be genetic in origin.
- d. Obsessive Compulsive disorder, Schizophrenia, Bipolar illness, and Major Depression all have the above 5 characteristics.
- e. Would it not be odd if Obsessive Compulsive Disorder, Schizophrenia, Major Depression, and Bipolar syndrome, amongst the thousands of genetically based illnesses which share the above 5 characteristics: Would it not be odd if these illnesses were the only illnesses of thousands (with the five characteristics) that turn out not to be genetically based?

6. Malfunctioning genes can cause malfunctioning in literally every organ in the body. Would it not be odd if the brain were the only organ in the body that is not subject to effects from malfunctioning genes? What types of symptoms would a brain that is malfunctioning (due to malfunctioning genes) exhibit, except changed behaviors and changed thoughts and feelings, otherwise known as mental illnesses caused by neurological dysfunction?

by Michael Golding on Tue, 09/20/2005 - 00:50 | reply

Can the Editors Admit when he is Wrong?

"He states that mental illness is like Type 2 diabetes and other illnesses for which we do not know the exact cause. Type 2 diabetes results when a person's body does not make enough insulin. As such there is an objective chemical marker for Type 2 diabetes -- lack of insulin."

In type 2 diabetes, insulin levels are often elevated. The cause(s) of type 2 diabetes are not known. And type 2 diabetes is defined by a committee of experts (just as mental illnesses are), and the definition changes regularly.

Can the editor admit when he is wrong?

by a reader on Wed, 09/21/2005 - 15:38 | reply

Re: Can the Editors Admit when he is Wrong?

Sure. Could you give us a link to the wrong statement, and we'll admit it's wrong right away.

by Editor on Wed, 09/21/2005 - 16:04 | reply

Re: Genes Affect Behavior

There is no shadow of a doubt in my mind that genes affect behaviour. So we're agreed on that point.

Now, on the occasions when someone has been mistakenly diagnosed as psychotic, how is that mistake typically discovered?

by David Deutsch on Wed, 09/21/2005 - 16:25 | reply

A Link to the Wrong Statement

Not exactly sure what you mean by asking me to provide "a link to the wrong statement." Are you asking me to provide a link (in this response) to the quoted (wrong) statement? If so, the incorrect statement, which the editor wrote, is in this very blog, under Science and Superstition, under Re: Serious Mental Illness is Hereditary, 2nd paragraph.

I don't know how to put computerized links in responses.

But perhaps you are asking for a link to information that is correct about type 2 diabetes? Any Google search, quoting some type of credible source, will provide information about diabetes. It is a syndrome with multiple (mostly unknown) causes, and its definition is decided by a committee of experts, just like mental illness. It tends not to cause organ damage for years, just like mental illness.

The issue is not whether we know exactly what causes something (although it is very nice to know) but rather whether the definitions PREDICT a progressive pathophysiology, damage to organs, and pain and suffering. Illnesses, like mental illness and diabetes, cause damage to organs and pain and suffering.

For mental illnesses like depression, bipolar illness, and schizophrenia, definitions are very predictive of progressive organ damage, as they are for type 2 diabetes. The issue is whether the definitions used and subsequent findings from various types of examination are reliable and predictive.

In addition, bipolar illness and schizophrenia happen to be far more genetically based illnesses, therefore caused by internal bodily factors, than type 2 diabetes, if a patient is in his or her 20's. In other words environmental and cultural variables predict far more the development of diabetes, than bipolar illness or schizophrenia (if the patient is in his or her 20's).

Editor:

"He states that mental illness is like Type 2 diabetes...for which we do not know the exact cause. Type 2 diabetes results when a person's body does not make enough insulin. As such there is an objective chemical marker for Type 2 diabetes -- lack of insulin"

If an editor of "The World" wishes to learn about diabetes, before explaining it to me, he or she may wish to read a little bit about his subject.

From Medline Plus Encyclopedia

"Diabetes affects up to 6% of the population in the U.S. Type 2 diabetes accounts for 90% of all cases.

A main component of type 2 diabetes is "insulin resistance". This means that the insulin produced by your pancreas cannot connect with fat and muscle cells to let glucose inside and produce energy. This causes hyperglycemia (high blood glucose).

To compensate, the pancreas produces more insulin. The cells sense this flood of insulin and become even more resistant, resulting in a vicious cycle of high glucose levels and often high insulin levels."

Or an editor can read this...

From a University Web site.

http://64.233.161.104/search?

q=cache:PQr41Ld0F5IJ:darwin.nmsu.edu/~molbio/diabetes/disease.html+elevated+insulin+type+2+diabetes&hl=en

Type II diabetes is associated with obesity and with aging. It is a lifestyle-dependent disease, and has a strong genetic component (concordance in twins is 80-90%). The problem seems not so much in insulin production, but that when the insulin reaches its target cells, it doesn't work correctly. Most Type II diabetes patients initially have high insulin levels along with high blood sugar. However, since sugar signals the pancreas to release insulin, Type II diabetics eventually become resistant to that signal and the endocrine-pancreas soon will not make enough insulin. These people end up managing the disease with insulin and they need much higher doses because they are resistant to it."

"Science and Superstition"....Indeed.

I will (briefly) explain how to distinguish schizophrenia from other psychotic states and non-psychotic illnesses in my next post.

Michael Golding

by a reader on Thu, 09/22/2005 - 01:23 | reply

Type II diabetes

Mr Golding is correct when he writes that doctors test for diabetes by measuring the level of sugar in the blood of patients not by measuring insulin.

by Alan Forrester on Thu, 09/22/2005 - 02:39 | reply

Miss the Point (again)

You miss the point (again), Mr. Forrester, as has been pointed out to you by 3 doctors and multiple posts.

Decreased insulin does not CAUSE diabetes and neither does an elevated fasting blood sugar, although both can sometimes be useful to measure. Definitions of type 2 diabetes are created by a committee of people as are definitions of mental illness. The definitions are evaluated based on whether they are reliable and WHAT THEY PREDICT.

If asking someone whether he has a dry mouth and urinates frequently and if asking him about his eating habits, predicted the consequences of diabetes (e.g damage to kidneys, brains, and eyes, etc) with no additional information from a blood sugar, then we would solely ask questions, in order to diagnose type 2 diabetes. We would not check a blood sugar. It is not that type 2 diabetes is "objective" and major depression is "subjective." We have blood tests for major depression, as well. These blood tests just don't predict outcomes as well as clinical interviews (at this point).

The issue is reliability of a finding (whether interview question or blood test) and its ability to predict damage to the body and future pain and suffering. We have not discovered THE MAJOR CAUSES of type 2 diabetes or major depression, so the underlying pathophysiological disorders are not known for either. But the presence of Major Depression, for example, is at least as important as the presence of diabetes in predicting morbidity and mortality after a heart attack, according to many studies in which they have been compared. And both certainly cause pain and suffering.

So major depression is an illness and so is type 2 diabetes, because both are reliably diagnosed, both predict damage to organs, and both cause pain and suffering.

NB: Lynching or homophobia or advertising fast food are not illnesses. But BODILY REACTIONS to these cultural factors can be (e.g. infection in response to the start of lynching, major depression in response to exposure to persistent homophobia, and developing diabetes if someone consistently eats too much in response to advertising.)

Unfortunately, neither you nor Professor Deutsch have been able to understand these straightforward concepts, and I am not sure why. So you label schizophrenia, and bipolar illness and major depression "fake" but other syndromes, like type 2 diabetes, real.

Science and Superstition. Indeed.

by Michael Golding on Thu, 09/22/2005 - 04:55 | reply

Re: miss the point

I believe your position is the following:

Serious mental illnesses are, like all illnesses, physiological phenomena that cause suffering. We know this from evidence such as: (1) Like diabetes and other illnesses, they have detectable biochemical and biophysical effects, which can be measured in life and at autopsy. (2) They are heritable. The mathematics of their heritability leaves no room for rational doubt that variant genes are a cause of mental illnesses in the same sense as they are a cause of diabetes. Yes, the environment and the patients' own choices also affect the incidence and course of mental illnesses, but that is no counter-argument because the same is even more true of (type 2) diabetes. (3) In some cases both the gene responsible for a mental illness and its mode of action have been discovered. (4) In some cases the signs and symptoms of a mental illness have been created artificially by inducing chemical changes in volunteers. (5) The signs and symptoms of most mental illnesses can be alleviated, often dramatically, by treatment with drugs. This has been established beyond doubt in clinical trials using the same double-blind methodology as any other tests in the science of pharmacology.

Mental illnesses cause characteristic behaviours which are used, along with biochemical and biophysical tests, in diagnosis, but again, the same is true of many non-mental illnesses, and it is not the case that modern medicine defines mental illnesses as behaviours. So in short, none of the alleged differences between the two kinds of illnesses exist in reality. Therefore, classifying mental illnesses as 'fake illnesses' is logically unjustifiable. But worse, it stigmatises the sufferers as fakers, malingerers or criminals, etc. It also stigmatises the professionals in the field of mental health, who are saving and repairing lives every day. Furthermore, it actively harms the sufferers by seeking to deny them the treatment that would help them, by blaming them for 'choosing' to be ill, and by persuading legislators and others to believe that scientific research into the physical mechanisms of mental illnesses is worthless because those conditions are not physical in origin.

Is that an accurate statement of your position (to the extent that a couple of short paragraphs can be accurate and complete)?

by David Deutsch on Sat, 09/24/2005 - 00:53 | reply

History of Mental illness

Is it possible that biology can change so quickly that even when they control for things like people going to the doctor more and other cultural changes, depression could increase such that people born since 1945 are 10 times more likely to suffer from depression as those born before?

I believe other mental illnesses have also increased to surprising degrees. Is this consistent with the idea of mental illness as a disease, or as mental illness as heritable? If so, could you explain?

This is not a rhetorical question.

by a reader on Sat, 09/24/2005 - 06:42 | reply

Hysteria has declined too

Hysteria has declined sharply in a very short time in India:
http://www.ncbi.nlm.nih.gov/entrez/query.fcgi?cmd=Retrieve&db=pubmed&dopt=Abstract&list_uids=1544018

Secret government gene therapy experiments? Or what?

by a reader on Mon, 09/26/2005 - 00:15 | reply

Diabetes: A "Fake" Disease Invented by the Communists?

"It is perhaps not generally appreciated that in the United States diabetes, or at least the recognition of the disease, has increased about 300 percent over the last fifteen years. It is the second leading cause of blindness, and the third cause of death. In 1950 there were 1.2 million diabetics in the United States; the estimation now is that there are over 10 million, yet the population has increased by only 50 percent."
Harris Coulter, Ph.D., April 16, 1997. Testimony House of Representatives.

How did the genes evolve so fast??

by Michael Golding on Mon, 09/26/2005 - 03:29 | reply

I like a bit of both.

Genomes encode proteomes that include such things as dopamine and serotonin receptors, enzymes that synthesize dopamine and serotonin from their amino acid precursors, enzymes which breakdown dopamine and serotonin etcetera.

The large number of genes involved in neuronal function makes the human brain a large mutational target.

If the brain is the organ of behaviour (and I believe it is) it follows that genetic mutations can influence behaviour.

It follows that there could, at least in principle, be a number of clinically recognised behavioural diseases that result from genetic polymorphisms (differences).

Furthermore, as genes are the units of hereditary, it follows that these diseases of behaviour would be heritable. That is to say they would run in families.

As the brain is such a large potential target for genetic mutation, different mutations may be of greater or lesser import. There could therefore exist a spectrum of behavioural disease that is clinically continuous with what we regard as normal. By analogy there is a spectrum of glucose tolerance (how effectively the body deals with glucose) in the population that is created by polymorphisms in the enzymes that are involved in metabolism. Not everybody with an impaired glucose tolerance test would satisfy the criteria for diabetes mellitus just as not everybody with bizarre or eccentric behaviour would be satisfy the criteria for a mental disease.

This doesn't necessarily mean that environmental factors are unimportant (either in diabetes or mental illness). It is possible that genetic factors might confer a susceptibility to both diabetes and/or mental illness but environmental factors might be necessary for the expression of the disease.

Our need to create order in a complex world begets one of the worst errors of human thinking: dichotomy, or our tendency to reduce a truly intricate and multivariate set of shadings into two diametrically opposed alternatives (Claude Levi-Strauss and the French structuralists have based an entire theory of human nature on this premise- I believe they are a bit over-extended in their arguments. Over-extension of good arguments is another common, and woeful, error in human thinking).

So many fatuous arguments stem from silly dichotomies. Nature or nurture is one of the most pervasive of our age. What's wrong with a bit of both?

Kieren

by Kieren on Fri, 10/21/2005 - 21:41 | reply

Very Well Said and Thank You

Michael

by M Golding on Tue, 10/25/2005 - 01:57 | reply

Re: I like a bit of both

If the brain is the organ of behaviour (and I believe it is) it follows that genetic mutations can influence behaviour.

This much is true. Babies have certain ideas about causality from a very early age as determined by observing that they look surprised if certain unexpected events happen.

It follows that there could, at least in principle, be a number of clinically recognised behavioural diseases that result from genetic polymorphisms (differences).

Doesn't follow even slightly. People can criticise behaviour and theories including behaviour and theories that happen to have a biological origin. For example, whatever our genetic theory of physics might happen to be we have refuted it in favour of general relativity and quantum physics. There also seems to be a common bias against markets which may be a result of genetically programmed ideas of fairness, butg these ideas can be refuted as illustrated by the work of pro-free-market economists like Hayek. As a result we can't explain differences of opinion or behaviour by referring to genes. Rather we have to say something like: people may inherit theories or behavioural propensities encoded in their genes but if there exists a good criticism of the behaviour or theory concerned then we have to explain its persistence by the person either not coming across that criticism or rejecting it for some other reason. For example, if a person has a genetically caused tumour that secretes adrenaline and the tumour makes him feel jumpy we can't explain him treating other people badly as a result of his jumpiness unless nobody has explained to him why he shouldn't treat people badly or by him coming up with some rationale as to why he should treat people badly, e.g. - everyone else is his moral or intellectual inferior and so they deserve to be treated badly.

A disease may cause bad enough brain damage to stop a person from thinking but these cases do not resemble most mental illnesses in any important respect. For example, washing your hands repeatedly does not resemble not thinking about washing your hands. Rather a person might interpret anxiety in such a way that she associates handwashing with making it go away. For example, if she had some disease in childhood she caught as a result of not washing her hands after going to the toilet she might have started to feel anxious as a child when she didn't wash her hands after going to the toilet and the anxiety might go away when she washed her hands and this ritual might bleed into other parts of her life. For example, she might notice that pavements tend to be dirty and start worrying about whether she might catch diseases by not washing her hands after going outside. Note this is not the same as not thinking it is the same as having a silly idea.

Furthermore, as genes are the units of hereditary, it follows that these diseases of behaviour would be heritable. That is to say they would run in families.

Starting out with bad ideas or behaviours might run in families as a result of genes. Continuing to hold those bad ideas or behaviours must be explained by not learning better ideas through ignorance or rationalisation of bad ideas or behaviour as explained above.

Alan Forrester

by Alan Forrester on Sat, 08/25/2007 - 23:31 | reply

Is it Possible to Reject Your Hypothesis?

Alan,

Do you think pain is real? When pain serves no useful function, is this chronic pain then an illness?

Most (but not all) mental illnesses are types of pain. Indeed if you superimpose MRI/SPECT scans of brains of people in pain and people suffering from depression, it is virtually impossible to tell the difference. I can forward you the pictures if you like....see if you can see a difference.

Note that pain has no "lesion" that defines it, yet most people think it is quite real. We recognize that people are in pain by their descriptions of it and their behaviors, just as we recognize mental illnesses by the same means.

Is there any experiment possible, even in principle, that would refute the notion that types of OCD and depression are caused by a person's own thoughts/parenting/culture?

Is there any experiment possible, even in principle, that would refute the notion that types of chronic pain are caused by a person's own thoughts/parenting/culture?

by a reader on Mon, 10/01/2007 - 19:23 | reply

Incorrect Word

In the paragraphs above, the question should read,

Is there any experiment possible, even in principle, that could refute the notion that types of OCD and depression are caused by a person's thoughts/parenting/culture?

by a reader on Mon, 10/01/2007 - 21:43 | reply

so mental illness equals find so mental illness equals finding your life painful?

by a reader on Mon, 10/01/2007 - 22:58 | reply

Mental Illness

No. Most mental illness is a type of chronic pain. One can intellectually know that one's life is going well and still be depressed and hurting; just as one can intellectually know that the physical functioning of one's body is good and still be in terrible pain.

by a reader on Mon, 10/01/2007 - 23:16 | reply

Intellectually

Your comment is interesting to me because it might reveal a misunderstanding we have. Certainly it's true that having an intellectual theory about one's life often fails to defeat depression. But why did you bring that up? Absolutely nobody thinks that intellectual theories easily conquer all.

I'm concerned you may think my position that mental illness may be idea based implies either that intellectual ideas have something to do with it, or that one could simply choose to have other ideas and be cured. Neither of those is the case.

-- Elliot Temple
curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 10/03/2007 - 06:12 | reply

Can it Be Shown to be False?

The point is straightforward.

Is there any experiment possible that could show that for certain types of major depression and OCD, thought/parenting/culture is not the explanation?

Readers should note that when we discuss measurable phenomena, no research is relevant (no genuine scientific inquiry is possible) by a person who thinks that no evidence that he might find could show that his ideas are wrong.

- "1. I think X explains measurable phenomena Y. (Or, "I think thought causes pain, depression, OCD, autism, heart disease, cancer etc.)
2. No evidence (even in principle) can show that I am wrong.
3. Therefore X explains Y"

Yes, such reasoning is tautological and probably solipsistic. Yes, it has much more to do with superstition than science.

by a reader on Thu, 10/04/2007 - 00:09 | reply

Scientism Watch – Fishy Feelings 2

A couple of years ago we commented on a purportedly scientific (but actually scientific¹) study that claimed to have found “conclusive evidence of pain perception in fish”.

Now, a similarly scientific study has come to the opposite conclusion about worms, lobsters, crabs, insects and spiders: they feel no pain.

Nothing inconsistent between the two conclusions. Fish aren't on that list.

But interestingly, the authors of the second study explicitly rejected as worthless the entire body of evidence cited by the authors of the first study. In summary:

The scientists [in the first study] found sites in the heads of rainbow trout that responded to damaging stimuli.

They also found the fish showed marked reactions when exposed to harmful substances

But Prof. Farstad, of the second study, said:

"It seems to be only reflex curling when [worms are] put on the hook ... They might sense something, but it is not painful and does not compromise their well-being."

[...]

Farstad said most invertebrates, including lobsters and crabs boiled alive, do not feel pain because, unlike mammals, they do not have a big brain to read the signals.

They do have a small brain, however, which reacts centrally to stimuli – for instance, all the legs cooperate to move the crab away when it encounters harmful substances, or towards a crab of the opposite sex.

Of course neither group displayed any scientific evidence for using the criteria that they were using. How could they? That is not a scientific issue. Evidently both sets of researchers in effect brought their conclusions with them to the study: the first happened to be false, the second true. But if they were going to do that, why didn't they just look in front of them at their computer screens, and notice that their computer meets all of the first study's criteria for feeling pain, and all the second study's criteria for not feeling it. And then, shouldn't these researchers have responded with some trace of intelligence – never mind feeling – to that stimulus?

¹ Scientism: The purported use of scientific methods to resolve non-scientific (i.e. philosophical) issues.

Wed, 02/16/2005 - 18:18 | permalink

Request for clarification

You say on the one hand that this is not a scientific issue, but on the other, that the conclusions of the two studies were incorrect and correct respectively.

If this issue - of the extent to which various types of animal can be said to feel pain - is not scientific, then shouldn't we say that neither study is right? That's the view I take, personally.

Natural selection has equipped all sufficiently advanced animal life with some kind of 'damage alarm' systems, which detect damage and modify the animal's behaviour in ways likely to avoid or minimize further harm. I think we have to base our ethical judgements about what constitutes humane treatment purely on a 'third-person' understanding of animals' central nervous systems and behavioural repertoires. That information is, of course, inadequate to answer the moral questions, but I think it's better to admit this outright than to pretend (as some of these articles seem to do) that 'if we only knew what the animals were really feeling then the ethics would become clear'.

by Neil Fitzgerald on Wed, 02/23/2005 - 15:05 | reply

Re: Request for clarification

Neither study provides any evidence, or any valid argument, for its conclusion. That is a separate issue from whether the conclusion is true or false.

Unfortunately if we were to "base our ethical judgements about what constitutes humane treatment purely on a 'third-person' understanding of animals' central nervous systems and behavioural repertoires", there would have to be draconian laws about the humane treatment of computers.

by Editor on Wed, 02/23/2005 - 15:24 | reply

Re: Request for clarification

I think you've misunderstood. All I'm saying is that I don't believe there is a 'fact of the matter' about whether (e.g.) fish feel pain - the statement is too vague. It is unverifiable and unfalsifiable, and hence unscientific.

However, I think you're being a wee bit stingy if you really don't think fish have more sophisticated damage alarm/avoidance systems than computers. Isn't it equally if not more appropriate to liken a computer's (more correctly, its operating system's) damage avoidance mechanisms to a fish's immune system as to a fish's pain-behaviour? What this shows, among other things, is that the analogy is too distant to be of much use.

by Neil Fitzgerald on Wed, 02/23/2005 - 16:57 | reply

Copyright © 2006 Setting The World To Rights

Conspiracy Theories In The Mainstream 2

Congressman Maurice Hinchey (D-NY) says that the fake CBS memos were planted by Karl Rove to discredit Dan Rather and divert attention from President Bush's "draft dodging" – says LGF. And they have the transcript and the audio.

Congressman Hinchey says that it is very important for such charges to be made.

If you haven't read our series on conspiracy theories, please do so!

Mon, 02/21/2005 - 01:21 | digg | del.icio.us | permlink

Children's Crusade

The BBC asked young people from various countries to say how they would do things differently to "tackle the environmental problems we are creating today" and change the world. All eight answers that the BBC saw fit to publish had a common theme: government control. Institute even more propaganda campaigns in schools and elsewhere; take up ever more of the population's time and effort in religious rituals such as 'recycling' their garbage or avoiding their cars; rein in production; ban trade; and generally smash capitalism:

The problem with free trade is that there is nothing in it for the environment – the bottom line is entirely monetary...

I think this a job for the government – it shouldn't let free market run wild.

One of the young people, who despite being only 14 is under the impression that she can feel the change in temperature due to global warming, said:

More people have to try to save the environment – but not a lot of people know about it.

This, despite the fact that virtually everyone her age (and most older people too) would already reply to the question exactly as she does. One of the most impressive achievements of the existing environmental 'education' campaign is to have caused this universal, ritual denial of its own tremendous success, and even its own existence.

The young people's objection to the free market is extremely common, but it is nonsense. Money is a means for people to express their preferences, which they arrive at for a combination of reasons of their own choosing. They are free not to buy a product if they think it is sub-standard or manufactured in an unsafe or harmful or immoral way. So it doesn't make much sense to say that the bottom line is money. Money is just a tool for expressing and criticising values.

Aparna Bhasin advocated:

Population control is also something we should look into - it will make everything else much easier to tackle.

In real life, population control policies, like those practiced by China, are code for brutal repression that includes infanticide and forced abortions. So in real life, governmental population control is a terrible evil. It is not a solution to environmental problems. By contrast, in free countries, there is no government population control and no population problem either.

None of the quoted respondents managed to identify the single biggest environmental problem in the world today – socialism. The free market allows people to make choices among different policies according to their best judgement about the issue in question. In a socialist society state functionaries control part of the economy and impose their own favoured policies while someone else is forced to bear the whole cost, no matter what effect those policies have. Thus socialism stifles the criticism that would help to create the knowledge necessary to improve the environment. As a result governments consistently abuse the environment though corruption and ignorance. So to protect the environment we must argue against government interference in the economy.

Sat, 02/26/2005 - 14:24 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Your Socialist Governments are Ruining the World

The problem is not free trade. The problem is not capitalism. The problem is rampant personal consumption with government socialism saying that no one needs to take direct responsibility for cleaning up their own left over mess. The dirty dishes are literally left in the sink waiting for the next government program to make the dirty dishes disappear. Each individual needs to wash their own dishes at the point of consumption. The role of government is not to be chief cook and bottle washer and diaper changer nor is it a proper role of government to take out the trash.

Never trust any government official that calls paper or plastic disposables an environmental choice. Recycling laws which are promoted as public panaceas are a sure sign of creeping socialism. Environmental pollution and degradation has nothing to do with free trade or capitalism and everything to do with individuals generating mountains of trash that someone else other than the consumer, read government program, is supposed to take to the landfill out of sight and down wind.

Turn that into a slogan.

by a reader on Sun, 02/27/2005 - 02:20 | reply

Go out and buy a dishwasher.

Personal consumption is a good thing, self-denial is bad. Any issue would lie with what is consumed, and if any harm is done, not with consumption per se.

You're right about one thing, the government does want to change our diapers.

But where are these mountains of trash?

by Tom Robinson on Sun, 02/27/2005 - 18:57 | reply

Environment and wealth

What the leftist environmental protection advocates fail to recognise is that environmental protection is itself a product of the wealth generating power of free trade. It is a highly expensive luxury which relies on vast sums of money being poured into it and offers very little economic return. Left to its own devices environmental protection makes people poorer and this cost must be offset by a corresponding increase in wealth generation. No wonder that those that shout the loudest about it tend to live in affluent societies. Odd, however, that they tend not to spot this.

by Leigh on Thu, 03/03/2005 - 18:13 | reply

I'm not sure you neocons/libe

I'm not sure you neocons/libertarians/whatever you call yourselves actually know what socialism means. You use it as a catch-all term for any situation whatsoever in which some kind of authority (whether elected or not, whether buying public services or not, whether redistributing wealth or not) collects taxes and then Does Stuff with the money. (Often leading to the barf-inducingly hilarious claim that the United States is itself a socialist nation).

Anyway, if one insists on using the word socialism in this way, then I claim that socialism is necessary in order to prevent environmental problems getting out of control. What alternative is there?

The answer forces itself upon us: If the freedom of private individuals and corporations to spend 100% of their money in whatever way they wish (subject to law (i.e. without causing direct harm to others, unless they freely choose to be harmed)), then the only way for us (in the Western world) to stop contributing to an impending environmental catastrophe is for individuals and corporations to (a) adequately educate themselves about the nature of the catastrophe, and figure out what changes in their own daily lives would have any bearing on it and (b) have the moral scruples to make those changes, even if it means forgoing many of the conveniences that have long been taken for granted, and even others are refusing to change (and possibly enjoying competitive advantages as a direct result).

If you really think private individuals/corporations behave like that (and it looks as if you really do: "They are free not to buy a product if they think it is ... manufactured in an unsafe or harmful or immoral way.") then you're blinded by an ideological delusion nearly as huge as the communist belief that people will work hard out of brotherly love for humanity, even if they personally receive no reward. (In both cases, the ideology claims that peoples' consciences will make them choose X even if their personal interests prefer Y).

(Of course, the usual "Protective Belt" that right-wingers construct against environmental issues is simply to claim that there isn't really a problem. I'm glad to see that, at least in this instance, you haven't taken that route.)

What governments (together with their committees of advisors) have over private individuals/corporations, that makes them better equipped to handle environmental issues, are the following:

(1) They're able to bring about changes on scales sufficiently large to have a real impact (unlike an individual thinking to themselves e.g. "I only have one car, what difference does it make whether it has a catalytic converter?")

(2) Environmental issues tend to involve widely separated causes and effects, such that the people causing the problem may have no awareness of the problem they're causing, and those on the receiving end may have no idea where it's coming from, and even if they did, it would be wholly outside of their power to change things. Example: The widespread use of antibiotics in agriculture leading to antibiotic resistant 'superbugs', causing humans to die from infections that in the past would have been treatable. The following have the power to curtail the use of antibiotics: (a) Farmers (b) Government. Who is better informed? Who has the smaller conflict of interest? Who is more likely to resolve the issue in a such a way as to achieve greater benefit for society as a whole?

OK, rant over.

by Neil Fitzgerald on Thu, 03/17/2005 - 04:34 | reply

Good, Evil And Howard Dean

"This is a struggle of good and evil. And we're the good." (Via LGF.)

No, that was not President Bush contrasting the West with the world's terrorists and tyrants. It was Howard Dean, the new Chairman of the Democratic National Committee, contrasting the left with the right in America.

Yet you can be sure that no one will call Dean Manichaeian, or equate him with the rulers of Iran in torrents of frantic sidetracking such as this. The sophistry that equates right with wrong and then sides eagerly with wrong is ever available and ever attractive, it seems, to those who prefer the glamour of dissent to the effort of engagement with real problems.

Mon, 02/28/2005 - 00:04 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

www.techcentralstation.com

<http://www.techcentralstation.com/022805A.html>

by a reader on Mon, 02/28/2005 - 12:01 | reply

Steven Den Beste Has Posted

Fans of his will want to look here.

How did we know? Macintosh users may want to look here.

Wed, 03/02/2005 - 02:08 | permalink

Alternatively, Macintosh (and Alternatively, Macintosh (and Windows) users could have subscribed to Den Beste's site using his RSS feed.

<http://denbeste.nu/rss.xml>

-Dan

<http://www.danielstrimpel.com>

by a reader on Wed, 03/02/2005 - 02:35 | reply

Re: Alternatively...

No, they couldn't. His RSS feed has not been updated.

by David Deutsch on Wed, 03/02/2005 - 02:44 | reply

I'm sure that Iraqi women are grateful for the opportunity to live under sharia.

by a reader on Sat, 03/05/2005 - 01:53 | reply

Discrimination As Anti-Discrimination

We recently wrote about two cases of secular-religious insanity in education, in which the meanings of 'secular' and 'religious' had been interchanged in the debate on school curricula.

Now we report a similar reversal concerning discrimination and non-discrimination against minorities. This has nothing to do with the paradoxes of 'positive discrimination' which, whatever you may think of its merits, at least says what it is. The following two cases involve a moral reversal, and a betrayal of ostensible values, as profound as those at the conclusion of George Orwell's Animal Farm.

The first is a new EU report on anti-Muslim discrimination, which uses as one of its measures of discrimination whether people 'associate the word "Islam" with ... "oppression of women"'. In other words, anyone who opposes the discrimination against women in Islamic cultures counts as biased, and only those who condone this discrimination so deeply that they do not even associate the two concepts in their minds, are certified as free from bias!

The second is a new plan proposed by the Commission for Racial Equality forcibly to separate black boys from their classmates and give them a different education. Given the history of the fight for racial equality in education, and given who is proposing this wicked and racist plan, the irony is almost palpable.

Yet more evidence that the world is insane.

Mon, 03/07/2005 - 18:39 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Political Correctness Fiddles While The World Burns

Norway's government has taken action to force a change in IKEA's furniture-assembly instructions. The offending instructions consist of diagrams that show only male figures or figures whose sex is unclear, and this has excited many who are obsessed with political correctness. IKEA's defence:

Verdens Gang quoted an IKEA spokeswoman as saying: "We have to take account of cultural factors. In Muslim countries it's problematic to use women in instruction manuals."...

In the game of political correctness, this is an ace, and would normally win the trick. But on this occasion the Norwegian government has a trump:

"This isn't good enough," Prime Minister Kjell Magne Bondevik was quoted on Thursday as telling the daily Verdens Gang. "It's important to promote attitudes for sexual equality, not least in Muslim nations."

We think that it is ridiculous – and yes, under these circumstances perhaps also immoral – to remove images of females from furniture instructions for fear of offending religious prudes. It is a form of immorality that should, in civilised countries in peacetime, be legal. But we are, in principle, open to a related argument that the Norwegian government should be making, namely that there's a war on and certain civil liberties – perhaps even the cherished freedom to publish sexist furniture manuals in order to curry favour with bigots – may need to be curtailed until it is won.

We do find this argument moderately persuasive in the case of the freedom to wear headscarves to state schools in France. But frankly, we are fairly sure that IKEA furniture instructions are going to be a very small part of any strategy to change Islamist attitudes toward women. Hence, the Norwegian government is wasting its time and effort by making all this fuss about furniture instructions when they could be doing something more effective, like perhaps prosecuting Islamist terrorists who live in their midst.

For the manuals, why not use stick figures that are dressed up in burqas?

by invadesoda on Sat, 03/12/2005 - 04:49 | reply

Can good economics be ridiculous?

I don't understand why it's ridiculous or immoral for a seller to remove images of women from their product instructions. Isn't it good for them to use their best market driven strategies, based upon their unique demographics and so forth, to make their business successful? They shouldn't offend their customer base should they? Until this publicity no one minded only male figures in the instructions and some people would mind the women in the figures, so why not do it the way all the customers can handle?

It seems reasonable to me that IKEA's best strategy, considering cost of making product instructions, and the markets they are in, and the attitudes of their customers about men vs women, and so forth could very well be for them to do the instructions the way they have.

by a reader on Sun, 03/13/2005 - 05:50 | reply

female chimps with sticks

I don't care if the diagrams are politically correct or not. This is one case where the end justifies the means. If I can assemble it with my female chimp brain thanks to clear instructions I am happy. Mouthing swedish and banging two sticks together in chimp glee.

by a reader on Sun, 03/13/2005 - 15:20 | reply

Freedoms long established

Freedoms long established should not be changed for light and transient causes. I agree with the World that libertarians tend to be too dogmatic, and don't understand that sometimes certain freedoms have to be compromised to protect freedom in general. But the fact that the World is open to the suggestion that publishing "sexist" manuals ought be outlawed in this time of "war" seems to be pushing the issue over the edge of any reasonable balance. I find the World posts usually quite good and insightful, but a number of objections can be raised to the reasoning followed in the above article:

1. The whole argument is implicitly based on the curious assumption that pictures of men, but no women, making furniture is not only sexist but promotes the subjugation of women. Now, IKEA does not need to defend their choice of pictures. And I would warn against where this can lead to. Freedom of expression precisely means defending the right of people to say things you find wholly objectionable. But if we were to get into this anyway, the World has got it completely backwards. More than 90% of IKEA furniture, I would guess, is in fact put together by men and not by women. Like it or not, despite decades of propaganda, feminism is something that most women find ridiculous, because it's a fantasy ideology (based on the wish for men and women to be the same) which is opposed to the idea of men and women simply doing what they want but rather wants men and women to conform to some kind of forced role-equality. Of course the individualist type of feminism is precisely the opposite and is a good thing, as it stands for freedom of choice and equal rights and respect for men and women. But a fact of reality is, when the IKEA is delivered most women prefer to cook the dinner while the men put together the thing, and most men prefer it that way too. So the manuals as they are are much more realistic than a manual that would depict women putting together the stuff.

2. Ironically I believe the World is completely missing an important point here. I would hypothesize that this issue is not about Islam at all, but is about the West. That is, my guess is that the depiction of males in IKEA's manuals has very little to do with trying to please the Muslim market, but rather has to do with pleasing the Western market. I suspect this is simply an opportunistic claim made by IKEA in an appeal to politically correct Westerners, which backfired. Contrary to the World, as far as I understand it IKEA did not "remove" any female images from their instructions. The fact is that it has always been customary in the West to depict males in these types of instruction booklets. This was done long before there was a significant market in the Muslim world for these products and long before there were any appreciable numbers of Muslims in the West. And so it was, and still is, done not for the benefit of Arab Muslims but for the benefit of the cultural ideas of Westerners - as many in the West also believe putting furniture together is a man's job. I haven't checked the stats but I would guess even now the Muslim market for IKEA is less than 10% of their sales. So if the demand of the Western market was for pictures of females, they would depict women in their manuals. IKEA does not admit they depict men to please Westerners, because such would be seen as sexist and wrong. Their hope was that by shifting the argument to a non-western minority group they would appeal to the politically correct idea that the west is bad and the non-west is good. But of course IKEA miscalculated. A few years ago this would have worked, but things have changed a bit since 9/11 and the feminist political correctness has won from the non-western political correctness.

3. To be sure, in many cases Islamic treatment of women is disrespectful and should be fought against, but surely depicting men rather than women as putting furniture together can hardly be interpreted as disrespectful of women by any stretch of the imagination. Quite the opposite is the case. Putting furniture together is not a particularly fun job, so I'm sure women all over the world will be quite happy if the idea is promoted that their husbands keep doing that job rather than themselves. Men doing hard work for women is not wicked but galant, on par with men giving flowers to their wives, and that's quite the opposite of such evils as Muslim men hitting their wives. And showing books with women putting the stuff together while in reality mostly men are doing that work, is an insult to men. Now if IKEA were publishing pictures of men hitting women, that would be a different thing (why doesn't the World speak out for a ban on all books and movies which depict real violence against women?).

4.It's bad enough that there are people who would want a national identification obligation, erosions of the rule of law and other police state measures all in the name of the war on drugs and terrorism. But despite the fact that those are all bad measures which will do nothing to help the war on terror or crime, at least they are attempts which are supposed to be aimed at the criminals and terrorists. But making laws to force people to depict women doing certain jobs is not even aimed at catching criminals against women. It's based on the far weaker hypothesis that promoting false equality is going to prevent crimes against women. But crimes against women have nothing to do with one's views on whether or not men and women are equal (i.e. equally interested in the job of putting furniture together), but rather it has to do with one's views of whether or not men and women have equal rights, which is something entirely different.

5.The whole idea of a war creating unusual circumstances for freedom is completeley misused here. War circumstances would apply if there were a real war, the kind with tanks and whatnot, going on in Norway. And it would mean things like that for practical purposes you can't have a court case every time a soldier wants to shoot the enemy. It does not mean abolishing freedom of speech, and certainly not cases of freedom of speech which don't promote violence, oppression or defend the actions of terrorists.

6.If any idea of freedom is to remain, then surely it would be the freedom to publish pictures of men in a manual. If you accept that this maybe should be forbidden because there may be some connection between this and supporting Islamic maltreatment or terrorism or other evils, then the door is wide open to just about any suppression of freedom. And that doesn't even require a terrorist problem. One might even argue that any politically incorrect book should be forbidden even in peace time, on the grounds that some man might rape a woman because he thinks women are inferior because he sees a man driving a truck or whatever.

7.If freedom is about anything, then it surely means that people don't have any positive obligations to do altruistic good to the world. Just as people should not be forced to pay for socialist policies helping the poor, so too companies should not be forced to publish politically correct manuals which supposedly would help the emancipation of women (but if fact would do no such thing). The business of business is simply to sell, business is not a vehicle for government cultural propaganda.

8.It is the perfect right of Ikea or any other company to sell their product to anybody (except if we're talking about selling arms to terrorists or whatever). If in Christian countries that means taking the sex scenes out of a movie, then we don't go about forbidding that on the grounds that they are thereby supporting the supression of sexual freedom by Christians. We don't forbid selling washing soap in the west by commercials with women cleaning on the grounds that that's sexist. In the same way we should not be forbidding pictures of men (because that sells better than pictures of women for certain products) on the grounds that that's sexist.

9. What's next? Forbidding TV-series where the nurses are women? Forbidding books where the firemen are men? Forbidding 90% of all human activities or censoring 90% of all the internet on the grounds that one can always make up some indirect connection between some picture or word and some act of violence somewhere?

10. Treating a picture of a man as on the same level as advocating suppression of women in a Mosque sermon is an example of moral equivalence. And if even our most ordinary and simple freedoms are to be abandoned on the most flimsy politically correct superstition, then why do we even fight the Moslim terrorists? Why not simply take over their culture, which is based on the very idea that governments are there to insure that everybody lives wholesome and decent and politically correct lives? We should not give up the fight of freedom versus oppression and replace it by a fight between two different versions of politically correct oppression ("it is immoral for women to put together furniture" versus "it is immoral for women not to put together furniture").

Henry Sturman

by Henry Sturman on Sun, 03/13/2005 - 15:23 | reply

Market-Driven Strategies

Isn't it good for them to use their best market driven strategies, based upon their unique demographics and so forth, to make their business successful? They shouldn't offend their customer base should they?

One cannot tell from economic theory alone whether they should offend some of their customers or not. That is a matter of morality as well as economics.

The fallacy in the above analysis by a reader is that both the policy he advocates (pandering to the bigots) and the one we advocate (defying them) are equally 'market-based'. For a market transaction requires a willing buyer and a willing seller at a given price. Whether the seller will be willing depends, among other things, on the seller's opinion of the morality of the transaction. Hence, one can decide what one's best 'market-based' strategy is only after one has decided issues of right and wrong. One cannot infer that something is right just because someone, with some moral values, would consider it right.

by Editor on Sun, 03/13/2005 - 17:23 | reply

I'm surprised and disturbed (

I'm surprised and disturbed (and offended) that everyone accepts at face value the assertion that the well-established international symbol of a Stick Figure on the instructions in question is a picture of a "man". The Stick Figure is an abstraction and represents all humans; I deeply resent these underhanded efforts to claim it for "men" only.

Seeing as how the Stick Figure is by design intentionally drawn so as to lack genitalia of either or any type (just as it is drawn to leave its race and body type and (dis)ability-level vague), I can't help but wonder why/how people are coming to this conclusion. Could it be, perhaps, because the Stick Figures in question are depicted putting together furniture, which is traditionally considered a "man's" task? For shame, for shame. I cannot think of anything more sexist than to look at Ikea's instruction booklets and decide that its Stick Figures are all "men". The people lodging these complaints obviously haven't risen above gender stereotypes themselves. The irony!

by Blixa on Sun, 03/13/2005 - 17:54 | reply

Morality?

"Whether the seller will be willing depends, among other things, on the seller's opinion of the morality of the transaction. Hence, one can decide what one's best 'market-based' strategy is only after one has decided issues of right and wrong."

Absurdity reaches new heights. The IKEA example is a pointed one in that it points out how easily humans are drawn into debate. A debate about assembly instructions containing figures and diagrams seems absurd in light of the comment about morality preceding 'market-based' strategy.

Considering the sale of bomb making materials to foreign countries would be an example of serious moral questions preceding 'market-based' strategy. The styling of IKEA bookcase assembly instructions are not on the same moral level. Bombing and bookcase building are not usually moral equivalents. Absurd as the minutiae of the IKEA example is, the debate has moral worth in that it helps to challenge our reasoning about what is moral and what is market-based. It is not easily sorted however into what moral questions of right or wrong we might first ask, nor would it seem to be a decision which should be left to the public sphere.

I ask where lies the public harm and where lies the public good?

by a reader on Sun, 03/13/2005 - 19:46 | reply

We Do Not Endorse The Norwegian Government's Intervention

We apologise for not having made it clear in the article that we oppose the Norwegian Government's intervention in this matter.

by Editor on Sun, 03/13/2005 - 20:10 | reply

Copyright © 2007 Setting The World To Rights

Two Hands, One Mouth

“Two hands, one mouth” is an old Libertarian slogan (by the way, can anyone tell us its origin?) that rebuts the myth that immigrants are an economic burden on the societies that they join. It makes the point that human beings in general are a positive resource, creating more wealth than they consume.

Of course politics can change that. An invading army can destroy the territories that it conquers. Some nations are beginning to think that hostile civilians can too. And governments, by instituting welfare-state or other socialist policies, can prevent immigrants from creating wealth and from lifting themselves out of the condition of being alienated parasites.

There was no need for West Germany to spend 1.5 trillion dollars on subsidising and ‘reconstructing’ East Germany after Reunification, thereby severely damaging its own economy and storing up political trouble for the future. On the contrary, the East Germans, after decades of communist repression, were an untapped resource both for themselves and for the world, whose liberation should have enriched both parts of the country and everyone else as well.

Now we see, via Solomon, that the South Koreans are making the same tragic mistake in regard to their own northern compatriots:

The South has been laboring to keep the North afloat for fear of the extreme costs of integrating the North should it collapse.

Meanwhile, the regime they are keeping afloat holds millions in starvation and tyranny, and threatens the world with weapons of mass destruction.

The North Korea crisis is complex and dangerous enough already, without being worsened by tacky economic myths. The South Koreans – and the world – should not be thinking “but how would we support 22 million indigent spongers?” They should be thinking “22 million additional South Koreans! OK, most of them don't know much yet, but they can learn, and most would eagerly work hard for a month in return for a mere colour television. What a boon to the world!”

Values matter

Jews are entitled to automatic citizenship in Israel, but non-Jews are not, and it's essentially impossible for some groups of people to get residency permits in Israel. This is the right policy, because any other policy would undermine the Jewish character of the state. Even a policy which allowed open immigration for non-hostile people would tend to undermine Israel's mission, because there is a tremendous economic incentive to move to Israel which does not carry with it Zionist tendencies.

Similarly, the constitutional orders of America and England depend on having citizens with certain values apart from economic values. There is a large economic incentive to move to America -- but this does not necessarily carry with it a desire to become American. This would be no less true if state subsidies were eliminated.

I'm not sure what the right answer to the problem of immigration is, but I don't think it's at all clear that open immigration is the right policy.

by Woty on Wed, 03/16/2005 - 15:40 | reply

Two hands, one mouth

The observation was made by the economist John Stuart Mill, and quoted here by Henry George in Progress and Poverty -- which, if you haven't read it, or haven't read it lately, I highly recommend to anyone of libertarian bent!

Manifestly the question whether increase of population necessarily tends to reduce wages and cause want, is simply the question whether it tends to reduce the amount of wealth that can be produced by a given amount of labor.

This is what the current doctrine holds. The accepted theory is, that the more that is required from nature the less generously does she respond, so that doubling the application of labor will not double the product; and hence, increase of population must tend to reduce wages and deepen poverty, or, in the phrase of Malthus, must result in vice and misery. To quote the language of John Stuart Mill:

[begin Mill quote]: Nature, not the injustice of society, is the cause of the penalty attached to over-population. An unjust distribution of wealth does not aggravate the evil, but, at most, causes it to be somewhat earlier felt. It is in vain to say that all mouths which the increase of mankind calls into existence bring with them hands. The new mouths require as much food as the old ones, and the hands do not produce as much. If all instruments of production were held in joint property by the whole people, and the produce divided with perfect equality among them, and if in a society thus constituted, industry were as energetic and the produce as ample as at the present time, there would be enough to make all the existing population extremely comfortable; but when that population had doubled itself, as, with existing habits of the people, under such an encouragement, it undoubtedly would in little more than twenty years, what would then be their condition? Unless the arts of production were in the same time improved in an almost unexampled degree, the inferior soils which must be resorted to, and the more laborious and scantily remunerative cultivation which must be employed on the superior soils, to procure food for so much larger a population, would, by an insuperable necessity, render every individual in the community poorer than before. If the population continued to increase at the same rate, a time would soon arrive when no one would have more than mere necessities, and, soon after, a time when no one would have a sufficiency of those, and the further increase of population would be arrested by death."

All this I deny. I assert that the very reverse of these propositions is true. I assert that in any given state of civilization a greater number of people can collectively be better provided for than a smaller. I assert that the injustice of society, not the niggardliness of nature, is the cause of the want and misery which the current theory attributes to overpopulation. I assert that the new mouths which an increasing population calls into existence require no more food than the old ones, while the hands they bring with them can in the natural order of things produce more. I assert that, other things being equal, the greater the population, the greater the comfort which an equitable distribution of wealth would give to each individual. I assert that in a state of equality the natural increase of population would constantly tend to make every individual richer instead of poorer.

source: <http://www.henrygeorge.org/pandp.rtf>

by lvtfan on Mon, 10/16/2006 - 21:38 | reply

Re: Two Hands, One Mouth

The observation was made by the economist John Stuart Mill, and quoted here by Henry George in Progress and Poverty

Thank you!

But it looks as though Mill was quoting it only in order to deny it. Might there have been an earlier source of the idea?

by Editor on Mon, 10/16/2006 - 21:53 | reply

Re: Two Hands, One Mouth

more people -> more specialization -> more effective work, per person or, suppose you can eat for $1000 per year (you can eat for less). even illegal immigrants make quite a bit more than that.

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 10/16/2006 - 22:29 | reply

Capital Investment

Modern capitalist doctrine assumes that in the short-term, but not the long term, wages will fall if there are sudden population increases. The reason real wage suppression does not occur in the long term is that people save and invest a proportion of their income and therefore the stock of capital grows, increasing the productivity of each worker. This offsets decreases in per capita productivity when increases in population temporarily cause more people to have to produce with the same amount of capital equipment.

The rate of growth of the stock of capital depends (holding other factors constant) on both the efficiency and the amount of money investment. Population growth increases the amount of investment. Knowledge growth increases the efficiency of each dollar invested. The amount of knowledge has likely been exponentially increasing, precisely because larger numbers of interconnected populations are freely exchanging ideas.

Ideas, unlike packaged breakfast bars, are not used up after they are traded. They are not consumed, but in fact become (probably exponentially) more powerful in terms of their capacity to generate wealth, the more they are exchanged. Rational exchange increases the truth value of each idea, and each increasingly correct idea is shared amongst all, increasing everyone's "human capital" and therefore efficiency in production.

The bet of most economists is that knowledge growth and consequent productivity growth will continue to increase faster than the population, so per capita real wages will continue to rise.

Rapid population growth can overwhelm economies and sometimes decrease real wages in the short-term, but not in the long-term.

by a reader on Wed, 10/18/2006 - 21:55 | reply

Not Quite Specialization

Population growth may increase specialization, but in doing that it also increases transaction cost. Given a stock of knowledge, there is an efficient amount of specialization such that dividing the production process more finely increases the net cost of production, not decreases it.

If there is a given probability that any given intelligent and rational person will come up with a good idea in a given time period, the larger the population the greater the rate that good ideas will be generated per time and refined by exchange with others throughout the population. Poor ideas will be quickly exposed.

Since it is relatively costless to exchange ideas given the internet and other technologies, the real reason population growth leads to increasing wages is not because of increased specialization, but rather because of the increased rate of knowledge growth and criticism permitted by more people generating, sharing, and criticizing ideas.

Indeed it is possible that technology growth will allow people to be more able to individually produce the goods they want and need. So it is at least conceivable that knowledge growth, fueled by the creativity of large populations in free societies, will lead to more self-sufficiency and less specialization in production.

by a reader on Wed, 10/18/2006 - 22:37 | reply

Copyright © 2007 Setting The World To Rights

EU Turkeys Promise To Be Impartial About Christmas

EU officials are starting a tax funded £5.5 million campaign to "inform" people about the proposed EU Constitution. EU officials promise that it will not be used to promote a yes vote.

There are two possibilities:

- These EU officials are lying; or
- They genuinely think that a vast, unaccountable bureaucracy is capable of dispassionately informing people about a proposal that would greatly increase, and permanently entrench, its power.

Neither possibility bodes well, should these turkeys succeed the referenda happen to yield the affirmative outcome that these paragons of impartiality may or may not want.

Mon, 03/21/2005 - 01:49 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Peanuts

I can't support such foolish propaganda from the EU officials. I also must remark that 5.5 million euros is small pocket change in comparison to the amounts spent by the U.S. officials on administrative propaganda.

A spade is a spade. Propaganda is propaganda.

by a reader on Mon, 03/21/2005 - 16:00 | reply

Turkey?

I'm confused. I thought Turkey wasn't even in the EU yet.

by a reader on Mon, 03/21/2005 - 17:00 | reply

Turkey?

I think the initial reference was to the slang: a person considered inept or undesirable. Or, maybe you were joking - it's so hard to tell nowadays.

by Michael Bacon on Mon, 03/21/2005 - 21:42 | reply

Turkey?

Yes, it was a joke, sorry. It really is hard to tell nowadays.

by a reader on Tue, 03/22/2005 - 22:11 | reply

Copyright © 2007 Setting The World To Rights

The Poverty Of Leftism: Arguments From The Sewers

Readers may be appalled to learn that child poverty in rich countries has actually risen during the last decade.

We, on the other hand, are indifferent to – nay, quietly satisfied with – this development.

That is because poverty has changed. In the 19th and early 20th centuries a substantial proportion of the population lived in conditions that were uncomfortable, painful, degrading and terrifying. Child mortality was high for various reasons such as bad sanitation, malnutrition, and so on. Leftists wanted to do something about this using government power. Their argument prevailed. Sewer systems were built by the government, and did indeed improve sanitation.

Subsequently, people became less poor and child mortality declined. This was only partly due to the presence of sewers. Nutrition, working and living conditions, clothing, literacy and so on were all improved primarily by improving technology for which market forces were almost entirely responsible.

Nevertheless, Leftists were flushed with success.

They managed to make a case for more and more state intervention in the economy over the following century or more, deriving their argument from the sewers. Unfortunately, the state never really had another success on the scale they had achieved with the sewage system, while on the other hand they caused many collective disasters. For example, the welfare state herded poor people into tower blocks containing hundreds of flats that were so badly designed that they rapidly became uninhabitable. Criminals could easily cover the single entrance or lurk in the elevators and so used a tower block's design against its inhabitants. As economists like Hayek pointed out, the state was chronically prone to wasting vast resources on such mistakes because it is relatively unaccountable compared to institutions on the market.

Leftists were not daunted by the total crashing failure of their world view, and the fact that their entire raison d'etre had disappeared along with the poverty that they had bemoaned. They simply redefined the word poverty. They set up a tradition of redefining it in such a way that it would last for ever.

Hence the definition of child poverty given in the UNICEF report:

Hence the definition of child poverty used in this report and widely accepted by policy-makers in many OECD countries: a child is to be considered poor if the income available to that child, assuming a fair distribution of resources within the family and making allowances for family size and composition, is less than half the median income available to a child growing up in that society.

This new definition of poverty has no moral significance. It has nothing to do with relieving suffering, only with justifying continued Leftism. It is arbitrary and ridiculous. It is economic nonsense: according to it, if Bill Gates, Steve Jobs, and a dozen other billionaires and their entire companies, were to move to Belgium, child poverty in Belgium would by definition shoot up drastically, even though every last person in the country would be better off as a result. That is, in effect, what has happened to cause the scare headline with which we began.

Underlying these flaws in the prevailing definition of poverty is the inescapable fact that there is no way to make people systematically better off simply by shuffling money around by force. The creativity of individuals tempered by the criticism of the market can produce ideas and inventions that will make the world a better place. UNICEF's beloved socialist bureaucracy, spiteful levelling and pointless bean counting cannot do this and should, at most, confine itself to the sewers from whence it came.

Sun, 03/27/2005 - 04:25 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Average and median

It's clear from the second paragraph on that UNICEF web site you link to that UNICEF does not know the difference between an average and a median. This does not bode well for - well, anything, really.

by a reader on Sun, 03/27/2005 - 05:57 | reply

The End of Poverty

All formulaic poverty indicators based on relative incomes are terminally flawed.

I propose instead a basic refinement to the present formulas: the Swarzenagger Dumbness Equation. The SDE states that in theory as well as in widely observed practice Sustainable Poverty will always equal Total Adult Dumbness divided by Population ($SP = TAD/P$).

Difficult as the TAD variable is to measure in the laboratory of world affairs, the SDE dumbness equation is a lasting indicator of true poverty since it is obvious causally that no peoples can long succeed if their adults are creatively impoverished. Societal dumbness unfortunately is a self-sustaining principle until it is no longer viable.

Hence, to ultimately end poverty in free societies, remove all formulaic poverty indicators and replace them with praxis: the infinite variable of applied Human Creativity Factor (HCF) which fortunately is very simple math.

Overall mental wealth is not only infinitely powerful. It is always also reducible to the power of one. Fostering mental wealth is equivalent to ending poverty, one person at a time.

Practical economics. Practical math.

Few economists and no political hacks need apply.

by a reader on Sun, 03/27/2005 - 14:10 | reply

Averages

Bryan Caplan recently offered some good examples of how deceptive averages can be.

Gil

by Gil on Mon, 03/28/2005 - 07:50 | reply

Median

umm since they say poverty is less than half of median, if Bill Gates moves somewhere it doesn't change anything. Bring whole companies and ... well might go up a little but not much.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Fri, 04/01/2005 - 06:18 | reply

Relative Poverty

...and if they incinerated the assets of the rich, then poverty (in the contemporary Leftist definition) would be slashed. One frequently gets the impression that such a measure would not be entirely unwelcome to egalitarians....

by Paul on Tue, 04/01/2008 - 17:37 | reply

home | archives | polls | search

Copyright © 2008 Setting The World To Rights

Conspiracy Theories – 5: Paranoia As Faith

For the first four instalments of this series, see [here.]

The Soviet dictator Josef Stalin was notorious for his all-encompassing paranoia. And yet, as Alexander Solzhenitsyn pointed out in his novel The First Circle, even Stalin was not entirely lacking in the capacity to trust:

Distrust of people was the dominating characteristic of Joseph Djugashvili [Stalin]; it was his only philosophy of life. He had not trusted his own mother; neither had he trusted God, before whom as a young man he had bowed down in His temple. He had not trusted his fellow Party members, especially those with the gift of eloquence. He had not trusted his comrades in exile. He did not trust the peasants to sow their grain or harvest their wheat unless he forced them to do it and watched over them. He did not trust the workers to work unless he laid down their production targets. He did not trust the intellectuals to help the cause rather than to harm it. He did not trust the soldiers and the generals to fight without penal battalions and field security squads. He had never trusted his relatives, his wives or his mistresses. He had not even trusted his children. And how right he had been!

In all his long, suspicion-ridden life he had only trusted one man. That man had shown the whole world that he knew his own mind, knew whom it was expedient to like and whom to hate; and he had always known when to turn round and offer the hand of friendship to those who had been his enemies.

This man, whom Stalin had trusted, was Adolf Hitler.

And so, when Hitler suddenly invaded the Soviet Union, betraying Stalin's trust and their non-aggression treaty (including all the nasty little secret clauses under which they had plotted jointly to enslave Eastern Europe), Stalin blindly and fanatically refused to believe Hitler was going to attack and even after the Nazi assault began still refused to believe that Hitler had ordered the offensive.

[Harrison E. Salisbury, emphases in original.]

Stalin also refused to believe his own spies, such as the astonishing Richard Sorge, who had sent specific and timely warnings of Hitler's plans, complete with smoking-gun evidence in the form of photographs of diplomatic telegrams.

Stalin nevertheless preferred to believe Hitler.

Stalin's island of gullibility in his ocean of paranoia is not exceptional – in fact, it is the rule. For instance, conspiracy theorists today prefer to believe that the likes of Saddam and Osama and Arafat tell the truth while Blair and Bush and Sharon lie. For, despite Solzhenitsyn's understandable mockery, what Stalin trusted uncritically was not Hitler, it was his own explanation (or rather, his own conspiracy-theoretic non-explanation) of what makes the world tick. Hitler was a natural beneficiary though, because he shared the same explanation. And it was Stalin's blind faith in this false world view, his inability to modify it in response to new information, that betrayed him. That is why it is not really very surprising that a person for whose “only philosophy of life” was distrust, came to lay himself wide open to the biggest betrayal of all time.

Paranoids, cynics and conspiracy theorists think of themselves as the most sceptical, the least gullible of the human race, and hence also as the most secure against disappointment. “If you're a pessimist,” the saying goes, “at least you'll never be disappointed”. But that could hardly be more false. Just look at the world of disappointment that Hitler let himself in for when he deduced, from the depths of his cynicism, that Britain was all talk and would never fight. Just look how heartbroken all the cynics and pessimists on today's political scene are whenever things go well in Iraq or Afghanistan.

In reality, such people are not the least gullible in the world but the most. For their approach to understanding the complex and frightening world of human affairs is not characterised by the countless possible explanations that they have vowed to reject, but by the single conspiracy-theoretic mode of explanation that they have vowed to believe regardless of all evidence or experience or argument to the contrary. This is not scepticism in the rational sense of the word, it is faith. They have chosen to put blind faith in their conspiracy theories. But the world punishes blind faith. Tyrants in general tend to be paranoid, yet nevertheless, they nearly always end up disappointed as well. Stalin was relatively lucky in his disappointment: most of them die of it.

Part 6

Fri, 04/01/2005 - 14:14 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

ideology vs. conspiracy

I agree with this post. But I wonder what the relationship between conspiracy theory and ideology is. As written here, any theory can be turned into an ideology, and any ideology can be turned into a theory. Like conspiracy theories, a major selling point of ideologies is their apparent simplicity in making sense of complex phenomena. You have declared a war on conspiracy theories. Does this mean a war on ideology in general? Or does ideology have a legitimate place in the world of ideas that isn't going away?

by Dan Strimpel on Fri, 04/01/2005 - 17:58 | reply

Conspiracy of Ideology

Excellent.

Strimpel's question also is of note.

Ideology contains within it a fertile medium for growing bad ideas. The fertile medium is the ground of fixed unquestioned first principles. The seeds of conspiracy theory sprout in the manure of these dogmas.

by a reader on Sun, 04/03/2005 - 14:23 | reply

Conspiracies are elementary-- Tabloid BS--Paradise

It is elementary... Conspiracy Theories are just a quick way to make people question a particular person or party. If someone wants to find fault with a particular person or party to turn others against them, they think of ways they are trying to harm everyone... That is how most gossip starts in high school, elementary school, work places etc.... Democrats want to find fault with the Republicans... It is that simple.. But think about it, if Clinton had been elected, I am sure we, Republicans could somehow blame Clinton for the 911 attacks... perhaps linked to Monica Lewinsky too! Perhaps Hilary and Monica were having an affair and had to cover it up... Believe me.. If we tried hard enough.. we COULD link them somehow.. It is all Tabloid BS to me..

by gadarInbabe on Sat, 08/20/2005 - 22:55 | reply

wow, YOU are CRAZY!

do you understand that it is the MAINSTREAM that are the victims of a "conspiracy theory", not those you accuse?

the MAINSTREAM believe that:

- osama bin laden did 9-11
- he did so because "he didn't like our way of life"
- iraq was involved somehow
- nineteen hijackers fooled our trillion dollar defenses
- the buildings collapsed because jets hit them
- etc etc etc

all because Time magazine, the New York Times, CNN, ABC, NBC, CBS, FOX etc told them so and never told them anything different!

THAT is a CONSPIRACY THEORY. And the people who cling fervently to that theory are CONSPIRACY THEORISTS. That means most people. As in "most people have been duped by the theory that bin Laden did it".

It is only the minority who have done a little bit of their own research and realize the lies of the official media and government and see how they've scurried to cover up as much as possible who are NOT beholden to a fixed view of what happened. It is we who think for ourselves.

GWB's grandfather Prescott Bush substantially funded Hitler from 1924-1941. Karl Rove's grandfather was a Nazi engineer. Arnold Schwarzenegger's dad was an Austrian SS man. It is probably not a good idea for conservatives like you to start bringing up the Nazis in order to buttress your arguments.

by a reader on Sat, 12/03/2005 - 18:18 | reply

Put your theory on the table

I'd like the previous poster to explain to me what actually happened on the day of 9 / 11. Not a million reasons for why the widely believed theory is a conspiracy but what actually happened.

In particular I'd like to know about the passengers on all four flights, where are they now or how did they die? I'd also like to know about the 19 hijackers, did they exist and were they on the planes, did they in fact hijack it? I'd also like to know how their training was paid for and why they made suicide videos in Afghanistan explaining their reasons for the attack. If you can manage all that you can round it off with why Al Qaeda has now accepted responsibility for the attack.

You could also go for who was behind the attack on the USS Cole and the East Africa embassy bombings if you're feeling really bold.

by RK on Thu, 06/29/2006 - 13:41 | reply

Vote Labour!

None of us has ever voted Labour before. Until very recently, we would have considered our doing so at the forthcoming election to be as unlikely as that we might endorse spoon-bending, or claim to have been abducted by extraterrestrials. Moreover, we remain desperately opposed to core Labour themes such as greater European integration, higher taxes, the destruction of valuable traditions (most recently, the abolition of the double-jeopardy rule), and ever-increasing bureaucratic intervention in every aspect of British life.

Yet despite all that, we want to do everything we can to return Tony Blair to office at the forthcoming election. In most constituencies, this will entail voting Labour, so that is what we urge our British readers to do.

The reason is, of course, the war. Faced with that challenge, Tony Blair spectacularly found his moral compass. Michael Howard shamefully lost his – and the Conservative Party stands willingly behind him. And of course the Liberal Democrats' stance was, and remains, utterly despicable.

There might be an argument for protest-voting for a fringe party, such as perhaps the UK Independence Party. But such a protest would be meaningless under the present circumstances, where there are overwhelmingly important foreign-policy and defence issues. One small comfort is that we shall get a separate chance to vote against Blair on the issues of the Euro and the European Constitution.

So, more precisely, our advice is: vote for Blair's foreign and defence policies. If your local Labour candidate is a Blair loyalist, the choice is easy: vote for him or her. (You can easily discover such information on the web.) If the Labour candidate is a Saddam supporter and the Conservative candidate approves of Blair's handling of the war, the choice is more complicated: you might then want to vote Conservative, because you would not want to have voted for an MP who, when Blair retires, will support an idiotarian socialist for Prime Minister. Also, where applicable, it is important to vote tactically to keep the Liberal Democrats from making any gains: more than anything else, large gains by them will be interpreted as a vote for the legitimacy of Saddam's regime and the world's remaining fear regimes.

Sat, 04/09/2005 - 13:42 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Once again...

the editors of "The World" sacrifice all of their values to the god of war.

by a reader on Sun, 04/10/2005 - 00:40 | reply

Re: Once again...

We shall sing our answer:

(Tune here.)

When this lousy war is over
We'll go back to normalcy:
No more voting for New Labour,
Oh how happy we shall be!
Every nation will start learning
How to trade instead of kill;
We won't tell your guilty secret:
They were freed against your will.

When this lousy war is over
We will blog of cows and trees.
No more threats to chop our heads off,
No more fear societies.
You'll be welcome then to join us,
But you'll hang your head in shame:
All the world was freed from tyrants
But it wasn't in your name.

(Original lyrics here.)

by Editor on Sun, 04/10/2005 - 14:45 | reply

Should be:

As He died to make men holy, let us die to make men free;

While God is marching on.

Glory! Glory! Hallelujah! Glory! Glory! Hallelujah!

Glory! Glory! Hallelujah! While God is marching on.

by a reader on Sun, 04/10/2005 - 21:07 | reply

Kickass song, Editor. - El

Kickass song, Editor.

- Elliot

misalignment of truth compass

Quoting the 'permalink'

"The reason is, of course, the war. Faced with that challenge, Tony Blair spectacularly found his moral compass. Michael Howard shamefully lost his.."

The coalition invaded Iraq in March 2003. Michael Howard became leader of the Conservative party in November 2003- a full seven months after the invasion. In March 2003, of course, Iain Duncan Smith was the head of the Conservative Party. Mr Duncan Smith, a former army Major, was fully behind Blair's proposed invasion of Iraq. This is a quote from his 2002 response to Blair's statement on Iraq;

'The only question remaining is whether he has the motive to strike against Britain - I believe it is fair to assume he would.' -Iain Duncan Smith.

Therefore, in response to the above claim of Howard losing his 'moral compass' when faced with 'that challenge' I refute it on two grounds: 1) Howard was not leader of the opposition then and 2) Duncan Smith, who was, did not oppose the invasion.

For the above stated reason, among others, the permalink statement is rhetorical nonsense.

Kieren.

Re: misalignment of truth compass

The moral challenge was not faced only by party leaders. Nor did it end with the invasion of Iraq. Nor has Michael Howard's loss of moral compass ever manifested itself (as the Liberal Democrats' has throughout) as explicit opposition to the liberation of Iraq: on the contrary, he continues to support the liberation and British military involvement in Iraq. (Britain can be proud that it is the only democracy in the world in which both the government and the main opposition party are in favour of such actions – though not too proud, since most of the population are opposed.)

We have described some of the forms it has taken here and here. Howard has lost no opportunity to jump onto the populist and conspiracy-theoretic Blair lied bandwagon, in order to gain credit with the anti-liberation constituency who want to believe anything that will undermine the liberation policy. Howard was once a prominent member of the Atlanticist faction of the Conservative Party. He has now gone so far in the opposite direction as to have become the first Conservative leader for many decades (since Eden?) to be persona non grata at the White House. It is not because of any policy differences that Bush's people have decided that they can't be bothered with Howard any more. It is his cynical, bombastic posturing about the war, which is the external sign that despite his powerful intellect and enormous knowledge and experience, there is no one at home there, morally.

by Editor on Tue, 04/12/2005 - 20:33 | reply

Copyright © 2007 Setting The World To Rights

Not A Great Man

The phenomenon of the mass media praising the recently deceased Pope as an exemplar or demigod is almost as inappropriate as the equivalent frenzy that followed the death of Princess Diana. Yes, the Pope was an opponent of communism – though not in fact an especially significant one. Yes, he deserves credit for taking a stand against antisemitism within his Church – though he did not hesitate to elevate several notorious antisemites to sainthood, and utterly failed to bear witness when President Assad, in his presence, resurrected ancient antisemitic blood libels and hailed the Pope as a fellow enemy of The Jews. Perhaps his most praiseworthy attribute (which is notably under-recognised, even in the current festival of appreciation for him), was his firm defence of the proposition that morality is not arbitrary or relative but objective – though even this great and rare virtue is offset by the embarrassing fact that his actual grasp of right and wrong over many issues of current controversy was ludicrously shaky compared with, say, the average person in an American street.

For as Christopher Hitchens points out, Pope John-Paul II opposed contraception that would have saved millions from AIDS, the Iraq war that liberated millions from tyranny, and stem cell research that would advance medical science and save lives, and was likewise a dogmatic and implacable opponent of much that would improve the human condition as well as his own Church. Many people with more deference than sense will continue to claim that he was a moral giant for some time to come, and that is a large part of the Catholic Church's problem. Millions of people follow its advice uncritically because they regard it as a supernaturally certified moral authority. This has given the Catholic Church enormous power but little capacity to improve, and almost none of the checks and balances that could offset the tendency of that power to corrupt.

Sat, 04/16/2005 - 17:47 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

On the other hand

In order to be a pope, a person must obviously be very devoutly catholic. If you want to end the discussion before it even begins by saying "catholicism is bad, therefore the pope is bad", then theres nothing more to say. On the other hand, I think its more interesting to analyse how good this pope was given that he had to be a devout catholic. In other words, how successful was he at balancing secular criticism of church doctrines (not allowing female priests, extreme pro-life views, etc.) while staying true to traditional catholic ideals (which, as pope, he is absolutely required to do). To say simply "the pope ought to be secular" is both unhelpful and uninteresting.

Also, I think the pope's main positive contribution to the world, rather than his philosophical position of moral objectivity, is the "strong spiritual medicine" he is able to dole out to people living in unimaginable poverty and squalor. Such people need a simplistic ideology that makes them feel that it is worthwhile to struggle on, particularly if they live in a failed state which shows no concern for their welfare. The Catholic church, led by the pope, is able to step in to dole out this spritual medicine (as well as often doling out actual medicine where other aid groups cannot), giving people a basic hope and also dissuading them from violence. John Paul seems to have been good at this.

<http://www.danielstrimpel.com>

by Daniel on Sat, 04/16/2005 - 19:30 | reply

The Iraq war liberated millions from tyranny in the same sense that World War Two liberated millions from communism. And World War One made the world safe for democracy.

by a reader on Sat, 04/16/2005 - 23:44 | reply

Condoms

For as Christopher Hitchens points out, Pope John-Paul II opposed contraception that would have saved millions from AIDS,

This endlessly repeated claim is utter nonsense. JP II espoused the classic catholic view that sex should be limited within marriage and that contraception should not be used. Now I personally think this is silly advice, but following this advice most definitely does not cause AIDS. In fact following it is a very good way of preventing AIDS. Since if you only sleep with the same partner within marriage you are very unlikely to contract AIDS, even if you don't use condoms, which would be logical anyway whatever your religion during at least some period of time if you want to have babies, which most married couples do in fact want. The only way to construe the Pope's position on sex and condoms to cause millions of AIDS deaths is to say that that will happen if people follow only one part of his advice (no condoms) but not the other (no sex outside or marriage). But that's just as absurd as saying that if someone advises getting drunk every saturday evening and advises against driving cars at any time that he's causing millions of deaths on the grounds that if people do indeed get drunk but don't refrain from driving when they're drunk they're relatively likely to have deadly accidents.

Now if anybody can come up with a quotation from the pope where he says that if people sin against the no-sex-outside-of-marriage rule then they should still be sure to commit their adultery without condoms, then it's a different story.

In the above linked article Hitchens also says:

By the time the church apologizes for saying that condoms are worse than AIDS,

OK, if it's true that the church ever said that condoms are worse than AIDS, I agree that's very bad. But I don't believe it and let him give his source for that statement.

Henry Sturman

by Henry Sturman on Sun, 04/17/2005 - 00:40 | reply

Re: Condoms

Henry Sturman:

Correct me if I'm wrong here but it seems to me that there's a flaw in that defence of the Pope. It's not the case that the Pope is merely giving advice on how to have sex, so that people who choose to obey half of it and not the other half have only themselves to blame. He is giving advice (or, as devout Catholics see it, commands) to governments on what laws to pass, and to electors on what laws to vote for. That means he is ordering people to interfere by force in the sexual behaviour of others. Some of those others die as a result. OK, they could avoid dying if they too obeyed the Pope's commands in full, but surely that is not a defence, is it?

by David Deutsch on Sun, 04/17/2005 - 11:35 | reply

Pope guilty

If the Pope said to get drunk every saturday night, he would indeed be guilty of many car accidents, no matter how opposed he was to cars at all. Pretending that advising mass drinking will not mean drunk driving, or pretending advising no condom won't mean unprotected sex, is such blatant willful blindness that he is quite culpable anyway.

take a population of unmarried people who he's told to be abstinent, and who have all reconciled this advice with their lives, and most are not abstinent. now have him say no condoms, and have half of them listen. he is totally guilty. advice has consequences, quite apart from the entire set of his intentions.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Sun, 04/17/2005 - 21:54 | reply

Not a great man

"Many people with more deference than sense will continue to claim that he was a moral giant for some time to come..."

While the president of the U.S. says that attending the pope's funeral was a highlight of his administration so far; an incongruous comment perhaps from a non-catholic, despite good seats.

He must have based that on something, the Pope's opposition to condoms, or the Pope's opposition to the war in Iraq?

Or, deference, it was probably deference.

by a reader on Mon, 04/18/2005 - 03:34 | reply

Re: The Iraq war liberated millions from tyranny

A reader thinks that

The Iraq war liberated millions from tyranny in the same sense that World War Two liberated millions from communism. And World War One made the world safe for democracy.

To readers who think it didn't matter who won World War 1, we recommend these articles by Gary Sheffield and John J. Reilly.

To readers who think that it did not matter whether Iraq was liberated (or doubt that it was) we recommend Ali's thoughts on the second anniversary of the liberation.

Readers who think it did not matter who won World War 2, should ask themselves why a Soviet state controlling Eastern Europe was a worse outcome than a Nazi state in control of the whole of Europe. Moreover, if the Allies had stood up to Hitler earlier, neither of those would have been a likely outcome. World War 2 really is a bad case to cite if one wants to argue against a willingness to go to war to preserve freedom.

by Editor on Mon, 04/18/2005 - 05:58 | reply

re: "would have saved million

re: "would have saved millions from AIDS", it seems appropriate to remind that AIDS is diagnosed differently in Africa than elsewhere and as a result not everyone who we count as having "died of AIDS" in Africa may have done so as a result of having unprotected sex.

I'll grant that probably doesn't substantially alter the larger point you/Hitchens are trying to make though. As Elliott says, unprotected sex (and whatever ill effects it causes) was a foreseeable result of his advice.

re: "opposed the Iraq war", are we really certain that he did? I know, I know, the News has repeatedly told me that he Strenuously Opposed Bush's Iraq War, but in reality I never saw clear evidence that he (as opposed to "The Vatican") issued anything other than the boilerplate (and vague) fence-straddling peace-rhetoric you'd expect of a Pope, on that subject. If I'm wrong lemme know.

Speaking of things you'd expect of a Pope, that hints at the larger issue here. I echo the first commenter above: many of the complaints lodged here are inevitable given that he was a Pope. It is unreasonable to have expected him to adopt positions that a Pope could never feasibly adopt. It would be much more interesting to analyze how he did in his role given that he was a Pope than to make the broad banal observation that The Pope was not a secular humanist liberal.

by Blixa on Mon, 04/18/2005 - 21:42 | reply

Re: Re: The Iraq war liberated millions from tyranny

To the editor that thinks the results of WWI were good. Was the introduction of communism into Russia good? Was the "democratization" of Germany and the subsequent election of Hitler good?

To the editor that thinks Iraq has been liberated I refer you to these links <http://riverbendblog.blogspot.com/> <http://www.sistani.org/> <http://www.timesonline.co.uk/article/0,,7374-1537512,00.html>

The editor and readers who think the results of WWII were good should ask themselves why Communist regimes in Europe and Asia were better than a Nazi and fascist regimes controlling Europe and a Japanese regime controlling Asia. BTW, didn't Britain and France declare war in defence of Poland? Was Poland liberated after the war? Did the Polish fighters return home and live out their remaining years in peace, freedom and prosperity? The allies expelled the Nazis from Tunisia, Morocco, Algeria, Libya and Egypt. Did they become free and prosperous nations? Of course, allies liberated France. And France became, and remains to this day, our staunchest ally.

by a reader on Tue, 04/19/2005 - 06:45 | reply

Re: condoms

David Deutsch responded to my previous post:

Correct me if I'm wrong here but it seems to me that there's a flaw in that defence of the Pope. It's not the case that the Pope is merely giving advice on how to have sex, so that people who choose to obey half of it and not the other half have only themselves to blame. He is giving advice (or, as devout Catholics see it, commands) to governments on what laws to pass, and to electors on what laws to vote for. That means he is ordering people to interfere by force in the sexual behaviour of others. Some of those others die as a result. OK, they could avoid dying if they too obeyed the Pope's commands in full, but surely that is not a defence, is it?

You are right if the Pope has been doing things such as advising nations to enact laws to forbid the sale of condoms. I am not aware though that he did that, but would be interested in a source. Certainly if that were the case, and if it were the case that there are countries that actually implemented that advice (which to my knowledge is not so), then I agree the Pope would be responsible for AIDS deaths. I would maintain though that my critique would still be correct within the context in which it was given. The above world article and the Hitchens article do not mention the Pope's advice concerning law. They mention only that he opposes contraception, which I took to mean advises people against using them.

Henry Sturman

by Henry Sturman on Tue, 04/19/2005 - 09:13 | reply

Elliot, Wouldn't your crit

Elliot,

Wouldn't your criticism of the Pope make it difficult for anyone to offer any advice with more than one part? And if advice must be very simple, won't we pass up opportunities for useful change?

SUVs may make their owners safer, but their popularity is likely to make all other road users less safe because they have greater mass and so cannot stop quickly and hit harder. If we cannot give advice like, "Buy an SUV, but drive carefully," I suppose we will have to support a static mix of vehicles or further safety regulations.

by romr on Tue, 04/19/2005 - 17:54 | reply

laws

Following Henry's post above, I would imagine that the only "laws" David could possibly be speaking about are "laws" such as: Whether to distribute condoms to people for free (or at a subsidized cost), or: Whether to allow the UN or similar outside agency to do so. When and where the answer is "no", and that answer is plausibly informed by Catholic doctrine, I gather this is what David would refer to as the Pope "ordering people to interfere by force in the sexual behaviour of others".

I'm struck by how weak that criticism really is, if that's all it amounts to. (If that's not all it amounts to, let me know.) Is Failing To Buy Someone A Condom (or Not Allowing Outsiders To Bring Someone A Condom) really the same as "interfering by force in their sexual behavior"? One could certainly criticize this position, but there's a lot less to the criticism than meets the eye.

Especially since this insidious Papal Anti-Condom Effect we all deplore so much, if/where it's operative, can really only be operative at the state/distribution/subsidy level anyway. Sometimes it seems as if we are meant to believe that the Effect also operates at the individual choice level, but I find that highly dubious to begin with. It stretches the imagination to envision a Catholic Third Worlder who is on the verge of committing the sin of fornication that is condemned by the Pope, and yet decides that when sinning in this manner he mustn't use a condom because, why, the Pope said it was a sin. At the very least, if moralistic anti-condom sentiment does influence any people in this (bizarre) way I would imagine it would have to be part of a larger and more complex, deeply-rooted social taboo/pattern against condom use, and is not dictated solely by the word of one guy in the Vatican, a notion which seems ridiculously simplistic and caricaturesque.

by Blixa on Tue, 04/19/2005 - 18:59 | reply

The Catholic Church teaches a

The Catholic Church teaches abstinence and celibacy to its followers (the majority of which are from the developing world) and argues, rightly, that if these were practiced the AIDS pandemic would not exist. But abstinence and celibacy are not the human condition. By promulgating an extreme and unrealistic ideology, as well as the utter falsehood that HIV particles can pass through latex condoms, the Catholic Church must have contributed to the AIDS pandemic. It is almost not worth arguing with anyone so obtuse as to not agree with this.

Kieren

by a reader on Tue, 04/19/2005 - 21:20 | reply

multi part advice

giving multi part advice where one part is very bad without the rest, is difficult. you must be extra careful.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 04/20/2005 - 05:14 | reply

The Pope and the Iraq War

Blixa,

I think that these links make the Pope's anti-Iraq-war position pretty clear.

Gil

by Gil on Wed, 04/20/2005 - 16:09 | reply

Indeed. Thanks,

Indeed. Thanks,

by Blixa on Wed, 04/20/2005 - 18:01 | reply

Re: The Pope and the Iraq War

Gil and Blixa:

That article in The Independent says "John Paul has said there is no legal or moral justification for military action". For what it's worth, I recently saw a Catholic pro-war blogger categorically deny that the Pope ever said this. I'm afraid I can't locate the link now, but I think he was saying that the press simply made it up, and that in fact the Pope always confined himself to generalised statements that did not specifically take a position on whether Iraq should be liberated. If you search for that phrase, you'll see countless references to it, but no actual quotes.

Having said that, I have to say that your first reference is quite hard to interpret as not taking a position.

I guess, with sufficient faith, one could do it, though.

by David Deutsch on Wed, 04/20/2005 - 20:11 | reply

Re: The Catholic Church teaches a

By promulgating an extreme and unrealistic ideology, as well as the utter falsehood that HIV particles can pass through latex condoms, the Catholic Church must have contributed to the AIDS pandemic.

It is in fact true that HIV particles can pass through latex condoms (when they break). The failure rate of condoms is between 1 and 10%.

Henry Sturman

by Henry Sturman on Wed, 04/20/2005 - 20:55 | reply

"Legal or Moral Justification"

According to this, it was actually top Vatican officials, and not the Pope himself, who said that a preventive US-led attack would have no legal or moral justification.

I guess it depends on whether or not you believe that top Vatican officials' speak for the Pope or not. I don't think he contradicted this particular sentiment.

Gil

by Gil on Thu, 04/21/2005 - 15:44 | reply

Hmm. Now I'm confused again.

Hmm. Now I'm confused again. Whatever the source of the "no justification" sentiment, in any event, Gil's first link alone had already convinced me that I stood corrected. "NO TO WAR", in a speech given by the Pope himself, and referencing Iraq specifically and almost exclusively, seemed pretty unequivocal. :) Although I admit that the more I turn over and over the phrasing of the passage in question the more it seems to crumble away to nothingness in my hands. I think it's enough to say that even if it was, as I had heard, lesser officials who had the largest role in crafting the Vatican Iraq war position, the Pope did nothing significant to dispel the idea that they spoke for him as well.

by Blixa on Thu, 04/21/2005 - 21:37 | reply

re: Pope and Iraq War, it is re: Pope and Iraq War, it is plain and simple to me: the Vatican is headed by the Pope. Of course, like any other political entity there are different people responsible for making the announcements etc. than the Pope himself, but if there is an official statement made by the Vatican regarding any issue, it is natural to assume it reflects Pope's personal stance. If it was otherwise he had to make that clear, just like any other head of state/political part/etc has to.

re: Pope and Aids, the more important issue is that he could greatly boost the prevention efforts by speaking in favour of condoms. The fact that he did not, and that numerous examples to the exact opposite are attached to the his and the Vatican's stance regarding AIDS is a liability.

I don't think that one should talk about the Pope given that he was "the Pope," so as to justify what he did and said or not. Well, what is a "Pope" anyway? What does a Pope have to do, being a "Pope"? That is the crux of the debate here, and hopefully the answers to these questions change during the time and converge to a more humanistic limit.

--Babak

by a reader on Sat, 04/23/2005 - 03:03 | reply

static

The Pope commands a large amount of power and you don't like how that one used it. You wish that he had done Y instead of X. But the Pope's authority is all "moral". So, question: If the Pope had indeed done Y would he still have had the same power necessary to achieve the results you imagine Y having achieved if done by someone with that power?

To assume so is a static analysis that is surely incorrect. This is why it "makes sense" to evaluate how a Pope did given that he was a Pope. It is all well and good to fantasize about there either being no Pope or the Pope being some other kind of office. But reality is reality.

p.s. I still can't for the life of me envision this bizarre Third-world fornicator who when fornicating against the command of the Pope decided not to use a condom based on the pivotal say-so of the Pope. I am not convinced that any such people exist, in fact, let alone millions of them.

by Blixa on Sun, 04/24/2005 - 17:53 | reply

3rd world fornicator

blixa,

imagine poor town in africa. there is some kind of official or chief, who makes various policies. public opinion is against both sex outside marriage and against condoms, and the pope is partly to thank for this. so the guy makes public policies against condoms. thus they are harder to get. banned sex is also harder to get. so anyway, many people want sex and get it anyway, but many of them find condoms too inconvenient to get under these circumstances, and don't. (this inconvenience includes lack of education about why to wear them, etc, so the person may not realise he should seek them out, as well as them actually being difficult to physically get). thus both of the Pope's views, together, cause more sex without condoms.

btw another arg:

take condoms away from half of ppl. take sex away from half of people. but don't make them all the same people. more unprotected sex. the point is if the Pope's policies don't have 100% success rate, and they don't always both succeed or both fail with a single person... (this is realistic, in that there would be some people who still have access to condoms but don't want sex, and others who want sex but no easy condom access)

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 04/25/2005 - 04:15 | reply

3rd world fornicator

He might not be choosing. He might not be obeying the Pope. He might not know what he's risking because it's against the law for teachers to tell him. His parents might not know either, or might not tell him because they are Catholic. Or he might not have parents. He might not be Catholic. He might be dirt poor and the government has driven up the price of condoms and harasses people who try to give them out free. And uses government money to fund campaigns telling lies about condoms and AIDS (lies prepared and spread and endorsed by the Catholic Church):
<http://news.bbc.co.uk/2/hi/programmes/panorama/3180236.stm>

Philippines: police regard condoms as evidence of prostitution. Also confiscate them. Also beat up people who have them:
<http://hrw.org/english/docs/2004/05/03/philip8522.htm>

We're not just talking about high-flown theological theories by some academic theologian in Rome. This is a massive world wide political campaign with real effects on people.

Good answers

Good answers, both. They have helped me to envision in more detail how the condom-effect could be operating in practice.

I note that you've both basically conceded my point however (that whatever the effect is, it's probably not operating on what I called the "individual choice" level). Maybe it was just a boring/obvious point... but I felt it worth making because quite often people who raise this problem do seem to be talking about, or think they're talking about, some millions of marginal 3rd world fornicators who decide not to use condoms while fornicating cuz the Pope says condoms are sin.

My next question perhaps is whether there is some subtle bigotry working here. For example why does the Pope get all of the ire about this, rather than perhaps Elliot's hypothetical "African chief", or the Phillipine authorities? Is it that we can't expect any better of such people? The response might be (probably will be) "um what are you talking about? there's enough ire to go around, it's just that this thread was about the Pope", though, and if so then nevermind.

by Blix on Mon, 04/25/2005 - 18:53 | reply

the ire

Well, the ire must be mostly about the Pope, when we, here in Canada, or England, or anywhere but that poor village in Africa with the little evil "African chief", talk about the issue. The people in that village, or in that African country must and I bet indeed do make their ire about that and many more such "African chiefs". I mean, it is not just this thread being about the Pope, but that from this distance, and from a more world-wide angle, the issue is the Pope and other such international public figures. And only when you are in that village, the issue is (first and foremost) the "African chief".

--Babak

by a reader on Thu, 04/28/2005 - 16:55 | reply

Moral Responsibility

Blix wrote:

So, question: If the Pope had indeed done Y would he still have had the same power necessary to achieve the results you imagine Y having achieved if done by someone with that power?

To assume so is a static analysis that is surely incorrect.

Just to make sure I understand: What you are saying is that if the Pope had done Y instead of X, which I would have liked, the Papacy would have been different from what we know it is today. In particular, the Pope might not have had the same power, or the same kind of power, he has today. So, I must make my analysis of the Pope's statements conform to the "fact" that he is the "Pope" and as such will not do anything that changes the Papacy.

I grant that you are right in thinking that analysis is static. But it seems to me that your argument against static analyses (the way I understand it) is an overkill: "The Pope will not change," you seem to me to be saying, "so you must abandon all analyses that make demands to that effect." Looks to me like a vicious circle blocking any hope for and any analysis, static or dynamic, directed at change.

Can't the Pope change the Papacy at all, and still enjoy the same order of power, though perhaps different in sort?

--Babak

by a reader on Thu, 04/28/2005 - 17:24 | reply

Re: ire, I don't think I a

Re: ire,

I don't think I agree. why is it valid for you to criticize the Pope (a faraway guy in the Vatican, in Europe) but not to criticize the African chief (a faraway guy in a village, in Africa)? why "only" when you are in the village can you criticize the village chief? Doesn't this mean you have to be a Vatican resident, or at least a Catholic, to criticize the Pope?

Perhaps you simply mean it's easier to point at/single out the Pope because he's a Worldwide Figure, whereas it's hard to speak to/criticize all those African chiefs. Well yeah. Pointing at the Pope alone is the easier/shortcut way of lodging these complaints.

Re: X, i think you've misunderstood me. it's not that doing X will "change the Papacy", about which I care not. it's that if he does X he himself risks ceasing to be the Pope! Then some other guy gets in there (more "reactionary") and now where does that leave you and your criticisms?

Another possibility is that he loses a good chunk of the "moral authority" that gives the Pope his magical sinister worldwide voodoo powers. you (as I recall) lament that people don't use condoms cuz the Pope says not to, and they listen to the Pope. (Yes we all worked out that it's a more complicated mechanism than that, i'm just trying to be quick). you want the Pope to say "use condoms". But if he does this will those same people even listen to him? if not, then the benefit you imagine (people starting to use condoms a lot) simply isn't there. Just because people obey the Pope on Not Using Condoms doesn't necessarily mean they'd obey him on Using Them. These people (more to the point - states, and "African chiefs") aren't a bunch of automatons who are given instructions and carry them out. They're humans and have natural human motives.

It would be very natural and typical for a lot of pious/religious people to hear a Pope saying "use condoms" and start to think of him as less "holy", and adjust their attitude to his statements accordingly. This mental model of 3rd World Catholics as automatons carrying out instructions, whatever they are, is rather lazy.

by Blixa on Wed, 05/04/2005 - 18:01 | reply

re: ire and X

re: ire,

Well, I did not mean to take the distance as a measure of whom to make the ire about. It's the international weight, or power if you will, that crosses over that distance, which is the measure. The african chief does not command any moral authority, in your own words, on the people in Europe or Americas, but the Pope does. And as it turns out, this is an international issue, since it is rather important what the people in such faraway countries as in Europe or Americas think about the issue as well as those in the village, at least because the people in the poor african village need their financial help.

re: X and Y,

Of course nobody (even me!) expects the Pope to come out one day and say "use condoms!" out of the blue. If he is going to say so, he must believe in its use and benefits in the first place, and if a Pope sees that light, he sure must have a lot of supportive argument for his new resolution, which he will also give. This moral baggage, if you will, is such that it does not, so directly as you seem to suggest, lead to a decline of his moral authority. I've seen a lot of such reversals in religious rulings of the religious references, in Islam for instance, (just specifying my experience, nothing special about Islam here) and the new ruling always is accepted, with a little adjustment, by the followers. It's complex but by no means impossible.

I do not expect the villagers to follow mindlessly the statements of their Pope, but surely that will ease the way greatly.

In brief, what I care about is the new paradigm that will result from such a ruling; I'm sure the Vatican knows how to take care of their moral authority. I do not expect this to be done overnight either, but it's important to voice criticism (on the right basis, of course). It may take decades, or centuries as it did for Galilleo, for the Vatican to change, but that's another story.

--Babak

by a reader on Sat, 05/07/2005 - 19:27 | reply

The Vatican, IVF, and stem cell research

It is going to campaign to have them banned:

The Roman Catholic church is liable to launch a global offensive against infertility treatment following its victory in an Italian referendum last week, a leading expert said on Sunday.

[...]

"Since this is obviously one of the key issues for the new Pope, he will try to say the same thing in other countries where the Catholic Church has influence," he told Reuters ahead of the start of a European fertility meeting.

"When the Vatican throws its weight and political influence, infertility (treatment) is one of the things that could be sacrificed."

[...]

Sunde believes fertility treatment is just the start. The real showdown will be over embryonic stem cells - master cells that have the potential to form into any other cell type or tissue and which have the potential to cure a range of diseases.

"What we are heading toward is the battle around stem cells. The issue is the moral status of the early embryo. That is what it is all about," he added.

by Editor on Mon, 06/20/2005 - 19:43 | reply

France Graduates From Weasel To Enemy

Having lost the lucrative Saddam contract, France continues to grub about among the world's dwindling supply of fear regimes looking for customers for its weapons. Now the French Prime Minister has said that if China invades Taiwan under the new law it has passed 'authorising' this, France would consider that only right and proper:

French prime minister Jean-Pierre Raffarin has said Paris will continue to push for the lifting of the European Union's arms embargo on China.

Mr Raffarin was speaking at the start of a three-day visit to China.

He also said France had no objection to China's anti-secession law, authorising the use of force against Taiwan should it move to declare independence.

That is appalling enough as it stands, but as always with France, attributing their immoral international stance solely to venality and cynicism is giving them far too much credit. For there is rank, undisguised malevolence there as well. As their President Chirac remarked recently:

A "no" vote to the European Constitution would weaken the EU and benefit the United States, warned French President Jacques Chirac, Thursday.

That the core objective of French policy is to harm the United States has always been implicit. Now it is becoming increasingly explicit. Many Americans dismiss French policymakers as pathetic buffoons. This may be a mistake. They are not stupid, and they can do a great deal of harm.

Update: InstaPundit remarks, in this connection:

You know, we should have just bribed Chirac et al. It's clearly the way these things are done.

But in reality they would not have accepted such a bribe. So what InstaPundit intends as a stinging criticism of Chirac and of France is really a free pass for the malevolence we spoke of. How do the French get these free passes, again and again?

Thu, 04/21/2005 - 16:30 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

You know, we should have just

You know, we should have just bribed Chirac et al. It's clearly the way these things are done.

But in reality they would not have accepted such a bribe.

Well, it looks like Chirac may in fact have accepted bribes in the oil for food program, which may be linked to his position regarding the Iraq war.

Henry Sturman

by Henry Sturman on Sun, 04/24/2005 - 08:47 | reply

Re: You know, we should have just

Well, it looks like Chirac may in fact have accepted bribes in the oil for food program

Yes, but our point is that he would not have accepted a bribe to do the right thing.

So his acceptance of that money was not so much corruption as accepting the natural benefits of a policy that he would have carried out anyway.

by Editor on Sun, 04/24/2005 - 09:04 | reply

Legitimacy

Maybe Instapundit gives France a pass because it is easier to imagine elites have deceived a democracy than that so many free people knowingly support evil. Others who don't like Bush's policies do the same thing.

Because France is a democracy, it enjoys some presumed moral authority and then makes use of any more legitimacy it can find lying around. Now that France is an enemy, the US cannot afford to grant undeserved legitimacy to false principles for the sake of political expediency because France will exploit it in ways that dictatorships could not. This happened with the principle that the UN should decide which wars to fight.

It may be useful to placate China right now and Taiwan's DPP may be difficult, but I don't think Colin Powell should have said these things:

<http://www.atimes.com/atimes/China/FJ30Ad03.html>

by romr on Mon, 04/25/2005 - 16:15 | reply

A pass

Maybe even we gave them a pass, with the title of this post. Have they graduated to the status of enemy of the USA? The authors of this book think they already were: Our Oldest Enemy : A History of America's Disastrous Relationship with France.

by Editor on Mon, 04/25/2005 - 16:32 | reply

Copyright © 2007 Setting The World To Rights

Environmentalism Is Tyranny

The world is in danger. A terrible threat to our wellbeing is generating a vast surplus of hot, fetid air which, if unchecked, will poison every aspect of our lives. Yes, that's right, the environmentalists are sounding off again. They are suing the US government for causing global warming.

They are always suing somebody about something.

In fact global warming is the scientific equivalent of the boy who cried wolf. However, for the sake of argument let's suppose that global warming was real and that the US government was not doing anything about it. How would environmentalists suing the government contribute to solving the problem? Such a lawsuit would take up a lot of time and money that could surely be put to better use. Instead the environmentalists would be better advised to do research into economically viable technologies to replace the ones that they say are causing global warming. This would automatically persuade people to abandon the technologies that ostensibly cause global warming without coercive government interference – and they could use the profits to fund advertisements to persuade people voluntarily to adopt further aspects of the lifestyle the environmentalists favour. Why are they not doing this? Why are enthusiasts for global warming, and practically every other 'environmentalist' issue, more interested in having the government's ear to push a statist political agenda than they are in solving the real problems that they claim exist?

Because of the 'public good problem'? A few free riders can spoil the value of a public resource for everyone? Nonsense. First of all, public good problems are in reality fairly rare phenomena, if they exist at all. Second, global warming, and many other 'environmental' issues, simply do not take the form of worrying about a few free riders spoiling things for everyone. They take the form of everyone, except a few campaigners with their heads full of hot air, simply not wanting to comply with some vast, ruinously expensive and intrusive madcap project. Yet somehow, because these campaigners have seized onto a weakness in contemporary politically-correct public morality, they get a free ride and aren't laughed out of public life. (Ironic, isn't it?)

By pursuing this agenda they have already generated mountains of wasted paper and reams of pointless regulations that impede economic growth. Environmentalists pose a special type of global threat to human wellbeing that has no counterpart in nature.

Thu, 04/28/2005 - 07:45 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

effete nonsense

There is no sense, other than perhaps a completely trivial one, in which environmentalism is tyranny. This 'permalink' could be the most fatuous to date.

Kieren

by a reader on Thu, 04/28/2005 - 12:39 | reply

No problem?

I agree there is no good evidence for man made global warming. Plus if it were true there would still be the issue whether warming is good or bad. But to say that legal action would not be the way to solve the problem if it were real is nonsense. We do not live in never-neverland where any problem can and will be solved easily and quickly with no pain. We live in the real world where solving problems is costly and we have limited resources. If my neighbor has a loud stereo which he refuses to turn off then I'll want to sue him. There's no good in saying I should just invest my own money to come up with a better technical solution. So too with environmental property infringements. Where they do exist, the rule of law is needed to solve conflicts, as it is for any other conflict between people. The fact that at some future date, after someone invests enough money another option will be economically viable is besides the point. In that connection it is obvious that right now oil is the most economically efficient option and that at this time it is not very profitable to invest in other options, for if it were otherwise fossil fuel would not be used and more research would be done on alternatives.

Hence for the time being either we allow oil and then oil will be used or we take legal or political action and oil use will decline. I agree there is no justification to curb oil use, but until we move to the garden of eden or until man has been modified into the perfect collective being with only common goals there is no such thing as a common preference where we can eat our cake and have it too and any belief in that is based on faith rather than reason.

Henry Sturman

by Henry Sturman on Fri, 04/29/2005 - 08:44 | reply

Here's another issue: if glob

Here's another issue: if global warming were dangerous, but not man-made, would that be OK? Many environmentalists act like the answer to this is yes. Hopefully their attitude to an impending meteor strike would be different.

>We live in the real world where solving problems is costly and we have limited resources.

Yeah, and the problem of using nuclear power (a solved technological problem) has now become a political problem (how to debunk environmentalism). I'm not sure what resources will have to be consumed to solve the latter. Patience is one, for sure.

by a reader on Fri, 04/29/2005 - 18:00 | reply

Environmentalists

The problem is that "Environmentalists" as a defined subspecies do not exist. Environmentalist is a catch all phrase, and often includes even an finer epithet like "Crazy Environmentalist". To say "Environmentalists" is like saying "Libertarians", although no one knows the number of each. For all I know there may be only one true Libertarian.

Your point is apparently about pesky persons who espouse environmental causes as if they are absolute truth. As most of us know, true believers in anything will use all means at their disposal including the pesky lawsuit. Research would make more sense, but who will fund it? Also who will fund counter-research, the "Anti-Environmentalists"? Get my drift?

If this is a complaint about the environment and those pesky people who inhabit it and think they are the arbiters of truth, more power to you. However its likely more a rant about another "ism" personalized to an "ist".

Do something. Fund a research project. Environmentalists, whomever they are how vast their numbers might be, seem to pose a special type of global threat to human wellbeing that has no counterpart in nature. That is a theory in need of further reseach.

Sounds like a worthy project to me.

by a reader on Sat, 04/30/2005 - 14:18 | reply

Re: Here's another issue: if glob

Yeah, and the problem of using nuclear power (a solved technological problem) has now become a political problem (how to debunk environmentalism). I'm not sure what resources will have to be consumed to solve the latter. Patience is one, for sure.

Everything is about economics, not about technology. Sure, the technological problem of using nuclear power has been solved. But at this time nuclear power is not useful because it is twice as expensive as power generation via fossil fuel.

Henry Sturman

by Henry Sturman on Sat, 04/30/2005 - 16:28 | reply

Envirotyranny

single parent spends extra pennies on organic food because she wants what's best for her child and all her nicest friends do the same. (they also say things like "now, jon, be calm at the table or you know what happens, you'll have to eat in the other room.") nobody quite knows why we must eat organic except that it's something to do with extra fresh natural wholesomeness. it's also to do with preventing local farmers being ripped off by giant supermarkets and, errr, stopping heartless global food corporations from profiting by adding nasty cancer chemicals to our regular food.

but more spent on baby food means less budget for toys and trips to the seaside.

the irony is that children don't usually want expensive food, and happiness is good for the environment.

by a reader on Sat, 04/30/2005 - 22:42 | reply

Re: Here's another issue: if glob

The issue of economics can't be separated from that of politics, especially tyrannical politics.

We don't know what the 'real' cost of nuclear power is because the political situation caused by environmentalist movement means that nuclear power has to be generated thousands of times more safely than any other form of power. Also, only very politically involved businesspeople can even dream of entering the nuclear industry, because their entire job is dealing with the government on the one hand and the environmentalism-obsessed public on the other.

And we don't know what the real cost of oil is because most of the oil production industry is run for the sole purpose of keeping certain tyrants in power, which is undoubtedly very far from the way it would be run if there were no tyranny involved.

by a reader on Sun, 05/01/2005 - 16:06 | reply

Yes, "tyranny" was rhetorical

Yes, "tyranny" was rhetorical hyperbole. Rather, Environmentalism is an Ideology (I am tempted to just call it a Christian heresy), which when and where influential could lead to something-like-tyranny in certain spheres of life (though I very much doubt the likelihood of it leading to tyranny proper).

As of now the most "tyrannical" thing that Environmentalism seems to have imposed on the average person is that we are typically all now conscripted, without pay, to sort our garbage by raw-material type before the people we pay to take it away, will agree to do so. Personally I dislike and resent this task very much (and the widespread acceptance of it as being our duty), almost to a pathological extent, but if that's the worst "tyranny" Environmentalism will generate I will be very happy :)

Henry is right that it's not clear whether GW is occurring, or if it is whether it is bad. He forgot to add that even if it is occurring, and bad, it's not clear that any feasible human action could stop it. (This is true whether or not human action "caused" it, which is - or should be - irrelevant.) Or at least, if it's happening+bad it's not clear whether the costs of attempting to "stop" GW by limiting greenhouses gases outweigh the costs of some other method of coping with the problem (settling Antarctica, making Mars habitable, building Battlestar Galactica, etc.)

The point that legal action could be appropriate is well taken. Emphasis on "could be". That doesn't mean it is. The World asked "How would environmentalists suing the government contribute to solving the problem?" That's a specific question which requires an answer, and the fact that in principle it is theoretically appropriate to use the law to solve such problems doesn't mean that the law is the best way to solve this particular problem.

The linked article gives a fascinating window into what the suers think they are accomplishing: "Any court that rules that global warming is a problem that needs to be addressed, just that headline, would be huge for the people trying to do something about global warming," said Pat Parenteau, a professor at Vermont Law School's Environmental Law Centre.

In other words they are trying to get a court ("any" court, but presumably the San Francisco court they are using was not chosen randomly) to declare "that global warming is a problem that needs to be addressed". They would be happy if this made it into a "headline".

In short, it's a PR stunt, designed to further and buttress their ideology. What they hope to achieve is what all ideologues hope to achieve, inducing people to believe in their ideology. (In particular they presumably want to bring about and maintain the conditions under which an ever-growing number of mainstream journalists write sentences like "Given that most mainstream scientists believe that greenhouse gases from industry and autos cause global warming", such as appears in the article, in passing.) To this end they would like, understandably, to get a court (an Authority) to Rule their ideology correct.

This aim doesn't exactly meet the conditions that Henry envisioned and outlined for how legal action is useful/necessary in solving a collective problem. Henry talks about "solving problems". This lawsuit is not about that. It's about winning converts and establishing orthodoxy. Not the same thing.

by blix on Mon, 05/02/2005 - 19:37 | reply

A noble ideology

Environmentalism (concern for the environment, and the anthropogenic impact upon it) and environment science are honest intellectual activities and I cannot understand why 'the World' finds them so contentious. Whether I'm concerned about my local nature reserve (under threat from the planned extension of a golf course), or the much wider issue of climate change, it makes me an environmentalist.

Having climbed down from the original (and churlish) mis-equation of environmentalism with tyranny, (this correlation, after all, is evident nonsense) "blixia" lays the much more measured charge of it being an ideology. He/She is right (the ambiguous name makes it hard for me to use gender-specific pronouns). It is an ideology (defined as a set of beliefs) that makes me, without shame, want to preserve biodiversity on this planet. Unfortunately its become a word a bit like 'sin' or 'reductionism' (you only use it if you're against it). Blixia's ideology might consider biodiversity to be unimportant (preferring, perhaps, net-dollar gain as the singular measure of human success) and this he/she is free to embrace.

There are environmental issues that need to be addressed. Few intelligent people are ignorant enough to deny this. The way to address such problems is through empirical science and debate among informed people. "Anti-environmentalism" plays no part in informing this debate, being, like anti-globalism, an extreme and reactionary ideology.

Kieren

by Kieren on Sun, 05/29/2005 - 01:55 | reply

Support Tony Blair!

Leftist Oliver Kamm is supporting Tony Blair by voting Conservative for the first time in his life.

Those of us who can are supporting Tony Blair by voting Labour for the first time in our lives.

UPDATE: Due to the historic nature of this event we thought it appropriate to present the following evidence of our intention.

(Click the images for larger photos.)

Tue, 05/03/2005 - 14:24 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

I was also intending to vote

I was also intending to vote Labour to show support for Blair's handling of the war. But I thought it best to check first that the candidate wasn't a stopper, so I wrote to him saying that the war was a fundamental issue for me and that I thought Blair deserved immense credit for his whole approach over it. I went on to ask the candidate, if had he been in Parliament at the time, would he have voted for war and if so did he still support it.

That was last week. Having heard nothing I wrote again. When nothing happened again I wrote to the regional office. They said they would forward my note, but I still didn't get a reply. I've written again this evening, but don't hold out much hope of a response.

The polls open in about 8 hours. Who do I vote for?

by Christopher Price on Wed, 05/04/2005 - 23:00 | reply

How to decide

There are several web sites devoted to analysing MPs' voting records and other attributes. Here's one where you can look up your own MP. For those who don't know who their candidates are, you can find out here, for instance. If the candidate you want to know about is not the outgoing MP, you can almost certainly still ascertain their opinions on key issues by searching the web.

by Editor on Wed, 05/04/2005 - 23:20 | reply

Editor - It would be fine if Editor - It would be fine if he had been an MP before but he hasn't.

And being called Dave Jones he is not the easiest person to google. At the moment Im thinking despite Blair I cant vote for him coz he is such coward. I mean what sort of a candidate wont tell his electors his views on the biggest issue going?

by Christopher Price on Thu, 05/05/2005 - 00:01 | reply

What does it mean?

Now that it's over, can someone who understands british politics explain what happened? I keep hearing that it's a victory and a defeat for Blair, etc.

Gil

by Gil on Fri, 05/06/2005 - 16:06 | reply

Re: What does it mean?

The best thing one can say about it is that it could have been a lot worse.

But it was a bad night. In the words of Oliver Kamm:

The election overall has been a bad one for liberalism in its broadest sense. In individual constituencies, there is much more to regret than to welcome.

[...]

Overall, I am afraid there is no escaping the conclusion that Tony Blair irrevocably damaged his political standing by committing troops to the Iraq war; had the war not taken place, we can reasonably assume that he would have enjoyed a substantial - and given its unprecedented character in Labour politics - triumphant third election victory. Many, probably almost all, Labour supporters would regard this as an indictment of the PM. I regard it as a measure of the man's political stature.

Indeed.

by Editor on Fri, 05/06/2005 - 16:41 | reply

Election Consolations

“May the Lord spare us from things that could have been worse”, says a gloomy old truism. The outcome of the election could have been worse. Mr Blair remains in office with an increased majority in his own constituency, despite being challenged by a smorgasbord of calumniators and conspiracy theorists. Only one constituency in England and five in Northern Ireland elected apologists for political terror – in both cases, an increase of only one; the remaining 640 constituencies elected democratic politicians. The disgraceful Liberal Democrats ended up with only about 60 seats, a disappointingly small (to them) increase of only 11. That is the best we can muster by way of consolation.

It is a painful fact that vast numbers of British people did indeed want to punish Mr Blair for doing the right thing in Iraq, and that they do believe vile conspiracy theories, both about him and more generally too. It is also painful that moral relativism, cynicism, racism, antisemitism and even outright violence have played a greater role in this election campaign than at any time in recent history. The people of Bethnal Green, in particular, have no excuse for electing George Galloway, who would serve the country far better in jail than in Parliament. Some people, like the Liberal Democrats, are anti-war because they have no moral compass at all, merely a wish that the world should be a warm and fuzzy place. George Galloway has a moral compass that points directly towards evil.

Perhaps the most consoling outcome of the election is Michael Howard's announcement that he will stand down as leader of the Conservative Party. Nothing in his tenure as leader became him more than the leaving of it. For this quick decision, and for the fine, gracious and insightful speech in which he announced it, he has regained no small measure of respect from us. If he succeeds, as he says he intends to, in reforming the Party's system for choosing leaders before he goes, he may yet leave a legacy of which he could be proud. For this may, in due course, allow a leader from the untainted, younger ranks of the party to be elected and restore it to its former stature. Perhaps someone like Michael Gove, the excellent Times columnist who was just elected MP for Surrey Heath. As an example of his quality, look here. You heard it here first, folks...

Update: The BBC link above for Michael Howard's speech leads to a page which blocks users outside the UK from viewing the clip. Their video server does not itself enforce this restriction: here.

Sat, 05/07/2005 - 10:18 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Consolation: Take Heart, We Will Save You

Anyone who is engaged in proper democratic politics can succeed in the world today. Take heart. You will be saved. A blueprint for salvation is contained within the applied tensions of American religion, judicious secrecy, and the fine art of war and peace.

<http://www.esoteric.msu.edu/VolumeVII/Secrecy.htm>

Read on.

by a reader on Sun, 05/08/2005 - 20:14 | reply

Off topic but I thought I might Off topic but I thought I might point out that the last decent journalist has left the Guardian.

by theGob on Tue, 05/10/2005 - 12:40 | reply

Galloway

Can you explain why Galloway is evil? No links please.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 05/10/2005 - 22:41 | reply

Galloway

Elliot,

Galloway was emphatically opposed to the invasion of Iraq in the most morally inverted of terms, and he was kicked out of the Labour Party after evidence suggesting that he was taking bribes from Saddam was published.

by a reader on Wed, 05/11/2005 - 15:18 | reply

Galloway

Elliot,

If you still have any doubts, take a look at what Galloway has been saying on Arab television.

Gil

by Gil on Wed, 08/03/2005 - 05:41 | reply

I didn't express any doubts.

I didn't express any doubts.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 08/03/2005 - 17:16 | reply

Doubts

I know.

I was just outraged by his statements and was trying to find a relevant place to post about them.

Gil

by Gil on Wed, 08/03/2005 - 18:12 | reply

ok cool, i read your link and ok cool, i read your link and yeah he hella sucks. just didn't want anyone to think I doubted he sucked :)

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 08/03/2005 - 21:30 | reply

Trade Justice For What?

Some anti-capitalists held a protest called "Wake Up to Trade Justice".

Organisers want to see an end to trade rules which, they say, force farmers in developing countries to compete with cheaper international imports.

So the organisers of "Wake Up to Trade Justice" want people in poor countries to get less food for their money? Perhaps they haven't bothered to think through their position and realise its implications.

Virtually any choice taken by anyone will hurt some people and benefit others. It is impossible to add up, or even to know, what all these costs and benefits are. What we can do is favour institutions under which ideas can be tried out and mistakes corrected rather than entrenched. In this respect free trade clearly wins over "fair trade". Under free trade, people choose the product they think gives the best value. So people who don't produce good products that others value have to change their behaviour. Thus, free trade has a mechanism to eliminate bad products.

In this case, free trade will make African farmers who aren't very good at farming move into jobs they are better at, because the African people actually eating the food don't want what they are selling. Forcing them to buy it anyway is entrenching indefinitely the poverty of all concerned. That is not justice.

Update: Broken link now replaced by a different one. Thanks to a reader for pointing this out in a comment.

Fri, 05/13/2005 - 22:59 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Subsidies?

You're sure this isn't in reference to first world farm subsidies that make it difficult for many third countries to develop a competitive agricultural economy?

(I tried clicking the link, but it appeared to be broken.)

by a reader on Sun, 05/15/2005 - 12:54 | reply

Re: Subsidies?

Thanks for pointing out the broken link.

If it were a reference to the injustice and harm done by first world farm subsidies, we would indeed be endorsing their protest. Unfortunately it is not. In the words of the organisers (see the new link), "the aim is to challenge the free trade myth and put forward alternatives":

The myth, perpetuated by the rich and powerful states that free trade and privatisation is the only answer to global poverty. Governments and key decision-makers across the world have swallowed this myth. Poor countries everywhere are being forced to open their markets to foreign companies and cheap, often subsidised imports; to stop helping vulnerable producers and to privatise essential services. The results are devastating. The myth needs to be exploded once and for all.

by Editor on Sun, 05/15/2005 - 13:57 | reply

Dynamic Institutions and Free Trade

"What we can do is favour institutions under which ideas can be tried out and mistakes corrected rather than entrenched."

Certainly this is correct. I point out this phrase because usually hidden from economic discussion is the essential fact that we live within political entities which define 'the marketplace' and markets through the lens of their familiar institutions. The very meanings of free trade are driven by our diverse institutional views, the ideas of corporation, the ideas of stock and markets, the ideas of banking and currency, the ideas of labor. All of these are institutionalized ideas, often embodied in names we recognize, Wall Street, WTO, World Bank, various Departments of Commerce and Bureaus of the Treasury. Other institutional ideas which function in various markets of the world are less well known but no less influential in promoting or diminishing the wellbeing and wealth of their citizens. Many of these institutions fall under the rubric of what these citizens also call free trade.

Most of us agree we should be attempting to live in a world ruled by reason. In order to do this well, we need to constantly examine our institutions and how they serve or do not serve us.

Free trade is not chaotic or whimsical freedom. For that matter, free trade is not unregulated trade.

Free trade in the highest sense is what we make it through the application of good ideas in an organized and reasoned way to serve the public good (Theory of Institution). Market mechanisms are recognized as well as how they may be institutionally encouraged in the public interest across the broad and changing marketplace(s) of the state(s), the nation(s) and the world.

Economic institutions, like all institutions reflecting the nobility of human endeavor are not temples of blind worship, or at least should not be. They need to function primarily as places of intelligent discussion and application, constantly reasoned and changeable reflections of our best ideas with constant trial and refinement of these ideas in the world market(s). Without regular rebuilding to recognize the viability of human ideas and change, like all temples of the ancient gods, the Temple of Free Trade will soon fall into ruins.

"What we can do is favour institutions under which ideas can be tried out and mistakes corrected rather than entrenched." At our peril, do not forget this.

by a reader on Sun, 05/15/2005 - 14:30 | reply

Sanctuary

Sanctuary by Bill Whittle.

Read it. We don't think you'll regret it.

Thu, 05/19/2005 - 11:08 | digg | del.icio.us | permlink

Uniforms

So the un-uniformed Kurds and marsh Arabs that rebelled against Saddam, if they were tortured, just got what they had coming to them?

by a reader on Fri, 05/20/2005 - 04:27 | reply

Re: Uniforms

Did those rebels abuse the sanctuary of Saddam's notorious reluctance to harm innocents? Did they fire from the midst of civilians or holy sites because they knew that Saddam's soldiers would not fire back? Did they set traps for those soldiers that relied for their effectiveness on the humanity and self-restraint of those soldiers?

If so, then ... the answer would still be no. No one has torture 'coming to them'. But the argument that Whittle makes about uniforms and the like would then begin - just begin - to apply to them.

by Editor on Fri, 05/20/2005 - 09:39 | reply

Uniforms

Did the lack of uniforms protect the residents of Dresden?

by a reader on Fri, 05/20/2005 - 11:47 | reply

or for that matter...

did taking refuge in their churches and hospitals protect them?

by a reader on Fri, 05/20/2005 - 12:25 | reply

Dresden (was Re: Uniforms)

A reader writes:

Did the lack of uniforms protect the residents of Dresden?

The British bombed Dresden during World War II because it had a railhead and an armaments factory. During World War II the RAF judged that they couldn't do bombing raids during the day because it would cost them too many pilots and planes. And they couldn't do precision bombing during the night. So they flattened Dresden to destroy the Nazi armed forces, killing many of Dresden's residents was an accidental byproduct of that decision.

by Alan Forrester on Fri, 05/20/2005 - 12:36 | reply

Re: Dresden

A few weeks before the end of World War Two, Winston Churchill drafted a memorandum to the British Chiefs of Staff:

'It seems to me that the moment has come when the question of bombing of German cities simply for the sake of increasing the terror, though under other pretexts, should be reviewed ... The destruction of Dresden remains a serious query against the conduct of Allied bombing.'

by a reader on Fri, 05/20/2005 - 23:58 | reply

Some sarcasm

Oh I understand now. The British were wrong to bomb Dresden. Therefore the Iraqi insurgents are right to bomb Baghdad.

Or is it:

The Iraqi insurgents are no worse than the British were in World War 2. Therefore the Americans fighting them are like those who were fighting the British in that war. They were Nazis. Hence Bush=Hitler. Yes, that must be it.

(A different reader)

by a reader on Sat, 05/21/2005 - 00:44 | reply

Re: Dresden

Some context for that much-quoted Churchill memorandum.

by Editor on Sat, 05/21/2005 - 01:57 | reply

Re: Sarcasm

No you don't get it. The principle of sanctuary has been obsolete since at least the start of the 20th century. The bombing of Dresden is just a classic example of this.

To claim that the torturers were motivated by a sense of indignity at the violation of sanctury is laughable.They were probably motivated by the same thing Uday was - The sheer joy of playing god with a defenseless victim.

by a reader on Mon, 05/23/2005 - 15:02 | reply

Copyright © 2007 Setting The World To Rights

No Magic

Stem cell researchers in South Korea say they have managed to create stem cells with the same DNA as sick donors. Some pessimists have claimed that this isn't possible. If someone has found a way to do it anyway, we are not surprised. Human beings are unique among animals in our capacity for critical and imaginative thought. However, we are made of cells that are not spectacularly dissimilar to those of other mammals. Some mechanism that we don't yet understand arranges these cells in a pattern that instantiates thoughts and feelings and so on. For any disease you can think of, one day doctors will understand the human body well enough to be able to cure it. We find these reflections not only robustly plausible, but far more cheering than the idea that the key to immortality is a sufficiently determined refusal to think critically about magical ghosts called 'the soul' and 'God'.

Fri, 05/20/2005 - 09:40 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

No Excuses

There is nothing in this report of mistreatment of prisoners by US soldiers in Afghanistan that would make a reasonable person doubt its authenticity or a decent person deny its seriousness.

It is a story of casual cruelty, torture and murder, unmitigated by the heat of battle, force majeure, 'ticking-bomb' necessity, or even good intentions.

The United States authorities will now prosecute the perpetrators of those crimes. We are confident that they will also discover, and do whatever is necessary to rectify, the negligence or institutional failings at a higher level which, it seems likely, were a necessary condition for those crimes to be committed.

None of this has any bearing on the justice of the liberation of Afghanistan, nor of Iraq. Those wars and any future wars of that sort will turn closed societies where casual cruelty and insitutional flaws are allowed to remain entrenched, into open societies that try continuously to root out such problems. But more: the overall war is a war of necessity – a come-as-you-are war. The United States did not ask to be attacked, nor did the West choose the logic of what has been or will be necessary to allow its uniquely benevolent and peaceful civilisation to survive. Nor, therefore, can the fear of further such incidents affect any future decision by the United States or its allies to take military action. To consider those two issues as even remotely connected would in the first instance be an insult and betrayal of the liberated. But more importantly it would also be a betrayal of those for whose longer-term protection such action would, if it were justified, be essential.

Fri, 05/20/2005 - 22:18 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

A bit strong?

I agree with the sentiment, but not the literal assertion of the strong position that it's wrong "To consider those two issues as even remotely connected."

I think it's right to consider those costs that we can reasonably expect when deciding whether an action is justified.

Again, I agree that these costs are unlikely to be dispositive, when weighed against the enormous potential benefits of these actions.

But, I think it weakens the case to state it too strongly.

Gil

by Gil on Mon, 05/23/2005 - 18:27 | reply

The NY Times a reliable source?

Pardon me while I barf my dinner. I wouldn't believe anything the NY Times reports without verification from two other independent sources. As far as deaths go of detainees you realize that over five per cent of the prisoners next by the US in WWII died?

by TJ Jackson on Tue, 06/28/2005 - 03:27 | reply

Democracy, Luxembourg Style

There are hopeful signs that both the Dutch and French people will vote No in the forthcoming referendums on the proposed EU Constitution.

The Eurocrats' attitude will be 'so what?'

Jean-Claude Juncker, the prime minister of Luxembourg and holder of the rotating EU presidency, told Le Soir newspaper in Belgium that he would act swiftly on Sunday night if France voted No.

He would appear with the head of the European Commission, Jose Manuel Barroso, and demand that all 25 EU nations complete the process of ratifying the constitution, in referendums or parliamentary votes.

Got that? The prime minister of Luxembourg will demand that the 25 parliaments and/or electorates of European nations vote Yes – including the ones that have just voted No. If they don't – then he'll ... he'll ...

"If it's a Yes, we will say 'on we go', and if it's a No we will say 'we continue'," he said.

In reality, if it's a No, we'll say 'off you go', and if it's a Yes, we'll say 'off we go'.

Thu, 05/26/2005 - 16:24 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Non!

The French people have emphatically rejected the proposed European Constitution. In doing so, they have killed the great project of European political union.

Hurray for them!

The French voted non for all the wrong reasons. Nevertheless, this is a moment to be charitable towards them, as New Sisyphus has been in a very interesting commentary:

The French, so the story goes, reject what they see as an Anglo-Saxon liberal power-grab in the guise of a greater Europe, while, ironically, the Dutch and the British see in it a rise of a socialist super-state with very little accountability.

Perhaps. There is no doubt that there is some truth to that line of analysis.

[...]

And, yet, at the same time we detect something deeper, something more fundamental. A great nation has been asked to vote itself out of existence, to subsume its identity in a larger mix.

We know not what the ultimate destiny of the French shall be, but it shall not be this, of that we are certain. France is eternal, great and glorious; it shall not whimper and walk off the world stage mixed with Belgians.

Indeed. And along the same lines we note, more pragmatically, that the very fact that different European nations are rejecting the Constitution for diametrically opposite reasons is a strong indication that the Political Union project is not only dead, but will also prove impossible to resurrect in any other form.

Sun, 05/29/2005 - 23:49 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

"Mixed with Belgians"

Very nice turn of phrase.

BTW, in addition to what you say in that post, I think it's notable that although the French people's Non is being ascribed to their ideological disdain for free markets, the reason why that long-standing disdain has come to a head right now, is to do with the cumulative failure of Franco-German social and economic policy, which has led to chronic high unemployment in those countries (among other ills).

And was it not ever thus that when socialists enact policies that result in economic failure, for many decades before they see the light, they regard this as manifest proof of the inefficiency and inhumanity of free markets; leading to a redoubling of their faith in socialism?

So what has really scupper the Euro federalist project -- even though this is not yet as widely recognised as it was in the case of the Soviet Union -- has been the real world refutation of it's ideology.

by KW on Mon, 05/30/2005 - 15:26 | reply

Fine Print

The EU Constitution consists of over 400 pages of fine print. Could it be that "the people" smell a rat? While the power of the majority crowd may be sometimes suspect, on matters of plain old common sense "the people" have spoken for their many reasons in their many tongues.

by a reader on Thu, 06/02/2005 - 14:14 | reply

2003 And All That

In 1066 and All That, their classic spoof of British history (or rather, of history lessons), W.C.Sellar and R.J.Yeatman list the main objective of the Peasants' Revolt as having been:

- a) To obtain a free pardon for having revolted.

They also remark that, having succeeded in that objective, they were all executed anyway.

In today's surrealistic political scene, unintentional self-parody among the Left and among opponents of the war is commonplace and there is no scope for talents of the kind possessed by Sellar and Yeatman. Therefore it is not surprising to find that many take for granted not only that the (real, secret) objective of the war is to steal oil, but that if a war must be fought, its principal objective should be:

- a) That none of our soldiers should ever violate the rules of war.

This has the same logic as Sellar and Yeatman's joke: it is an objective that can only be realistically achieved by surrendering in advance; and it is an objective perfectly compatible with all being executed anyway. Even Bill Whittle, in the fine essay we referred to recently, seems to be analysing the morality of the war in terms of which side adheres more closely to the rules of war. By that standard, the Coalition comes out overwhelmingly ahead. But that neither diminishes the crimes that Coalition soldiers do commit, nor is it a valid argument that the Coalition side is in the right.

We make no excuses for cruelty, nor do we condone violence that is not justified by self-defence. But we do not confuse the issue of enforcing the law among soldiers with that of what the objective of, or justification for, fighting is.

Sat, 06/04/2005 - 13:13 | digg | del.icio.us | permlink

objective of, or justification for

The link provided, while filled with the self-righteous indignation I've come to expect from "the world" does not seem to be consistent with "the World's" view point. If the (implied) objective is Saddam, then that objective has been met, in which case coalition forces could withdraw.

by a reader on Sat, 06/04/2005 - 19:57 | reply

Really?

I don't think The World is committed to the position that that link contains an exhaustive list of objectives and justifications for the fighting. Just some powerful ones that easily fit in a short blog post.

The reader claims that it isn't consistent with The World's viewpoint, but since he seems to know what that is, he probably knows that it is consistent. It's just not the complete story. And, there's no reason that it should have to be. This is a blog, not a book.

One minor quibble, though: I'd probably change "self-defence" to "defence" (I'd actually change it to "defense", but that's a different matter) since I assume that The World condones violence to defend others as well.

Gil

by Gil on Sun, 06/05/2005 - 00:38 | reply

Self-Defense

As far as moral justification, defense of others is self-defense – by the others.

/AmE [shudder]

by Editor on Sun, 06/05/2005 - 00:58 | reply

Re: Really?

I stand corrected. The World has consistently advocated war under various pretexts. I guess that is The World ultimate position - to advocate war.

Let's see, There was "Saddam has weapons of mass destruction!" "He doesn't? Well, it doesn't matter anyway". There was "Saddam has ties to al Qaeda!" "He doesn't? Well, it doesn't matter anyway" There was "Saddam is a brutal ruler!" "We are too? Well, it doesn't matter anyway"

Then there is the Popperianism which somehow infallibly justifies the war. When this fails to convince, The World switches to another ideology, the Sharansky doctrine.

by a reader on Sun, 06/05/2005 - 16:20 | reply

Re: Really?

A reader wrote:

I stand corrected. The World has consistently advocated war under various pretexts. I guess that is The World ultimate position - to advocate war.

I advocate peace. Unfortunately there are lots of tyrants and terrorists and if we don't kill or imprison them they'll kill lots of people and generally disturb the peace. So we need to fight a war to get rid of them, then we can have peace.

by Alan Forrester on Mon, 06/06/2005 - 02:35 | reply

war

Well I advocate war. Death, blood, gore, pain, all that. And it's not as if we're killing Americans. (Peace later is ok with me.)

We don't know if there are WMDs or not. We do know there used to be, and that Saddam failed to show that they were gone. How are we supposed to feel safe and secure that he doesn't have any if he did have them and then he wouldn't say what he did with them?

Our rulers aren't brutal like Saddam. For example, they let people like you call them brutal, and fail to kill you.

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 06/07/2005 - 03:01 | reply

Don't Ask, Don't Discriminate

The US Army has dismissed Sergeant Robert Stout for admitting that he is gay. We agree with Andrew Sullivan that this policy is unfairly discriminatory, and is especially ironic at a time of shortage of good soldiers.

But that is putting it too mildly. The "don't ask, don't tell" policy is a cruel and stupid outrage. If the US military fires a soldier because he admits that he's gay, they are effectively handing a free casualty to the enemy. And more: for every gay soldier that the Army fires, several more won't bother applying.

Even that is not the worst of it. This policy is a declaration that we are not fighting a war, we are playing a game. A game of rituals and taboos and arbitrary rules. But the only relevant rules for conduct in the armed forces in wartime are those connected to the performance of military operations. The US Army are worried that gay soldiers might fall in love and refuse to fight. Nonsense. The IDF and the British armed forces both have gay soldiers, and we have yet to see a report that any of them have become ineffective at fighting because they are in love. Men and women work together in those armies too, and in the US forces (including gay soldiers who 'don't tell'). Good soldiers of any sexual orientation are not stupid animals who follow their hormones regardless of morality or consequences. They are thinking beings who are capable of sticking to the hard and dangerous business of fighting to preserve freedom, under all sorts of pressures. We need them to do that, and to honour them for doing so. Shame on the authors and supporters of this immoral policy.

Update:

Please take note, US armed forces, this is how it should be done.

Wed, 06/08/2005 - 14:25 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Nothing new

During the civil war General Sherman asked that, and General Grant agreed to, dismiss all Jews from the Union army.

by a reader on Fri, 06/10/2005 - 00:40 | reply

Re: Nothing New

A reader wrote:

During the civil war General Sherman asked that, and General Grant agreed to, dismiss all Jews from the Union army.

As far as I can tell, this idea comes from the pen of Thomas J. Di Lorenzo, who is apparently quoting another historian:

Sherman himself certainly did not believe that "each man is as good as another." For example, in 1862 Sherman was bothered that "the country" was "swarming with dishonest Jews" (see Michael Fellman, Citizen Sherman, p. 153). He got his close friend, General Grant, to expel all Jews from his army. As Fellman writes, "On December 17, 1862, Grant . . . , like a medieval monarch . . . expelled 'The Jews, as a class,' from his department."

In fact, Grant issued an order , General Order No.11, saying that:

The Jews, as a class violating every regulation of trade established by the Treasury Department and also department orders, are hereby expelled from the department [the "Department of the Tennessee," an administrative district of the Union Army of occupation composed of Kentucky, Tennessee and Mississippi] within twenty-four hours from the receipt of this order.

In other words, Grant's order said that the Jews were to be expelled from his department. Lincoln got General Halleck to order Grant to revoke this order and he did. Grant has the good grace to be embarrassed about it:

During the Presidential campaign in 1868, Wolf had a two hour meeting with Grant and specifically asked him about the charges of anti-Semitism. "I know General Grant and his motives," he wrote at the time, "and assert unhesitatingly that he never intended to insult any honorable Jew, that he never thought of their religion... the order never harmed anyone, not even in thought... He is fully aware of the noble deeds performed by thousands of Jewish privates, and hundreds of Jewish officers during the late war."

The Union army had Jewish officers.

The reader might also reflect that any historian who makes the charge that Grant ordered all Jews expelled from the entire army and contradicts this claim in the next sentence, as Di Lorenzo did, has not shown good judgement. In general, Di Lorenzo is an incompetent historian who makes many errors of fact and interpretation. I recommend Battle Cry of Freedom by James M. McPherson to anyone who wants to understand the American Civil War.

Real reason

Running the risk of being branded a conspiracy theorist for attributing hidden motives, I submit that the real reason the army wants to ban gays has nothing to do with worries about falling in love. It simply has to do with many heterosexual men feeling uncomfortable in a 'man's world' around homosexuals. In other words, it's a simple case of homophobia (and in this light the 'don't ask, don't tell' policy suddenly makes sense). But no one likes to admit the problem lies with themselves, certainly not if such admission would also be politically incorrect, and so the problem is claimed to lie in the other party (just as Nazis would rather claim the jews poison the water and ruin the economy then admit they are simply jealous of their success).

Henry Sturman

by Henry Sturman on Fri, 06/10/2005 - 10:56 | reply

source please

"During the civil war General Sherman asked that, and General Grant agreed to, dismiss all Jews from the Union army."

Could you give a source?

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Fri, 06/10/2005 - 19:59 | reply

Re: Real reason

Hidden motives are common. In our analysis of conspiracy theories, we give five attributes of (irrational) conspiracy theories. Your theory only has at most one and a half of them and is neither irrational nor a conspiracy theory.

by Editor on Fri, 06/10/2005 - 20:11 | reply

Exactly why does a queer have Exactly why does a queer have the right to serve? I can think of a number of things that disqualify someone from serving. I mean if you allow queers why would you descriminate a pedophile, rapist, felon, etc. The bottom line is unit effeciveness isn't what concerns the gay lobby. And as far as the effectiveness of woman and men serving together just ask any Navy personnel who has had to do extra duty because a last minute pregancy left a ship short handed how he feels.

This is so bogus. The people who push this clap trap haven't served and wouldn't if they could.

by TJ Jackson on Tue, 06/28/2005 - 03:23 | reply

erm...

This is so bogus. The people who push this clap trap haven't served and wouldn't if they could.

If this was true, then it would be a non-issue. If the only people who think queers should serve were unwilling to serve under any circumstances, then there would be no queers trying to enlist.

by Woty on Tue, 07/12/2005 - 17:59 | reply

Impending Holocaust Watch

According to the latest opinion polls, the most likely winner of the forthcoming Iranian Presidential election is former President Ali Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani.

"regarded as a pragmatist ... has raised the possibility of improved relations with the United States" says the press. None of the mainstream reports of this, so far, has mentioned Rafsanjani's pragmatic opinion about the Jews of Israel. Namely, that they should be exterminated by a nuclear attack.

If one day, he said, the world of Islam comes to possess the weapons currently in Israel's possession [meaning nuclear weapons] – on that day this method of global arrogance would come to a dead end. This, he said, is because the use of a nuclear bomb in Israel will leave nothing on the ground, whereas it will only damage the world of Islam.

Not important enough to mention.

Wed, 06/15/2005 - 00:16 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

grrrr

Damned MSM. It is important. God, in the US you could be in trouble if you inhaled pot in college or said something nasty about Mexicans 20 years ago. We can't have racists in office, after all, nor drug users.

But I guess being genocidal must be different from being a racist.

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 06/15/2005 - 01:13 | reply

Ganji, the leading Iranian dissident facing death in prison

Many Iranian dissidents have called for a boycott of the elections. Some of those calling are now on hunger strikes and facing death. One of them is Naser Zarafshan, the lawyer of the victims of the chain killings of dissidents back in the ninties.

Another is Akbar Ganji. The leading Iranian dissident who has been in prison for the past six years. He was released for a week a short time ago, where he gave interviews asking for a boycott of the elections. He also asked for an end to the position of the Leader of revolution and the formation of a true democracy. He has returned again to prison by himself and is now on hunger strike.

In prison he has written two important manifestos elaborating on his demand for a secular democratic republic and promoting nonviolent resistance.

You can read his second manifesto in English here:

www.freeganji.blogspot.com

(The translation is still continuing for later sections)

Please support Akbar Ganji, Naser Zarafshan and other dissidents. Spread the news. Ask public officials to take a stance.

by Freedom Lover on Wed, 06/15/2005 - 03:51 | reply

Devil's Advocate

Is it clear that Rafsanjani was advocating the use of nuclear weapons, rather than suggesting that the threat of such a use would be sufficient to end the arrogance he criticized?

Maybe something was lost in the translation, but I think that I can read it either way.

Gil

by Gil on Wed, 06/15/2005 - 17:43 | reply

Re: Devil's Advocate

The "arrogance" in question centres on the presence of Jews in Israel. He says:

Jews should wait for a day when this "extraneous matter" would be removed from the region and the world of Islam, and those who have gathered together in Israel would one day be dispersed again.

To achieve this, he advocates, at the very least, threatening nuclear genocide, and is in fact threatening it. Evidently he would prefer the Jews to leave under this threat – because as he says, Muslims would be "harmed" too if it were carried out – but in reality he and everyone else knows that the Jews are not leaving. And the logic of a threat is that if it is not obeyed, it will be carried out.

Yes, his remarks can be interpreted either as advocating a genocidal attack or the threat of such an attack (and this is no doubt deliberate), but either way, the fact that the probable next

President of Iran advocates even the threat of nuclear genocide as a means of ending the presence of Jews in Israel is news. The fact that it is not being reported is itself an event of major significance. What is going on?

by Editor on Wed, 06/15/2005 - 18:19 | reply

I agree that it is news and s

I agree that it is news and should be brought up as much as possible, especially to put pressure on the Iranian regime and to delegitimze the elections and its results.

As far as the nuclear issue is concerned, again I agree that there is a real threat. However rafsanjani becoming president or not wouldn't affect that matter at all. President in the power structure of Iran is just a title out there for show. The real power is elsewhere, especially when it comes to the nuclear issue. Rafsanjani is a major element of that real power, president or not.

by AIS on Thu, 06/16/2005 - 00:25 | reply

Re: I agree that it is news

Good point, AIS. Thanks.

by Editor on Thu, 06/16/2005 - 00:44 | reply

Shape of things to come

Dear friends,

I am writing here to let you know in advance how things are most probably going to play out after this Friday (election day in Iran). The past city council elections and parliament elections in Iran were boycotted by most of the people. This came after the huge participation in 1997 and afterwards in support of the reform. This time, after all that has happened since 9/11, the regime in Iran could no longer endure another boycott, another blow of this magnitude to its legitimacy. At the beginning the usual obvious hardliners were nominated and were about to win again, like the past two elections when ordinary people simply didn't participate. But their candidates were considered by the heads of mafia power to be too direct and uncanny to be able to handle the present difficult situation. Rafsanjani has entered the race first and foremost to have the official position once more to go on with the new strategies of buying legitimacy in the international arena. His second and perhaps more important reason has been to stir up the election atmosphere, discredit the too obvious hardliners and bring people into voting booths. But given his infamous reputation they needed still more tactics to reach this aim. So the reformist candidate was barred and then re-accepted by the leader's decree and has ever since been giving a bit more radical mottos. This combination was meant to bring more people to vote, believing they will hinder Rafsanjani or the hardliners from becoming president. So if the people do show up in considerable numbers and the reformists win, the regime will have its desired turnout to show as its popular backup. The reformists themselves would be mere proxies for the likes of Rafsanjani. If not, Rafsanjani himself will do the job. In any case they are sure the hatred of hardliners and the sheer despair of the people will bring enough voters to the booths to neutralize a complete boycott. Unfortunately the polls seem to show they are right. About 50 to 55% will probably vote on Friday because of this game of good cop/bad cop that has been staged. After the elections, they are going to resume talks with the United States and most probably recognize the Peace Plan, and so indirectly the State of Israel, to send a nice face to a world that is already looking for excuses to start the bargaining. At the same time, they will pursue their nuclear ambitions. In short, we will have an entire oligarchy of Yasser Arafats, actually more canny and deceitful than him, smiling to the rest of the world and steps away from Nukes.

Whatever may come of this, please remember that there were many men and women who called for a boycott, some from within prisons, and who put their lives at stake to prevent this from happening, that the main student body supported the boycott with all its risks, that there are many who will go with the boycott nevertheless on Friday, and that we saw almost no international support this time when it was so desperately needed.

Anyway, as one of the people, and in behalf of those clueless men and women who are going to vote on Friday for the continual of their servitude, let me say in advance and for all it's worth, how sorry I am about this and all that will come of it.

by AIS on Fri, 06/17/2005 - 03:14 | reply

:-)

You're awesome, AIS. I'd pray for you if I wasn't an atheist.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Fri, 06/17/2005 - 03:46 | reply

Thanks a lot.(I didn't expect

Thanks a lot.(I didn't expect this :)

But seriously, when you grow up under their boots, you get to know them a bit.

by AIS on Fri, 06/17/2005 - 07:22 | reply

Well, it seems people didn't Well, it seems people didn't fall for this good cop/bad cop anymore to the great surprise of many (including myself). The regime is the big loser of these "elections" , with huge internal strife and calls of fraud from the governmental observers themselves. They lost a big chance to buy legitimacy and continue to deceive this time around.

by AIS on Sat, 06/25/2005 - 00:51 | reply

Copyright © 2007 Setting The World To Rights

Not Democracy

The British Foreign Office is yearning to be allowed direct and open contact with Hamas and Hezbollah. Their excuse:

The British Government is considering a Middle East policy switch that would mean direct and open contact for the first time with the militant groups Hamas and Hezbollah, which are expected to make significant electoral gains in the West Bank and Gaza and in Lebanon...

But the Foreign Office feels it would be hypocritical to encourage democracy but refuse to accept the outcome, even if it means working with groups it finds distasteful.

"Distasteful", indeed!

Hamas and Hezbollah are not democratic parties. They are gangs of terrorists who also participate in elections when it suits them tactically. They systematically intimidate and murder people and should be disqualified from anything that seriously aspires to be democratic. Hamas murdered a woman for holding hands in public with her fiance. Hezbollah has a 25,000 strong army in Lebanon, where they run a TV station that incites terrorism. They also run an international terror network. If you can't go out in public and criticise a group without fear of reprisals, then they are not fit to participate in elections. Hamas and Hezbollah are as politically illegitimate as the Nazis were, regardless of their hollow electoral victories.

Sun, 06/19/2005 - 02:35 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

What's Worse Than Banning Intolerant Speech?

Via LGF we learn that the Australian State of Victoria's new Racial and Religious Tolerance Act has just been used to prosecute two pastors for suggesting that the Koran promotes violence and terrorism

The Court ordered them to publish a retraction, and to undertake never to say the like again.

They say they will not comply. Hence, they will go to prison.

When a terrorist is next convicted in Victoria, and claims that his actions were justified by the Koran, will he be convicted under that same Act? And after serving his sentence, will he remain in prison for contempt of court until he agrees to attribute his crime to some other motive?

Wed, 06/22/2005 - 04:04 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Torah?

Not to be provocative but rather, logical. What if two Christian ministers or two Muslim clerics claim that the Torah promotes violence and zionism? Will they have to serve hard time? Do specific passages have to be quoted or would this be Torah bashing in general?

by a reader on Thu, 06/23/2005 - 17:04 | reply

Re: Torah?

If such a case were ever brought, then the claim that the Torah promotes violence would presumably be considered prohibited in the State of Victoria. But the claim that the Torah promotes Zionism would not, because, to a reasonable person, Zionism is not a term of abuse. In particular, it is not terrorism.

by Editor on Thu, 06/23/2005 - 17:50 | reply

Zionism

Unfortunately, reasonable persons seem to be in the minority these days, and the Zionism=Racism (and related to terrorism and unjust occupation) meme is widespread.

Gil

by Gil on Thu, 06/23/2005 - 18:32 | reply

Copyright © 2007 Setting The World To Rights

Calill And The Carbolic Smoke Ball Company, Redux

There are many frivolous lawsuits brought nowadays. This is not one of them:

A Kentucky woman who thought she won $100,000 in a radio station giveaway is suing for breach of contract after learning that her prize was actually a Nestle's 100 Grand candy bar. According to the below June 22 Circuit Court complaint, Norreasha Gill, 28, claims that she was listening to Lexington's WLTO-FM on the evening of May 25 when host DJ Slick announced that he would award "100 Grand" to the tenth caller. When Gill, the pregnant mother of three children, was that tenth caller, the radio host told her she could pick up her prize the following day at WLTO's studio. She subsequently learned that the contest was a "joke"

WLTO-FM's lawyers will undoubtedly be studying the classic and elegant case of Calill v. Carbolic Smoke Ball Company:

We are dealing with an express promise to pay £100 in certain events. Read the advertisement how you will, and twist it about as you will, here is a distinct promise expressed in language which is perfectly unmistakable - "£100 reward will be paid by the Carbolic Smoke Ball Company to any person who contracts the influenza after having used the ball three times daily for two weeks according to the printed directions supplied with each ball."

We must first consider whether this was intended to be a promise at all, or whether it was a mere puff which meant nothing. Was it a mere puff? My answer to that question is No, and I base my answer upon this passage: "£1000 is deposited with the Alliance Bank, shewing our sincerity in the matter." Now, for what was that money deposited or that statement made except to negative the suggestion that this was a mere puff and meant nothing at all? The deposit is called in aid by the advertiser as proof of his sincerity in the matter - that is, the sincerity of his promise to pay this £100 in the event which he has specified. I say this for the purpose of giving point to the observation that we are not inferring a promise; there is the promise, as plain as words can make it.

Read the whole thing. The parallels are eerie and, if the facts are as reported, WLTO doesn't have a leg to stand on.

However, the plaintiff is asking for punitive damages. And that is frivolous and unjust. She should get her hundred grand plus costs and not a penny more. If she wins punitive damages, it will be an injustice almost as great as if she lost the case altogether. The whole idea of punishment where there has been no crime should be anathema to any civilised society.

Thu, 06/23/2005 - 20:55 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Wow Editor!

Thanks for homing in on the important issues and ignoring the trivial stuff like the Real ID Act or the supreme court's decisions on medical marijuana and imminent domain.

However, it could be The World doesn't focus on these issues because the data might contradict their theories. i.e. that democracy, far from being a way to get rid of bad ideas, is an excellent way of assuring that bad ideas are institutionalised.

by a reader on Sat, 06/25/2005 - 03:48 | reply

Democracy is bad...?

Compared with what? Casting runes?

by David Deutsch on Sat, 06/25/2005 - 03:59 | reply

Focus

I guess that, being in the UK, The World's editors are a bit removed from the Real ID Act and recent US Supreme Court decisions, and so it's understandable that they don't focus on it as much as americans might.

I suspect that they would oppose them, but they would also be aware that these developments have sparked considerable public interest in these issues and are likely to cause many people to support reforms. Democracy isn't perfect or swift to come to the best conclusions, but it seems better than alternative systems of organizing institutions that wield power.

Even the National Review, a pretty extreme conservative magazine, has come out against the medical marijuana decision. So, I think that better ideas can spread, and democracy can lead to the correction of mistakes, eventually.

The World is doing its part to help spread good ideas so as to help democracy along toward progressing.

What are you doing?

What alternative are you proposing?

Gil

by Gil on Sat, 06/25/2005 - 06:28 | reply

Re: Wow Editor!

The principle of avoiding punishment where there has been no crime conflicts directly with both ID cards and the war on marijuana. So the post was actually quite relevant to your examples.

(Don't know what imminent domain is and wikipedia's offline for now)

by Tom Robinson on Mon, 06/27/2005 - 22:36 | reply

Eminent Domain

Tom, try "eminent domain", or anything about the recent Kelo decision.

Here is a pretty good op-ed article about it.

Gil

by Gil on Wed, 06/29/2005 - 05:01 | reply

Re: Democracy is bad...?

Collective ownership of a monopoly (in this case a monopoly on the use of force) is good? Compared with what? Collective ownership of the entire economy? It seems to me the world's entire view of democracy revolves around Popper's flawed views on the matter. The views of previous and subsequent thinkers have been largely ignored. e.g.: An economist has calculated that the odds of an individual being in an accident going to vote are greater than the odds of that individual having an effect on the outcome of the election. Did Popper think that individuals must act in conflict with their own self interest for bad ideas/policies to be corrected?

These are types of question that the World will not confront because it conflicts with the World's pre-existing world view.

by a reader on Thu, 06/30/2005 - 02:22 | reply

re: Focus

Oh come on! The editor(s) can cite some obscure Kentucky ruling, but "are a bit removed from the Real ID Act and recent US Supreme Court decisions"?

by a reader on Thu, 06/30/2005 - 02:29 | reply

Re: Democracy is bad...?

The problem with not specifying an alternative system for comparison, when one claims that democracy is bad because it has property X, is that one is then blinded to possibilities such as:

- All institutions for human interaction have property X.
- In all institutions for human interaction, there is a tradeoff between property X and property Y, and you dislike Y even more than X. (Here I am thinking partly of the no-go theorems of decision theory such as Arrow's theorem, which it's well worth looking up on Google.)
- As above, but substituting 'all institutions that have yet been proposed' for 'all institutions'.
- Although institutions without the property X or worse are possible, they cannot function in the absence of evolved knowledge that does not yet exist in people's minds. Thus, to give an analogy, merely enacting a copy of the US Constitution for Iraq today would not, in reality, secure the rights and freedoms described therein. Similarly, on the supposition that there exists a better system than, say, US democracy, merely abandoning democracy and declaring that the better system is now in effect would not actually cause the better system to come into effect. X would still be there, and worse.

by David Deutsch on Thu, 06/30/2005 - 06:28 | reply

Democracy is bad...

especially when compared to capitalism, i.e. the market.

by a reader on Fri, 07/01/2005 - 18:48 | reply

The Dark Logic Of Moral Equivalence

The Anglican Consultative Council, whose President is the Archbishop of Canterbury, has voted to recommend that its member churches divest from businesses that support Israeli "occupation" of the territories. As Melanie Philips said, they did this in response to a report "full of the most inflammatory lies, libels and distortions about Israel".

In an attempt to ward off accusations of bias, they also recommended that churches divest from businesses that support Palestinian violence against innocent Israelis. With this attempt at formal 'even-handedness' the Council betrays its moral bankruptcy and ignorance of the situation in Israel and Palestine as much as with anything else in the report. Palestinian terrorist groups try to attack Israelis and fantasise about destroying Israel. So the Israelis run military operations to stop terrorism and take security measures to prevent murderers from coming into Israel.

The Council are trying to be neutral between Palestinian terrorists on the one hand and Israel on the other. Their press release illustrates the dark logic of this moral equivalence. In it they do not mention terrorism. Nor do they mention that the Palestinian terrorist groups want to destroy Israel. Nor that their ideologies are based explicitly on wild antisemitic conspiracy theories, and that all the institutions of their society relentlessly transmit these to their children. Nor do they mention that Palestinian terrorist groups regularly murder Palestinians for "collaborating" with Israel, i.e. - for warning Israelis who are in danger of being murdered. However, they do manage to squeeze in a reference to "the draconian conditions of the continuing occupation under which so many Palestinians live." The Council's problem is that if they wish to remain neutral then they can't mention the agenda or the crimes of Palestinian terrorists. If they did, then they would have to admit that the terrorists are evil and the Israelis are defending themselves from this evil. So they can only mention the Israeli government's security measures while carefully refraining from putting them into context. And so their 'even-handedness' leads directly to their one-sided condemnation of Israel. The Church of England has sold its soul for the sake of appearing neutral.

Well said.

JL

by JL on Thu, 06/30/2005 - 22:54 | reply

title

moral equivalence better title than moral relativism. cheers

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Fri, 07/01/2005 - 14:51 | reply

Title

"Moral equivalence better title than moral relativism".

Yeah, I agree...the post being about both, of course, but with equivalence compounding the crime.

by Carlotta on Mon, 07/04/2005 - 04:00 | reply

More on the same topic...

Along the same lines,

have a look at this article

And our comments on one of the letters about it.

ZionistGuys at Zionism On The Web

by ZionistGuys on Fri, 08/26/2005 - 12:19 | reply

Not Just Bystanders

Milton Friedman once wrote that businesses only have a responsibility to increase their profits. For interactions within the laws of a free society, this formula is an excellent approximation to the truth. But when a business is involved with the government of a fear society, not everything it might do to increase its profits is morally permissible.

Microsoft has decided to block Chinese bloggers who try to use words like "freedom", "democracy", "demonstration", "human rights" and "Taiwan independence". Contrary to A Reasonable Man, we think Microsoft is behaving wrongly here. Microsoft has no duty to prevent the Chinese government from oppressing its citizens, but it should not collaborate with such attempts by acting as an enforcer. This is the difference a man between watching a thug beat somebody up because he is too weak or poorly armed or frightened to intervene, and the same man intentionally blocking the victim's escape route, or offering the thug a heavier lead pipe.

As in the case of international aid which gets appropriated by the very governments that have caused the victims' poverty, a totalitarian oppressor can always arrange matters so that if one wants to help at all, one must collaborate with him and entrench his power. In the extreme case, terrorists do the same when they take hostages. At the other extreme, any trade (and some would say any government) creates an element of this moral dilemma, and there is room for disagreement about where a bystander becomes a collaborator. (The interesting movie The Accused also explores this issue.) We think that in this case Microsoft could and should have said no to imposing these restrictions, which are so odious to the culture in which it thrives and on which it relies. It said yes, and crossed the line.

Tue, 07/05/2005 - 10:29 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

I think your analogy is a bit

I think your analogy is a bit off the mark. It's more like offering the victim a stick to fight back a little bit rather than offering him nothing until the government allows you to supply him with a machine gun.

Speaking of guns, should gun stores refuse to sell anything because they're not allowed to sell everything? What about network television and radio in America? Are they morally obligated to stop broadcasting until all FCC censorship ends?

Was it immoral to open a bookstore in Nazi Germany? What if you could offer a lot of great books to people who would otherwise have no access them? You couldn't offer every book, but is this the same as giving a Nazi a larger pipe to beat your neighbor harder?

Is Microsoft operating in China a net good, or net bad for freedom? Will more ideas of freedom be spread through these blogs (even given the censorship) or less?

Perhaps euphemisms will arise to replace these banned words and phrases. Or maybe you can just purposefully misspell stuff. At any rate, banning ideas seems a lot harder to enforce than banning porn.

by Wile E on Tue, 07/05/2005 - 14:57 | reply

Analogies

Obviously, I agree with Wile E.

To continue the other part of the analogy...it's not at all like blocking the victim's escape route. It's like building him a new narrow escape route. Obviously it would be better to be able to offer a wider one; but if the government would find and eliminate such a wide escape route, the narrow one is much better than the only realistic alternative: none at all.

The World seems to have ignored, or missed, the point of my post and the issue in Wile E's most important question: "Is Microsoft operating in China a net good or a net bad for freedom?" Likewise for Google and Yahoo.

Other good questions:

What is the alternative, and why is it better?

Who, besides irrational outsiders, is Microsoft hurting?

Gil (A Reasonable Man)

by Gil on Tue, 07/05/2005 - 16:48 | reply

Deferential

Your argument assumes the infallibility of the Chinese Government when it declares that they would find and close any escapes they want to, and denies any ill consequences they might suffer from doing so.

When people act deferentially about thugs, and avoid doing things the thugs disapprove of, then thugs needn't go through the trouble of exercising their power, and displaying to the world their tactics.

This does aid them, and it constitutes abandoning the victims.

Suggesting that there are workarounds available is unpersuasive. If it's so easy to trick the Chinese government, why doesn't Microsoft do it instead of leaving it up to the censored bloggers?

Is Microsoft operating in China a net good or a net bad for freedom?

I deny that is the choice to be made here. And let me remind you that if the Chinese Government thought Microsoft was harmful then Microsoft would be thrown out entirely.

BTW, for what it's worth, I agree The World's analogy is flawed. But I don't see analogies as the main issue here.

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 07/05/2005 - 22:31 | reply

Elliot, I'm confused. Ar

Elliot, I'm confused.

Are you suggesting that Microsoft not operate in China, or operate there, but either openly or covertly defy the restrictions that the Chinese government has mandated?

by Wile E on Wed, 07/06/2005 - 00:33 | reply

Fallibility and Deference

I'm not assuming that the Chinese government is infallible. But I am assuming that they're competent to test whether Microsoft is complying with simple restrictive measures.

I agree that it's possible to cooperate with thugs to an extent that would be immoral, but I think this is not even close to an example of that.

The restrictions are very minor, and the Chinese government has been practicing sophisticated information suppression long before Microsoft showed up there. Microsoft is giving the people a new tool to share ideas and information, with a few silly, minor, limitations. Getting kicked out for violating the laws would be bad for the chinese people, and bad for Microsoft.

I think that the Internet represents a dilemma for the Chinese government. The productivity gains that it offers are too great to pass up. But it's also going to allow the citizens the ability to understand what they're being denied and to organize opposition.

I suspect that the leaders know that their days are numbered and are just trying to postpone the inevitable.

It seems clear to me that Microsoft's contributions in China are helping the people, and accelerating their liberation. This is exactly the sort of peaceful evolution due to the spread of ideas that we should be cheering on, not sniping at.

Gil

by Gil on Wed, 07/06/2005 - 01:21 | reply

Re: Fallibility and Deference

Wile E,

I wasn't suggesting a course of action. I would advise you to look more to what I say instead of guessing what I may be trying to imply. If I wanted to say more, I would.

Gil,

Do you think there would be no side effects to the Chinese Government enforcing their censorship themselves?

The restrictions are not minor, and that isn't the point. Doing what they want to avoid getting thrown out is appeasement. The threat to kick Microsoft out isn't going anywhere, and there is nothing to stop the Chinese from asking for more.

That said, appeasement is sometimes tactically justified, and the Chinese Government may be incompetent at deciding what to ask for. So I might be tempted to support this action. But then I read quotes from the linked article like this:

Microsoft said the company abided by the laws, regulations and norms of each country in which it operates.

It is harmful to explicitly legitimise bad governments. And unnecessary.

I rather doubt the Chinese leaders "know that their days are numbered". That would amount to them believing their own ideals mistaken and unworkable.

I'm not sniping, I'm arguing. There is good here, but there are also parts worthy of criticism.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 07/06/2005 - 05:09 | reply

Alternatives

Every company doing business in every country has to either comply with stupid, harmful regulations, or risk being forcibly forbidden from engaging in its business. This would be bad for the company, and bad for the customers of its goods and services.

It is not always appeasement to comply with these laws. It's a judgment call, and compliance is often better than the available alternatives.

Microsoft isn't electrocuting people, or transmitting their information to a death squad. They're just generating a popup window that notifies the users that they can't use certain words or phrases in post titles. People can easily get their messages across using different expressions.

The whole point of my original post is that it isn't useful to criticize companies for not accomplishing perfection, when that's not a realistic possibility. What makes sense is to judge whether they are making good choices among actual alternatives. It's not better to forgo the good because it doesn't achieve perfection. Often, perfection is not an option. It's folly to let this imagined perfection become the enemy of the good.

It's helpful to know that there are aspects of a situation that are bad. But, before choosing to pursue another option, you must consider whether that option is actually better.

You didn't answer Wile E's questions, but you felt comfortable saying that Microsoft is in the wrong. That doesn't make any sense to me. It can only be wrong if there is something else to do that's better. Since you don't seem to know what that might be, how you can be confident that what Microsoft is doing is wrong?

Gil

by Gil on Wed, 07/06/2005 - 06:00 | reply

What Law?

You say that Microsoft has to comply with Chinese laws. But as MSN itself has printed there is no law in China forbidding the use of the words in question:

The MSN Spaces code of conduct forbids the posting of content that "violates any local and national laws".

But while China's ruling Communist Party deals harshly with political dissenters, there is no Chinese law that bars the mere use of words such as democracy.

by Alan Forrester on Wed, 07/06/2005 - 13:22 | reply

Re: Alternatives

Gil,

My primary point was just that I thought certain arguments given on the subject were poor.

I think Microsoft has the wrong view of the matter, and to some extent the wrong values. Thus it makes sense for me to say Microsoft is doing things wrong -- at the very least Microsoft is expressing the wrong attitude to the press. (But if they do that, it seems a very good bet their actions could use some improvements too.)

I don't need to know how to improve Microsoft to say this.

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 07/06/2005 - 16:12 | reply

No Law

Alan,

That's interesting. I suspect that, regardless of whether there is an explicit law involved, there were specifications that Microsoft had to meet to be permitted to provide the service. I highly doubt that Microsoft decided to forbid these words and expressions on their own. But, if it turns out that this is indeed what happened, I'll be happy to change my position.

None of us knows all of the details, which I think also argues against claims that Microsoft is acting wrongly.

I'm not saying that Microsoft is acting perfectly, just that the claims I've seen that they are acting immorally have been unsupported by valid arguments.

Gil

by Gil on Wed, 07/06/2005 - 16:33 | reply

Microsoft PR

Elliot,

I'm happy to agree with you that Microsoft has a lot of work to do to improve their public messages and perceptions.

I do think that much of the negative perception is overblown, but I agree that they could and should do a better job of communicating their messages.

Gil

by Gil on Wed, 07/06/2005 - 16:38 | reply

You are confusing yourselves

You, libertarians just hate to admit that within your ideas there is no practical bulletproof fence against oppression and coercion. And although you talk about coercion and freedom very much, the case with Microsoft exhibits your contradictions. Even if Microsoft were genuinely and actively helping Chinese government to oppress people half of you would disagree on whether Microsoft should be banned from cooperating with China or not. Half of you would always argue that Chinese government is responsible for oppression, not Microsoft.

On the other hand, asking Microsoft managers to be more "moral" or to promote more freedom is just as ridiculous.

There is no solution to this problem within libertarian infrastructure.

I suspect even, that once a group of people has been given full "libertarian" freedom to organise their society as they want on a secluded island they will most likely end up with stronger people oppressing weaker people in a direct or indirect manner, asserting constantly and unequivocally that coercion is really bad. However, all non-libertarian folk will be immediately accused of being "tyrants" and "oppressors".

Your will never agree that nearly everything is good only up to a point.

by a reader on Mon, 07/18/2005 - 13:31 | reply

Who is confused?

Aren't you judging Libertarianism by a different standard to everything else? Under democracy, fascism, cannibalism, or whatever else you personally might favor to Libertarianism, people are going to disagree about what the law should say. So why is that an argument against Libertarianism specifically? Libertarian infrastructure will resolve the disagreement one way or another, depending on the flavor of Libertarianism. So will democracy, depending on the flavor of democracy. So what?

You claim everything [meaning Libertarianism] is only good up to a point. But that's only relevant if you know of something that's better than Libertarianism. What?

by a reader on Mon, 07/18/2005 - 14:07 | reply

Something better than libertarianism

The American political tradition is better than libertarianism.

by Woty on Mon, 07/18/2005 - 15:16 | reply

Who is confused?

No, the problem is not that libertarians are in disagreement about everything. On the contrary, pluralism is a good feature of libertarianism. Your disagreement in this particular case just exhibits a contradiction in libertarianism. But you ignored the contradiction that I described. You prefer to argue about "sideway" point. The contradiction between theory and practice. In theory, libertarians favor freedom and despise coercion. But libertarianism fails to provide a reasonable and practical mean to achieve this. If Microsoft were genuinely oppressing Chinese people as paid for by Chinese government you would still argue that it is the Chinese government that pays for such service and is therefore responsible for oppression, not Microsoft.

If tobacco companies trick people into smoking which gives no benefits to mankind whatsoever you would still argue that it is a free choice of every individual to smoke or not to smoke and that by putting pressure on tobacco companies would necessarily lead to coercion of just about every business on the planet.

And another interesting point you make: if I am not a libertarian you tell me off straight away. It is a second nature to any libertarian - to think that others are necessarily in favor of "fascism, cannibalism, or whatever".

by a reader on Tue, 07/19/2005 - 11:36 | reply

Re: Something better than Libertarianism

The American political tradition is better than libertarianism.

To me, these are apples and oranges. The American political tradition is a specific tradition, actually implemented in the institutions of a society and actually functioning. Libertarianism is not an institution nor a specification of institutions but a property which, many people hope, the institutions of some future society may have.

Some - perhaps most - of them deny this. They think they have a blueprint for such institutions. For instance, some of them think that all that is needed is to repeal certain laws and pass others. So they are utopians, but I want to distinguish their utopianism (which, like all utopianism, is irrational) from their Libertarianism.

I entirely agree that the American political tradition is better than any institutions that might be set up today (say, at gunpoint) with the intention that they be Libertarian. On the other hand, I also think that one day the American political tradition itself will evolve into a better state, and that this state will have very Libertarian properties. (Though as some commenters above have pointed out, different people who call themselves Libertarians have conflicting ideas about what those properties are, in detail.) So that 'Libertarianism' will be better than today's 'American political tradition'.

by David Deutsch on Tue, 07/19/2005 - 13:19 | reply

The Difference

We are saddened and angered by the terrorist attacks that took place this morning in London. At the same time, the leaders of the G8 were meeting in Gleneagles to discuss how to try to solve some of the world's problems. The leaders at the G8 summit disagree profoundly with each another about how best to do this. However, they are good people and good people resolve their differences through discussion. Evil people, like the terrorists and the world's various fear regimes, lash out violently and hurt and kill people instead of thinking seriously about how to solve problems.

There can be no doubt that if today's terrorists had had it in their power to murder and maim and bereave ten times as many people, they would have done so with relish. If such people get hold of weapons of mass destruction they will destroy entire cities without hesitation. The West must not hesitate to take action against countries like Iran to prevent them from developing such weapons. If they do, the Iranian government and their ilk will not hold a summit when they disagree with civilised countries: they will threaten or commit mass murder to get their way.

Thu, 07/07/2005 - 14:24 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Glad to see all is well...

...with the folks at The World.

by Solomon on Thu, 07/07/2005 - 19:57 | reply

Re: Glad to see all is well...

Thanks, Solomon.

by Editor on Thu, 07/07/2005 - 20:15 | reply

Re: The Difference

Our thoughts are with you in Britain.

by Michael Golding on Fri, 07/08/2005 - 10:45 | reply

Iran war should do just nicely

Let's give 'em hell.

by Warmonger on Mon, 07/11/2005 - 06:46 | reply

Re: Iran war should do just nicely

To whom should we give hell and to what end? And what would it do nicely?

by Editor on Mon, 07/11/2005 - 08:13 | reply

Wishing you well

I was stunned. I still am. Glad you are well, and yes, I concur with your views. Pacifism, or otherwise failing to understand the sheer hatred of these terrorists and their capacity for destruction , is a prescription for disaster.

Atheist though I am, God bless Great Britain.

by Charles Dahl on Fri, 07/15/2005 - 08:05 | reply

Happy to see that you are all

Happy to see that you are all unharmed in the terrible bombings in London.

by AIS on Sat, 07/16/2005 - 00:57 | reply

Just wanted to say I'm glad y'all are ok. I wish the hundreds of people injured and the dead were too :(

Becky Moon

by beckyam on Fri, 07/22/2005 - 15:08 | reply

Two Karls

Karl Popper was a great philosopher who solved the problem of induction and who shed light on many philosophical problems related to freedom. Popper showed that people learn through critical thought and discussion, not by building their views on non-existent secure foundations. Karl Marx was an intellectual lightweight whose utter misunderstanding of economics, his antisemitism and his worship of violence combined to form a poisonous brew that inspired all the terrible tyrants of the twentieth century from Hitler to Stalin.

Nevertheless, when BBC Radio 4 held a poll about who is the greatest philosopher, Marx was at number 1 and Popper was at number 10.

Why do so many people celebrate Marx? Marx was only one in a long line of philosophers who advocated socialism - the idea that people should collectively own property. But people cannot collectively own property. A given piece of property can only be put to a finite number of non-conflicting uses, and people are fallible, which is why they disagree. When people practise capitalism they decide how property will be used through agreements to which they subscribe voluntarily. Socialists and other opponents of capitalism license one particular group to use violence, or the threat thereof, to steal property from another. Favouring one group through violence prevents critical discussion of different ways to use property, which is anti-rational. Popper argued that we should have an open society in which people are free to criticise and work for the alteration of current institutions through reason and persuasion. Marx's contribution to this debate was to say that logic was a creation of the bourgeoisie and so logic is an evil tool of oppression. The workers, Marx said, had a different logic. When Marx had thrown logic out of the window he could say anything he liked and so was free to argue for socialism. Many of Marx's intellectual descendants have used Marx's argument against bourgeois logic to say their opponents are bourgeois and therefore necessarily wrong, without bothering to address their arguments. Thus Marx provided socialists with a way to cut short debates that they would have lost if they had stuck to rational discussion. That is why so many socialists love Marx: he gave them an excuse for their intellectual and moral irresponsibility. If our readers want an example of the sort of confusion that Marx's philosophy helped to encourage, we urge them to listen to the discussion on the programme that announced the results.

People can only really use Marx's philosophy to entrench error. However, we can use Popper's insights on knowledge and the open society to puncture the pretensions of dogmatic philosophers, illiberal governments and tyrants, and to understand the nature of knowledge and freedom. Karl Popper and Karl Marx have the same first name, but there the similarity ends. .

Fri, 07/15/2005 - 14:23 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

A brave Popperian on hunger strike in Iranian jails

So true!

A bit OT:

Things are very heated up in Iran right now. One of the most important events of these times is being completely ignored by the MSM:

Akbar Ganji, the Iranian dissident, who is a staunch Popperian BTW, is on hunger strike for the past 35 days demanding his unconditional freedom. In the meantime he has been writing extremely bold and interesting letters and manifestos from inside the prison that are smuggled out.

President Bush has personally demanded for his immediate release. Unfortunately major news outlets are completely silent on this issue, with the exception of New York Sun that has been running articles and editorials about it.

As was posted before, you can read Ganji's letters and manifestos in English here: www.freeganji.blogspot.com

by AIS on Sat, 07/16/2005 - 01:03 | reply

Voting anomalies

It is sad of course that Marx ended on #1 and Popper on #10. However, polls like this don't really mean that much. I don't mean that in the sense that you shouldn't take the responses of average people seriously. I mean it more literally: that the results don't actually convey very relevant information about the views of the people polled. For example, say you have 10 philosophers to vote on and 9 of them are rational and 1 is irrational. And say 72% of people vote for a rational philosopher and 28% for an irrational philosopher. Then the irrational philosopher will still end up at #1, even though only a minority prefer an irrational philosopher. The reason being that the other 9 'split' the rational vote, with each one receiving 8%. So too, from this BBC poll one can't draw any conclusion regarding the relevant question whether most people prefer Marx or Popper. This can only be seen using a Condorcet voting system. If all these same people had been asked: looking only at two philosophers, Marx and Popper, who do you prefer? Then there is no way to know from the results we actually have who would win. It's possible Popper would have beat Marx.

Henry Sturman

by Henry Sturman on Sat, 07/16/2005 - 04:27 | reply

I just wanted to add a little

I just wanted to add a little bit of context to explain why my comment was somewhat relevant to this post:

Islamism , especially in its form in Iran owes a lot to communism. The revolution in 1979 was a half breed communist-islamist one and the basic elements of the ruling ideology have many marxist elements, the hatred of the capitalist, "imperialist" West embodied in the United States being an important example. The hostage taking was partly the result of islamist and marxist groups competing for anti-imperialistic legitimacy. The interrogation and torture techniques of the Islamic Republic are directly inherited from Stalinism....

Now a new stand point, that of the open society is gradually dominating the discourse of the young and educated generation inside Iran, with people like Ganji leading the new way. The events surrounding Ganji's life and death battle is also the clash of the two world views.

by AIS on Sat, 07/16/2005 - 04:39 | reply

Thanks for the link

Good to see that someone turned up on my Popper/Bartley/classical liberalism site from the link in your piece! And thanks for the information from Iran, I will post that on to my home blog, Catallaxy.

<http://badanalysis.com/catallaxy/>

by Rafe Champion on Sat, 07/16/2005 - 14:09 | reply

I Disagree

Shoddy arguing. I expect better from The World. Two examples:

That is why so many socialists love Marx: he gave them an excuse for their intellectual and moral irresponsibility.

I believe that socialists, on the whole, are genuinely persuaded and mean well. Extraordinary claims like their desire for excuses (and thus their implicit admission that they are bad) require extraordinary arguments, which were omitted.

People can only really use Marx's philosophy to entrench error.

This is false. Marx's philosophy can be used for lots of things.

It is misleading. If my friend is a socialist hope is not lost. If my friend remains a socialist for decades, hope is still not lost. I should not assume his views are entrenched. If I do, and treat him worse as a consequence, or fail to tell him my arguments in the normal way, then I am doing him a disservice, and helping cause this supposed entrenchment. I must avoid thinking of him as damaged, and I must avoid being frustrated by perceived entrenchment when I talk with him. Instead, I must take him seriously as a thinking person.

In our history, there have been effects other than "entrenching error" that have come about from putting Marx's ideas into practice. One effect has been to test some of Marx's ideas (they aren't all testable). Further, the effects of people thinking about Marx's philosophy have included thinking. And the effects of people discussing it have included discussion. All this thinking and discussion was not to entrench error or anything of the sort, by and large it was people doing their best to figure out good ideas.

I want to further add that the defense of capitalism above is incomplete. And I think the ways it is incomplete will jump out at most Marxists, so this is an important oversight. One way it is incomplete is it says capitalism means consensual use of property, but it doesn't address the case of me wanting to use my neighbors' property. It is not obvious that all cases of me wanting to use my neighbors' property are bad. It also fails to address the common complaint of people born into bad situations they do not want.

Finally, statements like "Karl Marx was an intellectual lightweight whose utter misunderstanding" are ad hominem and will do nothing but entrench your point of view. Right?

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Sat, 07/16/2005 - 15:45 | reply

Re: Voting anomalies

Henry,

While you have a technical point, I'd point out that most famous philosophers are crap, and the people who will be most aware of that are probably Popper supporters, so I would expect his votes to be least fractured.

EDIT: BTW, even if they are wrong that most philosophers are crap, I still think Popper supporters are most likely to believe it's true, so the voting phenomenon will still happen.

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Sat, 07/16/2005 - 15:49 | reply

Re: Voting Anomalies

Henry -

If Marx had won with 1% of the vote and all the others had received just under 1%, then your point would hold. But Marx winning 27.93% of the vote is appalling in itself, and would be almost as appalling if he had come third rather than first, and even if every one of the 72.07% who did not rank him first, ranked him last.

So this outrage is not an artefact of voting anomalies.

by David Deutsch on Sat, 07/16/2005 - 19:16 | reply

Appalling

Eh, it's not the end of the world. People have heard of him. Voting for him doesn't mean they're bad people. Most weren't voting seriously. That's ok, it wasn't a serious poll.

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Sat, 07/16/2005 - 19:26 | reply

Re: voting Anomalies

David -

Yes, you're right. I worded my point too strongly. The poll does indeed convey relevant information, namely the appalling fact that 28% of people rank Marx first. I should have said only that there is a small consolation due to a possible voting anomaly: it is still possible that most people would have ranked Popper above Marx.

Henry Sturman

by Henry Sturman on Sat, 07/16/2005 - 20:46 | reply

Re: Voting Anomalies

Agreed.

by David Deutsch on Sat, 07/16/2005 - 21:09 | reply

Re: I disagree

Finally, statements like "Karl Marx was an intellectual lightweight whose utter misunderstanding" are ad hominem and will do nothing but entrench your point of view. Right?

No. In that sense, the whole contest, and every vote cast, was "ad hominem". Our comment was apt in this context. Many people, even those who have strongly opposed Marx, even Popper himself, have succumbed to the misguided aura of respectability that has surrounded Marx and treated him as though he were a philosopher. Our comment was not an argument. It was a reminder that the Emperor has no clothes.

Update: Think of it as being addressed to Popper, not to Ken Livingstone.

by Editor on Sun, 07/17/2005 - 15:17 | reply

No Clothes

Deciding people you disagree with don't have clothes is not the way to make progress.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Sun, 07/17/2005 - 17:14 | reply

Fame is the name of the poll game

"Nevertheless, when BBC Radio 4 held a poll about who is the greatest philosopher, Marx was at number 1 and Popper was at number 10."

We might ask, "What is the greatest soft drink?" to a similar audience. Likely Coke would be at number 1 and another as yet unnamed soft drink would be at number 10. Would that poll result be equally unmeaningful?

As to polls, ask a silly question, get a silly answer.

by a reader on Mon, 07/18/2005 - 01:04 | reply

Re: I Disagree

In many respects socialism is an emotionally appealing ideology. People see poor people going without and naturally think that if only rich people would give their money to the poor everything would be fine and dandy. So when somebody argues against this idea, some socialists are not inclined to accept that argument because they find it emotionally upsetting and what they would really like is an excuse not to listen to it at all. Marx provided them with an excuse. The socialists who accept this excuse are not bad people, but they are intellectually and morally irresponsible even if they have good motives.

by Alan Forrester on Tue, 07/19/2005 - 01:38 | reply

Two Marxes

Thus Marx provided socialists with a way to cut short debates that they would have lost if they had stuck to rational discussion. That is why so many socialists love Marx: he gave them an excuse for their intellectual and moral irresponsibility.

Thus The World provided libertarians with a way to cut short debates that they would have lost if they had stuck to rational discussion. That is why so many libertarians love to call Marx socialist: it gave them an excuse for their intellectual and moral irresponsibility.

There are 2 Marxes: one as a political engineer (a rather bad one, as almost any other great philosopher though) and one as a great philosopher. What you mentioned here is only his stupid political agenda, nothing more. However, his philosophical ideas are entrenched into many peoples minds: "verification by practice", dialectics, materialistic view etc.. You prefer not to even mention them for public. Otherwise you will have to do a long discussion instead of very short one. In fact, you don't even have a discussion of Marx's heritage. All you have here is a political slogan.

Most of the posts here are like political slogans and become every day less and less intellectually appealing for me. Sorry

by a reader on Wed, 07/20/2005 - 11:41 | reply

Political Slogans

Most of the posts here are like political slogans and become every day less and less intellectually appealing for me.

Out of curiosity, which blogs do you like better?

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 07/20/2005 - 17:18 | reply

Re: Political Slogans

Out of curiosity, which blogs do you like better?

There are plenty of them nowadays. Some consist of short notes saying mostly something like "You know this guy - Marx. I don't like him" and some have real discussions (while very few can have really comprehensive analysis - but hey, that is just a weblog!).

I have found interesting material here, for example on conspiracy theories or history of Israel. But as I keep reading your posts they move towards the first type of blogs.

Marx is definitely not no. 1, but neither is Karl Popper, whether you like it or not. Defining no 1 in philosophy is kind of stupid anyway. Then why bother discussing who should be in top-10 and who shouldn't?

by a reader on Wed, 07/20/2005 - 18:43 | reply

They aren't my posts. Who

They aren't my posts.

Who is better than Popper?

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 07/20/2005 - 20:00 | reply

Who is better than Popper?

I am surprised you are still pursuing this question! How can you define? The only thing you can do is to ask "who sells better?" or "who is the most popular?".

Just because Popper suits better to libertarianism as a political movement doesn't mean he is bestest of the bestest. Not long ago people were asked "who is better than Mao" or "who is better philosopher than Lenin". We've seen this all and don't want to go this way again.

Philosophy is more for thought than for charts.

by a reader on Thu, 07/21/2005 - 11:00 | reply

Thought

What sort of thought never reaches any conclusions about whether one set of ideas is truer than another?

by Editor on Thu, 07/21/2005 - 11:04 | reply

Thought

Philosophy is not a "set of ideas" and neither as a "falsifiable theory". You confuse philosophy with something else, for example politics, or perhaps chemistry. Philosophical system is a system view of the world. Philosophical systems don't get rejected when a new evidence emerges that can falsify one theory and favor another.

Marx saw society as an extension of family and build his economical system on this basis. You cannot say straight away whether he was right or wrong in his thoughts. When it comes to practical implementation of his political agenda only then one can ask "whether one set of ideas is truer than another".

by a reader on Thu, 07/21/2005 - 13:43 | reply

Re: Thought

A reader wrote:

Philosophy is not a "set of ideas" and neither as a "falsifiable theory". You confuse philosophy with something else, for example politics, or perhaps chemistry. Philosophical system is a system view of the world. Philosophical systems don't get rejected when a new evidence emerges that can falsify one theory and favor another.

We can refute philosophical ideas by argument. For example, a solipsist might say that the world doesn't really exist and that he made it all up. However, if he is right then vast portions of his own mind are entirely outside his control. He cannot win the National Lottery, fly by flapping his arms and so on. And there are many things about this supposed dream world that nobody understands like dream quantum gravity. So all the solipsist has done is label the vast, complex and only partly understood structure of the real world as a dream. This adds nothing to any explanation of how the real world works and so we can reject it.

Marx saw society as an extension of family and build his economical system on this basis. You cannot say straight away whether he was right or wrong in his thoughts. When it comes to practical implementation of his political agenda only then one can ask "whether one set of ideas is truer than another".

Nope. We refuted some of Marx's ideas above. Economists like F. A. Hayek and Ludwig von Mises refuted others.

by Alan Forrester on Sat, 08/13/2005 - 01:57 | reply

We

Who does "we" refer to at the end?

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Sat, 08/13/2005 - 02:13 | reply

And Who Shall Guard The Guardians?

On Thursday 7 July, Islamist terrorists murdered over 50 Britons in a suicide bombing attack. The Metropolitan Police regard this as a terrible crime and are working to hunt down the people responsible.

However, the Metropolitan Police and the Association of Chief Police Officers are funding an Islamic academic called Tariq Ramadan to speak to the Middle Path conference in London on July 24 to the tune of £9000. So what will Mr Ramadan say?

Asked by one Italian magazine if the killing of civilians was morally right, he replied: "In Palestine, Iraq, Chechnya, there is a situation of oppression, repression and dictatorship. It is legitimate for Muslims to resist fascism that kills the innocent." Asked if car bombings were justified against US forces in Iraq, he answered: "Iraq was colonised by the Americans. Resistance against the army is just."

The Metropolitan Police Commissioner Sir Ian Blair said:

"Clearly this man has views about the struggle in Palestine and the struggles in Iraq which I find very difficult or offensive.

"(But) unless we hear these voices we are going to be in trouble..."

Sir Ian, and the other Mr Blair, do not seem to understand what they are doing. Mr Ramadan, who is barred from the United States for security reasons, is inciting violence against innocent people in Iraq, in Chechnya and in Israel. Incitement to violence is a criminal offence so Mr Ramadan is a criminal. Has he given convincing assurances he will not repeat those opinions again? If not, the Metropolitan Police and the Association of Chief Police Officers are knowingly sponsoring him to commit a crime, and have therefore also committed a crime.

But they think that they are going to be "in trouble" unless they commit it. What sort of trouble?

Update: A correspondent writes "He's not just inciting violence. He's inciting war." Indeed.

Inciting war

That is exactly what Mr. Bush did with his WMD claims in Iraq.

by a reader on Sun, 07/17/2005 - 17:21 | reply

Re: Inciting War

That can't be right. We have tremendous respect for the British armed forces, but we are sure that if Mr Bush had incited war against Britain, we would have lost by now.

by Editor on Sun, 07/17/2005 - 17:40 | reply

And by saying so you admit

And by saying so you admit that only inciting war against Britain is a crime?

by a reader on Mon, 07/18/2005 - 13:09 | reply

Re: And by saying so you admit

A reader wrote:

And by saying so you admit that only inciting war against Britain is a crime?

Inciting war against a free country is wrong. Saying that we will go to war with a tyrant or a terrorist organisation unless they surrender unconditionally is not.

by Alan Forrester on Tue, 07/19/2005 - 01:14 | reply

Clarification

Inciting war against a free country is wrong. Saying that we will go to war with a tyrant or a terrorist organisation unless they surrender unconditionally is not.

I know Alan does not mean it is unconditionally the right decision to start a war no matter how bad a tactical move it is, however some readers may not, so it's worth pointing out.

Whether to go to war with, say, North Korea, is not an easy decision. It may be better for us to do it, or it may not, and honestly I don't have the information necessary to decide, because a lot of it is confidential. The principle Alan is referring to is simply that wars of defense (either our own defense, or the defense of innocent citizens of another country who want our help) are legitimate while wars of aggression (for instance, trying to impose one's will on a free democracy that poses no threat) are an entirely different matter.

Similarly, lending my tools to my neighbor is legitimate on principle, but may not always be a good idea (for example, if he is careless).

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 07/19/2005 - 02:03 | reply

What about..

inciting war against a nation that commits torture or inciting war against a democratic nation that supports tyrannies in other countries? Is that OK?

by a reader on Tue, 07/19/2005 - 18:14 | reply

countries

Country A has some bad policies, and some bad people, but its traditions try to correct these errors.

Country B has some bad policies, and some bad people, and has a tradition of trying to entrench badness and prevent improvements.

Would you agree countries A and B are totally different?

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 07/19/2005 - 18:26 | reply

Define:

Define: Traditions, as in culture (good?); a tradition, as in history of action (bad?)

"its traditions try to correct these errors."

by a reader on Wed, 07/20/2005 - 04:04 | reply

It's "exactly what Mr. Bush did"

Cox & Forkum's observation.

by Editor on Wed, 07/20/2005 - 08:52 | reply

Trouble

The World asks:

What sort of trouble?

in response to Sir Blair's comment:

(But) unless we hear these voices we are going to be in trouble...

I think Blair means that it is useful to know what the ideas are of evil people. If we better understand them, then we can better protect ourselves from them. That's one of the reasons freedom of speech for evil people is important as well that for good people, though of course it's certainly debateable whether this freedom of speech should be extended to inciting violence.

Henry Sturman

by Henry Sturman on Sat, 07/23/2005 - 05:23 | reply

Copyright © 2007 Setting The World To Rights

The Future Of Elian Gonzalez

Fidel Castro says he is honoured to be Elian Gonzalez's friend. It is therefore safe to conclude that the Cuban authorities have been straining every sinew to ensure that Elian's experience of life in Cuba is the best possible one, and that he misses no nuance of the case for communism in general and for Castro's rule in particular.

Nevertheless, it won't stick. Elian is eleven now. We predict that despite all that effort, before another eleven years have passed, he will no longer be a communist. You heard it here first, folks.

What makes us think so? Communism, despite seeing itself as rational and humanistic, despite believing in science and in progress, just isn't convincing to people who live it. All the 24/7 output of the relentless Eastern European communist propaganda machines, running in an almost hermetically sealed environment for 40 years, were unable to lodge the idea in the minds of the victims. The moment the guns were no longer pointed at them, the Poles and the Hungarians and Czechs and all the other captive nations just shrugged off the memories of the Young Pioneers and all the values by which they had been living, in many cases all their lives, as if they had been a passing daydream. Even in Soviet Russia, after 70 years, the ideology hardly fared any better. Likewise, once Castro dies, no Cubans will remember for long what they ever saw in him.

Communism, though it resembles religions in some ways, is very unlike them in this one.

Sat, 07/23/2005 - 18:27 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Communism as a dream

The "ideal" is never remembered once it becomes reality.

by a reader on Sat, 07/23/2005 - 22:41 | reply

I'm Not So Sure

I hope, for his sake, that you're right about Elian Gonzalez.

But, unfortunately, it's just not universally true that people who've experienced communism never long for its return. It's all too common for people to crave the security of authority over the uncertainty of individual liberty and responsibility. It's also common for people to identify with the authority rather than its victims.

This is an ideological battle that needs to be re-fought constantly, or many will slip back into the horror.

Gil

by Gil on Sun, 07/24/2005 - 00:17 | reply

"It's all too common for peop

"It's all too common for people to crave the security of authority over the uncertainty of individual liberty and responsibility."

Funny. That's what is done in The World all the time. All hail Bush! :)

by a reader on Sat, 09/17/2005 - 14:46 | reply

Re: All Hail Bush

Funny. That's what is done in The World all the time. All hail Bush! :)

It's good to know that you read The World all the time. But has this given you the impression that we defer to the authority of Bush? For instance, that if he were to revert to his pre-9/11 foreign policy stance we would endorse that?

by Editor on Sat, 09/17/2005 - 15:07 | reply

The Pope Meant It

This is a very bad sign about Pope Benedict.

As Thomas Friedman and many others have pointed out, criticism of Israel is not the same as antisemitism, but systematically singling out Israel for disproportionate condemnation most certainly is. And that is especially so in regard to Israel's anti-terrorism and security policies, which are a moral beacon and an example to all other nations, in a lowering and cynical world.

The Pope should wake up and see that light.

Thu, 07/28/2005 - 23:05 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Conspiracy Theories – 6: Theories That Are Merely False

When Yasser Arafat died, the world's conspiracy theorists predictably went into a frenzy of accusing Israel of having poisoned him.

This was not a conspiracy theory.

Although it fits well into the conspiracy-theoretic world view because it shares some of the attributes of conspiracy theories, it lacks a key attribute by which we recognise conspiracy theories as irrational and as false. As we have said in the first post in this series, a conspiracy theory is:

- an explanation of observed events in current affairs and history (✓) ... which
- alleges that those events were planned and caused in secret by powerful (or allegedly powerful) conspirators (✓), who thereby...
- benefit at the expense of others (✓, sort of), and who therefore...
- lie, and suppress evidence, about their secret actions (✓), and...
- lie about the motives for their public actions (✗).

For the Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon to have had Arafat poisoned, he would not have needed to lie about his motives, only his actions. Sharon and his government had said many times that Arafat was a mass murderer and actively engaged in terrorism, so their publicly announced and defended policy of targeting such people would in principle apply. It was only out of expediency that they had decided not to kill him. This means that the operation, had it existed, would have required no dupes: the active cooperation of only a few senior officers, politicians, undercover agents, and possibly a military scientist or two would have been needed, and all of them could have been informed of the operation's real nature and its real purpose. Hence there would have been no need for the impossible task of promoting dupes to conspirators, which is an archetypal flaw of conspiracy theories.

Lest any readers misunderstand our example here, we must stress that it is not even remotely plausible that Sharon had Arafat killed. But that is because of the specific political, military and moral circumstances, and not, as in the case of conspiracy theories, because the idea is irrational in its form.

Fri, 07/29/2005 - 10:59 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Yellow Cake

"an explanation of observed events in current affairs and history (✓)
... which alleges that those events were planned and caused in secret by powerful (or allegedly powerful) conspirators (✓), who thereby...
benefit at the expense of others (✓, sort of), and who therefore...
lie, and suppress evidence, about their secret actions (✓), and...
lie about the motives for their public actions (✗)."

Conspiracy theory:

I understand. Its like yellow cake and outing of Valerie Plame.
Sometimes it really is Karl Rove and a plan of the influential to distort reality. Sometimes it is only a conspiracy theory about yellow cake and Saddam Hussein. On the surface both meet the criteria. The proof is in the pudding (or cake as it were).

by a reader on Fri, 07/29/2005 - 13:57 | reply

Re: Yellow Cake

Neither the theory that Saddam's regime sought to purchase uranium from Niger, nor the theory that Karl Rove sought to discredit Joe Wilson by drawing attention to his wife's involvement in having him sent on his mission to Niger, is a conspiracy theory.
Furthermore, both theories are highly plausible.

by Editor on Sat, 07/30/2005 - 13:02 | reply

Conspiracy like Cake batter

So it would appear that both are highly plausible conspiracies convoluted and tangled together as each may be by the ingredient mix of truths and fictions. See above. It will be very hard to completely separate conspirators/players and their roles in this because of the juiciness of the yellow cake story and how it serves to connect the figments of recent history. The lessons in this are many. That's my theory and I am sticking to it until proved otherwise.

by a reader on Sat, 07/30/2005 - 18:08 | reply

Simple minds take exception to conspiracies

A dictionary definition of a conspiracy theory is: A theory that explains an event or set of circumstances as the result of a secret plot by usually powerful conspirators.

There is no mention of a requirement of dupes being involved.
There doesn't have to be any dupes working on behalf of the conspirators.

You say in part 2, "That is one reason why, in practice, conspiracy theories are always false." Always false? Have you ever heard of price fixing? Corn syrup, milk, gasoline, all of these products have been price fixed in regions around the country. So there are groups of people who meet in secret and decide the price of products. Those are conspiracies! And they involve greedy capitalists! Those events really happened whether you want to believe them or not. I'll give you the fact that lots of the theories are out in left field and very unbelievable, but to bury your head in the sand and say no one conspires is just naive. Simple minded people just cannot contemplate how to put a conspiracy together so, in their minds, none exist.

And the government is never involved in secret projects on unsuspecting people, oh no, never. Ever heard of the Tuskegee Syphilis study, the CIA LSD study, or Project MKULTRA? These were secret plots by powerful conspirators. Or do you claim all of the subjects were just volunteers with full knowledge of what was to happen to them? If those people did not know the plot, then those projects fit the description of a conspiracy theory.

by a reader on Thu, 10/11/2007 - 21:47 | reply

Re: Simple minds take exception to conspiracies

It seems that all the examples you have given are things that you disapprove of, but there is nothing in your dictionary's definition that requires that. According to it, anything done by two or more powerful people that has some effect and is not done live on television is a conspiracy. In fact, being powerful is not stated as a necessary condition, so any claim that two or more people have done anything at all, that has had any effect at all, counts as a conspiracy theory according to your definition.

Also, none of your examples are conspiracy theories by our definition. Therefore, pointing out the former has no bearing on whether the latter are ever true. It does not address our argument.

by Editor on Mon, 10/15/2007 - 04:00 | reply

A Photo-Fisking

Here's a "rare but effective" photo-fisking by Michael J. Totten (via InstaPundit).

Will Juan Cole respond with the same grace as Molly Ivins? Don't count on it.

Tue, 08/02/2005 - 16:52 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

The Power of anti-fantasies

Apparently the BBC has even been able to produce a film which proves that all our terrorist nightmares are no more than a fantasy. And there's more. That fantasy is created by ... a conspiracy between neoconservatives and the islam.

Henry Sturman

by Henry Sturman on Wed, 08/03/2005 - 05:47 | reply

President Bush Takes 'Intelligent Design' Seriously

President Bush is the latest person to have been fooled by the disingenuous pseudo-scientific claptrap called 'Intelligent Design Theory'. This purports to provide a scientific critique of the prevailing theory that the complex adaptations in living things came about through Darwinian evolution, i.e. through many rounds of random genetic variation and natural selection. Instead, it proposes that they were intelligently designed. The President has called for schoolchildren to be "exposed" to this "alternative".

It is sad that the President has an embarrassingly deficient grasp of science. But, let's face it, so do most people (see the Appendix and weep). Even though the vast majority of the population, including President Bush, are subjected to a dozen years of daily science lessons as children, including evolution lessons, very few of them could tell you what Darwin's theory of evolution is, let alone why it is preferable to any given crackpot alternative. There is no reason to assume that an Intelligent Design lesson would be any more effective than an algebra lesson or a French lesson.

So the issue is symbolic rather than practical, both for schoolchildren and for the President. Fortunately, like most people, the President does not work in a laboratory. His flawed understanding of scientific method makes little difference to anything important.

Fortunately too, unlike his political opponents, he does know the difference between war and other types of struggle. And between right and wrong. And between liberty and tyranny. And between the West and its enemies.

Thu, 08/04/2005 - 13:59 | digg | del.icio.us | permlink

Arrogance, ignorance, and stu

Arrogance, ignorance, and stupidity are evident in this little rant. Glad to see you have such a vast grasp of the universe that you "know" the truth. Can you show us your Noble Prize (for fiction)?

by a reader on Thu, 08/04/2005 - 22:25 | reply

Re: Arrogance, ignorance, and stu

"are evident"

Are you absolutely sure you "know" that?

by Editor on Thu, 08/04/2005 - 22:56 | reply

Learning about ID theory

Indeed, it's not a good idea to expose children to bad science or pseudoscience as a serious alternative to real science (though I favor freedom of education, and so do think schools should be allowed to teach it). However, I do think a discussion of Intelligent Design should be part of any course teaching evolution - not as a way of weakening the belief in evolution, but as a way of strengthening it. Thus, the critique by ID and others of evolution should be discussed so that it can be shown how the critique fails. Indeed, standing up to experiment and criticism is how scientific theories become firmly established. And understanding how the critique of a theory fails helps one understand that theory.

ID-type arguments against evolution were there from the beginning, in the 19th century (e.g. how can evolution explain complex things such as an eye?), and actually were quite sensible in the beginning, but evolution has succeeded quite well in countering those arguments.

Henry Sturman

by Henry Sturman on Fri, 08/05/2005 - 05:58 | reply

Hello stu

Nobel prize, not Noble prize. You don't have to believe me. You can look it up.

by a reader on Sat, 08/06/2005 - 14:29 | reply

Re: Learning about ID theory

Agreed on all counts. And a further reason for explaining Intelligent Design Theory to those who want to listen would be that the fact that it is taken seriously by so many people is an important fact about current affairs.

But we should perhaps add that ID theory, as currently promoted, is more than just the venerable (and reasonably respectable) Argument From Design. It also includes, among other things, a slew of silly misrepresentations of perfectly ordinary disputes within evolution theory, as 'flaws' in the theory.

by Editor on Sat, 08/06/2005 - 15:49 | reply

ID arguments

Henry Sturman,

You make some reasonable points. However, the driving thesis of ID, that there are gaps in the modern theory of Darwinism, is one that the modern theory openly addresses. If you quickly examine public school earth sciences textbooks, you will find - over and over again - cautionary phrases used: such as "evidence suggests", "findings so far indicate", "astronomers believe". Scientists are not ramming their "gospel" down the throats of innocent kiddies. They acknowledge they do not have the key to the absolute answer - but their driving thesis is that we need to keep looking. Then, of course, there is the problem that ID predicts nothing, explains nothing, illuminates nothing - except the enduring and profound mystery of faith - which is why it belongs in philosophy/religion classes, not science.

by Jody Tresidder on Tue, 08/09/2005 - 13:47 | reply

Intelligent Falling

This is quite funny. Have you seen it?
www.theonion.com/news/index.php?issue=4133&n=2

by AIS on Sun, 08/21/2005 - 21:04 | reply

INTELLIGENT DESIGNERS AND UNIFORM FIELDS

..Please bear with me..I always have much to say..

String theorists and mathematicians allude to the required extra dimensions as either too small to perceive or too large, and explore manifold theories and other constructs to model infinitesimal point notions. The information continuum and dimension stares me in the face each morning when I wake to the faces of my family and when I stare at myself in a mirror. The information dimension is certainly not invisible.

If one looks at a tree and believes as I do, that the philosophy of the tree is simply antigravity then the inevitable question arises: why is the tree a fractal geometric shape and not uniform and predictable like the gravitational field we imagine? Can a small part of the reason be that the model of the gravitational field is itself flawed in some respect?

The lure of physical realities being perfectly described by uniform equations and power laws is attractive but, much like the failure of chemical fertilizers, pesticides and herbicides to continue to perform effectively on factory farms as advertised, modeling reality and generalizing with uniform power laws representing uniform fields leads us inevitably to uncertainty and even breakdowns in the ability of a model to predict. Uncertainty is in part our lack of profound or integrated reflection and knowledge of a subject; uncertainty is itself introduced with physical models that gloss over "imperfection" in favor of ease of calculation without considering all of the facts associated with the subject. Scientific determinism and mechanism applied to life is friendlier, understandable and gracious up until the un-thought of cataclysm or discontinuity occurs.

Discontinuity is at the essence of life form in this universe.

The mathematical methods of calculus were tools invented to extrapolate our imagination and ideology of uniform fields and geometry that we could see and touch to an imaginary, infinitesimal level. To project perfectly formed fields and surfaces onto our perfectly formed mathematical ideology we had to introduce infinity and imagine what sequential and reproducible pattern any given surface would follow should we progressively approximate it with slices approaching infinitely thin widths; an extension of Archimedes' method and brilliance. But with real life and real materials the slices describing the surface in fact do not follow our ideal model once they reach a certain scale but rather tend to follow a fractional progression or irregular and perhaps random sequence towards the infinitesimal yet, all the while, following the average shape we imagined at our narrow bandwidth of thinking and measurement and, of course, within our means of manufacturing. A real surface and shape is everywhere discontinuous and nowhere near as ideal as we like to think as we approach the infinitesimal where our models break down. In fact, many applied scientific methods use empiricism to model what happens after the discontinuity occurs in many descriptive models of physical phenomenon.

Even the most deeply entrenched quantum entities such as the charge of an electron are approximations and ideology. Cite the observation of fractional charges in 1998:

<http://nobelprize.org/physics/laureates/1998/press.html>

Perhaps this is yet another clue to the requirement for a more robust and integrated mathematical treatment or cataclysmic improvement in our model of reality and physical fields. There were many earlier clues such as the quandary of the equivalence principle and then perhaps again when we realized that there had to be a thing called dark matter to account for strange velocity anomalies observed in galactic structures. Grounded on earth perhaps puts us at the trunk of the afore-imagined fractal gravitational field and reveals to us the strange equivalence of feathers falling as quickly as lead weights that somehow goes against our intuitions.

My personal belief is that every decision, idea and action is both flawed yet reflective of the perfection and beauty that can be observed both in nature and fostered over time in the communication and creative exchange with others (the scientific method). The notion of an intelligent designer is both foreign and unnatural that rubs against a sense of personal freedom even though this sense can be hedonistic and ideal in itself. This is probably the same feeling that many who are grounded in the stability of the objective scientific method or other such pattern of describing or controlling environment would have when considering the paradigm constructs and physical laws or controls as fleeting. Yet there is a universal line of balance where personal hedonism is balanced by realities of personal tragedies that eventually happen to everyone. In this respect the notion and interjection of an intelligent designer is possibly less frightening than accepting the disquietude and inevitable entropy resulting of free will of all things in the universe. Intelligent Design is a concept that extends the safety and comfortable protection of determinism and continues to gloss over the imperfection introduced by the free will of all things combined in the universe (the universal pull of entropy).

Determinism is ultimately balanced by free will in cataclysmic explosions where new emergences can replace and consume old. Determinism and perfect symmetry are broken by creation, are shattered by supernova and other life and death cycles of creation, are continuously expanding in depth, and are confounded by the connection we have to everything else each with purpose to survive the miraculous and perfect journey through life.

by Peter J Slack on Mon, 10/10/2005 - 03:09 | reply

To Link Once To A Holocaust-Denying Web Site May Be Regarded As A Misfortune. To Do It Twice Looks Like Carelessness

Most decent people writing on the internet take care not to link to hate sites, such as those promoting antisemitism or Holocaust denial, if they can possibly help it. When they do have to link to them, for instance in order to illustrate a point about the hate-promoting ideologies themselves, they accompany the link with a warning of the evil that lies at the other end.

Adhering to such a policy is important for several reasons, one of which is that one does not want to become a source of publicity for hate sites, either directly or by increasing their score in search engines. Another is that one has a responsibility to readers, a proportion of whom must be young, or newly interested in the field in which one is writing, not to seem to endorse false claims such as Holocaust denial, antisemitism, and the associated conspiracy theories.

Wretchard of Belmont Club has not been adhering to such a policy. As we noted here, he recently linked to a major Holocaust-denying site, without comment. Today he has linked to an extreme antisemitic site (National Journal), again without comment.

On the first occasion, the passage that he quoted contained nothing directly hateful: it was merely a rather strained interpretation of George Orwell's writings, which compared Western media today with totalitarian ones, and also happened to contain the mistaken opinion that the Allied bombing campaign in World War 2 was genocidal. But one does not have to look far to see the role that such ideas play on that site, and the rest of the essay from which the quote is taken contains explicit Holocaust denial. On this occasion, again, the page that Wretchard links to contains explicit antisemitism and Holocaust denial, and the main content of the page is a deranged attempt to deny that anywhere near six million Jews could have been murdered, apparently on the basis of a misprint in a copy of the Daily Mail in 2003. Again, the passage that he quotes contains none of the hateful material.

We have seen no trace in Wretchard's own writings of any ideology of hate. Quite the contrary, he seems to be a passionate supporter of Western values. But his policy (or carelessness?) in this regard is not right. We urge him to be more careful about the sites he chooses to link to in future.

Sat, 08/06/2005 - 14:57 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Copyright © 2007 Setting The World To Rights

The New Rosa Parks

Cindy Sheehan has been causing a bit of a stir by following President Bush around trying to ask him why he killed her son. Her late son was a Marine who was in fact killed by the enemy. She seems to have changed her story about the President since she met him last year. But anyway, now a holy man, the Reverend Lennox Yearwood (leader of "the Hip Hop Caucus, an activist group") has called her the "Rosa Parks of the anti-war movement". We agree. Just like Rosa Parks, Cindy would do a lot of good if she tried her very best to get on a bus, sit down quietly in the seat of her choice, and ride it all the way home.

Update: Solomonia has two good posts which anyone interested in the Cindy Sheehan phenomenon ought to read: Not a Saint and A Judenhass Horse.

Fri, 08/12/2005 - 01:23 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

How many children has the editor lost in the Iraq war?

by a reader on Fri, 08/12/2005 - 13:25 | reply

Don't "Son" Us

It is not the case that the victim of a catastrophe has the right to immunity from criticism when they express a public opinion about its nature, cause, or proposed remedy.

As Christopher Hitchens said, don't "son" us. See also the chickenhawk argument.

by Editor on Fri, 08/12/2005 - 15:29 | reply

How many parents has the editor lost in the Iraq war?

I guess you can count grandparents, aunts, and uncles. But not cousins or ants.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Fri, 08/12/2005 - 20:02 | reply

It is a simple question, Editor. How many?

by a reader on Sat, 08/13/2005 - 00:31 | reply

Another simple question:

Why do you ask?

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Sat, 08/13/2005 - 01:13 | reply

Re:Another simple question:

Because I want to know what price the editor has paid in support of his agenda. I believe at heart he is a socialist, and like most socialists he wants other people to pay the price.

by a reader on Sat, 08/13/2005 - 15:02 | reply

Criticism of public opinions

It is not the case that the victim of a catastrophe has the right to immunity from criticism when they express a public opinion about its nature, cause, or proposed remedy.

I agree, but making fun of someone (even as gently as was done here) isn't necessary for criticism, and it's not very persuasive. At best, it's encouraging to people who already agree with the criticisms -- unless it comes across as insensitive (which it does to me in this case). I disagree with her claim that Bush has killed her son. It's wrong for her to do so, and it's wrong for people to encourage her to do so. I'm sorry her son is dead.

Becky

by beckyam on Sun, 08/14/2005 - 19:13 | reply

Re: Criticism of public opinions

We have exercised restraint in our comments in deference to Cindy Sheehan's loss and that of her family and out of respect for her late son Spc. Casey Sheehan. If you disagree that we have, please read Solomonia's posts, themselves appropriately restrained, that we refer to in our update above.

by Editor on Mon, 08/15/2005 - 00:42 | reply

Public figures and criticism

Nobody is seeking out grieving parents of fallen soldiers to criticize them.

Sheehan opened herself to criticism when she made herself into a public figure. She has spent the last year speaking at anti-war meetings often with very questionable (anti-Semitic and pro-terrorism) associates.

She stepped into the public square and appears to have spent the last year trying to grab the limelight. Now, she has it.

by a reader on Mon, 08/15/2005 - 01:37 | reply

Re: Sheehan

Her web site (Crawford Peace House) states:

"Israelis deserve to carry on the activities of daily living without fear of being blown to bits." Is this an example of anti-zionism?

by a reader on Mon, 08/15/2005 - 03:04 | reply

"Chickenhawk" Argument

The following is a quote from the NY Times on the web dated February 28, 2003:

"Mr. Wolfowitz, the deputy defense secretary, opened a two-front war of words on Capitol Hill, calling the recent estimate by Gen. Eric K. Shinseki of the Army that several hundred thousand troops would be needed in postwar Iraq, 'wildly off the mark.'"

The other "front" was his gross underestimation of the cost of the war.

I fully agree with the Editor's view that failure to have served in the military in no way should limit a persons right or obligation to speak out on important issues of war and peace -- particularly if one is in a position of leadership. However, those who have the responsibility for developing war strategies and fighting plans (particularly if they have no military experience or training) also have a duty to listen especially closely to those who have such training and experience.

Although, as noted in previous posts, I question some aspects of the strategy adopted to combat Islamic extremists and the terrorism that they spawn (e.g. focusing on Iraq to the exclusion of other potential targets, and perhaps, as a result, actually contributing to unnecessary setbacks and losses), I have no hesitation in ultimately supporting this "war," because it must be waged in defense of fundamental values and human progress. Nevertheless, the above quote reflects, at least from my perspective, the often tragic way our effort in Iraq has been implemented. The war in Iraq, despite progress on some fronts, is in many important respects floundering and the outcome remains uncertain. Gen. Shinseki was canned, at least part, because he spoke out about what history appears to be showing was really needed.

Those who haven't served or who have no real military training or experience (and Wolfowitz was not alone in this regard in the Administration), certainly have the right and the obligation to speak out, but they also have an obligation to listen carefully (despite ideological and political proclivities) to those who by experience and training are most capable of helping to develop the best possible strategy and tactics. Brave men and women's lives are at stake, as well as much, much more.

by Michael Bacon on Mon, 08/15/2005 - 14:50 | reply

Re: "Chickenhawk" Argument

they also have an obligation to listen carefully (despite ideological and political proclivities) to those who by experience and training are most capable of helping to develop the best possible strategy and tactics

Indeed.

In what way does the experience and training of a high-ranking military officer qualify him or her to judge issues like "if we delay for two years to undertake a crash programme to recruit and train hundreds of thousands more troops, will Saddam use the time to stockpile more chemical and biological weapons and missiles to use against them when they attack?" Or "is such a recruitment programme politically practicable?" Or "how far can we deplete our strategic reserve before the North Koreans are tempted to resume military adventurism?" Or "to what extent would the deployment of a large occupation force inhibit the evolution of the Iraqi political culture?"

Would the answers to such questions have been relevant, at the time, to the Administration's Iraq policy?

Are the answers relevant today, to judging how successful or unsuccessful that policy has been so far?

What sorts of experience and training best qualify a person to answer such questions accurately?

Were there any high-ranking officers with experience and training similar to that of Gen. Shinseki who endorsed the Administration's policies? If so, would adopting Gen. Shinseki's policy have been evidence that the Administration had not listened carefully to those officers?

by Editor on Mon, 08/15/2005 - 15:47 | reply

Re: "Chickenhawk" Argument

The training and experience provided to high ranking officers in the modern US military, because of its scope and sophistication, might well be helpful, but I can't see that it would necessarily provide any particular insights into answering the more strategic and policy oriented questions you list in your first full paragraph.

The answers to your questions would, I agree, be very relevant, at the time, to the development of a successful and timely Iraq policy. Of course, asking these and other important questions, and getting the answers right, is the hard part, and I do not in any way mean to make light of the difficulty.

I don't think the answers are relevant to the question of the success or lack of success of the policy today. To answer that we must look to the facts and circumstances as we find them today, and how we think the facts and circumstances will play out going forward.

A sound moral and ethical compass, domestic political acumen and experience in international political, economic and cultural affairs (perhaps with that helpful dose of training of the kind provided to high-ranking officers in today's military), would be the best overall experience.

Rarely, of course, can all of this be found in one individual, or even in a handful. Every Administration is served by a cadre of people, both in and out of government, who provide these types of experiences and knowledge. Certainly, this Administration went through an extensive consultation exercise, including consulting with a number of high ranking military officers.

I am far less certain how many high ranking military officers wholeheartedly supported the effort with fewer troops (a question regarding which they had particular knowledge and experience), even if it meant some delay in launching the war -- I think your reference to "two years" is greatly exaggerated (to make a good point no doubt), but that discussion is more complicated.

I believe that there is a good deal of evidence to support a reasonable view that a very substantial number of high ranking military officers (active and retired) and others, supported the war effort, but strongly recommended (from the start of the war, and regularly thereafter - since the need for higher troop levels has been apparent to many objective observers at least from the end of the first round of fighting) that additional troops be provided.

Having ignored and continuing to ignore that advice does not mean that the Administration didn't and doesn't listen carefully to those it chooses to seriously consult, including high ranking military officers. It could, however, mean that we have much greater difficulty and sacrifice many more lives than necessary -- without achieving our goals. The jury is, I believe, still out on this question.

Let me reiterate something I said in a post some time ago. I am not arguing for cutting and running in Iraq. If anything, this is an argument for more troops, primarily because the cost of failure now could be catastrophic. Nevertheless, I see nothing to be gained by failing to look at things clearly (clearly, of course, in my opinion), warts and all.

Shinseki was not canned

Gen. Shinseki was canned, at least part, because he spoke out about what history appears to be showing was really needed.

By the way, factcheck.org says this is a pure myth, propagated by John Kerry among others.

by Editor on Tue, 08/16/2005 - 12:31 | reply

Factcheck

Your are correct.

Factcheck says: "It is true that Shinseki told the Senate Armed Services Committee on Feb. 25, 2003 that 'something on the order of several hundred thousand soldiers' would be required for an occupation of Iraq. It is also true that Deputy Defense Secretary Paul Wolfowitz called that estimate 'wildly off the mark' in testimony to the House Budget Committee on Feb. 27, 2003. And it is true that the general retired several months later on June 11, 2003. But the administration didn't force General Shinseki to retire. In fact, The Washington Times reported Shinseki's plans to retire nearly a year before his Feb. 25, 2003 testimony."

I obviously didn't check MY facts on this specific point, and I regret the mistake. I believe that the Factcheck item does, however, reconfirm that the advice was given to the Administration, and Wolfowitz's response to that advice.

The main issue today is whether in fact we need more troops to secure Iraq, and whether without such troops there is a material risk of failure.

Thanks for the correction.

by Michael Bacon on Tue, 08/16/2005 - 13:19 | reply

Re: Factcheck

Indeed that is the main issue. But in regard to the side issue: doesn't that mean that there is now less evidence than you thought there was, that the Administration did not listen carefully to a proper range of qualified people?

by Editor on Tue, 08/16/2005 - 15:57 | reply

Yes

Yes. While it does not speak directly to the question of whether they listened carefully, it is relevant to answering that question. Whether or not they listened carefully, it's direct evidence that they did not in this case (and perhaps therefore don't in most all cases) take revenge in the form of trying to fire someone whose private advice and public remarks makes policy goals more difficult to achieve politically -- even if they believe that the advice and public remarks were "wildly off the mark."

by Michael Bacon on Tue, 08/16/2005 - 20:34 | reply

Restraint

We have exercised restraint in our comments in deference to Cindy Sheehan's loss and that of her family and out of respect for her late son Spc. Casey Sheehan. If you disagree that we have, please read Solomonia's posts, themselves appropriately restrained, that we refer to in our update above.

I don't know if I have said this before here, but I really appreciate this site and the effort that goes into the articles. I'm definitely not a fan of what Cindy's been saying, and my problem with the statement had little to do with Cindy's having lost a son. It's a general distaste for people being poked fun at. Compared to what she's saying about President Bush, though, it seems relatively minor.

Becky

by beckyam on Wed, 08/17/2005 - 04:21 | reply

Bought into it

The most insightful thing I can say about this story is that first of all it is a story where there is almost no story to tell. Of all the things going on in the world, if I stood along a back country road in the middle of Nowhere Texas, who would take notice? In sum, this is all it is, a lady standing on the side of a back country road.

As they say in the real estate business, Location, Location, Location. It seems to be true of the News too. Crawford Texas sells newspapers and little else.

by a reader on Wed, 08/17/2005 - 15:02 | reply

Trust

Gordon Brown has said that if Robin Cook had not died he would have made him his deputy when he became party leader (and presumably Prime Minister). His reason would have been to restore "trust."

Whose trust does he want to cultivate? Robin Cook was a socialist who felt he had "sold his soul" by joining up to New Labour. Presumably New Labour's superficial prattle about a Third Way between capitalism and socialism put off Cook who preferred more overtly socialist nonsense.

Cook also famously opposed the liberation of Iraq. So Brown wants to cultivate the trust of socialists who oppose deposing evil dictators who fund terrorism. The leader of a nation should argue for the policies he thinks are right and to pursue them as successfully as he can. After France fell in 1940, some members of Churchill's Cabinet wanted to accept a "peace offer" from Hitler. If Churchill had tried to win his colleagues' "trust" by pandering to this nonsense, he would have been guilty of a shameful abrogation of his responsibilities. Instead he gave them a speech that persuaded them not to surrender. Mr Brown has shamefully pandered to the worst elements in the Labour Party, hard core socialists and antiwar noisemakers.

Another potential leader has also shown that he can't be trusted. Potential Conservative Party leader Malcom Rifkind said:

"I believe it [the Iraq war] was a wrong war, at the wrong time, for the wrong reasons. The war was an extremely foolish and unnecessary one. The consequence has been to create a political vacuum in Iraq itself.

"Terrorists are operating within Iraq in a way we didn't have in the past, so the war has certainly assisted international terrorism in Iraq. If you destroy an existing regime - however evil it may be - you create a political vacuum..."

That is nonsense.

"If a prime minister has led his country to war on a false basis then he should bear the full responsibility. He should have resigned. If I had led the party at the time that would be the policy I would have pursued.”

That too is a bizarre remark. When a Prime Minister makes decisions about war and peace he must do so on the basis of the best information available. If that information turns out to be wrong he should only resign if this problem is a result of wrongdoing or incompetence on his part. There is no reason to think that was true in regard to the information on Iraqi weapons stockpiles, and all the other reasons for deposing Saddam turned out to have been underestimated.

Nor has Mr Rifkind explained how we can prevent terrorists from attacking Britain without removing tyrants who sponsor terrorism, like Saddam. Sometimes we may be able to do this without a war by sponsoring a resistance movement or through economic sanctions. But Saddam's Iraq was a Stalinist police state and economic sanctions did not harm Saddam's regime and had proved ineffective. Mr Rifkind and Mr Brown are opportunists who cannot be trusted to lead Britain in a time of war.

Wed, 08/17/2005 - 17:24 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

France fell in 1940

Henry Sturman

by Henry Sturman on Thu, 08/18/2005 - 12:47 | reply

Re: France fell in 1940

Indeed it did. How that typo got through is a deep mystery! But it's corrected now. Thanks.

by Editor on Thu, 08/18/2005 - 12:53 | reply

"who sponsor terrorism, like

"who sponsor terrorism, like Saddam". Modern islamic terrorism is a complex problem. Removing Saddam doesn't help at all.

Al-Qaeda and other terrorist organisations are sponsored by many people through "havala" system. People in islamic states are not happy with their governments and they sponsor terrorism against West in order to deprive their governments of foreign support. Many people in Saudi Arabia believe that Saudi regime is sponsored by America and they feel moral necessity to fight against America.

Where is Saddam Hussein in this system?

On the other hand, helping Iraqis to set up government by Americans is considered by many arabs as installing a western government and therefore contributes to terrorism support quite a lot.

So, it turns out that "liberation of Iraq" has an opposite effect to what you described in your heroic pro-war slogans.

by a reader on Thu, 08/18/2005 - 14:24 | reply

First of all, I hope it doesn't

First of all, I hope it doesn't need pointing out that the fact (which I'll not dispute) that the "havala" system is used by "many people" to support terrorism does not, in and of itself, refute the fact that Saddam Hussein was an evil dictator who supported terrorism, as The World stated. The two facts are not mutually exclusive. (Unless the claim is that 100% of all terrorism is supported by non-dictator laypeople through the "havala" system, a claim which would be absurd on its face.)

Further points:

If people in "Islamic states" are "not happy with their governments" perhaps they ought take it up with their governments. The chain of reasoning which asserts that plotting to murder randomly chosen Westerners will somehow improve their own governments is tenuous at best; in any event, the effort is immoral and must be resisted.

Based on a reader's comment re:Iraq it is worth pondering just what he thinks makes people in Islamic states unhappy with their governments. For example, one might think that an evil dictator government (such as Saddam Hussein's) would have made people in that Islamic state unhappy, yet according to a reader when we ended that government (we are not, by the way, "helping Iraqis to set up government by Americans", but by Iraqis), we just contributed to terrorist support. Is a reader saying that people in Islamic states like and want evil dictators to govern them, and get mad when they are ousted? Seems like it. Now don't get me wrong; there are certainly people who fit the description "prefers evil dictators". But their preferences are immoral, they should not be heeded, and it is particularly insulting for a reader to insinuate that they necessarily speak for all Muslims (or Arabs - it's not clear which set of people a reader thinks he is talking about BTW; he switches freely).

Finally, a reader contradicts himself. In paragraph 2 we are led to believe that the cause of terrorism is people in various Islamic states not being happy with their respective governments. By paragraph 4, the ouster of Hussein in Iraq has made "many arabs" mad, thus contributing to terrorist support. "Many Arabs"? Why would "Arabs" as such care what happens in Iraq unless they are Iraqi themselves? Remember, the reason (supposedly) terrorists become terrorists is because they are unhappy with "their" government. Why would "Arabs", not from Iraq, become terrorists (as is currently happening) on account of whatever is or isn't going on in Iraq? What's it to them? This phenomenon is inexplicable if a reader's theory of "good-government-wanting terrorists" is correct.

Could it be because improvement of "their" government, as such, is not quite at the top of their agenda, and something else is?

by blixia on Thu, 08/18/2005 - 22:48 | reply

your hope is all you have

You are definitely right, that existence of havala system is not 100% mutually-exclusive. On the other hand, getting of tyrans doesn't help with getting rid of terrorists. And the reason for that believe is the existence of such systems as havala and world-wide muslim support of terrorism against western civilization whatever irrational reasons stand behind the terrorism.

So, instead of finding a contradiction in my reasoning you are trying to find contradictions in terrorist ideology. You are not even wrong - there are plenty. In fact, every reason to kill one person for the sake of others is a contradiction. And obviously, I don't hold this contradiction as my personal view. Neither do I support terrorists or tyrans like Saddam. You are fighting with a shadow, don't you?

"The chain of reasoning which asserts that plotting to murder randomly chosen Westerners will somehow improve their own governments is tenuous at best". Who argues about that? Me - not. Extremists-muslims - yes, they vote for that view with their both hands, however tenuous it is. Large number of arab peoples in Saudi Arabia - yes. They vote for that view with their money (sent through "havala" system to Al-Qaeda).

The same irrational view is used by many to recruit suicide bombers, to resist new Iraqi government initiatives, to reject any constitution rendering it as "imposed on us by americans" etc.

The fact that such extremists don't speak for all muslims is irrelevant. It is absolutely pointless to do logical reasoning about what all arabs want or don't want since there is no system in existence to reveal their wishes. There are no elections and therefore, no exit-polls and no such thing as "public opinion". If there is no way to express a wish, there will be no wish. If question is never asked, people don't bother to know the answer.

Later in the text you say that arabs in other countries shouldn't bother what is happening in Iraq. Or have I misunderstood you? These are your words:

"Why would "Arabs" as such care what happens in Iraq unless they are Iraqi themselves?"

Are you really serious about it?

This is the main generating power of global terrorism. British-bred muslims go to a bus in Tavistok Square and blow themselves up for the sake of Iraqi people (or as they think so). But somehow, you make a conclusion that they shouldn't do it. But they DO IT!

Your 100% correct logical construction is based on the assumption that all people are reasonable and rational. You are not even wrong.

You are simply billions of light years away from this planet.

Yes, it does seem illogical that people start with fury about their government and end up with fury about western civilization. But it only seems so. In reality it is a matter of radicalisation on whatever issue is available at the moment. Today they are not happy with saudi prince, tomorrow they are unhappy with american administration in Iraq and it seems perfectly reasonable to them.

by a reader on Mon, 08/22/2005 - 17:11 | reply

Then What Should Be Done with Illogical People?

If destroying a murderous dictator like Saddam and trying to give the Iraqi people a say in their own political affairs helps terrorists, and hurts Iraqi's: What should have been done to hurt terrorists and help Iraqi's? What should be done now?

Attack Israel?

by another reader on Mon, 08/22/2005 - 18:45 | reply

shhh

I wouldn't recommend suggesting attacking Israel to illogical people.... ;-)

I wouldn't even mention Israel, if you want to continue talking about anything else.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 08/22/2005 - 22:55 | reply

deal with reality, not with your logical constructions

The trouble with libertarians is always about their idealistic view of the world. Instead of dealing with whatever happens in reality, you just assume that all "logical" people would understand your word and therefore, the problem is solved. When someone points out that there are not-quite logical people all over the place (and in fact, every person is illogical about at least one thing), libertarians just say - or, in that case it doesn't matter, we'll just do ... whatever .

Simple example, an evil person is jailed or executed, but his son loved his father and should be expected to act absolutely illogically in future. But we still have to deal with such cases reasonably.

And we should also expect that many iraqi people while being oppressed by Saddam would prefer to stay under his rule just to be spared of war. And whoever brings the war against Saddam would be considered as trully evil. Is it so difficult to understand? Do these people have to be condemned forever as "illogical creatures"?

And is it so tremendously difficult to realise that many young arabs are going butts about it? That many older people would sponsor and support these youngsters?

Saddam Hussein regime is toppled, 100 000 iraqis are dead, thousands of new radical youngsters have joined jihad against West.

If hundreds of thousands iraqis have been killed while Saddam was in power are these 100 000 humans deaths of any help now?

Does irrationally motivated global terrorism suffer from any losses here? Hardly.

by a reader on Tue, 08/23/2005 - 10:49 | reply

"On the other hand, getting o

"On the other hand, getting of tyrans doesn't help with getting rid of terrorists."

If the tyrant is supporting and/or sheltering terrorists, then it does help.

"The fact that such extremists don't speak for all muslims is irrelevant. It is absolutely pointless to do logical reasoning about what all arabs want or don't want since there is no system in existence to reveal their wishes. There are no elections and therefore, no exit-polls and no such thing as "public opinion"."

That is what we are attempting to change, in Iraq. An effort which you (I think it was you) called counterproductive. So, what, then?

"["Why would "Arabs" as such care what happens in Iraq unless they are Iraqi themselves?"] Are you really serious about it?"

Not exactly. I was extrapolating from your characterization of the motive for terrorism: "People in islamic states are not happy with their governments and they sponsor terrorism against West in order to deprive their governments of foreign support." I was trying to illustrate that this doesn't work as a motive for non-Iraqi Arabs who support terrorism in Iraq. If "not happy with their governments" is the motive for terrorism then no outsider Arabs should be bothering with sponsoring terrorism in Iraq, because after all, what does that have to do with their government?

Yet (as you say, correctly) outsiders DO sponsor terrorism in Iraq. Why? Your characterization fails to explain. Some key component must be missing.

"This is the main generating power of global terrorism."

Indeed. Which is why your earlier characterization ("they are unhappy with their governments and want to deprive them on Western support") made no sense to me. It failed to take into account the pan-Arab-nationalist sentiment which is, in fact, the (or at least, a) main generating power, as you say.

"Your 100% correct logical construction is based on the assumtpion that all people are reasonable and rational. You are not even wrong. You are simply billions of light years away from this planet."

Wrong. I do not "assume", or believe, that "all people are reasonable and rational". I was simply being rhetorical so as to show the absurdity of your earlier claim. Get it now? Thanks for the response, by blixax on Wed, 08/24/2005 - 04:24 | reply

Copyright © 2007 Setting The World To Rights

Human Beings Are People, Not Wildlife

In Niger, millions of people are starving:

"For Niger's nomads, the situation is desperate. To these people, losing your animals is like losing your life savings. Without their animals, they have no means of survival," said Natasha Kofoworola Quist, Oxfam's Regional Director for West Africa.

That is a bona fide emergency. But Oxfam has a sinister take on the problem:

"Twelve centuries of nomadic culture are threatened with extinction if these people do not get long-term help to rebuild their livelihoods," she added.

Niger's nomads are so poor that if a family loses a single animal they might die. Because they are nomads, they can't do simple things like store food or set up irrigation systems to save their cattle when it is very hot, which happens a lot in Niger. And they have been living and dying like this for twelve centuries! Haven't they suffered enough yet? Why should it be their role in life to satisfy the voyeuristic needs of Westerners who consider it of paramount importance that someone (other than their too valuable selves) be made to act out spasms of quaint desperation for ever and ever?

Of course the charitable folk are as keen as any game warden to save the lives of the half-people in their human game reserve. But heaven forfend that the inmates ever acquire the means to escape. So they want to tailor their 'help' in such a way that it saves the inmates' lives but leaves their cruel, foul predicament – delicately referred to as 'their unique nomadic culture' – unchanged and unchangeable.

We have a better idea. There's this new fangled thing called agriculture. Instead of tuning their policies to make people limp from crisis to crisis in appalling poverty just so that the relationship of benefactor and grateful supplicant can continue, let charities give money instead, and with it, access to knowledge that would allow the nomads out the wilderness. If their unique culture should fail to survive this challenge, then good riddance. Let it go to the hell from whence it came.

:)

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Sat, 08/20/2005 - 03:00 | reply

Guns, Germs, and Steel

While a useful comment, and true to some extent, there are considered fallacies to your argument.

Niger, long before it was Niger was supporting a small population of nomadic peoples with no help or charity from anyone else. There might have been occasional dry seasons, natural fluctuations in the viability of the land to support humans (and mammals and life in general), but this is the reason why nomadic cultures pick up their belongings and move. Such peoples survive and in their own way by their own means thrive.

The insertion of western civilization, agriculture, charity, technology, or whatever, is not necessary for human life to thrive in a place. Insertion is usually balanced at some near point by desertion. What is not near to us is not dear to us. What is near to us is dear to us, and only then we survive and thrive. Most of all, to be left alone to one's own creative devices and ingenuity is the prime need and what makes us human and adaptable. Mass starvation and famine would not be happening now, true, without all this prior interference.

Who needs or truly cares about Niger? Only the peoples that live upon the land.

Our feeble comments and platitudinal solutions are not needed, and often are especially short sighted and muddle minded. We have no stake in Niger and no business being there. Most people could not place it on a map of the globe within 100 km or have not one sense of its sustaining terrain. In terms of long term viability of humans in the region known as Niger, also, most of us have not a clue. Birth control in the polluted community wells is probably the only obvious humane long term solution other than a return to the natural cycles of birth, subsistence and death. But who would support such obvious interference, despite the multitude of less obvious but more dire interventions. I would choose the natural cycles of birth, subsistence and death over anything we do-gooders and social philosophers are proposing as an interference in region. It is likely more moral in the long run.

Perhaps full scholarships to Oxford for any Nigerian student showing academic promise on the condition that they return to their ravaged region would save more than a few lives in the long run. But that (education and real opportunity for self-determination) is another experimental question in itself. Nomadic peoples have formed nomadic cultures because it worked for them and the lands for at least 100,000 years. If it no longer works (for them) it is because something we do has changed the order of things.

by a reader on Sat, 08/20/2005 - 15:50 | reply

It hasn't worked for them eve

It hasn't worked for them ever. Natural lives are not nice lives. They are brutal, short, hard, pain-filled, ugly, and unhappy. It's hard for us to imagine how horrible they are, because we know something completely different. We know what life can be like. We know something many orders of magnitude better than the people of Niger do. And now that they've heard of civilisation, they want it too. They do not want to return to their traditional painful existence that did not get better for thousands and thousands of years. We can help them to have something better, that they would prefer. And it'd be cheap for us to help (if only we helped in the right way), and it'd make the whole world (including us) richer.

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Sat, 08/20/2005 - 19:16 | reply

Cheap Help

The last sentence is verifiably true.

However, "they" is a wrong assumption. Just ask "them" and listen carefully to each person's answer. I dare you then to assume who "they" are and what "they" want ever again.

by a reader on Sun, 08/21/2005 - 01:55 | reply

What they want

One virtue of our suggestion (giving them only money and access to knowledge, without regard for the effect on their culture) is that it doesn't involve the giver, or anyone else apart from each individual recipient, deciding how they should live their lives.

However, it is uncontroversial that they would use the money and knowledge to change their way of life if they were free to do so. That is the whole point of Oxfam's having a policy of preventing them from doing so.

by Editor on Sun, 08/21/2005 - 02:19 | reply

"Niger, long before it was Ni

"Niger, long before it was Niger was supporting a small population of nomadic peoples with no help or charity from anyone else."

Is it just me or is "supporting" a hugely misleading term here? Suppose that for all of this long blissful free-of-Western-influence time, the life expectancy was 23 and infant death rate at 50%. Yet, some fraction of people did survive to reproduce, generation after generation, and so, "the land was 'supporting' nomadic culture". Well BFD. That's good enough for those people, is it? "Supporting" is a trivial condition that means nothing more than "humans didn't die out completely there".

"The insertion of western civilization, agriculture, charity, technology, or whatever, is not necessary for human life to thrive in a place."

Sure helps.

"Insertion is usually balanced at some near point by desertion. What is not near to us is not dear to us. What is near to us is dear to us, and only then we survive and thrive."

Why then is a faraway group of peoples' 'native nomadic culture' so dear to Westerners half a world away?

"Who needs or truly cares about Niger? Only the peoples that live upon the land."

Says who? Speak for yourself. They are humans, I care about them. Moreover, Niger has certain natural resources which supply the rest of the world.

"Our feeble comments and platitudinal solutions are not needed"

Indeed.

"We have no stake in Niger and no business being there."

On the contrary, we have every 'stake' in Niger and "we" (if by "we" you refer to People From The West) have business dealings with people in Niger, specifically with regard to its natural resources. Do you know where Niger is, and about it?

"In terms of long term viability of humans in the region known as Niger, also, most of us have not a clue."

Agriculture would give us a more solid footing for, at least, making predictions in the "long term viability" department, methinks.

"I would choose the natural cycles of birth, subsistence and death over anything we do-gooders and social philosophers are proposing as an interference in region. It is likely more moral in the long run."

No 'teach a man to fish..' for you, is it. Course not, that would be "interference".

"If it no longer works (for them) it is because something we do has changed the order of things."

All the more reason...

p.s. What Elliot said

by blixax on Mon, 08/22/2005 - 03:05 | reply

Words not Deeds, or Words and Deeds

I have no doubt that you and several others "care" and so do I. So far caring has not been enough and various muddleheaded approaches for years have certainly not improved the lot of nomads in Niger much less the lot of peoples in sub-saharan Africa in general. Granted each situation and group is a different one, within Uganda, Zimbabwe, and so on, and for all the various tribes and peoples within.

The jury is out. We are alot closer on this than you might think. The point is that money and access to education and resources are key, rather than more lectures and back and forths on what should be done. I try to offer both and one person is only one drop in the bucket. Many persons are better.

We all must do much better. By "we" I mean everyone who has the interest to see real change, not just the next famine amelioration. And even with more attention and understanding of the real situations it will all be for naught if the affected peoples themselves, nomadic or not, do not have a direct hand in it.

by a reader on Mon, 08/22/2005 - 15:39 | reply

Oxfam Mauritania

Perhaps this is an example of a shared agricultural and educational resource.

http://www.oxfam.org.uk/what_we_do/where_we_work/mauritania/seedfair_learning.htm

by a reader on Mon, 08/22/2005 - 21:29 | reply

Oxfam Mauritania

It's about Oxfam seed vouchers. You're kidding, right? If not, go take your salary in seed vouchers and then get back to us about how educational it was.

by a reader on Mon, 08/22/2005 - 21:49 | reply

When I was farming

Seed vouchers were fine. Vouchers are a medium like money is a medium too. You can plant the seeds you want and grow crops and last I checked that was bonafide agriculture.

by a reader on Mon, 08/22/2005 - 23:43 | reply

Vouchers

If vouchers really are a medium like money, why does Oxfam give them vouchers and not money?

by Editor on Tue, 08/23/2005 - 01:35 | reply

Vouchers Do Not Equal Money

Harder to use seeds (so to speak) to buy prostitutes.

by a reader on Tue, 08/23/2005 - 02:14 | reply

You can't call a simple life bad.

Niger...

I have to say that people with a natural existence do not live bad lives or horrid lives for an eternity - they live simple lives, which is only different from a life in the west.

How can a way of life survive for thousands of years without happiness? Think about it - mothers tell their children about thier history, fathers come home at night after work, it is the same in all families and societies.

I know nothing of the niger people, but I do know of the indonesians - and those with simple lives are happy and fine, although they all want some of what they see on western television. Unless they are desperately poor, I liken this to a romantic view of westerners concerning faraway places.

Of course, the difference is that westerners can all afford to go, while most others in other countries cannot - however in this response, I am concerned here with the general quality of their lives.

My experience makes me agree with the view that only that which has been grown by ones oneself, or achieved alone has any value to that person or society - there are countless examples of given benefit in all countries that has been squandered, because of the careless way it has been introduced.

However, before a huge donation in aid, or a large education program, constantly there has been no slow buildup, or considered planning, or any opportunity of choice - personal power.

What seems as a novelty is often used and thrown away, no matter how expensive.

Naive it is to say that people in Africa would not desire money and objects from the west when they see them.

However, it is also naive to believe that a simple life without western commodities is worthless and brutal, when no experience of that life has been gained.

Bobby.

by Bobby Brown on Tue, 08/23/2005 - 11:17 | reply

Surviving Without Happiness

Bobby Brown wrote:

I have to say that people with a natural existence do not live bad lives or horrid lives for an eternity - they live simple lives, which is only different from a life in the west.

How can a way of life survive for thousands of years without happiness? Think about it - mothers tell their children about their history, fathers come home at night after work, it is the same in all families and societies.

Any way of life can survive very easily without happiness as long as people don't know anything better. That, in fact, is how people survived throughout most of human history. As the World pointed out above these people are typically one farm animal away from death. Do you imagine that they don't worry about that? Here's another question for you to chew over. A nomad group must sometimes pass near a town or through it. Sometimes people in that nomad group must want to go to the town, or to stay there and not have to worry as much about food. So why don't they?

by Alan Forrester on Mon, 09/05/2005 - 13:20 | reply

Using this name instead of Bo

Using this name instead of Bobby Brown.

In response to your last question, humanity as it can be would probably not allow these nomads to settle in their village. In any poor country, large groups of people that haven't managed to get themselves money, no matter what harsh circumstances, would always be driven away by people that have homes - because there is hardly anything to share. Good hearted citizens in any society routinely turn their heads to human problems that are too great for them to solve.

The wealthy do not share either - if they gave to one, they would have to give to many. Anyway it's not their fault - it's how the country is run that's the problem, and they can't give openly, but through channels, charities (that I believe like so many people are corrupt as hell). We should understand that if they romantically open their doors, they would lose all of their privilege for some very temporary aid to admittedly quite a lot of people.

Neither would open their doors for essentially the same reason - personal loss - which means that my mention of the rich in a poor society is actually irrelevant.

I understand the situation my friend. I get you, I do, and I am a realist, but then again, I can't emphasize enough that happiness and love are essential to human existence... to the individual and to the whole, to society.

Societies which do not have love and happiness collapse. An evil society breaks down. It will destroy itself. Smaller societies I do not know about, but briefly, the Romans destroyed themselves through laziness, expansion and too much power. The Nazis destroyed themselves by madness, and again a desire for too much power.

Nomadic existence - a life which never tried to become large, never gathered in a way which was meant to subjugate other people. They are poor, they have nothing - how long have they lasted? 1200 years. The Roman army lasted from 31 BC - 1453. At this point, only three hundred years longer. The Roman empire was much larger than these Nomads - perhaps because the Nomads are smaller, they should have lasted a tiny amount of time compared to the Roman empire. Left alone, they would certainly survive much longer, although considering the effects of globalisation, this is unlikely.

Why did the Roman empire get larger and larger and larger? Why was it an unstoppable force - because it wanted fulfill itself in culture and and enrich itself with other races. At the beginning, if they were evil, it was only in the opinion that a cause of death is evil. But for a long time, when the Roman Empire was concerned with learning and knowledge and expansion, it was a vital growing thing. When it's emphasis shifted to control and power, and entertainment such as the arenas, then it was evil, destroyed itself, collapsed. Nazi Germany - in itself a very short lived society, and a mad rush for power. Any such thing is invariably CRUSHED OR FALLS APART INSTANTLY. This is the exact opposite of Nomadic existence that I have read about here, something that grew gradually from the people, something that was always there.

With the Nomadic existence - there must be something strong and vital inside it which is comparable with the beginnings and marvelous parts of the Roman empire. Their way of life must reside in their strength of movement. How do you think they keep going, while they are traveling, while they have so much hardship and pain? They love each other, and they find happiness within themselves, their families and their people - and their way of life. On their travels they must find things, and have a proud wandering tradition. They must know various African communities incredibly well, and have knowledge of the land and of the birds and the animals.

African history was once considered as a verbal recording, inside the minds of humans only. It is likely that most Nomads think of their history in the same way. It is likely that they are very proud of their knowledge of themselves and their existence.

The universe grows my friend, it doesn't rot and still manage to continue on its course of life. It grows.

These people must be sustained. They must be happy.

OF COURSE, as human begins they must desire freedom that some people have in this sad sad world and some people do not.... Certainly, like most people in the developing world, the Nomads self perception is corrupted by the west. Certainly, many would not like to be nomads anymore, and would like to have a car, and a home.

However, The concept that there are societies of people that do not have happiness - This is wrong. Happiness is a natural emotion felt by human beings in the mind or in the soul. There are some sad people that have never known it, but never an entire society.

Looking at it this way - survival without happiness, actually cannot in fact be easy. A life like that would be very hard, it wouldn't be life at all. The society would attack each other constantly, would steal each other's animals. Would have no care. Nomads would not be a type of 'people', but individual scavengers, who hurt others, and steal constantly, from towns and offer no support to each other - an unhappy evil society. If that is what these people are, having lasted for 1200 years in this way, then my whole argument here is wrong.

Thanks, Daniel.

by DanielH on Wed, 10/19/2005 - 17:41 | reply

Life Expectancy

Daniel,
Do you think it would make them happier to live 70 years, rather than 30 years?

If everyone had their options explained to them, do you think you would rather have your children grow up with them, and live to 30 or so? Or do you think the parents of nomads would choose to have their children grow up in the United States and/or England? What do you honestly think?

More people do seem to want to immigrate to the United States from "third world" countries than the reverse....The proportions are remarkably different. I literally have never met someone who asked to live a nomadic life once it was explained to him just the diseases he would likely encounter and how long he would likely live.

Life expectancy isn't everything, but it does tell you about the relative ability of a person to meet his basic needs, something that is arguably very important to his own perception of whether he is happy (especially if a person living in a low life expectancy region knows about alternatives, so he can actively compare himself to those who are doing better from this perspective.)

Just curious.

Michael

by M Golding on Wed, 10/19/2005 - 20:23 | reply

Tut tut.

No, we're wildlife. If you can't handle that there are a number of religions available to you.

by Bill on Thu, 06/01/2006 - 11:55 | reply

Religions

Bill:

we're wildlife. If you can't handle that there are a number of religions available to you

The idea that morality in general (or in this case, drawing a moral distinction between humans and other animals) is tantamount to religion, is a concession that many atheists make to the religious. But it is a mistake, no more coherent than it would be to concede that epistemology or metaphysics, or for that matter physics, is tantamount to religion.

You may enjoy thinking of yourself as wildlife, but I myself am a mineral, and I challenge you to find the flaw my argument to that effect. It is the same as the flaw in yours.

by David Deutsch on Thu, 06/01/2006 - 12:19 | reply

Already with the straw man ar

Already with the straw man arguments!

People are nothing 'special', by any detached/objective view. The distinction we make is a subjective one (which is why we invent God to make it for us).

Not being a narcissist, I don't particularly 'enjoy' thinking of myself as anything.

I find no flaw in your mineral argument, though I find a flaw in it being called 'satire'.

by Bill on Thu, 06/01/2006 - 16:51 | reply

Re: Already with the straw man

You say people are wildlife, and you say you find no flaw in an argument that people are minerals. Well, which is it? Are people wildlife or mineral life?

-- Elliot Temple

My Blog

by Elliot Temple on Fri, 06/02/2006 - 06:56 | reply

People are people

And mineral. And wildlife.

If you can't see that, I really can't help you.

by Bill on Fri, 06/02/2006 - 10:27 | reply

Re: People are people

When you previously claimed people are wildlife, what did you mean?

-- Elliot Temple

My Blog

by Elliot Temple on Fri, 06/02/2006 - 16:12 | reply

People are wildlife

People are members of a primate species we designate H. sapiens. They are not some special non-animal category of beings.

The trouble with most of those who mock environmentalism is that they don't understand this. They think that humans have somehow transcended nature and the laws of physics.

by Yoni on Sun, 09/10/2006 - 11:24 | reply

Re: People are wildlife

People are not a "special non-animal category of things" in the same sense as animals are not a special non-atom category of things. That is to say, in the reductionist (or essentialist) sense.

However, animals have emergent properties that are not captured by describing them as atoms. The theory of evolution, for instance, is not needed to explain why the sun is hot, but it is needed to explain why giraffes have long necks - even though those necks consist entirely of atoms.

Likewise humans have emergent properties that are not captured by describing them as animals. The most prominent of these are human consciousness and human knowledge creation. But the one that is relevant to our discussion here is the moral values of humans. One can explain the behaviour of animals without ever referring to a distinction between right and wrong, or between what ought to be and what is. That is not so for humans.

by Editor on Sun, 09/10/2006 - 12:06 | reply

Re: Humans have transcended the laws of physics?

By 'transcended', do you mean violated?

If so, could you give an example of where something we have said implies that a law of physics has been violated (and state that law)?

If you mean something else by 'transcended', what makes you think that laws of physics cannot be 'transcended' in your sense?

by Editor on Sun, 09/10/2006 - 12:12 | reply

Funny Because They're True?

At Ynet, The Golem learns of the special training that allowed Israeli soldiers to stay superhumanly composed during the evacuation of Gaza under the most extreme verbal abuse.

Cox & Forkum have finally come up with a design for a World Trade Center replacement that would satisfy the Left.

And LGF recalls Bob Hope and claims that some things don't change.

Wed, 08/24/2005 - 00:28 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

'Pallywood' And Other Things You Ought To Know About

Solomon interviews Boston University History Professor Richard Landes about his new media watchdog project. The content is eye-opening.

Tue, 08/30/2005 - 14:30 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Worth Reading even if not Eye-Opening

Cognitive Egocentrism is everywhere, everywhere behind the eyes like a glaucoma in reverse. Think about it. You have to already have your eyes open and clear of fog to see beyond it.

Then we write, and write and read, the so called journalists and the medium of all our news that is fit to print. What news is that and is it yours? Why do you read what you read? Do you read it?

Where did old-fashioned journalism go, the writing that got to the heart of the story, if it ever blossomed in the first place? Such writing is not accidental, it takes time, but who will publish it today? Writing the story is only the last 10 percent of telling the story. Who will pay for the other 90 percent? If it is searched, written, and fortunately published, will we even carefully read the story if it is readily accessible?

Here's one, one of those stories, in the form of a blog interview. It may be accidental that its even about the news.

A worthwhile read.

by a reader on Sat, 09/03/2005 - 18:47 | reply

Can The United States Survive This Catastrophe?

So the narrative has settled down to the following:

President Bush and his friends need slaves in order to remain rich. The slaves are the unemployed [sic], the poor, illegal immigrants, and black people. President Bush and his friends have herded these people into environmentally vulnerable areas like New Orleans because they would rather they died. Then they caused hurricanes by not adopting the Kyoto Protocol. They also prevented the city and state governments from evacuating the unemployed, poor, and non-whites from New Orleans as the hurricane approached, and later prevented the survivors from being rescued, in part by sending the National Guard overseas to an immoral and illegal war, which itself is being fought in order to enrich President Bush and his friends. When they were finally sent in, it was to murder the black people. No wait, actually the war is being fought at the behest of Israel via a Jewish cabal who seized power through an illegal election and other sinister machinations, but don't get us started on that.

That a substantial constituency in the United States and throughout the world embraces or sympathises with this idiotic conspiracy-theoretic fantasy is a global catastrophe. We hope that the United States, and the world, can survive it.

Sun, 09/04/2005 - 14:28 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Catastrophe

As you know, the United States will certainly survive this catastrophe and we will be stronger as we learn to handle situations like this more effectively in the future. What else can we do?

The story that is not being told, however, except on Fox news, is interesting.

Many survivors of the hurricane could not be evacuated into hundreds of waiting boats that arrived immediately after the storm to help with evacuation efforts. Thousands of fellow Americans, wishing to risk their own lives to help the victims just as the storm ended, had their boats indefinitely detained outside the disaster area, because it was not deemed safe to be in open water around the city. The boats could not enter the ports because (get this)snipers were shooting at the passing rescue vessels in the harbors! "Citizens" of New Orleans stole a generator from a hospital, and the hospital, too, was taking incoming sniper fire. Helicopters that tried to evacuate citizens from rooftops were attacked from citizens on the ground. It was not safe for days for buses to enter parts of the city to evacuate refugees in need, not because of high water, but because of carjackings!

Obviously the vast majority of the citizens of New Orleans were brave and decent, even as they suffered horribly. But I can't imagine that if a tragedy of similar scope had happened in South Dakota or North Carolina, that rescue workers and fellow citizens would have been attacked with such zeal.

One of the lessons that does need to be learned is that in certain areas of the United States, when disaster strikes, the military and national guard need to be called in first to secure the area. And aid agencies, no matter how well intentioned or needed, must wait until the areas are secured. As it happened, the aid agencies arrived first but had to wait days, because no one imagined that such thuggery and lawlessness would break out in America after a tragedy, when Americans usually band together in times of crisis.

But the fact of the matter is that in cities like New Orleans, different sorts of disaster plans need to be in place. The national guard and military should be called in first, even if this too would lead to criticism.

"You're treating us like criminals, not victims," would be heard.

Only after an area is secured can aid agencies legitimately do their jobs. At this time it is no one's fault because we did not know, but next time we should hold our government responsible. There was insufficient law enforcement, because no one imagined that certain Americans would behave so horribly during a tragedy.

Unfortunately, it is not only in the Middle East that people shoot at those trying to rescue them. It pains me greatly to say that tribalism is alive and well in (a few areas of) the United States, as well.

by a reader on Sun, 09/04/2005 - 16:16 | reply

Re: Catastrophe

Indeed. But is it tribalism? Is it not the conspiracy-theoretic world view that made people contemptuous of cooperation and provided the sanction for their trying to kill and hurt and blame their way out of a problem instead? It is the prevalence of this world view, not the hurricane, that is the catastrophe we were referring to.

by Editor on Sun, 09/04/2005 - 17:51 | reply

Problems

It's hard to know for sure, but I suspect that only a very small percentage of the american people actually believe anything close to the theories you describe. A larger percentage like to spew stupid things to signal to their cohorts that they are bona fide members of their groups.

I see no evidence that those who were shooting at rescuers were motivated by anything like these theories. What was motivating them is, indeed, a problem. But, I suspect it's a different one.

But, we shouldn't forget that governments failed spectacularly in their fundamental responsibilities of maintaining law and order and facilitating people helping each other. Not through malice; but through incompetence, stupidity, corruption, institutional bickering and rigidity.

Giving these people more resources, responsibility, and power would be a terrible failure to learn from this tragedy.

Gil

by Gil on Sun, 09/04/2005 - 19:21 | reply

Incompetence

Instead of overanalyzing conspiracy theory and the city of New Orleans, why not forthrightly call it incompetence, confusion, and short sightedness and leave it at that. There's plenty of that to go around at all levels from the individual citizen on up but get on with it, stop carping, clean it up, and straighten out the disaster waiting to happen so it doesn't happen in the same way again. The United States doesn't need defenders so much as workers who pitch in and Americans fortunately have that trait in abundance no matter where they come from. Pitch in or move on.

by a reader on Sun, 09/04/2005 - 22:32 | reply

What Incompetence?

Does anyone know how to run a better law enforcement agency or disaster recovery agency than the ones that exist? If so, why don't they? Show me the cases of people being stopped.

OK I know if you want to form a private police force the laws will get in your way, and this does restrict the growth of certain knowledge. But there are two points to keep in mind: A) That knowledge you want, in fact, does not presently exist B) No other country is more competent Further, no one has suggested simple, reasonable, attainable improvements on our current government and persuaded a significant amount of people they aren't terrible ideas. Why is that, if our government is so incompetent?

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 09/05/2005 - 04:26 | reply

Competence

Elliot, you make a blanket statement that no other country is more competent. What makes you so sure of that? That certainly is a claim that should not be accepted without good reasons.

-- Mikko Särelä

by Mikko Särelä on Mon, 09/05/2005 - 06:31 | reply

other countries

Well, all I really need is this weaker statement: I haven't seen someone even claim another government is more competent, let alone make a serious argument that one is. It just seems to be: big disaster implies big failure. That doesn't follow.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 09/05/2005 - 07:18 | reply

USA

Besides, if someone said "Look here, if only the US was more like France, then it would have responded to the disaster far better. the French have an age-old tradition of charity and rescue. however, the arrogant Americans rejected it because they prefer dead civilians to adopting anything more from the French than French Fries" I would be right to laugh without bothering to look anything up.

I can imagine a few countries where I wouldn't outright laugh. But c'mon, the burden of a little evidence is on the people criticising the most successful country ever.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 09/05/2005 - 07:27 | reply

Re: Problems

Perhaps it is true that few Americans believe such theories while many feel it necessary to claim to believe them in order to signal membership of their groups. If so, it implies that many groups require lip service to be paid to such theories, which is surely worrying in itself.

Be that as it may, Condoleezza Rice has found it necessary to publicly deny one of those theories:

"I don't believe for a minute anybody allowed people to suffer because they are African-Americans. I just don't believe it for a minute"

Competence

Elliot, the people in charge of the rescue operations were hired to do that job. I can point out as a customer that a certain corporation has failed in delivering something it's customers needed/wanted even if I don't know how to make the better thing. In the market, you can often tell that they failed by them taking a fall.

With government thing, you don't have that creative destruction showing that the organization failed.

I, nor anyone else, do not have to be an expert, or have practical experience in the subject to be able to criticize what was done. Nor is the question of the government rescue being competent/incompetent a question of whether there's anybody out there who would have done a better job - but a question of whether objectively with the resources they have been given, could they reasonably have done a better job.

To start with some criticism: Why did they not evacuate hospitals before the storm hit? The likelihood of a disaster was high enough to have warranted such actions. Nor did they evacuate prisons, or probably many other places where people could not have moved out on their own. (Sorry for not providing links, I've mostly read Finnish newspapers and don't have time to dig English references - believe me if you like, or don't, or dig up the references, your choice).

Another thing: Why did they not know that the land had went down at some points in the city at least a meter, in some places more (this affected the flood walls' capability to operate)? Such a thing just would not happen in Finland and it isn't that costly to do.

How come there were no police within the congress center keeping peace? Nobody was there to prevent violent gangs from taking over - a simple thing that could have changed many peoples lives.

Now, if your criticism is directed toward those who just want to bash America, I have no problem. But to claim that the crisis operation went well that it did not fail or that incompetence was no part of it failing, you are reaching too far. You are making claims far bigger than your shoes.

The problem the rescue organization were trying to solve was huge, of catastrophic magnitude. In order to learn, one must look at what was done see the successes where they were and the failures where they were. The purpose of this is not bashing people, but learning. As the likelihood of another great storm appearing in the same area within a month was 42% last I checked - the people doing these things really need to learn to do better. A lot better.

I did not provide references to my claims of incidents happened, because I've mostly read them from Finnish newspapers myself and can't be bothered to search for similar stories in English. I have better things to do, such as doing research on crisis management and communication systems for medical emergency recovery. Doing that, as it will be part of my Ph.D. and hopefully something I will be working on in San Diego next year, is a little bit more important to me at the moment than looking for the references in this case.

I would like to finish this by saying that the task of managing such a widespread disaster and emergency is hard. It is a lot harder than most people estimate - most people have no idea how many things we take for granted that really are not there when you get into a disaster zone. Or for that matter how hard it is to coordinate groups of people from different organizations with different equipment and communications devices. And to do all this in an extremely hostile environment.

by Mikko Särelä on Tue, 09/06/2005 - 11:04 | reply

Re: Competence

Mikko,

You want to ask questions like, Why did they not evacuate hospitals before the storm hit?

That line of argument does not work. You could use the same style of argument about any subject where the government did not fail. People use it about Iraq all the time: Why was the old Iraqi army disbanded not used for security? Why not more troops? Can't any idiot see we needed more troops, and if only we brought them the war would be more successful?

We could question WWII submarine countermeasures policy similarly, regardless of what it actually was. We lost boats, didn't we?

I don't know why they didn't evacuate the hospitals. But neither do you. The correct line of argument would be an explanation of what the government did and why it functioned that way, coupled with implementable ways it could have done better. Tell me the reason they intentionally chose not to evacuate the hospitals.

You act like what to do was obvious and any reasonable person would have done better, but you have yet to explain what force prevented anyone reasonable from getting the job.

You say the organisations in the area need to get better. I say: They will get better at dealing with this. That's what they do. All by themselves.

Now, if your criticism is directed toward those who just want to bash America, I have no problem. But to claim that the crisis operation went well that it did not fail or that incompetence was no part of it failing, you are reaching too far.

I didn't say it went well, but I have no policy changes I'm suggesting, and my attitude towards the government is mildly friendly. I am annoyed with government haters of all varieties, and also anyone complaining without a clear purpose. (People who live in the area are excused and may complain. As can their friends who live elsewhere.) It takes knowledge to do things well. Either put up or shut up. (Create the knowledge in usable form yourself, or pay for it to be created.)

And even if you do create knowledge now, you didn't create it in usable form prior to the disaster. There's no getting around that.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 09/06/2005 - 12:20 | reply

Competence

I could continue my line by saying that it is my understanding that in e.g. Finland evacuation of hospitals, etc. are part of evacuation procedures already in place and that they have been for a long time. It is a well known fact in the disaster recovery profession that you need to make yourself a process and a plan for evacuating those people who cannot do it themselves.

It seems that such plans for New Orleans did not exist. Or that they were not used. Which ever the case, this is something that a) several organizations working around the globe know, b) was not used in this case, and c) goes directly against what you said before: namely that nobody else could have done a better job.

And no, I did not create the knowledge in a form that was usable within New Orleans area, nor did many other people. Me, I was not interested in creating it in such form, because to any sensible person it is clear that you need a plan for evacuating those who cannot do it. It never dawned to me that this might be a thing that people expressedly paid for doing emergency management never contemplated (or if they did, they nevertheless did not act on).

We only have 24 hours a day to do things and that ultimately means that one needs to choose priorities in what to pursue and what not to. That is why people hire other people to do things for them. They can dedicate themselves to doing the job and let you dedicate yourself to doing something else; something that your time is better spent in.

Now for the reasons why any capable person wouldn't have gotten the job? Are you asking about why not get the job from current organizations, or why not be capable of putting up their own?

For the first, the answer is not so simple, but public choice theory might give you a few hints to why. For the second, I wonder why the insurance companies have not started this by themselves - they would certainly have the economic incentives to do such things. Why it hasn't, is indeed an interesting question.

ps. your example of Iraq army actually punctuates my point, if I have understood the situation correctly. I've read that the armed forces had actually planned to use the Iraq army for stabilizing the area, but that the government appointed representative for Iraq disbanded the Iraq army without consulting the armed forces.

by Mikko Särelä on Tue, 09/06/2005 - 13:45 | reply

Priorities

Frank J agrees with me.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Thu, 09/08/2005 - 16:01 | reply

Tribes

Another nice, long essay by Bill Whittle. This time he's a bit – cross.

Mon, 09/05/2005 - 23:46 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Not only a bit - cross

Also a little bit - of a blathering idiot. But that may be his mouth talking; all the sheepdogs I have ever known have been all action and no talk. Plus they are usually a tribe of one and they wear no particular color.

If he is one of those sheepdogs and not a sheep in sheepdog clothing he belongs in the hundred mile rim of catastrophe along with all those other sheepdogs doing something.

by a reader on Wed, 09/07/2005 - 01:46 | reply

Re: Not only a bit - cross

We do not always agree with everything that Whittle says, but could you cite one of the blatherings that you consider especially idiotic?

by Editor on Wed, 09/07/2005 - 02:13 | reply

"Pinkos"

I agree wholeheartedly with the use of the phrase "blathering idiot" to succinctly describe Mr. Whittle.

I have not the patience for a full post-mortem of his hateful, psychotic rant, but shall merely present a couple of focused criticisms for now:

(1) His Pink/Grey dichotomy is ridiculous. Firstly, Pinkness and Greyness, as he defines them, have Absolutely Nothing Whatsoever To Do With Each Other - it's like categorising people into the Beethoven-lovers 'versus' the Southern-hemisphere-dwellers. For instance, why on earth should permissiveness (a 'Pink' attribute) run counter to, say, respect for science (a 'Grey' attribute)?

(2) Something I find particularly repugnant here is the latent homophobia:

The Pink Tribe is all about feeling good: feeling good about yourself! Sexually, emotionally, artistically... without regard to... natural law

I shall be most unimpressed if 'the world', which purports to be socially liberal (at least in respect of this particular issue) now tries to make excuses for him.

(3) I know I said two before, but I can't resist poking fun at Whittle's "Clinton Pink, Bush Grey" verdict. I mean, which of those two believes in 'intelligent design'? I'd give a long list of other examples of how Clinton is more in touch with reality than Bush, but ID is the only instance where 'the world' is itself sufficiently in touch with reality to see that I'd be right.

by Neil Fitzgerald on Wed, 09/07/2005 - 05:16 | reply

Re "Pinkos"

Could you explain how this passage

That has nothing to do with me being white. If the blacks and Hispanics and Jews and gays that I work with and associate with were there with me, it would have been that much better. That's because the people I associate with – my Tribe – consists not of blacks and whites and gays and Hispanics and Asians, but of individuals who do not rape, murder, or steal.

is consistent with the essay being an expression of homophobia? Is it also secretly an expression of hatred of all the other groups that he says are in his 'Tribe'?

by Editor on Wed, 09/07/2005 - 12:12 | reply

Just because the psycho is in

Just because the psycho is inconsistent doesn't mean he's good.

It's tempting to say 'the psycho doth protest too much'. I mean honestly, when in your life have you ever seen someone make the rhetorical gesture of insisting on their own lack of prejudice 'at gunpoint'. If it really happened that someone demanded acknowledgement of their unracism at gunpoint, would you be more or less inclined to think the person was harbouring objectionable views? Actually, though, I don't have enough evidence to honestly call him a racist, but my point (2) remains.

I didn't make that quote up by myself.

Whether or not you're prepared to call it latently homophobic (I certainly am) you can't deny that it runs counter to the ethos of your own website (perhaps even more so if I were to take out those

...'s and quote the whole passage).

by Neil Fitzgerald on Wed, 09/07/2005 - 14:03 | reply

Clarification

(Sorry about the double post, by the way!)

What runs counter to the ethos of 'the world' is not the definition of pinkness but the fact that Whittle is associating it, on the one hand, with the mentality of all the people who looted, raped and murdered in New Orleans, and on the other, with 'nongreyness' (this is where my point (1) comes into play - so I suppose (1) and (2) are two aspects of the same point, at the end of the day). Since greyness seems to be nothing other than a mixture of practicality, intelligence and scientific-mindedness, Whittle's opposition of greyness to pinkness implicitly makes the claim that anyone in favour of artistic and sexual freedom must be lacking those qualities.

(An unrelated point follows.)

I can see that what Whittle is really trying to contrast, with his Pink and Grey routine, is 'denial of reality' vs 'acceptance of reality', though why these qualities should be regarded as marking out disjoint 'tribes' (when in fact, people usually accept some realities but deny others), and why permissiveness should equal denial of reality, are both beyond me. And he holds up the neocons in the White House as paragons of the latter (rofl). OK, well why are they refusing to acknowledge global warming, then, and putting it all down to a Giant Left-Wing Conspiracy?

Oh, I forgot, you guys it's all a big conspiracy too.

by Neil Fitzgerald on Wed, 09/07/2005 - 14:33 | reply

post 1

Hmm, first Whittle is a homophobe.

Now The World is run by double-post-a-phobes.

Might this constitute a pattern of imagining bigotry?

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 09/07/2005 - 21:45 | reply

post 2

i sure hope I'm right that u r imagining the double-post-a-phobe thing.....

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 09/07/2005 - 21:46 | reply

All your usual acumen on disp

All your usual acumen on display I see. Good work, Elli.

by Neil Fitzgerald on Wed, 09/07/2005 - 23:25 | reply

The World and Bill Whittle

As we said, The World's political views are not the same as Bill Whittle's. However, we do not believe that everyone who disagrees with us in any way is an idiot or a psychopath.

Nor do we tend to attribute events to 'big conspiracies'. In fact we have a bit of a thing about conspiracy theories. We don't think they're true. (Or are we just 'protesting too much', to cover up our latent conspiracism?)

By the way, where is the evidence that President Bush believes in 'Intelligent Design'? We see only evidence that he has been fooled into thinking it's a serious theory because, like most people, he has a deficient grasp of the nature of science. And where is the evidence that 'the neo-cons in the White House ... are refusing to acknowledge global warming'? Certainly they are reluctant to waste trillions of dollars on a largely religious ritual whose effect on the climate would be barely perceptible at most. But, as far as we can see, their policies and statements about their policies take the existence of climate change for granted.

by Editor on Thu, 09/08/2005 - 00:05 | reply

replies galore

-Okay, so Whittle's Pink/Grey "dichotomy" is neither sharply-defined nor all-encompassing. But are you honestly claiming you didn't understand the categorization and had major disputes w/ how he categorized folks?

-"Permissiveness", properly defined, might be considered to run counter to respect for science if for example the scientific method, as applied to human nature by examining history, would reveal that humans behave in wicked ways (and are more unhappy) absent moral and legal codes, and in lesser but still harmful ways when perverse incentives/moral hazards are present. As I think it would.

-I don't see the "homophobia" at all. That passage could be read (and was probably intended) as simply a condemnation of (heterosexual) "free love". The fact that you saw the phrase "feeling good about yourself... Sexually" and thought Whittle must have been talking about homosexuality is... odd.

-Bush is certainly (at least in his public/political persona) more receptive to "Intelligent Design" (though as The World points out, there's no evidence he actually 'believes in' it per se) than Clinton. You're saying that this makes Bush more "Pink" than Clinton? Are you using Whittle's definition of Grey vs. Pink, or one of your own invention? I don't read Whittle's essay as setting up "Grey" as "reality-based" (including materialistic) and "Pink" as "not reality-based" as such, which seems to be what you have in mind. I think we can stipulate that Bush's worldview is more informed by faith than Clinton's. If you think this fact makes Bush more "Pink" (qua Whittle) than Clinton then you didn't read Whittle's piece closely.

-So Whittle might be a racist (albeit you "don't have enough evidence to honestly call him" one) because you look askance upon the fashion in which he, anticipating the charges of racism that his piece would engender from such as yourself, states that he is not? Heh.

Finally, a substantive point:

"Whittle's opposition of greyness to pinkness implicitly makes the claim that anyone in favour of artistic and sexual freedom must be lacking those qualities."

Or at least, doesn't have those qualities in the combination and amount that is characteristic of those who are "Grey". Sure. You seem not to know this: Whittle's "Tribe" setup is a grouping, not a "definition" per se. He is observing patterns among people and that many people generally fall into one category or the other. So it's not a "definition" in the sense of "Since you're Pink, ergo X". It's more like, "X, Y, and Z are true of you... these are Pink tendencies... so you lean 'Pink'". You can argue that this pattern doesn't exist and that Whittle is wrong to think that it does, or you can argue that Whittle is wrong in some or most of the categorizations he has put forward, but you haven't done either (except to say that Bush can't be "Pink" because he supposedly believes in "Intelligent Design", which is a non sequitur).

"I can see that what Whittle is really trying to contrast, with his Pink and Grey routine, is 'denial of reality' vs 'acceptance of reality', though why these qualities should be regarded as marking out disjoint 'tribes' (when in fact, people usually accept some realities but deny others), and why permissiveness should equal denial of reality, are both beyond me."

They're fuzzy groupings, generalizations. Yes, some people really have a problem with extracting generalized groupings from observations, though I don't understand why.

"And he holds up the neocons in the White House as paragons of the latter (rofl)."

What's a "neocon" exactly, and which people in the White House are them? Remember, you don't like fuzzy, general categorizations... :-)

" OK, well why are they refusing to acknowledge global warming, then, and putting it all down to a Giant Left-Wing Conspiracy?"

Who "refuses to acknowledge" global warming? Global warming (lowercase), if it means anything, = the world getting warmer (on average - how that average is to be taken, must be defined BTW) according to measured temperatures. Has Bush or someone else refused to acknowledge the existence, or accuracy, of the temperature record from circa 1850-2000, and the mathematical fact that it evinces a warming trend (assuming of course that it does)?

Perhaps you mean to refer to "Global Warming" here, i.e. the hypothesis that (1) the earth's temperature will get significantly warmer in the future due to a particular, easy to understand heat-trapping effect people have identified and termed "the greenhouse effect" and the hypothesis that this "greenhouse effect" will dominate all other effects present in the oceano-atmospheric system (as well as fluctuations in the sun's energy output), (2) this warming will be bad (for us) in general, and (3) we can reverse it significantly by altering our behavior in some realistic way (and in a way whose benefits outweigh the costs).

Problem is, it's still untrue to claim that Bush "refuses to acknowledge" this hypothesis. I'm quite certain he acknowledges that the hypothesis exists (as do I). That's not the point. I guess what you are really "accusing" Bush of is being unwilling to stake our economy on the hypothesis, in toto, being correct. Well yeah. I am too.

It's just a hypothesis after all, buttressed (perhaps - I'm not even sure one can honestly say it's buttressed) by some (who knows how accurate or complete) computer modelling. Also, ALL of (1), (2), and (3) have to be true for the action you presumably desire to be worthwhile. I'm not even sure that (1) is true, myself. It looks as if The World is (understandably) stuck on (3). Either way, this all is a hypothesis which is only as strong as its weakest link. So why would we alter our entire domestic policy and hamstring our economy based on a hypothesis with so little evidence behind it? Is that "acknowledging reality", or its opposite? Is "But still, let's just sign Kyoto anyway, or at least string along the process/talks, because we need to get along, besides, we can fix the details later" (Clinton's evident stance) based on reality, or its opposite? Ok, I know your answer to that. As you know mine - and Bush's.

by blixa on Thu, 09/08/2005 - 04:13 | reply

Re: replies galore

Re homosexuality, I think he means this passage: "do their own thing without regard to ... natural law". Homophobes consider homosexuality unnatural, right?

by a reader on Fri, 09/09/2005 - 00:34 | reply

Oh, I see

Good point. Another example: Race bigots consider race-mixing unhealthy. I say "Don't be unhealthy." Therefore I must be a race-bigot!

That was fun :-)

by blixax on Fri, 09/09/2005 - 21:50 | reply

Blixax, master of logic, and y

Blixax, master of logic, and yet a race bigot. What an unlikely combination! :-/

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Fri, 09/09/2005 - 22:30 | reply

Code Words

One of these days The World might do a post on code words, those words in conjunction that have an implicit meaning for the doctrinally informed. Some examples for consideration?:

Natural Law
Climate Change
Neo-Con Intelligent Design

On the other hand, this could post might seem to border on the edge of Conspiracy Theory. To clarify, I wonder if these words are born into the world of political discussion fully formed, or are they someone's intentional invention. Add code words of your choice and the daffy definitions that might go with them. It could be fun!

by a reader on Sat, 09/10/2005 - 01:52 | reply

Sorry it took me a while to r

Sorry it took me a while to return, but in truth I was rather ashamed of my unwarranted outburst at Elliot Temple. However, I see that blixax has written a thorough reply, deserving of consideration.

- "Permissiveness", properly defined, might be considered to run counter to respect for science if for example the scientific method, as applied to human nature by examining history, would reveal that humans behave in wicked ways (and are more unhappy) absent moral and legal codes, and in lesser but still harmful ways when perverse incentives/moral hazards are present. As I think it would.

Well, I guess that's possible, but when a polemicist like Whittle writes a diatribe like that, it can surely be taken for granted that his targets are not just some tiny, defenceless, powerless groups/ideologies, but rather, ones that hold some sway and are worth the effort of attacking. And to the best of my knowledge, there is no significant groundswell of public opinion in favour of a total absence of moral or legal codes. However, there is a significant battle of ideas going on in American right now around such issues as gay marriage and whether gays should be allowed into the priesthood and so on (perhaps there are others, but my ignorance of US politics prevents me from reeling off a list). The 'live' issue of abortion rights also springs to mind. Therefore, the most reasonable conclusion I can draw is that Whittle was indirectly referencing the 'permissive' sides of those debates. Perhaps I'm wrong, but at least you can see the logic in my madness.

-I don't see the "homophobia" at all. That passage could be read (and was probably intended) as simply a condemnation of (heterosexual) "free love". The fact that you saw the phrase "feeling good about yourself... Sexually" and thought Whittle must have been talking about homosexuality is... odd.

OK well one of the main reasons for the association I made was that in this country (the UK) the colour pink just is associated with homosexuality for some reason (gay men in particular). Perhaps I was wrong in leaping to the conclusion that it's the same in America. As for Whittle's phrase "feeling good about yourself... Sexually", well let's do some of that free association Whittle recommends: Brainstorm some possible reasons why a person might not feel good about themselves sexually. I'd be surprised if 'because they're homosexual (and happen to live in one of the less tolerant parts of our society)' wasn't one of the first ideas that came into your head.

But fair enough, maybe I was seeing a bit more than he really implied. However, even if that's true, my point about permissiveness being opposed to the desirable attributes of greyness remains...

So it's not a "definition" in the sense of "Since you're Pink, ergo X". It's more like, "X, Y, and Z are true of you... these are Pink tendencies... so you lean 'Pink'"

Ah. You're right, I hadn't fully grasped that point.

You can argue that this pattern doesn't exist

That's precisely what I would argue. I have anecdotal evidence: I spent a few years in academia, going to conferences and meeting various people (mathematicians). A substantial majority of those I conversed with leaned to the liberal sides of the various 'moral issues' I mentioned above, and Whittle would thereby be inclined to call them 'Pinks'. At the same time, I judged that these people had far greater understanding and respect for science than the general public, and moreover a much greater willingness and ability to base their political opinions on reasoned argument, and even science when possible. This qualifies them as 'Greys'. I tentatively predict that this tendency towards simultaneous Pink and Grey is to be found throughout the world's scientific community, which therefore stands as so massive a counterexample to Whittle's 'pattern' as to make it useless. I suspect David Deutsch, with his much wider experience of academia, will be able to corroborate this.

If you think this fact makes Bush more "Pink" (qua Whittle) than Clinton then you didn't read Whittle's piece closely.

I beg to differ.

(a) Pinkness, as best I can tell, incorporates the attribute of believing something irrational because it makes you feel good. ID is irrational. But it makes the religious right feel good.

(b) Greyness seems to incorporate the attribute of respect for the best scientific theories, even to the extent that they may contradict hopes we hold dear. Clinton, by rejecting ID, exhibits greater respect for science than Bush.

-So Whittle might be a racist (albeit you "don't have enough evidence to honestly call him" one) because you look askance upon the fashion in which he, anticipating the charges of racism that his piece would engender from such as yourself, states that he is not? Heh.

Are you honestly unfamiliar with the phenomenon of the phrase "Now I'm no racist, but" prefixing a racial attack (not that it necessarily does here)?

What's a "neocon" exactly, and which people in the White House are them? Remember, you don't like fuzzy, general categorizations... :-)

Bush, Cheney, Rumsfeld, for instance.

Perhaps you mean to refer to "Global Warming" here, i.e. the hypothesis that (1) the earth's temperature will get significantly warmer in the future due to a particular, easy to understand heat-trapping effect people have identified and termed "the greenhouse effect" and the hypothesis that this "greenhouse effect" will dominate all other effects present in the oceano-atmospheric system (as well as fluctuations in the sun's energy output), (2) this warming will be bad (for us) in general, and (3) we can reverse it significantly by altering our behavior in some realistic way (and in a way whose benefits outweigh the costs).

Yes. I mean (1), (2) and (3). Overwhelmingly, the leading scientists in the field accept (1) and (2) and the first half of (3). As proof, I point to Naomi Oreske's paper.) The cost-benefit thing, admittedly, falls outside their area of expertise. However, a point is reached where the severity of (2) makes it perverse, to say the least, that we're already doing the best we can cost-benefit-wise.

I shall make no defense of Kyoto, as I don't know enough about it. But some market-based system of "carbon-trading" seems an obvious and relatively painless catalyst for the necessary research into greener energy.

Copyright © 2007 Setting The World To Rights

Amnesty International Versus Freedom

Sometimes the government proposes bad ideas for fighting terrorism, like identity cards. The police would be able to harass people to produce their cards, which would cost somewhere between £93 and £300 each. Even if the cards had worked in pilot studies, and they have not, criminals and terrorists would be essentially unimpeded by them. In a speech on 2 September Charles Clarke, the Home Secretary, said we already carry lots of ID with us, so why not one more card? But if the market already produces lots of ID why do we need this ruinously expensive and useless bureaucratic monstrosity from the government? We suspect that Mr Clarke wants to introduce the card for a reason he announced in his 2 September speech:

“Big Brother society is already here and my job is to control it.”

Obviously Mr Clarke does not understand the difference between people voluntarily carrying useful ID and the government forcing people to carry ID. Nor does he understand what Big Brother states, i.e. – tyrannies – are. So we need organisations who keep an eye on the government's attempts to encroach upon civil liberties.

Amnesty International is ostensibly such an organisation. However, they have argued that the House of Commons ought not to pass legislation to allow the government to expel people who incite terrorism. They write:

- the absolute prohibition of torture or other ill-treatment, and the principle inherent to such prohibition according to which a person should never be sent anywhere where she or he risk being subjected to torture or other ill-treatment -- the principle known as non-refoulement;
- the right to seek and enjoy asylum, including the right of all persons who seek international protection to have their asylum claim individually and fully considered in fair and satisfactory procedures consistent with international human rights and refugee law and standards. Any intention to exclude someone from refugee status should be considered in the context of regular refugee status determination procedures, and should be subject to fundamental principles of procedural fairness, including the right to appeal against the decision to exclude, and to remain in the UK while that appeal is being considered;

- the rights to freedom of expression and association;

We are in the middle of a war against people who intend to destroy freedom by committing mass murder. People who advocate this are among our enemies in this war. The British government should not allow these people to recruit and raise money in Britain. Nor should the British government, in general, deport these people to any free country. Freedom of expression does not entitle people to incite, train, finance or recruit combatants for war against citizens of free countries. Freedom of association does not require the government to allow people to come together to support such a war. The new anti-terror legislation does not contravene human rights.

Thu, 09/08/2005 - 12:53 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Don't get your idea

Let me be clear. Do you really say that Amnesty International deliberately supports terrorists?

I think that in this case they simply support civil society principles indiscriminately.

And that is what law should be all about - it should set out rules for everybody.

If a person can be proven to incite hatred - why can't he or she be prosecuted in UK?

If the fault cannot be proven - who has the right to define fate of the person?

Hey! What about civil liberty?!

Why do you oppose "government's attempts to encroach upon civil liberties" selectively?

And about "war on terror". I don't understand why spreading terrorists across the world is better than prosecuting them where they are?

by a reader on Thu, 09/08/2005 - 15:37 | reply

Big Brother

"Big Brother society is already here and my job is to control it."

Thanks for the best laugh of the day. It's a tough job but someone has to do it.

Oxymoron joke, thoroughly enjoyed!

by a reader on Thu, 09/08/2005 - 15:51 | reply

Re: Don't get your idea

I think that in this case they simply support civil society principles indiscriminately.

And that is what law should be all about - it should set out rules for everybody.

If a person can be proven to incite hatred - why can't he or she be prosecuted in UK?

If the fault cannot be proven - who has the right to define fate of the person?

Under that principle, wouldn't all warfare be murder?

by Editor on Thu, 09/08/2005 - 16:03 | reply

Re: wouldn't all warfare be murder?

I am not sure what you mean exactly. Modern terrorism is almost always murder and therefore, terrorists, their leaders and those who incite terrorism should be tried and prosecuted.

Why sending them to Egypt, Jordan or Lebanon is better than prosecuting?

On the other hand if you cannot prove anything and therefore cannot prosecute people in one way, why do you resort to prosecution in another way? What right do you have to do so? Just because you call somebody a terrorist doesn't mean he is terrorist.

I saw some of those "people in question" on TV and they say quite unambiguously that they endorse violence against civilians, for example, in Israel. If they cannot be brought to justice then the law must be changed in order to accomodate such crime and to be able to punish them. In that way UK law would say clearly what moral values it stands for.

What you advocate here for, as it seems to me now, is to just "fight some bad guys for good reasons" without hesitation. Does end justify means?

By sending these "terror preachers" back home you admit that you are simply helpless.

by a reader on Thu, 09/08/2005 - 17:52 | reply

Re: wouldn't all warfare be murder?

When soldiers go on a mission to kill enemy soldiers, they do not put them on trial first. Thus they are deciding their fate without first proving that they are guilty of a crime. Under the principles of a civil society, pursued indiscriminately as you advocate, that is murder, is it not?

by Editor on Thu, 09/08/2005 - 18:10 | reply

Re: soldiers go on a mission to kill enemy soldiers

Oh, great! Soldiers also kill many civilians that are considered as unavoidable casualties in a war. I suggest also killing their families and friends - in present circumstances (i.e. GLOBAL WAR ON TERROR) their lives can be sacrificed without pity.

No, seriously. If you consider yourself as such a soldier why don't we go and kill terror preachers right where they are? What is this about? Playing around with deportation, right to abode etc. - what a petty issue it is!

In case of such an emergency like global war on terror - what petty issue is ID cards introduction.

You oppose one initiative on the grounds of civil liberties and support another on the grounds of war on terror. Be consistent.

by a reader on Fri, 09/09/2005 - 09:49 | reply

Re: soldiers go on a mission to kill enemy soldiers

Is it murder or not?

by Editor on Fri, 09/09/2005 - 10:44 | reply

Of course it is murder

.. and people should feel sorry for committing it even if it is unavoidable. And every effort should be put to avoid murder.

If such murder is unavoidable during a war then the war should be avoided, but soldiers cannot be prosecuted for killing enemy. If the war is unavoidable then, again, it is a different story.

But whatever you call it but terror is not a war, although it might be unavoidable in many cases. And the presence of terrorists doesn't mean that you can prosecute people randomly in such a tricky way. However, if their fault can be proven under civil society law than the war retorics wouldn't be necessary here at all.

by a reader on Fri, 09/09/2005 - 14:58 | reply

Re: Of course it is murder

Is it your opinion that civil society law ought to designate certain unavoidable things as serious crimes?

If all war is murder, and every effort should be made to avoid murder, should all war be made illegal?

by Editor on Fri, 09/09/2005 - 15:36 | reply

losing time and logic

You have gone too far from the main point. In my view, the main point was - why do you protect civil liberties only selectively? And why a person whose fault cannot be proven needs to be sent away?

Comparing terror preachers with an enemy soldier who cannot be stopped except if killed - such comparison is overstretched, to say the least.

Home office (or whoever) have had years to try and stop these people and nevertheless have managed to do nothing. These people could have been stopped in a peaceful manner many time before the bombs went off in London and before the planes crashed into WTC. After all, noone can tell if these terror preachers have had any direct connection to the bombing. I have no information about whether they recruited, assisted or guided the terrorists. All we have is their speach. But their speach, even if very harmful to society, is not an order. You can compare these things only in figurative sense. But you go far beyond that line. You tell that they actually do give orders.

Is it logical enough?

by a reader on Mon, 09/12/2005 - 15:28 | reply

Re: Of course it is murder

You have said categorically that all war is murder and that every effort should be made to avoid murder. It seems to follow from those two propositions that all war should be illegal. Do you believe that it should?

by Editor on Mon, 09/12/2005 - 16:27 | reply

RE: war, murder and civil liberty

I think both parties to this discussion have a point and are mistaken in parts of their reasoning: not all war is murder, so not all war should be made illegal. Wars have two sides, but there is usually no moral symmetry based on which the legality of the war should be ultimately judged. But it is true that The World's argument for deportation is selective in regards to civil liberties. I believe a better move than the deportation law is to define the "incitement to terror" as a form of assistance in murder and prosecute the inciters within the UK. This will also produce a far more desirable outcome. By deporting the preachers of terror, one would effectively leave them free to do harm in other places and in other forms, and worse, one would help radicalize the societies that have given rise to the existing terrorist ideas in places like Saudi Arabia, Pakistan, Iran, etc. Whereas a successful prosecution in the UK is capable of ending that trail of incitement forever.

by Bob on Tue, 09/13/2005 - 04:46 | reply

A fair trial

Is it the position of The World that when we are deemed to be at war with some group, someone who is accused of supporting that group does not have a right to a fair trial and the presumption of innocence?

by GS on Tue, 09/13/2005 - 14:15 | reply

Re: A fair trial

That depends what you mean by 'supporting'. For example, enemy fighters cannot be assigned such rights without in effect banning warfare. And sometimes (depending on the nature of the war) nor can people who are giving the orders, planning the operations, spying, manufacturing or transporting munitions, and recruiting, training or inciting people to do any of those things. Under some circumstances, any or all such people are, in fact, enemy fighters. Another example is innocent bystanders. They must never be targeted, but nor do they have an unconditional right not to be harmed unless first put on trial (where they would in any case be acquitted).

Is it your (GS's) position that enemy fighters have a right not to be forcibly expelled from a given territory unless they are found guilty of a crime in a fair trial under the presumption of innocence? If not, why not?

by Editor on Tue, 09/13/2005 - 15:51 | reply

enemy fighters

It is only you who called them "enemy fighters". There is no real war between "terror preachers" and UK. Therefore, they are entitled to all civil rights as everybody else in this country. Arguing whether all wars are illegal or not is a separate totally unrelated topic. You denied these people fair trial on the basis that you called them "enemy fighters". Nothing else!

On the other hand, bringing them to justice under possible "incitement of terror" would have much better effect on society and would help enormously in the course of "war on terror". That sort of fighting is much much more acceptable way.

What amazes me is that UK legal system feels much more comfortable when prosecuting people on the grounds of unslighting religious feelings (which are expressed towards non-existent God) rather than on the grounds of humanity (which is expressed towards quite real entities - us). And this is where the real problem lies.

by a reader on Wed, 09/14/2005 - 10:42 | reply

Re: enemy fighters

Should all war be illegal or not?

by Editor on Wed, 09/14/2005 - 10:47 | reply

Re: A fair trial

If I understand you right you think that people suspected of supporting terrorists may or may not "be assigned such rights (to the presumption of innocence etc)... depending on the nature of the war"

What aspects of the nature of the war are you thinking of here?

I would suggest that, in a conventional war between large armies it is not practical to try every soldier, and if they are fighting in uniform it is hardly necessary.

However this war is more dissimilar to a conventional war than it is similar.

The British government has easily enough resources to try every single person suspected of supporting terrorists and allow a jury of their peers to decide on their guilt. This would, I suspect, lead to fewer false conviction and give everyone greater faith in the system. Why should they not do so?

Also if during a war it is acceptable to curtail the rights of those who may be supporting terrorists would the world support the internment of all Muslims? Or there deportation? If not why not?

Lastly if you think that some level of proof is required before you deport, imprison, or intern someone accused of supporting terrorists but not the level of proof required by a jury trial, what level of proof do you think is acceptable?

by GS on Wed, 09/14/2005 - 13:59 | reply

Re: enemy fighters

>Should all war be illegal?

I don't have an answer to this question, but maybe it would be helpful to the discussion if The World suggested a working definition of "war". I suggest their definition would have to exclude violent street gangs, international mafia organizations (or maybe not?) and violent G8 summit protesters and encompass conventional warfare and the war on terror/global jihad.

by GS on Wed, 09/14/2005 - 14:24 | reply

Should all war be illegal?

You are still trying to catch me on this question no matter how relevant it is. My point was that this question is absolutely irrelevant here because we don't talk about real war here at all.

But if you insist on your question, I should answer that in ideal world where only moral principles should govern people all real wars should be illegal (or rather, not morally justifiable). But in today's world laws govern people and states and the laws are not equal to moral principles. Also, many country leaders do not behave rationally regarding human rights, WMD etc. and therefore a real war could be legal and justified. The thing is, whenever it is physically possible any evil man should be brought to fair trial (like Saddam is going to be) and so should be the "terror preachers".

Therefore, Amnesty International is not against freedom but for freedom. Quite contrary to what you stated.

by a reader on Wed, 09/14/2005 - 16:42 | reply

Well?

Well? What is it about the nature of this war which makes it inappropriate to give suspected enemy a fair trial? We have plenty of spare resources to do it with.

by GS on Fri, 09/16/2005 - 13:56 | reply

nature of war

that the guy is shooting at you, and it's far easier to shoot him than to capture him.

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Fri, 09/16/2005 - 14:52 | reply

nature of war

So if the person is not shooting you, as in the cases we were discussing, you should give them a fair trial according to your answer.

by GS on Fri, 09/16/2005 - 15:59 | reply

capture

our soldiers already have a policy of accepting surrender and of capturing prisoners, when it is safe to do so. we don't shoot people who aren't a danger.

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Fri, 09/16/2005 - 16:03 | reply

capture

I'm sorry Elliot but I don't think you have been following the discussion. The question is whether people arrested in Britain, who are alleged to have supported terrorists should be given a fair trial with the presumption of innocence etc. I do not accept that that situation is analogous to a battlefield one where resources are scarce and split second decisions must be made. We have all the resources of a modern state at our disposal and a few dozen, or at most a few hundred alleged enemy. Why not give them a fair trial?

by GS on Fri, 09/16/2005 - 16:12 | reply

I thought you were discussing

I thought you were discussing war (which has been asked about repeatedly in this thread), but I see now it was just a confusing choice of metaphor.

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Fri, 09/16/2005 - 16:25 | reply

War metaphor

I agree it is a confusing choice of metaphor, however the accuracy of the metaphor is the basis of The World's whole argument.

by GS on Fri, 09/16/2005 - 16:37 | reply

I dunno about the basis of th

I dunno about the basis of their whole argument, but perhaps we can hope for a follow World post explaining it in more detail.

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Fri, 09/16/2005 - 16:52 | reply

A working definition of war

Organised political violence using lethal force.

by Editor on Fri, 09/16/2005 - 19:14 | reply

ok i think i get what ppl are ok i think i get what ppl are saying now. some questions:

to The World:

1) what are the benefits of deportation? to save space/money that it'd cost to jail them?

2) is the reason not to give trials one of cost?

to GS:

how much money and effort are we required to spend being nice to our enemies, would you say? is it limited?

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Fri, 09/16/2005 - 20:13 | reply

The question

The question is whether people arrested in Britain, who are alleged to have supported terrorists should be given a fair trial with the presumption of innocence etc.

Isn't it more whether they should always be given a fair trial etc. regardless of how much harm that might do to the war effort, or just usually?

For example, if the evidence to convict a person of being a member of a terrorist network would reveal sources of intelligence and therefore cannot be presented to a court, but evidence can be presented for a court to order him deported, except that the person has a well-founded fear of persecution in his home country, then under peacetime rules he would walk free. Wartime could justify either detaining him without trial as an enemy combatant or deporting him summarily to his home country.

by Editor on Fri, 09/16/2005 - 20:18 | reply

So, we have intelligence reports

... against terror preachers and revealing the sources would jeopardise the whole country safety? Don't be ridiculous.

I thought that these people's fault is quite clear without any hidden information. The problem was only with legislation. We afraid to tell that inciting violence is bad, but we are not afraid of spoiling our fair trial system. Applause!

by Yuryr on Mon, 09/19/2005 - 11:10 | reply

Re: The question

>For example, if the evidence to convict a person of being >a member of a terrorist network would reveal sources of >intelligence

Surely the same could be said for alleged members of drug gangs, or mafia organisations, can they also be locked up without trial?

This also links back to your definition of war which, while I accept it, rather begs the question what is special about political violence? If the violence is organised, lethal and political we can use a whole set of new rules, while if it is organised, lethal and for money, or for control or turf, we cannot.

by GS on Mon, 09/19/2005 - 12:46 | reply

money and effort

>how much money and effort are we required to spend being >nice to our enemies, would you say? is it limited?
>-- Elliot Temple

I would say that the amount of money and effort we are required to spend giving fair trials to those accused of being our enemies is not unlimited, but is quite large in a rich society. I would not belittle it by calling it 'being nice to our enemies'.

by GS on Mon, 09/19/2005 - 14:12 | reply

The cost

So (round figures) the cost of the Moussaoui trial has been about $10 million. There are 100,000 jihadists in the world. So under your system, they could win the war just by all giving themselves up. The cost of their trials alone would be a trillion dollars. If that doesn't bankrupt America overnight, North Korea could declare war, and have its armed forces of 7 million commit some war crimes and then surrender.

by a reader on Fri, 03/17/2006 - 02:18 | reply

...Then Only Criminals Will Have Guns

Following a recent spate of shootings in North-West London, local people say they have had enough, and have marched with police through the streets of the Borough of Brent, demanding an end to gun crime in the area.

It is not clear whether London's criminals were impressed by the march. Time will tell. The police are rather despondent, though:

Brent's borough commander, Chief Supt Andy Bamber, said the availability of firearms in the borough was "absolutely horrifying".

"People can easily get a firearm and the age group of those getting involved is coming down," he said.

It's not even remotely true that 'people can easily get a firearm'. Thanks to Britain's stringent gun-control laws, it is only criminals who can easily get them.

Sat, 09/10/2005 - 19:02 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Question

What are the penalties for holding an illegal handgun or rifle? What are the penalties for using a firearm in a crime? What are the penalties for smuggling firearms?

by a reader on Sun, 09/11/2005 - 02:15 | reply

Penalty

The penalty for owning a gun is five years in jail and an 'unlimited' fine.

by Alan Forrester on Wed, 09/14/2005 - 02:26 | reply

Re: ...Then Only Criminals Will Have Guns

No. Police and army has guns too. Sometime it is not enough - true. But what you suggest instead?

- 1) all teenagers should have guns (from their parents wardrobes)
- 2) all looters should have guns (from nearby gun shop)

- 3) all burglars
- 4) all former prisoners
- 5) some psychologically unstable people (who have not yet been qualified as "dangerous" by GPs)
- 6) all people who at least once in a lifetime might feel jealousy or rage or whatever.
- 7) some drunk people
- 8) people who are annoyed by neighbours, passers by, bad drivers or whatever causes hatred between people.

A teenager shooting classmates in a school, a city white collar worker shooting colleagues being over-exhausted at work, a looter in New Orleans who could easily break into a gun shop shooting rescue workers - these examples seems not enough for you, guys? Are you going to bear arms or arm bears? How do you tell the difference?

by a reader on Wed, 09/14/2005 - 10:55 | reply

Re: ...Then Only Criminals Will Have Guns

No. Police and army has guns too.

They have guns, and so do certain specially privileged civilians. However, contrary to what Chief Supt Bamber inadvertently said, none of those people can get them easily. Only criminals can.

Your point might be better made if you removed all the criminals from your list. Why, for instance, did you include burglars, since we know from Chief Supt Bamber that they can already get guns easily?

by Editor on Wed, 09/14/2005 - 11:19 | reply

burglars

knowing that every family can have gun legally quite possibly would provoke every single burglar and thief have guns charged and ready and start shooting to any living soul they meet on their way.

On the other hand many burglars (even if they can easily get a gun) prefer not to have it at all because their sentence would be much higher if found in possession of a gun.

There is no perfect solution in this imperfect world. But once again you exhibit double standards.

On one hand you advocate for giving guns to everybody so that everybody can defend himself/herself. On the other hand, you don't agree that if every country can have weapons of mass destruction than there will be less wars and more protection. Why don't we want Iran to have nuclear weapon?

Because we are not sure that Iranian government would act rationally. The same goes here - I don't believe that all people with guns would act rationally.

If somebody is targeting you as a possible victim and is armed than the fact that you have a gun doesn't play much role. Killers and burglars who own their living this way would spend more money to get a better gun and put more efforts in training themselves than any of us. The only choice we have is to set up a body of professionals who can protect others. And that is what police and army are.

Many criminals have guns - true. But you would allow armed criminals to multiply enourmously whereas you would still have your own single gun. I am not sure if this would be a better world to live in.

by a reader on Wed, 09/14/2005 - 11:43 | reply

knowing that every family can knowing that every family can have gun legally quite possibly would provoke every single buglar and thief have guns charged and ready and start shooting to any living soul they meet on their way.

Or maybe most thieves don't like gun fights, or murder, and wouldn't rob anyone they thought might be home and have a gun.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 09/14/2005 - 17:41 | reply

I Have

A big dog and a shotgun loaded with rock salt. Stops those burglars everytime.

by a reader on Wed, 09/14/2005 - 20:16 | reply

Buglers

I don't see why buglers shouldn't have guns. They need them in case someone tries to steal their bugle.

by R on Thu, 09/15/2005 - 00:38 | reply

Oh

you mean burglars... Nevermind.

by R on Thu, 09/15/2005 - 00:41 | reply

Burglars

Thanks for correction... Many people would suggest putting an alarm into house, a dog, a baseball bate or whatever. And many people would find it useful to deter burglars this way. But in any case burglars exist and will exist, they will break into houses, kill or harm people or just leave if anybody is inside. There is no ideal solution. In some places people have just hired guards to look after several houses at once - it works quite well.

But how would you deter you teenage son from finding a gun in your house in order to settle score with his classmates? Or a husband from killing his wife after finding out that she was having an affair.

Putting aside this hypothetical arguments, I don't see how American society has become safer and less criminal without gun control. As I pointed out before, shooting classmates or colleagues doesn't quite support your argument. Number of prisoners in USA divided by total population is also quite a blow.

by a reader on Thu, 09/15/2005 - 10:16 | reply

Personally, I do not think it

Personally, I do not think it relevant what effect the Firearms Acts have on the rate of crime. Criminals are responsible for crime. People in general are not.

If you support any law whatsoever that makes it harder for a person to get a gun and use it to defend themselves, then you are, I believe, saying that sometimes a woman must submit to being raped, or beaten up, or killed, in order that other people are safer in general. I don't; I believe in a right to self defence.

In point of fact, gun laws make the country far more dangerous - not that it makes any difference to the moral aspect of the question. The fact that people are not allowed to be armed is what makes armed spree killings possible. This situation particularly promotes the kind of schoolyard murders and killings of wives by husbands that you were talking about. I could easily kill my fiancée with my bare hands if I wanted to. I don't, obviously! But if I did, she would have the right to defend herself. Or so I believe, anyway.

Incidentally, when the original poster said that only criminals could get guns easily, did they mean this as true by definition viz. if you get a handgun without a firearms certificate you're breaking the law, or just practically the case if you're not a career criminal? I don't think it is hard in practice. It's certainly easy to break the gun laws and come up with some sort of illegal weapon yourself. I don't think they can be that hard to buy either. I mean, they will sell some revolvers to any adult in France. Here, for example.

by a reader on Thu, 09/15/2005 - 11:47 | reply

Re: Criminals are responsible for crime.

The problem is that more people would become criminals and more criminals would use guns.

In general, people un mass don't necessarily act sensibly or rationally. Just like not all countries are expected to be rational about WMD. Some are and some aren't. And that is what bothers me.

You are wrong about using statistical data. In some cases you have to disregard statistics when your personal situation can easily be isolated from others. For example, if you want to stop living and demand a right to do so. Even if statistics can point out that more people would leave this world this numbers would be irrelevant. By killing your self you don't put anyone else in danger, although some indirect influence is always present.

In case of gun controls, the situation is totally different. The fact that you posses a gun makes quite a big difference on safety of others. Your failure to hold on to it puts other innocent people around in danger. And many people can be expected to be quite careless at times.

If you argue that being killed by neighbour is better than being killed by a burglar than I must say that there is no clear line between would-be-criminal and an innocent person. The moment an innocent person crosses the line (deliberatly, professionaly or by mistake) he/she has become criminal. By letting people have guns you just "produce" more criminals.

Do you have any facts to confirm that there are less burglars in USA or that they are less violent, or there are less victims?

by a reader on Thu, 09/15/2005 - 13:07 | reply

There are quite a few people

There are quite a few people posting as "a reader" here. I can hardly complain, as this includes me (at 11:47), but it might be confusing things.

Anyway, I have something to ask the person that posted at 13:07.

Do you think that if guns were more readily available, more people would become criminals? Meaning: burglars, robbers, rapists, murderers? I think that's what you were saying. If so, why? I personally think the opposite, as do quite a lot of people, as you can see by the fact that such people seem to rule the blogosphere.

In any case, if it were true, why would this mean that a person should not be allowed to use a gun to defend themself from a rapist, robber, bugle-playing maniac etc?

by a reader on Thu, 09/15/2005 - 13:44 | reply

I am the reader 13:07

"Do you think that if guns were more readily available, more people would become criminals?"

In order to give any answer to this question we need to summon statistical data which I suggested to do in the first place and which you oppose saying that this is irrelevant because personal protection is what matters.

I argue that if you are more likely to be shot than you are in more danger and less protected. Again you disagree.

What is your answer to that?

As for purely ideological discussion that libertarians always tend to prefer, than of course personal freedom and protection is above all values (or at least above common values). But I would argue again that in case of gun control your personal freedom to have a gun oppresses me in the same way as any pyrotechnical experiments in the private property of my neighbour would threaten my life. The fact that my dead neighbour would be responsible for damage to my property is a little consolation to me.

by Yuryr on Thu, 09/15/2005 - 15:06 | reply

Intentions are real and they matter

I could kill my fiancee with my bare hands if I wanted to Yeah, but not wanting to is the same as not being able to.

It's certainly easy to break the gun laws

Most members of the public would not find it easy. They respect the law generally, and would fear accusations of criminality. Only hardened criminals could find it easy.

by Tom Robinson on Thu, 09/15/2005 - 19:08 | reply

Statistical Data and Intentions

Yuryr, let's get some statistical data. I'm all for it. It wouldn't change my mind either way personally, because I see the question as a moral issue - people have a right to defend themselves against attack - but if it means something to you, let's do it.

The only problem is what to take as good evidence. I suggest trying to find out what the effect of tightenings and liberalizations of gun laws in different countries is on the trends in the rates of the various types of crime there. You have to look at a derivative so that you can see what actually happens as a result of the gun law changes. It's no good saying (for example) "America is dangerous", or "Switzerland is safe". Lots of people get stabbed in America, for example, but not many in Switzerland.

Tom Robinson, I'm not entirely sure that only hardened criminals would break the gun laws. I have, I'm sure. They're pretty difficult to obey, in fact, if you're interested in shooting. Am I a hardened criminal? Maybe, but I don't feel like one! I really just wanted to know what the original poster actually meant by "it is only criminals who can easily get them."

by a reader on Fri, 09/16/2005 - 08:51 | reply

'Easy'

We meant, as Tom Robinson said, that most members of the public would not find it easy. Not only for the reasons he gave, but also because they do not have the relevant knowledge and contacts. The fact that they become criminals by definition is also relevant, and was a secondary meaning.

by Editor on Fri, 09/16/2005 - 09:52 | reply

Statistical Data and Intentions

Murders with firearms (per capita):

http://www.nationmaster.com/graph-T/crime/crime_mur_wit_fir_cap

Murders (per capita):

http://www.nationmaster.com/graph-T/crime/crime_mur_cap

In both tables USA is preceded only by African and developing countries in other regions.

Another link (rather simplistic summary):

http://www.learnenglish.org.uk/magazine/magazine_home_disarmament.html

As we were talking about burglaries the text in the link above says: Guns don't protect you. Statistics show that you are more likely to be shot if you have a gun in the house. And the person who gets shot is more likely to be the householder than the intruder.

As for personal morale principles, that I expected to be valued above all by libertarians, lets just reflect on what you are saying. Putting other innocent people in danger is not a moral issue to you, but your own protection is important (even if it doesn't actually make you more protected as statistics shows). Perhaps, we are not sharing the same moral values with you.

But why are you always putting moral first? Correct me if I am wrong. We are talking about legislative and political issues. They don't coincide with moral principles and moral principles are not clear. What we can do in reality is to modify laws in order to be closer to what we see as moral. Besides laws are what should be best for society, not a single person. I know that putting society needs before individual freedom is not moral. But laws are for society and about society and always will be whether libertarians like it or not.

Of course, it is usually the case that if laws disregard private property and personal freedom etc. than the whole society deteriorates. But that is a different topic.

If you are looking for a law that governs your personal life or the life of your family than you use moral principles. When you talk about society (which is not equal to a family) you talk about conventional laws (not moral ones). Using New York map for navigating through London is a little bit awkward to say the least.

by Yuryr on Fri, 09/16/2005 - 12:31 | reply

Maybe the USA has higher gun

Maybe the USA has higher gun crime than everywhere but Africa because it imported a bunch of Africans who do it's gun crime for it.

by a racist on Fri, 09/16/2005 - 14:54 | reply

Yuryr, I don't think the murd

Yuryr, I don't think the murder rates in any one year in a country really say much. Surely what's wanted is to find out what tends to happen to these rates (or, better, to a more rounded measure of public safety, since a lot of murder victims are criminals, and a lot of crime doesn't result in murder) in a country, after more restrictive gun laws are brought in, and what tends to happen when less restrictive ones are introduced?

I believe that the rate of crime probably generally falls when gun laws are liberalized. This seems to be the case in the US states that have recently allowed concealed carry compared with those that haven't. I don't seem to have time to find evidence, though, sorry! That said, I re-iterate that I believe that the right of a person to defend themself from crime, and to be prepared for it by owning a gun and carrying it in ordinary public places is absolute. You and I are probably not going to agree on this issue any time soon, I feel...

"A racist", I doubt very much what you say (or at least imply), although it is certainly conceivable. But if your implication were true, would it make any difference to the gun law question?

Incidentally, Editor, is it just me, or is it impossible to select (with the mouse) most of the text on The World? Maybe this is deliberate? I ask because it meant I couldn't cut Yuryr's urls above - not easily, at least. You might also want to know that your submission verifier earlier asked me to divide two by an empty string. Maybe David Deutsch can do that, but I can't!

Also, thank you for an interesting and unique blog.

by a reader on Fri, 09/16/2005 - 15:49 | reply

You doubt the prevalence of (

You doubt the prevalence of (gun) crimes by black people?

<http://www.racismeantiblanc.bizland.com/005/06-02.htm>

<http://www.ourcivilisation.com/usa/racewar.htm>

<http://www.ojp.usdoj.gov/bjs/crimoff.htm>

<http://www.ojp.usdoj.gov/bjs/glance/race.htm>

This matters to the theory that the reason the US has more gun crime than the UK is lax gun laws.

by a reader on Fri, 09/16/2005 - 16:21 | reply

Cutting remarks

We do nothing to inhibit selecting and copying content. I have just checked using (in alphabetical order) Camino, Firefox, iCab, OmniWeb, Opera, Safari, and Shiira and see no problem, so it seems likely that it is something specific to your browser or its configuration.

The occasional impossible arithmetic challenge is, of course, a deliberate ploy to encourage readers to register.

by Editor on Fri, 09/16/2005 - 22:15 | reply

A reader 9/14 11:43 calls it

A reader 9/14 11:43 calls it a "double standard" that The World doesn't want to ban guns for everyone yet at the same time doesn't "want Iran to have nuclear weapon". Do I really need to point out that this is a silly comparison? Wanting guns to be legal for law-abiding citizens as a matter of general law is not the same as wanting some given psychopath to have a gun. I might add that The World never advocated for "giving guns to everybody" but for not banning guns for everybody. There is a difference.

Does a reader really not understand the difference between the general and the particular?

Even the oh-so-gun-plagued U.S. disallows, for example, convicted felons from getting guns. If Iran is not the equivalent on the international scale, what country is?

A reader writes:

"I don't beleive that all people with guns would act rationally."

And neither do I. But this is not a good reason to ban guns altogether. (I do not believe "all people" with baseball bats would act rationally....)

Then a reader declares, out of clear blue,

"If somebody is targetting you as a possible victim and is armed than the fact that you have a gun doesn't play much role."

That's a calculation you've made for yourself, and that's your right. Others have made a different calculation, that a gun would prove useful for self defense in certain situations, and that's their right (in the U.S.).

"But you would allow armed criminals to multiply enourmously whereas you would still have your own single gun"

Armed criminals obtain firearms independently of whether laws exists banning them. This is part of the reason we call them criminals.

And the hypothetical of the multiplied number of armed criminals attacking a solitary citizen who only has a single gun is a total non sequitur. "Criminals" do not all belong to a giant organization together through which they team-up, in ever-increasing numbers (in proportion to their total), to attack a target they have all decided upon somehow. Even if the reader is right that the group "Armed Criminals" multiplies (by 2, say) due to no gun laws, this does not mean that any given robbery attempt will involve twice as many criminals. That would be a very silly model of criminal behavior to believe in (which I doubt a reader actually does). Certainly, it is true that if one is attacked by a hundred armed men, being armed will probably not help. But so what? If one is attacked by Godzilla a gun won't help either. That's not the sort of situation anyone envisions a gun being useful in the first place.

Because it won't defend against a hundred armed men, there's no use getting a gun that might defend against one or two? That's just idiotic. And you don't really believe that logic either, I hope.

by blixax on Sat, 09/17/2005 - 16:46 | reply

Of course it is exaggregation

Yes, indeed, I don't think that the whole world conspires against unarmed myself. It is just a simplification. This was a similar to pacifistic reasoning that the more advanced weapons you use the more advanced weapons your enemies use and the balance of force remains but the danger increases. Of course, this logic is not flawless. And countries need to protect themselves and it works. The increased danger of possessing more advanced weapons (like intra-army casualties) are outbalanced by increased protection against a clearly identifiable enemy with clear intentions.

There is one important difference between countries and people. Every country has a system of looking after its weapons. It is never flawless but the system exists and has its purpose.

People don't have such system. Who is going to protect me from your children shooting randomly or by mistake? Don't start again about children throwing knives randomly or trying to strangle everybody with bare hands - it is not the same at all. People can drop a gun on a street or left in a train like they drop thousands of their purses or mobile phones.

There is a systematic way of dealing with criminals and that is called police. You said that you should have a right to protect yourself. Sure. You also have right to protect yourself in many ways. You can demand better policing or higher conviction terms, hire a guard on temporary or permanent basis, or whatever - the possibilities are endless. Nobody tells that police is useless and it has lost its grip on criminals. And But you chose the way which puts other people in danger. Neither system is flawless, neither protects you in 100% of cases. There is no even a particular threat for your at the moment. But you choose the system which puts other people in danger.

I don't mind you giving the right to, for instance, cure yourself with whatever drug you prefer. You have a right to protect yourself against diseases as well. And many people would die additionally as a result of no-prescription medical system. And this terrible statistics wouldn't put me off. Simply because it doesn't put other people in danger. And the drugs are easier to isolate from children, although not 100% foolproof.

But you simply ignore this important difference between drugs and guns.

If it is difficult to find clear statistics than on the moral grounds it is wrong to put other people in danger for your own safety.

by Yuryr on Mon, 09/19/2005 - 10:55 | reply

"There is one important diffe

"There is one important difference between countries and people. Every country has a system of looking after its weapons. It is never flawless but the system exists and has its purpose."

There are many important differences between countries and people but I don't think that's one of them. I could just as easily say truthfully that Every person has a system of looking after his weapons, it is never flawless but the system exists and has its purpose.

"People don't have such system. Who is going to protect me from your children shooting randomly or by mistake?"

One, you are. I assume that in your everyday life if you saw someone, whether child or not, wielding a gun erratically you would stay away. Two, my children are, since I have instilled in them morality and responsibility. Three, I am, since I keep my gun(s) under lock and key and so forth (this is all hypothetical). Four, the police are; if they're around, they will surely take countermeasures.

Of course, that system isn't flawless, but lack of flawlessness doesn't seem to bother you when it comes to countries bearing nukes, so why should it bother you when it comes to individuals bearing puny firearms?

"People can drop a gun on a street or left in a train like they drop thousands of their purses or mobile phones."

That is an odd thing to say. In my experience, people are quite attached to valuable objects and are reluctant to part with them. How many firearms have you found or observed left on a street or train?

"You also have right to protect yourself in many ways. You can demand better policing or higher conviction terms, hire a guard on temporary or permanent basis, or whatever - the possibilities are endless."

Indeed, and they include arming oneself.

"Nobody tells that police is useless and it has lost its grip on criminals. And But you chose the way which puts other people in danger."

False. The typical citizen arming himself does not, overall (i.e.

looking at both sides, not just one side of the equation), put other people in danger and you haven't established that it does.

"But you simply ignore this important difference between drugs and guns."

I don't think the comparison is important or even interesting. For what it's worth, the policy 'let people treat themselves w/whatever drug they want' would too involve a danger to 'others'. If people can try whatever drug they want, say Dangerous Experimental Drug X (DEX), that leads to a budding industry for DEX, which means it can be found in drugstores, which means it's in lots of peoples' bathroom cabinets (or left on, uh, trains, as the case may be), which increases the likelihood that Little Johnny will find it and gulp it down....

"If it is difficult to find clear statistics"

...you nevertheless seem to feel free to invent conclusions such as "letting a typical citizen be armed puts other people in danger" out of thin air.

"If it is difficult to find clear statistics than on the moral grounds it is wrong to put other people in danger for your own safety."

Yet it is perfectly appropriate to put other people in danger if they pose a threat to my safety. If people do not threaten my safety then they are in no danger from my (hypothetical) firearm, and the same is true of 99% of firearms owners.

This system isn't "flawless", of course, but remember: that's okay with you.

Or is it Not Okay with you for the one special case of firearms, for some pathological reason?

by blixia on Mon, 09/19/2005 - 20:50 | reply

Affirming Life

Sometimes surrender is wise. This is not one of those times.

New Orleans should be rebuilt, as before but stronger and better.

So should the World Trade Center towers.

Wise or not, surrender to evil is 'bad for the soul'. That is to say, it is harmful in many traceable and untraceable ways over and above the loss of the immediate thing being surrendered. The same is true of despair or resignation in the face of challenges from nature.

Correspondingly, defiance of evil, and of natural challenges, is good. It affirms life, and has unforeseeable benefits.

Tue, 09/13/2005 - 00:45 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

No Question

This is one of those questions that is irrelevant. Not build New Orleans? C'mon.

The only questions are around how New Orleans can best be rebuilt. These are good and useful questions. How would you rebuild New Orleans better, safer, stronger? Now we are talking in the rhetoric of The Six Million Dollar Man.

I would rather not have New Orleans destroyed again by the next powerful hurricane. Even more, I see no reason for New Orleans to ever again be flooded with ten or more feet of water because of an unviable levee design. Biloxi and Gulfport will be rebuilt too, and above sea level as they are now.

by a reader on Tue, 09/13/2005 - 03:33 | reply

It's Not So Obvious

First of all, surrendering to evil (and thus encouraging more of it) is very different from not rebuilding something that was destroyed by nature. Sometimes, rebuilding it is just repeating a mistake.

I think it's politically inevitable that New Orleans will be rebuilt, but that doesn't mean rebuilding it is the right thing to do.

I have no objection to people who would like to rebuild New Orleans contributing to such a project because they judge the benefits to exceed the costs, and they are willing to bear the costs (including the costs of protecting against repetition of this tragedy and private insurance against such events).

I have a strong objection to government subsidies that force unwilling people to contribute to this.

There are many people who perpetually rebuild their homes in unsafe areas because the government subsidizes their risky behavior.

That is theft. I don't think that The World should support such things.

Perhaps it's the case that the benefits of rebuilding New Orleans justify the costs. However, we'll never know unless those who want it done bear all of the costs of doing it.

Gil

by Gil on Tue, 09/13/2005 - 06:05 | reply

Let the market decide?

Walter Block makes the point that the market rather than government should decide whether New Orleans should be rebuilt:

Private enterprise alone should determine if the Big Easy is worth saving or not. Problems of "transactions costs" will be far easier to overcome than challenges presented by an inept and economically irrational government. Possibly a Donald Trump type might try to buy up all the buildings at a fraction of their previous value, and save his new investment by levee building and water pumping. He wouldn't need to get 100% sales. A lesser amount, say, 90%, might do, and he would only make his initial purchases subject to reaching this level. That is, he might first purchase options to buy.

But I'm not sure this is relevant given the fact our society is organised so that government is very much involved in the infrastructure and it's not realistic to expect we can privatise a whole city at this point in time.

But I would guess it's probably efficient to rebuild in any case even from a purely economical standpoint. Because I think once the water is pumped out, we'll see most of the city is still there, so it would be quite a waste to write it all off. Repairing the city will surely cost less than building a completely new city elsewhere. And indeed, when you add to that the emotional component of not wanting to lose such a historic place, plus that it's good for the soul, the decision shouldn't be too hard.

Here in Holland in 1953 we had almost exactly the same thing happen. Also a flooding of a huge area, because a storm broke the dikes - something which had been predicted by experts for years but they didn't do anything about it. But it was all rebuilt and they made super strong dikes that are expected to break only about once every 10000 years.

Henry Sturman

by Henry Sturman on Wed, 09/14/2005 - 00:32 | reply

Good for whose soul?

Are you claiming to know what is good for the souls of the 500,000+ former residents of New Orleans? Are the people who choose to leave and never return somehow moral cowards?

Perhaps they should be forced back to rebuild the city to fulfill your vision of what is good for them.

by a reader on Wed, 09/14/2005 - 13:18 | reply

Why are cities built?

New Orleans will be rebuilt. The Mississippi Delta is a fabulous place with many economic assets. As for real estate, Location, Location, Location. Below water tho is not Location, unless you are a shrimp or a clam.

New Orleans will be rebuilt. Rebuild it right, on the same premise that the original city was founded, above water.

by a reader on Wed, 09/14/2005 - 16:04 | reply

Re: Good for whose soul?

Perhaps they should be forced back to rebuild the city to fulfill your vision of what is good for them.

We disagree. Do you think we should be forced to agree, in order to fulfil your vision of what is good for us?

by Editor on Wed, 09/14/2005 - 16:23 | reply

Re: Let the market decide?

Isn't this a bit of a category error? If I were to write an article extolling the virtues of the Macintosh operating system over Windows, and urging people to switch to the former, would you reply that it would be better to let the market decide?

The point is, preferences are changeable. Preferences are causally prior to market forces. Preferences are a legitimate subject for debate and for creative thought. And there is no way of 'letting the market decide' what one's preferences should be.

by David Deutsch on Thu, 09/15/2005 - 02:46 | reply

Who Should Pay?

David,

It's perfectly legitimate for anyone to express their preferences. But, it's also the case that it's usually illegitimate to force others, who disagree, to pay for those preferences

There may well be great reasons why people should prefer to rebuild New Orleans. The best way to decide whether this is decided by reason and argument rather than force is to refrain from coercively forcing some to subsidize the expressed preferences of others, and to let those others express their preferences by choosing to pay for what they say is worth the costs.

The market doesn't determine what makes sense. But, it can help to determine whether there is actually sufficient economic demand for something to justify its costs.

Gil

by Gil on Thu, 09/15/2005 - 04:45 | reply

Macintoshes

To complete the analogy.

You may or may not be right about the superiority of the Macintosh's operating system.

But you would certainly be wrong to advocate the spending of taxpayer money to support the adoption of Macintoshes vs. PCs.

Likewise, I think you would be wrong to support taxpayer subsidized assumption of the costs of rebuilding New Orleans that people wouldn't voluntarily assume.

It's possible that rebuilding New Orleans is well worth it. But, separating people who make choices from the costs of those choices is to encourage mistakes. I think we should avoid the fatal conceit that we already know the right answer.

Gil

by Gil on Thu, 09/15/2005 - 04:55 | reply

Re: Let the market decide

David wrote:

Isn't this a bit of a category error? [...]

Yes, I agree with your point. There are really two separate questions involved:

1. Should these decisions be left to the government or the market?
2. What is the best decision?

Henry Sturman

by Henry Sturman on Thu, 09/15/2005 - 12:45 | reply

Neither

This is not an either/or question. It is more a question of complex market forces and geography, also economics, also politics, greed and goodness, rational vision, also foolish dreams.

There is a market for swampland. There is a government which is not always by and for the people. All the King's Men is an excellent read right about now. Yet New Orleans shall be rebuilt and maybe well.

Perhaps the problem is more succinctly stated, who will pay and is the risk worth the risk of return?

by a reader on Thu, 09/15/2005 - 21:30 | reply

Pallywood, The Movie

Pallywood. Have you watched it yet? It's fun.

Mon, 09/19/2005 - 23:18 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Ignorance

All sides in politics continually attribute their opponents' real or alleged errors to such factors as stupidity, corruption, misguided loyalty, naivety, prejudice, sentimentality and sheer malevolence.

It is possible, though, that simple factual ignorance is in reality a more significant cause of political error – at least, in the West – than any of those. We have previously conjectured that many opponents of the liberation of Iraq are literally unaware of the case in favour. We do not mean unaware of the merits of the case, but simply unaware of its content.

Now we read of a revealing incident in which the new Foreign Minister of France has displayed astounding ignorance of the basic events of the Second World War:

during the visit of French Foreign Minister Philippe Douste-Blazy to the new Holocaust museum in Jerusalem's Yad Vashem on September 8, he asked – while perusing maps of European sites where Jewish communities had been destroyed – whether British Jews were not also murdered. Needless to say, Douste-Blazy's question was met by his hosts with amazement. "But Monsieur le minister," Le Canard quoted the ensuing conversation, "England was never conquered by the Nazis during World War II."

The minister apparently was not content with this answer, which, according to the magazine, was given by the museum curator, and persisted, asking: "Yes, but were there no Jews who were deported from England?"

How can a person who is that unaware of the role played by Britain in the war be qualified to meditate and pontificate on the perfidiousness of the Anglo-Saxon character (which is, after all, fifty percent of a French Foreign Minister's job), or to make nuanced estimates of how shitty the Jews are (which is most of the remaining fifty percent)?

There is something very positive about ignorance, though. Perhaps we are allowing hope to triumph over good sense here, but the more of the bad opinions in the world are due to factual ignorance rather than any of the other causes above, the more the world is actually better than it looks. How one might go about remedying this ignorance, though, is less clear. Anything that succeeds at that should also succeed at diminishing our own ignorance. Our best shot so far has been to start a blog...

Update: As a matter of fact, some British Jews were deported – from the Channel Islands, the only part of Britain to be invaded by the Germans.

Tue, 09/20/2005 - 14:44 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Factual Ignorance?

I think its thinking ignorance. The facts are available, or their close approximation, if anyone is willing to look, check, and think. Thinking ignorance is the bane of the western world, and the rest of the world for that matter too. Like factual ignorance it is correctible if the owner of the ignorance is willing.

by a reader on Thu, 09/22/2005 - 14:09 | reply

Ignorance

One of my favorite examples of ignorance underpinning bad policy is the idea that the Great Depression was caused by "the failure of unfettered free markets". Invite your friends to list the nations that had anything remotely resembling free markets in the 1920s and 1930s.

by Rafe on Wed, 09/28/2005 - 10:21 | reply

The German Electorate Refused?

At last week's general election in Germany, the two main candidates for Chancellor were Angela Merkel of the Christian Democrats (CDU/CSU) and Gerhard Schröder of the Social Democrats (SPD). Merkel is relatively pro-free market and she supported the liberation of Iraq. Schröder is a socialist who opposed the liberation.

So in this election the Germans were choosing whether to continue on the path of appeasement and socialism, or to move in the direction of freedom, capitalism and opposition to tyranny. The result was a tiny (1%) swing from the SPD to the CDU/CSU, resulting in a slight majority for the latter, plus a somewhat larger swing away from both of them towards fringe parties. Under a rational electoral system (the British or American electoral system known as First Past the Post), that would have been an end of the matter. Merkel would now be Chancellor implementing her party's programme, and all the other parties would be holding endless post-mortems, struggling to improve their ideas so that next time, they can be the ones who persuade more electors than anyone else that they had the best policies for the future.

Unfortunately nothing of the sort has happened, nor can it happen – because of Germany's proportional representation (PR) electoral system. PR allows parties with a small share of the vote to get seats easily. This provides an incentive for parties to split into ever smaller parties, which then take seats in the legislature making it almost certain that every government will be a coalition government. By contrast, First Past the Post tends to amplify differences in the number of seats parties get, compared with their share of the vote, and so tends to give rise to parliaments in which one party has a clear majority.

As a result of the German election, no party will be able to implement the policies that it thinks are right. Consequently, nobody will be able to assign responsibility for the effects of the policies that do get passed. For instance if Merkel becomes Chancellor in a 'grand coalition' with the SPD, the anti-capitalist and anti-American tendency in Germany will blame her for everything that goes wrong and give the SPD credit for everything that goes right. So, ironically, she and her party might do better if she does not become Chancellor. Schröder is arguing that he should remain Chancellor because the two geographical divisions of the CDU/CSU should be regarded as separate parties, making the SPD the largest party after all. He also says that 'the electorate has refused to give a mandate' to either party. Nonsense. Quite possibly not a single elector took that view. It was a pure artefact of the electoral system.

Yet on such sophistry, the fate of a nation could hang. Another possibility is that Schröder will cling to power by forming a coalition with the far-left PDS – something that he pledged not to do, but the system may not leave him able to fulfil that promise. In that case the outcome of the small electoral swing in which the ruling party is overtaken by the opposition will be that the latter is frozen out of government altogether; and meanwhile the loony-left ideas of the fourth-largest party pervade the character of the next government, for its leader will have the power to remove the Chancellor the moment he displeases him. All in the name of greater representativeness. Such is the perversity of PR.

Sat, 09/24/2005 - 12:47 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Not like this!

When we urged the rebuilding of New Orleans, we didn't mean this! A hideous plan to pour 250 billion dollars of Federal tax money – over $50,000 per citizen of Louisiana – down a bottomless pit. We were urging a spontaneous act of defiance of nature and an affirmation of human creativity. This would be the opposite: an orgy of misappropriation and misuse of the creativity of others.

Update: Here are some remarkable phenomena under way in Biloxi, Mississippi, driven by the free market and human creativity. Opportunities are being exploited and structural changes in land use are under way, such as poor people moving away from waterfront areas and rich people replacing them. There are, no doubt, many reasons for the sharp increase in many property prices since the hurricane, and not all of them are good. But many are, and overall the picture seems to be that those in the best position to know believe that the city will not only recover, but be considerably more valuable in the future than it was in the past.

Tue, 09/27/2005 - 20:14 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

You should have been clearer.

You should have been clearer. Now look what you've gotten us into.

by R on Tue, 09/27/2005 - 22:46 | reply

Oh

but that's the American way.

by a reader on Tue, 09/27/2005 - 22:49 | reply

You Should Have Known Better

It's one thing to urge people to be strong, and to pursue great things. But, it's quite another to encourage those who view these things as the province of governments who measure national greatness by how much of other people's money they commit to projects.

If you meant limited governmental response and great private responses, you should have said so. I know you are somewhat libertarian, but I take your messages like the prior one, and the encouragement of space exploration (for example) as appeals to use the government to provide more of these "public goods".

It never turns out as nicely as it sounds in speeches.

Gil

by Gil on Wed, 09/28/2005 - 05:42 | reply

Is libertarianism

only about declaring ideals not necessarily being practical?

My impression is that libertarians always talk about right/wrong things to do in terms of coercion, personal freedom rather than working/not working things in a real society.

And when something doesn't work in reality - they wash their hands. For instance environmental concern cannot be entrusted to individuals and environment is, by definition our common limited irreversible resource, then libertarians just deny existence of such problem. Simply because environmental efforts cannot possibly be fitted into libertarianism. And this is where they loose connection with reality as it is. They say that rivers and forests should all be made private and then their owner would care about pollution. But in reality, whether we like it or not, shrinking rainforests are not private and neither USA nor UK have any control over their property status. And we cannot even see how soon they are going to become private. Perhaps even never.

But libertarians can keep denying that less oxygen is produced and more carbon dioxide is emitted. They resort to statistical and political tricks, to pointless discussions about what counted and how often and in what way we should look at the figures. I have no idea whether global warming is hapenning or not, but if it is - libertarian model has nothing to offer here at all simply because environmental concern doesn't fit into its idealistic model.

The best way to allocate limited resources is not to entrust everything to private property and to markets but to arrange pluralistic usage of it. If private property acts toward competition - it works, if it acts against pluralism (in case of monopoly) - it doesn't work.

The problem is not whether to pay taxes or not, whether to spend public money on re-building or not. The question is how to set up a proper truly pluralistic system of public money usage.

by Yuryr on Wed, 09/28/2005 - 11:32 | reply

"Somewhat" libertarian? Is t

"Somewhat" libertarian? Is this implicitly saying they are less pure libertarians (and so am I?) than you are?

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 09/28/2005 - 16:36 | reply

Somewhat

As the Our Politics section in the sidebar says: 'we have a lot in common with Libertarians ... except'

by Editor on Wed, 09/28/2005 - 16:50 | reply

The except clause begins: "Ex

The except clause begins: "Except that we are not barking mad" (and continues along similar lines)

Do people really believe being barking mad increases libertarian purity?

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 09/28/2005 - 17:18 | reply

No

The "barking mad" items were along the lines of opposing all military actions, or pushing the button to immediately invoke anarchy.

That's irrelevant to what I was talking about.

I think advocating large increases in government non-defense spending goes against a much more conventional libertarian position that The World generally seems to endorse.

Gil

by Gil on Wed, 09/28/2005 - 22:30 | reply

Gil, My comments about 'ba

Gil,

My comments about 'barking mad' were because the Editor seemed to concede he was not fully libertarian based on the stuff he linked. I think we can both agree those positions do not make the World less libertarian.

As for what you were talking about, I take that as: "yes, I was questioning the libertarian purity of The World". Glad to get that straightened out.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 09/28/2005 - 23:57 | reply

Mostly Private

"limited government response and great private response..."

