

Setting The World To Rights

Ideas have consequences.

home | archives | polls | search

Our Politics

We are often asked to define our political stance.

We have a lot in common with Libertarians...

In that we believe in liberty as an essential human value, and would like to see the abolition of victimless crimes (especially the fun ones). We are very much in favour of entrepreneurship and take the view that if something is worth doing, it is worth doing at a profit. However, our talk of the wonders of making heaps of money is (so far!) mostly theoretical. Yet even though some of us do not even make enough money to pay any income tax, we want to see the gradual abolition of taxation. We think that anything government can do, a truly free market could one day do better and more cost-effectively. We are with the Libertarian movement wholeheartedly in many respects...

Except that we are not barking mad idiotarians who think that everything any government does is by definition wrong, or that the US government is just as bad as every mass-murdering aggressive dictatorship in sight – or, for that matter, France. We don't have a blind spot when it comes to the simple logic that being prepared to defend liberty is a pre-condition for liberty: si vis pacem, para bellum (if you want peace, prepare for war). We are not starry-eyed utopians who believe we own the blueprint for the perfect society. The perfect society will have to evolve: unlike many libertarians, we don't think that everything would be perfect if we could press that magic button to get rid of government. Like many Libertarians, we champion the freedom of the individual, but unlike many, we do not make an exception when it comes to children. We support the idea of a free-market in babies, but we thoroughly eschew the idea that children are in any way the property of their parents, the state, or anyone but themselves.

We are a bit like Republicans...

In that we revere the traditions of the United States and of the Anglosphere generally, we rather like Donald Rumsfeld and Condoleezza Rice, and, especially since hearing that Condie is against gun control because she does not trust government, we are rooting for her to be the next President of the United States. We believe in the right of self-defence, including the right to kill someone who is about to kill us or who puts us in serious danger. Thus, in the world as it is now, we favour national defence, because no matter how good a shot one or more of us may be, we'd need a bit of backup in the event of a large-scale attack – not to mention a nuclear bomb. We think current US foreign policy could be a lot worse. We love political incorrectness and we are proud not to call ourselves 'feminists'. So you could say that we are a bit like Republicans...

Except that we do not believe in increased 'discipline' in schools (unless you're talking about the sort of 'discipline' that my old headmaster was rumoured to be engaging in with Matron in the privacy of his own quarters). We don't approve of forcibly incarcerating innocent people in institutions, and since we are in favour of education, we cannot support the existing school system or any other so-called 'educational' system that tends to stultify and sabotage the learning process. We approve of abortion, divorce, sodomy, and a woman's right to wear trousers... or a burqa. We find the 'anti-fornication' laws of some US states frightening, to say nothing of the dry counties, the 'war on drugs', and other horrors associated with the Republican movement.

We are a bit like Democrats...

In that we are in favour of abortion rights, we think Bill Clinton should not have been impeached, we are enthusiastically in favour of stem cell research, and we are nauseated by the very idea of insisting that children be taught the Creationist myth as if it were fact. We are a bit like Democrats in that we think of ourselves as 'liberal'.

Except that when we use the word 'liberal' we really mean liberal, as opposed to 'anti-liberal' as the word 'liberal' seems to mean in American politics.

(In Britain) We are in sympathy with the libertarian/Portillo wing of the Conservative Party (well they certainly need help!)... and we're right behind the Labour government's current foreign policy in regard to Iraq. We just wish the Labour Party was too.

(In Israel) We like Natan Sharansky and Ariel Sharon... and support reasonable factions within parties such as Likud, the Shinui Party, the Yisrael B'Aliyah Party, the Labour Party, the... well, if Israel isn't a good argument against proportional representation, we don't know what is. When are they going to wake up and realise that it is an unmitigated disaster?

(In Canada) To the extent that we can discern who's who in a country whose motto is reputed to be "as Canadian as possible under the circumstances", we like the libertarian strands in the Canadian Alliance, including, for example, Garry Breitkreuz, who is bravely continuing to fight gun control. Leader, Stephen Harper deserves support for his position on Iraq.

We think death is overrated and conjecture that advances in science and technology will eventually make death a choice. We are atheists, and are suspicious of all organised religion. But we believe that there is such a thing as right and wrong.

We hate... communism, fascism, Islamofascism, Wahhabism, Eurofederalism, nationalism, idiotarianism, anti-Zionism, anti-Semitism, terrorism, racism...

Note: In The Ethics of Liberty near the beginning of the section on Strategies for Liberty, Murray Rothbard says that if one were to have a magic button that, if pressed, would automatically transform our existing society to one governed by libertarian rules, one should press it. He argues that we should aim for the most rapid advance towards libertarian society possible, rather than a gradual approach. This is the epitome of the approach that we repudiate.

Mon, 03/31/2003 - 20:49 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Setting The World To Rights

Ideas have consequences.

home | archives | polls | search

About Setting The World To Rights

Setting the World to Rights (or The World, for short), is a result of our deeply held belief that it is only ideas that are wrong with the world, and only ideas that can improve the world.

We want this site to speak in a distinctive voice of its own – and in any case, the texts posted here are often collective efforts. For these and other reasons, all posts on the front page of this site are editorials, and have the customary anonymity thereof.

But for the curious among you, those responsible for this web site include David Deutsch and Alan Forrester of Elegance Against Ignorance, with software support by Kevin Schoedel.

We are very grateful to all those who contribute editorials and comments, and if you would like to join in, that would be splendid. We encourage you to send submissions to us at submissions@settingtheworldtorights.com. Items that we like but that can't go on the front page, we attribute to the author, so when you submit an item, please state whether we may attribute it to you or not, and whether you wish your name, email address, and or web site details to be included. If you would prefer your piece to appear as an attributed article rather than a front page editorial, please make that clear in your message.

The software behind this site is Drupal (using PHP and MySQL on Apache) with some custom add-ons.

We'd like to thank Javier Henderson of kjsl.com for providing the web space.

Tue, 04/01/2003 - 13:49 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Our Comments Policy

We are experimenting with comments and, for the moment, have implemented an unusual comments policy: comments are ephemeral. You can expect any comment that you post to be deleted sooner or later. Some will survive longer than others, at our discretion. If we especially like a comment, we may take it out of the comments section and archive it permanently, but, generally speaking, you should always keep a copy of any comment you post if you want to preserve it for posterity. As we continue to experiment, we may change this comments policy without notice.

Tue, 04/01/2003 - 18:42 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

History of Israel

Take a look at this very short presentation of the history of Israel.

We are going to be posting our own History of Israel here shortly.
Look out for it!

Wed, 04/02/2003 - 19:51 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

When?

When do you plan on running this?

Bill Henderson

by a reader on Mon, 04/07/2003 - 12:44 | reply

It's Not About Oil

The Financial Times recently debunked the "It's all about oil" myth

One of those great ideological divides that seem to withstand all reasoned argument is the view that America's determination to oust Saddam Hussein is born of the desire to gain control of Iraqi oil. This view is prevalent in much of Europe and is shared in other parts of the world, especially in the Middle East. Even the wise Nelson Mandela believes it. The view is not, however, dominant, or even much discussed, in the US. Despite the chasm, the implausibility of this view warrants at least one more effort to dispel the myth.

And so they make the effort.

But they do not address another issue: what accounts for the tenacity with which this view is held – and will continue to be held – despite its "implausibility" and despite the efforts of the FT and all others who examine the question rationally?

Wed, 04/02/2003 - 20:22 | digg | del.icio.us | permlink

War for oil, or for the flag?

If this war were about oil, it might be justifiable. I mean that if a foreign tyrant had seized oil fields legitimately owned by a private owner, the state representing this owner could be justified in protecting its citizen's property.

The problem is that this war is not about oil. It started as an extension of the so-called "war on terror", then invoked the excuse of disarming Saddam Hussein's regime, and finally started under the guise of liberating the Irakis (a large part of whom apparently don't want to be liberated from their tyrant more than most of us want to be liberated from the ones who rule over us).

This war is not about oil, alas! It is about legitimizing and glorifying our monstrous states.

As for why the false view of "war for oil" continues to be held, I submit that it is for the same sort of reasons that warmongers cling to their views: ideological irrationality in general, and naïveté towards the state in particular. I don't want to imply that the Iraqi tyrant is not much worse than our own, but isn't it strange that the state (our states, the good states, the nice states, flectamus genua) is presumed to be man's best friend, despite the lessons of 25 centuries of history – and of five decades of Public Choice economic analysis?

Pierre Lemieux
<http://www.pierrelemieux.org>

by Pierre Lemieux on Wed, 04/02/2003 - 20:33 | reply

It's Not About Oil

I agree that this war is not mainly about oil. Although the prospect of the US enjoying direct access to it cannot be discounted. The "about oil" myth appears to be propagated by Middle Eastern sources and believed by many in the West. Another reason ascribed is the defence of the US dollar against the euro as the currency for oil purchases.

It is true that the initial Iraqi reaction to their "liberation" did not appear to be one of unalloyed joy, but more recent news clips show that the US, and the rest of us, did not fully appreciate the extent to which the Iraqi people in general had been suppressed and terrorised by the regime and its followers.

Our states may not be models of perfect liberty, but I doubt if in this imperfect world we inhabit it is likely to improve very much. At least we ordinary people all have the liberty to go to Iraq and fight for Mr Hussein, but the reverse is certainly not true.

by Ralph Maddocks on Wed, 04/02/2003 - 23:08 | reply

War for Rightness

The people who think the war is for oil are basically Marxists and anti-state cynics who can't believe that any country could possibly choose to risk life and limb for the sake of something more important than money. To them, the idea of a state actually trying to do what is morally right, despite the human costs, is unimaginable.

(Not that money isn't important and good, too: but saving the world from nuke-laden terrorists is even more important. It's hard to make any kind of a living when you're fallout dust.)

So, what do the Arab states have that we don't have? Oil is about it, really. In every other respect, they are entirely uncovetable. So oil it must be! The reason why those who hold this belief are impervious to argument is simply that they aren't interested in argument. Any more argument would upturn their entire world-views.

In the meantime, things are moving fast in Baghdad, and I very much look forward to hearing what more of the Iraqi people really do think about all this, as soon as the war ends and they can start feeling safe. Until then, we should bear in mind that Saddam is still officially their leader and they are under fear of torture and death if they dare to do anything for the TV cameras other than enthusiastically support his regime.

by Alice on Thu, 04/03/2003 - 21:06 | reply

Confessions of a limb

I recognize myself in "the anti-state cynics who can't believe that any country could possibly choose to risk life and limb". I still have to meet a country for a drink, watch his limb, and listen to him talk about his life with his collective mouth. In the history of political thought, this is called social organicism. Auguste Comte, the French 19th-century scientist, believed that individuals were only "organs of the great social Being" -- limbs of the great country, as it were. Danten believed that society (substitute "race" in the case of Hitler) could scarifice an organ (read: an individual) when necessary for social health purposes, just as an individual decides to have a cankered limb cut off. Emile Faguet, the famous French literary critic of the turn of the (other) century (and extraordinary writer), LOL-ROTFed about this "zoological conception of society": "You believe you are a man," he wrote, "but you are only a foot."

Pierre Lemieux

<http://www.pierrelemieux.org>

by Pierre Lemieux on Fri, 04/04/2003 - 01:34 | reply

We even have oil. At least Ve

We even have oil. At least Venezuela does...

by Daniel Strimpel on Mon, 04/07/2003 - 00:57 | reply

False economy

Does anyone really believe that there is an oil shortage in the western world? No, so why would we want Iraqi oil? Well obviously, if we have access to their oil then the price of oil will go down, right?

Now can someone explain to me why they think this saving will outweigh the cost of firing billions of dollars worth of missiles at iraq, and then paying a comparable amount to repair all the damage caused by them afterwards?

Surely it would be easier just to use this money to subsidise oil in the first place, no?

by Socrates on Tue, 04/08/2003 - 14:24 | reply

Oil, Oil. Oil

The United States can't afford to "make it all about oil"! If the United States rips one penny off Iraq, then all of OPEC would embargo the U.S.!

ditariel

by a reader on Sun, 06/15/2003 - 18:38 | reply

I Disagree

"Let's look at it simply. The most important difference between North Korea and Iraq is that economically, we just had no choice in Iraq. The country swims on a sea of oil." ~ Paul Wolfowitz, US Deputy Defense Secretary

by a reader on Thu, 07/03/2003 - 14:56 | reply

la de da

he's saying economic sanctions won't work on an oil-rich country.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://curi.blogspot.com/>

by Elliot Temple on Thu, 07/03/2003 - 16:58 | reply

its not about OIL its about $$

Money is everything today, Money is power.

The USA itself is not earning a cent, they are paying all that, but its not the USA itslef its the US citizens tax dollars, that are spent in missiles and fighterjets. Its YOUR taxmoney that is going to Bechtel co. that is doing the rebuild. Its not the USa itself that is owning the iraqi Oil, the oil will propably go in private hands. Privatisation is the key i think. al that belongs to the iraqi ppl today will be sold soon, who has the money to buy that stuff? the iraqis??????? its all about oil is just to simple. Its about the liberation and a good thing ,wel that would be nice, but it isnt. Voilence brings only new problems. There are Billions to earn, not by the US itself, but by some ppl inside the USA with much influence in the US goverments and other Goverments. Folowe the money!

by a reader on Sat, 08/23/2003 - 13:50 | reply

It's about oil and many other things!

If it were only about oil we would simply have planted our flag in Kuait 12 years ago and started pumping away.

Why must there be only one reason. A ruthless tyrant has been deposed, the children of Iraq have a chance for a decent future. Are they any less important than American children? How long were the no fly zones to be enforced, forever? Can anyone imagine solving the problem of Islamic terrorism in a world where Saddam Hussain is still in power? When the President speaks of liberty, freedom and justice for all people of the world how can anyone credibly argue against him? History is being made in front of our eyes and I for one want to look back some day and knowing I was on the right side of it.

Oil, yes it's about oil too. The free flow of it among other things.

by a reader on Wed, 11/26/2003 - 22:09 | reply

Supporting Iraq war doesn't become you, libertarians!!! Get rid

What are you talking about? Many people agree that it is not about oil. So what?

- 1) Iraq supported terrorism. No more than: Iran, Syria, Lebanon, Iemen. USA supported terrorists in Macedonia
- 2) Saddam supported Ben Laden - very weak link is observed and it is still not proven. Again, not more than etc.
- 3) Tyran regime. Not more than Northen Korea etc. etc. USA supported Ben Laden at the beginning of his "career".

Does it look like a hypocrisy to you?

4) WMD. A little doubt is remaining about why Saddam resisted and that was probably about well hidden WMD. Again no proofs, a weak doubt after all.

5) Liberate people. They will always choose Islam. And Islam is "incompatible" with democracy. Do they want to be liberated? You talking about children making their choices. Now you have to tell that adult Iraqis are less able to make a choice. Hypocrisy again. Or a devil in details?

by a reader on Mon, 03/15/2004 - 12:16 | reply

The invasion of Iraq is not about Nation Building or WMD

It is about survival. The world is running out of oil (Noth Sea oil will last just another 5-6 years) and the industrialised world needs desperately the stuff at an affordable price. With a real danger of Saudi Arabia falling in the hands of a fundamentalist regime I believe that securing and controlling the world's second largest oil reserves is just plain common sense. Good luck!

by a reader on Mon, 09/20/2004 - 20:54 | reply

Make your point intelligently

Wouldn't it be nice if some of the hotshots who want to change the way the world works or explain to all of us who are obviously STOOPID (stupid to the power of 10) could, just once, spell correctly in their musings and make correct use of the language.

by Ted Harris on Fri, 11/26/2004 - 22:15 | reply

Elections, money, empire, oil and Dad

Of course the second Iraq war was not all about oil.

It was about "elections, money, empire, oil and Dad" (to quote Andrew Motion).

To make the point less flippantly, we have the following:

- (1) The USA's constant, gargantuan thirst for oil.
- (2) The fact the Iraq is the second most oil-rich nation on Earth (if I recall correctly - in any case, there's a hell of a lot of oil there).
- (3) The fact that replacing Saddam with a pro-Western regime has the 'side-effect' of securing long-term American access to the oil (provided that this regime doesn't collapse. However, we have every reason to think the Americans believed 'their' Iraq would (will) be nice and stable in the long term.)

Put them all together, and the conclusion that Iraq's oil factored heavily in the decision to go to war is almost unavoidable.

Suppose you put a plateful of food in front of a hungry man at 9:00 and by 10:00 he has eaten it. What possible evidence could overturn the contention that the man ate at least partly because he was hungry?

by Neil Fitzgerald on Sat, 11/27/2004 - 03:05 | reply

A foot in the door

What it's all about is securing a foothold in a vast area hostile to "the life" as we all know it in the west.

Where are an endless number of crazed murderers coming from?

Why are they fighting with barbarity beyond all known values of engagement?

And how are they instructed, trained and financed?

Who knows...Perhaps the neighbouring dictators are a bit uptight about democracy creeping closer and closer...

Or are the Sharia puritans of the near by theocracies worried sick by freedom with all it's accompanying degenerate baggage of fun,alcohol,porn,gambling,choice and all that..

My preference is for an extension of the real world..tourism and decadence included.Murdering women, molesting mules,amputations or even a Friday night out clubbing in Teharan or Jeddah just are'nt my cup of tea...

But that's me

Hooray George.W..Afganistan and Iraq are a good start.

by accidental tourist on Wed, 12/22/2004 - 15:54 | reply

Advancement depends on cheap energy!

If you can think without your "American Dream" bias, you will soon see that the underlying issue is the building up of defense to maintain "the American Way of Life". In the past two decades things have changed dramatically in regards to foreign oil dependency. This includes that the Asias(China,Japan,India)have become grosly dependent on the same oil we depend on) All have started implementing a oil stockpile strategy .We also have seen peaks in discovery of new oil wells in the 1970s . In the 1950's we were using about 50million barrels per day, now we are using around 75 million barrels per day worldwide. Many physicist believe that our limit to production may very well be around 110 million barrels per day. In the 1970's America expirienced its first energy crisis, where we only saw a drop of about 5% in production. (That is all that is needed to cripple our nation, OIL DOES NOT NEED TO RUN OUT TO CAUSE A COLLAPSE)

So, what do we do as Americans, well we pretend to believe that there is sufficient research and advancement of alternative energies, where as the US energy policy contradicts thees "pipe dreams". Simply stated the US energy policy (dealing with the aspect of oil production decrease) is to continue to build up a massive defensive program. If you cannot realize the importance and uniqueness of oil as an energy, then you have your eyes closed. What other liquid can push a 3000lb piece of metal 10 miles with one gallon. The bottle of water you buy everyday and throw away, the car you drive, plastics, paints, distribution systems (average piece of food travels 1500 miles before being consumed) are some of the many of thousands of luxuries we will have to live without if we want to avoid major global resource wars in the future. As long as we have a reason to send 150,000 troops to an oil abundant nation (terror) we will also be able to baby-sit our oil supplies on that side of the planet. Certainly people have come up with great ideas like hydrogen for instance. Another pipe dream, "the hydrogen economy" is a complete fallacy. At the moment the only economical hydrogen fuel cell must use platinum, which is a very finite resource (like oil) and would not come close to replacing the 700million vehicles worldwide. Even if it could, Hydrogen is currently a energy carrier, which means it takes more energy to create potable hydrogen then is actually given out. Furthermore, things you may not even connect with oil are: pesticides to maintain agriculture, running water, construction (6,500 gallons of gas per average house built) and our basic monetary system is controlled by the price of gas per gallon. If you can't see the deeper turmoil that is brewing between the major contenders, China, America and the middle east, then maybe you are just another ignorant American, that comes home from work, turns on the big screen, and absorbs all of the propoganda that the US media has to offer.I certainly realize that our little hundred year spurt of burning off massive amounts of petrochemicals to create prosperity in America will not last through even the next two generations. If we do not address the situation of American over consumption, and global overpopulation, we will have no choice but to go to war to maintain the same increase in energy consumption we see each year.

Sincerely

Matthew E. Coyle

University Films Production Executive

*Coming soon, the end of the industrial age, the beginning of the resource wars!

by Matthew Coyle on Wed, 04/20/2005 - 18:49 | reply

Your argument makes little se

Your argument makes little sense when you look at who's paying (us, taxpayers) and that some non-paying parties (corporations) are benefiting in the breakdown, buildup and available resources thereafter.

by a reader on Wed, 11/23/2005 - 06:12 | reply

Re: Your argument makes little sense

Your counter-argument of cui bono, to have any substance, would have to include some account of how the benefit to certain corporations was translated into the liberation of Iraq. How, for instance, did it cause large numbers of people to become persuaded of the rightness of such a liberation? And how did it cause the President and his Administration to embark on a mission whose real purpose was to dispossess their own voters for the benefit of a third party?

Without such an account, your counter-argument is just a general-purpose conspiracy theory.

by Editor on Thu, 11/24/2005 - 00:59 | reply

The war on Iraq was more on a

The war on Iraq was more on and ego booster than oil. People who are speculating that America needs the oil of Iraq are totally lost. Perhaps it is a possible reason, but I don't see any logic since America is already controlling Saudi's oil. The attack on Iraq was Bush's move to show the world not to mess up with America or else.

by Online Wong PoKér Hu on Fri, 11/25/2005 - 00:13 | reply

hahahaha

what an amazing time capsule about how retarded the supporters of the phony war in Iraq were back in the day.

they're still totally stupid but back then they were goose-stepping!!!!

by a reader on Sat, 12/03/2005 - 18:27 | reply

Firmly in the 'stupid' camp!

Whichever side of this debate you come down on, anyone who spends some time considering the facts and questioning some of the half-truths and propoganda that surround this issue, will quickly realise that there were strong, valid and logical reasons both for and against going to war in Iraq.

Anyone who dismisses the other side as: "Retarded", "Totally Stupid" or "Goose-stepping" is either themselves too stupid to understand the debate, or (more likely) too intellectually lazy.

Unless they change, they are doomed to learn nothing from history, and blunder through life with their shallow, mistaken opinions, continually astonished at the 'stupidness' of others, and the 'retarded' nature of others' actions.

I can only hope that 'a reader' never ends up in a position of power where his/her ignorance and laziness can do any real harm.

by Mark on Mon, 08/21/2006 - 11:18 | reply

'A reader'

If this pathetic, infantile tirade is what 'a reader' has to contribute, then I suggest he go back to playing in his sandbox, because he is not fit to join an adult debate.

His screeching reference to goose-stepping tells us a lot about the 'mind'-set of this ignorant individual.

by Yoni on Sun, 09/10/2006 - 16:03 | reply

OIL AS A WEAPON

Osama bin Laden himself has said if America leaves the Middle-East, Muslims will still sell them oil. What do THEY need the oil for? Here's a critical point that everyone seems to keep missing though: OIL IS MONEY! Not primarily for us, for THEM!! And tell me, oh great wise CONSPIRACY THEORISTS OF THE WORLD, what will the Fanatical, Extremist Islamic Fundamentalists of the Middle-East DO with that oil money?

Why don't we FIGHT in Darfur? Why don't we invade South-East Asia again? Why don't we take-on North Korea? Is it REALLY because they don't have oil? Actually YES! But not because WE make money, but because the radical assholes who have the OIL make money! Do we invade NICE nations, with good leaders and decent political potential, who happen to have OIL? NOPE!

North Korea can't even feed its' own, let alone fight US. The Sudan might spread their violence across their borders, which may cause us to go in, even without the oil, as we did in the former Yugoslavia. We don't tolerate the 'spreading' of violence so much. BUT, if you have OIL, if you have MONEY from that OIL, you are a much, Much, MUCH bigger international threat!!!

Think about it please, before you go on and on about how we are fighting for cheap OIL, oil for US! No, it's to keep OIL MONEY out of the pockets of tyrants.

by REN on Fri, 11/10/2006 - 06:23 | reply

Are you people serious?

Consider two things:

1 The US is by far the largest user of oil.

Our own reserves, combined with Venezuela and Mexico could not sustain us. We could not meet demand when OPEC cut us off in the 70s, and we use far more today than we did then.

2 Iraq has around 25% of the proven oil reserves in the world. The Persian Gulf has 50% all together.

No, oil was not the only factor. Partly the war was an excuse to increase military spending, to set a precedent of ignoring the UN, and to generally get citizen support of increased government - particularly executive - power over both our own lives and the world.

Partly it is a warning to other countries that the US is not to be messed with, that we should be given whatever we want without having to ask twice.

Basically it is about world domination.

However, oil is a huge component of that, and it is not coincidence that we choose as our target the country with the second most oil reserves on the planet.

There are plenty of other countries with human rights abuses, genocide, a lack of democracy, or Islamic based governments. We did/do not send massive amounts of troops into Rwanda or Darfur even though what happened/is happening in those countries is at least as bad as anything Saddam ever did.

Saudi Arabia has a King and no Parliament or congress. There are no elections in Saudi Arabia. There never have been. Saudi Arabia is also a Islamist country in which law is based on the Koran. People have very little freedom.

Yet, Saudi Arabia is our ally.

Iraq, by contrast, was a secular government. People had far more freedom in Iraq than in Saudi Arabia, and in fact, more freedom under Saddam than they do now (for example, in most areas not directly controlled by US troops today women must wear head scarves).

Ultimately it is about preserving the American way of life - i.e. CONSUMPTION. Massive, excessive amounts of consumption. When our leaders use the term "democracy" what they actually mean is "capitalism". Unrestricted free trade is what allows our corporations (which are becoming more and more synonymous with government) to become as excessively wealthy as they are. If we did not display a giant show of force now and then, the rest of the world would not put up with us. Iraq is a warning to OPEC. We leave Saudi Arabia alone because they give us a fair price. Most people, when making a deal with the mafia or any other bully, offer a good price, and then except what ever terms are suggested. Saddam had balls, so we cut them off to serve as a warning to everyone else. Getting control over the immense Iraqi oil fields is much more than just a side benefit.

It is about power. We are exploiting the world. This is why illegal immigrants want so badly to get in here. Everyone would prefer to be on this side of the fence, since we have both the guns and the money.

The "threat" of "terrorism" is no different than the "threat" of "communism" a few decades ago. What did the communists want which made them evil?

They want to take away the money of the wealthy, and spread it around.

That's it.

Nothing to do with democracy or authoritarianism. It has to do with capitalism. Russia was a democracy. Not a perfect one, but ours never has been either (look at a Gerrymandering district map).

And they were able to convince the American people that it was an issue of good (us) vs evil (them).

Even today you see people on this very form using "Marxist" as an insult, with no context or basis. And so it continues...

by Jay Aziza on Wed, 12/20/2006 - 16:19 | reply

Oil or Oil Money

We are not getting much oil out of Iraq, but our economy is still doing well. Therefore Iraqi oil is not necessary for the United States and Great Britain to be economic powers.

On the other hand, we did try and should keep trying to keep oil money (and money from other sources) out of the hands of Saddam and other evil dictators. We need to do this because many dictators use money from oil and money from other sources to foment evil throughout the world.

We don't invade other countries whom we would also like to deprive of the resources to foment evil, either because we lack the power to do so without grave consequences to ourselves or other innocents, or because such countries have less capacity to create evil throughout the world.

Although we should pay much more attention to Darfur and other African tragedies, we are currently not paying much attention because we suspect that many countries in Africa, ruled by evil dictators, will not have the resources to be able to immediately hurt freedom loving peoples throughout the world.

The reason we don't attack North Korea, despite their potentially very threatening war machine, is that if we do so, we are concerned that our freedom loving brothers and sisters in South Korea will be killed.

That's why we invaded Iraq, and do not want to invade North Korea (right now). And that's why we basically ignore Darfur, but not Tehran.

Now, whether our invasion of Iraq will keep more money out of the hands of terrorists and states that sponsor terrorism, for example, is open to debate. But that was our intent.

by a reader on Thu, 12/21/2006 - 00:57 | reply

A little volatile of a post,

A little volatile of a post, but spot on. Another reason that we didn't invade N. Korea is because they already had nukes, and Saddam didn't (yet).

by a reader on Wed, 04/11/2007 - 21:33 | reply

Reading past posts is humorous.

A few Americans must be feeling sheepish right about now. I wonder, have the posters become more informed regarding U.S. policy towards oil in the past, present, and future?

by a reader on Fri, 06/22/2007 - 21:12 | reply

1) A country (in our case the

1) A country (in our case the USA) is not an agent, it is an aggregate of many people with various opinions. Therefore, the different reasons that people give to go to war can all be correct in the same time.

2) Even if simple everyday acts are often driven by single motives (going out to buy cigarettes), political decisions are usually taken after a complex process of weighting pros and cons.

Conclusion:

-Most of you are probably right in different degrees.

-If we want to discuss this topic seriously we should try to avoid speaking of America as a single entity and start speaking about Bush, a typical conscript, a board member of Halliburton, a think tank representative, Cheney etc...

P.S. Understanding demands cold blood, rational thinking and a careful hear for arguments of the opposite conviction. After the analyse is done, speaking forcefully for one side and calling the other side blind is sometimes justified! Sometimes one side is 99.9% right.

by jmd on Sat, 10/06/2007 - 23:26 | reply

Copyright © 2008 Setting The World To Rights

History

In another of his superb, moving essays, History, Bill Whittle places the present war in its broadest context, analysing it from the perspective of other times, other conflicts, and other universes too. Read this piece, and when you have finished, read his other essays.

Wed, 04/02/2003 - 22:37 | permalink

Understatement

To call it "moving" is an understatement. I have tears pouring down my face. In amongst the powerful words about history is the following important argument we should never forget:

No sane person wants to fight a war. But many sane people believe that there are times when they are necessary. I believe this is one of those times.

For it seems to me that if you are against any war ♦ if you believe that peace is always the right choice -- then you must believe at least one, if not both of the following:

1. People will always be able to come to a reasonable agreement, no matter how deep or contentious the issue, and that all people are rational, reasonable, honorable, decent and sane,

or,

2. It is more noble to live under slavery and oppression, to endure torture, institutionalized rape, theft and genocide than it is to fight it.

History, not to mention personal experience, shows me that the first proposition is clearly false. I believe, to put it plainly, that some people have been raised to become pathological murderers, liars, and first-rate bastards, and that these people will kill and brutalize the good, meek people and steal from and murder them whenever it is in their personal interest to do so. [...]

We fight wars not to have peace, but to have a peace worth having. Slavery is peace. Tyranny is peace. For that matter, genocide is peace when you get right down to it. The historical consequences of a philosophy predicated on the notion of no war at any cost are families flying to the Super Bowl accompanied by three or four trusted slaves and a Europe devoid of a single living Jew.

It would be nice if there were a way around this. History, not merely my opinion, shows us that there is not. If all you are willing to do is think happy thoughts, then those are the consequences. If you want justice, and freedom, and safety, and prosperity, then sometimes you have to fight for them.

by Sylvia Crombie on Mon, 04/07/2003 - 15:54 | reply

Man's best friend

Actually, this piece is a well done romantic job to make midinettes cry; I suggest it has little rational content, and certainly no libertarian wind. It is more glorification of the state than humanistic poetry. Read this: "these kids died for all of us. We asked them to go, and they went." Jesus Christ! just like Him!

We should not be cynical towards heroism, as we might need some in the future (and it is not going to be against some little foreign tyrant!), but the more sober truth in this case is probably that the men who died in Irak (I don't mean the Irakian conscripts or brainwashed thugs) are adventurous men who do a fun job (they are all volunteers), like to obey orders, and who, more often than not, will shoot a suspected drug smuggler when ordered to.

And read this: "Today, the United States is at war with Iraq." Oh! I thought that the U.S. state was at war with the Iraki state. But perhaps there is no difference: in a Rousseauvian way, the state is us.

What a naiveté towards the state perceived as man's best friend! The author should read Christopher Browning's Ordinary Men. Some Public Choice readings wouldn't hurt his warrior poetry either.

The reference to Lincoln is truly fascinating. Indeed, one could possibly argue that, just as Lincoln liberated the slaves and enslaved free men(see Jeff Hummel's fabulous book on the Civil War), Bush will liberate "the Irakis" and enslave Western individuals.

Pierre Lemieux
<http://www.pierrelemieux.org>

by Pierre Lemieux on Tue, 04/08/2003 - 02:52 | reply

Copyright © 2006 Setting The World To Rights

Curious About Joe McCarthy

Elliot Temple at Curiosity has become curious about what McCarthyism was really all about. His preliminary findings, and musings comparing the beginnings of the Cold War with the present day, are here:

[Joe McCarthy wanted] to fight to get idiotarians out of government. Or so it sounds. Don't actually know how many idiotarians there were in 1950. Have heard plenty, but must do more research.

So, to sum up, McCarthy was pro-morality (and Christianity), anti-commie, anti-complacency, didn't like anti-Americanism at home, and had some suspect facts. And was blunt. So far ... I like him.

Oh, and Elliot recently wondered:

I still haven't gotten any hate mail. What's up with that?

Thu, 04/03/2003 - 09:34 | permalink

On Loyalty – Part 1: True Allies, True Loyalty

Down with loyalty! In international relations, the very concept undermines the struggle for good against evil and plays into the hands of the enemy.

The redoubtable Steven Den Beste once mused on the subject of which countries are truly “allies” of the United States, and concluded that It's a very short list. We've got the UK, and Canada, and Australia. That's the lot.

He contrasted these countries with others who merely co-operate with the US out of “self-interest”:

Real allies sacrifice for you, take risks for you.

Well, yes, of course allies sacrifice and take risks to help you. But so do fair weather friends, whenever they consider it expedient. The West sacrificed plenty to help the Soviet Union in World War 2 but that did not make them “real allies” of Stalin in the sense that Steven is looking for.

Steven – do you think that there exist countries who make sacrifices to help another country to do wrong as they see it? That never happens. You have put your faith in a chimera - the chimera of loyalty. As George Washington said in his Farewell Address:

There can be no greater error than to expect or calculate upon real favors from nation to nation. It is an illusion, which experience must cure, which a just pride ought to discard.

What about those countries who take risks, not ‘for you’ but because they agree with you - because they share fundamental moral values with you and therefore have reached the same conclusion about what should be done? Such countries do not count as “allies” by Steven's definition! Because if, by some quirk, you embarked on what they saw as a morally wrong path, they would refuse to help. Instead, they would offer friendly criticism.

No doubt some readers will see in this an echo of the slimy excuses that are always trotted out by the Weasels when they are weaseling, such as: “friends don't help friends to drink and drive -

so the fact that we are trying to thwart the liberation of Iraq doesn't mean we're not friends of America". Such readers are not seeing the wood for the trees. The point is, drunk driving is wrong; liberating Iraq is right. The Weasels are at fault, not for 'lack of loyalty' in refusing to condone a war that they believe to be wrong, but for believing that it is wrong in the first place.

As soon as you take the argument out of that moral arena and into that of morality-free analysis - loyalty and betrayal, gratitude and ingratitude, sacrifice vs. self-interest - you have let the Weasels off the hook. Because then, for every accusation that the Weasels have betrayed a friendship, they can counter that so have you: it takes two to fracture Western unity, does it not? Has not Britain fractured EU unity too, by siding with the US? For every appeal to gratitude for saving France from the Nazis, they can claim that the US wouldn't even exist if it had not been for French help in the Revolutionary war. For every claim that the the war is enforcing UN resolutions, they can claim that the war violates the UN Charter.

These claims are absurd; but one cannot discover this by examining the entrails of who has been more disloyal to whom. One has to face the issue of who is in fact right about Iraq and who is wrong.

The Weasels are in fact wrong. America and Britain and Australia are right. And they are helping each other to fight this war because they have all come to similar, right conclusions about what should be done about Iraq. It was no coincidence that they have: it is because of fundamental moral values which they share. And that does indeed make them true allies. But loyalty did not come into it. It would have been shameful if it had.

UPDATE: Steven Den Beste points out that his comments here regarding allies are congruent to ours.

Part 2

Thu, 04/03/2003 - 09:41 | permalink

Loyalty

I've always thought of loyalty as a virtue, but I like your argument. Is loyalty always the wrong focus? Is it legitimate to use the word as a shorthand to refer to acting rightly in certain ways?

by Chris on Fri, 04/04/2003 - 12:01 | reply

Loyalty

I think loyalty takes on a worthwhile meaning when you define it between a state and an idea, rather than between two states. In that case, it might mean something like ideological integrity i.e. in the face of adversity, the state sticks up for its principle, instead of wimping out and falling back on a more conciliatory one.

by Daniel Strimpel on Wed, 04/09/2003 - 01:04 | reply

Copyright © 2006 Setting The World To Rights

Setting The World To Rights

Ideas have consequences.

home | archives | polls | search

Contact Us

For general enquiries, comments, and criticisms, write to The World. The Webmaster deals with technical problems only.

Submissions: submissions@settingtheworldtorights.com

Administration: admin@settingtheworldtorights.com

Webmaster: kevin@settingtheworldtorights.com

The World: theworld@settingtheworldtorights.com

Fri, 04/04/2003 - 00:41 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Why?

From Lt. Smash

I'm here because there is a hole in the ground in New York, where a couple of the world's tallest buildings used to be.

I'm here because I knew some of those people in the Pentagon.

I'm here because my seven-year-old nephew has nightmares about terrorists.

I'm here because whether Saddam is responsible or not for those terrorist attacks, he has the will and is developing the means to do much, much worse.

I'm here because if History teaches us anything, it is that evil men cannot be deterred by sanctions, containment strategies, diplomacy, resolutions, or weapons inspections.

I'm here because I don't believe in appeasement.

I'm here because someone has to be.

This concise and moving argument from a serving soldier leaves no room for evasion. That is why he is there. That is why we support him and his comrades.

May they achieve their purpose soon and return home safely.

Fri, 04/04/2003 - 08:43 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Do they all know why they're there?

I read that a marine said that if a bunch of people had come to his hometown and did to them what he had been doing to Iraqis, he wouldn't be too happy about it either. As though the two situations are morally indistinguishable. They don't all get it, do they? Could this adversely affect what they're doing?

by Chris on Fri, 04/04/2003 - 11:56 | reply

There's always a few

We don't know how representative that Marine is - or the context in which he said that. From everything else I've seen, the soldiers in general seem to have a remarkably coherent and nuanced take on the objectives of the war and its moral basis. Of course there are always the weird people on the far edges of any Gaussian distribution, like this guy. But my guess is that they are vanishingly few

by David on Fri, 04/04/2003 - 15:26 | reply

Copyright © 2008 Setting The World To Rights

Legitimacy of the Post-War Iraqi Government

Now that their epic 12-year struggle to preserve the regime of Saddam Hussein is nearing its final relegation to the cesspool of history, the forces of Weasel are turning their malevolent attention to the next government of Iraq. The one that will replace Saddam's.

The thrust of their opposition to Iraq's liberation was that Saddam's regime is legitimate. In other words, states are sovereign: no matter what they may do to their people and no matter what future threat they pose to the world (so the theory went), their rule is legitimate. Only the Security Council of the United Nations can take away this legitimacy and since (under the Weasel interpretation at least) it refused to do so, the liberation of Iraq is illegal. Likewise, it is only the UN that can grant legitimacy to any post-war government of Iraq.

Hence, before anyone had any idea what such a government would look like or how it would behave, the Weasels were already threatening it pre-emptively:

The European Union issued a blunt warning yesterday that it would not finance the reconstruction of Iraq if Washington went to war without a clear mandate from the United Nations.

Chris Patten, the European external affairs commissioner, said it would be "very difficult" to convince states already facing a budget crunch that they should spend large sums of money repairing the damage done by America in a conflict they opposed.

Just step back and consider the sheer depravity of this threat and what lies behind it. Be optimistic for a moment. Suppose that sometime soon the murder and the torture and the repression and stagnation in Iraq have come to an end and a new government is trying to rebuild the country and feed the hungry. The Europeans will suddenly find it "very difficult" to help. Why? Well, it's all about legitimacy: Let the new government be as democratic and representative as you like; let it respect human rights and religious freedom and let it achieve prodigies of reconciliation; let it recognise Israel's and Kuwait's right to exist and let it disarm so transparently that Hans Blix completes his work in an afternoon; let it excel in every virtue known to Paris and beyond, and it will avail it nothing. For what the Weasels will find unforgivable about the new Iraqi government has nothing to do with what that government will do or be. It is not really about Iraq at all. It is that the Americans deposed Saddam. For their taint of association with this crime, Chris Patten will withhold aid to the people of Iraq. This is the same Chris Patten, incidentally, who is the principal cheerleader for EU funding of the Palestinian Authority on "humanitarian" grounds, and who scornfully (and successfully) opposed the proposed European Parliament investigation into the use of these funds for terrorism.

Will the UN likewise withhold legitimacy? The weasels would certainly have them threaten to:

In the face of continued US reluctance to consider a role for the UN in postwar Iraq, Mr de Villepin insisted that the UN was vital to tackling problems in Iraq, and their repercussions in the region. "The requirement for UN approval is both a principle and a necessity," he said. The US and Britain, above all, would find political cover and legitimacy from the UN necessary in the war's aftermath.

Necessary, why? Because should the Coalition be unwilling to pay the Weasels' price, the UN will exert its magical prerogative and deny the new Iraqi government legitimacy.

And what is this price? Control:

In the war's aftermath, he accepted that "it is clear that the countries that have taken the lead on the ground may have a special responsibility". But they should exercise it "under the umbrella of the UN to confer legitimacy". The UN should approve, even if it did not run, operations in postwar Iraq.

By what right? What will entitle the Weasels and their bloodstained allies, all the tyrants of the world, to control the destiny of the people whose liberation they tried so long and hard to prevent, and for which Coalition soldiers are today fighting and dying?

Fortunately the legitimacy of governments is not really in the gift of the UN. It comes from the consent of the governed. In the long run this is the standard against which it will, in practice, be judged no matter what anyone says. It is a standard against which the United States, but conspicuously not the UN, wants its post-war policy to be judged. The UN is not – or at least not yet – a legitimate or honest judge. But whether the UN in future can find a role in a world order based on that criterion of legitimacy, or whether, alternatively, it continues to be a major obstacle to the creation of such a world, is the standard against which the UN must itself be judged.

UPDATE: The Emperor Misha has graciously noticed our humble remarks and has proposed that, consequently, as the war draws to a close, the Weasels would be better renamed "The Axis of Vulture". Good point.

FURTHER UPDATE: The Vultures are squawking louder.

Fri, 04/04/2003 - 08:55 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Tony Blair

Can Tony Blair be trusted not to betray the US in this matter? I don't like what I'm seeing him say.

by Chris on Fri, 04/04/2003 - 11:24 | reply

Tony Blair

I don't like what I'm hearing Blair say either (not that I like what I hear Colin Powell saying, but that's another story).

Despite their troops who are doing a fine job in Iraq, the Brits (particularly that arse Jack Straw) are determined to insist that Israel not be allowed to do exactly what the "coalition" is doing - namely drain the swamp and shoot the rats....Don't trust the Brits. Without W leading the charge they'd have sat this whole thing out too.

by a reader on Sat, 04/05/2003 - 04:03 | reply

Interesting

The thought that that the UK would stay out of a fight to liberate a country of the oppressed gives me chills. I am hoping that as an Australian, that my government made the decision to deploy to Iraq, not because the UK was involved, but because it was the "right" thing to do. Admittedly, we didn't see too much overt US/UK presence in East Timor, although it was VERY nice to know they were there. The western democracies (why western, look how far east Australia is!) are free countries. If we can create other democracies, it is our legitimate right, nay, our duty, to do so. Oppression by other nations is wrong. I know that sounds simplistic, however this is essentially the crux of the argument, economic factors notwithstanding. We should not tolerate any nation that does not allow a citizen to speak his/her mind, without persecution. I understand personal limitations and inflammatory remarks, however, democracy is a robust concept that has weathered these tribulations before. And will do so gain. Free speech for all. Regardless of colour, race or creed. For fuck's sake, it's deeds, not words, that are the evil actions. Speak evil, be derided as an ignorant asshole. Do evil, be bombed. So sayeth the world.

by a reader on Sat, 04/05/2003 - 13:48 | reply

(1) That was a brilliant post

(1) That was a brilliant post. I agree completely and wholeheartedly.

(2) It worries the shit out of me to hear all that UN nonsense again and again, with the peaceniks latching onto a new issue to beat the US with. There has been no public information (I refrain from saying anything about the broadcast media) about what an interim government needs to do (flush out the Ba'ath Party functionaries and destroy its power, provide security, institute the rule of law and civil rights, establish freedom of speech and assembly) and how Iraqis will end up with a Russian situation (gangsters, organised crime) or a new set of Saddam-lookalike replacements, if the UN is allowed a hand in things. They have spent 12 years cosyng up to the Ba'ath functionaries, and even now attack the British army for trying to destroy the party's power. People think all you need is a wish and a prayer and the virtuous power to stop evil US corporations getting their hands on the oil. What is perhaps most sickening is that any authority through the UN Security Council would involve Syria, which is hardly any better than Iraq as far as promoting terrorism is concerned, and ought to be taken out next!

by a reader on Mon, 04/07/2003 - 10:46 | reply

Is it even possible?

We're all kinda assuming this whole thing is possible, but sometimes I wonder. Like, can we take out the regime and impose a better one? How can we be sure that's possible if the people there are still the same people they were before? don't get me wrong--I sure HOPE this is possible. It's necessary! But is it possible? Is Iraqi opinion going to suddenly turn good? How do we know they don't prefer Hussein or that kind of regime? Show me the Arab countries that have a Western democracy. Where are they? Do Arabs want a democracy? Even Turkey's going down the tubes. Aren't we trying to impose our own values on people who just ain't gonna get it? Help me here, guys!

Bill Henderson

by a reader on Mon, 04/07/2003 - 12:41 | reply

gradual change

Certainly, we can't drag a people into the 21st century, kicking and screaming, but surely we can meet them more or less where thier understanding is, and bring them along through education and democratic institutions? I hope.

by a reader on Mon, 04/07/2003 - 14:30 | reply

post Saddam Iraq

You are, in general terms, talking my language. Not many weblogs are presenting anything new or useful.

I set up baghdadskies.blogspot.com in order to work out my ideas in a context of memories of Iraq in the 1950s. Though not as slick as your site - especially in its lack of comments and email - it has some value.

A general algorithm that includes:

FACT

IDEA

CLARIFY

DELIMIT

DEFINE

EXPLAIN

PREDICT

would allow anyone to think through any set of ideas without resorting to the the methods of "argument" outlined on my weblog which Schopenhauer detailed in his "The Art of Controversy".

Sincerely,

Andy

by a reader on Thu, 04/10/2003 - 12:06 | reply

Duty

"If we can create other democracies, it is our legitimate right, nay, our duty, to do so."

and so by this "duty" we enslave ourselves

by a reader on Sat, 05/17/2003 - 02:49 | reply

home | archives | polls | search

Copyright © 2008 Setting The World To Rights

United Nations Reform – A Modest Suggestion

If the UN is to have any beneficial role in the future of the world, the Security Council must live up to its responsibilities from now on. That means it must never again behave as it did during the Iraq crisis.

What, then, is to be done about France? Here's a possibility. France can retain its permanent membership of the Security Council, but with a slight alteration in the voting rules: any vote cast by France must have the unanimous consent of all other EU members. Without such consent, France/EU is deemed to abstain.

This at a stroke would make the UN more effective, increase the EU's role in world affairs, encourage European unity and promote multilateralism. Since these are all prime aims of French foreign policy, France would welcome the change.

Heh heh heh.

Sat, 04/05/2003 - 10:41 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

What happens to France if it

What happens to France if it refuses- how, in the fantasy, does the rightness get enforced?

by Alice on Sat, 04/05/2003 - 15:54 | reply

What happens to France?

In the fantasy, France approves of the reform.

In real life, the US imposes this or some equivalent reform by threatening to withdraw funding from the UN or, ultimately, to suspend its membership or leave altogether.

What happens to France? It takes the consequences.

by a reader on Sun, 04/06/2003 - 17:46 | reply

The UN

Do you think the US would do that? Don't they need the UN for the support it gets them from otherwise unsupportive governments and individuals?

Bill Henderson

by a reader on Mon, 04/07/2003 - 12:25 | reply

Excellent idea. Just one slig...

Excellent idea. Just one slight modification - France would need approval of all other EU members that are not also at the time members of the Security Council.

by a reader on Tue, 04/08/2003 - 20:50 | reply

France should be told to shut...

France should be told to shut up, and get back to the kitchen and the vinyard. Otherwise the ANGLOnofreakinfroggiesSPHERE will unsheath Operation French Freedom III, and do it properly this time, liberating all french women from the tyranny of french men, who will be disenfranchised.

Kofi should be reclassified as French, and, just as Peking became Beijing, Putin's name should be corrected to Putain.

The UN should be moved to Waco Texas and Bill Clinton should be put in charge of fundraising, staffing, and travel.

by a reader on Fri, 04/11/2003 - 08:47 | reply

At Least One of Us Has Gone Mad

We knew Matthew Parris when he was still fairly sane...

Better than sane. His extraordinary political perceptiveness, his personal and intellectual integrity, his kindness and his humane, libertarian instincts made him first a Conservative MP whom one could unashamedly support, and then arguably one of the greatest columnists ever. About a decade ago, we were on the same side, or so it seemed.

Not any more. Not for a long time.

At some point he seemed to start losing it. To be fair, he has written excellent articles on some subjects quite recently, but war is not one of them. He opposed NATO's military intervention in Kosovo, and the liberation of Afghanistan from the Taliban and Al Qaeda. In a December, 2001 article which still seems germane and true, Henry Porter wrote:

A little under two months ago the Times columnist Matthew Parris put the hawks on notice. In the Spectator he declared his deep misgivings about the war, and wrote that he hoped that, if the Afghan adventure ended, like Vietnam, in palpable humiliation, those who had argued for the war against terrorism would be man enough to admit they were wrong.

Well, it hasn't ended like Vietnam; in fact the result has been a complete vindication of the plans devised by the Pentagon, of the Bush administration's resolve and of Tony Blair's support. Mr Parris has yet to concede that he and other prominent doves were wrong but while we wait, it's worth recalling another sentence in his column which captures much of the venom that existed between the two camps during the jittery weeks of autumn: " But they (the hawks) will know who they are, and we can guess who they are: the people who went the extra mile, and urged the troops the extra mile, towards the battle-front, and who did so not because they had to but as a matter of personal judgment and moral choice."

That is exactly right. Every journalist, academic and expert called upon in September to write about or debate what should happen had to make a difficult personal judgment. But it was not just the hawks who made a choice. The doves did too, and although at the time it seemed a safe bet that to opt for peaceful means in Afghanistan was to claim a kind of de facto high ground, it turned out to be the less courageous choice and now demonstrably the wrong one.

To say that Matthew is firmly against the coalition action in Iraq would be an egregious understatement. In his March 29th, 2003 article in The Times, he writes:

I am not afraid that this war will fail. I am afraid that it will succeed.

The title of the article is: "Are we witnessing the madness of Tony Blair?" But who is the madman here? Oh! The irony of it all! To quote Matthew's opening paragraph:

Most of us have experienced the discomfort of watching a friend go off the rails. At first his oddities are dismissed as eccentricities. An absurd assertion, a lunatic conviction, a sudden enthusiasm or unreasonable fear, are explained as perhaps due to tiredness, or stress, or natural volatility. We do not want to face the truth that our friend has cracked up. Finally we can deny it no longer and then it seems so obvious: the explanation, in retrospect, of so much we struggled to reconcile.

UPDATE: No surprise here.

Sun, 04/06/2003 - 04:35 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Insanity

Interesting how war has a habit of polarizing opinion into the good guys and the bad guys.... Tony Blair's come along great, IMO.

Bill Henderson

by a reader on Mon, 04/07/2003 - 12:30 | reply

Matthew Parris

Interesting.

I recall reading Matthew Parris years ago in the "Spectator" and liking him.

Now he's become a typically European envious little raging impotent.

by a reader on Wed, 04/09/2003 - 22:34 | reply

Insult

That last comment is an insult to impotent men.

Or do I mean Europeans?

by Rob Klein on Thu, 04/10/2003 - 21:00 | reply

Out of context

The Matthew Parris quote ("I am not afraid that this war will fail. I am afraid it will succeed.") is taken out of context.

He didn't want the Iraq war and its aftermath to go too smoothly for the Americans lest they be tempted to continue their policy of trying to export freedom and democracy by force of arms.

Of course, if we temporarily ignore the world outside of Iraq, then Parris, just like the rest of us, prefers the Americans to win as quickly and painlessly as possible.

I should point out, furthermore, that it's ignorant and even a little bit insulting to call someone insane when all you really mean is that you think some of their opinions on current affairs are rationally indefensible. (Never mind that they and many other people think the same of you.)

by Neil Fitzgerald on Sat, 11/27/2004 - 03:50 | reply

Times change....

Since it is a while since you wrote this article, perhaps it would be fair to all concerned if you spent a few moments considering, in the light of events, if your opinions have changed?

by Roger S on Mon, 09/18/2006 - 12:15 | reply

Events

Which events do you think might change our opinion, in what way?

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/blog/>

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 09/18/2006 - 13:52 | reply

Benefit of retrospect

I do hope Matthew someday has the pleasure of reading this silly drivel. Only the second paragraph reflects reality: he's a very nice man and probably one of the best columnist ever. Maybe the writer of this article should check his bearings, especially with the benefit of retrospect from 2007 when almost everyone agrees that the war was a mistake. The writer should also hesitate before making condemnations and consider whether he really understood Matthew's articles.

by K Johansen on Sun, 09/23/2007 - 07:36 | reply

On Loyalty – Part 2: Who? Whom?

In a previous item we criticised the idea that a true ally is one that exhibits loyalty. We said that the whole idea of loyalty in international affairs is a chimera – and also exculpates Weasels (and, we should add, the bad guys too) by shifting the focus away from moral issues towards merely formal ones.

After Steven Den Beste had expressed that idea (NB he may have changed his mind since), some of his readers queried his omission of Israel from his short list of true allies of the US (Britain, Australia and Canada). And he explained his conclusion – again in terms of loyalty:

In all three cases of Canada, the UK and especially Australia, their willingness to stand by us in this crisis is more voluntary, more motivated by feelings of loyalty and friendship, than by the frank lack of choice which is Israel's top (but not only) reason for standing by us.

Yet recent events seem to cast doubt on that opinion of Canada. The Canadian government's "willingness to stand by us in this crisis" turned out to be close to zero. Perhaps even more telling, there was an upsurge of bitter anti-American feelings among Canadians – or at least, an upsurge in public expressions of hostility that already existed: events like this one in Montreal:

The sellout crowd of 21,000 at Bell Centre was asked to "show your support and respect for two great nations" before the singing of the American and Canadian national anthems.

But a significant portion of the crowd booed throughout "The Star-Spangled Banner" in an apparent display of their displeasure with the U.S.-led war against Iraq.

Defenders of Canada's honour will point out, quite rightly, that governments come and go, and that if the accidents of history had happened slightly differently, a Canadian Prime Minister might well be standing stalwartly with the US – and Israel – today. This one certainly would have. They will also rightly point out that there are plenty of idiotarians, and indeed plenty of anti-Americans, in the United States itself, where it has not been difficult recently to drum up far larger crowds chanting far viler things than "boo".

This illustrates a further misconception in the idea of international 'loyalty'. For the real alliances are not between nations but between political traditions. Within each nation, there are many of these, struggling continuously for expression and domination of the souls of their respective nations and of the world. Governments represent factions, and the extent to which a particular government 'truly' represents the nation's values can only be determined later, with the hindsight of the victors. So governments – and public opinion too – sometimes take positions contrary to what will later be regarded as the fundamental moral values of that nation. An alliance between states can become unreliable or completely worthless if a faction whose heart isn't in it happens to be influential at the time. So if we want to gauge the extent to which there is a 'true alliance' between two nations, we have to take into account all the political traditions that have a reasonable chance of affecting the relevant policies of the governments of those nations. That includes not only political parties but also such things as the traditions of Common Law and the world-views of the US State Department, the British Foreign Office, media professionals and the 'Arab Street'.

Now, speaking of Israel, please cast your mind back to a time when it was Israelis, not Canadians, who were displeased with US policy: the moment of shame in 1981 when the US Government behaved spitefully towards Israel for delaying Saddam Hussein's nuclear weapons programme. The White House suspended deliveries of F-16 fighters and the State Department joined the frenzy of international condemnation of a morally impeccable action which, a decade later, made the Coalition's job so much easier in the first Gulf War.

So America's 'loyalty' to Israel faltered at that moment, but do you think that any crowds at Israeli sports stadiums booed the Star Spangled Banner or American athletes? It's unlikely, because Israeli national pride, unlike that which was on display in Montreal, contains no element of anti-Americanism. Consider also what would be happening at this moment if Israel had no need of allies. What if it were secure, universally recognised, and not under any threat or attack? Can anyone doubt that Israel would nevertheless, today, be a prominent member of the Coalition of the Willing? When someone is fighting righteously for their life, it is always easy to accuse them of acting out of 'mere' expediency. But that's a grossly unjust argument. Of course they are acting out of expediency, because to act expediently is, in that situation, also to act rightly. But Israel is, primarily, acting rightly, just as Britain was when it was fighting for its life in 1940, and as the nascent United States itself was in 1776.

Fundamentally, when Israel or Britain or Australia side with the United States (or when, as usually happens, Canada does too), and when the United States supports them, it is neither out of loyalty nor out of narrow expediency, nor should it be. It is out of agreement about what is right.

Part 3

Question

Did America ever issue some sort of apology to Israel about criticizing the bombing of the nuclear reactor?

by Daniel Strimpel on Mon, 04/07/2003 - 00:52 | reply

Apology

I don't know if they apologized but they did honor the pilot, didn't they?

Bill Henderson

by a reader on Mon, 04/07/2003 - 12:20 | reply

Canada?

Canada? Who's that?

by Chris on Mon, 04/07/2003 - 15:24 | reply

Perhaps the UN Should Send In Some Saddam Inspectors

White House correspondent: Given that the main excuse for attacking Iraq was its alleged possession of a so-called 'SHD' (Saddam Hussein the Dictator), and given that Coalition forces have now reached as far as the heart of Baghdad without finding any SHDs, is the Coalition at all worried yet?

Senior Administration spokesperson: No. The regime is skilled at concealing its SHDs.

Correspondent: But if no SHD is ever found, will the US Government itself have any legitimacy left?

Spokesperson: [sigh] Yes. But in any case, we have overwhelming evidence that an SHD exists and we are confident that it will be located and rendered harmless.

Correspondent: OK, you have found palaces, statues, intercepted television broadcasts ... but isn't it true that you have as yet found no 'smoking gun' proving the existence of SHD?

Spokesperson: Why would a regime spend fortunes on palaces if not to house its SHD? Also, we have found all the trappings of a classic SHD such as torture chambers.

Correspondent: Couldn't they have some other, innocent use?

Spokesperson: It occurs to me that I have no firm evidence that you exist. On the whole you seem very implausible.

Correspondent: Oh, I exist all right.

Spokesperson: Too bad.

Tue, 04/08/2003 - 08:26 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Iraq : An opportunity to reform the UN

- 1) If the UN was an Union of Democratic States no one could deny it a role in post-Saddam Iraq
- 2) Syria - an unelected dictatorship - is on the security Council How can the UN make sensible resolutions in these circumstances?
- 3) UN as a humanitarian organisation ought have a strong role

- provided the US/UK monitor what staff it sends [e.g. no corrupt Arabs/Russians]

check out www.baghdadskies.blogspot.com

by andy on Thu, 04/10/2003 - 13:25 | reply

Democratic States

Does France get to be in the hypothetical Union of Democratic States? If so, how would a Union of Democratic States be any better at solving problems than the current UN?

by Sentient on Sat, 04/12/2003 - 03:06 | reply

It would be better, but it would still suck.

Does France get to be in the hypothetical Union of Democratic States? If so, how would a Union of Democratic States be any better at solving problems than the current UN?

It would be better, but it would still suck.

David Schneider-Joseph

President, Americans for a Society Free from Age Restrictions
Chief, Tewata

by DavidSJ on Sat, 04/12/2003 - 06:10 | reply

Why?

It would be better, but it would still suck.

What would make it better?

by Sentient on Sun, 04/13/2003 - 09:01 | reply

Because

What would make it better?

As much as France sucks, surely it's not as bad as the many dictatorships in the U.N., like Lebanon and Syria, etc.

David Schneider-Joseph

President, Americans for a Society Free from Age Restrictions
Chief, Tewata

by DavidSJ on Sun, 04/13/2003 - 19:31 | reply

US troops arrive at Baghdad Bob's press conference. He responds:

"You aren't Americans."

5% (2 votes)

"See, ladies and gentlemen, these are the only survivors of the entire invading army"

22% (9 votes)

"Americans? What Americans?"

17% (7 votes)

"No I'm not" (when they tell him he's under arrest)

2% (1 vote)

"Welcome, liberators, I have been foretelling your arrival for weeks"

15% (6 votes)

"I don't exist."

7% (3 votes)

"I'm not the Saddamite you're looking for. I can go about my business. Move along."

32% (13 votes)

Total votes: 41

Tue, 04/08/2003 - 12:37 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

US Libertarian Party Protests Against Censorship of Iraqi TV

The Libertarian Party of America, which has voiced its principled opposition to the liberation of Iraq has now protested against the latest atrocity committed by the US government:

BAGHDAD (Reuters) – Iraq's domestic state television has gone off the air in Baghdad as US troops advance into the city.

"This disgraceful censorship of free speech cannot be allowed to go unchallenged," stated a Libertarian Party spokesman. "It is typical of this entire war which is an unjustified violation of the sovereignty of the state of Iraq. Libertarian Party policy has always been that states should be revered and respected at all costs. Regardless of how many innocent Iraqis the Iraqi state slaughters, regardless of how much terrorism it sponsors, regardless of how blatantly it is planning further acts of aggression and regardless of how bellicose its rhetoric becomes, it is wrong to take any action against it until a nuclear bomb is detonated in New York with 'This is from Saddam Hussein, may you all rot in hell, Zionist infidels,' written on it in Saddam Hussein's handwriting verified by an international panel of handwriting experts." The US government is said to be 'studying' the statement.

Tue, 04/08/2003 - 15:24 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Bad Satire

Was this supposed to be funny?

We can disagree with the position expressed by the Libertarian Party about when US forces should be deployed, but these false quotes should seem hysterical and ridiculous to anybody familiar with the subjects.

by Gil on Tue, 04/08/2003 - 16:25 | reply

Bad Satire continued...

I should have added that I meant hysterical and ridiculous in a way that doesn't criticize a real problem with the theories involved in the Libertarian position. I understand that they were intentionally hysterical and ridiculous. But they make the author seem hysterical and ridiculous, not the Libertarians.

by Gil on Tue, 04/08/2003 - 16:38 | reply

It is funny. The bit abo...

It is funny.

The bit about the nuclear bomb kinda blows it, imo, but there really are lots of people: "Oh, they kill their own citizens....that's not force.....no NAP violation.....nothing to see here.....weeeeeeeeeeeeeee"

-- Elliot Temple
<http://curi.blogspot.com/>

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 04/08/2003 - 17:28 | reply

No it isn't!

No, there really isn't anybody who says "that's not force". Particularly not a spokesman for the Libertarian Party.

What they (the Libertarians) say is that the US military should only be used to defend the US. This isn't a stupid or immoral position. The extent to which the Iraqi regime posed (I love using the past tense about this!) a threat to the US is controversial. I agree with this campaign, but I can understand why some serious, smart, moral people thought it was a bad idea.

by Gil on Tue, 04/08/2003 - 18:13 | reply

sweatdrop

"the US military should only be used to defend the US"

Because this position is divergent from "the US military should do what is right" it is immoral. And people trying to use it to oppose fighting against Iraq are stupid (the solution to terrorism is not more people patrolling our borders).

-- Elliot Temple
<http://curi.blogspot.com/>

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 04/09/2003 - 02:29 | reply

Good Satire but lets LP off too lightly

I don't understand the objection to this satire.

The LP harps on about the violation of Iraq's national sovereignty, completely ignoring the effect of this sovereignty on the liberty of the Iraqi people. The World satirizes this by saying "Libertarian Party policy has always been that states should be revered and respected at all costs." How is that anything other than fair satire?

The LP harps on endlessly in their barrack-room-lawyer way, not about facts or morality, but about whether the US has obeyed legal technicalities or treated different states equally or not. The World satirizes this as the LP complaining that the war is disgraceful censorship. That too is a perfectly legitimate use of satire.

"Libertarians say: Saddam has not committed an act of aggression against the United States." The World satirizes this as "it is wrong to take any action against it until a nuclear bomb is detonated in New York." Well that's hardly even satire, it is almost exactly what the LP is saying.

And The World doesn't even bother to satirize IMO the worst thing in the LP press release, which is the barking moonbat conspiracy theory on which the whole thing is based. "Since Bush has no legitimate reason for waging war on Iraq, he has cobbled together a list of accusations."

I think the LP got off too lightly.

by a reader on Wed, 04/09/2003 - 10:47 | reply

Right and rights

Elliot,

The Libertarian Party do think that their position is moral, obviously. Not everybody agrees about what is right and wrong. They think taking armies abroad is wrong. This doesn't make them complete idiots. Unless you think all but four or five people in the world are total idiots, which is an extremely pessimistic position, which is immoral.

by a reader on Wed, 04/09/2003 - 10:49 | reply

The LP are idiotarians

Alan Forrester

Sorry Gil, but it's true. So the question becomes if it had been any other idiotarian group would you have objected to the piece above being written about them. If this piece had lampooned the Green Party say would you still be angry?

Oh, and about the reader who thinks that the peice didn't point out the gaping holes in their logic, it was kinda implicit in the links that went with the piece.

by Alan Forrester on Wed, 04/09/2003 - 13:15 | reply

Hawks Are Morons (just kidding)

Alan,

While it might give you emotional comfort, it's neither accurate nor useful to lump the LP along with all other war opponents, call them names, and pretend that their reasons are equally invalid.

I would prefer the the Green Party be lampooned because I think they oppose the war for bad reasons.

I think the LP opposes the war because they consider the policy of limiting the US military actions to those that defend Americans from more direct foreign threats to be wise. This comes from a (well-deserved) distrust of politicians and how they behave when they have power and wide discretion about how to use it. This does not mean that they don't consider liberating Iraq to be a noble, moral project. They just don't think that it's good policy to have the US military do it, now, under these circumstances. I'm sure they'd be quite happy if you created and funded your own institution to pursue projects like this (that limited the use of force to moral causes).

And I don't think it's fair to use the LP's indication that the fact that Iraq is internationally recognized as a sovereign nation is a relevant consideration when complating invasion to accuse them of hypocrisy about reverence for states. It is a relevant consideration. I think it's a cheap shot.

Again, I have been in favor of this campaign. But that doesn't mean I think everybody who has opposed it has been equally foolish. I recognize that the decision involves a great deal of judgement, and that I might be wrong about it.

by Gil on Wed, 04/09/2003 - 17:03 | reply

The LP are badly wrong

The reasons why the LP are better than the greens has nothing to do with their stance on the war. They are right that free markets are better than government intervention and so on while the greens use the fabricated excuse of the environment to push for a government controlled economy. But on this issue I'm not convinced they're really any better than the Greens - they don't have WMDs and anyway they're not going to give them to terrorists and Saddam isn't hostile to the US. You'll note in this document for example that they simply pay no attention to the wider issue of Islamofascist terrorism. They also attribute far too much good sense to Saddam Hussein. SH's worldview is a cobbled together bunch of crackpot conspiracy theories and any policy that relies on him being sensible is a bad policy, see Kenneth Pollack's book 'The Threatening Storm'. Either the LP are ignoring the truth or they are not doing their research properly. In either case I think they are a driven by a utopian wish to deal with everyone by the medium of free trade, even those who despise the very principle of free trade and would like nothing better than to see it crushed and utterly destroyed, such as SH.

by Alan Forrester on Wed, 04/09/2003 - 20:21 | reply

The Idiotarians' big tent

The libertarians quite often are moral people.
It's the the apparatchicks in the Libertarian Party USA that refuse to acknowledge that their fantasies of what the world ought to be do not agree with the world as it exists, full as it is of dangerous mass-murderers and their followers and supporters.
There is nothing more despicable than the comfortable deriding the efforts of those whose efforts and sacrificies keep the peace and freedom of the deriders.

by a reader on Wed, 04/09/2003 - 22:27 | reply

Despicable

Somebody wrote:

There is nothing more despicable than the comfortable deriding the efforts of those whose efforts and sacrificies keep the peace and freedom of the deriders.

What a lack of imagination! There are lots of things more despicable than that!!!

Here's one:

Attacking anybody who criticizes those who sacrifice in the name of "Keeping the peace and fredom of the deriders" without reference to the merits to any actual arguments (or with just some vague accusation of being unrealistic); as if all sacrifices or military campaigns are beyond criticism, and anybody who is guilty of being comfortable should blindly praise them or shut the fuck up.

by Gil on Thu, 04/10/2003 - 16:35 | reply

Some Libertarians really are that stupid.

No, there really isn't anybody who says "that's not force". Particularly not a spokesman for the Libertarian Party.

What they (the Libertarians) say is that the US military should only be used to defend the US. This isn't a stupid or immoral position. The extent to which the Iraqi regime posed (I love using the past tense about this!) a threat to the US is controversial. I agree with this campaign, but I can understand why some serious, smart, moral people thought it was a bad idea.

At least two people who call themselves Libertarians have told me that if they had a magic button which they could push to end Saddam Hussein's regime, they wouldn't push it, because we have no right to intervene in that sovereign nation. I was surprised to hear this, because I thought that their objection was using the U.S.

military for this purpose, not any willing U.S. citizens doing it themselves.

David Schneider-Joseph

President, Americans for a Society Free from Age Restrictions
Chief, Tewata

by DavidSJ on Sat, 04/12/2003 - 01:34 | reply

Ok, some Libertarians are that stupid

But I still don't think that's the official position of the Libertarian Party or that of a substantial percentage of its members.

by Gil on Sun, 04/13/2003 - 07:54 | reply

Ok, some are that stupid...

"But I still don't think that's the official position of the Libertarian Party or that of a substantial percentage of its members." - Gil Speaking as a voting libertarian [since 1983], Gil, it's not the position of a substantial percentage of libertarians. Definately not that of the ones I correspond with. "Official position"? Hmmm... officially, the Libertarian Party does contain a few idiotarians, just as the Democratic and Republican Parties do.

My understanding of libertarian principles encompasses an appreciation that totalitarianism is antithetical to libertarianism, and an awareness that dedication to libertarianism and liberty involves a responsibility to support and encourage liberty wherever it is lacking - else it's only hollow words, not a "principle".

by a reader on Tue, 06/17/2003 - 03:14 | reply

Whoulps. ;]

Sorry 'bout that - didn't mean to post anonymously. Brief moment of idiotarianism: I missed the create account on the sidebar. Used to blogs where you input usernick/name as you comment. ;]

That was me just above.

Sherman Barnes - Ironbear

by Ironbear on Tue, 06/17/2003 - 03:27 | reply

From a Libertarian

As far as Saddam goes, I for one was against invading because it was under false premiss and by a group who had personal biases and motives in his expulsion. The second reason is that I felt he was of no threat to anyone outside of Iraq, as he was having enough trouble keeping the peace between these rival bands that we now call "insurgents", to keep him bussy for decadedes. He was a very paranoid man, because his nation was falling apart into a multiple party civil war, that only his style of brutal dictatorship could hold together. His massive killing and rape rooms, produces the Fear necessary to keep Iraq together, and this prevent mass chaos. That nation was a powder Keg, and it's now blowing up all over young american soldiers.

The world as a whole should have sent soliders in on a mission of peace, something like the Natural law party suggesed but less hokey and mystical. Once Iraq was healed from the inside, Saddams fear would have been eased and a less oppressive governement could have basically transcended the need for a sovergn like Saddam, while preserving his honour in the eyes of the people. Thus a sort of representational monarchy could have left the Husseins as respected figure heads, while the people themselves were given more control over the government, without interference from Saddam of the US in Iraq's policy.

As it stands, the US is obviosuly out to take control over Iraq and make it into a co-operative puppet, it has no altruistic motive in seeing the people rule themselves, but instead wants to install Iraq as another handle by which the US can attatch a string and be the puppet master of the world. That is why the "insurgents" are still fighting the US military after Saddam has been captured.

by Froclown on Thu, 11/18/2004 - 07:11 | reply

Er, what?

Froclown wrote

'As it stands, the US is obviosuly out to take control over Iraq and make it into a co-operative puppet, it has no altruistic motive in seeing the people rule themselves, but instead wants to install Iraq as another handle by which the US can attatch a string and be the puppet master of the world. That is why the "insurgents" are still fighting the US military after Saddam has been captured.'

Do you have an argument for that? Also, you probably ought to read this:

<http://www.settingtheworldtorights.com/node/202>

by Alan Forrester on Sat, 11/20/2004 - 01:56 | reply

Proof

I am basing this on much study of how the US has acted in the past as well as the essays and books by such notable persons as Noam Chomsky and Howard Zinn to name a few.

Also, from my personal experince that the US is itself far from a "free democracy". The US is run my all kinds of generally unwritten, moral codes, dress codes, race codes, behavioral codes, thought codes, etc. Failure to obey these codes, leads to social, political and economic alienation. Corporations and "privite" entities can fire anyone for any reason. I recently was fired frommy job, because I was talking about the Church of the Subgenius on my break time. It is my understanding that absolute freedom and speech, expression and a life which does not restrict one's experiences was granted in the constitution of the United States, it seems this is a lie.

Certain drugs are prohibited from use under the notion that the "class" knows better than individuals and their doctors what substances are good for people. These drugs are obviously restricted because of their association with dissident groups. The class system only allows certain rich families access to the upper echelon of the government, and those are well trained in certain social disciplines. You will never see a Goth or a Punk in the White House, Howard Dean was dropped from the race because he was too enthusiastic. It seems only yuppie rich boys who spent their youth as drunken jocks, who most likely engaged in forceful beatings of other subculture types, are allowed to represent this nation.

With this nation so twisted against the individual and over run with consumerism and for profit bottom lines rather than for promotion of individual happiness and well being, I can only imagine what sort of system they have in store for Iraq. You know that country where all them "brown skin, towel-head sand niggers live, all hooting and plotting the death of mothers, baseball and apple pie, are sitting on all that oil" as the yuppie jocks in the White House call them in private",

by froclown on Sat, 11/20/2004 - 09:04 | reply

True Freedom

DO WHAT THOU WILT SHALL BE THE WHOLE OF THE LAW.

True freedom means that every individual is given maximum allowance and support to utilize his own mind, body and "soul" to its greatest extent, for the purpose of exploring and experiencing everything that is possible to the individual without restriction or limitation placed on the individual by any outside mandates, Gods, states, organizations or other such ideals.

We are as incarnate beings cast forth into the living world in bodies of flesh, just as an astronaut who awakens in command of a powerful space exploration vessel, we have every right and duty to push that vessel to its limits and explore the universe unhindered by the Goals and Ideals of others.

Man has the right to eat, drink, walk, sculpt, love, fuck, read, say, and in general DO what he or she wills, which is towards the ultimate goal; to push one's own body and mind even to the point of self destruction if he so will. Any and all restriction placed on any individual by any external agency, is a sin against that individual's True Will or "divine plan" if you want to view it in a religious/fate sense.

The US is such an external agency as much as Iraq is, and both must be considered equally as enemies of individual rights and Liberty as set forth by the Divine/natural law as put forth here, also known as THELEMA.

ANYONE WHO RESTRICTS THIS RIGHTS OF THE INDIVIDUAL HAS DENIED THESE RIGHT FOR HIMSELF AND HAS SET HIMSELF UP AS THE ENEMY OF LIBERTY, AS SUCH THOSE OVER WHOM THE TRANSGRESSION HAS EFFECTED HAVE EVERY MORAL RIGHT TO KILL, PUNISH, CORRECT OR PARDON THE WRONG DOING AS IS NECESSARY TO THE EXPRESSION OF THE WILL OF THE INDIVIDUAL INVOLVED.

LOVE IS THE LAW, LOVE UNDER WILL.

by Froclown on Sat, 11/20/2004 - 11:15 | reply

Noam Chomsky, Yawn

Oh, right, Froclown is a Chomsky zombie. Read this:

<http://www.frontpagemag.com/Articles/ReadArticle.asp?ID=1020>

by Alan Forrester on Wed, 12/01/2004 - 01:50 | reply

That article is hogwash

I do enjoy hogwash and this article is a great example of it, but I also like truth.

Chomsky is an anarchist, he doesn't not claim that america is the root of all evils, but that as not only a state, but the most powerful State, America is a danger to the world.

All states are dangerous because their existince is dependant on the control and subjection of individuals to the States goals. Those closest to the State, the political and economic elites, benefit on the backs of the common people. Any attempt at cetralized control, is leads to this problem. Certianly leaders like Sadaam and Ossama, are example of this same structure, where some people are used as cannon fodder for others, is the US millitaty any less of a suicide attacker than the terrorists who hit 9-11?

Neither the US as a state not Ossama as a leader, have the interests of Freedom and indivudalism at heart, both use individuals as pawn in their chess game for control over the world. The US seeks economic dominion over the whole world, judeo-christians are seeking religious dominion over the world. The islamics, if they had the power would also seek religious, cultural and econmic rule, however, they have been pushed back for hundereds of years and now only seek to defend what is left of their, culture, religion, economy, from the US.

The US is at war with Islam, and all that it stands for, because they stubbornly hold on to that last tiny remaining piece of power that, which is to say the oil supply. The islamic nations are no different that the US indian reservations. If we found oil or something valuable on one of those reservations, the US would try to pay the indians, or failing that just take their land again. This would endanger the native american way of life, their spiritual and traditional culture, and we would probably have native american suicide bombers.

Freedom, can not never co-exist with centralized power. Where there is a State, there is no freedom. Wherever men have dreams bigger than thier personal grasp, they will use fear, lies, signs, symbols, pychological tricks and physical threats to ensure that other are working towards the ends of the state, and benefit of the elite class.

by froclown on Thu, 12/02/2004 - 23:40 | reply

Copyright © 2007 Setting The World To Rights

From Whom Can the Coalition Accept Unconditional Surrender?

By far the best Reality TV in the world today can be seen on the live broadcasts of the British Parliament.

Today's Prime Minister's Question Time was a classic, including the following exchange:

Iain Duncan-Smith [Leader of the Opposition]: The Prime Minister will recall that at the end of the last Gulf War, Iraqi generals signed a document of surrender on behalf of the Iraqi regime. The current regime is in complete collapse ... Given that, from whom does he believe, or do his advisers believe, that the Coalition can now accept an unconditional surrender?

Tony Blair: ... It is extremely difficult as we speak to know what is left of the governing higher ranks of Saddam's regime, and I think the best way of answering that would be that we must be clear that whomever we accept a final declaration [from] - that so far as Saddam's regime is concerned the war is over - whoever it is has [the] proper authority. Now I can't at the moment make a judgement as to who that may be...

Un-named Member of Parliament: Galloway!

[22 seconds of laughter from the whole House]

Tony Blair: Right. I'm going to resist all temptation at this point, so we'll have to wait and see.

Wed, 04/09/2003 - 12:03 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

British parliament

The House of Commons is quite often hilariously funny. I think this is a sign of how cool it is. Apart from anything else, surely the enormous amount of room for heckling and humour must attract slightly more intelligent interesting people into becoming MPs than it would otherwise? Can't imagine this happening in Berlin, but perhaps they're all too busy taking drugs in the toilets. Is there a website of British parliamentary humour?

by Alice on Wed, 04/09/2003 - 13:43 | reply

Update

Not Venal, Evil

by Kevin on Tue, 04/22/2003 - 14:53 | reply

Copyright © 2007 Setting The World To Rights

Is Nothing Sacred?

Journalists have been frothing at the mouth about the incident in which the Palestine Hotel was shelled by US forces who had been receiving fire from there. How dare the coalition shell their preferred hotel? At a CentCom briefing earlier, one reporter asked whether the Palestine Hotel has now been designated as a site not to be attacked, like a mosque or site of special historic interest.

That might please the proud and haughty journalists who have been complaining that they have been targetted (would it be very bad not to care much if those particular ones really had been?). But if CentCom were to announce such a policy, where would all the fire be coming from, from then on?

UPDATE: As pointed out in a Comment by a reader, it now appears more likely that the shelling that killed people in the hotel was done by the Iraqis.

Wed, 04/09/2003 - 13:37 | permalink

Is nothing sacred?

It appears that the shelling was done by the Iraqis:
<http://media.guardian.co.uk/iraqandthemedial/story/0,12823,932481,00.html>

by a reader on Wed, 04/09/2003 - 22:09 | reply

Fog of War?

Difficult to tell... the fog of war....

by Rob Klein on Thu, 04/10/2003 - 20:46 | reply

Sex vs. the FCC

by Alan Forrester

Although America is the most open and rational society in the world, occasionally things happen to remind us that there is still a long way to go. For example, a radio station in Detroit has been fined and may lose its broadcasting license for talking about sex:

The Federal Communications Commission proposed fining Infinity's 97.1 WKRK-FM station $27,500 (17,500 pounds) for the January 9, 2002 "Deminski & Doyle Show" broadcast between 4:30 p.m. and 5:00 p.m., during which the on-air personalities asked listeners to call in to talk about strange sex techniques.

"The station presented graphic descriptions of violent sexual acts against women as entertainment at a time when children likely composed a significant portion of the audience," FCC Commissioner Michael Copps said on Thursday.

The agency warned the broadcast station that additional similar incidents by Infinity could lead to an FCC proceeding to revoke its broadcast licences, a move Copps said should have been initiated immediately.

The FCC said the company, a unit of media conglomerate Viacom, did not deny airing the material but argued that the agency's definition of indecency was unconstitutional.

The FCC defines as indecent speech that depicts or describes sexual organs or activities, and a broadcast must be "patently offensive as measured by contemporary community standards for the broadcast medium."

"The broadcast included explicit and graphic sexual references, including references to anal and oral sex, as well as explicit and graphic references to sexual practices that involve excretory activities," the FCC said.

The on-air cast members did warn children and women not to listen to the segment, but the law bars the airing of indecent material between 6 a.m. and 10p.m.

Revoking broadcasting licences because of the content of a programme, prima facie, violates freedom of speech. But the material, they say, is "patently offensive as measured by contemporary community standards for the broadcast medium." What does this even mean? Presumably that some sections of the community found the broadcast offensive. Presumably including the boring prudes of the FCC. Other sections of the community find boring prudery offensive, but unfortunately the boring prude section happens to have some clout and is ramming its agenda down everyone else's throats. Metaphor intended.

Next is the strange definition of "violent" sexual acts. The quote from the FCC about the nature of the acts described on the programme doesn't mention rape or anything else non-consensual. Some of the activities mentioned sound unpleasant and perhaps even unsanitary but the idea that they are violent seems to be part of the distressing tendency in our culture to introduce wilful fantasy into a political debate as if it were uncontroversial fact.

But should descriptions of even non-consensual sex be banned? Non-consensual sex, like other crime, is a staple of great literature. A description of a rape on a crime programme may lead to more victims of a rapist coming forward to help the police catch him. The very definition of 'non-consensual' changes over time (for instance, until quite recently, husbands could legally rape wives because the wives were deemed to have consented through their marriage vows), and such changes depend on public discussion of the issues. And so on.

Lastly there is the all-purpose argument about taking away the licence because children might listen to the show. So what? If they are not interested they'll change the channel or ignore it and if they are interested then they'll learn something. The relevant part of the show came with a warning. It did not advocate crime. Children are people. Case closed.

In general, sex gets a very bad rap in our society, which is a shame because it's fun. It would be good to see more open, positive discussion of sex, and less of the kind of the twisted, guilt-ridden pseudo-righteousness exhibited by the FCC and its ilk.

Wed, 04/09/2003 - 13:53 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Setting The World To Rights

Ideas have consequences.

home | archives | polls | search

Attributed Articles

Democracy Must be Experienced to be Learned!, by David Rovner

Roadmap or Carjacking?, by Alan Forrester

Sex vs. the FCC, by Alan Forrester

Libertarian Foreign Policy Is Not Immoral, by Gil Milbauer

And finally...

Our Politics

Wed, 04/09/2003 - 14:01 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Libertarian Party Foreign Policy Is Not Immoral

by Gil Milbauer

In a recent comment Elliot Temple wrote:

“The US military should only be used to defend the US” [a paraphrase of the Libertarian Party position]. Because this position is divergent from “the US military should do what is right” it is immoral. And people trying to use it to oppose fighting against Iraq are stupid (the solution to terrorism is not more people patrolling our borders).

This gets several things wrong.

First of all, saying that the position is divergent from “The US military should do what is right” begs the question. What is right for the US military to do is what is in dispute. This depends on many things including what sort of institution the US military is, what its mission is, what its obligations are, etc. The US military is an agent of the citizens of the United States. It has a mission to defend them from foreign threats. What is right for it to do is different from what would be right for Superman to do. It has an obligation to use its resources wisely so as to defend America as well as possible, as well as to the soldiers who have volunteered and risk their lives for that purpose.

One thing that is NOT right for the US military to do, for example, is to engage in every conflict on earth where the exercise of the military's special capabilities can be expected to improve the local moral landscape, regardless of the resources required, and regardless of its effect on the safety of American citizens.

So, is it right for the US military to engage in campaigns like the one in Iraq? I think it is, because it does in fact use resources effectively and morally to make Americans safer. It combats the complex problem of the rise of radical Islamism (and the terrorism that comes with it) by striking a blow to open up one of a group of closed societies that help breed this threat (hopefully encouraging more liberalization in the region); it removes Saddam's terrible weapons from his reach, and that of future terrorists; it liberates the brutalized people of Iraq; and displaying the US military's impressive ability to effectively project force will make it unnecessary to do it on many future occasions. But this case is by no means obvious. It's possible that the costs outweigh the benefits. Saddam could have launched a deadly attack that would kill many thousands of our soldiers and innocents. The action could incite more hatred of the US and cause more rather than fewer future attacks; there could be other ways to use our resources that would get us more long-term safety for less risk, etc.

Furthermore, some might argue that even if there are occasions like this when it's best to use force in the absence of a direct attack by the nation we invade, the policy of leaving it to the discretion of future congresses and presidents to identify these cases will make us less safe in the long run; it will lead to many mistakes that will be themselves immoral, and generate more enemies and entangling alliances, etc. So a simpler rule, even if it doesn't optimally address each situation, might leave Americans safer in the long run.

So, it's not at all clear that "the US military should only be used to defend the US" is divergent from "the US military should do what is right". In fact, "what is right" is misleading because it implies that only one policy is right, and all others are immoral. But that can't be true. Are we all immoral because we are not perfectly doing the absolute best thing we could be doing (morally) at all times? No. Morality can't require perfection. There are many moral paths that diverge from each other. There is not always just one thing that "is right" (although there may be one thing that is best). There are also things that are wrong and immoral, but it's not at all obvious that the Libertarian policy is one of them.

One thing that is obviously wrong is Elliot's assertion that people who use the Libertarian principle to oppose fighting in Iraq are stupid. There are many counter-examples to this claim, but one would be enough to disprove it. If he means that they are foolish to make this argument (rather than being generally stupid) then I hope the issues I've raised have disproved that claim as well.

Wed, 04/09/2003 - 18:34 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Stupidity

Being stupid is subject dependent, of course.

-- Elliot Temple
<http://curi.blogspot.com/>

by Elliot Temple on Sun, 04/13/2003 - 15:31 | reply

Libertarians Don't Understand Morality

Is the sole responsibility of the US Army to defend the US from attack? It is the first priority by a large margin when the US is under direct attack but the thing is that it's not and seldom has been. The reason for this is that it is very difficult for the US to do anything at all is it gets destroyed, it's just common sense.

However, in the long run, the best way to make the US safe is for it to stick its nose into other state's business because the situations that might lead to military conflict are those in which the issue at stake is related not to the geographical location of the US but to its political and moral values.

Take for instance the Arabs' fifty year long attempt to wipe Israel from the map. The Arabs are not directly attacking the US when they sponsor terrorism against Israel but it is still appropriate for the US to give money to Israel to kill Palestinian terrorists and to make alliances with Israel and to publicly support Israel when it takes on these terrorists. Why? Because the values the terrorists despise in Israel are the very same values held by the US and inevitably their attention would turn in the direction of the US among others once they achieved their goal of destroying Israel. The allegiance of the US army should be for the values that the US stands for not the piece of ground on which it happens to be sited. In the years to come there will be a lot of international politicking and possibly a few wars, these dealings will be replete with foreign aid deals and entangling alliances and most of it will be entirely good and right and the highups in the LP will still bitch about it endlessly because they don't understand the above argument.

by a reader on Sun, 04/13/2003 - 16:30 | reply

Why did you post this???? Y...

Why did you post this???? Yet another apologist for the LP.

by a reader on Tue, 04/15/2003 - 02:19 | reply

Martyrs to Fear

Cast your mind back a few months. The year is 2002, the world is still reeling from the attacks on 9/11. The US has invaded Afghanistan in a hunt for Bin Laden, and a discussion rages about what they should do when they catch him. One thing is clear in everybody's mind however – whatever the legal or ethical arguments about killing him, the last thing we should do is make him a martyr.

Stop.

Back to the present day. The Coalition has all but destroyed the Iraqi regime, and attention has turned away from the question of whether we can win this war (can you believe we ever had this discussion?) and onto the subject of Saddam.

Things are a bit different this time. The Coalition has made it clear that the moment they catch so much as a whiff of him, the last thing he will see is the smiley face painted on the nose of a 2000-pound bomb. And yet, until recently, people were still saying "The last thing we should do is make him a martyr." Some are still saying it. Today's John O'Groat Journal reads:

[T]his war, in a cack-handed way, will have given Saddam Hussein what he does not deserve. If [...] he has been killed [...], he will become a martyr fighting for the Arab cause[...]

In the light of news footage of crowds of Iraqis passionately hitting the fallen statue of Saddam with their shoes, this idea seems preposterous, so why did anyone think it in the first place?

Haven't we just swallowed this whole concept of martyrdom without really thinking? In a culture that worships death (no, not Islam, we mean something authentically Western here), it becomes all too easy to believe that what our enemy really wants is for us to kill him so that he can rise up, Obe-Wan-Kenobe-like, more powerful than ever.

What rubbish. Where did this idea come from? Was it Jesus? Or did it predate that? Many influential people in history have indeed been willing to die for what they believe in, but so have a great many more losers. Che Guevara springs to mind as a symbol that trendy college students will gladly sport on their T-shirts, yet what he stands for is the triumph of (relatively) civilised society over an ~~upstart Fascist wannabe dictator~~ idealistic revolutionary – failure.

Did Che Guevara's brave sacrifice set off a global fascist uprising that would descend upon the capitalist pigs and bring them to their knees? No, actually all it set off was an opportunity for some handy T-shirt revenue for those capitalists smart enough to capitalise on it.

So why exactly were we afraid to martyr Saddam? His death (or trial, or ignominious flight) will not mark the dawning of a new wave of Islamic terrorism or super-Ba'athism or anything of the sort. All the terrorists that are going to rise up have risen up already: that is what started all this. The end of Saddam will mark the dismal failure of yet another uppity dictator who fucked with the Western world and got his arse kicked for the privilege.

Next...

Thu, 04/10/2003 - 15:14 | permalink

Anglosphere

You said "the Western world". Are the Weasels still part of the Western world, or do we need a new term? "Anglosphere" doesn't work, because it excludes the eastern Europeans, who are ok.

by Rob Klein on Thu, 04/10/2003 - 20:55 | reply

New Term

How about Good Guys?

And it needs to include Israel, too.

by Gil on Thu, 04/10/2003 - 23:42 | reply

This "martyr" business is jus...

This "martyr" business is just one of the many absurd memes floated ad nauseum by the mass media parroting the arab propaganda.

Any time such a junk idea is re-examined, it turns into a dud.

by Boris A.Kupershmidt on Sun, 04/13/2003 - 00:09 | reply

Suicide Bombers

In an item on CNN just now, about another suicide attack on US marines, the reporter on the ground likened the situation to that in Israel, where suicide bombers maim and murder people on a sometimes daily basis.

The question is: will this change people's attitudes to Israel, and in particular, to the way the Israelis handle their security?

Thu, 04/10/2003 - 17:07 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

... likened the situation to that in Israel

Note that these suicide bombers are merely attacking the soldiers of a liberating army, while the ones in Israel murder children.

Note that these suicide bombers merely intend to restore a tyrant to power, while the ones in Israel intend to exterminate a nation.

by a reader on Thu, 04/10/2003 - 18:03 | reply

Israel

I hope Tony Blair was watching that show.

Bill Henderson

by a reader on Thu, 04/10/2003 - 19:15 | reply

It will change opinions toward...

It will change opinions toward Israel slightly less than those other suicide bombings in America a year-and-a-half ago did.

by a reader on Thu, 04/10/2003 - 19:49 | reply

The previous comment seems to...

The previous comment seems to suggest that if 9-11 didn't change people's opinions about Israel, what's happening in Iraq at checkpoints won't either, but I'm not so sure. 9-11 was less likely to bring the plight of the Israeli population to mind, for the very reason that that attack was on such a different scale. I was glued to the TV for weeks in September 2001 and I never saw anybody making the link between Palestinian suicide attackers and 9-11. These incidents in Iraq do more easily bring the Israeli plight to mind despite the differences other comments have pointed out.

by a reader on Thu, 04/10/2003 - 20:29 | reply

If they learn anything it'll be a first

This does not bode well: HonestReporting analysis.

by a reader on Thu, 04/10/2003 - 23:35 | reply

I saw the link made.

I was glued to the TV for weeks in September 2001 and I never saw anybody making the link between Palestinian suicide attackers and 9-11.

I remember in March and April of 2002, during the height of the suicide attacks in Israel, the link was made a couple times on TV. I believe it was noted that the amount of Israelis murdered, as a percentage of their overall population, is much higher than the number of Americans murdered on 9/11.

David Schneider-Joseph

President, Americans for a Society Free from Age Restrictions
Chief, Tewata

by DavidSJ on Fri, 04/11/2003 - 23:34 | reply

Pessimistic

Most harsh critics of Israeli policy just don't like Israel. They have real contempt for Israel. As this is not a problem of a lack of knowledge about the situation in the Middle East, or even a problem of a skewed but consistent moral view, such parallels between suicide bombers aren't likely to change attitudes. It doesn't change the fact that one agent is Israel, the other is America.

by Daniel Strimpel on Sat, 04/12/2003 - 17:48 | reply

D'oh!

From a March 6 interview on Fox News by host Bill O'Reilly with anti-war activist/actress Janeane Garofalo, according to CyberAlert:

O'Reilly: "If you are wrong . . . and if the United States – and they will, this is going to happen – goes in, liberates Iraq [with] people in the street, American flags, hugging our soldiers . . . you gonna apologize to George W. Bush?"

Garofalo: "I would be so willing to say, 'I'm sorry.' I hope to God that I can be made a buffoon of, that people will say, 'You were wrong. You were a fatalist.' And I will go to the White House on my knees on cut glass and say, 'Hey, you and Thomas Friedman [sic] were right. . . . I shouldn't have doubted you' . . ."

We're waiting, Ms. Garofalo...

UPDATE: Mean Mr. Mustard has some thoughtful comments about why we're still waiting.

Thu, 04/10/2003 - 17:28 | permlink

Please DON'T Come Home

On CNN just now, a so-called 'human shield' in Iraq was shouting at a US marine. In a thick accent – an accent from somewhere in England – the 'human shield' shouted "Go home, Yankee. We don't want you here!"

All the jubilant Iraqis there might feel like replying: "No! YOU go home!" But speaking as residents of England, may we say: please, human shields, don't come home.

Thu, 04/10/2003 - 20:04 | permlink

On Loyalty – Part 3: The Individual and the Nation

Controversies about war tend to be especially divisive, because what is at stake is the legitimacy of violence. In the present crisis, anti-war demonstrators denounced the liberators of Iraq as war criminals – and that is among the more conciliatory of their statements. One protest banner in San Francisco read "we support our troops – when they shoot their officers". A professor at Columbia University called for "a million Mogadishus" (referring to the ambush in Somalia in 1993 in which 18 American soldiers were killed). The British MP George Galloway incited "the Arabs" to "rise up" against the invasion of Iraq.

A great deal has been written about where the line should be drawn between legitimate dissent and treason or sedition. Such people as Galloway have been widely denounced as traitors. Morally, we agree with this judgement. But what hangs on this?

First of all, what is so bad about treason, in itself – i.e. considered independently of what is being betrayed? Surely 'my country, right or wrong' cannot be the stance of any rational person: if an army is in the wrong, it can make no difference, morally, that you have previously sworn to serve it or that you were born in a particular country. So when soldiers and civilians commit treason against an evil regime, we approve. It's not that their treason is a character flaw, excused because it happens to serve a good cause: on the contrary, their impulse to betray their state in wartime is a positive virtue which we rightly honour. Conversely, even protests which do fall well within the category of 'legitimate dissent' under any reasonable interpretation, and are therefore entitled to protection, are not thereby rendered innocuous. As The Dissident Frogman pointed out, their peace has a price, and as this soldier says in a letter quoted by Jawsblog:

Even if not intended, the by-product of the protests can't help but add significantly to the totals of killed, maimed, and missing and puts US servicemen at greater risk.

Dissent is the bedrock of a free society, but protesters can't have it both ways. Catchy slogans and trendy chants can't change the fact that public protests provide support to Saddam.

We have said that the real alliances are not between nations but between political traditions; well, for the same reason, the real war is between political traditions too. One of the bitter facts that many of us woke up to after September 11, 2001 was that our own society is profoundly split. It's not just a matter of a few spies labouring bright-eyed over a radio transmitter and a copy of Das Kapital; not just a few sleeper cells of fanatics awaiting the order to detonate themselves among the infidel, nor just a few potty academics and entertainers whose mouths are not connected to their brains, but entire sections of Western society. Some substantial proportion of your ordinary neighbours who watch The Simpsons and worry about bullying in their children's school are effectively – in their analysis of events, in many of their aspirations, in their words and in their votes – allies of those who are trying to extinguish our society in a cruel and vicious war. At the height of the liberation of Iraq, an opinion poll in Le Monde showed one third of French people hoping the Coalition would lose. In the Anglosphere, the proportion is lower, but it is by no means negligible: Matthew Parris is not alone in his views. In this opinion poll, 45% of British people considered President Bush a greater threat than Saddam.

So, if Galloway is a traitor and those Californian demonstrators are seditious, how many other citizens are guilty of the same crimes of disloyalty? Millions? Tens of millions? In any other society this would mean there was a danger of civil war unless the dissenting political traditions were slapped down hard. In any other society the courts and the gallows (or just the death squads) would now be working overtime making examples.

But the West does not work like that. The miraculous internal peacefulness of our billion-strong society, at once the most diverse and the most stable that has ever existed, is one of the most neglected arguments for why Western standards must prevail everywhere if the world is to avoid the hell of asymmetrical warfare fought with weapons of mass destruction. We are at war; and, ironically, in our case, this argues against adopting a strict interpretation of treason and sedition. It argues for bending over backwards to protect the enemy in our midst. In peacetime one might be inclined to be a stickler for the rule of law. But in wartime, victory takes precedence over procedure. Those who demand the prosecution of every air-headed demonstrator or celebrity who is technically a traitor are being just as silly as those who demand a fair trial for every enemy soldier before our soldiers are allowed to pull the trigger in battle. The Rule of Law, like the US Constitution, is not a suicide pact: we have to win. And winning involves strategy and tactics as well as soldiers and weapons. It involves struggling to ensure that the war is fought on our terms and not the enemy's.

And that means that it must, among other things, be fought out in the arena of ideas. Glenn Reynolds says:

The best way to stop terrorism is to kill terrorists, and stop the states that support them

Yes, but we also need to destroy the factions within our society that sympathise with those terrorists and those states and therefore seek to paralyse our self-defence. And to do that, we need to avoid at almost any cost changing our way of life, the basic patterns of interaction in our society – not because the bastards deserve leniency, but because we need it that way. We need to take that battle to the ground on which we are the strongest and fight it on our terms. By argument. That is why Setting the World to Rights exists.

Sat, 04/12/2003 - 09:15 | permalink

Reality: The final argument

"We need to take that battle to the ground on which we are the strongest and fight it on our terms. By argument."

When profound moral progress occurred in the past, it was never the result of argument. Authoritarianism, fascism, communism all died because they simply couldn't face up to reality. Reality bit them and they were forced to grudgingly accept better alternatives. Similarly, these vast anti-Western segments of society won't change through argument, at least not verbal argument with other, more enlightened, human beings. Anyone who has tried to argue with an idiotarian won't dispute this. Rather, they will eventually change by realizing that they cannot find fulfillment with their current outlook. They will realize that their whole life plan is full of goals that will not be realized and fantasies that will not provide solace, just like fascist and communist states ultimately did. Embracing terrorism is indicative of a moral nihilism that can only bring anger, envy, despair and most of all, hatred. When the poverty of this existence becomes manifest i.e. when moral reality "kicks back", they will discover the West.

by Daniel Strimpel on Sat, 04/12/2003 - 16:41 | reply

Selling The World

Taking the battle onto the strongest ground seems ostensibly to be about selling places like the rational blogosphere: the problem of getting idiotarian antiwar lefties to argue in the first place, in fact. Mostly I find they just switch off or get confused or angry when their ideas are questioned.

Maybe if there was some way their ideas could just die out, that would be better? Perhaps we could round them up, and encourage them to go and live in Glastonbury, and help them make wickerware until they become extinct? I suppose they might notice the barbed wire fences after a while, though...

Read my blog:

http://libertarian_parent_in_the_countryside.blogspot.com/

by Alice on Sat, 04/12/2003 - 21:23 | reply

the premise

Lumping. Black & White. The premise is not sound. America was founded on dissent. If you look closely at protests, and who protests, you will find that it is not made up of one bloc. Nor of one opinion. People and ideas are not that simple. In a free society, as the Secretary of Defense just said, things sometimes get a little messy. Sure there are idiots. Sure there are people who benefit by American and British, and Western values, who would hope that they would fail and crumble. Don't count every person who protests with that group. Idiots and Traitors. Free People with ideas. Some flawed, some whole. Convince them if your ideas are right. Write columns which are based on the right to dissent. You do that of course. Do not forget that because some one walks in the street and says something which you might disagree with they are no worse than someone who writes their protest. Consider what they say. Draw your own opinion. However, always look at your premise. If your premise is flawed, your argument, your fine case may be flawed too.

by a reader on Sun, 04/13/2003 - 02:38 | reply

Reality?

When the poverty of this existence becomes manifest i.e. when moral reality "kicks back", they will discover the West.

So why are the former Soviet republics embracing EU socialism?

by a reader on Sun, 04/13/2003 - 05:11 | reply

Reality??

So why is Poland embracing capitalism and Americanness?

by a reader on Sun, 04/13/2003 - 13:03 | reply

Reality

So why are the former Soviet republics embracing EU socialism?

So why is Poland embracing capitalism and Americanness?

Because it's not really countries that do these things, but political traditions. In all these countries, pro- and anti-capitalist strands are struggling for the souls of their countries.

by David Deutsch on Sun, 04/13/2003 - 13:42 | reply

Reality

I've been trying this and running into brick walls.

Example 1: I tried posting facts to a left fest web site, and even though I was polite in every post, they could not stand my very presence. My IP is now blocked from posting on the site any longer. In their mind their blog is by a liberal and for liberals, and other views are not welcome. Can you believe it?

Example 2: I have a nephew that I care about a lot. In our conversations in the last week I have discovered that he immediately discounts anything I say as coming from a right wing source, (in this case I sent him an article from the UK Telegraph). He also was unwilling to listen to facts about the proven falsifications in a "documentary", because said "documentary" happened to endorse his cynical "the west is evil" viewpoint.

Sigh. I'm really not a raving lunatic and I'm discouraged that so many are willing to disregard facts in order to justify their condemnation of western society. (Frankly I know not where the author of this blog is from. I am from USA. Led here from the dissidentfrogman. Nice to meet you.)

So, I'm coming to the conclusion that the battle of ideas is one best taken to our youth. From what I know of curriculum these days, the truth of the founding of our nation is not being taught in schools. We need to reach the next generation.

Comments?

by a reader on Tue, 04/15/2003 - 00:30 | reply

TCS Shall Save The World

Youth are a good thing to be worried about, but the way to help youth is not with better schools, but rather with better parenting. see www.tcs.ac

-- Elliot Temple
<http://curi.blogspot.com/>

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 04/21/2003 - 19:37 | reply

France, Scary?

Alan Forrester notes that a recent article by Guy Milliere, France is not a Western Country Anymore, is scary.

These days, it is becoming hard to find a French politician ready to speak about human rights, freedom or democracy. All of them seem to have the same speechwriter or to belong to the same totalitarian political party; all of them are anti-American, anti-Israeli and "pacifists." They regard Western civilization as something filthy and abhorrent.

If you read the newspapers, it's the same. At times it seems the only difference between the Soviet Union twenty years ago and France today is that in Soviet Union you had only one Pravda, and in France you now have at least ten such propaganda outlets: Different titles, same content. Their party line is clear in reporting on the personalities found in the present Middle Eastern crisis. Saddam Hussein, the "President of Iraq"? Well, maybe he has been brutal, but you know, in "those" countries... George W. Bush? He's a "moron" - a former alcoholic, who has become a crazy fanatic, in fact the most dangerous man on the face of earth. Ariel Sharon? A fascist who loves to kill Arabs. Arafat? A great freedom fighter. When an American general speaks, it is merely propaganda, but when Tariq Aziz pontificates, it is pure truth. Almost everyday you hear anti-Semitic remarks, to boot.

Let's hope that's not the whole story. After all, Milliere himself says

To hear [Chirac] speaking about morality or international law nauseates every decent Frenchman.

Aha! So he admits there's such a thing as a decent Frenchman. Milliere himself is presumably one. Here's another.

Seriously folks, remember that the differences between different countries are ones of degree. The true struggle is between opposing political traditions.

How do you define "political traditions"?

by a reader on Tue, 04/15/2003 - 01:22 | reply

Copyright © 2005 Setting The World To Rights

What Saddam Was Planning When He Invaded Kuwait

Time Magazine claims to have found letters by Saddam's son Uday in one of Uday's palaces in Baghdad:

In a 1990 letter, Uday reveals that his father plans to create a greater Iraq that includes Kuwait, Palestine and Arabstan, a region of Iran historically controlled by Baghdad. The note says Saddam is beginning with the easiest – Kuwait.

“Palestine”, huh? We doubt that he can have meant just the West Bank and Gaza...

The contiguity of the relevant territories suggests that Saddam favoured the original League of Nations Mandate meaning of the term ‘Palestine’ which included today's Jordan. Which puts an interesting light on his devotion to the cause of the “liberation of Palestine”.

Sun, 04/13/2003 - 14:35 | permalink

Do you think they're in Syria...

Do you think they're in Syria? Is the US going to invade Syria next? What about Iran having nuclear weapons capability in the near future? Can the US and the UK deal with all these threats? What about N. Korea?

by a reader on Tue, 04/15/2003 - 01:20 | reply

Alive?

Is he alive? If he is, why is he parading around Baghdad, as alleged on some Arab TV stations? If not, where did this video come from? Or why is a look-alike performing for him? If he is alive, where is he?

by a reader on Fri, 04/18/2003 - 13:09 | reply

Jopa

Nice try! <http://111111nogdr09gw-w.com> raspy 222222
[url=http://33333kosi-gds.com]333333[/url] Thanks for this, seriously.

by Jopa on Sun, 05/02/2010 - 13:22 | reply

Women in Qatar and Children in England

An interesting article about how women in Qatar are treated.

Upon arriving at Doha International Airport, as a 22-year-old American female coming as part of an ABCNEWS Nightline team to cover the then-imminent Iraq war, I took one glance around the baggage claim and realized that, apart from my fellow journalists, every woman was completely covered in the black abaya...

Women in Qatar now have the right to vote, drive, and pursue many career opportunities, but the restrictions of family and tradition, which are much stronger than any law, are still strong...

"It's not from the government. There is no law to ask you what to wear or what to do," said al-Malki. "But the people themselves, they have the choice. Everybody here in Qatar has the choice to do whatever they want. Even women."

They have a choice do they? Really? If they have a choice, why do they all do the same thing and why do they all choose to wear costumes that have such obvious practical, not to mention sartorial, disadvantages?

Well, presumably there are a few women who wear abayas because they enjoy it. There must be many who think that God will punish them if they don't. Many do it because people they care about will put psychological pressure on them or punish them if they don't wear abayas. Many do it because their fathers or husbands will hurt them (or plain force them) if they don't, and hurting women against their will is legal in Qatar. There may be some who wear abayas because nobody has told them that there is no longer a law requiring them to do so. So the lack of a law banning something does not in itself make it genuinely possible to choose to do it.

Similarly, there is no law in England requiring children to go to school and yet most of them do go. A few go because they enjoy it. Many go because their parents will put psychological pressure on them or punish them if they don't go. Some go because their parents will hurt them (or plain force them) if they don't, and hurting children is legal in England. Most children and most parents are not aware that there is no legal requirement to go to school. Even where a child does know that playing truant is legal (for the child), the police often treat truancy exactly as if it were a crime, using force to prevent it. The lack of any law in England requiring children to go to school doesn't provide much help for many children who don't want to go, because most adults are determined to get children to go to school regardless of whether they want or not, and regardless of whether it is legally compulsory or not.

Mon, 04/14/2003 - 15:50 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Legally

This paragraph seems misleading:

The lack of any law in England requiring children to go to school doesn't provide much help for many children who don't want to go, because most adults are determined to get children to go to school regardless of whether they want or not, and regardless of whether it is legally compulsory or not.

You seem to imply that children may legally come and go to and from school as they please but that is not true. If a child is registered at school, the parent has a legal obligation to ensure that they attend regularly. This explains why parents of kids registered at school might want to get them to school. Only if the child is NOT registered is it legal for the parents not to make them go.

by a reader on Mon, 04/14/2003 - 20:47 | reply

Deregistration is available on demand

<http://www.education-otherwise.org/Legal/Deregistration.htm>

by David Deutsch on Mon, 04/14/2003 - 21:20 | reply

Yes but your article implied ...

Yes but your article implied that even if you're not deregistered it's still legal for the parents not to make the kid attend school and that's not true.

by a reader on Tue, 04/15/2003 - 01:16 | reply

Women in Qatar

I am a Canadian woman living in Qatar and I would like to provide an alternative perspective on wearing the Abaya. Did you know that I and many other non-muslim and non-qatari women wear them on occasion? It is especially helpful when driving in a country with a very high accident rate. There is a lot more respect given by both qataris and non-qataris alike to the local women who are easily identified by the way they dress. Yes - some may even be afraid to offend or hurt them! Given that this is the case, wouldn't you prefer to assimilate into this society?

I originally bought my abaya on a trip to UAE when I was being hassled by men thinking that I was a quick and available western woman. But now that I have it, I am very practical about wearing it when I want to. I do thank the government in Qatar that I am not required to wear it and that I can choose my dress.

Before you make judgements upon arriving in the airport with very harsh views, please stop to take some time to understand ALL facets of what might be going on.. Also realize, that you can't tell which locals are NOT following the crowds because they blend in with the rest of us.

by a reader on Wed, 11/10/2004 - 08:35 | reply

Rational vs Irrational Anarchism

On a mission deep in enemy territory, we discovered this Anti-state.com article by Lee McCracken, called Two Kinds of Anarchy.

McCracken outlines two broad schools of thought that, he thinks, all anarchists fit into. He calls them voluntarism and liberationist.

[Voluntarism] holds that while the state is evil and illegitimate, it does serve certain useful and important functions, however inadequately. Chief among these is the maintenance of some semblance of just law and order. Anarchists of this persuasion tend to have a pessimistic (they would say realistic) view of human nature similar to that expounded by the philosopher Thomas Hobbes. According to Hobbes, human beings are fundamentally self-interested – they seek their own advantage, even to the detriment of others.

Such statements of human nature make no sense. Human beings make choices according to their (conscious or unconscious) ideas. So either human nature, in certain situations, prevents humans from making choices and controls them, or it is a statement about our ideas. However, we can change our ideas. The notion that some unexplained, nonphysical mechanism controls our behavior in some extensive but undefined class of situations, and that this mechanism contains knowledge of what 'self-interest' is, is pure mysticism.

Besides that, since when is self-interest divergent from morality?

The other defining bit on voluntarism states:

The idea is that since human beings are not going to achieve dramatic moral improvement any time soon, the existence and enforcement of rules necessary for common life has to be reconciled with human freedom.

In other words, voluntarists see laws as a necessary evil. Because humans are bad, they must be controlled by law, but because freedom is good, we should still strive to maximise it. And these goals are contradictory and must be balanced.

But are rules really a threat to freedom? No. To see why, imagine two people with a chess set, but no rules. They might try to have a nice time with the board and pieces, but in itself, moving figures around on coloured squares has quite limited appeal. Now add rules to the picture – limits on what can legitimately be done with the pieces – and the players may, if the rules are good, flourish. Rather than find their lives limited by these rules, they find them enriched. Not all rules are a mechanism to oppress people, rather they are a mechanism to create consent in human interactions. Which is useful for the simple reason that humans are different.

Rather than seeing a conflict between laws and freedom, rational people should see laws as a potential force for good – an aid to freedom.

Next, liberationist anarchism:

[Liberationist anarchism] sees human nature as essentially reasonable and tending toward social cooperation without the need of external sanctions. It deems authority and institutions to be impediments to the full flowering and development of individuals. For the liberationist, human beings are governed by reason, and rational individuals will be able to avoid conflict on their own.

Liberationists are no better than voluntarists in their view of human nature; although they pick a more optimistic one, the above criticism still applies, namely that there isn't really such a thing. Furthermore, in a liberationist's warped view, our chess players would still be better off without rules. Why? Because liberationists think that rules are an impediment to the full flowering and development of the players. If only they weren't so constrained, they would promptly discover an even better game than chess!

However, creating fulfilling, consensual interactions is not a matter of good intentions or fiat. Rather, it requires knowledge and creativity. And therefore, for all practical purposes, it requires tradition. It would be folly to begin every discussion from first principles (including, we suppose, working out a language to use from scratch).

Fortunately, there is actually another kind of anarchist: a rational one. Rational anarchists respect the valuable knowledge that exists in current traditions, and wish for gradual improvement. They know that every function of government can, in the limit, be privatised, but also know that such a change, rather than being the difference between a bad society and a good one, will only be one step among many on the endless road of evolution.

Mon, 04/14/2003 - 23:25 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

You said: are rules really...

You said:

are rules really a threat to freedom? No. To see why, imagine two people with a chess set, but no rules. They might try to have a nice time with the board and pieces, but in itself, moving figures around on coloured squares has quite limited appeal. Now add rules to the picture ♦ limits on what can legitimately be done with the pieces ♦ and the players may, if the rules are good, flourish. Rather than find their lives limited by these rules, they find them enriched. Not all rules are a mechanism to oppress people, rather they are a mechanism to create consent in human interactions. Which is useful for the simple reason that humans are different. Rather than seeing a conflict between laws and freedom, rational people should see laws as a potential force for good ♦ an aid to freedom.

This raises the issue of when rules are rational and when they are merely anti-rational impediments to the furtherance of intellectual and emotional flourishing. How do we tell the difference?

by a reader on Tue, 04/15/2003 - 01:12 | reply

Which Rules Are Rational?

I think the right approach is to look not at the content of the rule, but at how it was created and what tradition it is a part of. (Content can be a rough indicator too -- arbitrary (not false!) rules tend to be bad.) Rules that are part of rational traditions, rules that are open to criticism and evolution, are fine even if rather false. And unquestionable rules, created by fiat or dice, even if mostly true, are bad.

It's important to note that two rules, that say the same thing, may not be equally good. For example, imagine one company decrees that all employees must eat lunch from 12-12:30 exactly, and no other systems may be considered, and lots of people are resentful, and the management doesn't listen to complaints. Then imagine another company, where the employees found they would get back from lunch at different times, and this was making them less efficient, and in an effort to improve productivity by better coordinating everyone's schedule, a lunch time rule, from 12-12:30 is created. Same rule, different value.

-- Elliot Temple
<http://curi.blogspot.com/>

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 04/15/2003 - 06:24 | reply

Anarchists are boneheads

Actually it was a good post. But please drop the word "anarchist"!!!! "Real" anarchists (and they will blab for hours explaining it to you) are leftist/marxist/communist/socialist/anti-capitalist/etc etc. As you describe in the post, "fake" anarchists - market-anarchists, etc - are also a crock. why in heavens would a LIBERTARIAN want to be associated with these trash?

by a reader on Tue, 04/15/2003 - 11:28 | reply

Anarchism is a fine word

Why would you trust someone dumb enough to be a marxist/communist/socialist/anti-capitalist to be an authority on what "anarchist" means???

See this FAQ for a discussion of this dispute as well as other aspects of anarcho-capitalism.

by Gil on Tue, 04/15/2003 - 17:27 | reply

yeah then read the Anarchist FAQ

So what? There many dueling faqs out there on the true meaning of the word "anarchist." The mere fact that socialists use it means it is soiled, just like the word "liberal" has been. "Libertarian" is somewhat more clean -- though many during this war have chosen to stink it up.

Really the labels are less important than the ideas, but it is the case that "market anarchists" seem more hip to prove their anarchy than to espouse anything resembling Liberty. Hence they are un-libertarian boneheads.

by a reader on Tue, 04/15/2003 - 18:24 | reply

Some thoughts by (I)An-ok

I am of the belief that anarchism is against being against any and all forms of authority and domination, ie, systemic forms of coercion (TCS definition - <http://www.tcs.ac/FAQ/FAQShortGlossary.html>). And as a result of which, it is naturally opposed to all forms of the State, capitalism, coercive parenting, etc, because authority exists within these. It is not opposed to these because they are the State, capitalism, etc., it is opposed to these because of the authority and domination within them.

As far as anarchism being "libertarian", I would say that it is very much so, in the small-"L" sense of the term. Anarchism is all about individual liberty - individual liberty goes hand-in-hand with non-coercion.

by AnarchoTCS on Thu, 04/17/2003 - 14:27 | reply

If you are against all author...

If you are against all authority and any form of coercion in principle, then the rational position to hold is to be for government as it stands in the West. The reason is that Western Democracy/Capitalism is the best system known to man for facilitating freedom. Furthermore, it contains within its tradition, a capacity to improve and to become progressively less coercive, less authoritarian, less statist...If you care about this, there really isn't any alternative.

by a reader on Thu, 04/17/2003 - 14:57 | reply

Being against all authority means all authority

I don't see how one can be against all authority and domination and still support any kind of authority-based system. Whether it be "Western Democracy/Capitalism", or any other government or authority system in the world, it is STILL an authority-based system. If one is against all authority, then one is against all authority - full stop.

For anarchists, there's no playing favorites, there's no half-assed attempts, there's no compromises, there's no capitulation - the whole damn "authority" thing has gotta go.

"If you care about this, there really isn't any alternative."

Maybe that's how things seem for you, but I see a whole world of possibilities out there just waiting to be played with.

by AnarchoTCS on Sat, 04/19/2003 - 00:30 | reply

Why be against all authority?

What is it about authority that makes it always bad?

Why is it bad to voluntarily participate in a project where more decision-making authority is given to some people than to others so as to help the entire project progress and succeed?

If this works, by the lights of everyone involved, better than all of their alternatives, why would you want to deny them this option? And how could you stop them from doing this without exercising the bad sort of authority?

I think you've chosen the wrong enemy in "authority". Perhaps coercion would be a better target.

by Gil on Sat, 04/19/2003 - 21:57 | reply

Good comments, but slightly off

I think you slightly misinterpreted what I was getting at here. The "voluntarist" does not see rules as a necessary evil, but necessary, simpliciter. There is, in my view, no such thing as a necessary evil. In fact, I quote C.S. Lewis to the effect that "There cannot be a common life without a regula. The alternative to rule is not freedom but the... tyranny of the most selfish member." Rules are, in my view, a positive good that make civilized life possible.

The constraints of human nature that I identified with the voluntarist position is simply that self-interested individuals will sometimes seek to defect from cooperation and that rules (or laws if you like) are necessary to act as a check upon their actions. This is because there will always be people a) whose rational self-interest is served by taking advantage of their fellows and/or b) who simply do not act out of enlightened self-interest, but wanton impulse. I take this to be a fact about human beings that, at least under present conditions, is ineradicable. This is not an appeal to "nonphysical" invisible entities, but simply empirical observation.

Cheers,

Lee McCracken

by a reader on Tue, 04/22/2003 - 17:26 | reply

Epistemology Is Neat

It's not possible to observe explanations.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://curi.blogspot.com/>

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 04/23/2003 - 04:32 | reply

Look I Wrote More

To be a bit clearer, the notion that the things you observed are because of human nature is an explanation that you didn't actually observe, you just made up.

And also, you seemed to have missed the point that attributing personality to "human nature" is nonsense.

And also, the idea that there will necessarily always be people who intentionally, wrongly hurt others for their own gain, is either the idea that morality does not exist, or some sort of strange theory about the impossibility of progress.

And also, what's acting out of "wanton impulse"? Doesn't it just mean having a certain collection of personality traits (theories)? Don't you know that any particular theory is not a necessary part of the world?

-- Elliot Temple

<http://curi.blogspot.com/>

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 04/23/2003 - 05:37 | reply

Not quite there

No, you're missing the point. "Human Nature" in this instance is not a hypothetical entity that purports to explain phenomena--it just is those phenomena. "Human nature" is just shorthand for those traits that human beings exhibit (or tend to exhibit). In this case, acting with disregard for the rights of others.

If assuming, in constructing any hypothetical anarchist social arrangements, that these traits will always be with us means denying Progress--at least inevitable Progress--then, so much the worse for Progress.

Acting out of wanton impulse just means acting without regard to one's enlightened or long-term self interest (as when someone commits a crime where the likelihood of getting away with it is nil-- which happens all the time, or acting irrationally on a momentary impulse--so-called crimes of passion, etc.). Children and animals are the paradigm cases, but many adults exhibit this kind of behavior as well.

Lee McCracken

by a reader on Wed, 04/23/2003 - 17:49 | reply

First get a theory of the mind, then talk about minds

Personality/behavioral traits = theories/ideas = totally changeable = no reason to think they will "always be with us"

btw, how do you plan to get to an anarchist society? isn't the basic route to change people's personalities (theories) by espousing anarchist ideas? and if that can work, why can't espousing good moral ideas work?

-- Elliot Temple
<http://curi.blogspot.com/>

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 04/23/2003 - 21:54 | reply

A=A after all...

You seem to be embracing a form of extreme nominalism wherein one cannot make any generalizations about the behavior of classes of entities.

I take it as obvious that humans have (within admittedly wide parameters) an enduring cluster of traits/capacities/dispositions to behavior. That's what makes them things of a particular kind, after all. And it's far from obvious that personality traits can be equated with ideas. One's personality is far more than just ideas; it's also a function of biology, heredity and environment (among other things). They are not "totally changeable."

I suspect an anarchist society, were it ever to come about, would require a critical mass of people to be convinced of the basic soundness of anarchist ideas. But this by no means requires a society of saints.

--Lee McCracken

by a reader on Thu, 04/24/2003 - 00:10 | reply

Subject Lines Are Fun

Errr, ok, I get that you don't like my theory of minds (that personality traits are ideas/theories), but can you present a coherent one of your own please? One that explains stuff, and doesn't violate our theories of physics, logic, or epistemology.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://curi.blogspot.com/>

by Elliot Temple on Thu, 04/24/2003 - 00:29 | reply

Rejecting rules

Just like most people who're born into a religion and somehow get convinced that is the only right religion, [i'm not atheist btw], most people also get inculcated with systems of power from the time they're born.

Case in point: blind respect for parents as opposed to anyone in the same age group, respect by age, respect and subservience to religious leaders and omniscient omnipotent God/s.

Govts are no less. They play god all the time. Anarchy then is the flawed utopia. A system of power sets up the entire infrastructure, but after that, even without centralised power, people will just carry on their normal way of life.

The problem with using chess set rules to talk about reality is that there is no iterative prisoner's dilemma inherent in chess. But that is the sort of game we've been playing throughout the evolutionary cycle. It's not win or lose, some people go by the motto, "if I'm going down, I'm taking you with me." that behaviour is NOT seen in chess. There is never thoughts of collateral damage. Ideally every move is for maximal effect, immediately or in the long term.

The problem with using vanilla rule sets to describe an imperfect authority is very clear in the penal system for example. Murder is individually wrong, but as a govt they own your life sufficiently to decide to take it away?

Criminals have little to stop them from committing crime except the veiled threat of legal punishment, but once they're caught, the system actually protects them! Free food, good clothes, safety from grieving relatives. Imagine this happening in a live and let live world. No purchase.

<http://iandravid.wordpress.com/2008/03/22/think-anonymously/>

by iandravid on Sat, 03/22/2008 - 03:57 | reply

Cargo Cult Politics

When Europeans came into contact with the people of the Southern Pacific islands, they brought with them many goods which were, from the point of view of the islanders, so technologically advanced, and so desirable, as to appear magical. After the Europeans left, the natives wanted them to come back with more of the goods. This led to the religious practices known as cargo cults, which later gained new impetus because of World War Two when large quantities of supplies were frequently dumped, abandoned, or washed up on Pacific shores. In one cult in Papua New Guinea in 1942 the islanders set up fake armies with fake officers and dummy equipment in the hope that it would turn into real equipment. In another, on the island of Tanna, cultists built fake landing strips with control towers and warehouses and so on, in the hope that planes would land there. Of course, the problem with all this is that it imitated only the form, not the substance of what wealth creation is really all about.

The physicist Richard Feynman pointed out that many scientists have a cargo-cult attitude towards scientific knowledge. There is a similar and fairly widespread habit in politics, practised by people whom one might call cargo cult politicians.

Many dictatorships nowadays have elections and parliaments that ape the form of Western liberal democracy with embarrassing crudeness, while behind the scenes people are beaten and tortured and the ballot papers only have one name on them. Socialist governments think that if only they order the construction of factories and hospitals and employ doctors and teachers, just as free people would in a free economy, they can achieve what free economies do – only better, because after all, it's fairer isn't it? Some libertarians think that a free market and small government (or no government) are the sole criteria of a free society (and so many of them blithely force their children to go to school, do chores, and generally obey their every whim). Such people are best described as libertarian statists, partly because it annoys them, but mainly because they are convinced that it is the malevolent State, rather than bad authoritarian ideas and lack of knowledge, that is the basic obstacle to human progress. So they want to mimic the form of a future society in the hope that the substance will magically follow.

Just as participants in a cargo cult didn't understand how much complexity is required to produce technological goods, what is missing in all these cases is an understanding of the complexity of the human condition.

Just as the people of the cargo cults sooner or later get bored and angry about the world's complexity and its failure to fit their unrealistic expectations, so the cargo cult politicians nurse a grudge against a civilisation that does not fit their preconceptions. They deny or sneer at its achievements and become cynical, twisted, and bitter. We have much more sympathy with those who appreciate the greatness of what the West has achieved – even those with whom we have substantial disagreements – than with any of the cargo cult politicians, regardless of what ideals they profess.

Tue, 04/15/2003 - 18:34 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Vision and Serious Work

In one sense, adopting the form of something and then hoping it will lead to the substance of the thing following on, makes sense. It is a form of conjecture. So, as you say, the problem with cargo cultism is not form-emulation but failure to do the work of making the vision come true; expecting it to happen all on its own by magic.

People might approach any school of knowledge, including TCS, with a cargo cult mentality, thinking that all they have to do is make one imaginative and intellectual leap (the paradigm shift) and their family futures will be bright and easy. But the process of building the future is likely to be more complex and difficult the more deep the paradigm shift: in other words, the most promising institutions are also the most demanding! Compared with forcing change revolutionary-style, or waiting for magic to occur, painstaking piecemeal knowledge-growth is very hard work indeed.

So, what if we have an exciting new vision, and are convinced that it is good, but lack the knowledge of how to bring it about? If neither institution-smashing nor reliance on the supernatural are viable, where do we begin?

The best approach would seem to be to hold the vision in mind, maintaining consciousness of its fantasy status, and then begin the process of conjecture and refutation of the many piecemeal ideas that might move us towards that vision. Individual moral choices must be made on the way, with reference to our vision, which should be constantly checked and adjusted as new information throws new light on its right or wrongness. A big conjecture can only be tested by a process of lots of other smaller ones plus their interactions with the big one. Growth is complicated.

Any idiot can be a backseat Prime Minister. But if a person is not prepared to undertake the work required actually to get into government, growing ideas is all the political change he can achieve. So he had better have some faith in the institutions he is working from within: otherwise, according to his own thinking, all that work will have been pointless. Which seems an immoral waste of time.

http://libertarian_parent_in_the_countryside.blogspot.com/

by Alice on Wed, 04/16/2003 - 11:25 | reply

Copyright © 2008 Setting The World To Rights

What Are These Sanctions For?

The Weasels' vengeful fury against the Iraqi people for the crime of being freed by America is still increasing:

diplomats who for many years have called for the sanctions imposed in 1990 in the wake of Iraq's invasion of Kuwait to be lifted are now calling for a delay.

What? So, let's get this straight:

- Saddam's in power: they want sanctions lifted.
- Saddam's deposed: they want sanctions to remain, until...

Until what?

They say the restrictions should remain until the UN certifies that Iraq is free of WMDs.

In other words the UN is still malevolently seeking control, still holding innocent people to ransom until it gets it, and still using its utterly unmerited jurisdiction over legitimacy as a weapon.

Remind us again – what good do these bastards do?

Fri, 04/18/2003 - 12:07 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

UN

What good does the UN do? It provides legitimacy for the policies of the US and the UK sometimes. If it does no good, why do they keep sucking up to it? They need it, they's why.

by a reader on Fri, 04/18/2003 - 13:00 | reply

legitimacy

Many Americans, and even more Brits, have jumped on to the "legitimacy" bandwagon, eager to proclaim the pure altruism inherent in any proclamation made by a sophisticated European, who understands the importance of "transnational cooperation" and "international law". That is one big reason why politicians who know better find it expedient to suck up and pay lip-service. They don't have to mean anything by it, but why incur needless wrath from weasels at home? The UN only confers "legitimacy" to the extent that people around the world believe in the fantasy. Currently, our best shot at discerning the actual legitimacy of a country is whether or not the US supports it consistently.

by Daniel Strimpel on Fri, 04/18/2003 - 22:44 | reply

UN 'Legitimacy'

To make things even clearer. The UN is an unelected and unaccountable body that sponsors terrorism. There is no sense in which its opinions are any kind of determinant of what is morally right.

by Alan Forrester on Fri, 04/18/2003 - 23:15 | reply

Washington Post's Disturbing Hostility to Daniel Pipes

A thread on LGF discusses President Bush's appointment of Daniel Pipes to the Board of the new Institute of Peace. The moderate (i.e. anti-idiotarian) Islamic Pakistan Today, wholeheartedly approves:

American Muslims welcome the nomination of Daniel Pipes, a scholar of militant Islam and director of the Middle East Forum, by President Bush to serve on the board of the US Institute of Peace. They note in particular his care to distinguish between the minority of Islamists and the majority of normal, patriotic Muslims.

Many moderate American Muslims, frustrated by and angry at the extremist policies of militant Islamist organizations in the US and their efforts to portray themselves as the sole voice of Islam, have welcomed the nomination of Daniel Pipes

So do we. By contrast, the Washington Post condemns the choice:

Many Muslims received the news that the White House had nominated scholar Daniel Pipes to, of all places, the U.S. Institute of Peace as sort of a cruel joke.

It urges Congress to rescind the appointment, accusing Pipes of seeming to harbor a "disturbing hostility to contemporary Muslims."

Consider the logic of these two opposite spins on what American Muslims think. If Pakistan Today is right, then the WaPo is opposing moderate Muslims and siding with "militant Islamist organizations in the US and their efforts to portray themselves as the sole voice of Islam". If the WaPo is right, then the American Muslims quoted in Pakistan Today's editorial are themselves extremists: Muslims with a disturbing hostility to contemporary Muslims? But they characterise most contemporary American Muslims as "normal" and "patriotic". Hmm.

Oh, of course! They are guilty of the most unforgivable of all extremisms: support for the US Government.

UPDATE: The editor of Pakistan Today protests in a letter to the Washington Post:

At best, your editorial confuses Pipes's opposition to militant Islam with opposition to Islam as a whole. At worst, it reduces all Muslim opinion to an enthusiasm for a totalitarian form of the religion. Fortunately, a broader spectrum of Muslim opinion exists. Unfortunately, many anti-militant Muslims do not speak out, fearful of retribution even in the United States.

Sun, 04/20/2003 - 10:38 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

York University

It is interesting to note that when Daniel Pipes was invited to speak at York University, certain student groups violently prevented him from doing so on the grounds that he was a "racist", "nazi", "bigot" and no doubt in whispers "Jew". Determined not to become another Concordia (Concordia students had recently made violent attacks on Benjamin Netanyahu and sabotaged his visit. He was unable to speak and sent away) York hired armed security guards, mounted police and set up metal detectors so that Pipes could speak to a small group of students who had bought their tickets months earlier. Even then protestors were right outside the door. What is Pipes' crime? That's right, it will sound familiar: he supports Israel.

by Daniel Strimpel on Sun, 04/20/2003 - 18:39 | reply

York University in the UK

To Daniel Strimpel:

Are you referring to York University in the UK? If so, when did this happen?

by a reader on Sun, 04/20/2003 - 18:45 | reply

York University in Canada

I think it was at York University in Toronto, Canada. In January, 2003.

by Gil on Sun, 04/20/2003 - 21:17 | reply

Not that one...

He's referring to this York University, in Toronto.

by a reader on Sun, 04/20/2003 - 21:21 | reply

York Canada

Yes its the Canadian one. I think Pipes has a write up on it either on his home page www.danielpipes.org or his admirable www.campus-watch.org. Its also worth noting that Pipes, along with Martin Kramer (www.martinkramer.org) are at the forefront of diagnosing the state of Middle East Studies at American Universities. IMO they are both right on the mark.

by Daniel Strimpel on Sun, 04/20/2003 - 23:18 | reply

Good Article

This is such a good article of his. The guy has real insight.

by a reader on Tue, 04/22/2003 - 15:04 | reply

Now Look Here, Mr Blunkett

David Blunkett, the UK Home Secretary, is blind. No, really, he's literally blind: he takes a seeing-eye dog into the House of Commons with him and everything. Admirable, and it's in no way his fault that this makes it somewhat difficult to criticise him for a certain range of political defects: lack of vision, short-sightedness ... and now – well, what is this but sheer blindness?

Everyone in Britain will have to pay around £25 for a compulsory identity card under proposals being put to the cabinet by David Blunkett, the Home Secretary ...

While forcing people to pay for the card could add to the anticipated objections from human rights campaigners, Mr Blunkett believes that concern about national security is sufficient to ensure that individuals will be prepared to bear the cost.

Mr Blunkett is confident that he can win support for the idea of a compulsory card even though previous ministers have failed.

Can't he see what's going to happen? Ought not someone take him aside and explain that it doesn't matter how many times he proposes such a measure, we are still going to reject it? Just as we have every time since 1952, following a 1951 ruling:

LORD GODDARD, Willcock v. Muckle, 26 June 1951.
Decision that led to Parliament's repeal of National ID card in 1952, it is obvious that the police now, as a matter of routine, demand the production of national registration indemnity cards whenever they stop or interrogate a motorist for whatever cause. Of course, if they are looking for a stolen car or have reason to believe that a particular motorist is engaged in committing a crime, that is one thing, but to demand a national registration identity card from all and sundry, for instance, from a lady who may leave her car outside a shop longer than she should, or some trivial matter of that sort, is wholly unreasonable.

This Act was passed for security purposes, and not for the purposes for which, apparently, it is now sought to be used. To use Acts of Parliament, passed for particular purposes during war, in times when the war is past, except that technically a state of war exists, tends to turn law-abiding subjects into lawbreakers, which is a most undesirable state of affairs. Further, in this country we have always prided ourselves on the good feeling that exists between the police and the public and such action tends to make the people resentful of the acts of the police and inclines them to obstruct the police instead of to assist them

...

They ought not to use a Security Act, which was passed for a particular purpose, as they have done in this case.

We agree. We have no objection to special wartime security measures where they are merited. But these are not merited, nor are they special wartime security measures. They are a piece of totalitarian nanny-state legislation, brazenly proposed under cover of the present emergency. This is shameful.

Tue, 04/22/2003 - 04:13 | permalink

Who's the blind one here?

I agree that ID cards would be a bad thing, but are you really saying they are not going to be brought in regardless? This flies in the face of all the evidence. Are you looking at the British government through rose-tinted spectacles? At what point do the British people get to say no? We're not going to have a referendum, are we? Isn't it inevitable that we'll get them?

by a reader on Tue, 04/22/2003 - 13:30 | reply

Two Modest Proposals

Here are two modest proposals which, after all, are not more inconsistent than an "entitlement card" which is not compulsory, but which will save you getting into a lot of trouble with the police when you don't carry it. My first proposal is that it be really an entitlement card, i.e, that it actually entitles you to be a citizen, that is, that it entitles you to carry a revolver. (A special law would be required to forbid policemen from carrying guns, as was the case during the few years following the creation of the New York City police: the normal situation is indeed that sovereign citizens be armed and state agents be not.) The second proposal is that the state finance itself exclusively with entitlement cards by charging, say, 6,400 pounds per card. After all, if the people want it, they will be willing to pay for it.

(The U.K GDP is 950 billion pounds. The tyrant's revenues are about 380 billion (i.e., 40% of GDP). With a population of 59,000,000 we get 6,400 pounds per capita.)

Pierre Lemieux <http://www.pierrelemieux.org>

by Pierre Lemieux on Tue, 04/22/2003 - 13:36 | reply

Who's the blind one?

are you really saying they are not going to be brought in regardless? This flies in the face of all the evidence. Are you looking at the British government through rose-tinted spectacles? At what point do the British people get to say no? We're not going to have a referendum, are we? Isn't it inevitable that we'll get them?

Sure, it's been inevitable for the last 51 years and it will continue to be inevitable for the next 51 million.

Look, people, we need to learn some method of analysis of political events beyond "help, the evil government must irresistibly grow and grow and we're all doomed, doomed I tell you."

by a reader on Tue, 04/22/2003 - 17:01 | reply

The European Factor

Sharp-eyed Steven Den Beste has spotted an embarrassing side-effect of using an ordinateur instead of a computer.

Tue, 04/22/2003 - 16:28 | permalink

Not Venal, Evil

The hilarious news that the ever-odious George Galloway might have been – gasp – being paid larger sums of money per year than some of us have seen in a lifetime, by Saddam Hussein, has been described as “thrilleresque” by Glenn Reynolds on Instapundit, as “a bombshell” by Andrew Sullivan, and as “an impressive scoop” by Malcolm Hutty on samizdata.net. And now the Guardian is reporting that Galloway is going to sue.

But in all this excitement about Galloway's possible hypocrisy and fall from political grace, let's not forget the real issue here. George Galloway is an unfailing spokesman and advocate for evil, and whether or not he was bribed is a mere side issue. If the vile things he has done and said in connection with Israel, Iraq, and so on, were in fact right, there would be nothing morally reprehensible about taking money for them. As we have said, if a thing is worth doing, it is worth doing at a profit. By concentrating on the bribery issue, we are letting the likes of Galloway off far too lightly. So instead of saying darkly, as Malcolm Hutty does – [N]ow it appears that [Galloway] was motivated by pure greed rather than just a love of controversy.

...[H]e was giving aid and comfort to the enemy for personal gain.

– which risks sounding as though we agree with our anti-capitalist opponents that seeking personal gain is a bad thing, let's remember to speak out against sin, not the wages of sin.

Tue, 04/22/2003 - 18:22 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Treason

I think Hutty's main point was that Galloway's action amounts to treason.

by a reader on Tue, 04/22/2003 - 20:29 | reply

But they say they're against greed

The reason it's worth mentioning that anti-war activists may have been motivated by greed, is that that's what they profess to despise about the pro-war leaders. It's one of their major arguments for opposing the war.

So, not only are they completely wrong about the facts of the case, but they're hypocritical as well. Even they don't believe what they're saying. They clearly just say things to win supporters, not because they believe them.

Being wrong and vocal on life-and-death issues is bad enough. Being wrong and knowing that you don't believe what you're saying is particularly vile.

by Gil on Tue, 04/22/2003 - 21:05 | reply

Hypocrisy

Hypocrisy is the only thing immoral people can criticize in others, because it is the only vice that you can judge in the absence of a good sense of morality yourself.

by Chris on Wed, 04/23/2003 - 19:37 | reply

I disagree somewhat with the post.

If the vile things he has done and said in connection with Israel, Iraq, and so on, were in fact right, there would be nothing morally reprehensible about taking money for them.

That's true, but if he was saying those things because he was being paid, then he was in fact wrong to say them. Even more wrong than if he was saying them because he believed them, yet he was wrong in his belief.

David Schneider-Joseph

President, Americans for a Society Free from Age Restrictions
Chief, Tewata

by DavidSJ on Wed, 04/23/2003 - 22:42 | reply

To my constituents

What will he say to his long-suffering constituents? How will he wriggle out of this one?

by Sylvia Crombie on Thu, 04/24/2003 - 01:50 | reply

Galloway

There is, of course, the glaring hypocrisy. It is, after all, we on the right that are portrayed as greedy.

It is an interesting question of why those who proclaim their concern for the innocent citizens of Iraq so loudly fought so hard to keep the prisons, torture chambers and rape squads in business.

The horrors of the Baathist Regime were hardly secret, there must be a reason that so many fought so hard to let it continue, undisturbed. For at least one of the leaders of this movement, we may have found the reason.

It would be interesting to have a long hard look at the books of organisations like ANSWER.

I am rather uncomfortable with the newspeople going through those records found in Iraq. I'd be much happier if it were the FBI, CIA and the Brit SIS, with help from the IRS.

Much of the rank and file of the 'peace' movement is made up of what Lenin called the useful idiots, I do wonder how the leaders finance their lifestyles and travels.

by Peter W. Davis on Sun, 04/27/2003 - 04:04 | reply

Setting The World To Rights

Ideas have consequences.

home | archives | polls | search

Link to The World

Feel free to use one of the following buttons when linking to Setting The World to Rights on your site. If you would like a different size or have some other request, let us know: theworld@settingtheworldtorights.com. For your convenience, the dimensions are included (wxh, pixels).

- 166x98

- 180x96

- 200x117

- 250x130

- 280x150

- 300x156

Tue, 04/22/2003 - 21:18 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Setting The World To Rights

Ideas have consequences.

Poll: What Will Be Found First?

Following the Coalition's victory in Iraq, what is going to be found first? Vote in our new poll in the sidebar on the right.

Saddam Hussein: Saddam is captured alive or found dead by Coalition forces and this is verified by DNA matching.

Baghdad Bob: aka Comical Ali, aka Mohammed Saeed al-Sahaf, the former Iraqi Minister of Information, is captured alive, found dead, or appears in public in a new job.

The 'smoking gun': Nuclear, biological or chemical weapons, or incontrovertible evidence that they were recently destroyed or smuggled out, are found in Iraq. (N.B. a barking moonbat being able to utter the words "that evidence was planted by the Evil Bush Administration" does not count as making the evidence "controvertible", nor does shrieking "but the US and Israel have WMD too!")

The quagmire: It is found that far from having ended swiftly, the war turns out to be another Vietnam, naturally covered up by the US and UK governments.

Janeane Garofalo's apology: Well you never know...

None of the above will ever be found: Well – never is a long time. Say, a year from now.

Wed, 04/23/2003 - 17:42 | permalink

Which one?

How do we know they have the DNA of the Real Saddam Hussein?

by a reader on Wed, 04/23/2003 - 19:15 | reply

It's all a big lie, I tell you!

They won't find anything. The whole thing is one big conspiracy dreamed up by the Jews/US government/aliens/anti-Libertarians/kids to overthrow The Powers The Be and become the preeminent Big Brother State which will take YOUR money.

I've made up my mind. Don't confuse me with facts.

Me? Paranoid?

by Chris on Wed, 04/23/2003 - 19:17 | reply

DNA

"How do we know they have the DNA of the Real Saddam Hussein?"

I read somewhere that they got a sample from Dan Rather's blue dress.

by a reader on Wed, 04/23/2003 - 22:26 | reply

Quagmire

When I saw that the quagmire option had some votes, I thought people were kidding... until I received an email saying "Don't be so sure it won't be another Vietnam." Hel-lo?

by Sylvia Crombie on Thu, 04/24/2003 - 01:55 | reply

IT seems none of the above

According to the globe and mail, Bagdad Bob tried to surrender and was turned down!

by a reader on Sat, 05/03/2003 - 15:31 | reply

Not yet decided

Bagdad Bob tried to surrender and was turned down!

That doesn't count. For Mr Sahaf to win, he has to be captured alive, found dead, or appear in public in a new job. For 'none of the above' to win, a year has to pass.

by Editor on Sat, 05/03/2003 - 15:56 | reply

Hello

Can I be of any assistance?

by Hindsight on Sat, 05/20/2006 - 16:41 | reply

CHI flat irons are a very CHI flat irons are a very popular choice of hair straightener. The Farouk CHI flat iron was the first to have ceramic plates, making it a best seller. But are today's CHI flat irons any good or have they been eclipsed by other brands

FHI Flat Iron

FHI flat irons

HAI Flat Iron

HAI Flat Irons

Hana Salon Flat Iron

Croc Flat Iron

of flat iron?

You can still buy the original CHI ceramic flat iron. It's the cheapest model in the CHI range and falls into the medium priced category for flat irons. It comes with 1" ceramic plates, heats in seconds and is still a very good hair styling tool. But if you're by fesrefdsr on Sun, 06/13/2010 - 15:02 | reply

following includes ?Britney following includes ?Britney Spears, Jessica Alba, Mariah Carey, Mickey Rourke, Paris Hilton, Snoop Dogg, Chris Brown, Usher, Marilyn Manson, Madonna, Shakira, Ciara, Heidi Klum, T.I. & Jaime Foxx. His most recent ventures

wholesale Ed Hardy Jeans

wholesale Dunk SB Shoes

wholesale Tiffany wholesale True Religion jeans

wholesale Gucci Shirts

wholesale ED Hardy jeans

wholesale Coach shoes

wholesale Dior Shoes

china wholesale

Wholesale Jordan Shoes include the new Ed Hardy brand based on the work of Don Ed Hardy, Smet in unison with Johnny Hallyday, and his own namesake Christian Audigier. Christian Audigier has also teamed up with Patrick de Montepeyroux of

by fesrefdsr on Thu, 07/08/2010 - 12:29 | reply

Following the Coalition's victory, what will be found first?

Saddam Hussein

6% (15 votes)

Baghdad Bob

24% (55 votes)

The 'smoking gun';

39% (90 votes)

The quagmire

3% (7 votes)

Janeane Garofalo's apology

3% (6 votes)

None of the above will ever be found (or not in the next year)

25% (58 votes)

Total votes: 231

Wed, 04/23/2003 - 18:07 | permlink

Read this:

This is how we introduced this poll. It provides more information than the brief choices given in the actual poll.

by Sarah Fitz-Claridge on Mon, 06/16/2003 - 12:35 | login or register to post comments

Don't mind me

Just passing through

by Tumbleweed on Wed, 02/15/2006 - 02:27 | login or register to post comments

In The News...

BREAKING NEWS: Baghdad Bob to be given top job in the BBC. Spokesman for the BBC says they are honoured to have him on the team. "We appreciate his clear-eyed perspective on world events. Being a top BBC reporter requires a particular gift, and Mohammed Saeed al-Sahaf is amply qualified."

Wed, 04/23/2003 - 20:03 | permalink

Just wondering...

Have Bob al-Sahaf and Bob al-Fisk ever been seen together?

by Kevin on Wed, 04/23/2003 - 23:22 | reply

Ken Starr?

The one on the right looks just like Ken Clinton-Catcher Starr! And you're not trying to tell me that the one on the left is Our Friend The Iraqi Information Minister, are you? Baghdad Bob is much better looking.

I think he should get a job in PR -- for Janeane Garofalo.

by Sylvia Crombie on Thu, 04/24/2003 - 01:40 | reply

DNC

With the tremendous fundraising advantage the Republicans have, so far, in the upcoming election cycle the DNC may well be looking for a new National Chairman. Baghdad Bob would be a great choice.

by Peter W. Davis on Sun, 04/27/2003 - 04:09 | reply

Copyright © 2005 Setting The World To Rights

The Other Appeasement

Much has been written about the long history of appeasement of Saddam that eventually led to war. All Western countries bear some of the blame; yet there were some of them – ‘the Good Guys’ (hereinafter referred to as ‘us’) – that eventually rebelled against appeasement and insisted on opposing and ending the evil, while others – ‘the Weasels’ – did their utmost to have it continue.

But has it occurred to you that even as the Weasels were appeasing Saddam they were, at the same time, appeasing us?

Look at it from the Weasels’ point of view: Iraq invades Kuwait. A regrettable incident, and one very likely to ~~alarm every decent person in the world~~ provoke certain warmongers. So, the ~~appeasing Weasels~~ forces of moderation pretend to go along with the ~~liberation of Kuwait~~ cowboys’ cathartic acting-out, but as the price of their acquiescence they extract a promise that the ~~good guys~~ warmongers “have no further territorial ambitions” – i.e. will not liberate Iraq. This ensures ~~that no lasting good will have been done~~ stability. A classic appeasement manoeuvre, n'est ce pas?

But, as usually happens, though the appeasement seemed to work in the short run, it merely built up much more trouble for the future. No sooner did we fulfil the letter of our promise – incidentally betraying the thousands of Iraqis who tried to take that opportunity to liberate themselves – than our pesky cowboy demands started up again. First we demanded a surrender treaty requiring Iraq to give up all its weapons of mass destruction. Then it was Security Council Resolutions enforcing this, then no-fly zones, and so on inexorably through the years until eventually we could be appeased no more.

Every act of appeasement of the bad guys was also an act of appeasement of us. And it had the same effect on us: a sullen but temporary acquiescence. We were willing, for a while, to take the chance (however slim we considered it) that we could achieve our objectives by that method, and so not have to resort to war. But our objectives themselves did not change. How on earth could being appeased ever change anyone's objectives? So ours remained good, just as Saddam's remained bad, and the Weasels’ remained weasely. And inevitably it all unravelled, and in the end a few hundred thousand more people had been murdered than would have been if either we or Saddam had rejected the appeasers’ whiny siren song in the first place.

And here is a marked difference between this appeasement and classic appeasement: Chamberlain was trying to cope with the threat posed by Hitler. King Aethelred with that of the Vikings. They feared invasion, violence, oppression and the destruction of their liberties. Today's Weasels are trying to cope with us. Because they fear insignificance.

Fri, 04/25/2003 - 10:16 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

It's piecemeal social enginee...

It's piecemeal social engineering at work until it no longer works and would demand a dramatic action. Otherwise we would fall into the trap to go right toward the perfect end and risking ourselves into making a grave error.

Words can fool men but nature doesn't give a damn!

by Lan Nguyen on Fri, 04/25/2003 - 16:34 | reply

Appeasement works ...

only when acts of appeasement are expected to change the dynamics that lead to the undesired behavior. The Progressive and Civil Rights Movements might be examples in history, where giving concessions to those who demanded them ultimately mitigated these demands.

I guess my choice of example really reflects my belief that you can only appease, or deal with, reasonable people with just grievances.

by a reader on Sat, 05/03/2003 - 08:04 | reply

Proper Responses to Treachery

Mean Mr Mustard writes that the proper response to the treachery of the Russians, the Germans and probably the French is to threaten them as we would any tinpot dictatorship that threatened us:

But the stripe of betrayal that has become more and more evident in Russia's case (and may very well manifest itself in both France and Germany's dealings) is entirely different. In essence, they were giving material aid to an enemy engaged in trying to kill American soldiers. Russia shared vital intelligence with Iraq and even trained some of Saddam's thugs in espionage. And that's just the official actions of the government itself. It seems the dealings involving private Russian companies (with the tacit approval but plausible denial of the government) were much worse than that. Germany was apparently looking to get very friendly with the Iraqi secret service. What possible reason could animate the desire for such a relationship at this point except thwarting US forces?...

Such overtures could only, in my opinion, signal a willingness to aid Baghdad in physically hurting us while were actually engaged in battle...

If they want to act like Syria, then we should oblige them and have our Defense department making similar veiled threats. They're the ones who committed the actions indicative of such hostility. For us to not respond in at least a rhetorical fashion this instant is just wilful blindness on our part.

Syria is an evil tyranny, and as such has no internal mechanism to correct their policies and remove their leaders. Hence, when they do evil things that endanger us, there is no alternative to our making it clear that the leaders themselves will suffer if they do not mend their ways – ultimately by being deposed in a war and put on trial for their crimes. France, Germany and Russia are democracies. As such they do have the ability peacefully to change their policies and if necessary to get rid of Putin, Chirac and Schroeder. It is therefore appropriate to maintain peaceful relations with them.

Certainly, it is also appropriate that they should pay a price wherever possible. It is also imperative that the Americans cut them out of all diplomatic initiatives to deal with Syria and its poisonous ilk, and that they be very careful about what intelligence they are shown since they obviously cannot be trusted. Yet though the French, Russian and German governments may be run by men with all the moral courage and integrity of a weasel, they aren't actually evil and should not be treated on a par with Syria.

Sun, 04/27/2003 - 17:38 | permalink

Copyright © 2005 Setting The World To Rights

Correcting Common Errors

We have a new item in our sidebar: Error Correction. These are useful resources, but not directly for you, O Wise and Rational Readers of The World. They are for your friends and acquaintances. They are for those jaw-dropping moments when, for instance, you think you are having a deep discussion about some subtle geopolitical issue with someone whom you have not previously observed to deviate from sanity, when they suddenly come up with

- "Well, there are people who could locate Saddam with their psychic powers. It's at least worth trying, isn't it? After all, the police use psychics to solve murders, and even the CIA..."

Don't panic. Just refer them to the James Randi web site, where they will find this and be cured. More generally, don't engage with any argument about any supernatural claims that have not won Randi's million dollar prize. (None has ever got past the first stage, a prima facie demonstration of the claimed effect.)

If they tell you about an email message they have just received from Bill Gates guaranteeing them a thousand dollars if they forward it to ten people ... or if they remark

- "Did you know that during the Nazi occupation of Denmark in World War 2 the Danish king wore a yellow star in solidarity with his Jewish subjects",

Refer them to Snopes (which everyone should read thoroughly, by the way, and then regularly check out their Recent Additions page).

- "Such diseases as anorexia, bulimia, Oppositional Defiant Disorder, schoolphobia, homosexuality..."

Refer them to Thomas Szasz.

- "Studies have shown that watching TV makes teenagers more violent..."

Refer them to junkscience.com.

- "Well, in some ways the Israelis and the Palestinians are as bad as each other. They should both..."

Refer them to Myths and Facts. And you might also try HonestReporting.com.

We should stress that to endorse these sites as excellent antidotes to common errors is not to claim that they themselves are error free. On the contrary, only one web site is error free. And in particular, we have reservations about some of the content of each of those sites.

Mon, 04/28/2003 - 02:08 | permalink

Not So Easy

The World writes: Don't panic. Just refer them to the James Randi web site, where they will find this and be cured.

As lovely as this sounds, it's not very accurate. Yes, Randi offers true refutations of psychics, and these other sites also offer true refutations of various other crap. But come on. You're all familiar with TCS, and its total lack of popularity. Despite lots of TCSers explaining it over and over on numerous forums, with highly varied approaches. Truth alone isn't enough to win many converts.

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 04/28/2003 - 02:48 | reply

Correction

Quote:

On the contrary, only one web site is error free.

Excepting of course the Readers' Comments (particularly this one).

by a reader on Mon, 04/28/2003 - 03:16 | reply

For those who missed the irony...

If ever you see on this site any of the following –

- (1) grandiosity
 - (2) anything that appears to imply that solving problems is a piece of cake requiring no creativity but a mere act of will
 - (3) optimistic-sounding claims that anyone in the grip of thoroughly bad ideas will surely change his mind when the truth is presented to him
 - (4) anything that sounds as though we think that the truth is manifest, and/or that
 - (5) we think ourselves infallible knowledge-generating systems
- ... and so on... –

look for the irony. If we appear to say such things, you can be pretty sure that it is not entirely serious.

On the other hand, we* are quite serious about switching to the Mac.

Sarah

* Kevin Schodel wishes to disassociate himself from this comment, as he is a compiler writer pure unix type who does not seem entirely satisfied with what they have done with System X.

by Sarah Fitz-Claridge on Mon, 04/28/2003 - 14:39 | reply

Our First Convert From Idiotarianism?

In a sensitively-written piece in the Globe and Mail (via Abode of Amritas), Roy MacGregor brought to life the terrible plight of Ms Dianne Burnham, who does not speak with "a loud voice, but ... quietly and cautiously". This poor peace activist has, it seems, been so traumatised by finding herself in "the minority anti-war side" in that most abominable of regimes, America, that she is looking for a "safe haven". Anxious to help her in her search for a new home, we'd like to recommend that she try North Korea, Syria, or perhaps Cuba, France or Zimbabwe might appeal to her too.

But wait! Could it be that Ms Burnham has experienced a last-minute access of sanity? Look at her bumper sticker ad for The World!:

"God Bless The World", she insists.

Though we are atheists, we gratefully accept the support of what may be our very first idiotarian convert.

Tue, 04/29/2003 - 01:58 | permlink

Unbelievable

This paragraph reached out and kicked me:

It is hardly an even split, the pro-war side vastly outnumbering the antiwar, and because the media, particularly television, have been vastly pro-war, little attention has been paid to the minority side apart from quick dismissals and even charges of unpatriotic activity.

I haven't read the Globe and Mail before, so I'm not clear on what its place is on the political scale, but I find that ridiculous. It seemed to me that 9 out of 10 news outlets here were anti-war (at least until the fighting was over, then it seemed to abate somewhat). It's like they made that up to somehow justify this woman's insecurity.

Oh, and does she realize how un-American it is to run when things aren't just how you like it? If she were in the old Iraq, after fleeing, her remaining family members would certainly be tortured after she left for suspicion of disloyalty.

by a reader on Tue, 04/29/2003 - 06:09 | reply

The Globe and Mail

The Globe and Mail is the main traditional left-centre Canadian newspaper. They generally believe that the state is man's best friend.

by a reader on Wed, 04/30/2003 - 21:32 | reply

Was the writer entirely serious?

I thought I detected a hint of sarcasm in the Globe and Mail article. Anyone else?

by a reader on Wed, 04/30/2003 - 21:34 | reply

Ms. Burnham's hysterics

The Globe and Mail should reinterview Ms. Burnham next year to discover whether she had the courage of her convictions to disrupt her life by actually moving to Canada or Costa Rica. Or whether - after quivering delicately in the spotlight - she simply stayed put. As a former journalist I didn't detect so much as sarcasm in the tone of the report (as noted by a previous reader) as a sense of boredom with Ms. Burnham's creepy solipsism.

by a reader on Thu, 05/01/2003 - 17:41 | reply

As Anti-American As Anti-TV?

Is there a connection between anti-Americanism and being anti-TV apart from the obvious 'commercialism' aspect?

by a reader on Fri, 05/02/2003 - 01:52 | reply

Yeah, I'd lay money on her st...

Yeah, I'd lay money on her staying right where she is.

by a reader on Fri, 05/02/2003 - 01:53 | reply

Anti-American, Anti-TV

Yes there is a connection.

They both come from a preference for the "natural" (ie primitive).

America is seen as favoring using technology to control nature to "improve" (their scare quotes, not mine) our lives. This includes using TV to communicate and entertain.

Fundamentally, I think this preference is anti-human, because they seem to view "natural" as "excluding human action", so they seem to think the world would be perfect if only there were no people in it.

by Gil on Fri, 05/02/2003 - 17:15 | reply

Copyright © 2005 Setting The World To Rights

Holocaust Memorial Day

Yesterday was Holocaust Memorial Day (Yom Ha'Shoah).

For those who wonder how much the West knew of the Holocaust while it was going on, have a look at this footage (RealPlayer required) at the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum, of protests in New York in March 1943, and at the links here:

After word reached America of the Nazi killing of European Jewry, pressure mounted on the Roosevelt administration to help European Jews. To spur action, playwright Ben Hecht prepared a memorial to the Jewish victims of Nazi persecution, "We Will Never Die." The pageant, sponsored by the Zionist Revisionist Bergson Group, was part of a mass demonstration at Madison Square Garden in New York City. Later seen in other U.S. cities, the show was part of the Bergson Group's effort to pressure Washington to act decisively to rescue Europe's remaining Jews.

However, interference with the Holocaust was contrary to Allied policy:

By the spring of 1944, the Allies knew of the gassings at Auschwitz-Birkenau. Jewish leaders pleaded unsuccessfully with the U.S. government to bomb the gas chambers and railways leading to the camp. From August 20 to September 13, 1944, the U.S. Air Force bombed the Auschwitz-Monowitz industrial complex, less than five miles from the gas chambers in Birkenau. However, the U.S. maintained its policy of non-involvement in rescue, and bombed neither the gas chambers nor the railways used to transport prisoners.

For those who can't view the video, here's the transcript:

The pageant "We Will Never Die" is New York's Jewish protest against Nazi massacres. In Lublin, five hundred of our women and children were led to the market place and stood against the vegetable stalls we knew so well. Here the Germans turned machine guns on us and killed us all. Remember us. [Narrator:] And a great dramatic appeal is made as Paul Muni tells of Nazi crimes against helpless people. [Muni:] There are four million Jews surviving in Europe. The Germans have promised to deliver to the world by the end of the year, a Christmas package of four million dead Jews. And this is not a Jewish problem. It is a problem that belongs to humanity and it is a challenge to the soul of man.

March, 1943.

Wed, 04/30/2003 - 01:12 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Celebrity does good

Paul Muni Hollywood actor! <http://movies.yahoo.com/shop?d=hc&id=1800018166&cf=awards&intl=us>.

Was that the last time a Hollywood celebrity ever demonstrated on the side of good?

by a reader on Wed, 04/30/2003 - 01:38 | reply

Putin Taunts Blair

What should have happened:

Putin: Is Saddam sitting in a bunker waiting to blow the whole place up with WMD?

Blair: [smiles cheerfully] Dunno. If he is, will you resign your Presidency?

Putin: [indignantly] No.

Blair: So, you're not even willing to stake your career on the proposition. I'm not willing to stake countless lives on it.

Spot the difference.

Wed, 04/30/2003 - 18:37 | permalink

Excellent

Well put.

by a reader on Mon, 05/12/2003 - 08:19 | reply

Scientism Watch – Fishy Feelings

Fish do feel pain, scientists say

The first conclusive evidence of pain perception in fish is said to have been found by UK scientists.

The “conclusive evidence”? Well, it's that fish not only react to harmful stimuli (which might just be a “simple reflex response”) but behave differently afterwards. Uh huh. So does a computer, guys. Heck, so does a refrigerator.

Let's hope this doesn't answer Alan Forrester's shark question, but we have a horrible feeling it might. Has the world gone insane?

No. It always has been insane. That's why it needs setting to rights.

In related news, the BBC also reported: Plants avoid worst Corus cuts. Ouch! We don't blame them. Those Corus cuts are the worst.

Thu, 05/01/2003 - 01:38 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Scientism

Which meaning of the word 'scientism' do you have in mind?

by a reader on Thu, 05/01/2003 - 02:14 | reply

Scientism

The purported application of scientific methods to resolve non-scientific, philosophical issues, especially moral and metaphysical issues.

by Editor on Thu, 05/01/2003 - 02:39 | reply

Observations

Observations, in and of themselves, never resolve any issues. Explanations that rely on observations can. Many scientists either don't know this, or ignore it. So if you see a scientist talking about a study proving something, and you don't see any explanations of how the observations demonstrate the purported conclusion, it's scientism.

-- Elliot Temple
<http://curi.blogspot.com/>

by Elliot Temple on Thu, 05/01/2003 - 06:08 | reply

What we have here is a failure to communicate

I think that part of the problem is that different groups are using the same word ("Pain") and attaching different meanings to it.

The scientists are, indeed, observing something: "profound behavioural and physiological changes" and labeling it "Pain". Perhaps this is a standard usage in the field; but when most laymen hear "Pain" they think about the kind of anguish that people can feel. This is something entirely different and cannot be established by observation (certainly not today).

It's my understanding that our best theories about how brains work tell us that fish nervous systems are not capable of experiencing this human-like pain and these experiments do nothing to change that.

by Gil on Thu, 05/01/2003 - 16:52 | reply

Suuuuuuuuuure

Gil,

Can you find one source suggesting these "scientists" don't think fish feel pain in the human sense?

-- Elliot Temple
<http://curi.blogspot.com/>

by Elliot Temple on Fri, 05/02/2003 - 06:29 | reply

Isn't pain a feeling?

Pain is a feeling isn't it? How can that be measured? Aren't feelings subjective? Don't we interpret physical sensations with our brains? Thus, how can an animal have the same experience we have? They don't have our brains so they can't experience it the way we do.

by a reader on Fri, 05/02/2003 - 12:24 | reply

Wrong Word

You mean quale (plural: qualia) not feeling (emotion).

But it's not that fish can't experience it the same way because they "don't have our brains" -- two humans with different brains (we all have different brains) can, according to our best theories, experience the same quale the same way. It's that you have to be conscious in the first place to have them. Fish are thus no more candidates than rocks.

-- Elliot Temple
<http://curi.blogspot.com/>

by Elliot Temple on Fri, 05/02/2003 - 13:20 | reply

Source

Well, these scientists didn't speak about their results describing how the fish felt (which is good from a scientism point of view). Those conclusions were drawn by the animal rights activists and, perhaps, the article author. The scientists only claimed to have observed responses to damaging stimuli.

There was a quote from another scientist that did explicitly distinguish these findings from feeling pain.

Dr Bruno Broughton, a fish biologist and NAA adviser, said: "I doubt that it will come as much of a shock to anglers to learn that fish have an elaborate system of sensory cells around their mouths...

"However, it is an entirely different matter to draw conclusions about the ability of fish to feel pain, a psychological experience for which they literally do not have the brains," he said.

He quoted from a study by Professor James Rose of the University of Wyoming, US, in which it was found fish did not possess the necessary and specific regions of the brain, the neocortex.

by Gil on Fri, 05/02/2003 - 16:18 | reply

Irony

I find it somewhat ironic that Elliot and this post's author seem to have drawn conclusions about what theories these scientists hold about fish feeling pain based purely on the observation that they have published a paper describing physiological and behavioural responses to damaging stimuli, the fact that they use the word "pain" (which probably has an observable technical meaning in their field), and the interpretations of laymen.

I know that they didn't claim these conclusions to be scientific, but they still suffer from the same supportability problems that are ascribed to others.

But, I agree that it is correct to criticize those who did explicitly draw grand conclusions about fish feeling pain in the human sense.

by Gil on Fri, 05/02/2003 - 16:51 | reply

oh c'mon

Gil,

Have you read any of the article besides the part you quoted, which is from a NAA (fisher ppl) adviser..? OK, i know you have, but stop studiously ignoring it.

-- Elliot Temple
<http://curi.blogspot.com/>

by Elliot Temple on Fri, 05/02/2003 - 19:32 | reply

What?

What am I ignoring? Where does the scientist (Dr Sneddon) say something that implied the fish feel pain as humans do?

Was it this?:

Dr Sneddon said the team's work "fulfils the criteria for animal pain".

Maybe I'm wrong, but I interpreted "animal pain" to be a technical term for observable responses to damaging stimuli, not a psychological, emotional, interpretation.

All of the conclusions about how the pain is felt seemed to come from the animal rights people, the author, and apparently many of the readers of the article.

by Gil on Fri, 05/02/2003 - 23:08 | reply

Do they mean 'pain' in the morally significant sense?

Gil I think you may be letting the authors off too lightly. Because

- If this were truly a technical term that they intend no other connotation for (as when a physicist uses the word 'charm' to refer to a property of sub-atomic particles), they would apply it uniformly to everything that passes the criterion. Such as certain robots. But I bet they do not say that robots feel pain.

- If this were truly a technical term that they intend no other connotation for, then the entire project has no worthwhile motivation. It's not something that has any significance for zoology or any other science. Zoologists reading this paper are not saying "oh, now we can understand this other perplexing problem; oh now we have a promising way of investigating that other phenonenon" or anything like that. Its only interest is its purported relevance to moral issues of how fish should be treated, in the wider context of animal rights etc.

- If this were truly a technical term that they intend no other connotation for, then they would be at pains to point this out to journalists -- for the possibility of confusion is abvious when you use a technical term that has a different meaning in everyday life, concerning an issue of widespread interest and controversy. Journalists don't come away from interviews with physicists with the impression that the "charm" of elementary particles means charm.

For this and other reasons, I conclude that they are guilty.

by David Deutsch on Fri, 05/02/2003 - 23:35 | reply

Pain

David,

I think it would be useful to speak of robots experiencing pain. It would help people grasp a model for controlling it's behavior, learning, etc. It would be good to build in sensors that detect destructive stimuli, and avoid the source in the future. Pain is what I'd call it.

I'm not sure what facts are useful to zoologists, but this scientist said:

"We believe our study is the first work with fish of the teleost family [those with bony skeletons], and the results may represent an evolutionary divergence between the teleost and elasmobranch lineages."

Which sounds to me like it proves useful (some animals have developed certain receptors and others haven't).

As for the impression that the reporter was left with as evidence; it's my experience that reporters often make mistakes like this, and worse. I'd be very surprised if this has never happened to you.

by Gil on Sat, 05/03/2003 - 00:38 | reply

Pain

Gil: Yes it has, but that wasn't my fault! :)

by David Deutsch on Sat, 05/03/2003 - 01:06 | reply

Pain

David,

:) I'm sure it wasn't your fault!

So why don't we blame the journalist, and the animal rights wackos, and give the scientists the benefit of the doubt?

I like scientists.

by Gil on Sat, 05/03/2003 - 02:32 | reply

Innocent scientists?

Gil:

Are these scientists innocent too?

"Living within a group requires a moral code of behaviour... Most animals that live in communities exhibit similar moral codes to humans.

"Zoologists who have spent their professional lives studying animal behaviour, either by observation or by experiments to test their mental capacities, believe that many animals feel and think."

Joyce D'Silva, chief executive of CIWF, told BBC News Online: "The whole climate over whether to accept sentience has changed hugely in the last 15 years.

"It has huge implications for all the ways we use animals. It implies all farm animals are entitled to humane lives and deaths - and millions are denied them."

Dr Jackie Turner, research director of the CIWF Trust, told BBC News Online: "There's far more rationality and mental complexity in farm animals than we acknowledge.

by David Deutsch on Sat, 05/10/2003 - 19:33 | reply

Guilty

Ok, I don't know how many scientists are associated with that group and agree with its chief executive, but those who do are guilty.

by Gil on Sun, 05/11/2003 - 00:05 | reply

Consciousness, pain, and other's experience

In order to conclude that others feel conscious pain you must establish that they are conscious.
Which is impossible.

The only thing we can do is observe their actions and draw conclusions based on how their actions parallel our own in similar situations, and make the assumption that they have a similar experience.

This applies not only to fish.

This applies to humans.

How do I know that you feel pain?
Perhaps because you say so? What if you don't speak English? What if you are too young to speak? What if you have brain damage? Because you flinch, or yell, or cry? Those could be just instinctive stimulus responses. In fact, when you say "that hurts" that could just be a complex conditioned response. Perhaps no one feels pain in the way I do except me. Or, from your point of view, except you.

Maybe know one else is conscious. You can never prove that anyone else is conscious, only that they behave as though they were.

So your neighbor and sister are just as much candidates to feel pain as a rock is.

If a fish has a brain, and reacts to avoid certain stimuli, it is not an unreasonable assumption to conclude that they are likely to experience something similar to what we experience in the same situation.

In any case like this, just insert "severely mentally retarded human" in place of what ever animal with a primitive brain you are talking about, and see how your argument sounds.

The only reason this is even a matter to debate is because people don't want to feel guilty for eating other things which have the capacity to feel.

Humans are animals. Animals think and feel and experience. Either get over it, or become vegetarian. Stop lying to yourselves so you can feel more justified. You aren't better than everything else, you are just different.

by Jay Aziza on Wed, 12/20/2006 - 17:51 | reply

Fish and Humans

So do you believe that a fisherman and a murderer are equally evil (both are animals)?

If you don't think that a fisherman and a murderer are equally evil, why are humans more important?

by a reader on Thu, 12/21/2006 - 00:27 | reply

Deceptively Irrational

With its cheery daily briefing today saying, inter alia, “we remain resolutely committed to our vision of building an America where freedom, opportunity, prosperity, and civil society flourish”, you might be forgiven for concluding that the Heritage Foundation's web site could be worth visiting on a regular basis, but you'd be a bit of a gudgeon.

OK, so we agree with them that moral and cultural relativism are egregious errors. They know the problem is one of right and wrong. They know that it is urgent and integral to the current crisis. They seem at first glance to understand key concepts such as objective morality and moral progress...

But appearances are deceptive.

They assume that moral relativism is also the cause of unrelated problems such as cheating in schools and colleges, corporate scandals and political corruption. They lament the lack of patriotism exhibited by a survey showing that 37% of college students would try to evade a draft. Heritage has been a “champion of the importance of marriage, parental rights, and traditional values – standing up against the liberal line that all lifestyles are morally equal”.

Their proposed cure is brutal: a mandatory politically incorrect American History course for first year college students. This coercion will supposedly “inoculate them against the lies and distortions of the anti-war left”.

D'oh!

So it turns out that the Heritage Foundation has little inkling of true morality. Their agenda is conservatism in the literal sense, that is, to conserve traditional institutions and practices by protecting them from criticism. In evaluating institutions and practices, they look to history rather than moral content. Their dogma – in effect, ‘our traditions are good, true, and infallible’ – is no better than the idiotarian one of ‘all our traditions are wicked, false, and must be replaced’. Thus the Heritage Foundation is hardly less of a threat to our society than the radical leftists. Their apparent grasp of the issues in regard to the war and its morality was little more than a coincidence.

The rational libertarian view is that there is valuable knowledge contained in our traditions, but that all of them are fallible and can be improved through argument and debate in the absence of coercion. Dangerous ideas will not be defeated through the propagation of authorised truth to captive audiences. They will be defeated through argument, as will the Heritage Foundation.

Fri, 05/02/2003 - 00:09 | permalink

Fishy

"Gudgeon" = gullible person, I assume? The fishy definitions look ... fishy.

by a reader on Fri, 05/02/2003 - 01:56 | reply

Gudgeon

<http://dictionary.reference.com/search?q=gudgeon>

"Slang: One who is easily duped."

"A person easily duped or cheated. --Swift."

by a reader on Fri, 05/02/2003 - 02:29 | reply

your bias is showing

I thought information was power?

Why are you not railing against all the brutal forced re-education that Politically Correct thought disciplins are enforcing on the first year college students?

Would it not make sense that if we cannot stop all forced education, we should insert forced education that refutes what authoritarians are pumping as the "correct" way to think?

This is what disgusts me about Libertarians, thier adherance is as fanatical as a wahabbist muslim, they would blow themselves up figuratively, or politically (literally) to adhere to some pure ideal they think trumps reality.

What makes the Constitution great is its ability to survive hypocrisy, and still give the society attempting to adhere to it, progress. There are miss-steps, but with all the checks and balances, and competing interests, we can evolve progressively. We can only evolve progressively if we have a true history, so that we as a society dont get caught in some negative feedback loop spanning centuries, or millenia.

by a reader on Sat, 05/03/2003 - 18:22 | reply

Not against all coercion?

Why are you not railing against all the brutal forced re-education that Politically Correct thought disciplines are enforcing on the first year college students?

We most certainly do!

Would it not make sense that if we cannot stop all forced education, we should insert forced education that refutes what authoritarians are pumping as the "correct" way to think?

No. We should never take such a defeatist and immoral attitude. We should resist all coercive education, not substitute one lot of coercion for another. And that is what TCS (Taking Children Seriously) is doing.

by Sarah on Sun, 05/04/2003 - 13:45 | reply

Foreskin or Against?

Andrew Sullivan says of a Reuters piece about a study claiming to show that circumcised penises are just as sensitive as uncircumcised ones:

My own anti-circumcision view, however, is not based on the idea that mutilated men have less pleasure. It's based on the simple notion that individuals' bodies should not be permanently altered without their consent, unless the medical evidence for such a procedure is overwhelming.

We hope that he would not actually support the idea that innocent people's bodies should be altered without their consent, whatever the medical evidence! Perhaps what Mr Sullivan intended to say was that it would be unreasonable to assume consent on the part of the baby about to be circumcised, unless, say, the baby has a particular medical condition and no less invasive treatment is possible.

But to get back to the study: the questions it asked were necessarily mechanistic – and rightly so, because otherwise it would have been another case of scientism – so it does not really address the issue of 'sensitivity' in the sense anyone is interested in. Furthermore, the study's sample size is so small that it isn't difficult to find people who have engaged sexually with more men than were in the study. When we asked a few of our more experienced friends whether their intimate knowledge of both circumcised and uncircumcised men led them to concur with the study, the answer was no.

Europeans are often shocked to learn that circumcision is so common in the US. It is not common (apart from for religious reasons) in the UK, Europe and Australia. Parents in America are beginning to question circumcision, but many lack basic information. They are unaware, for example, that there is a difference in functionality between the circumcised and the uncircumcised penis. At the risk of getting a little too graphic here, the lack of moveable skin affects masturbation, etc. If interested, see the five photographs at the bottom of this page. Note the two lines drawn on the skin, showing how it moves. Whilst the functionality argument is obviously trumped by the human rights argument above, some might want to take it into account when making the decision.

Sat, 05/03/2003 - 01:34 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Amos

I'm no experts on men's dicks, but I can tell you that circumcision is very common, in fact nearly the norm, here in australia.

by a reader on Sun, 05/04/2003 - 15:10 | reply

Another Aussie

I'll second that observation. In my (limited to looking only) experience, it is the uncircumcized male that is the minority in Australia.

by a reader on Mon, 05/05/2003 - 03:04 | reply

A Circumcised Aussie

I was born in Sydney Australia in 1962. The first time I saw an uncircumcised dick was when I was 8 years old - a kid from England flashed his 'elephant trunk' in the classroom. All the other Aussie boys I knew were circumcised. I grew up thinking that in Australia you were born circumcised & that kids from Europe just had a stranger looking dick. You only have to visit any of the beautiful clothing-optional beaches in Sydney Harbour (I like Cobblers Beach the most)to see that the majority of Aussie men are circumcised.

by a reader on Fri, 10/17/2003 - 16:26 | reply

we're all cut here in Australia

My experience was the same. I didn't know there was such a thing as circumcision until I was over 10 when I asked what the word circumcision meant. I pretty much only ever saw circumcised dicks when I was growing up. And that's great - they're the best looking dicks around.

by a reader on Tue, 10/12/2004 - 13:29 | reply

i dont care!!

Well my's is uncircumcison,it's very overwhelming not being circumcised i was born puerto rico and lived in NY and now in FL,a long time a go, i told my friend that i was uncircumsed this when i just found out about it. so year have pass and one day my friend tell another one of my friend about my you know what.start calling me 'elephant trunk' and then pull back man which they got form the wal-mart comm on tv. this make me feel like $hit every time they talk about it so about 10-20 people now know that i'm not circumcsed.and i'm 16 year old now!

by a reader on Thu, 10/28/2004 - 10:14 | reply

Circ'd at 15

Ever since I was little I wondered why my "thing" looked different. So I finally found out. When I found out it could be done easily I got it done in about an hour and I'm feeling free and fine with the results.

by a reader on Thu, 10/28/2004 - 22:14 | reply

Everybody is right!

The number of circumcised males counted over all age groups in Australia is currently well into the 65-75% range, but only about 15% of baby boys are now cut at birth. The very high (~90%) rates for infant circumcision were from about 1935 to 1970. The circumcision rate for each age group has been falling steadily since about 1975 when Australian doctors decided to refuse to offer it as a procedure at birth (although some would still provide it on parental request). So everyone is right! (But surgery without consent when there's no real reason is always wrong!)

by "an Aussie doctor" on Mon, 12/06/2004 - 15:08 | reply

Cut Aussie

I agree. Most men in Australia have been cut. I went to an all boys school and the majority there were cut. It is so much cleaner and looks better

by a reader on Sun, 12/12/2004 - 22:22 | reply

Yes again

I'm another Aussie guy who was born here in 1973. Pretty much every kid I knew while I was growing up was circumcised - I think a few of the Greek kids at school were intact but everyone else had been done. Australia seems to be thought of as a non circumcising country but even now, many of my peers are having their kids done with no problem at all.

Incidentally, an ex of mine told me about an ex of hers (still with me?) who was circumcised at age 19 and swore it was the best thing he'd done. My ex said he certainly seemed to be no less sensitive for it.

by a reader in oz on Wed, 01/12/2005 - 11:40 | reply

Saudi-islamo-Treachery

Saudi Arabia originally offered $10 million for tsunami relief; then, after international criticism, upped its pledge to $30 million. This sum is dwarfed by the $150 million per year the Saudis have given to the families of suicide bombers. Meanwhile, according to government websites, they spend billions funding 1,500 mosques, more than 200 colleges, and some 2,000 schools for Muslim children in Europe, North and South America, Australia, and Asia. Their aim is not to alleviate human suffering, or even Muslim suffering, but only to promote their version of Islam.

The tsunami tragedy shows once more that Islamist extremism does not seek freedom, democracy, or the alleviation of poverty. Its explicit goal is to advance enmity between Wahhabis and all others, and to create reactionary regimes ruled by a perversion of Islamic law. The extremists would remove a Muslim leader such as Mohammed Yunus, and perhaps execute him for the "crime" of cremating Hindu bodies and placing crosses on the graves of Christian victims. Islamist extremism--an incubator not only of terrorism but also of universal hatred--is the enemy of all other beliefs.

by pilgrim on Wed, 01/12/2005 - 18:06 | reply

how did you get circumsied

how did you get circumsied

by sam on Sat, 02/19/2005 - 22:26 | reply

you dipshit pilgrim

pilgrim you fanny. what the fuck has that got to do with circumcision. and are you so unaware that America is currently spending BILLIONS on keeping the corrupt saudia royals in power. if it wasnt for the THOUSANDS of American soldiers the Saudia royals would of been lynched and their dead bodies dragged around the streets.

forget the Tsunami. did you know the same amount of people die EVERY WEEK because of starvation and disease in Africa????? and before you bitch about Saudias whose wealth is being robbed by America (over a trillion dollars is in America out of saudia money) do you realise that America spends every year OVER 400 billion dollars on its milatry. it would cost America 40 billion to completely stop world hunger and all those people from dying.

and before you start all that "aid" bullshit no country offered out of their "hearts" straight away did they. The donations were so late and constantly chaning in Europe and America becasue of pure political reasons.

by a reader on Wed, 05/04/2005 - 21:59 | reply

I was born in Holland, but my

I was born in Holland, but my dad is american. When i was born, the doctors didnt accept to do circumcision on me. They thought it was abnormal and dangerous.... So my dad brought me into the U.S. so they could have the operation done. Im so glad they did it to me, In my opinion, A Cut dick looks SOOOO much better than an uncut one. I personally think about all the uncut dutch guys and its gross. These are things i love about The USA, Canada and Australia. The majority of their males are cut.

by Kehivi on Tue, 02/14/2006 - 21:03 | reply

Cutting Edge Australia

All this just shows how easy it is to get your foreskin in a twist.

It is plain to me that Australia is a circumcised country but is no longer a circumcising country.

Personally I don't give rat's arse about "your" foreskin or lack of it, but I sure wish adults would let kids keep theirs long enough to make up their own minds about it.

Whose dick is it anyway?

by a reader on Thu, 03/30/2006 - 09:35 | reply

Well, I'm an aussie born in 1

Well, I'm an aussie born in 1976 and I'd say 80% of my year were uncut. The cut kids were the one's who are in the minority.

by 76er on Fri, 04/21/2006 - 19:01 | reply

I'm glad my mum made the right decision

I found the last post a little weird. I was born in 1975 and i reckon about 90% of my year were cut all through school.

I was cut at birth, and I believe my mum made the right choice. It is way better and looks much nicer. foreskins are just so damn UGLY!!! If I ever have a son, he will be cut within the 1st 6 months of birth.

by a reader on Mon, 08/21/2006 - 06:42 | reply

add on to the last post

I was born in australia too.

by a reader on Mon, 08/21/2006 - 06:43 | reply

"abnormal and dangerous"

"the doctors didnt accept to do circumcison on me. They thought it was abnormal and dangerous..."

Then one really has to question their medical qualifications. Dangerous?!!! What utter drivle.

by Yoni on Sun, 09/10/2006 - 16:07 | reply

A short story

Today, the circumcision rate is very low in Australia. I am 20 and have just completed my final year of university in Brisbane. All through high-school/secondary school i thought i was in the minority with an uncircum sized penis. After school when my friends and I were more open about each other, I realised that only one of my friends was circum sized, and he felt quite embaressed. Every time he looked like hooking up with a girl he would tell her first that he was cut (not that she would really care). Since school i have had sex with about 15 women and not one of them has made any comment on my foreskin. My current girlfriend has never even been with a guy who has a cut penis, and asked me one day what exactly a circumcision involved. After explaining the pros and cons of the operation, she couldn't believe the mutilation. The POINT is, circumcisioin is not really performed on younger generation Australians. Most guys now under 25 have not been circumcised.

by Student on Thu, 12/14/2006 - 01:37 | reply

circumcision

I was born in Australia in 1950 of Australian parents.I am not circumcised but almost all other males born then, about 95%, were.

I think that circumcision is a good idea and had our 3 sons done.

by a reader on Sun, 10/21/2007 - 18:48 | reply

home | archives | polls | search

Copyright © 2009 Setting The World To Rights

Seriously Satirical

Whenever a political or social tradition is driven by psychological hang-ups (and at present they all are, to a greater or lesser extent), there is a potential for satire because the unfortunate sufferers of the hangup can neither defend their opinions rationally nor modify them. So they are sitting targets and, literally, ridiculous.

This is especially so when the opinions in question are currently being refuted by collision with cold reality. Refutation only rarely cures hang-ups, but it does increase the work that their holders have to do to cope with the 'cognitive dissonance' of living in a world that simply is not as they feel it must be. Satire likewise plays the important role of increasing the psychological cost of clinging to untenable views. For instance, the treatment that Muhammed Saeed al-Sahaf has received at the hands of satirists will make it harder, in future, for totalitarian Ministers of Information to get themselves taken seriously by Westerners – or even by the average idiotarian journalist.

Before 9-11, the ridiculousness of idiotarianism lay largely concealed under layers of complacency and political correctness. The fact that such a significant strand of political thought did not even have a name before 2002 when Charles Johnson coined the term 'idiotarian' (the very term being a form of serious/satirical criticism) is testimony to the psychological power of these concealment mechanisms. Their sudden failure – the sudden removal of the idiotarian emperors' clothing – may go some way towards explaining why there are many extremely good satirists among today's warbloggers. The funniest that we know of is IMAO – see, for instance, these masterpieces, but perhaps better examples of what we are talking about are Scrappleface (who coined the term 'Axis of Weasels') and The Skeptician, who are masters of harnessing genuine, relentlessly logical arguments in the cause of satire. Of course, so are we, when we put our minds to it.

It's a good time for visual satire too. The 'Weasels' metaphor was memorably taken up by the New York Post. Here, blogger Laurence Simon pokes fun at idiotarian 'human shields' by ingeniously reinterpreting a much-mocked government emergency poster (via LGF). Here is a parody of the New York Times, which beautifully skewers a whole range of ridiculous postures that idiotarians have felt compelled to adopt in response to the recent Coalition victory in Iraq. Here is a cartoon that did the same for post-9-11 postures. The most consistently excellent political cartoonists that we know of are Cox and Forkum – not so much funny as clear-sighted.

We are living in exceptionally interesting times, which, as the urban myth about that being a 'Chinese curse' indicates, means that we are in trouble. However, it has its consolations too. One is that we can witness, or perhaps even assist in, troubles being fixed. Another is that there are some seriously ridiculous people and situations out there at the moment. If it is worth setting the world to rights, it is worth laughing at them while doing so.

Sat, 05/03/2003 - 20:03 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Seriously Satirical

"The devil... the prowd spirit... cannot endure to be mocked." -- Thomas More.

"Nothing deflates a windbag faster than the prick of laughter." -- Me.

Curmudgeon Emeritus, Palace Of Reason

by fporretto on Sun, 05/04/2003 - 11:02 | reply

Keep up the excellent work!

The blog looks great. I especially liked your shameless plugs of other blogs when talking about satire. It was also very interesting to see your realization that people can absolutely fail to spot satire at times. Keep up the excellent work!

by a reader on Mon, 05/12/2003 - 18:55 | reply

Roadmap or Carjacking?

by Alan Forrester

Once again the US is trying to move along a Middle East Peace Plan by putting pressure on the Israelis.

The road map to peace envisions the settlement of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and the establishment of a Palestinian state by 2005. The road map is horribly flawed. It is supposed to be implemented by the Quartet: EU, the UN, Russia and the US. The EU and the UN are both biased towards the Palestinian terrorists. The US and Russia have decidedly mixed records.

Furthermore, by adopting a peace plan with a time limit the US has painted its way into a corner. The problem is that Palestinian terrorists are still dedicated to destroying Israel and haven't got the slightest in making concessions. They may be squeezed if the Syrians shut down terrorist camps as they have been asked to but that's a big if.

It gets worse. The road map requires the Palestinian Authority (PA) to recognise Israel's right to exist, it has not done so. The road map also hinges on the introduction of a democratic constitution in Palestine and the PA cracking down on terrorism. The most recent version of the Palestinian Constitution includes words like "democracy" and "freedom" but sets the stage for tyranny. The Constitution also says that the Palestinian state will support terrorism.

As things stand now there is no substantial sign at all that the PA has any interest in peace. It is disgraceful that the US is putting pressure on Israel. No amount of pressure on Israel will make sure that the road map is implemented. Pressure on the PA might make it clear that this time the West actually intends to make sure that peace prevails in the Middle East. A good start would be for the US to issue a demand that the PA should rewrite the Palestinian Constitution. If pressure is not put on the PA to make real moves toward peace then they will conclude that the Quartet is not serious about peace and they will be right.

Introducing Our Series, “A Short History of Israel”

This is the introduction to our series, “A Short History of Israel”. The Table of Contents is here, and at the foot of each part of the series, we link to the next part. If you want to skip this introduction, click here to go straight to Part 1.

.....

Once upon a time, we wrote a parody history of Israel, intended for Setting The World To Rights, in which every sentence contained at least one lie.

But the reactions of many of our friends who read it were alarming. Instead of falling about laughing, saying, “Jolly good show! What a super parody!”, most of them read it as fact. These are not opponents of Israel, you understand, but people who are sympathetic to it. We hadn't realised quite how pervasive the prevailing distortions and falsehoods are. When you consider that the parody began: “Judaism is unique among religions in being exclusive to a particular ethnic group (the Jews). It teaches (in its doctrine of ‘the Chosen People’) that all other races are genetically inferior to the Jewish one and that Jews are entitled to rule over them”, you might (we admit we're optimists) understand our unease that our friends took it seriously.

We soon realised that we could not put the parody into the public domain. After all, The Protocols of the Elders of Zion is also a crude forgery, but is now part of the standard anti-Semitic repertoire – for instance it is in the Charter of Hamas. We do not want to be responsible for another anti-Semitic canard that might last the next few centuries.

However, everyone who read the parody asked us where they could find the true facts. Looking around the internet, we found that there are no satisfactory summaries containing just the facts (though we found many containing falsehoods far worse than our parody!). So we decided that we had to compile a short History of Israel ourselves, and we are pleased to announce that we shall post the first instalment (“Anti-Semitism and Zionism”) tomorrow. Look out for it!

UPDATE: Click here for Part 1: Anti-Semitism and Zionism

When you consider that the pa...

When you consider that the parody began: ♦Judaism is unique among religions in being exclusive to a particular ethnic group (the Jews). It teaches (in its doctrine of ♦the Chosen People♦) that all other races are genetically inferior to the Jewish one and that Jews are entitled to rule over them♦, you might (we admit we're optimists) understand our unease that our friends took it seriously.

What is false about that? No really. It looks OK to me.

by a reader on Mon, 05/05/2003 - 00:57 | reply

Why'd You Do That?

I'm curious about what sort of thought process could possess you to think that your comment was a good thing to post.

-- Elliot Temple
<http://curi.blogspot.com/>

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 05/05/2003 - 04:51 | reply

The parody

Well, I thought the parody was hilarious. Maybe it needed to be more obvious for idiots, like this:

"Judaism is the only religion which is limited exclusively to people whose noses are a certain length, and which actually shoots anyone else who tries to join in. It teaches in its doctrine of "The Master Race" that all other humans should be eliminated and that one day Jews will rule this universe, and most of the other ones as well, in a great big orgy of Broadway musicals, haberdashery shops and potato latkes."

http://libertarian_parent_in_the_countryside.blogspot.com/

by Alice on Mon, 05/05/2003 - 12:19 | reply

O Lord, I realize that we're...

O Lord, I realize that we're the Chosen People but can't you pick on the Hindus once in a while and give me a little break?

by Peter W. Davis on Mon, 05/05/2003 - 19:02 | reply

Will there also be a history ...

Will there also be a history of Ireland next week?

by a reader on Tue, 05/06/2003 - 12:39 | reply

Rastas

Here's a question I have always been embarrassed to ask: what is the connection between judaism and the rastafaris? Reggae songs talk of Mount Zion and the children of Israel a lot, although in some connection with Ethiopia: why?

With dreadlocks and silly hats on, they also look a bit like orthodox jews put through some kind of photoshop filter.

- "Dash"

by a reader on Tue, 07/01/2003 - 03:50 | reply

1. Anti-Semitism and Zionism

This is the first part of our series, "A Short History of Israel". If you have not read our introduction, it is here. See also, the Table of Contents.

.....

In the second century CE the Romans expelled and scattered the Jews from their homeland, which was roughly today's Israel [MAP] [MAP] plus the West Bank, Gaza, and part of Jordan. The Romans then re-named the region Palestine (after the Philistines, ancient enemies of the Jews who had passed into history long before then). As a result of that expulsion and previous expulsions, Jews settled in almost every country of the Old (and later the New) World, forming communities in which they continued to evolve their distinctive culture. The Jews of today are descendants of those Jews and of local people who occasionally adopted the culture through conversion to Judaism (the Jews' traditional religion, which permitted, but seldom sought, converts).

Most countries in Europe and the Middle East have persecuted Jews for most of their history. Most have expelled and/or slaughtered their Jewish populations at some time or other. They have justified this through a complex of ideas called anti-Semitism, which include

- the idea that Jews have collectively failed some crucial test (e.g. they rejected Jesus, or Mohammed, or do not have the Aryans' capacity for 'culture', or do not satisfy Stalin's criteria for being a 'nation', or lack a mystical 'connection to the land', etc);
- the idea that Jews cause pollution – for instance that they are poisoning the water supply, or that they desecrate holy sites and artefacts – which is often extended, semi-metaphorically, to the idea that Jews are pollution/vermin/rotten/cancer etc.;
- blood libels, the classic one being that Jews kidnap and murder non-Jewish children and consume their blood in religious rituals;
- the incorporation of an entity called 'The Jews' deeply into the fabric of many cultures as the eternal enemy bent on destroying whatever that culture values; and
- conspiracy theories, especially theories that 'The Jews' are secretly 'behind' the events of history and current affairs.

Before the twentieth century, Jews had responded to anti-Semitism in various ways, of which the most important were: endurance, conversion and assimilation. But large-scale conversions occurred only under direct duress, and assimilated Jews were sometimes targeted as much as traditional Jews. During the Enlightenment, Jews were given equal rights in Western countries, though in all but the Anglo-Saxon ones this was little more than a facade. During the nineteenth century, there were sporadic mass murders of Jews in Eastern Europe. In the Arab countries, mass murders and expulsions (albeit on a smaller scale than in Eastern Europe), ubiquitous blood libels and day-to-day persecution, continued much as they always had. In Western Europe, virulently anti-Semitic ideologies arose. This seemed ominous to many assimilated Jews: if anti-Semitism was on the rise even there, at the hub of modernity where assimilation was almost total, then assimilation was not the solution to anti-Semitism and Jews everywhere were in danger. Some of them became socialists, identifying themselves with the struggle for a worldwide workers' paradise in which everyone, even Jews, would be truly emancipated. Some became Zionists.

Zionism is the idea that Jews should form a state, where they could live normal lives and defend themselves like the people of other nations, and provide a haven for Jews who might be persecuted elsewhere.

Zionism had been proposed by various writers during the nineteenth century. The Zionist movement, as a political organisation, was founded by an Austrian journalist, Theodor Herzl, who in 1894 had decided that his own assimilationist views were untenable. He was in Paris covering the trial of Captain Alfred Dreyfus, a Jewish officer in the French Army who was falsely convicted of espionage in an atmosphere of national anti-Semitic hysteria. Through writing, lecturing and individual persuasion, Herzl rapidly gathered support for his new movement. The First Zionist Congress was held in Basle, Switzerland in 1897.

Zionism was opposed by religious Jews because it had a secular objective. Some opposed it because it usurped the role of the Messiah, a mythical person who they believed would one day lead them back to their historical homeland. They considered any Jewish political movement not led by the Messiah futile, even sacrilegious.

Initially, Zionism was also opposed, or ignored, by most assimilationists, because it sought separation, which they believed to be the cause of anti-Semitism.

As the persecution of Jews continued to increase all over Eastern Europe during the early twentieth century, a significant minority of secular Jews, and a small minority of religious ones, became Zionists.

There had been a small Jewish community in Palestine for many centuries, perhaps since Roman times. In 1850, the total Jewish population was about 10,000, most of them in the city of Jerusalem where they had just become the majority (and have remained so ever since). During the second half of the nineteenth century,

Jewish philanthropists had been buying land in Palestine for the purpose of resettling Jewish refugees from Eastern Europe. Palestine was very under-populated, in the sense that it could, even with nineteenth century technology, support many times its population at that time, which was less than half a million and declining. It was a run-down backwater of the Ottoman Empire [MAP] where people of many different races and cultures lived, mainly Arabs. There was no administrative region of the Empire called Palestine, and the inhabitants of the region did not think of themselves as a distinct political entity.

Western countries introduced immigration controls towards the end of the nineteenth century, and made them ever more stringent as the twentieth century progressed. This was in response to the waves of immigrants, including Jewish refugees, who kept arriving from Russia and Europe.

The British offered part of Uganda as a refuge for one million Jews. The Sixth Zionist Congress accepted this as an interim measure in 1903, but the British soon cooled to the idea and took no steps to implement it. Herzl, who had been its most prominent supporter, suddenly died, and the Seventh Zionist Congress finally rejected it in 1905. Also in 1905 there was a vast outbreak of murder of Jews in Russia, resulting in the arrival of thousands of Jewish refugees in Palestine – a total of over 40,000 by 1914.

The Ottoman Empire was an ally of Germany in the First World War. The British captured Palestine in 1917 and issued the Balfour Declaration, which said:

His Majesty's Government view with favour the establishment in Palestine of a national home for the Jewish people, and will use their best endeavours to facilitate the achievement of this object, it being clearly understood that nothing shall be done which may prejudice the civil and religious rights of existing non-Jewish communities in Palestine.

This was incorporated into the terms of the League of Nations Mandate under which, after the war, the British administered a territory that they called Palestine [MAP], consisting of the area that we shall call Palestine (Israel, the West Bank, Gaza, and the Golan Heights), plus today's Jordan. The Mandate required Britain to make arrangements to allow Jews to settle in Palestine and create their National Home. The Jews themselves would finance this, assisted by a charity which was later called the Jewish Agency. They would purchase land for farms and new towns, drain the swamps that spawned endemic malaria, build new infrastructure, and generally develop the country. The British would assist by donating some of the government-owned land which they had 'inherited' from the Ottoman Empire, and by maintaining human rights and the rule of law.

Between then and the Second World War, about 600,000 Jews came to Palestine. A few of them came because they wanted to be part of the new type of Jewish society that was being created in the Jewish National Home, but most had nowhere else to go and many of them would otherwise have died in the Holocaust or the other mass murders that preceded it.

In 1920 there were Arab riots in Jerusalem and elsewhere, in which Jews were murdered. The Jewish community were alarmed that the British authorities seemed reluctant to intervene. After the riots, the British arrested many Arabs and Jews and dealt out harsh prison sentences for illegal possession of weapons. It seemed unfair to Jews that those who had been defending themselves from murder should be treated equally with their would-be murderers. A few months later, the British proclaimed an amnesty and released all those who had been sentenced.

One of the Jews imprisoned and then amnestied was Vladimir Jabotinsky, a Zionist leader and former British soldier who had led the defence of Jerusalem in 1920. He became disillusioned both with the British and with the Zionist movement whose policy of peaceful cooperation with the British, he believed, would lead to the destruction of the Jewish National Home. He founded a new movement called 'Revised Zionism' or 'Revisionism', which aimed for a fully independent Jewish state (not just a 'National Home'), in the whole of the Palestine Mandate, and also rejected the mainstream Zionist movement's socialistic ideology in favour of a free-market philosophy.

Also in those riots, the handful of Jews living on the Golan Heights were expelled. They had been farming there on land that had been purchased in the 1880s. Another tract of 18,000 acres further east, in what is today Syria, had been purchased by Baron Rothschild in 1891. The Jews who settled there had been expelled by the Ottoman provincial ruler soon afterwards. (But Rothschild had retained title to the land; his family donated it to the State of Israel in 1957.)

In 1921, the Jewish area of Jerusalem was attacked again, Jews all over Palestine were murdered, and many Jewish farms and settlements were destroyed. The British responded by temporarily suspending Jewish immigration.

They also removed the Mayor of Jerusalem for inciting anti-Semitic riots, but as a conciliatory gesture replaced him by his nephew Haj Amin al-Husseini, a leader of those riots who had been granted amnesty, and who now did everything in his power to incite anti-Semitic hatred and organise anti-Semitic violence. He added a new libel to the standard repertoire, namely that The Jews were plotting to demolish the Al-Aqsa mosque and replace it by a synagogue. Within a year, he was also appointed Grand Mufti of Jerusalem (i.e. the senior Muslim cleric in Palestine) and became the dominant Arab political figure in the region for the next two decades.

Part 2: The Gathering Storm

Mon, 05/05/2003 - 19:11 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Conversion?

Before the twentieth century, Jews had responded to anti-Semitism in various ways, of which the most important were: endurance, conversion and assimilation. But large-scale conversions occurred only under direct duress, and assimilated Jews were sometimes targeted as much as traditional Jews.

Conversion of whom? By whom? To what?

by a reader on Tue, 05/06/2003 - 00:03 | reply

Conversion

Mostly to Christianity, by christians.

by Alan Forrester on Tue, 05/06/2003 - 00:21 | reply

Conversions of Jews to Christ...

Conversions of Jews to Christianity and Islam of course.

by a reader on Tue, 05/06/2003 - 01:24 | reply

Other European happenings...

Would it be possible to mention some specifics of the treatment of Jews in particular European countries prior to 1900, and their roles in various societies? I imagine that to some extent that situation is relevant in understanding how various states' attitudes have crystallized today.

by a reader on Tue, 05/06/2003 - 23:01 | reply

Anti-Semitism and Zionism, part I

An excellent beginning. You've read your sources well. I'd suggest that you provide more documentation, though, if you can; some of your readers (especially those who disagree with you) will demand it.

For example, you might provide links in your text to a page of footnotes in your printed sources... so that anyone who doubts the forced conversions of Jews to Christianity during the Inquisitions, for example, would know where to look (and in which book) for your sources.

It also occurs to me that you haven't mentioned the Inquisitions (of Spain, Portugal, etc.). I think that might be pertinent; in the Inquisitions we saw the largest wholesale persecutions of Jews that would be known until the rise of Hitler.

As I said, though, a very good beginning! I look forward to future installments -- the partitioning of Palestine (east and west of the Jordan), the Haganah and its rivals, the wall-and-watchtower era, and so forth.
best wishes,

Daniel Schwartz
Medford, MA

by a reader on Wed, 05/07/2003 - 22:38 | reply

Zionism good or bad?

It's fair for Jews to have their own land as long as the human rights of the surrounding nations are not violated. Is it true that this nation has 110 different nuclear weapons- I know it is. In the event of war, the whole middle east will go under water.

Zionism is o.k to be concerned with the existence of Israel. What about if it is concerned with its expansion however, on the detriment of surrounding nations, violation of human rights etc. Do you know that the island of Cyprus is within the concept of the "GREAT ISRAEL?" The Armenians suffered a genocide of the Turks; Why U.S and other countries with the exception of France and Greece do not recognize such genocide? I think we should be fair to the Jews as much as we should be fair to other people that went through genocides. By adopting double standards is not the way to justice or truth.

by Reader on Fri, 03/18/2005 - 10:14 | reply

Zionism

Read the remaining instalments of this series.

Reader is mistaken: Israel's existence does not violate the 'rights' of other countries; there have been several Middle-East wars involving Israel after it developed nuclear weapons (all of them caused by murderous attacks on Israel) but they did not cause the Middle East to 'go under', because Israel is a civilised country. As for the proposal that 'we' should de-legitimise Israel out of fairness unless the Armenian genocide and every other wrong in the world is first 'recognised', or the absurd theories of Israeli expansionism, or the whole line of argument in that comment, this just demonstrates how the only way to reach the conclusion that Zionism is 'bad', is to ignore facts and base one's policies on conspiracy theories and antisemitism.

by Editor on Fri, 03/18/2005 - 15:38 | reply

That reader didn't stay on th

That reader didn't stay on the subject, so typically of that of an Arabists propagandists' menu:
'Attack the Zionists with ANY aslander, and then run...'

I have seen this before they insert some drama slogan, like: "human rights", as if Israeli Arabs are less well off than minorities in the US (The opposite is true!).

What "human rights" is he talking about?

The (surrounding) Arab Muslims' human rights squashed under their leaders' brutality (all of them as of today still on Nov-2005) and divert their attention to the "zionist-enemy"?

Is he maybe talking about the Syrian phony claim to Baron Rothchild's Golan heights where the Druze live better there than under the Syrian boot?

Not even going into the "judenrein" (areas where they plan to establish, a never before in history, a country by the name of:) "Palestine" where no Jew is allowed to live.

But even him mentioning Cyprus, which I don't see any Zionist leader having a "plan" there, shows the reader was brainwashed by an Arab Muslim that convinced him that the "Zionists are out to get him in Cyprus".

From this point on, there's no much sense in elaborating any further.

Only reaffirming again, who the victim is...

Lies!

by a reader on Mon, 11/07/2005 - 02:55 | reply

the true vitims are the milli

the true vitims are the millions slain for there leaders thoughts and views jewish and non jewish. Remember we r all human and live on the same rock, No culture has the right to put there needs first. just think if u were born and raised a muslim would ur veiws be the same? I doubt it.

by derrick on Tue, 08/22/2006 - 03:31 | reply

"No culture has the right to

"No culture has the right to put there needs first." Yes they do. That's the whole point of having different nations. What matters is whether the culture is giving individuals different rights based on cultural differences. To my knowledge, proof of Israel having done this or anything like it can only be found in the fevered imaginations of liberals and anti-Semites.

by EJS on Wed, 04/11/2007 - 21:19 | reply

A Short History of Israel

Table of Contents

Introduction announcing this series

Section 1: How Israel was Created

1. Anti-Semitism and Zionism
2. The Gathering Storm
3. The War of Independence

Section 2: The State of Israel

4. Independence, But No Peace
5. The Suez Crisis
6. Eleven Years of Fighting, Six Days of War
7. Settlements

Section 3: Peace Processes and Terrorist Attacks

8. The Yom Kippur War
9. The Rise of the PLO
10. ...And Then The World Changed

...

Sources

- Israel, A History, by Martin Gilbert
- United Nations Information System on the Question of Palestine
- Historical Document Archive of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Israel
- Jewish Virtual Library

Mon, 05/05/2003 - 19:20 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Anti-Semitism and Zionism

The first installment of our short history of Israel is up! You can find it here.

The table of contents page, which includes the sources, is here.

Mon, 05/05/2003 - 19:45 | permalink

Maps

Anyone know where I can find good maps, showing the relevant areas?

by a reader on Mon, 05/05/2003 - 22:20

Maps

Excellent idea. We'll include some.

by Editor on Mon, 05/05/2003 - 23:31

What Are Armies For?

You may think it's obvious: armies are for defence. As Lt Smash said:

I'm here because my seven-year-old nephew has nightmares about terrorists.

And indeed that is what the US armed forces are ultimately for: they are the means by which Americans prevent bad people from coming to hurt American children, and adults. Likewise that is what the British armed forces are for, and also – quintessentially – the Israel Defense Forces.

But, of course, that has not been the function of most armies in history, nor of most armies in existence today. Some have exactly the opposite function: to go and hurt someone else's children, to loot, enslave and conquer the people of some other country. But that is not the core function of most armies either. Most commonly, the core function has nothing to do with the wars that they may or may not fight; it is to do with the internal functioning of their own country: the armed forces are the means by which the rulers keep themselves in power. In many cases this really does just come down to the crude business of murdering the ruler's rivals and their supporters, but often there is a complicated synergy between external war-fighting and the war against internal opposition.

OK. But now, how can we explain the purpose of this army?

“Old Europe” threw down the gauntlet at the feet of Britain, the United States and the Atlantic Alliance at a mini-summit yesterday, unveiling plans for a new Euro-army with its own military headquarters.

France, Germany, Belgium and Luxembourg - described by some in the US as the “Axis of Weasel” - vowed to press ahead with a full-fledged defence union, brushing aside warnings that the move would entrench the European Union's bitter divisions over Iraq and could lead to the break-up of Nato.

Much has been written ridiculing these moves, pointing out the glaring contradictions in the overt justifications presented by the Weasel nations. For example, the sole and defining policy difference between the military doctrines of the Weasels and those of the Good Guys is that in a certain class of cases where the Good Guys would fight, the Weasels will not. But what is the point of forming a separate military alliance for the sole purpose of not fighting? Actually, it's even worse than that, because the situations in which they would not fight are going to be all situations that are even remotely conceivable in practice. So they could, apparently, achieve the same effect by dismantling their armed forces.

Yes, armies have other legitimate uses – peacekeeping, disaster relief, military bands and formation flying at air displays – but note that the Weasels are already well provided-for in those respects. There is already a European Rapid Reaction Force that “operates under NATO operational command” (for now). So ... perhaps it is necessary to have a parallel Weasel-operated command structure just in case there should ever be an earthquake and the evil US President chooses to veto the dispatch of NATO troops to help.

Oh wait, that never happens ...

But anyway, this new entity is not like that. It is supposed to be a genuine war-fighting force:

While superficially similar, the new force is a different animal. It will be a fully-integrated Euro-army, and seems intended for combat in the future.

What sort of combat? Um...

There will be a “joint European protection capability” against weapons of mass destruction,

That may sound refreshingly robust. Until you remember that according to the military doctrine under which this force will operate, pre-emption is the ultimate crime. Worse than tyranny. Worse than mass murder and mass torture. Worse than fomenting terrorism. And worse – in particular – than any mere danger of weapons-of-mass-destruction attack. Therefore, by “protection capability”, they are referring strictly to forms of ‘protection’ that can be implemented after the attack has taken place. So actually we're back to disaster relief again. Plus, no doubt, special teams of soldiers with analytical equipment, to determine which of the many claims of responsibility to believe, so that the Weasel governments can know whom to appease next, or whether it is yet time to surrender outright.

No seven-year-olds were protected in the making of this army.

They're also proposing a “solidarity clause” binding EU states to face all forms of risk together as elements to be included in the new European constitution.

We don't know whether to laugh or cry. Will this clause be more binding or less binding than the one in the Nato Charter requiring the members to assist Turkey recently? Does anyone remember the “solidarity” displayed by Belgium in the first Gulf War, when it refused to sell ammunition to Britain? And again, given the doctrine under which all this is being done, “facing all forms of risk together” means no more nor less than that in future conflicts, Britain would be forbidden to fight on the right side without France's explicit permission (which, given that war is always an acknowledgement of failure, would never be granted), while the Weasels would continue to be entitled to do the wrong thing with impunity.

Yet we come back to the question: why do they need a new army to do all this? The thing is useless as an army, but it is almost as expensive as one – in fact more expensive if one includes the wilful ruin of irreplaceable stores of goodwill and friendship that it entails. What purpose is so desperately important that it justifies all that? It isn't to keep evil away from their seven-year-olds. It isn't to visit evil upon other people (it will do so, indirectly, but that is not its purpose: it isn't for raping and pillaging). Nor is it to have an excuse to chase down the leaders of the French and German opposition parties and torture them to death in secret cellars. What is it for?

It isn't for anything. To understand it, we need look no further than Lee Harris' classic analysis of Al Qaeda's Fantasy Ideology.

It was not aimed at altering the minds of other people or persuading them to act differently. Its whole point was what it did for him.

And what it did for him was to provide him with a fantasy – a fantasy, namely, of taking part in the revolutionary struggle of the oppressed against their oppressors.

[...]

A fantasy ideology is one that seizes the opportunity offered by such a lack of realism in a political group and makes the most of it. This it is able to do through symbols and rituals, all of which are designed to permit the members of the political group to indulge in a kind of fantasy role-playing.

So it's not what the new army will do that counts for anything. It is the very act of proposing it, of achieving the role-playing semblance of standing up for their ideology, not against any real threat (those, they deal with differently of course), but against – inevitably – the United States. And against the rest of the Anglosphere, and Israel. Against anyone, in short, whose reason for acting, and for having armies, is both real and good.

Tue, 05/06/2003 - 22:45 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Was the cold war so long ago that you can't remember it?

What history teaches is this – that people and governments have never learnt anything from history, or acted on principles deduced from it.

The point of a European military is to keep the US power in check.

The point of the US military is to protect our vast amounts of wealth, much of which is built on exploitation of other countries.

You are starting off with the assumption that the US is, always has been, and always will be a benign force, which acts only for the good of everyone in the world.

You can't actually believe that, can you?

We are not the worst there has ever been, but we have done a lot of bad things.

We are the only country to ever nuke another.

We sponsored military coups of democratically elected leaders. We actively exploit many other countries which have less than us to begin with.

We use 25% of the world's energy, while having only 5% the world's population. We produce as much pollution as China, even though we have far superior technology and 1 BILLION less people, less than 1/4th the population.

And our corporations are literally invading the entire world. There are McDonald's even in communist China.

Considering that we went into Iraq - with the 2nd largest known oil reserves in the world - virtually unopposed is why Europe wants a real military.

We used to have the USSR to keep us in check.

The founding fathers of our country recognized the value of checks and balances, because absolute power corrupts absolutely.

While in many ways we (citizens) benefit from our country taking over the world, they (political and economic leaders) see us as "other" just as much as foreigners, which makes us ultimately a legitimate target. We should all be concerned. For this reason, I support the Europeans in this.

Think of it this way: It can be very cushy living in a mob family, but it can be very dangerous as well. If the rival family finally takes out the boss, it's over, and you can go back to being a regular person.

by Jay Aziza on Wed, 12/20/2006 - 18:06 | reply

Good and Evil

1. "Nuke another" country
To stop evil.

2. "Staged coups"
Yes.. Often for good purposes but sometimes creating evil.

3. "Use 25%, of the world's energy"
But our technology has created more than 25% of the world's wealth. Proof: They are living longer and supporting much larger populations.

4. "Our corporations ... (e.g. "McDonalds")...(are)..invading the entire world."

Tell them to stop asking for Big Macs.

by a reader on Wed, 12/20/2006 - 23:47 | reply

Deductions From History

Jay Aziza wrote:

What history teaches is this – that people and governments have never learnt anything from history, or acted on principles deduced from it.

Now, what are the principles deduced from history?

-- Cyrus Ferdowsi, <http://libiran.blogspot.com>

by Liberal Iranian on Fri, 12/22/2006 - 02:16 | reply

Lunatics, the Asylum, Self-parodying ...

What is there left to say? We've already heard about all this stuff:

The [United Nations Human Rights Commission] now includes six of the world's most repressive regimes - Cuba, Libya, Saudi Arabia, Sudan, China and Vietnam. A UN committee on the rights of women is headed by Iran. The former regime in Iraq was at one stage scheduled to chair a conference on disarmament. Meanwhile, the US two years ago lost its seat on the body it helped to set up in 1947. The situation can only be described as cultural relativism gone mad.

And we've all heard that Libya chairs the UN Human Rights Commission.

If there was still any sanity left in the institutions that purport to regulate international affairs, there would now be a good opportunity for satire. "Whatever next?" one would ask, and then one would invent an even more extreme travesty.

But what chance does a satirist have, if the reader can instead just look at today's news and find something so outrageous that no satirist would have dared invent it? So - try it. Think of a joke appointment that would be more absurd than the above.

Done that? OK now look at this:

Zimbabwe's police commissioner, who is accused of being a driving force behind President Robert Mugabe's brutal repression of opponents, has been appointed honorary vice-president of Interpol.

Augustine Chihuri is on a list of close Mugabe associates subject to sanctions by the European Union and the United States because of the regime's human rights abuses. Yet it emerged yesterday that he has accepted an invitation from the international police organisation's President, Jesus Espigares Mira, to take up the honorary post. The Zimbabwe Herald, the state-owned newspaper which is a mouthpiece for the Mugabe government, said the appointment was a "show of confidence" in the Zimbabwean police force by the international community.

How did you do? Was your idea more absurd and wicked than the reality, or less? If more, we think you should consider abandoning your day job.

Fri, 05/09/2003 - 01:55 | permalink

Copyright © 2005 Setting The World To Rights

Setting The World To Rights

Ideas have consequences.

New Testament Quotations

These are quotations from the King James Bible that we referred to here.

Matthew

6:24 No man can serve two masters: for either he will hate the one, and love the other; or else he will hold to the one, and despise the other. Ye cannot serve God and mammon.

6:25 Therefore I say unto you, Take no thought for your life, what ye shall eat, or what ye shall drink; nor yet for your body, what ye shall put on. Is not the life more than meat, and the body than raiment?

6:26 Behold the fowls of the air: for they sow not, neither do they reap, nor gather into barns; yet your heavenly Father feedeth them. Are ye not much better than they?

6:27 Which of you by taking thought can add one cubit unto his stature?

6:28 And why take ye thought for raiment? Consider the lilies of the field, how they grow; they toil not, neither do they spin:

6:29 And yet I say unto you, That even Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these.

6:30 Wherefore, if God so clothe the grass of the field, which to day is, and to morrow is cast into the oven, shall he not much more clothe you, O ye of little faith?

6:31 Therefore take no thought, saying, What shall we eat? or, What shall we drink? or, Wherewithal shall we be clothed?

6:32 (For after all these things do the Gentiles seek:) for your heavenly Father knoweth that ye have need of all these things.

6:33 But seek ye first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness; and all these things shall be added unto you.

6:34 Take therefore no thought for the morrow: for the morrow shall take thought for the things of itself. Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof.

.....
19:21 Jesus said unto him, If thou wilt be perfect, go and sell that thou hast, and give to the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven: and come and follow me.

.....

19:23 Then said Jesus unto his disciples, Verily I say unto you, That a rich man shall hardly enter into the kingdom of heaven.

19:24 And again I say unto you, It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle, than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God.

.....

19:29 And every one that hath forsaken houses, or brethren, or sisters, or father, or mother, or wife, or children, or lands, for my name's sake, shall receive an hundredfold, and shall inherit everlasting life.

Fri, 05/09/2003 - 14:32 | permalink

Frank Meets Jesus

We're delighted to see that Frank of IMAO is willing to contemplate abandoning his religion if Jesus turns out to be an asshole:

Finally, I had a lab assistant stop my own heart temporarily. I found myself at the gates of Heaven, and there stood Jesus.

"The time of your judgment has come," thus spake Jesus, "and now I shall..."

"Sorry to interrupt, Jesus, but I'm only here temporarily," I informed Him, "You see, Laurence Simon wanted to know if there is a Doggy Heaven, and I knew you'd have the answer."

"Yes, and the answer is... Wait a second; did you say 'Laurence Simon'? He's a Jew, and he'll just use this information for the Zionist conspiracy."

"What are you talking about?"

"Hey, I already have enough problem dealing with dead Iraqis since those bagel eating neoconservatives tricked Bush into attacking Iraq."

"Oh my God, Jesus, you're like a total anti-Semite!"

"Hey, just because someone raises legitimate questions about whether the Holocaust happened, doesn't make him an 'anti-Semite'."

"How can you be a Holocaust denier? You must have met all the dead people."

"Yeah, but I think they were lying about how they died as part of their Zionist conspiracy. It's all so they can oppress the peaceful Palestinians and..."

At this point, Jesus started cracking up, and I knew he was just pulling my leg. "You're such a rascal, Jesus."

"I had you going there, didn't I, though?"

"Yeah. I was thinking, 'Man, this Jesus is an asshole.

"I think maybe I'll become a Buddhist."

"Sorry, but I just love playing jokes on people. You should see how much I mind-fk the atheists."

[Our emphasis.]

Now ... can anyone think of any way of persuading Frank to read the New Testament?

Fri, 05/09/2003 - 22:45 | permalink

It Wouldn't Matter

Notice that Frank didn't say "...I think maybe I'll give up religion."

He'd rather adopt Buddhism, a religion that he'd never before considered to be true, than reject religion altogether. Because he seems to care more about being religious than about the content of the particular religion he's landed in.

He didn't consider leaving Christianity because he discovered it was false, but because it became uncomfortable. He has a stronger commitment to the comfortable lie than to reason.

On the other hand, he is funny, sometimes.

by Gil on Sat, 05/10/2003 - 05:21 | reply

Frank's Education, Continued

Since reading this article, I've been pondering this issue (no, not that of Frank's sadly lacking education, but of how Christians can read the Bible and take it seriously). I asked some good friends with theological backgrounds to comment, and one replied:

Money generally gets a very bad press in the NT – e.g.

In the Gospels – giving up everything is the only way the rich young ruler can get into heaven (his morality is already beyond question, but he is excluded because he won't give all his possessions up).

It doesn't stop at giving up material things – one potential follower is excluded because he wants to bury his father before he gives up everything and is told 'let the dead bury the dead' – there is a prevailing apocalyptic morality in which familial relationships must be abandoned in favour of serving God. In a parable Jesus excludes those who care about land they've bought or a person they have that day married – God is first, middle and last and nothing else can have priority.

In Acts the early Christians form a kind of commune and everything is handed over to be kept in common – one couple keep back some land of their own and are struck dead for their 'sin'

In terms of attitudes to women -

There is advice in Corinthians about correct dress for women to worship in and Paul has several references to women not being suitable to lead. He instructs women to be subservient in the same way as men should be subservient to Christ, with a resulting whole philosophy of male 'headship'.

The story of the woman taken in adultery is a bit double edged - although Jesus saves her life and prevents her being stoned, pointing out the fallibility of everyone, she is then told 'go and sin no more' - she is 'let off', but sex outside marriage is still bad.

Slavery is not questioned - "slaves, obey your masters". (Those translations which say "servants, obey your masters" were simply masking the historical reality, probably because "servants" was more culturally useful at the time of the King's James translation, which is very inaccurate generally.) The whole book of Philemon concerns a slave who has become a Christian and although Paul wants Onesimus (his owner) to let Paul have him he acknowledges the primary ownership of another person as a given.

For more general thinking the sermon on the mount (on the plain in Luke's gospel) glorifies suffering as a means of salvation and the central theme of Luke unfolds in the verse - 'whoever would follow me, let him first deny himself, take up his cross and follow me.' Suffering and self denial are very much good things. The 'suffering servant' Christology is a very strong motif and is held up as a model of discipleship.

Luke also contains Mary's Magnificat which talks of those who have losing what they have and the rich becoming poor.

How does Frank gloss over all this? How do other Christians rationalize it? Beats me! Can anyone explain it to me?

by a reader on Sun, 05/18/2003 - 18:14 | reply

Glossing Over Bad Ideas In The Bible

Well, one technique is to realise is no one uses them today, they really don't matter. Christianity has evolved, the current day version is better, and so people go by that. You may be objecting "if it changed, how can it be true?" And that is a problem even many Christians have. But the notion of "true and mutable" is actually a very important epistemic truth. We can and should hold our best theories true, and at the same time seek to improve them. And when they do improve, we should hold these new theories true, knowing full well they will be replaced. If you're objecting that "true" is supposed to mean "absolutely true" you've forgotten fallibility.

If you want something to bug Frank about, tell him that washing a child's mouth out with soap is not funny. cringe

-- Elliot Temple
<http://curi.blogspot.com/>

by Elliot Temple on Sun, 05/18/2003 - 20:32 | reply

Reconciling The Bible and Reason

I think that the problem with the question is that it assumes that people go to religion because they think it's a great source of truth. Only idiots think that today. But many non-idiots continue to be religious.

I think people go to religion for authority (both to relieve themselves of the responsibility of figuring out what's right, and to use as a weapon against others), for social bonding, for emotional comfort; not for true explanations. Elliot has to do lots of contortions and tap dancing to pretend that Christianity is something like an evolving body of knowledge containing our best theories. It isn't. I don't think it ever was.

So, I don't think there is a problem reconciling religion with the truth and the best theories available. I don't think anybody seriously tries to do this (who isn't willing to delude himself, and is thus not serious about it). I think they've effectively separated the parts of their minds that are interested in the truth from the parts that are drawn to religion. If the only way to read a passage as true is to "interpret" it as having a message completely different from its plain meaning, you have to undercut the entire authority of the text as the revealed word of an omniscient God. It's not comfortable to go there, so people who want to be religious just don't go there.

I think this is similar to some of the anti-war activists who rely on slogans and leftist consensus rather than arguments and explanations. They're not trying to pursue the truth, they're reveling in something that they like; something that people like them agree upon; something that lets them emotionally vent outrage at ideological enemies. It's not about what's reasonable, it's about what's comfortable.

by Gil on Sun, 05/18/2003 - 23:28 | reply

Delusions

To think that the memes perpetuated by a religion are not affecting people today- that a religion has changed and 'improved'- is a delusion, in this reader's opinion. These memes are so deeply inculcated into the culture that people don't even realize where they come from, and even those who are not 'religious' absorb and expound them- from patriarchy and women's inferiority to the glorification of suffering and sacrifice, to the necessity of authority outside of one's self. These bad ideas cannot just be glossed over; a thorough deconstruction, in the light of reason, along with better ideas to replace them with, are necessary. It's slow going, but it's possible and desirable.

by a reader on Fri, 05/23/2003 - 15:45 | reply

Re: Delusions

To think that the memes perpetuated by a religion are not affecting people today- that a religion has changed and 'improved'- is a delusion, in this reader's opinion. These memes are so deeply inculcated into the culture that people don't even realize where they come from, and even those who are not 'religious' absorb and expound them

Aren't you contradicting yourself here? If non-religious people absorb and expound them (which I agree they do), then these memes are not being perpetuated by a religion, right?

by David Deutsch on Sat, 05/24/2003 - 23:43 | reply

Re: Re: Delusions

David asks:

Aren't you contradicting yourself here? If non-religious people absorb and expound them (which I agree they do), then these memes are not being perpetuated by a religion, right?

Does "perpetuated by" have to mean "exclusively perpetuated by"?

If not, then I don't see a contradiction.

I'm not the reader who posted it. I just like to pick nits. :-)

by Gil on Sun, 05/25/2003 - 00:19 | reply

2. The Gathering Storm

This is the second part of our series, "A Short History of Israel". If you have not read our introduction, it is here. Part 1 is here. See also, the Table of Contents, where you will find links to the other parts when they are posted.

.....

In 1923 the British ceded the Golan Heights from Palestine to the neighbouring French Mandate of Syria, and partitioned the Palestine Mandate [MAP] into an Arab autonomous region, which they called Transjordan (today's Jordan), and the western part, which they now called Palestine (today's West Bank, Israel, and Gaza Strip) [MAP]. They barred Jews from settling in Transjordan and announced that the Jewish National Home was to be created only in the western part.

In the Arab riots of 1929, the ancient Jewish community living near the holy places in the Arab town of Hebron were massacred and the survivors fled. Jews were also murdered in Safed, Jerusalem and Jaffa. The Jews of Palestine complained that the British authorities had done nothing to prevent these murders. Jewish self-defence militias, which had existed since Ottoman times, grew, and were unified into a single organisation, the Haganah (which means 'defence').

Arab violence grew worse. The British responded with a combination of force and conciliatory measures – i.e. measures against Jewish immigration and Jewish self-defence. The Jewish population became increasingly fearful for their lives and for those of European Jews, and distrustful and contemptuous of the British.

In 1931 some members of the Revisionist Party formed the Irgun (full name: Irgun Tzeva'i Le'umi, meaning National Military Organization, sometimes known by its Hebrew acronym Etzel), which would fight the British for independence, and also retaliate violently for murders of Jews, sometimes by murdering innocent Arabs. Thus it was a terrorist organisation, and great bitterness developed between it and the Haganah, whose constitution required it to act only in self-defence and which followed the mainstream Zionists' doctrine of restraint and cooperation. The Haganah and the Irgun each believed that the other was betraying the Zionist project, undermining its chances of succeeding, and hence endangering all Jews.

The rapid development of the country set in motion by the Jewish National Home project dramatically reversed the demographic and economic decline of the previous century. The flow of Arab emigration was replaced by Arab immigration and return of former emigrants. One immigrant was Yasser Arafat, who was born in Cairo in 1929 of an Egyptian father and a mother whose family came from Palestine. When he was four, she died and he was sent to live with relatives in Jerusalem.

The Nazis came to power in Germany in 1933. The Grand Mufti (al-Husseini) immediately approached the German Consul General in Jerusalem and offered his services. The Nazis were initially lukewarm to this offer because they still hoped to come to an accommodation (or even an alliance) with the British Empire. In Germany, they immediately embarked on anti-Semitic persecution, which soon included widespread murder. German Jewish refugees began to arrive in Palestine. The Arabs of Palestine demanded a ban on all Jewish land purchases and a complete end to Jewish immigration. In 1936, when the British refused the first demand and responded to the second merely by lowering the Jewish immigration quota, the Arabs responded with riots on an unprecedented scale.

In 1937 the Peel Commission proposed that Palestine (i.e. the western part of the original Mandate) would be further partitioned into Jewish and Arab self-governing regions [MAP]. The Zionists accepted partition, though they wanted to renegotiate the proposed borders (mainly because they excluded Jerusalem and several areas that had been developed by the Jewish Agency). But a conference of Arab leaders categorically rejected the idea of partition and declared that the British would now have to choose "between our friendship and the Jews".

Britain chose the former. In the White Paper of 1939 (usually referred to as 'the White Paper'), it finally abandoned the idea of a Jewish National Home. Jewish immigration to Palestine was to be limited to a further 100,000 in total, spread over five years. Jewish purchases of land were to be forbidden except within existing Jewish areas. After five years (i.e. in May, 1944), majority rule in the form of an all-Palestine legislature was to be introduced. The Arabs made it clear that at that point, they would use their majority in Palestine as a whole to ban all Jewish immigration.

All other countries (including Britain itself) had already imposed minuscule immigration quotas, so that in total, the world was prepared to give refuge to only a fraction of the hundreds of thousands of Jews trying to escape from Germany. The rest, and the millions of Jews in Nazi-sympathising countries and in countries that were shortly to be invaded by Germany, were trapped there by that universal consensus, several years before the Germans began the Final Solution.

The Nazis, too, sought the friendship of Arab nationalists. They finally accepted the Mufti's offer.

The Haganah, in addition to its self-defence activities, organised peaceful demonstrations against the White Paper, and secretly began to support illegal Jewish immigration.

The Irgun had been organising such immigration for some time. With its help, and now also that of the Haganah, perhaps 25,000 European Jews succeeded in entering Palestine illegally. The number was so low because there were enormous difficulties: the refugees had to run the gauntlet of both officially- and unofficially-organised violence and expropriation in their home countries; they faced weeks of travel involving extortion, hardship and danger. The authorities in all the countries along their route were trying to stop them (both spontaneously and under pressure from Britain). Then, since they had to come by sea, they had to contend with scarce and unsafe boats (they could not use ordinary shipping lines, of course) and with the Royal Navy. Finally they had to enter and live undetected in Palestine.

Meanwhile Arab immigration continued. The number of Arab immigrants to Palestine during the Mandate period is unknown and highly controversial, but the net increase in the Arab Palestinian population was about twice the net increase in the Jewish Palestinian population.

When the Second World War began in September 1939, the British outlawed the Haganah. Illegal possession of a weapon was made a capital offence. Heavy diplomatic pressure was placed on all the countries on the main Jewish escape routes to Palestine to close those routes down, and on Mediterranean countries to ensure that no transportation was available. As a Foreign Office minute put it in December 1939 "The only hope is that all the German Jews will be stuck at the mouth of the Danube for lack of ships to take them". The Royal Navy's patrols to intercept illegal immigrants were increased. Those who were caught were imprisoned on the island of Mauritius in the Indian Ocean, where the regime was designed to be (in the words of a Colonial Office minute of January 1941) "sufficiently punitive to continue to act as a deterrent to other Jews in Eastern Europe". Internees were also forbidden to join the Allied armed forces. Legal immigration was restricted to levels below even those of the White Paper. For almost a year during 1941, no legal immigration certificates were issued at all.

As the war continued, these measures were gradually relaxed. Many Haganah and Irgun members volunteered for the British armed forces: 30,000 of the half-million Jews of Palestine enlisted (as compared with 9,000 of the 1.5 million Arabs). Many volunteered for hazardous operations behind enemy lines. The Irgun promised not to attack British forces for the duration of the war. A small splinter group, Lehi (disparagingly known as the 'Stern Gang', after their leader Avraham Stern), refused to cease operations because they deemed that the White Paper had made the British legitimate targets.

The British relaxed the immigration restrictions for Palestine in 1943 – Jews fleeing from the Holocaust could now enter Palestine at will if they got as far as Turkey, but by now only a handful were arriving. Conditions at the Mauritius prison were not improved until 1944.

When France surrendered in 1940, the Nazis set up an intelligence and propaganda base in Syria (nominally under the control of the puppet Vichy French government), from where, in April 1941, they helped to instigate a pro-Nazi coup in Iraq, headed by Rashid Ali al-Gailani, a former Prime Minister and associate of the Mufti. In support of the coup, the Mufti, who had been deposed by the British for inciting the 1936 riots, declared jihad (holy war) against the British. The coup was soon suppressed by British soldiers (though not before about 150 Iraqi Jews had been murdered). Al-Gailani fled to Germany to join the Mufti who was trying to negotiate a formal Arab-Nazi alliance with Hitler against the Jews and British. They both remained with the Nazis for the rest of the war.

The Mufti made Nazi propaganda broadcasts, organised parachute attacks against the British, and helped to recruit an army of over 20,000 Muslim SS volunteers in Yugoslavia, for which purpose he was formally admitted to the SS with the rank of Gruppenführer (Major General). Captured by the French after the war, he escaped (thus avoiding prosecution as a war criminal by the Yugoslav government), and found refuge in Egypt, where he continued to incite violence and demand the total expulsion of Jews from Palestine until his death in 1974.

In May 1941, the Haganah began secretly training an elite fighting force (the Palmach).

In the late 1930s, some congressmen in the United States argued that Alaska (which was at that time being prepared for Statehood and was in dire need of immigrants) should be exempted from the United States' immigration quotas so that some victims of Nazi persecution could find refuge there. In November 1938, Representative Charles Buckley of New York wrote an open letter to President Roosevelt asking him to support legislation to that effect. Roosevelt refused. The idea also encountered considerable opposition in Alaska itself. It continued to be discussed for several more years but never found enough support. In 1939 the Wagner-Rogers bill, which would have admitted 20,000 refugee children to the United States, failed in the Senate.

During the war, most of the Jews of Europe were murdered by the Germans and their allies and collaborators.

Part 3: The War of Independence

Sat, 05/10/2003 - 14:31 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

The Irgun

Did the Irgun begin as a terrorist organization or did it turn into one later? I read somewhere it started out more like the Haganah. Is it fair to call it terrorist?

by Rob Klein on Sat, 05/10/2003 - 16:48 | reply

The Irgun

We have responded to the above comment here.

by Editor on Mon, 05/12/2003 - 20:35 | reply

The Irgun

On the question of whether or not Irgun was a terrorist organization: at the risk of splitting hairs, I would argue that, if we accept terrorism to be the deliberate (and random) targeting of civilians for the political purpose of undermining society, then Irgun's status is ambiguous. Yes, Irgun did carry out assassinations and bombings (in addition to its status as a paramilitary organization). But Irgun's targets were military targets, with no exceptions that I'm aware of. Even the King David hotel bombing (a subject of great controversy all by itself), which is often cited as a deliberate attack on civilians, was not -- the King David was targeted because it was the headquarters of the British military administration in Jerusalem. (The personnel of the hotel were also warned before the attack, something I heartily wish modern terrorist organizations would emulate.)

Lehi, on the other hand (Lohamei Herut Israel, the "Freedom Fighters of Israel"), did indeed target civilians and diplomatic targets.

Daniel Schwartz
Medford, MA

by a reader on Tue, 05/13/2003 - 21:04 | reply

The Irgun

We'd omit the provisos "random" and "undermining society" from your definition of terrorism. But in any case, for the other reasons you give, the blowing up of the King David Hotel was not a terrorist act. But things like this were:

Etzel rejected the 'restraint' policy of the Haganah and carried out armed reprisals against Arabs, which were condemned by the Jewish Agency. Many of its members were arrested by the British authorities; one of them, Shlomo Ben Yosef, was hanged for shooting an Arab bus.

(See <http://www.us-israel.org/jsource/History/irgun.html>.)

by Editor on Tue, 05/13/2003 - 21:31 | reply

Arab Immigration

Meanwhile Arab immigration continued. The number of Arab immigrants to Palestine during the Mandate period is unknown and highly controversial, but the net increase in the Arab Palestinian population was about twice the net increase in the Jewish Palestinian population.

If one compares the rise in birthrates across the region during this period, coupled with the lack of any serious documentation about immigration in the area, it is not honest to ascribe the rise in Arab population to immigration alone. Birthrates were multiplying in Syria, and the Lebanon, and presumably Palestine (where data is scarce). Anecdotal evidence suggests that immigration was limited. But, as you say, there is no solid evidence one way or the other, but the balance of mediocre evidence would suggest that immigration did not play a large role in the population rise, and that better accounting and higher birthrates were the primary causes.

by a reader on Wed, 07/02/2003 - 19:05 | reply

They didn't

They didn't "ascribe the rise in Arab population to immigration alone". But if the hugely increased economic activity and infrastructure building in the Jewish-settled areas did not cause a huge influx of labor from the surrounding run-down region, how would you explain that? It wouldn't make sense.

by a reader on Sun, 10/24/2004 - 00:08 | reply

Standards of living were incr

Standards of living were increasing throughout this time period, which would naturally increase birth rates. I personally don't believe that immigration was the chief cause for the increased Palestinian population.

by a reader on Thu, 11/11/2004 - 05:11 | reply

i just wanted to knoe, if it i just wanted to knoe, if it was in the year 1939 and i lived in germany. What route do i take to get out of germany so i can get to america? can ise the picture?

-thanks

by a reader on Wed, 01/19/2005 - 14:49 | reply

There was no route

There would have been no route to America, because the US quotas were filled and the US Government did not permit any more Jewish refugees to enter. See the story of the St Louis.

by Editor on Thu, 01/27/2005 - 19:32 | reply

home | archives | polls | search

Copyright © 2008 Setting The World To Rights

The Gathering Storm

Part 2 of our series, "A Short History of Israel" is up. Here is a taste:

In the Arab riots of 1929, the ancient Jewish community living near the holy places in the Arab town of Hebron were massacred and the survivors fled. Jews were also murdered in Safed, Jerusalem and Jaffa. The Jews of Palestine complained that the British authorities had done nothing to prevent these murders. Jewish self-defence militias, which had existed since Ottoman times, grew, and were unified into a single organisation, the Haganah (which means 'defence').

If you missed Part 1, there is a link to it in the Table of Contents. The introduction is here.

Sat, 05/10/2003 - 14:48 | permalink

In a Nearby Universe ...

Germany Now "Committed to Peace"

Millions of Germans claiming Sudeten-German descent today marched peacefully into the Czech Republic and declared a Nazi State there. The German government had been keeping them in squalid camps ever since the expulsion of all Sudeten-Germans from their homes at the end of World War 2. Over the decades, making cynical use of the original refugees' grievances, the failed and tyrannical German state has fed them and their descendants a relentless diet of Nazi propaganda in which all their suffering, and the myriad ills of German society as a whole, has been blamed on the Czech government and people. In four major wars and a non-stop terrorist campaign, Germany has tried unsuccessfully to reconquer the Czech Republic.

Today the German Government expressed its "quiet satisfaction" that it has at last been able to achieve that objective by peaceful means. "The long nightmare (or, as we Germans say, die Katastrophe) of the existence of an independent Czech nation on our doorstep has now been finally rectified", said a spokesman, who declared that Germany is now "absolutely committed" to peace.

Following the land-for-peace takeover, the UN is instituting an urgent relief effort for the surviving Czechs, who are being airlifted to Uganda where they belong.

In other news:

Canadian Intransigence Torpedoes Prospects for Peace with France

There is no more fundamental axiom of French culture than that Canada is sacred French land which must be returned to the glory of French rule. The 40 million French who claim Québécois descent have been kept for generations in refugee camps, and their children taught that their only purpose is to sacrifice their lives in a holy war of murder and conquest of Canada. The French Government, having failed several times to conquer Canada by conventional warfare, has sent thousands of Québécois-descended militants to murder English-speaking Canadians, whom they accuse of devouring the blood of French children and plotting to rule the world. French politicians have repeatedly threatened to "burn half of Canada" with their fearsome Force de Frappe. Now President Bush, in collaboration with the EU, the UN, and ~~the Soviet Union~~ Russia, has proposed a "Road Map" in the hope of ending the long cycle of violence.

But, as usual, Canada's intransigence threatens to torpedo all such conciliatory initiatives: although Canada has declared itself willing to make the "painful concession" of ceding Quebec to French sovereignty and forcibly relocating the English-speaking inhabitants, it has also declared in advance that it will never agree to a "right of return" of 40 million French "refugees" to Canada. Since Canada's population is only 32 million, "this would be a formula for the end of Canada as an independent nation," said a Canadian spokesman, "it would simply become another province of France and its English-speaking population would be oppressed, driven out or slaughtered." Dominic de Villepin, the French Foreign Minister, responded: "And votre point is?"

Sun, 05/11/2003 - 16:28 | permalink

Canadian Coincidence

You've heard of the FLQ, right? And who trained them? (see link) And, when their "targets included ... the homes of prominent English speakers in the wealthy Westmount area" (see link) -- you know who that means, right?

Fortunately, that was all in the far distant past.

by a reader on Sun, 05/11/2003 - 20:26 | reply

Not a Coincidence

Wow. In fact we did not know who that means. We should have guessed it on a priori grounds, but in fact we did not. Thank you for the information, "a reader".

by Editor on Mon, 05/12/2003 - 01:06 | reply

Delusions About Jurisdiction

Perry de Havilland is a jolly nice chap who often strikes us as a libertarian with some sense (and oh, how rare they seem), so we were somewhat taken aback by a recent article of his. Quoting this –

A United States federal judge has ruled that Iraq provided material support to Osama bin Laden and his terrorist group al-Qaeda for the September 11, 2001, attack and is liable to pay $US104 million ($163 million) in damages to two victims' families. The ruling, by Manhattan District Judge Harold Baer, is the first court decision stemming from the September 11 terrorist attacks.

– Perry stormed:

The notion a US court would think it had any standing or authority to order Saddam Hussain's Ba'ath Party, let alone the future post-Ba'athist government of Iraq, to do anything whatsoever is almost beyond belief. How divorced from reality is this? Judge Harold Baer and the people involved in this case must be suffering from serious metal delusions.

We guess that Perry can't have given this more than two seconds' thought before his the-state-can-do-no-right override cut in and his brain went offline, overwhelmed with revulsion at the idea of the American State 'intervening in someone else's affairs' – shock, horror: outside its jurisdiction. We have commented before on the unconscious statism inherent in this particular hangup.

Call us

"moronic" [...] "Cretinous? Idiotic? Ludicrous? Laughable?"

– but this seems to us a good illustration of the absurdity of the "non-intervention" idea. Of course the court in question had jurisdiction! For a start, there is, no doubt, money lying around in vaults in America whose legal ownership depends on the outcome of this case – for instance, on whether S. Hussein of Baghdad, or M. Omar of Kabul did or did not commit a tort against the plaintiffs. In other words, to decide what is legal or illegal by way of cash transfers within the US in 2003, the court has to decide on the legality or illegality of acts committed in Baghdad and Kabul in 2001. And furthermore, there is property all over the world, which may at any moment be involved in trade with the US, whose legal ownership depends on the same thing. And there are people all over the world, whose status in US law may change from 'trader' to 'bankrupt' as a result of the same issues.

Judge Harold Baer is just doing his job. The all-too-common yearning of Libertarians to keep the Saddams and the Omars immune from his judgment is ludicrous and reprehensible.

Mon, 05/12/2003 - 11:58 | permalink

What about Sharon?

What does The World think about the Belgian courts trying Ariel Sharon for alleged war crimes in Lebanon?

Is there a jurisdiction issue there?

by Gil on Mon, 05/12/2003 - 16:17 | reply

What about Sharon?

That's a very interesting and relevant question.

Basically the answer is that Belgian courts do sometimes have to take a position on the legality of acts committed in Lebanon or Israel. Generally, the way to do this is to recognise the decisions of courts with more immediate jurisdiction. In the case of the US court hearing a case about Saddam this could not be done because there was and still is no Iraqi court able to try Saddam and hear the case with integrity, or under a legal system conforming even to minimal standards of human rights or the rule of law.

The case of Sharon in Belgium is, first of all, a malicious prosecution and should have been thrown out on its merits. That it was not thrown out is pure political posturing on the part of the Belgian government. Secondly, the case has already been heard by the competent Israeli authorities and by a US court, and there is no reason, other than crass anti-Semitism anti-Zionism and anti-Americanism, for doubting that those cases were conducted with integrity. Hence, again, the Belgian courts should refuse to re-open the case.

by Editor on Mon, 05/12/2003 - 17:20 | reply

What about Sharon?

And thirdly, the Belgian court is attempting a criminal prosecution, while the argument we gave only justifies civil cases.

by Editor on Mon, 05/12/2003 - 18:01 | reply

He's a Good Guy!

According to a Rabbi who hosted Sharon at a university in the UK, Sharon insisted on holding the hand of his wife, even if it made him look weak when he was being jeered at by Palestinian supporters, because his wife had comforted him through the time of his first wife's death. Imagine that! A big strong warrior leader holding his wife's hand. I love the guy!

by Sylvia Crombie on Mon, 05/12/2003 - 20:05 | reply

He's a Good Guy

Sylvia Crombie:

:) We think that this might not quite count as decisive evidence in most courts. Nevertheless, in fact, he is not guilty of any war crime, and is indeed a good guy.

by Editor on Mon, 05/12/2003 - 20:23 | reply

Was the Irgun a Terrorist Organisation?

Rob Klein asked a very interesting question in a Comment on Part 2 of our Short History of Israel.

Did the Irgun begin as a terrorist organization or did it turn into one later? I read somewhere it started out more like the Haganah. Is it fair to call it terrorist?

We sympathise with the thrust of this question. We have to admit that our calling the Irgun a terrorist organisation is, in a sense, unfair, especially in today's climate when the media are unwilling to apply the term 'terrorist' even to organisations whose sole reason for existing is to murder innocents, and which rejoice and vie with each other over the sadistic cruelty of their violence. By comparison, the Irgun were mere apprentices, mere part-time amateurs at the business of murder. We hope we have made it clear in our History that the Irgun, in sharp contrast with terrorist organisations of today such as the PLO, Al Qaeda and Hamas (or with the fedayeen at the time), did not have the murder of innocents as its purpose or even as its principal tactic, that the great majority of its activities were not murderous, and that it saved thousands of lives.

Having said all that, though, we must also say (and here the Irgun would, we are sure, be the first to agree) that fairness is not always the overriding moral concern. In this case, we think it is more important to retain a decent use of language. If an organisation sometimes, occasionally, commits acts of terrorism, not as an aberration or in the heat of battle but as a deliberate and continuing policy, then even if it also does many good things, it should be called a terrorist organisation. We would not want to see Hamas designated non-terrorist because it also funds hospitals.

One should perhaps also say that the overall objective of the Irgun, which was essentially to try to mitigate the effects of anti-Semitic violence and mass murder by making immigration to Palestine available to Jews, was an overwhelmingly right one. Also, the degree of provocation – the impending Holocaust, British complicity, and relentless Arab mass murder – under which the Irgun made the decision to commit terrorism was arguably unsurpassed in history. Nevertheless the Haganah had a similar overall objective, and lived through the same terrible history under the same provocation, yet did not choose terrorism. Its policies remained true to its name (‘defence’) and to its ideals. We think – despite the unfairness which we recognise – that it is right to reflect that difference in the terminology we use.

Mon, 05/12/2003 - 20:14 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

What did the British do?

"One should perhaps also say that the overall objective of the Irgun, which was essentially to try to mitigate the effects of anti-Semitic violence and mass murder by making immigration to Palestine available to Jews, was an overwhelmingly right one. Also, the degree of provocation ♦ the impending Holocaust, British complicity"

What did the British do?

by Trace Element on Wed, 05/14/2003 - 12:12 | reply

What the British did

They were the ones who stopped the immigration and I also seem to recall that they banned Jews from carrying guns, I can't remember offhand whether they slapped the same ban on the Arabs.

by Alan Forrester on Wed, 05/14/2003 - 17:20 | reply

Was the Irgun a Terrorist Organization?

It is interesting, how we as humans always find a way to rationalize and justify the wrongs we commit, no matter how wrong they may be. I think that as members of the human race we need to change this, we must be more honest about ourselves and history. Only by being honest and coming to grips with the truth can we begin to maybe change things and build a better world for all humankind. In this article we see the phrases, "mitigate the effects of anti-Semitic violence", "Also, the degree of provocation – the impending Holocaust, British complicity, and relentless Arab mass murder...", all as a means to justify what the Irgun did. The Irgun was a terrorist organization and did commit many crimes just like the Arab terrorist did. Terrorism is terrorism no matter who does it. The Arab terrorist who terrorize the new settlers were wrong just like the Irgun that terrorizes the Arabs were wrong. Only with truth can we prevail. Please, let us be honest and say it as it is instead of painting a nice picture by trying rationalize, justify the evil acts we commit. When will we learn?

Juan Rodriguez

by a reader on Sat, 11/06/2004 - 03:23 | reply

Listen, If irgun was a terror

Listen, If irgun was a terrorist organization than so is hamas, plo, Islamic jihad etc.

they should be called so in the media and not militants.
second of all these terrorist are widely accepted and supported by the arab world. the Irgun was often condemned by the jewish agency and the jewish people who lived in israel pre 1948 and after 1948 Ben-Gurion bombed the 'Altalena' an Irgun ship that transported weapons and had many people on board. the bombing resulted in many casualties.
thirdly, the irgun was anti-british and tried to minimize civilian casualty unlike hamas, islamic jihad and plo before many of their operation they warned and told their plans to minimize civilians hurt. they were ordered specifically not to hurt anyone who surrenders unlike al-queda and hamas who execute anyone who falls in their hands, especially if they are jewish.
so don't compare between them, because if you do, you can also say that Washington was a terrorist, and that the US Army is the biggest terrorist group out there because texas, new mexico and california are 'occupied territories' and dallas, st. antonio, houston, and los angeles are all illegal settlement build by the americans to steal mexican land.
btw the wall separating the US and mexico is also an 'apartheid wall' designed to 'steal land'

by a reader on Fri, 12/17/2004 - 00:56 | reply

don't dress it up

Any combatant who does not display their identification (Uniform) and is a member of a recognised regime or governments's armed forces . Who attacks an armed representative of any nation with the intent of killing or wounding them is a terrorist. I recall the incident in the orange grove as an example.

by a reader on Wed, 01/05/2005 - 12:38 | reply

home | archives | polls | search

Copyright © 2008 Setting The World To Rights

Patriot (Yeah, Right) Refuses to Celebrate

Jeez, when are these idiotarians going to get it? In a recent article, Howard Zinn writes:

Our government has declared a military victory in Iraq. As a patriot, I will not celebrate. I will mourn the dead -- the American GIs, and also the Iraqi dead, of which there have been many, many more.

Does he think people who take a different view on the war do not mourn the dead?

I will mourn the Iraqi children, not just those who are dead, but those who have been blinded, crippled, disfigured, or traumatized, like the bombed children of Afghanistan who, as reported by American visitors, lost their power of speech. The American media has not given us a full picture of the human suffering caused by our bombing; for that, we need to read the foreign press.

Clearly he does not celebrate the lives of those who would still be being blinded, crippled, disfigured, or traumatized at this moment and for untold years to come, had they not been rescued against his will.

Nor does he mourn those who were blinded, crippled, disfigured, or traumatized by the regime that was removed despite his shrieking opposition. In our name, but not in his.

What are his perverted criteria for celebrating and mourning, then? Not whether innocents are saved or die, not whether right or wrong is done, but whether America is involved or not:

I suggest that a patriotic American who cares for his country might act on behalf of a different vision. Instead of being feared for our military prowess, we should want to be respected for our dedication to human rights.

Well duh. The fact that barking mad idiotarians are unable to see that this is ultimately what this whole war was about, doesn't mean others can't.

Should we not begin to redefine patriotism? We need to expand it beyond that narrow nationalism which has caused so much death and suffering. If national boundaries should not be obstacles to trade -- we call it globalization -- should they also not be obstacles to compassion and generosity?

Exactly! That's what we've been saying all along!

Should we not begin to consider all children, everywhere, as our own? In that case, war, which in our time is always an assault on children, would be unacceptable as a solution to the problems of the world. Human ingenuity would have to search for other ways.

Tell that to the millions of children who would have been tortured or murdered or enslaved but for the defeat of the tyrannies under which their parents lived. Tell that to the millions of American and British children who would likewise have died, or had their lives ruined by tyranny, had the American and British people not (at last!) stood up and made it known that WE WILL DEFEND OURSELVES. Lord Palmerston was right.

Wed, 05/14/2003 - 02:48 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Question about Lord Palmerston

Who was Lord Palmerston and what did he say? There was a connection error when I clicked on the link in your last line.

by Trace Element on Wed, 05/14/2003 - 11:50 | reply

Lord Palmerston

From the page linked:

Palmerston understood something the State Department has yet to grasp: In a dangerous world, you want to make sure your passport counts for something.

In an 1850 House of Commons speech defending his decision to blockade Greece after an Athenian mob had burned down the home of a British citizen, Palmerston put it this way: "As the Roman in days of old held himself free from indignity when he could say 'Civis Romanus Sum' ['I am a Roman citizen'], so also a British subject, in whatever land he may be, shall feel confident that the watchful eye and the strong arm of England will protect him against injustice and wrong."

You might also be interested in the War of Jenkins's Ear. In 1738, while in the Caribbean, the ship of Captain Jenkins had been boarded by the Spanish Guarda Costa, his crew had been maltreated, and the Spaniards had cut off one of his ears. This caused outrage, and war was declared on October 19 1739.

And then there was "Mad King Theodore" of Abyssinia, who held the British consul and a small group of westerners hostage in 1867. The response? A grand punitive expedition equipped with elephants was sent to capture his fort, and King Theodore eventually shot himself.

by Sarah Fitz-Claridge on Wed, 05/14/2003 - 15:20 | reply

The Long Arm Of The American Military

Time was, I was reflexively opposed to the exercise of American military power for any reason except the defense of the homeland. I felt war for any other reason was unjustified, and worse, fattened the Omnipotent State more rapidly than any other kind of event.

Time was.

Whether it will always be this way or not, today we live under conditions in which only judicious exertions of American arms in distant places can 1) protect us against further atrocities such as Black Tuesday, and 2) bring the taste of freedom -- or even a prospect of survival -- to the subjects of bloody-handed dictators such as Saddam Hussein.

Perhaps not everyone is happy to pay for it. I sympathize; there are innumerable things Washington does that I'm not happy to pay for. But I'm more than happy to pay for American power to open children's jails, and shut down torture centers, and put an end to the reign of one of the worst regimes in the world, run by one of the worst men in the world. So, for the nonce, I'll pretend that all my tax money went to Operation Iraqi Freedom, and the anti-war types can pretend that all their tax money went to teaching brain-damaged welders how to speak Ameslan, and we can all be happy.

No perversion of arithmetic can make Operation Iraqi Freedom into anything but an immense gain for the cause of liberty and justice -- in Iraq, in the Middle East, and in the world.

Curmudgeon Emeritus, Palace Of Reason

by fporretto on Wed, 05/14/2003 - 22:01 | reply

The Long Arm Of The American Military

Hear hear!

One of the few pleasant side-effects of war is that from the point of view of good people, it decreases the coerciveness of taxation.

by Editor on Wed, 05/14/2003 - 22:26 | reply

3. The War of Independence

This is the third part of our series, "A Short History of Israel". If you wish to read the preceding parts, see the Table of Contents for links to them. We welcome comments and criticisms. Do tell us what you think.

.....

After the war, the Allies' policy was to force all refugees, including 250,000 Jewish Holocaust survivors, to return to their countries of origin. However, many of the German and Austrian Jewish survivors did not wish to live among the murderers of their families. Many Jews from Eastern Europe found that their properties had been seized and the new occupiers were violently opposed to their return. Many did not want to go and live under Stalinist rule. Over a thousand Polish Jews who did try to return home were massacred in anti-Semitic riots in several Polish cities. At least one, in Kielce, was inspired by a classic anti-Semitic blood-libel (that The Jews were kidnapping Christian children in order to drain their blood). Furthermore, a high proportion of Jewish survivors had become committed Zionists, and wanted to go to Palestine to help build a Jewish state. All Jews who refused to return to their countries of origin were detained by the Allies in camps in Germany and Austria. Those who were caught trying to make their way to Palestine were imprisoned in Cyprus.

In 1945 the League of Arab States (or Arab League) was formed, and as one of its first acts, declared a boycott of all Jewish businesses in Palestine.

When it became clear that Britain was not going to reverse its White Paper policy, the Haganah became a Jewish independence movement. They ceased their former close cooperation with the British authorities in capturing Irgun and Lehi members, and instead formed an alliance with those organisations on condition that they follow the orders of a joint United Resistance Movement. They continued collecting, and began manufacturing, weapons. They continued clandestine military training, even inside the detention camps in Europe. They attacked immigration offices and other property – on one occasion destroying ten of the eleven bridges over the river Jordan – and sought out and killed individual Arabs who had murdered Jews.

The United States put pressure on Britain to allow 100,000 Jews to leave the camps and enter Palestine for humanitarian reasons. Britain refused. But it announced that it would withdraw from its Mandate (now a United Nations Mandate) in 1948. The United Nations proposed a partition plan for the aftermath [MAP]. It allocated the Jews more territory than the Peel Commission had, mainly by including most of the virtually empty (and, at that time, virtually uninhabitable) Negev desert. However, this territory did not include most of the Jewish historic or holy sites, nor many Jewish settlements, nor Jerusalem; moreover it was not defensible militarily. This plan was a bitter prospect for the Zionists, but they accepted it. The Arabs refused.

When the British left, the Jews of Palestine declared their new State of Israel in the territory allotted to them by the United Nations. The Chairman of the Jewish Agency and the Zionist movement, David Ben-Gurion, was named Prime Minister of the Provisional Government of Israel. The Haganah was renamed the Israel Defence Forces (IDF). The first two countries to recognise Israel were the United States and the Soviet Union. Most other countries, but no Arab ones, followed suit. The first act of the provisional government was to abolish all restrictions on Jewish immigration. Jewish refugees began pouring into Israel.

Despite the fact that a new state in the Arab portion of Palestine would likewise have been immediately recognised by the nations of the world, including Israel, the Arabs of Palestine did not declare a new state in their portion. Instead, Palestine was invaded by the armies of Egypt, Jordan, Syria, Lebanon and Iraq, plus a token contingent from Saudi Arabia [MAP].

The PLO was not founded until seventeen years later, but large numbers of Arab irregulars from Palestine and abroad had already been staging murderous attacks on a scale that dwarfed anything the country had yet seen: 1,200 Jews, and even larger numbers of Arabs, were killed in those attacks and in the open fighting that broke out as a result, during the few months before the Declaration of Independence. The departing British had made only sporadic attempts to halt this violence or to defend the borders and Jewish population of Palestine from incursions by the Jordanian army and by irregulars.

The Arab armies had initial success: the IDF was outnumbered and greatly outgunned – having at the outset no heavy artillery, few armoured vehicles, no military aircraft, and no navy (all of which the Arab armies had) – and was defending impossibly vulnerable territory. Though the IDF was better trained, and many of its members were veterans of the British army in the Second World War, the Jordanian Army in particular had been well trained and armed by Britain and had many British officers including its commander, Colonel John Glubb. The local Arabs also inherited most of the fortifications (except in Jerusalem, where the Jews seized them) and weapons left behind by the British.

The fighting was intense and bitter. Some Jewish villages put up astonishing resistance with grossly inferior and makeshift weapons. Some managed to hold out for weeks in epic sieges, but many were overrun by Arab armoured columns. In some of those, the inhabitants were massacred; from some, they were taken into captivity; from most, they were merely expelled, or fled. In no location that had been captured by Arabs were any Jewish inhabitants allowed to continue living in their homes. Jerusalem was cut off and besieged. Its Jewish inhabitants began to go hungry and were bombarded continuously by artillery. The Arab armies advanced towards the Israeli population centres on the coast from the east, south and north. The Egyptian Air force bombed Tel Aviv and the Egyptian Navy began a blockade of Israel's ports and landed troops from the sea.

The IDF managed to halt all the Arab advances before they reached the main Israeli population centres, except the Old City of Jerusalem with its ancient Jewish Quarter, where the Jews surrendered and were expelled.

The United States had imposed an arms embargo on both sides, and kept it in place after the Arab armies attacked. Britain continued to supply the Arab armies. Because of a fortuitous quirk of Cold War politics, Israel was briefly able to buy weapons from communist Czechoslovakia. When these began to arrive, the IDF began to take the initiative.

They captured several key towns, and territory to connect their populated areas. They broke through to Jerusalem, relieved the siege but failed to recapture the Old City, which was then annexed by Jordan; Israel held the newer, western part of Jerusalem, and the city remained partitioned from then until 1967.

Jordan also annexed the other Palestinian territory it had captured, called it 'the West Bank' – forbidding the use of the term 'Palestine' on official documents referring to that territory – and expelled all its Jews. Egypt expelled all the Jews from the Palestinian territory it had captured (the Gaza Strip), and remained in occupation there until 1967. During the following few years, about 800,000 Jews remaining in Arab countries were either forced or 'allowed' to leave on condition that they leave their property behind, and nearly all of them came to Israel.

During the war, about 725,000 Arabs living in the territories allocated to or captured by Israel moved to the Arab-controlled area of Palestine or to neighbouring countries, and about 30,000 to locations within Israel. There were diverse reasons for this: some were fleeing the fighting; some were combatants; some heeded radio broadcasts by Arab authorities, urging them to get out of the way of the invading armies and of imminent bombing by Arab air forces; some, such as the inhabitants of villages overlooking the Tel-Aviv-Jerusalem road, were expelled by the IDF for military reasons. Some were expelled in acts of spite, revenge or callousness.

There was one massacre of Arabs by Jews: During the campaign to relieve the siege of Jerusalem, the Irgun offered, and was authorized, to help the IDF by capturing an Arab village, Deir

Yassin. At the end of the battle, they murdered some of the villagers. The circumstances of the deaths, and the number killed, remain bitterly disputed to this day. In 1987 a study by Bir Zeit University (a Palestinian Arab university on the West Bank) concluded that the number murdered was between 107 and 120.

The worst example of expulsion occurred at the Arab towns of Lydda and Ramla. These were astride the country's main north-south and east-west roads and railway, and the IDF needed to capture them during a desperate battle to defend Tel Aviv from the main strength of the approaching Jordanian army, while also holding off the Syrian army which had crossed the river Jordan in the north and was using its superior artillery and air superiority to advance from its bridgehead. Ben-Gurion took the decision to force all 45,000 inhabitants of the two towns to leave, partly to allow the IDF to fight there (about 250 civilians had already been killed in Lydda in the crossfire of the previous day's battle with the Jordanians), but partly to impede the Jordanians' advance and increase the logistical burden on them. Some of the refugees were carried to the edge of Jordanian-held territory in buses driven by the Palmach, but most had to walk, and in the end some 335 of them died of dehydration and exhaustion on the way. The tactic worked – the Jordanians were delayed for long enough – but it caused moral revulsion and a fierce debate among the Israeli leadership, and was not used again.

Probably the most common single reason why Arabs left was that they feared that they would be harmed if the Jews won the war. In the event, the 160,000 who remained in Israel fared incomparably better than those who left. The latter were not permitted by any of the Arab governments into whose jurisdiction they came (including their 'own' Jordanian government on the West Bank) to lead normal lives. On the contrary, they were herded into refugee camps where they were systematically prevented from rehabilitating themselves or integrating into the local populations or (except in Jordan) acquiring citizenship of the host country. Today, over half a century later, although a proportion of refugees have been integrated, the basic policy of intentional misery remains in effect: the camps, including those in the areas now administered by the Palestinian Authority, are still occupied.

In contrast, the Arabs who remained in Israel became full citizens of the new state, and those who were internally displaced were resettled and integrated. They became, and they and their descendants remain to this day¹, the only Arabs in the Middle East who elect representatives to a democratic parliament, or live under the rule of law, or enjoy full human rights in the Western sense of the term. The only exception to their legal equality was that they were not allowed to join the IDF and were exempted from conscription. However, two small ethnic groups, the Druse and the Circassians, later asked for, and were granted, exemption from this exemption. In addition, Bedouins were granted the right to join the IDF voluntarily, and traditionally do so, and so were Christian Arabs².

When the United Nations envoy Count Folke Bernadotte proposed a new partition plan which, among other things, again did not assign Jerusalem to Israel, he was assassinated by Lehi. Ben-Gurion ordered: "Arrest all Stern Gang [Lehi] leaders. Surround all Stern bases. Confiscate all arms. Kill any who resist." Virtually all Lehi members were indeed arrested and Lehi ceased to exist.

Ben-Gurion then demanded that the Irgun be dissolved. Any members of the Irgun who unconditionally handed over their weapons and joined the IDF, would receive amnesty for their previous crimes. Otherwise they would be treated as criminals. The Irgun, in a bitter statement in which they said that they evidently valued the lives of IDF soldiers more than the Israeli government did, complied, and its members joined the IDF.

On October 1, 1948, four and a half months after the termination of the Mandate and Israel's simultaneous Declaration of Independence, a council of prominent Palestinian Arabs met in Gaza and declared themselves to be the 'Provisional Government of All Palestine', electing the former Grand Mufti (al-Husseini) as its President. This claim was briefly recognised by most Arab states but by no other state, but was angrily rejected by King Abdullah of Jordan. A rival group of dignitaries in Jericho voted for union with Jordan and declared Abdullah King of all Palestine. Both claims were soon forgotten: Egypt did not permit the 'Provisional Government' to meet again, and Jordan reluctantly gave up its territorial claims beyond the West Bank when Britain threatened to cut off arms supplies.

But the Arab nations and people still insisted on the principle of Arab rule over the whole of Palestine, and would continue to fight and kill for this principle for decades to come.

1. Note added 2005-02-03: This was written before the Iraqi election on 2005-01-30.

2. Note added 2005-01-21: Since the 1990s, Muslim Arab Israelis not from those groups have also been allowed to join the IDF, and a few do so each year.

Part 4: Independence, But No Peace

Thu, 05/15/2003 - 00:45 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Bias

Up until this point I have found this document to be free of bias and generally factually accurate, and remarkably so for this is sensitive material. However in this account, virtually every paragraph is colored by bias, half-truths, and stilted language. Every Arab attack is "murderous" where the Jewish attacks are "disputed" or put in the context of military necessity.

Furthermore I can tell you that as an Arab-Israeli, your remarks about our status are typical, by which I mean fatally flawed. While it is true that the framework for democratic participation exists, in practice this is not the case. A quick example-- while there are only a few laws against the transfer of land, the reality is that every Arab-Israeli town is surrounded by land owned by the JNF-- which specifically prohibits the selling of land to Arabs. This is why Arab towns in Israel experience overcrowding and artificially high land prices. I could also get into state-sponsored efforts to ensure there is no united Arab political party in Israel, institutional racism in the biggest state industries, detention of citizens without charge, the land confiscations that continue to this day, and the murder of peaceful protestors but I would need more space.

The bottom line is that this document was fair in parts I and II, but dives utterly towards couched language, ignorance of facts, and willful distortion in this section. I suggest that your readings of history are incomplete and that you also are purposefully distorting the facts in a fairly obvious manner, a simple analysis of the language you employ when discussing Arab and Jewish massacres should be your first clue that you have allowed passion to overwhelm reason.

by a reader on Wed, 07/02/2003 - 19:18 | reply

How should we write it?

Imagine groups A and B. lots of members of group A murder members of group B. group B defends itself sometimes, and sometimes observers make up stories about how group B is the same as group A, but these observers are lying. How would you write the history of that? Would you say the groups are morally equivalent? Wouldn't that be the lie? Just because history is on someone's side doesn't make it false/biased.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://curi.blogspot.com/>

by Elliot Temple on Thu, 07/03/2003 - 00:41 | reply

Re: Bias

The issue of whether we have described every Arab attack as murderous and no Jewish attack as murderous can be easily resolved by reading the piece.

We agree that this exercise of comparing the language we actually used with what 'a reader' alleges we used would provide a clue as to who has allowed passion to overwhelm reason.

We also agree with Elliot Temple that a mere numerical imbalance in the number of times that the respective sides' killings are described as murder is no indicator of bias.

by Editor on Tue, 10/21/2003 - 14:29 | reply

Re: Bias

As a reader from New Zealand Trying to create a speech upon "the question of Israel/Palestine", if anyone i should be unbiased. personally i have to side with the first comment on this topic, as i am beginning to suspect a large creep in of bias. there has been no mention so far of the annual $92 billion in funding provided by the US government aiding Israel yet, or the fact that Israel has invaded and Annexed the West Bank and Gaza Strip, which it claims to be part of Israel as international borders are drawn. what i thought was an unbiased essay is now something that i must recheck my facts upon, in order to cross-reference and get the real truth. i also agree with the statements made that the language used is geared heavily in favour of Israelis.

Yours Sincerely,

Andrew Lynch

by a reader on Wed, 08/25/2004 - 08:13 | reply

Re: Bias

Yes, you should re-check the facts, among other things.

by Editor on Thu, 08/26/2004 - 01:12 | reply

Ignorance Breeds Hatred

It is refreshing to read such a well-written, accurate and concise account of the history of Israel. I teach Argumentation and Debate at the university level and use your site often. It is unfortunate how many college students think that Israel was created in 1948 by a British declaration "stealing land from the peaceful Palestinian shepherds and farmers".

Once the facts of history are presented it is hard not to support the only island of Democracy in a sea of tyranny.

by Paul A. Deis on Thu, 02/03/2005 - 15:30 | reply

Re Bias

Well, Being fair you did say: "a fortuitous quirk of cold war politics" - which is an introduction of bias in that it supposes it was a good thing that Israel managed to get some better weapons. More appropriate would be "a quirk of cold war politics"

However, I find this a very good, and largely unbiased read. Thank you.

by a reader on Sun, 01/22/2006 - 01:43 | reply

Fortuitous

Thank you very much for the kind remarks.

Fortuitous in its best-established usage means happening by chance rather than design. A fortuitous event may or may not be a good thing. A different and originally mistaken usage has been gaining ground, probably through confusion with 'fortunate' or 'felicitous'. See the usage note here.

by Editor on Sun, 01/22/2006 - 02:17 | reply

Presentation

I am reading these articles in order and the closer you get to the present it seems you really do get biased. You have to agree that massacres are presented differently.

Most of the things I've read here are fatally omitted from the average History lessons and this seems quite appalling. Restricted immigration, for example, no history teacher ever mentioned that! Anyway, I think it's hard to remain objective when you're trying to write such a thing, you may take sides at a moment without realizing. Just make sure the research you do is not all based on books published by Jewish historians.

by pauline on Thu, 06/22/2006 - 06:23 | reply

fortuitous

fortuitous means:

"happening by accident or chance rather than design"

-- Elliot Temple

My Blog

by Elliot Temple on Thu, 06/22/2006 - 09:22 | reply

Fair and Balanced?

In a previous chapter you describe Britain's promise to provide a Jewish homeland in Palestine under the Balfour Declaration. Didn't Britain also make the same promise to the Arabs in exchange for their support during WWI?

by bleacherdave on Mon, 07/17/2006 - 05:32 | reply

Re: Fair and Balanced?

That's a good point. Thank you very much. Actually it wasn't 'the same promise' (and anyway it did not apply to the territory that is now Israel), nor did we refer to the Balfour Declaration as a promise. But yes, the McMahon letter certainly should have been included in our History, and it will be, shortly.

by Editor on Sun, 07/23/2006 - 11:22 | reply

The War Of Independence

The third installment in our series, "A Short History of Israel", is up. Here is a quote from The War of Independence:

The fighting was intense and bitter. Some Jewish villages put up astonishing resistance with grossly inferior and makeshift weapons. Some managed to hold out for weeks in epic sieges, but many were overrun by Arab armoured columns. In some of those, the inhabitants were massacred; from some, they were taken into captivity; from most, they were merely expelled, or fled. In no location that had been captured by Arabs were any Jewish inhabitants allowed to continue living in their homes.

If you have not read the preceding parts, you can find them linked from the Table of Contents.

Thu, 05/15/2003 - 00:59 | permalink

Lincoln's War?

Was the American Civil War, which ended slavery in the US, originally about something completely different? Alan Forrester knocks that theory on the head. Hard.

(N.B. if Blogspot doesn't deign to honour that link, click here and search for ACW.)

Thu, 05/15/2003 - 23:56 | permalink

Ridiculous

Slavery was definitely part of the reason, but federalism was also an issue. The outcome was possibly the biggest loss of liberty in history.

by a reader on Fri, 05/16/2003 - 04:52 | reply

Hyperbolic Steroids?

> the biggest loss of liberty in history

I cannot measure the chagrin of the millions of dead people who have learned today that their tyrannies don't measure up. Infinity, it turns out, is slightly smaller than a libertarian exaggeration.

Greg Swann, presenceofmind.net

by gswann on Fri, 05/16/2003 - 13:50 | reply

Speaking of Hyperbole

Greg,

The "reader" was obviously talking about a loss of liberty in American history caused by the changes brought about by the Civil War. And he's correct that these changes brought about dramatic anti-liberty effects (and some pro-liberty effects too).

I cannot measure the chagrin of the millions of dead people who have learned today that their tyrannies don't measure up.

I can measure it. Zero.

Infinity, it turns out, is slightly smaller than a libertarian exaggeration.

Pot. Kettle.

by Gil on Fri, 05/16/2003 - 20:35 | reply

Copyright © 2005 Setting The World To Rights

Two Wishes For The World...

If you have been enjoying Setting The World To Rights, and feel that your life will be for naught unless you take urgent measures to, as they say, "give something back to The World", now is your chance to do just that. We are accepting submissions for The World. Anything considered (hey, we're not desperate... just... keen) – provided you are a rational person who is a) a top-notch writer, b) as witty as Frank, c) as popular as Glenn, and d) in the running for Miss World or Mr Universe.

Failing that, you could buy us a set of these satirical cards from NewsMax.com:

The Pentagon's Iraqi Most Wanted "Deck of Death" playing cards was a huge hit with Americans. Now, NewsMax.com is raising the ante – with the Deck of Weasels, depicting the 54 worst leaders and celebrities who opposed America and were key members of "The United Nations of Weasels." ...

The Ace of Spades is none other than French Prime Minister Chirac, Saddam Hussein's partner in crime of 30 years, and includes his most infamous quote: "Our position is no matter what the circumstances, France will vote 'no.'" The Washington Times' new revelation that France helped Saddam's top goons escape shows just how relevant and useful this deck is.

Each suite of the Deck of Weasels reveals America's enemies. The Spades are the most treacherous of the world's foreign leaders. The Diamonds are the most backstabbing U.S. leaders. The (bleeding) Hearts, of course, consist of Hollywood's woefully ill-informed would-be geopolitical "experts." And the Clubs include the worst of the biased media and self-appointed pundits.

The Deck of Weasels is not only great fun, it's also educational. Check out the cards and learn:

- which rock star raged: "We [expletive] deserve to get bombed. ... Bring it on, I hope the Muslims win!"

- which Hollywood has-been whined: "This is a racist and imperialist war. The warmongers who stole the White House (you call them 'hawks,' but I would never disparage such a fine bird) have hijacked a nation's grief and turned it into a perpetual war on any non-white country they choose to describe as terrorist."

- which movie star ranted: "I believe he [President Bush] thinks this is a war that can be won, but there is no such thing anymore. We can't beat anyone anymore"

- the shocking pro-Saddam comment that escaped the lips of the self-styled sweetheart of morning TV "news" (and she refuses to retract her statement!).

If that doesn't grab you, we'll have to get a tip jar. We can't have generous souls being prevented from giving a little back to The World, now can we?

Fri, 05/16/2003 - 01:49 | permalink

Blimey...

As rational as Woty, as good at writing as Bill Whittle, as funny as Frank and as popular as Glenn...

Good luck! :-)

by Alice on Fri, 05/16/2003 - 18:39 | reply

But Alice...

...we were thinking of you, of course! :-)

by Sarah Fitz-Claridge on Sat, 05/17/2003 - 16:13 | reply

Studies We'd Like To Commission – 1: On Idiotarianism

What Do Idiotarians Think That Non-Idiotarians Think?

In an interesting and much commented-on essay, left-wing blogger Michael J Totten recently mused on the fact that left wingers typically know less, factually, about history than right wingers:

I am astonished and dismayed to discover this. I'm a life-long liberal and I devour history like food. Not until after September 11 did I learn I'm a minority on the left.

Read it. He makes some excellent observations, and suggests a good reason for the phenomenon. Inevitably though, he does not mention a more straightforward and perhaps more significant reason, namely that left-wing explanations of historical events are simply less true than right-wing ones. So left wingers studying history more often have to create laboured reinterpretations of the causes of events and then find ways to believe them – an overhead whose very existence they must hide from themselves. Conspiracy theorists (of the right as well as the left) thrive on all that, but for sane left-wingers, factual history is harder work than for sane right-wingers.

Anyway, we agree with what Perry de Havilland suggests (but does not explicitly say) in his comments here, namely that the cultural divide in question is not really between left and right, but between idiotarian and non-idiotarian. And it puts us in mind of a long-standing conjecture of our own about the nature of idiotarianism. Our conjecture is easily testable experimentally and we should very much like to see it tested, for the study of idiotarianism [permalinks broken: search for 'idiotarian'] is, in our opinion, a dangerously neglected subject, and such an experiment might help to get it off the ground.

So, those of our gentle readers who wish to make a significant contribution to human knowledge and to the war effort, and who have influence in a suitable university department or opinion-polling organization (or have the wherewithal to hire one), please pay close attention.

In short, we conjecture that idiotarians are unaware of what their opponents' position is. We don't mean the bottom line: of course people who were against the invasion of Iraq know that their opponents were in favour of it. And they think they know why:

because the warmongers are greedy, bloodthirsty, stupid bastards who do not mourn dead soldiers or dead children. Now, never mind for the moment whether that is true; what the idiotarians don't know is what the warmongers claim their reasons are.

Specifically: select at random 500 people who approve of the recent invasion of Iraq (call those the "pro-war" people for short; few of them are idiotarians), and 500 who disapprove (call these the "anti-war" people, who are mostly idiotarians). Ask each pro-war person to write, in a paragraph, what they consider to be a valid and sufficient argument for the invasion. Then – and here is the crux of the study – ask them to write a second paragraph which, they believe, a typical anti-war person would endorse as a valid and sufficient argument against the invasion. Ask each anti-war person to do the same thing. Then randomly hand out copies of several of these 2,000 paragraphs to each of the 1,000 people, and ask them to guess which were written by someone on their own side and which by the opposition.

Here's what we expect the outcome to be: most of the pro-war people will be able to write an anti-war paragraph that anti-war people would endorse. But few of the anti-war people will be able to write a pro-war paragraph that the pro-war people would endorse.

Additionally, we guess that the stronger a person's pro-war views are, the more easily they will be able to write the anti-war paragraph, because, just as Totten points out in the case of historical knowledge, politically-engaged non-idiotarians are interested in, and aware of, what idiotarians are saying and where they are coming from (i.e. in their arguments and values). With politically-engaged idiotarians, we expect exactly the opposite: they are as uninterested in the other side's arguments as they are in factual history. So we expect that the stronger a person's anti-war views are, the less likely it will be that they can write a recognisable pro-war paragraph. In fact we should not be surprised if a significant proportion of the anti-war people are unable to comply with the conditions of the study at all: their "pro-war" paragraph will contain irony, or comical stereotypes of the warmongers, or even overt anti-war arguments.

If we're right, isn't this quite important? And if we're wrong, or the truth is the opposite of what we expect, wouldn't it at least provide some interesting additional context for Totten's phenomenon (which could be measured at the same time)? So – somebody out there: please do it.

UPDATE: Why We Use The Word 'Idiotarian'

Fri, 05/16/2003 - 20:34 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

An idiotarian reply

I see no evidence that "non-idiotarians" are aware of what their own position is. e.g. how you start at Popperian epistemology and end up advocating military action vs. Iraq. (Unless it was a scientific experiment?1.Conjecture: Iraq has WMD. 2.Military action to get empirical data. 3.Apparent refutation: No WMD found so far)

by a reader on Sat, 05/17/2003 - 13:07 | reply

Re: An idiotarian reply

Thanks for the data, "a reader", but your reply only constitutes anecdotal evidence in favour of our conjecture. What we'd like to see is a scientific study.

by Editor on Sat, 05/17/2003 - 13:26 | reply

This is an interesting idea, ...

This is an interesting idea, and one that should be applied. I myself doubt your conclusion but it would be useful to be proved right.

by a reader on Wed, 06/04/2003 - 10:26 | reply

An example

This onion article at http://www.theonion.com/onion3911/pt_the_war_on_iraq.html is a good example of idiotarians being completely ignorant of the pro-war argument:

Point-Counterpoint: The War On Iraq This War Will Destabilize The Entire Mideast Region And Set Off A Global Shockwave Of Anti-Americanism

If you thought Osama bin Laden was bad, just wait until the countless children who become orphaned by U.S. bombs in the coming weeks are all grown up. Do you think they will forget what country dropped the bombs that killed their parents? In 10 or 15 years, we will look back fondly on the days when there were only a few thousand Middle Easterners dedicated to destroying the U.S. and willing to die for the fundamentalist cause. From this war, a million bin Ladens will bloom.

vs. No It Won't...

You are completely wrong.

Trust me, it's all going to work out perfect. Nothing bad is going to happen. It's all under control.

Why do you keep saying these things? I can tell when there's trouble looming, and I really don't sense that right now. We're in control of this situation, and we know what we're doing. So stop being so pessimistic.

Any reasonably informed pro-war person could write the first paragraph, but the idiotarians can't come up with any pro-war position that even sounds like an argument.

~Woty

<http://woty.blogspot.com>

by Woty on Thu, 06/05/2003 - 01:37 | reply

Copyright © 2007 Setting The World To Rights

Give us Guns!

Tony Martin, a farmer who shot a burglar, has been refused parole, which he would have received by now if he had been willing to say that what he did was wrong. Gun crime in Britain has risen by 35 percent and robbery by 14.5 percent. In response, David Blunkett is seeking a ban on replica guns. Despite the disastrous record of the already draconian anti-gun policy, he is seeking further restrictions. Why?

In the ~~simple~~ minds of ~~Nanny State operatives~~ ministers like Blunkett, the thinking goes like this: if people have guns, they will commit crimes with these guns, therefore ~~Nanny~~ the responsible, effective and ever-vigilant authorities must prevent ~~her~~ charges citizens from getting their hands on them. Who could possibly disagree with this ~~illogical and antiliberal~~ common-sense idea?

Some nefarious characters acquire guns with the intent of committing crimes. This is true now, and it would be true if guns were legal. But someone should sit Blunkett down and explain to him that people have free will and might choose to buy guns for perfectly moral reasons. Moreover, his idea that crime is caused by the buying of guns is an insult to human beings in general and to would-be law-abiding gun owners in particular. This may come as a surprise to Blunkett, but a gun cannot control a person's mind and force him to commit crimes; it is an inanimate object.

Some of us would like to be able to buy guns for self-defence. Big mistake. It's just not cricket to prevent a person going about his unlawful violent business. After the decision was made to keep Tony Martin locked up, Mark Leech, founder of the ex-offenders' charity Unlock, expressed approval of the Court's decision. He explained why, on this occasion, Unlock is in favour of lock:

"We don't have a death sentence for burglary in this country and we don't want one either."

In other words, he wants Mr Martin to be kept in prison for as long as possible because he wants the penalties for crime in Britain to be lower.

The Tony Martin situation is a clear indication that Britons are no longer free. The State has decreed that it and it alone shall decide who will be defended from predation. That effectively licenses the predators, making them an arm of the State. I'd say the masks have fallen.

England was once known as the "land of liberties." Every idea in America's founding documents came from an English source.

To our English cousins: Do you folks have some ideas for how to correct this, or would you prefer that we send an American Expeditionary Force? We do this sort of thing rather well these days.

Curmudgeon Emeritus, Palace Of Reason

by fporretto on Sun, 05/18/2003 - 11:26 | reply

In a Nearby Universe ...

The President makes a statement on the latest Palestinian terrorist attacks

President Bush: Today's terrorist attacks in Israel and the disputed territories remind us of the reason why we are fighting this war: we are in danger from an evil enemy who takes pleasure in the deaths and suffering of good people.

These crimes come at an important moment in Middle East history, the moment when the United States' own vital interests require the war between Israel and the Arabs to be brought to an end. That is why we have published the Road Map for peace and have announced that we are going to be fully engaged in ensuring that it is followed. The first step on the Road Map is that the Palestinian Authority take effective steps against terrorism. So let there be no mistake: that is the standard against which we are going to judge the Palestinian Authority's new Prime Minister.

Thank you very much, ladies and gentlemen.

[Turns to leave, but there is a hail of questions and he stops to answer one:]

Reporter: Are you going to put pressure on Israel as well?

President Bush: Israel is a country with which we have not only a close alliance but shared, deeply held values. I am certain that without any pressure from us, Israel will respond to these attacks in exactly the way the United States would.

[Ignores further questions and leaves.]

Sun, 05/18/2003 - 22:15 | permlink

That must have been a very _f...

That must have been a very _far away_ Universe.

by Boris A.Kupershmidt on Mon, 05/19/2003 - 03:03 | reply

In another universe...

In another universe...

President Bush and Prime Minister Blair today issued a joint statement in which they announced that forces from the US and Britain will be dispatched to the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, the world's last remaining terror strongholds, to work with IDF forces. "I once said that if you're not with us, you're against us. We have waited for too many years for the Palestinian Authority to crack down on terrorists in their jurisdiction. They have failed. Now, we will act. I say to the people of Israel: soon you will be liberated from this menace."

Blair added: "I must admit that it is now clear that I was wrong in the past on this issue. I want the people of Israel to know that I am now fully behind them."

[Yeah, hiding behind them for cover when the suicide bombers come.]

by a reader on Mon, 05/19/2003 - 10:51 | reply

4. Independence, But No Peace

This is the fourth part of our series, "A Short History of Israel". If you wish to read the preceding parts, see the Table of Contents for links to them. We welcome comments and criticisms. Do tell us what you think.

.....

After many months of fighting, Israel had succeeded in surviving, defeating the Arab armies and consolidating its now larger territory. But over 6,000 Jews – about one percent of the Jewish population of Palestine – had been killed. Many more were wounded or made homeless. The survivors had been traumatised, and their economy and agriculture were devastated.

Jewish immigration was prodigious, especially from the refugee camps of Europe and from Arab countries where the Jews were being forced out. Within about four years the immigrants who had arrived after independence already outnumbered the 'pioneers', but their successful absorption was only one of the achievements of which the builders of the new state became proud. Israelis soon began to make world class contributions to science, technology, the arts and agriculture. Israel is a free and prosperous nation with a distinctive, diverse and tolerant culture, exceeding many of the most optimistic expectations of its founders. Of the approximately 100 new independent states that have been created since 1945, Israel is the only one of which that is true. And it has remained a haven for Jews fleeing persecution, or simply seeking a better life, from anywhere else.

Theodor Herzl had said of the First Zionist Congress in 1897: "In Basle I founded the Jewish state. Maybe in five years, certainly in fifty, everyone will realise it." He was proved right, almost to the year. Had he lived, he would have been 88 years old at the time of Israel's Declaration of Independence.

The Israeli War of Independence formally ended in 1949 with armistice treaties between Israel and its four neighbours: Lebanon, Syria, Jordan and Egypt. (Iraq assigned the territory it had captured to Jordan and withdrew without signing an agreement.) Under the treaties, Israel agreed to withdraw from all Egyptian and Lebanese territory it had captured, and the Arab countries agreed to withdraw from all territory they had captured inside Palestine, other than Gaza, the West Bank, and East Jerusalem.

The treaties also required the parties to resolve their differences peacefully in future. This was not to be. The Arab countries stressed that they remained at war with Israel. So as Israel struggled to rebuild its economy, absorb vast numbers of destitute immigrants and build the institutions of a modern society, its people were under constant attack. Arab soldiers and civilians frequently murdered Israelis venturing within rifle range of the border. Arab artillery would shell Israeli towns. Every few days, Arab terrorists (known at that time as 'fedayeen') would cross the border and murder Jews. Israeli farmers would plough their fields in armoured tractors to protect themselves from snipers. In border towns, people slept routinely in underground shelters.

Israel annexed all the territory that it had captured in Palestine. Most Israelis considered this to be the legal and justified action of a victim of an aggressive war. Having just sustained heavy casualties in defending indefensible borders in such a war, they felt morally obliged not to return to them, especially as their enemies were still committed to Israel's complete destruction regardless of borders.

Israel refused to allow back or compensate the Arabs who had fled during the war. The Israeli government believed that a settlement of Arab refugees' claims should form part of a peace treaty, along with the claims of Jewish refugees who had been expelled from Arab-held parts of Palestine, and other grievances arising out of the same war. Israeli attitudes on this issue hardened further during the following few years, when hundreds of thousands of Jewish refugees arrived from Arab countries, most of them having been dispossessed.

Israel adopted a single-chamber Parliament (the Knesset) elected by proportional representation. This caused a proliferation of political parties and shifting coalitions, but one can classify the parties into three main groups, namely:

- The successors of the mainstream Zionist movement. This group, whose largest member today is the Labour Party, was dominant in every ruling coalition in the Knesset until 1977.
- The successors of the Revised Zionist movement. The largest member of this group today is the Likud party, which has since 1977 alternated with the Labour Party in being the main party in government.
- The religious parties. The largest, the National Religious Party, was the main party representing religious Jews who supported Zionism. Other religious Jews were still suspicious of Zionism. A small proportion still considered the State of Israel sacrilegious and actively opposed it. Because of the proportional-representation system, religious parties have frequently held the balance of power in shaky coalition governments, and have often won concessions in return for their support even though all of them combined have never gained enough votes to lead the opposition, let alone the government.

The religious parties (of all kinds) had three main items on their political agenda. First, they wanted state funding for their own activities, especially religious schools; second, they wanted special privileges for orthodox Jews, such as exemption from military service; and third, they wanted certain restrictions on the lives of all Israelis, such as a prohibition on shops opening on the Sabbath. Many secular Jews (who have always been the overwhelming majority in Israel) felt anger and contempt for the non-Zionist religious factions because, during the 1930s, many European rabbis had discouraged their parishioners from fleeing while it would still have been possible. At the time of the UN partition plan in 1947, ultra-orthodox groups within Palestine had petitioned the UN not to allow secular Jews to rule over them.

The first act of the Provisional Government of Israel in 1948 had been to abolish all restrictions on the immigration of Jews. In 1950 this was formalised in the Law of Return, which stated that on reaching Israel any Jew (with certain exceptions such as criminals fleeing justice) must be allowed entry. A companion law granted such immigrants immediate citizenship. The exact definition of 'Jew' did not matter much at first, but within a few years a struggle developed between the Zionistic interpretation laid down by Ben-Gurion (which defined a Jew for the purposes of the Law of Return as "anyone who declares in good faith that he is a Jew") and religious definitions. The present definition is a compromise: Law-of-Return privileges are granted to Jews according to the religious definition (including converts to, but not from, Judaism), and to their spouses, children and grandchildren, and also to Righteous Gentiles (non-Jews who have risked their lives to save Jews from persecution) and their spouses, children and grandchildren. In parallel with the Law of Return, Israel has a normal immigration policy resembling that of other Western countries: over the years it has accepted many non-Jewish immigrants and asylum-seekers, from Vietnamese boat people to Muslim refugees from Bosnia and Kosovo, as well as people whom the secular authorities deem to be Jews but who are not in any of the above categories. The combination of all these arrangements has ensured that very few, if any, people satisfying Ben-Gurion's definition have ever been denied entry to Israel (or citizenship, eventually) and large numbers of people not satisfying it have also been welcomed and have become citizens.

Jordan failed to comply with the Armistice Treaty provision for free access to holy places for worshippers.

In 1951, King Abdullah of Jordan was assassinated at the al-Aqsa Mosque in Jerusalem, for allegedly wanting to make peace with Israel. He was succeeded by his grandson, King Hussein.

The few Jews remaining in Arab countries continued to be persecuted in the traditional ways, but now in addition they were often charged, individually or collectively, with spying for Israel, and punished accordingly. Blood libels and other incitements to anti-Semitic hatred were encouraged by Arab governments, becoming part of the curriculum of schools and the vernacular of academics, politicians, writers, journalists and diplomats. By the time of the Suez war in 1956 (see below), the standard-issue equipment of all Egyptian officers included a copy of Adolf Hitler's Mein Kampf, translated into Arabic.

Arab leaders issued incessant threats of war, mass expulsion of Jews from Palestine, and sometimes genocide.

Part 5: The Suez Crisis

Mon, 05/19/2003 - 15:51 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Copyright © 2007 Setting The World To Rights

Independence, But No Peace

The fourth installment of our series, "A Short History of Israel", is here: Independence, But No Peace.

If you have not read the preceding installments, you can find them linked from the Table of Contents.

Mon, 05/19/2003 - 16:25 | permalink

There Is No Such Thing As Induction

Steven Den Beste, like most philosophers, has swallowed the ancient myth that we obtain and justify our knowledge of the physical world through a process called induction which is a bit like deduction only different.

Alan Forrester [permalinks broken so search for "induction"] is on the case.

From what Steven writes, we confidently induce (just kidding!) that he has not read The Fabric of Reality.

Mon, 05/19/2003 - 20:52 | permalink

weeeeeeee

I would have been on his case too, if I hadn't stopped reading him due to annoyance at his previous bad epistemology. And he posted that quantum physics is non-local and ignored my correction. Anyway, everyone should read FoR, it's the best book ever.

-- Elliot Temple
<http://curi.blogspot.com/>

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 05/19/2003 - 23:14 | reply

Well, At Least He's Aware of the Criticism

I see Den Beste has added an update noting that Nigel Kearney has commented.

Since this comment consists of referring Den Beste to the epistemology of Popper and Critical Rationalism, there might be hope that Den Beste will see the light.

by Gil on Tue, 05/20/2003 - 17:05 | reply

No surprise here.

As much as I like SDB's blog, he really needs to stop droning on under the delusion that he is on firm footing when discussing philosophy. Fact is, he is WAY out of his depth when it comes to metaphysics, and it's getting a little tiresome watching him try to apply his knowledge of physics (which he never fails to remind his readers is prodigious, as in, "As an engineer, I blah-blah-blah, because we engineers blah-blah-blah") to philosophy. He's more strut than substance, and he really ought to get back to talking about the Great Mac vs. PC Debate, or something equally devoid of philosophical import.

by a reader on Thu, 05/22/2003 - 20:09 | reply

Copyright © 2005 Setting The World To Rights

More Or Less

Oooh, how exciting! One of our regulars, a reasonable man, he says (well he always did have a good sense of humour), has started blogging. Knowing Gil, we were expecting to find some deep thoughts about the latest political situation, or a glowing tribute to Microsoft. Instead, we found toilet paper. And as it's on blogspot, whose archive links might as well be toilet paper, visit it soon or search for "toilet paper".

Wed, 05/21/2003 - 03:09 | permalink

In a similar vein -- any comm...

In a similar vein -- any comments on this ?

by a reader on Wed, 05/21/2003 - 04:13 | reply

It Makes Sense

Heh. I think it makes sense. Brake lights and complete stops can have long-lasting effects on traffic, so avoiding them should improve the average flow. I've been driving like that for a long time (avoiding frequent stops). It should save gas, too.

It's interesting that some people seem to always be looking for the best ways to do things while others never seem to.

by Gil on Wed, 05/21/2003 - 20:51 | reply

I've seen some work on trying...

I've seen some work on trying to ameliorate the effects of a flood surge in a river by breaching dykes downstream of the area one wishes to protect - it's a similar kind of thing, in some sense.

In a two lanes-merging situation:

Numerous experiments in various areas of the country have led me to believe that rolling down the window and pointing at the lane that is about to disappear will help dissuade drivers from jumping up to the front; it's got a 25-30% success rate in preventing queuejumping. But I have a large and hairy arm, if not an imposing car; YMMV. In some areas of the country it's more about people not putting their clicker on to merge - even if there is space.

Traffic flows definitely have a critical point - once fluidity is lost (a sort of critical 'temperature') capacity drops.

by a reader on Thu, 05/22/2003 - 21:24 | reply

Copyright © 2005 Setting The World To Rights

Axes

Why has the US Administration not adopted Scrappleface's felicitous phrase "Axis of Weasels"? After all, everyone else has.

Probably what happened is this: when a speechwriter first attempted to slip a reference to Weasels into a draft speech, he found himself on the carpet in the Oval Office, where the President told him:

"Read my lips: no new axes!"

Inspiration from [GrahamLester.Com.]

Thu, 05/22/2003 - 01:20 | permalink

BBC-zarro World

The Facts: Israeli Navy commandos have seized a boat on its way from Hezbollah in Lebanon to Palestinian terrorists in the Gaza Strip. The cargo consisted of rocket fuses, electronic bomb-making components and CDs containing instructions for assembling explosives belts for suicide bombers. All on board, including a Hezbollah terrorist, were captured.

The Spin from BBC-zarro World:

http://news.bbc.co.uk/1/hi/world/middle_east/3050769.stm

Israel 'seizes Hezbollah boat'

The purpose of the sneer quotes is as follows: The Israelis, being Jews, are the Fathers of Lies and cannot be trusted. Therefore (1) they may not have seized the boat; it may have sailed voluntarily into Haifa harbour after a sincere change of heart by the crew. (2) It may not have been from Hezbollah; it could be the Salvation Army who are now sending rocket- and bomb-making equipment from Lebanon to the PLO. (3) It may not have been a boat at all, but a large rubber duckie.

Israel said the ship was heading to Palestinian militants in the Gaza Strip

No, BBC-zarro folk, the Israelis did not say that. You said that. The Israelis said that it was heading for Palestinian terrorists didn't they? And then you deliberately misrepresented what they said, didn't you? And don't say you don't know what "said that" means, or what the difference between a terrorist and a militant is, because if you didn't, you wouldn't keep lying spinning like this.

The Israelis say they have seized a ship carrying weapons for Lebanese militant group Hezbollah.

Oh the rich ambiguity of language! How long would it have taken someone without a Ph.D. in Bizarro-English to find a way of putting that which fudged the issue of where the weapons were headed and who sent them? Any less gifted person might simply have said that the weapons came from Hezbollah, and were going to the Gaza Strip.

Also, somewhere in any decent reporter's report there would have been a mention that their sole use, on arrival, was going to be the murder of Jews. But the BBC-zarro reporter mentioned neither murder, nor Jews.

[...]

Israeli Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom said the arms were being transported from Lebanon to Palestinian militants in the Gaza Strip.

There are those pesky militants committing mass murder again! Pretty soon their reputation is going to be quite tarnished, you know.

He added that the incident showed that Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat was behind terror operations.

Really? The fact is, the incident does not show anything about whether Arafat was involved. It may be that the Israelis have other evidence pointing in that direction. (In fact, they do.) But a reader of the BBC report has to wonder whether this is a case of Mr Shalom mis-speaking, or some other mistake, or just the BBC ~~lying through their teeth~~ spinning their report again. An experienced reader will know which is most likely.

[...]

Last year, Israel intercepted a 50-tonne shipment of Iranian weapons, which was destined for Palestinian militants, in the Red Sea.

Israeli sources say the current cache is much smaller than that.

Yeah, right. Much smaller. Couldn't have been used to murder more than – what? – a few dozen Jews? Couple of hundred tops. So let's all forget about such trivialities and get on with that nice Peace Process, shall we? Stage one: Israel stops intercepting boats.

Thu, 05/22/2003 - 23:15 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Are you sure about this?

Do you know for a fact that the Israelis said "terrorists" not "militants", or is that an assumption? I've seen both terms used. Do you have any evidence that the Israelis are being misquoted in this way? Have you asked them if they use the term "militants" or "terrorists" or both? Have they issued a statement to this effect? If you have or could get such a statement, I think we should mount a major campaign to get the BBC to stop. What do you think?

by a reader on Fri, 05/23/2003 - 11:54 | reply

We do not know for sure

No, we do not know, and that is a measure of the size of the lie that it is the policy of the BBC (and many other news organisations, but the BBC is one of the worst) to tell. Although they claim to be telling us what the Israeli side of the story is, they systematically change what the Israelis say, so that we don't know whether:

- The Israeli government has taken to saying "militant" as part of confidence-building measures; or
- This particular spokesman has; or
- This case specifically involved militants who were not terrorists and the spokesman was being careful with language; or
- He said "terrorist" and the BBC claimed he said "militant".

As for mounting a campaign, there already is such a campaign under way here: <http://www.terrorpetition.com/>, But why should the BBC pay any attention? Their revenue is secure, and in any case, their reaction is likely to be "well, if the militant Zionists and militant Palestinians all think we're biased, that just shows that we are fulfilling our mandate of strict impartiality".

by Editor on Fri, 05/23/2003 - 14:03 | reply

The Scandal of Faked Grades

In schools and universities in the United States and elsewhere, it is standard practice to falsify the results of academic assessments as a means of punishing and controlling students. Typically, grades are reduced as punishment for disciplinary offences such as lateness to class, without even a pretence that the resulting grade is an accurate measure of the student's knowledge or competence in the subject in question. Here's a case where grades are being fraudulently raised as part of the fine-adjustment of a complex punishment. But whether the grade is raised or lowered, this practice deliberately misrepresents the student's competence to future employers or educators.

That this institutionalised corruption of scholarly values is accepted as normal in the world's most rational society never ceases to amaze and disgust us.

Academics and teachers should refuse to participate in it, starting right now.

Fri, 05/23/2003 - 22:53 | digg | del.icio.us | permlink

Do high-school grades really ...

Do high-school grades really represent competence to future employers?

by a reader on Sun, 05/25/2003 - 02:49 | reply

So What?

No. But they matter for getting into college, and also children are made to care what grades they get by their parents.

(This is not a recommendation for going to college.)

-- Elliot Temple
<http://curi.blogspot.com/>

by Elliot Temple on Sun, 05/25/2003 - 04:00 | reply

Yes

Some employers won't hire people who have not graduated from high school. If students don't pass classes due to artificially bad grades, they are unable to present a qualification that they in fact deserve.

Also, as Curi pointed out, colleges consider high school grades in making decisions about who gets in.

by Woty on Sun, 05/25/2003 - 07:27 | reply

Umm, yeah

My answer did assume you graduated. If the messed up grades prevent that, it has to be revised to say it does mess up employment. Although if you get a GED, will that work just as well for employers? I'm not sure. I hear GEDs are super easy.

-- Elliot Temple
<http://curi.blogspot.com/>

by Elliot Temple on Sun, 05/25/2003 - 19:22 | reply

Generally speaking a GED is b...

Generally speaking a GED is better than nothing at all, but isn't considered as good as actually graduating from high school. I believe some states, like California, have a super-GED test that is more difficult than the 'regular' GED.

by a reader on Sun, 05/25/2003 - 22:19 | reply

Attendance

You note that tardiness and I would assume attendance, in-class behavior, and other factors not related to the knowledge learned by a student are being taken into account when calculating final grades. I'm actually shocked that you'd think this is a bad thing.

You write that it misrepresents the students' competence. That's most definitely not the case. Competence includes things like ability to get to work on time, to stay on task, and to maintain a professional workplace. These things are in addition to what is normally thought of as scholarship. And the truth is that scholarship is only part of what employers look for.

by Rob Michael on Thu, 07/10/2003 - 15:21 | reply

Attendance

Employers might be interested in more than scholarship, but they don't get useful information from a single grade that consolidates many factors.

It might be reasonable to argue that other factors such as tardiness, attendance, ass-kissing should be reported separately, so that employers could consider these things if they want to. But arguing that the grade that is supposed to measure command of subject matter should be polluted with these other factors for the sake of employers is mistaken.

by Gil on Thu, 07/10/2003 - 16:41 | reply

Purpose of Grades?

I'm not sure I'm willing to agree with you that the purpose of a grade is to measure command of subject matter. I would say that it is a measure of performance in class. Performance includes understanding of the subject, attendance, etc. And, because teachers have been including attendance, behavior, and other factors in their grades at least as far back as the 80s (my own experience) I'd say there are few people who would agree with you that grades measure subject matter alone.

by Rob Michael on Thu, 07/10/2003 - 21:13 | reply

What is this obsession with competence anyway?

Rob Michael wrote:

I'm not sure I'm willing to agree with you that the purpose of a grade is to measure command of subject matter.

Exactly! What is this obsession with competence anyway? What possible use is a pure measurement of competence? When I go to have surgery I am interested in picking a well-rounded individual to operate on me. I want a surgeon who is not merely competent in his field, but is also good at performance in class, which I understand also includes attendance, behavior, and other factors in his grades, especially whether he used to hurry for the bus in the mornings when he was a student. Someone who often risked being late for class as a student might arrive late for my operation, and where would I be then? Am I supposed to wait for him, or what? That way lies anarchy. And who cares if one surgeon is slightly better than the other at surgery: I'll take the one who is slightly worse every time, provided he never talked back to his teachers.

by a reader on Thu, 07/10/2003 - 21:40 | reply

Learned behaviors...

Well, seeing as how surgery is not typically taught at the K-12 level (or the undergraduate either) I don't think your analogy works. Even setting aside my objection, learned behaviors like attention to detail, ability to focus on a task, and the desire to be properly prepared are not usually addressed beyond K-12. Once you hit college, most professors expect you to be able to show up on time, stay on-task, etc. Those behaviors have to be learned somewhere and if universities expect you to already have them, then it is clear that educators expect such learning to take place in K-12.

You didn't even take into account the attention or ability to stay focused of your fictional surgeon. Could this be because we generally expect our surgeons to already have such behaviors???. Where do you think those behaviors are aquired?

by Rob Michael on Fri, 07/11/2003 - 14:41 | reply

Or better yet, beat the syste...

Or better yet, beat the system and don't get a regular job :P

by entivore on Mon, 08/18/2003 - 09:03 | reply

I think grades should measure...

I think grades should measure competence in the material, if only for the reason that the other stuff is biased beyond any usefulness anyway. I once had a teacher in high-school in 1st period who would penalize "points" for arriving late. The problem is, the bus service at the school was very unreliable, somewhere along the lines of 25-50% arrivals late. If every other day you are getting penalized on your grade for something you really have no control over, how does this indicate anything useful to future employers?

How about likability factor? If the teacher doesn't like you, they are more likely to penalize you for the same behaviour.

I think the only sane thing to do is make the most out of your job interviews and resumes. Make it clear that you know how to do the job, or at least know how to learn to do the job quickly. If a certain place doesn't want to consider you solely on your academics, it's their loss. . . unless of course you suck so badly at selling yourself that noone at all will hire you. Then it is your loss :P

I think I accidentally posted the post script to this first somehow. lol

by entivore on Mon, 08/18/2003 - 09:05 | reply

Surgeons

Rob Michael,

I want my surgeons to be on time and not like some of those smart-ass surgeons these days.

I also want him to be able to spell S-U-R-G-E-O-N... or at least be able to copy someone else when they spell it. Come to think of it, I want people in casual conversations to do the same thing.

But whether or not he can spell his profession, or you can, has little to do with his competence.

As Elliot says... Ho hum.

-Dan

by a reader on Thu, 08/26/2004 - 23:48 | reply

High-school Grades

I am an employer and have never asked about a potential employee's grades. We are rarely the same people we were in high-school. Personally my grades ranged from Cs one semester to As the next depending on my family ups and downs. As a college student I have been straight As.

by a reader on Thu, 09/14/2006 - 02:16 | reply

Grades

That might be reasonable when interviewing a 30-year old, but not a 19-year old.

by Yoni on Sat, 09/16/2006 - 16:28 | reply

Contraceptives: We've Been Had!

A recent judgment by a judge in Argentina said that contraceptives violate women's rights:

The judge in question, Cristina Garzon de Lascano of Cordoba province, on Thursday ruled in favour of a conservative Catholic organisation which argued that oral contraceptives and intrauterine devices (IUD) violated women's health rights.

The judge agreed that such contraceptives were "abortive" and banned their production and sale. She also ordered the destruction of existing supplies.

Abortion is illegal in Argentina and can be punishable by prison...

Women's and health organisations also condemned the ruling.

Some said it would increase the number of clandestine abortions carried out in Argentina - already the country's primary cause of maternal death.

What has not been reported is that the learned Judge went on to don red inquisitorial robes before explaining that these contraceptives constitute a health risk to the immortal souls of the women concerned: "They may think that not having access to contraceptives constitutes a health risk in this life, but at least their souls won't burn in hell for all eternity. Having Satan shove a spit up your arse and roast you slowly over an open fire for ever and ever is significantly more dangerous than doing the nasty without an IUD," she declared.

Well, it is, isn't it? Anything wrong with that argument?

Frank? Anyone?

Sun, 05/25/2003 - 13:48 | permalink

A still another reminder of w...

A still another reminder of what used to be true through most of the human history: that the organized religion has always tried to use the coercive powers of the state to deprive people of their freedoms, property, and life. The robed quack in question has also been derelict in the discharge of her duties: she should have sentenced every contraceptive user, male or female, to be burned at the stake, to save their immortal souls.

by Boris A.Kupershmidt on Mon, 05/26/2003 - 01:18 | reply

This would be funny if it wer...

This would be funny if it were not so appalling.

by Sylvia Crombie on Wed, 05/28/2003 - 15:23 | reply

We Had to Shoot Them Down a Second Time

On June 13 1940, Winston Churchill made the last of several flying visits to France. He did this at some personal risk: at one point his plane came within sight of a squadron of German fighters, but was not noticed. His aim was to try to persuade the French government to fight on against the invading Germans. But unbeknownst to him, the French had already decided to make a separate peace with Hitler, in direct violation of their mutual defence treaty with Britain.

The French Prime Minister Paul Renaud opened the meeting with a hypothetical question about the "solemn pledge that no separate peace would be entered into by either ally": If France nevertheless made a separate peace, what would Britain's attitude be? It would, he said, "be a shock if Britain failed to concede that France was physically unable to carry on".

Churchill said that under no circumstances would Britain reproach France for any such decision, but that this was different from releasing them from the obligation. And he spoke of practical plans for a rearguard action, giving time for the bulk of the French forces to withdraw to North Africa, so that they and the powerful French Navy could carry on the struggle from there. But whatever France decided,

At all events England would fight on. She had not and would not alter her resolve: no terms, no surrender. The alternatives for her were death or victory. That was his answer to M. Reynaud's question.

(From The Second World War by Winston S. Churchill. Book 3: The Fall of France.)

After some fruitless to-ing and fro-ing, Churchill gave up. But he had one last favour to ask of his erstwhile allies, a favour which was of desperate importance given the nature of the battle which their surrender was about to precipitate:

Before leaving I made one particular request to M. Reynaud. Over four hundred German pilots, the bulk of whom had been shot down by the RAF, were prisoners in France. Having regard to the situation, they should be handed over to our custody. M. Renaud willingly gave this promise, but soon he had no power to keep it. These German pilots all became available for the Battle of Britain, and we had to shoot them down a second time.

Let's hope that the same will not turn out to have happened in this case.

Mon, 05/26/2003 - 09:29 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Copyright © 2008 Setting The World To Rights

5. The Suez Crisis

This is the fifth part of our series, "A Short History of Israel". If you wish to read the preceding parts, see the Table of Contents for links to them. We welcome comments and criticisms. Do tell us what you think.

.....

The Soviet dictator Josef Stalin's general paranoia focused particularly on Jews, and now on Israel. While the 1948 war was still in progress, he ordered Czechoslovakia to cease supplying arms to Israel. In 1949 the Soviet press began an 'anti-cosmopolitan' campaign – 'cosmopolitans' being a code word for Jews. Many Jews were arrested on trumped-up charges, tortured, and executed or sentenced to long terms in labour camps. In 1953 Stalin 'discovered' a fictitious plot by a group of doctors, most of them Jewish, to overthrow the Soviet regime. Mass murder of Jews was probably averted only by Stalin's own death a few weeks later, after which the new Soviet leadership disavowed the 'Doctor's Plot' and posthumously annulled the fifteen death sentences already carried out on account of it.

However, the Soviet Union continued to persecute Jews, and its foreign policy stance became violently anti-Israeli. In 1955 it began supplying large quantities of arms to Egypt and Syria. Egypt signed a treaty with Syria and Jordan placing the Egyptian dictator Gamal Abdul Nasser in command of all three armies. This was one of the high points of the pan-Arab nationalist movement, led by Nasser, which wanted to unite all Arabs into a single nation.

In July, 1956, Egypt nationalised the Suez Canal, an international waterway owned by the British and French governments. Israeli ships, and ships travelling to or from Israeli ports, were banned from using the Canal. Nasser ignored the UN's perfunctory protest. He had already imposed a similar ban on another international waterway, the Straits of Tiran, thus blockading Eilat, the port that Israel was trying to develop at its southern tip.

Violent incidents on Israel's borders increased. Jordanian and Egyptian soldiers and fedayeen crossed the border and attacked both military and civilian targets. The shelling of Israeli towns and villages within range of Egyptian artillery became almost continuous.

Israel prepared for war against Egypt. It planned to lift the blockade of Eilat by seizing and holding Sharm-el-Sheikh, a town where a large military base had been built, dominating the Straits of Tiran. It also planned to retaliate for Egypt's attacks, and impair Egypt's ability to threaten invasion, by striking at its army, now deployed on the Sinai peninsula and in the Gaza Strip.

To do all this, the IDF needed modern weapons. The United States would not supply any. Nor would any Soviet-bloc country including Czechoslovakia (which was now supplying Egypt). Nor would Britain, which still considered itself an ally of the Arab countries – now excluding Egypt. But Israel had been cultivating a relationship with France, which prided itself on its independent foreign policy and agreed to sell weapons to Israel.

Britain and France had been secretly planning to recapture the Suez Canal, despite pressure from the United States to acquiesce in the nationalisation. Now the French informed the Israelis of this plan and invited them to coordinate their own attack with it. In negotiations which, for many years afterwards, all three countries would deny ever took place, they agreed that Israel would capture the Canal, then the British and French would call for both sides to withdraw, and when Nasser refused, British and French forces would be sent in to 'protect' the Canal zone.

Israeli paratroopers landed in the west of Sinai. Israeli forces captured Gaza, and Israeli armoured columns drove westwards into Sinai and southwards towards Israel's main objective, Sharm-el-Sheikh. The following day, Britain issued an ultimatum to Israel and Egypt, saying that unless both sides withdrew to a distance of ten miles from the Canal, force would be used against them.

During the next six days, the IDF defeated the Egyptian army in Sinai in fierce fighting, capturing Sharm-el-Sheikh and most of Sinai. Complying with the British ultimatum, it halted ten miles from the Suez Canal. The Egyptians did not withdraw from the Canal, and British and French forces invaded, landing at Port Said and pushing southwards through the Canal zone.

There was an enormous international outcry, led by the United States. President Eisenhower put intense pressure on Britain and France to withdraw. They complied: their forces halted, and soon afterwards returned home in humiliation. The British Prime Minister, Anthony Eden, resigned, a broken man. Eisenhower threatened Israel with UN economic sanctions and expulsion from the UN if it did not withdraw too. The Soviet Prime Minister sent a private letter to Ben-Gurion reminding him that the Soviet Union possessed missiles that could reach Israel. Israel sent a delegation to Washington, arguing that to withdraw without receiving any concessions from Egypt about future violence or blockading of international waterways would be to invite a repetition of the situation. Eisenhower was adamant about unconditional withdrawal, but he himself did make some concessions: he assured Israel that the United States would from now on keep the Straits of Tiran open, and that the international community would act 'firmly' if Egypt did not allow Israeli shipping through the Suez Canal. He also arranged for a UN Emergency Force to be deployed in Sinai and Gaza, whose job would be 'to assure the scrupulous maintenance of the armistice agreement' – in particular, to ensure that those territories were not again used to launch fedayeen raids, artillery barrages or armed threats against Israel.

Israel withdrew. The UN Emergency Force was deployed. The fedayeen raids and other attacks from Egypt ceased. The Straits of Tiran and the Suez Canal were opened to Israeli shipping. The Suez war became a widely-cited symbol of the last gasp of Imperialism and of the futility of Western intervention in the affairs of other countries. Israel had lost 172 dead and 817 wounded.

The Egyptian authorities soon began to harass ships heading to or from Israel through the Suez Canal – delaying them and sometimes confiscating cargoes. The UN brokered a compromise under which cargoes would always be owned by the non-Israeli party to the trade, during their time of passage through the Canal. Israel agreed, under protest, to this cumbersome and illegal requirement, but the first ship to try it (the Greek ship Astypalea) was arrested anyway, and its cargo of 500 tons of Israeli cement was confiscated. For all practical purposes the Canal was again closed to Israel-related shipping. The 'firm action' promised by Eisenhower never materialised.

Part 6: Eleven Years of Fighting, Six Days of War

Tue, 05/27/2003 - 10:05 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

The Suez Crisis

The fifth installment of our acclaimed series, "A Short History of Israel", is now up: The Suez Crisis.

If you have not read the preceding installments, you can find them linked from the Table of Contents.

Tue, 05/27/2003 - 10:28 | permalink

Thanx 4 the history lesson

This history of Israel is stellar! I'm certainly learning a lot from it. I hope Robin Whittle does too. He sure does need it.

When you've finished posting it, would you please post the whole thing in one part for ease of downloading and printing? I'd like to print it out and give copies of it to my friends and family.

by Sylvia Crombie on Wed, 05/28/2003 - 15:32

Democracy Must be Experienced to be Learned!

by David Rovner

There is much talk these days about the importance of teaching values (democracy, peace, good citizenship, non-violence, responsibility) in our public schools. It appears that newspaper columnists, teachers' unions, public organizations and other civic minded people have suddenly come to realize that our youth is growing up ignorant of, and uncommitted to, the great principles upon which our nation is based.

Although I fully agree that the problem exists, I am afraid that the proposed cure – more classes on democracy or on peace or on being a good citizen or on being responsible – is not better than the disease. Why is it that people persist in thinking that the solution to real-life problems is talking about them? Does anyone really believe that subjecting children to yet another course will achieve really meaningful goals? We can't even get our kids to read or write or do arithmetic properly, despite endless hours of classroom effort. Are we going to make them into the defenders of peace, freedom and democracy, and responsible by adjusting the curriculum once more?

People don't learn values through teaching in classrooms. The very idea of "instructing" children in any set of values at school is off-base. At best, children view such teaching as boring and irrelevant; at worst, they treat it as obnoxious preaching.

The simple fact is that children are not committed to peace, or democratic principles, or political freedom or the Declaration of Independence, or behaving as responsible people because they themselves do not experience any of these lofty matters in their everyday lives, and in particular in their schools. Children do not have rights in school, they do not participate in meaningful decision-making at school (even where the decisions directly affect their own lives) nor do they have the freedom of self determination in schools (virtually all schools choose in fact to deny that students are capable of deciding and personal responsible for their acts – "success breeds success" is the password today – freedom of choice, freedom of action, freedom to bear the results of action – these are the three freedoms that constitute personal responsibility). In fact, the schools are models of autocracy - sometimes benevolent, sometimes cruel, but always in direct conflict with the principles on which our country is based.

How hollow have all these great civics and history lessons sounded this past year in schools, when the 54th anniversary of the Declaration of Independence was celebrated in classroom after classroom, to a captive audience of students to whom much of that very the Declaration of Independence DOES NOT APPLY !

The way ethical values are transmitted to children is THROUGH EVERYDAY ACTION, on the part of adult role models and ON THE PART OF CHILDREN. This is why the family is the epicenter of moral education.

Moral education belongs in the home. To be sure, it does. But does that exclude it from schools?

It sure does not exclude moral education from schools' control and authority ! !

The way to ensure that people of any age will be deeply committed to the democratic Way is to make them FULL PARTICIPANTS IN IT (provide real-life experiences: making choices significant to their lives, exercising judgment in consequential matters such as school rules and discipline, choosing between alternative courses of action, and evaluating and discussing the outcomes of these choices) LET US MAKE OUR SCHOOLS DEMOCRATIC, let us give our children FREEDOM OF CHOICE and THE BASIC RIGHTS OF CITIZENSHIP in their schools, and they will have no problem understanding what is TOLERANCE, RESPECT TOWARD PEOPLE, SELF-AWARENESS and RESPONSIBILITY.

(you are invited to visit a democratic school:

<http://www.sudval.org/>, and a network of democratic schools: <http://www.sern.org/>)

DEMOCRACY MUST BE EXPERIENCED TO BE LEARNED ! !

Haifa, Israel, May 2003

Tue, 05/27/2003 - 12:04 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

The Settler Non-Problem

In a piece on the Arab-Israeli conflict, Robin Whittle says that the evil Zionists and Americans are to blame for the problem:

The settlements and the severe restrictions and fragmentation of Palestinian life by Israel prove that successive Israeli governments have no interest at all in giving Palestinians even a fraction of their land [...]

Israel can only do this with the financial, technological and political support of the USA. Both the USA and Israel are democracies. The problem here is not despots – but democratic nations systematically killing and oppressing all Palestinians.

His description of Israel's overall stance and its counterterrorist policies in particular is utterly divorced from reality and he would benefit from reading this excellent article on Israel's counterterrorist policies, as well as our Short History of Israel. (Or perhaps he wouldn't. Someone who can seriously say what he says about "Palestine" may not have much interest in getting his facts straight.)

Whittle is not alone in advancing the curious proposition that the existence of Jewish settlements shows that the Israelis are fundamentally to blame for the violence against them. So let's go through this s-l-o-w-l-y, for Mr Whittle and other similarly confused nincompoops. Question: Is buying land a crime?

There are approximately 840,000 Indians in Britain, many of whom have bought land here. By Mr Whittle's argument, all non-Indian British citizens are entitled to strap on belts of explosives and kill Indians, both here and in India.

Back in the real world, buying land and settling it is just buying land and settling it. Even if all Jewish settlers were to remain in the future Palestinian state and no expatriate Palestinians were to return there, Jews would constitute some 6% of the population, which one might usefully compare with the 20% of Israeli citizens who are Arabs and with whom Israel is living in peace. When there is an even vaguely reasonable leadership in Palestine, the settlements will be at the very most a minor issue in any peace settlement.

See also this piece.

Does Robin Whittle say Jews s...

Does Robin Whittle say Jews shouldn't buy land in other places too, or is he only worried about "Arab lands"? Does he also disapprove of Arabs buying land in Israel? Or does he think that's ok? I see Robin Whittle lives in Australia but was born in England. So that's ok, but it's not ok for Jews to do the same thing? It's like, ok, the Australians didn't object to his parents moving to Australia so that's ok, but it's not ok for Jews to move to Arab countries because Arabs do mind, right? But see, the Arabs also don't want Jews living in Israel either, or anywhere else. That's why they attack Jews all over the world. Where SHOULD Jews be allowed to buy land? Would Robin Whittle agree with those who think the Jews should be bulldozed into the sea? Hitler would be proud.

by Sylvia Crombie on Wed, 05/28/2003 - 15:15 | reply

The Arabs who sold land to Je...

The Arabs who sold land to Jews obviously don't mind Jews living there.

-- Elliot Temple
<http://curi.blogspot.com/>

by Elliot Temple on Thu, 05/29/2003 - 03:50 | reply

Buying land????

This is so stupid. Millions of lives are at stake here. The USA and Israel are oppressing the Palestinians. It's true that some Palestinians want to kill every Jew, but that is no justification for what Israel does to the rest of the Palestinians - the law-abiding ones. To describe what Israel is doing as "buying land" is a joke. What planet are you on??? How many American voters have ever seen that map of the settlements? The Israelis are not BUYING land, they are TAKING it. It's a case of the Israeli government giving Jews subsidies to settle on Arab land. There's no buying involved, they just take it and sell it to Jews.

by a reader on Thu, 05/29/2003 - 10:09 | reply

It's the Evil Jooossss!

"It's a case of the Israeli government giving Jews subsidies to settle on Arab land. There's no buying involved, they just take it and sell it to Jews."

If this is the case then the Israeli is taking money from some Israelis and giving it to others so that they can buy Arab land in PA areas and settle it. In any event the land is still being bought and the Palestinians can still refuse to sell, so the Palestinians have no beef, but Israeli taxpayers might, strangely the latter group do not see fit to murder people.

As for the rest of your comments, they make no attempt to address any of the facts at issue and make no argument that our interpretation is wrong. Also I'm confused about the relevance of Americans not having seen the map, the map does not change the logic of the situation, it just depicts the distribution of settlements, or is it that the evil Jooos are concealing the map under their black coats along with the Palestinian babies they kill and eat in their dark rituals?

by a reader on Thu, 05/29/2003 - 21:33 | reply

ho hum

What he meant about the map is if only the Americans saw the map ... saw how much land the Jews had bought -- surely they would object too. See, if the Jews have bought lots of land, more than Arabs can afford, then using the premise that Jews aren't morally better, and the fact luck is a bad explanation, they must have gotten the money/land by stealing, or otherwise cheating. (Perhaps shooting Palestinian landowners under guise of fighting terror, and then installing settlements on the now "abandoned" land really fast and scaring everyone away.....la de da)

-- Elliot Temple
<http://curi.blogspot.com/>

by Elliot Temple on Fri, 05/30/2003 - 02:47 | reply

settlements

I've not noticed that the Indians in Britain live in Indian only settlements which other Britains are barred from living in.

They live by the laws of the country - unlike Israeli occupiers who seize Palestinian land in defiance of international law with no agreement or compensation to the Palestinians.

Neither do the Palestinians in Israel get to live in Arab-only settlements annexing land willy-nilly do no comparison there either.

by a reader on Wed, 04/21/2004 - 13:49 | reply

Re: settlements

Unfortunately, 'a reader' has fallen for a pack of lies and half-truths so far-reaching and so wicked that a full rebuttal of his or her admirably concise comment would require at least a hundred times as much space. We recommend, for a start, reading Mitchell Bard's Myths And Facts.

But in short: Britain, during the periods when it was at war with Germany, allowed no Germans to live in the country at all, and imprisoned without trial anyone who was even suspected of sympathising with them. But there are Arabs living in Israeli settlements on the West Bank, just as there are Arabs living all over Israel, including in settlements that contain no Jews, and also in predominantly Jewish areas. Land for the settlements is either rented government land (temporarily administered but not annexed by Israel, pending a peace treaty) or is purchased, not seized, from willing private owners.

by Editor on Wed, 04/21/2004 - 14:57 | reply

It's clear from his writing

It's clear from his writing that Robin Whittle cares much more about inciting people to blame "the Jews" than he cares about history. I hate it when someone who's clearly anti-semitic tries to portray himself as a neutral. This is a person who also writes about the "accepted history" of the holocaust. A holocaust denier. Big coincidence that he has so much to say about "Palestine". I don't think he really cares about the Palestineans, he just has a problem with the Jewish people. He probably just wants to convince others to feel the same.

Hello, you'd be more effective in spreading your hatefulness if you had actually read up on your history! A history lesson is needed! Does this guy even know what happened in 1948? Doubt it. People like Whittle really make me sick.

by a reader on Wed, 07/07/2004 - 17:16 | reply

Yes, I do think he would agree

Yes, I do think he would agree with that. Maybe he's just Hitler reincarnated.

by a reader on Wed, 07/07/2004 - 17:28 | reply

Questions

Don't you think your example of Asians in Britain would be a better analogy if Britain were occupied by the Indian army?

And is all that land being settled by Israelis sold by private individuals, or is some of it land in the public domain that the occupation authority is giving preferential access to?

The so-called "private property" of colonial settlers doesn't usually bear much looking into. In colonial Africa, for example, it was common practice for colonial administrators to preempt ownership of uncultivated land (including forest, pasture and other commons) and then distribute it among settlers. That's they way settlers in Uganda and Rhodesia wound up owning most of the best quality land.

Of course, English settlers in Africa are another object of sympathy for those who specialize in apologizing for right-wing settler pariah regimes.

Re: Questions

A reader wrote:

'Don't you think your example of Asians in Britain would be a better analogy if Britain were occupied by the Indian army?'

The Palestinian Authority has been offered and has received freedom from Israeli military interference on more than one occasion. The PA used this as an excuse to increase the intensity of their campaign to wipe Israel from the map and replace it with Islamist tyranny. When the IDF goes into the PA controlled areas they do so in self-defence. Those areas are not occupied but Israel has not allowed and should not allow those areas to be used to support violent Islamist thugs. You might want to try reading about Israeli history here, before you make any more false and baseless accusations:

<http://www.settingtheworldtorights.com/node/view/74>

by Alan Forrester on Wed, 11/03/2004 - 20:12 | reply

Myths from Laputa

"They live by the laws of the country - unlike Israeli occupiers who seize Palestinian land in defiance of international law"

ROFL. Utter drivel. There is no 'Palestinian land' by any sane definition (but hey, who says antisemites are sane?).

And there is no 'defiance of international law' (actually, there is no such thing as 'international law').

Basically, you just want to keep parts (all?) of the Jewish homeland Judenrein.

Won't work. Tough. Live with it.

by Myself on Sat, 09/09/2006 - 22:37 | reply

calls of racism

I personally am part African-American and part Jewish Ukrainian.

There have been one or two times in my life when I experienced something where racism might possibly have played some small part.

A lot of black people like to use racism as an excuse for anytime they don't get their way. Didn't get the job? Its not because the other candidate had a more relevant degree, its racism. More black people getting pulled over, its not because black youth have less respect for the law and tend to drive obnoxiously, its racism. More blacks in prison, its not a complex issue related to the legacy of slavery, the lack of reparations, inheritance, capitalism, and the accumulation of wealth leading to greater degrees of poverty and lack of education which in turn correlates to a higher crime rate - its just racism.

And American Jews do EXACTLY the same thing.

If anyone condemns the actions of Israel, they are called "anti-Semitic"

Yet these same people condemn the actions of any violent or oppressive government.

The issue here can not be reduced to "these people are right, these people are wrong"

First, Palestinians have no justification for blowing up Israeli citizens.

Second, Israel's reactions to Palestinian attacks is almost always disproportionate and unjustified. I read once in the paper about Israel firing mortars over a wall after some kids threw rocks at Israeli soldiers.

If you deny that Israel often overreacts, or claim it has never done anything wrong, you are just as much full of it as someone who claims the Holocaust wasn't that bad.

Yes we (Jewish people) have been heavily persecuted throughout history.

That does not make us perfect, or saintly, or immune from wrong doing.

History: thousands of years ago, Jews found what is now called Israel and claimed it. At the time a lot of land was not incorporated into any particular country, so this was kind of like Europeans coming to America and claiming it. There were people already living there, but they weren't organised into a country, so in their minds that made it ok.

Then, after Rome took over, and the Jews and Romans had their falling out, Rome took Israel, and as punishment for trying to gain Independence made the country of Palestine and Syria.

Thousand years later, the league of nations (UN) changed it back again.

Obviously no one from the last change was still around, nor their children or grandchildren, so its hard to say if the land was rightfully theirs or not.

Most of the middle east didn't think so.

Egypt was the aggressor in the first war, and in that aspect Israel was in the right.

Israel kicked the crap out of the Arab countries.

But they didn't stop there.

They also took, by force, about 26% more than land they had originally be given, (which, as pointed out already, was only semi-legitimate to begin with).

Then, years later in the 6-day war, they did it again.

In terms of international law, this was unjustified.

This is the origin of the Gaza Strip / West Bank conflict. They never were a part of Israel. It is as though the US settled parts of Mexico, and then when the Mexicans attacked the settlers, we started a war over it, and then officially claimed that land (oh, wait, we DID do that).

Before any discussion over whether Israel's actions regarding land usage are moral or not, they would have to give back all of the land they claimed in all wars - not just to the green line, but to the original 1947 borders.

by Jay Aziza on Wed, 12/20/2006 - 18:54 | reply capitalism is inherently moral?

"buying land and settling it is just buying land and settling it."

As though, if you can afford it, it must not hurt anyone.

Consider a hypothetical situation:

There is a natural disaster. As a result, most stores are short on food for a while.

A man who has plenty of money has an emergency shelter in place, well stocked.

He is out during the day, his shelter locked up, and he comes across a store which has some food, albeit at higher than normal prices.

But they have a limited supply.

He could just walk home, but he is hungry now, so he buys some bread and eats it.

Which means someone else can't.

He is just buying something and using it, and he can afford it - but it is still immoral.

Another example, a real life one this time.

I used to live in a trailer park about 15 miles from Manhattan.

In that area rent for even a small apartment can be over $1000 per month.

Our rent at the park was $420 a month.

It was affordable, and it was totally unsubsidized.

Some residents were retired, some disabled, some young, some with families, some working poor. The majority of the residents could not afford to more than double our rent. There were about a couple hundred households between my park and another one next door.

There was no other comparably low cost housing in the area.

The city government wanted to, under the eminent domain ruling, force the parks owners to sell, and then re-sell the land to private developers who would put up a strip mall in its place. The rationale was that the mall would provide more tax revenue to the city.

Economically, as long as they compensated the land owners, they would have been in the right, but it would have still been immoral (I don't know what happened, I moved out of the state).

Suppose Phillip Morris can afford to put cartoon ads for smoking on during Saturday morning cartoons. Would that be ok? Its just buying and using advertising slots on radio wave frequencies.

Suppose wealthy Islamists want to buy the Washington Monument,

Mt. Rushmore, Yosemite and Yellowstone Parks, and the Golden Gate bridge.

If they can afford it, do we let them?

Suppose someone wants to buy the house you live in as a renter, and throw you out.

In the REAL buying land and settling it is NEVER just buying land and settling it, because anywhere you go in this country, someone already lives there.

Go find a Native American and ask them if "buying" land and settling it is "just" buying land and settling it.

The pioneers bought the land they settled from the US government. Only problem is, it wasn't rightfully theirs to sell.

Little wonder that the citizens of a country built on this practice would support Israel for doing the same thing.

by Jay Aziza on Wed, 12/20/2006 - 19:13 | reply

Tiny Bit of Land

Even if the situations you describe suggest the immorality of trade in certain circumstances, in what sense are the situations you mention analogous to the settler issue in Israel?

The settlements are a tiny fraction of the land area of the West Bank and Jordan. In what sense are Palestinians being displaced?

Two peoples had individuals living on the land in the 1800's. Jewish immigration then encouraged Palestinian immigration because of the prosperity they created. The overwhelming majority of Palestinians living in the West Bank are descended from immigrants.

To the extent that Palestinians did lose land, they did so in the late 1940's because they declared war on the Jews and tried to take their land. So land was not stolen, except if you mean that there was intent to steal land.

In which case, Palestinians have a lot to answer for.

by a reader on Wed, 12/20/2006 - 23:34 | reply

Re: capitalism is inherently moral?

Jay Aziza is arguing by way of some examples that, trade is not just an isolated act and so it may be immoral or even illegal in some cases to allow free trade between consenting parties. However, in the examples he gives he has fallen victim to the same error he is supposedly trying to point out in the original post. Indeed, trade is not an isolated act; it always occurs within a broader social context. So if we mean to show that free trade may be immoral and (thus) illegal in some cases, we must do so by looking at those cases in the broader context they sit in.

In the first example Jay is saying that, the well-stocked person who buys food at the local store would be doing an unethical act. That could be if the assumption that the store has "limited supply" were true over a long enough period of time. But, In such cases "food" or any such commodity would usually be thought of as a public good and even the most libertarian minds would agree that there would be a case for some (limited) government role at least in the form of laws and their enforcement. But in a context where free trade is the common form of trade, food supply does not satisfy this condition even in places where a natural disaster has struck except in rare occasions. Usually the shortage is over in a short time because the incentives of a free economy work overwhelmingly against it. In such a broader context, buying food at the local store when one is hungry, even if one is well-stocked, is nothing more than buying food to eat.

The second example, the one about the eminent domain of the city over the trailer park, in fact demonstrates the opposite principle to what Jay is trying to support. The eminent domain is supposed to be about giving the city (the state) the power they need to achieve the goals they are supposed to. Things like building roads, parks, etc. Giving permission to build a mall in place of existing, occupied housing is a modern overstretch of these goals and goes against the more important principle of private ownership. As such, this example does not show the moral deficiency of free trade, but the moral deficiency of state control.

If Philip Morris could buy ads in Saturday morning cartoons, he had not done any immoral act. But do you think the networks that allowed such ads in their cartoons would have nearly as many viewers as they would otherwise? Would they be willing to sacrifice the most important reason they could sell ad space to Morris in the first place? In a free-trade context, with enough information about the harms of tobacco, this would not be a pressing issue of morality, but a simple matter of economy.

If wealthy Islamists could afford to buy the Golden Gate bridge, why should we not let them? What are they going to do with the bridge? Close it, or blow it up? Then we just need to set a price that would allow us to build another one if that is a credible outcome. Would they then buy it? Another scenario is that, they might pose a security problem by building a base for themselves within our society through acquiring land, etc. This is actually already happening. In Canada for instance, there are credible rumors that the highest officials of the government of Iran have piled up enormous assets and private properties. But that is not an argument against free trade. The problem here is not freedom in trade but the ideology of the despots such as Hashemi Rafsanjani and Khamenei of Iran who are against it. In such cases, it is by default the responsibility of the government and/or the courts to create the necessary legal framework that protects the free trade for all to have, not to take it away by unnecessary restrictions.

So, in all Jay's examples, the actual conclusion is not one against free trade. To the contrary, the best solution to such problems is one that expands and protects free trade.

-- Cyrus Ferdowsi, <http://libiran.blogspot.com>

by Liberal Iranian on Tue, 12/26/2006 - 11:39 | reply

Public Goods

In such cases "food" or any such commodity would usually be thought of as a public good and even the most libertarian minds would agree that there would be a case for some (limited) government role at least in the form of laws and their enforcement.

I don't agree the public good issues make any case whatsoever for government action. There was an extensive discussion of public goods in comments on another thread here. I don't believe that governments have any special knowledge of what should be done with goods.

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Sat, 01/20/2007 - 15:55 | reply

It's Not Knowledge

"I don't believe that governments have any special knowledge of what should be done with goods."

It's not a question of governments having special knowledge. When there are public goods, the government sometimes has the ability to act coercively in order to improve overall societal efficiency, even when private citizens do not. If this coercive action increases efficiency and if non-coercive solutions are less efficient (which is theoretically possible when the government enables public goods to be produced), this increased efficiency increases people's freedom because people have more money to spend. So citizens tolerate some coercion some of the time, in order to increase their freedom in other circumstances, more of the time.

Very few people (even the rich) will vote for a pure libertarian no government economy, because they recognize that limited government intervention, for example when there are natural disasters, sometimes increases efficiency. Virtually no one will vote for a pure libertarian economy, because in net it is too inefficient, and therefore too coercive to citizens.

"Liberal Iranian" is right. Sometimes even libertarians should consider that a consequence of limited coercion can be an increase in net freedom, due to greater prosperity.

by a reader on Mon, 01/22/2007 - 22:31 | reply

Knowledge

You believe everyone agrees on what is best (it's not an issue of knowledge), but some people act wickedly by refusing to do it (it's an issue of forcing people who refuse to do what they know is right). Is that correct?

Regardless, this question may make sense to you: If it's not a matter of knowledge, then why can't a private citizen use force? He has, by premise, the same knowledge of what outcome to force as the government does.

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 01/23/2007 - 00:58 | reply

More Public Goods

"You believe everyone agrees on what is best (it's not an issue of knowledge)"

Elliot

Mostly, I agree with that, but not entirely. With public goods, the overwhelming majority may favor using taxation to accomplish something, but there may be a few individuals who don't agree that a project qualifies as a public good (that the provision of the good by the government would increase efficiency in society).

Those individuals who don't agree, if they favor living in a particular democratic society, usually believe that even though they are overruled in one election, overall their rational conception of when something is a public good, will in general be shared by others. So they expect to be in the majority when most other votes are taken.

So they maximize their net freedom in society by participating in democracy, even if they disagree with a particular decision of their fellow citizens.

"If it's not a matter of knowledge, then why can't a private citizen use force?"

Elliot

The common knowledge of those in a democratic society is that a monopoly on the use of force is the most economically efficient way of providing security (and desired coercion) to the society.

In public good situations, a single coercive force can sometimes increase economic efficiency in society. With more money, people can do more of what they want, so their net freedom increases. But coercion is most efficiently implemented when only one specialized group of people have overwhelming firepower (the police). If everyone has overwhelming firepower, then no one has overwhelming firepower. So if everyone is equally powerful, everyone has wasted money on arms. Wasting money takes away people's freedom. So most people think that functioning militaries and police are "public goods", best financed by our tax dollars.

If minor forms of coercion can increase economic efficiency and therefore net freedom, most people will want that coercion produced in the most efficient way possible, again to maximize freedom. Government police forces and militaries serve their citizens, in democratic countries, in that way.

by a reader on Tue, 01/23/2007 - 03:03 | reply

Monopoly on Force

The common knowledge of those in a democratic society is that a monopoly on the use of force is the most economically efficient way of providing security (and desired coercion) to the society.

What is the argument that this is most efficient? I thought that monopolies created by forcibly suppressing competition were inefficient. For example, the post office. And indeed our government: since when is it very efficient at anything?

The alternative I'd like you to address is not everyone having guns, but a relatively small number of companies having significant armaments.

-- Elliot Temple
curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 01/24/2007 - 01:56 | reply

Knowledge

As I see it, your recommendation involves the majority, when it thinks it is right, imposing its will on a minority which says it disagrees. This is justified by saying that it's not a real disagreement -- they are wrong, and know it -- they are just being wicked.

One problem with this is that it makes no serious attempt to differentiate between wicked people (who know what's best, but refuse to do it), and people who genuinely disagree.

There is no justification for using force against people who disagree about what should be done with their property. I know that you will say there is: it's more economically efficient. But that presupposes that the forcer is right. That's invalid. There is no system with the quality that it only uses force when it is in the right.

-- Elliot Temple
curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 01/24/2007 - 02:04 | reply

Radical Libertarianism Attacks Freedom

"There is no justification for using force against people who disagree about what should be done with their property."

Not quiet what I am saying. People make a trade in certain situations. They agree to be coerced by the majority when they are in the minority, in exchange for being able to coerce the minority when they are in the majority. Theoretically, 100% of people could agree with that. Are you really saying that even if 100% of people agree to this, they are doing something wrong?

"no justification"?

None?

Even if 100% of people unanimously agree to utilize democratic principles to solve certain classes of problems?

We know that the overwhelming majority voluntarily agrees to live in a democracy because virtually no one, including the rich, will vote for libertarian candidates. The majority will not vote for (particularly radical) libertarian candidates because such individuals do not recognize the existence of public good problems.

The gross inefficiency created by not recognizing certain public good needs of communities (e.g. the need for defence, police, courts, roads, etc.) is too great for most people to stomach. A libertarianism that recognizes no public goods, deprives people of money and their lives.

So virtually no one will vote for these radical libertarian arrangements, because this libertarianism grossly violates individual liberty.

by a reader on Thu, 01/25/2007 - 01:42 | reply

Clarification

"One problem with this is that it makes no serious attempt to differentiate between wicked people (who know what's best, but refuse to do it), and people who genuinely disagree."

1. You seem to be saying that if a "serious attempt" were made to differentiate between "wicked people" and those who genuinely think the taxation is inefficient, you would be more sympathetic to taxation of everyone, except those who honestly disagree.

If so, what would constitute "a serious attempt", in your mind?

2. Or is your point that a "serious attempt" that gives a valid answer is truly not possible. In which case you didn't mean to say that serious attempts are not made, but rather that even serious attempts can never give valid answers!

Is 1 or 2 correct?

by a reader on Thu, 01/25/2007 - 04:54 | reply

Re: Clarification

The problem is that the supposed justification for coercion was that the majority was right (as, you say, everyone involved knows) -- the dissenters were wicked and had no point. But no attempt is being made to identify when the majority is actually wrong. It just keeps being assumed that it is right, b/c of your delegitimazation of dissent. Such a system, with next to no ability to correct errors in the thinking of the majority, is deeply hostile to new ideas, and can easily entrench bad ones.

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Thu, 01/25/2007 - 15:57 | reply

Public Goods

You say that not recognizing certain public goods is inefficient. Well, I say I recognize more than you. I recognize that, the option to buy a sandwich at a location for a particular price is a public good. Anyone in the world (with a few exceptions) has that option. It's a useful, valuable option.

I say the option to walk into a bookstore and browse books, and walk out, without paying, is a public good. You get something for free, and it's quite difficult for the store to give different treatment to people who plan to buy something, and people who don't. And the fact is that this public good exists.

Every single business and store on the Earth provides public goods. Many of them were created without force, and without help from the government. Public good problems are solved all the time, without force.

It's interesting that you mention roads as a public good, because privately built roads already exist. It's also interesting because you are aware of the concept of a toll road, and also a private driveway. How can you call roads a public good when it is relatively easy to exclude access to people who don't pay in advance? (Well, people will have the free option to buy use of the road. I will accept that answer, but it only puts roads in the same category as McDonalds.)

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Thu, 01/25/2007 - 16:06 | reply

Public Goods

"Well, I say I recognize more than you. I recognize that, the option to buy a sandwich at a location for a particular price is a public good."

Why is it a public good?

"I say the option to walk into a bookstore and browse books, and walk out, without paying, is a public good. You get something for free, and it's quite difficult for the store to give different treatment to people who plan to buy something, and people who don't. And the fact is that this public good exists."

As I have said before in a different post, a chance of customers spending money, is in fact money in the bank to a business with a large enough volume of customers. A 50% chance of getting 100 dollars is worth something to most businesses, so they will spend some money to get that money.

Ask yourself whether you would be willing to pay a certain amount of money to have a 50% chance of getting 100 dollars. Most people would be willing to spend something (usually less than 50 dollars) to buy that deal. Again, most people would be willing to pay SOMETHING to buy a "chance", even if it is not a guarantee of money, but a "chance" for money.

Because people will spend money to buy a "chance", a chance at winning money is worth something to the people who will spend for it.

Borders is implicitly giving customers money, by giving customers a comfortable chair and reading materials. And yes, the customer is paying for it, because the customer is giving back something very valuable to Borders: A "chance" that he will buy something. And remember, chances are valuable, so the owners of Borders are willing to spend money (provide seating) to buy the valuable chance that a customer might buy a book.

So when the owners of Borders provides seating to the public, they are not usually providing a public good, though the charitable giving of the company certainly would qualify.

"Public good problems are solved all the time, without force."

Yes. The culture does encourage people to be generous with each other, and so many (even most) public good problems are solved that way. But for some public good problems, there is no known efficient way of solving the problem. The overwhelming majority of people will vote for a publically owned defense force (a public good), enforced by taxation for example, to prevent our country from being annihilated. (It is simply too inefficient not to have a publically owned military!)

by a reader on Fri, 01/26/2007 - 00:51 | reply

Owning a Public Good is Owning the Law

If one believes in the ability of individuals to steal, then one believes in the existence of public goods, because private ownership of a public good, is private ownership of the means by which people steal.

Therefore owning a public good is equivalent to owning the ability to create laws that give and take property from others, without consent. Try to think of any classically recognized public good, and try to think of one in which this is NOT true.

So those radical libertarians who believe that traditionally labelled public goods should be privately owned, implicitly believe that private owners should be able to write the laws of their community that effect others, without their consent.

And those who believe that private individuals should be able to write the law that effects others, without consent, are otherwise known as dictators and socialists.

Therefore, a radical libertarianism that does not recognize a distinction between public and private goods, devolves into an equivalent socialism and totalitarianism.

And radical libertarians, espousing such a doctrine, are the enemies of freedom, like their socialistic and totalitarian identical twins.

by a reader on Fri, 01/26/2007 - 02:57 | reply

Chance

The "chance" that a customer will buy something is nothing like gambling on a 50% chance to get $100. With the gambling if you win the dice roll the house must pay you. With the book store, no one has to pay them anything. It isn't a chance, it's a decision.

Why will a person choose to pay Borders? Simple. Because they value owning one of the books more than its price.

They will not choose to pay for a book because they like the chair they already sat in. That doesn't affect the calculation of whether to buy the book or not.

A further argument that customers aren't paying for the chairs is this: no matter how many books I buy from Borders today, they can remove all the chairs tomorrow. I can make no (legal) complaint, because I have not paid for those chairs to be there.

-- Elliot Temple
curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Sat, 01/27/2007 - 17:28 | reply

Stocks Have No Value?

"The "chance" that a customer will buy something is nothing like gambling on a 50% chance to get $100. With the gambling if you win the dice roll the house must pay you. With the book store, no one has to pay them anything. It isn't a chance, it's a decision."

So stocks, which may be worth nothing when you try to sell them, have no value at all? Look at the stock page of any newspaper. Note the prices of stocks.

Then you might wish to rethink your argument!

by a reader on Sun, 01/28/2007 - 04:00 | reply

Chairs

For each person in the world, there is a certain probability that he will buy a certain number of additional books at Borders if they offer seating compared with if they do not. This does not mean anyone is paying for chairs, but never mind that for now.

For some people, this probability is zero: these include people who would never go to Borders anyway, and people who buy a lot of books at Borders but do not value sitting down there.

But it also includes people who never buy books but do value sitting in chairs in malls, reading books free. Such people are paying Borders zero. They are free riders. And it is entirely possible for a bookstore not to be built, that would have been built if only those free riders paid for the chairs they value.

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Sun, 01/28/2007 - 22:11 | reply

A Fair Coin..A Fair Chance..Flipped or Not

"For some people, this probability is zero: these include people who would never go to Borders anyway, and people who buy a lot of books at Borders but do not value sitting down there."

So if I flip a fair coin and then cover the results with my hand, so I can't see the results, are you really willing to say that I don't have a 50% chance of getting heads, because the coin was already flipped and must already be showing heads or tails underneath my hand?

From the perspective of the owners of Borders, each customer has a certain average chance that he will buy books, regardless of whether the individual customer knows that he will or will not buy books. The managers of Borders know that they can increase the average chance that a customer will buy books, if the store provides a comfortable place to sit.

As individuals, I have no doubt that the owners of Borders can be as altruistic as anyone else. But comfortable chairs and a nice ambience in stores are present, for the most part, to increase profit, not to increase altruism. If managers waist money on store furniture that does not improve long-term profitability, the store will lose investment money to competitors who invest their money more profitably.

by a reader on Mon, 01/29/2007 - 00:16 | reply

Free Chairs

Borders has some free riders in their chairs who will never pay.

Borders makes profit from its policies that allow free riders.

One way a public good problem can be solved is to ignore the free riders because it's profitable to carry on anyway.

With me so far?

-- Elliot Temple
curi@curi.us
Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 01/29/2007 - 01:40 | reply

Good Post!

I changed my mind. You are right!

Good Post.

It is entirely possible that the owners of Borders are maximizing profit, but at the same time unintentionally giving away a free service, because of the cost of measuring who is a "true" customer and who is just there for the "free ride".

It actually neatly illustrates a point that I often try to make when discussing these issues. From the perspective of the owners of Borders, there is variable behavior of customers. Presumably, if they could perfectly tell who was going to buy, they would lavish considerably more attention on him/her....very comfortable couches!

So variability in the customers behavior, from the perspective of Borders, is a cost to its owners. Memes and culture probably have a role in making it easier to determine who is the real customer. Or at least, if such mechanisms existed, it would minimize the cost of "free riders" and hence the transaction costs of the business.

Thanks.

by a reader on Mon, 01/29/2007 - 02:07 | reply

Excellent

Great! I think it will interest you to now apply similar logic to a classic public good problem:

There is a valley with farmers, and this valley has yearly floods. A dam is proposed to keep more exact control over water levels and make all the farms have better yields. The dam costs many times more than the benefit to one farmer, but the benefit to all the farmers combined is much more than the cost of the dam.

The public good problem says: a few people don't actually want the dam right now. Maybe they are in too much debt to make an investment of that size. Or they think dams are ugly. Or they hate technology. If we ask everyone who wants the dam to pay their fare share, everyone has an incentive to pretend to be one of the people who doesn't really want it. Then they won't have to pay, but they will still get the dam.

How can Borders help us here? Well, in that case, we ignored free riders on a public good (the chairs), while making a profit on a private good (the book sales). Maybe it's better than that: we didn't just ignore the free riders, we took advantage of them being in our store: while there, they saw advertisements and book covers that could tempt them to buy a book.

In the case of the valley, one thing to do is remember that having the public good available makes the valley a more valuable place, just like the chairs make Borders a better place. So we could buy real estate there before building a dam, and its value would increase afterwards.

But getting back to the original plan, what other private goods could we sell? Well, the owners of a dam for a large valley have a lot of important decisions to make. What will the dam be named? What sort of tourism program will it have? What will be the exact schedule of releasing water, and what will be the exact target water levels in the valley on each day? Will it take various steps to be "environmentally friendly"? Who is allowed to press the big red button to release huge torrents of water?

So another thing we could do is sell the name of the dam, and give tours. We even could call it "the dam that defies public good theory" if that would impress enough people. And the farmers won't all want the same exact schedule of water releases. Having preferable water levels could be worth a lot to a major farmer. The other farmers will get non-ideal water levels for free which are better than when there was no dam. But so what? That isn't hurting us. As long as we have things we can sell, we may be able to build the dam.

It may be true that the dam is more difficult to build than Borders. Maybe it's harder to find enough things to sell for the large cost to build it. But my claim is only that we can think of both projects as, fundamentally, facing the same issues.

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 01/29/2007 - 17:07 | reply

Hmm

"In the case of the valley, one thing to do is remember that having the public good available makes the valley a more valuable place"

I have a great business idea. Let's move all Border's bookstores to blighted/impoverished/high crime locations. After the move, there is more of a public good problem available, so we have more of an opportunity to make money stopping "free riders" and criminals. Better yet, let's move all the Border's stores to flood plains. That way the stores can increase in value, when we agree to lose money in perpetuity to "free riders", who won't support the building and maintaining of dams.

Find the greatest public good problems, and business will come!

by a reader on Tue, 01/30/2007 - 01:17 | reply

Radical Libertarianism Attacks Freedom (part II)

An "economic good" is defined as a commodity or service that can be utilized to satisfy human wants and that has exchange value.

-noun

From Dictionary.com, Based on the Random House Unabridged Dictionary

Radical libertarians claim that there are no public goods. But if there are no public goods, then all goods are private goods.

If a person owns the "ability to create the law", he owns the rights to a valuable service (having property rights defined in the way he wants them to be defined). This service certainly is worth something in an economic exchange. Therefore, "the ability to create the law" is an economic good, given the meaning of "economic good" specified above.

But if the radical libertarian believes that there are no public goods, then all goods should be considered private goods, including "the ability to create the law." But the ability to create the law, owned by an individual, turns an individual into a dictator, in the standard meaning of that term. Therefore radical libertarians, although talking loudly about freedom, in fact (logically) support dictatorship.

But the situation is worse than that. If an individual owns "the ability to make the law", he owns the ability to steal from others, if he chooses. But legal protection from theft, independent of this choice of someone else to steal, is what defines a private good. So if the radical libertarian does not believe in public goods, he does not believe in private goods, either. Finally, believing neither in the existence of public goods nor private goods; in other words believing in the existence of no goods at all, makes no sense at all.

Therefore, by a reduction ad absurdum argument, it is illogical not to believe in the existence of public goods.

So Elliot, do you believe in the existence of public goods, independent from private goods?

by a reader on Tue, 01/30/2007 - 03:03 | reply

pg

I didn't say there are no public goods, I said that Borders has a public good problem! They are very common. But also, as Borders illustrates, they can be solved without government.

Please don't be sarcastic. I think we misunderstand each other enough when we are straight-forward.

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 01/30/2007 - 04:41 | reply

Radical Libertarians and Public Good Problems

A reader wrote:

Radical libertarians claim that there are no public goods

Here is a chapter almost entirely devoted to the discussion of public goods and public good problems, in the textbook Price Theory by the anarcho-capitalist (and radically libertarian) economist David Friedman.

by Editor on Tue, 01/30/2007 - 12:53 | reply

But at Times...

I recently had a discussion with a certain individual whom you might know, who argued that one can never make a convincing argument that a particular economic situation represents a public good problem.

The implication of that argument was said to be that since one can never make a convincing argument that a particular situation represents a public good problem, one can not be convincing in arguing that the government should intervene to solve a public good problem.

I believe I demonstrated in other discussions that the argument is mistaken.

So there are people who have believed that one can not make a convincing argument that public good problems exist.

by a reader on Wed, 01/31/2007 - 00:23 | reply

Thanks

Yes! I think it would be good to read his chapter.

In a public meeting situation, the author describes the following:

"The long-winded speaker is underproducing the public good of brevity. Another, and equivalent, way of describing the situation is to say that he is overproducing his speech. The problem can be described either as underproduction due to the public-good problem or as overproduction due to the existence of an externality."

So someone who is a mugger is overproducing the externality called "stealing" and underproducing the public good called "public safety". Public goods and externalities are two-halves of the same coin.

I have previously said that it is a mistake to believe that one cannot make a convincing argument for the existence of public good problems. But we can now say something stronger. If one knows that stealing is a problem, this proves the actual existence of public good problems.

by a reader on Wed, 01/31/2007 - 01:35 | reply

Who Determines?

"There is no justification for using force against people who disagree about what should be done with their property."

Elliot Temple

Who determines (or how is it determined) that something has been done to one's property?

by a reader on Wed, 01/31/2007 - 04:08 | reply

Convincing Arguments

A public good problem is a situation in which the right outcome will not happen voluntarily or by market forces. However, forceful government intervention can help everyone and make the right outcome occur. The way this happens is that the right outcome is for many people to pool their money to buy something that will help them all. A few people don't want the good, so they shouldn't pay. Unfortunately, people who do want the good do not have an incentive to tell the truth: if they say they are one of the few people who doesn't want it, they will save money. They get a free ride. But if everyone acts rationally, they all try to get a free ride, and the right outcome isn't paid for until the government steps in. Technically, not everyone is helped this time -- a few were telling the truth when they said they didn't want to buy the good at this price -- but, on average, they all benefit from the government's interventionist policy.

How do you identify a public good problem in real life? Well, you need to know what the right outcome is, and you need to know it won't happen by market forces: no one could possibly invent something that puts incentives in the right places. But how can you convincingly argue for those?

If something is the morally best outcome, it is best for everyone involved. If only they understood that, they would voluntarily want to do it, because it is better for them to do so than to do anything else. So, it seems to me that it's always the case that sufficient knowledge in the right place will make people do something voluntarily -- if it really is best.

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 01/31/2007 - 04:23 | reply

Subjective vs. Objective

"There is no justification for using force against people who disagree about what should be done with their property"

So is it a person's "subjective" sense that something has been done to change his property and this precludes the use of force to create the change? Or is there an "objective" sense in which something has been done to his property, and this precludes the use of force to create change?

by a reader on Wed, 01/31/2007 - 13:00 | reply

Objective

There is a fact of the matter about whether someone has violated your property. It isn't subjective.

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 01/31/2007 - 18:25 | reply

Stopping Others from Trading

"There is no justification for using force against people who disagree about what should be done with their property"

Elliot Temple

If an individual's property value will not go down (objectively) and no objective damage will be done to anyone else's property values, should an individual be able to legally stop (coerce) others from making a voluntary and mutually beneficial trade, on the grounds that he thinks the trade is immoral?

by a reader on Thu, 02/01/2007 - 00:15 | reply

no

no

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Thu, 02/01/2007 - 00:45 | reply

Even Government Immorality?

"There is no justification for using force against people who disagree about what should be done with their property"

Elliot Temple

Multiple (but not all) farmers, who experience flooding on their land, make a deal with the government to collect taxes from all farmers after a dam is built. The dam increases the income of all farmers (due to increased crop yields from decreased flooding), more than the taxes subsequently collected to pay back the government.

Should a libertarian farmer be able to stop this deal, just because he has moral problems with the government collecting taxes from him? Has governmental force been applied against the libertarian because he disagrees with the government decision and has to pay taxes?

by a reader on Thu, 02/01/2007 - 03:40 | reply

Yes

In an ideal world, he should be able to stop it: no one has a right to sign him up for some deal if he doesn't want to be part of it. But they can continue on without his money.

For all you know, his kids were in a car accident yesterday, and he doesn't have insurance, and your government taxes mean he has to choose one to die.

There is a huge variety of milder circumstances. But the point is, taking people's wealth matters. And if they don't want to sign up for the deal which you think is in their interest, they will have a reason. And it could be a good one. And if it isn't, you could persuade them it isn't so there is no need to use force.

-- Elliot Temple
curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Thu, 02/01/2007 - 07:32 | reply

Wealth Increased

"There is a huge variety of milder circumstances. But the point is, taking people's wealth matters."

But his wealth is not being taken. The increase in yields from his crops is greater than the tax subsequently collected to build the dam.

by a reader on Thu, 02/01/2007 - 12:11 | reply

Taken

You take his money now, and according to your predictions, if he continues with the same lifestyle, which you don't know if he will, then he will make more later. That could ruin someone's life.

-- Elliot Temple
curi@curi.us

Dialogs

Libertarian Objections

"You take his money now and according to your predictions..."

The tax can be collected, for example on the sale of his produce, if he produces it. So the tax can be collected only when we are as objectively sure (as possible) that the libertarian has made a net profit. Making a net profit would take into account his entire tax obligation as one of the farmers benefitting from the socialized dam.

If this arrangement occurs, but the libertarian objects to having to pay taxes, has he been coerced or forced to do so? Should it be legally OK to collect taxes in this way?

by a reader on Thu, 02/01/2007 - 18:33 | reply

Objections

I am trying to isolate the cause of the sense that the libertarian has been coerced.

If you do think it should be illegal to tax the libertarian farmer, is it because even if all the assumptions are true, so the libertarian's net profit increases, the libertarian is being forced to involuntarily change his behavior (e.g. write a check to the government) though he does not want to?

by a reader on Thu, 02/01/2007 - 18:43 | reply

Tax

You could be wrong about why his profits increased.

Your dam may increase his profits less than another dam which he would have preferred to pay for.

Your dam may have policies he doesn't like. If you were a private company, he wouldn't buy from you, b/c he'd rather give his business to another company with policies he prefers.

He may think the flood control isn't helpful. Even if he's wrong, you need to persuade him, not force him, b/c you could be wrong as well.

He may object to reporting his income to you, so that you know how much to tax him. Privacy...

He may think the dam is ugly, and not worth the profit, and doesn't want to pay to support it.

He may prefer not to do business with you. Being selective about who we do business with is important. What if the dam project doesn't work out? Perhaps because of resistance from people like him, even. Well, then you might have a half-finished dam sitting around (plus angry bureaucrats). That could be worse than no dam.

The main point: if the dam is a good idea, persuade him. Then he will happily consent to pay for it out of his profits. As Godwin said (quoted on the front page of my website):

Let us consider the effect that coercion produces upon the mind of him against whom it is employed. It cannot begin with convincing; it is no argument. It begins with producing the sensation of pain, and the sentiment of distaste. It begins with violently alienating the mind from the truth with which we wish it to be impressed. It includes in it a tacit confession of imbecility. If he who employs coercion against me could mould me to his purposes by argument, no doubt he would. He pretends to punish me because his argument is strong; but he really punishes me because his argument is weak.

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Thu, 02/01/2007 - 19:41 | reply

Mistake?

1. "In an ideal world, he should be able to stop it (the dam)"

Elliot Temple

2. If an individual's property value will not go down (objectively) and no objective damage will be done to anyone else's property values, should an individual be able to legally stop (coerce) others from making a voluntary and mutually beneficial trade, on the grounds that he thinks the trade is immoral?

a reader

"No"

Elliot Temple

Argument number 1 applies to the dam. So you are saying that the dam should be able to be legally stopped by the libertarian in an ideal world.

Argument number 2 also applies to the dam. So you are saying that the dam should not be able to be stopped by the libertarian in an ideal world.

Which of your statements is mistaken?

by a reader on Thu, 02/01/2007 - 22:22 | reply

re: mistake

arg 2 does not apply for reasons including:

- the trade involves him, not just "others"
- he isn't objecting on purely moral grounds

- it isn't voluntary if he objects

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Thu, 02/01/2007 - 22:55 | reply

Does Apply

A few farmers are trading with the government. Nobodies property values go down, though all are being taxed. The tax has increased the libertarian's wealth. Are you saying the libertarian has been coerced because he has been given money?

Perhaps you are saying that the libertarian has been coerced because he has to change his behavior?

What is it that is "objectively" coercive about the new arrangements?

Number 2 precisely applies.

by a reader on Thu, 02/01/2007 - 23:07 | reply

doesn't umm i edited my post above FYI (before seeing that you replied) can you reply to my reasons i've now spelled out that arg 2, as written, does not apply?

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Thu, 02/01/2007 - 23:13 | reply

Libertarianism and its Twin, Socialism

"The trade involves 'him,'" (The libertarian, therefore, is involved in the trade but his objections are not taken into account.)
Elliot Temple

If a government sells a road to a businessman and everyone's property values go up and everyone's time to work decreases, should a socialist be able to legally object to the trade on the grounds that the roads should be owned by the government? Can the socialist object to the trade on the grounds that he used to have to pay the government, but now has to pay a private individual (the road owner)? So the socialist feels "coerced" because there are now a few private roads. As usual, the libertarian and the socialist are on the same page. Both want to socialize morality at the expense of property.

"he (the libertarian) isn't objecting on purely moral grounds"

Elliot Temple

What other grounds is he objecting on?

"it isn't voluntary if he objects"

Elliot Temple

If a Best Buy buys a small local grocery store near me, and my property values go up, should I be able to legally object on the grounds that I am opposed to business? Should I be able to stop the trade, on the grounds that the "people" have not agreed to this? The libertarian and the socialist, once again, share this concern that everyone has to be on the same page before anything is done. So they are willing to steal property by preventing exchange in real time, in the name of socializing morality.

by a reader on Thu, 02/01/2007 - 23:57 | reply

the socialist has no grounds

the socialist has no grounds for complaint -- he doesn't have to trade with the road owner if he doesn't want to. except that the government has various duties to its people, and shouldn't irresponsibly mess up reasonable access to the roads it built. if he makes that objection, he can complain to the government, not to the new owner.

"What other grounds is he objecting on?"

I gave a list of reasons people might object in a previous post. If no one objects, then go ahead.

regarding voluntary: part of the deal is the government takes my money to pay for it. your grocery store example lacks that aspect.

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Fri, 02/02/2007 - 00:43 | reply

Socialists and Libertarians

"the socialist has no grounds for complaint -- he doesn't have to trade with the road owner if he doesn't want to."

If the businessman-road-owner owns the only road out of a cul-de-sac, then it becomes very difficult for a homeowner not to exchange with him. Now, a homeowner could take a helicopter out, or he could develop a new road.

But the same is true of the libertarian farmer. He does not have to plant crops, and he therefore does not have to pay the government (for the dam) from taxation of his crops. So like the homeowner who uses a helicopter to leave his house, the libertarian can decide to not pay for the dam by not planting crops (not using the benefit from the dam).

Creating new solutions to flooding may take some time, but it will take the homeowner time to build alternative roads, in the cul-de-sac. I'm afraid there is exact symmetry between the socialist and the libertarian. Both are trying to prevent trade that objectively increases the wealth of everyone, including themselves. Note that there is even a physical symmetry between a river that runs between farms, and a road that runs between homes in a cul-de-sac.

"You could be wrong about why his profits increased."

If the government sells the road to a businessman and everyone's property values increase, and if the best economic theory suggests that the cause was placing the road in the hands of private individuals who value efficiency; the socialist could nonetheless claim that the analysis is mistaken. Perhaps the increased housing values occurred for other reasons.

Imagine the consequences if the socialist and the libertarian should have the legal right to stop any trade because there is uncertainty about the outcome, even though the best economic theory says that a private road and a public dam increase the wealth of everyone.

There is always going to be some uncertainty in trading. So stopping trade because of uncertainty amounts to stopping all trade. And this amounts to a defense of the status quo, because there are inevitably uncertainties. Once again, the libertarian and the socialist are restricting free exchange between people, this time because of fears and pessimism.

"regarding voluntary: part of the deal is the government takes my money to pay for it."

Actually if everyone's wealth increases, the private/government actions are in net creating wealth, not taking it.

"Your dam may have policies he (the libertarian) doesn't like. If you were a private company, he wouldn't buy from you, b/c he'd rather give his business to another company with policies he prefers."

The policies of the private owner of the cul-de-sac road may not agree with everyone, either. Some may disagree about the placement of the lights, for example.

The socialist homeowner and the libertarian farmer may need to help create alternatives that increase the value of their own properties, without decreasing the value of their neighbor's property. But "command and control" libertarians restrict the wealth of everyone, by stopping an efficient public dam from being built. And "command and control" socialists do likewise, if they prevent efficient, privately owned roads that benefit everyone.

"He (the libertarian) may prefer not to do business with you."

The socialist homeowner may not prefer to do business with the private owner of the cul-de-sac road, either. As you can tell, socialist homeowners and libertarian farmers have a lot of objections in common.

"He may think the flood control isn't helpful. Even if he's wrong, you need to persuade him, not force him, b/c you could be wrong as well."

The socialist homeowner may not think that the private road is more efficient, either. But even if our best economic theories say the socialist is wrong, are you really claiming that the cul-de-sac road should not be privately owned, even if everyone becomes wealthier as a consequence?

Does it really make sense for a libertarian farmer to think that if he judges any trade anywhere in the United States to adversely affect his property values, he has a right to stop it, until he is convinced that it doesn't? Does he have a right to stop every single trade, even if our best economic theories suggest that the trading of others helps, not hurts him?

Well, now I think the libertarian farmer is worse than the socialist homeowner. For if the libertarian can stop every trade in the United States, until he says that it does not hurt him, that libertarian is no socialist; he's a plain dictator!

"He may object to reporting his income to you, so that you know how much to tax him. Privacy..."

If the tax is based on the total cost of the dam to the private individual, collected after he sells his produce, the amount that he pays in tax is fixed. Income information is not shared.

"He (the libertarian farmer) may think the dam is ugly, and not worth the profit, and doesn't want to pay to support it."

If a libertarian can stop any trade because he thinks the results are ugly, then he can stop all trades in the United States (when he says they create something ugly). Do you see, as you listen to these arguments, how libertarian conceptions of people's rights amount to a defense of dictatorship? One libertarian is demanding the right to restrict every other person's trade, on the grounds that he thinks the results are ugly.

"The main point: if the dam is a good idea, persuade him."

Should the privatization of roads not be allowed, unless every socialist has been persuaded? Indeed, should no trade take place in the United States, unless there is unanimous rule? Should therefore no trade take place, at all, because every single person in the United States does not 100% agree about what is right?

But property is created because of exchange. So should we have no property, at all, because of a totalitarianism that insists that everyone first agree? In other words, is the libertarian arguing that we should have no property at all, unless we can first create totalitarian unanimity of mind? But this implies that everyone must own a little bit of all property, if everyone must be persuaded for any piece of property to be exchanged. But this sounds exactly like the mantra of the socialist, indeed is the mantra of the socialist. The libertarian is implicitly arguing, in his insistence on universal consent, that everyone owns a little bit of every piece of property. In other words, the libertarian is insisting that all property is socialized. And like the socialist, the libertarian claims this creates freedom.

by a reader on Fri, 02/02/2007 - 05:00 | reply

Who Must Consent?

It isn't universal consent that is required for a trade, it is consent among all participants of a trade. Your dam+taxes trade involves everyone in the valley. So it's very hard to organize. You have to convince everyone that you want to pay you.

You say it doesn't count as paying you because they become richer. But what if something goes wrong? Say a blight takes all their crops. Then what?

-- Elliot Temple
curi@curi.us
Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Fri, 02/02/2007 - 20:10 | reply

You Have to Pay for Services

Actually, it involves only those people who use the services of the dam. So yes, those who use the dam have to pay for it. If the farmer does not plant crops, so gains no benefit, or can objectively demonstrate that he has his own method of flood control, then the farmer wouldn't pay (be taxed).

If the socialist homeowner does not use the (only) road exiting the cul-de-sac, then he wouldn't pay the private road owner, either.

"Your dam+taxes trade involves everyone in the valley."
Elliot Temple

It involves everyone in the valley only as much as private ownership of a cul-de-sac road involves everyone living in the cul-de-sac.

So why is the libertarian farmer a "participant" in the trade but the socialist homeowner is not?

by a reader on Fri, 02/02/2007 - 22:26 | reply

not the same with the valley, people come to my door, ask for money, and put me in jail if i refuse. just for growing crops on my land. with the cul-de-sac, that does not happen -- they only ask for money if i use their land w/out an easement. why do you think they are the same?

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Fri, 02/02/2007 - 22:54 | reply

Identical Situation

If there is an easement or not in the cul-de-sac is irrelevant. If people put a toll booth on the road and if I use the private road and don't pay, I get thrown in jail for stealing.

Similarly, if I use the dam and I don't pay (taxes), I also get thrown in jail.

The situations are identical.

by a reader on Fri, 02/02/2007 - 23:43 | reply

using

You are counting me as "using" the dam even if i carry on with my life as normal from before it existed. Even if I didn't know it exists, you'd count me as using it. Even if I don't want it, and I think it is making me poorer, you'll send me a bill for it. Right?

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Sat, 02/03/2007 - 01:07 | reply

Substitute "Dam" for "Road" and "Libertarian" for "Socialist"

The libertarian: "You are counting me as "using" the dam even if i carry on with my life as normal from before it existed. Even if I didn't know it exists, you'd count me as using it. Even if I don't want it, and I think it is making me poorer, you'll send me a bill for it. Right?"

The socialist: "You are counting me as "using" the road even if i carry on with my life as normal (using the road) from before the road was privatized. Even if I don't know the road is private, you'd count me as using it. Even if I don't want the private road, and I think it is making me poorer, you'll charge me for it (when I get to the toll booth). Right?"

I do think that people should be informed that the road is private and there will be charges. I think the same is true for the dam.

Elliot, your argument is essentially declaring a "right" to the status quo. But nobody has such a right. Otherwise one person can stop all other people from trading based on his subjective sensibilities. And that is immoral.

by a reader on Sat, 02/03/2007 - 03:41 | reply

it should be the same lifesty

it should be the same lifestyle from before the road existed to make the claim it doesn't use the road.

in the dam case, i stick to my property. in the road case, i leave it.

what is your claim that i'm using your dam? that you affect water flow onto my property. you are spilling water (or dryness) onto my land. that i didn't want, and that i think is hurting me. then you have the nerve to charge me for it. if anything, you owe me.

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Sun, 02/04/2007 - 20:13 | reply

Socialists are People Too

Libertarian "It should be the same lifestyle from before the road existed?"

Socialist "Well, it's not! I bought my house and positioned the driveway precisely so I can have a very direct route to work. As you correctly point out, my property came with an easement (the road itself which I shared with my neighbors.) The law protected my use of my driveway and the easement. I bought a package of rights when I bought my home, and you are taking them away from me and making me pay for the same thing I used to do for free! Disrupting my route to work, and the way I wanted to use of my driveway, which I just repaved, disrupts my lifestyle. What's more, you have the nerve to ask me to pay for these changes that I don't want. Now I, a freedom loving socialist, have to pay a businessman to drive the same route I did before? You should pay me for taking away my right to use the driveway as it functioned before and the easement as it functioned before!

And libertarian farmer, I have no sympathy for you. You are using your property in virutally exactly the same way as you did before. You are farming the same land, just having an easier time of it, according to objective economic analysis. So your lifestyle is the same, except you get more money for doing what you already are doing. On the other hand, you have not had to change your route out of your housing complex to avoid paying capitalists. How can you say your "lifestyle" has changed, certainly not to the degree that mine has. So the government has given you money, despite virtually identical behavior on your part, yet you complain and desire to deprive everyone else of money. Typical capitalist thief!

by a reader on Mon, 02/05/2007 - 15:04 | reply

P.S.

Socialist to Libertarian

To maintain my lifestyle (where I don't have to stop at toll booths just to drive), I have to pave my backyard and put a hole in the back of my garage to drive my car through, to avoid the businessman's toll booths. Yes, if I do all that I can find a ridiculous dirt road behind my house which is called the new 'easement' leading out of my complex, and avoid toll-booths. Anyone can see that having to do so much just to maintain the lifestyle I had, I am worse off. In other words, my lifestyle has been disrupted, if I don't want to use the capitalist toll booths. Yet you, libertarian farmer, claim your "lifestyle" has been disrupted, yet you do virtually the same behaviors as before, just make more money doing them. That makes no sense. On what grounds do you say your lifestyle has been disrupted?

by a reader on Mon, 02/05/2007 - 15:41 | reply

My kids preferred to swim in

My kids preferred to swim in the old level of flooding. To me, that's worth a million dollars. Stop changing my life and telling me I should prefer it. Caring about swimming conditions is reasonable. You are assuming you are right about what I should want, without addressing why I want it.

-- Elliot Temple
curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 02/05/2007 - 19:53 | reply

Political Economy

"My kids preferred to swim in the old level of flooding. To me, that's worth a million dollars. Stop changing my life and telling me I should prefer it. Caring about swimming conditions is reasonable. You are assuming you are right about what I should want, without addressing why I want it."

No I am not assuming that you are wrong for what you want. I am assuming you have to pay for what you want.

Of course the socialist can also say, "My kids preferred to use our driveway as it had been, and use our easement without having to stop at a toll booth. That is worth 1,000,000 dollars to me. The government should not sell the road to a private businessman without my consent. Stop changing my life and telling me I should prefer it. Caring about how I travel to work, the sites I see, the way I go to work: All of these concerns are reasonable. You are assuming you are right about what I should want, without addressing why I want it."

Now, with a million dollars, you might be able to change many people's minds, but without compensating them, you usually should not be allowed to use your moral claims (your children "like swimming"), to damage the property and productivity of others. This is precisely why we have the police and government in the United States, to protect people from libertarians (and socialists) trying to impose their moral standards on everyone else.

You may not want me to paint my house a particular color because the photons entering your family's eyes, as you stand on your property, bother your children or you an awful lot. But we have the police to protect us from individuals who want to impose their moral values on the rest of us, while taking our property. If your property values do not fall when I paint my house, in general, you do not have a right to complain about the color of my house. And if you want me to change the color of my house, you have to pay me.

Now, should objective economic efficiency trump all questions of morality. Obviously not! The real question is how should it be decided which issues are questions of morality, in which it is sometimes OK to involuntarily take property from others, and which are not.

Mantra's about "coercion" and "force" being "bad" usually don't solve many real-world problems. The reason is that one person's "stealing" of property is another person's "justified ownership" of the same property. Both sides will perceive that their property has been forcefully taken, no matter what the outcome, as the examples of the "socialist" and the "libertarian" demonstrate, discussed above. By assumption, property values and income of both increased but the socialist and the libertarian wanted their moral claims to trump the economic ones (the efficiency claims).

So the real question is not about "force" and "coercion", because one person's "justified force" is another person's "stealing". We can all agree that no one likes bad things to happen. But rather, the real issue is how should free people decide which goods should be subjected to efficiency analysis, and which should be subjected to ethical analysis. The two sometimes go together, but as the examples above show, not always.

Such discussions are the beginning of a discussion of political-economy.

by a reader on Tue, 02/06/2007 - 00:06 | reply

Re: Political Economy

one person's "justified force" is another person's "stealing"

Is this true too? One person's freedom fighter, is another person's terrorist.

-- Elliot Temple
curi@curi.us
Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 02/06/2007 - 00:25 | reply

"what is your claim that i'm

"what is your claim that i'm using your dam? that you affect water flow onto my property. you are spilling water (or dryness) onto my land."

The condition of the road is spilling over onto everyone's house in the cul-de-sac. How do we know this? Because economic analysis shows that property values will increase when the "spill-over" effect from the ugly road is changed. Predictably, when the road is repaired by the private entrepreneur, everyone's property values increase. And certainly, the private entrepreneur is changing the way the road affects the visual perception of those standing on their own property.

Now, a socialist may say that his children and he appreciated the "old rustic road" (the spill-over effect that damages property values), but they do not have a right to take people's property for that "want" (their sense of aesthetics), unless they pay for it.

"one person's 'justified force' is another person's stealing"
a reader

"Is this true too? One person's freedom fighter, is another person's terrorist."
Elliot Temple

People do disagree about who is a freedom fighter and who is a terrorist. But I think there is an ethical answer in each case, although we might not know what is correct at this point in time. As I said, "the real issue is how should free people decide which goods should be subjected to efficiency analysis, and which should be subjected to ethical analysis."

Most of the time one person's ethical principles should not allow him to stop other people's trades. However, this is not true all the time! Many people who call themselves "freedom-fighters" should be stopped, even if in some way they improve the local economy (think Hezbollah!) I think it is OK to take the property of those who support Hezbollah.

by a reader on Tue, 02/06/2007 - 13:57 | reply

efficiency vs ethics

the real issue is how should free people decide which goods should be subjected to efficiency analysis, and which should be subjected to ethical analysis.

I take it that by "efficiency analysis" you mean considering whether it meets people's preferences as much as the alternatives. And by ethical analysis, you mean to consider not just what people do prefer today, but also what they ought to prefer. I put it to you that an ethical analysis is always the best one.

An ethical analysis is the general case of analysing what choices people ought to make. It must, therefore, take into account everything relevant, including efficiency, but also including anything else. It will be capable of judging how important efficiency is in each situation, and each other factor as well. By contrast, an efficiency analysis is not universal, and isn't self-aware: it can't tell if it was the right type of analysis to use. So it is bound to sometimes mislead us, if we sometimes start with it.

Something that dominates many ethical analyses is property rights. This is partly because they exist in our society, so you'll do as well ignoring them as ignoring road signs. But it's also because they help humans to cooperate. Property rights tell us how to resolve many disputes about the use of goods, and as an evolved tradition in our society, they are sufficiently clear that they can be resolved in court. Our courts would have no trouble at all deciding who violated whose rights in the case of the unwanted-dam-and-charges, or the case of the terrorist "freedom fighter", if the parties involved were all just citizens.

There is one thing that is considered to change the analysis: when government takes an action, like charging people for a dam they didn't want, that is deemed legitimate, even though if a private citizen did the same thing it would be clearly illegal. It remains illegal even if the perpetrator proves in court that his action was economically beneficial. The government is a special case: it is thought right to use force "for our own good", (as are parents with their children), but private citizens aren't.

What's the purported justification for these exceptions, and is it reasonable?

Is this way of considering the issue agreeable to you so far?

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 02/07/2007 - 01:00 | reply

Such Efficiency is Inefficient

"I take it that by "efficiency analysis" you mean considering whether it meets people's preferences as much as the alternatives."

No. But wouldn't it be nice if we could do that! The problem is the information cost (the transaction cost) of accurately figuring out everyone's wants and then trading goods (given those wants) is far too high.

So everyone's incentive is to NOT want everyone else's preferences to be optimally met, because if these preferences are discovered, the cost of this process will cause each person to receive less overall from trade. So no one will vote for a system that only allows a trade if everyone in the entire society feels happier about it. Virtually everyone is willing to sacrifice having his own preferences optimally met, as long as everyone else does the same, because overall that makes everyone wealthier. Not having everyone's preferences considered in any transaction, therefore, is a public good.

Instead, when many speak of efficiency, they refer to the idea that objectively determined property values of everyone's goods should not be decreased by others' transactions.

Obviously, this is not a perfect rule, either, but it does have the advantage of protecting objective property values.

I agree with you that asserting that efficiency analysis is often "good", is a moral claim.

by a reader on Wed, 02/07/2007 - 22:53 | reply

Unanimous Rule Takes Freedom

"What's the purported justification for these exceptions, and is it reasonable?"

Virtually every transaction that is made involves people doing things that at least some people do not want. So when things happen which people do not want, it is the norm, not the exception!

What is the ethical justification for

1. ruining the subjective quality of a socialist's property easement, though his wealth increases when an entrepreneur buys and repairs a dangerous road.
2. allowing people to smoke cigarettes in their own homes, though others would prefer they did not,
3. repainting one's house to a color that helps property values but annoys one neighbor,
4. having a dam that increases everyone's property values and wealth by preventing flooding, though one libertarian objects...

What is the justification for not demanding unanimous rule about every decision? People understand that demanding unanimous rule takes so much property from everyone (to discover what everyone actually wants), that everyone's choices become impoverished because of the cost of this process. People understand that the ability to choose is valuable and that money can sometimes provide people with choices. People therefore reject socialism and libertarianism because of the ethical principle that it is important to value freedom.

So why do we allow the government to build dams to prevent flooding? Why do we allow a private entrepreneur to own a road to make it safer, citizens to smoke cigarettes in their own homes, and neighbors to paint their houses utilizing their own imagination?

Because these decisions increase our freedom. And freedom is an important ethical value.

It is only an immature person who demands everything that he wants and expects everyone else to accommodate. Adults understand that one can't have everything that one wants. But if we are willing to compromise with each other, often we all can have much more than what any one of us can create alone. And that's an important ethical value, as well.

by a reader on Thu, 02/08/2007 - 20:48 | reply

Adults

It is only an immature person who demands everything that he wants and expects everyone else to accommodate. Adults understand that one can't have everything that one wants.

Where do adults (presumably as contrasted with children (non-adults)) come into it?

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Fri, 02/09/2007 - 22:36 | reply

Enforcement of Rules is Sometimes Good

"The government is a special case: it is thought right to use force "for our own good", (as are parents with their children), but private citizens aren't."

When a private entrepreneur buys a cul-de-sac, according to a socialist, force was utilized.

Indeed, when virtually any trade is made, someone's behavior is involuntarily altered. It is not a sign of immaturity to desire government intervention in certain circumstances.

Rather, immature political philosophies do not recognize the freedom-promoting potential of enforceable rules.

by a reader on Mon, 02/12/2007 - 15:30 | reply

Re: Enforcement of Rules is Sometimes Good

Freedom is Slavery

Voluntary Trade is Coercion

War is Peace

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 02/12/2007 - 23:01 | reply

Contradictory Claims

Being unable to defend a position is not the same as being able to defend it.

by a reader on Fri, 02/16/2007 - 22:33 | reply

Huh?

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Sat, 02/17/2007 - 02:24 | reply

Shoot the Junk Down

The most pointless engineering project in history has just been approved by – guess whom?

European governments have given the final go-ahead for the launch of the Galileo satellite navigation network, Europe's answer to the U.S.-controlled Global Positioning System.

Europe's answer? What was the question?

The long-delayed $3.6 billion (3.2 billion euro) system, Europe's biggest ever infrastructure project, will be based on 30 satellites and should be operational by 2008.

Yes, but what is it for?

“Only the realisation of this civil system will allow the beginning of the development of the use of satellite navigation in conditions which are suitable for Europeans,” French Transport Minister Jean-Claude Gayssot said in a statement.

“Conditions which are suitable for Europeans”? What is that supposed to mean? Does this man compose his speeches using a Eurospeak random-platitude generator or is he criminally insane?

“It will allow the European Union to liberate itself from dependence on the American GPS system,” he added.

Ah, the one kind of “liberation” that the Euro-folk understand. Now we're getting to the point of all this:

Galileo will lead Europe into conflict with the US, which has security concerns about the building of a navigational network to rival its own system.

GPS, like the Russian Glonass system, is a military-run network and can be downgraded or taken offline if an enemy attempts to use the data to launch guided missiles, for example.

By contrast, Galileo will be a civilian-run operation that will be guaranteed in all but the direst circumstances so services that are safety-critical – landing planes, for example – can rely on the data.

So – just to be clear about this: the entire purpose of this multi-billion-Euro technological miracle is that one day it will be left switched on at a time when the US has switched off the GPS. Which the US will only ever do when it believes an enemy is “using the data to launch guided missiles, for example”.

The US has absolutely no choice but to announce that if the European system is ever left switched on at a time when the GPS has been switched off for security reasons, the Galileo satellites will be shot down.

Mr Bush, Mr Rumsfeld, members of the United States Congress, please make that announcement now. Some of us here in Europe find it galling enough to be forced to pay for this monstrous monument to anti-Americanism, but we do not want blood on our hands as well. Please promise us that if it ever comes to it, you will not hesitate: shoot the junk down.

Wed, 05/28/2003 - 14:02 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Not on topic but...

What is going to happen about the United States of Europe superstate? Is it going to happen? Will the British people accept it?

by Sylvia Crombie on Wed, 05/28/2003 - 15:20 | reply

What will happen?

I was wondering that myself. These are the ideas I've come across:

1. It's already too late, the UK is now a fully paid-up member of the evil Communist superstate,
2. It hardly matters, the UK is already on a decline so dire that nothing can save it,
3. We join Europe, change our minds, announce unilateral departure, and Europe starts bombing us.

Some more ideas of my own are:

4. Europe (at any stage of the proceedings) tries to impose some ruling on us that we really really don't want, whereupon we get out, war or no war (what's a war these days? A couple of threats from America? Bear in mind Europe would actually have to try to invade the UK. Not many people have ever successfully managed that before. And the US would be on our side.)
5. Europe (ditto), whereupon we manage to change that law to suit us, and this keeps happening until such time as we get out, or getting out becomes insignificant because they don't control us anyway.

As far as I can see, our freedoms have not so far been horribly attacked by Europe. Either they tried to attack and failed, or we basically didn't get up enough energy to care about what measures we buy our food in. Dictating the shape of bananas is as trivial as it is absurd.

"Ah, but surrendering small freedoms is the slippery slope to surrendering big freedoms!" Not necessarily: it depends at what point you decide to tell the people pissing you off to get lost.

"Ah, but surrendering small freedoms anaesthetises us against surrendering big freedoms!" Gosh, people, aren't they dumb? Except for we who are clever, of course, and immune to anaesthetics!

My suggestion: instead of just arguing against Europeanness per se, we need to start arguing against the ideas which we fear being imposed on us. What laws are actually going to get passed, which will compromise our identity?

My suspicion is that the British government is only handing such power as it doesn't care about handing over anyway. Being left-wing, they happen to enjoy stupid banana-regulations. Countries join Europe because they think it will further their own aims. But nobody can make you stay in a gang you don't want to be in anyway, except by threats and force. What we need to know is: what will happen to countries who try to leave, and how will it be enforced?

by Alice on Fri, 05/30/2003 - 12:42 | reply

Diversify power!

While I agree that the EU should not be spending this money, in one sense I think it is a good thing. We need to DIVERSIFY power, and the worst thing is for the US State to have all the power. This system should not be in the hands of one tyrannical State (the US) it should be in many hands.

If you are serious about shooting it down, that brings us to something like a 1984 state of affairs.

by a reader on Wed, 06/04/2003 - 12:14 | reply

Non-Libertarian Argument

Are you saying that it would be wrong for private companies to have a GPS system, or merely that if they did, and the US State perceived a threat, the US State should shoot down their GPS system? It is not clear to me that this would be a good thing. You are naive in trusting the US State this much if you ask me.

by a reader on Wed, 06/04/2003 - 12:20 | reply

This is totally true! I cannot...

This is totally true! I cannot convey how strongly I agree.

After 8,000 years of human history, we have finally found the magic formula that transforms the lead of violence into the gold of happiness: a state which is all powerful, all legitimate, all glorified, but inoffensive as it consolidates ALL INDIVIDUALS' DEMANDS AND ACTS ON THEM. After all, isn't it the essence of the Anglo-American political tradition to have a state that puts into effect the conclusions of the "social conversation" (if you will allow me for a moment to use French intellectual Newspeak to express a truth)? This sort of state is, to use a Hegelian formula, the incarnation of Right.

Long live the (especially American, Israeli, and Labour-English) state! Be seeing you.

Pierre Lemieux
<http://www.pierrelemieux.org>

by Pierre Lemieux on Wed, 06/04/2003 - 14:58 | reply

How do you shoot down a satellite?

Anyone know if this is even feasible?

by a reader on Fri, 06/06/2003 - 05:42 | reply

The capability to destroy sat...

The capability to destroy satellites (in low Earth orbit at least) has existed since the 80's. The U.S. has a missile launched from an F15 at high altitude that can destroy a satellite.

The problem of shooting down a satellite is simpler than getting a satellite into orbit. A warhead need only be lofted to the same altitude as satellite to destroy it. The warhead doesn't need to go into orbit. Much less energy is required.

by a reader on Sun, 06/15/2003 - 19:28 | reply

How to defeat Galileo

No one has yet (publically) fielded an antisatellite weapon capable of shooting down a GPS or Galileo satellite.

Low Earth Orbit (LEO) satellites, those in orbits of about 1000km altitude or less, are relatively easy to shoot down. There was an F-15 anti-satellite missile, I believe successfully tested several times. The Soviets had a system where they used a guided bomb placed in the same orbit as the target satellite. They could tail any LEO satellite they wanted and destroy it at their leisure. This was also tested several times.

LEO satellites are important targets because almost all the surveillance satellites, both imaging and radar, are kept as close to the ground as they can, to maximize resolution.

Navigation satellites, on the other hand, are a much different problem. Both GPS and Galileo are in (will be in) Medium Earth Orbit (MEO) at about 20000km altitude. It would require a launch vehicle of almost identical capability to the one which originally launched the target to intercept it. This would mean that shooting down a satellite that high is almost as expensive as launching it in the first place.

Probably if we wanted to shut down Galileo, the best way to do it is by spoofing. Spoofing is a process by which an adversary is able to mimic the signal from a real satellite, but with incorrect information, so that receivers on the ground either cannot compute a position at all, which is bad, or compute a wrong position, which is worse.

The whole point of the encoding on the present military system is to prevent spoofing. The GPS transmits two signals simultaneously, one unencrypted and one encrypted, for military use only. The military code is secret. Any satellite broadcasting a military signal without that military code will be completely ignored by the receiver. In fact, the receiver will not even detect that it is there. Since the code is secret, only the military can create that signal, so if your receiver is able to detect it, it must be authentic. The civilian signal on the other hand, since it is published, can be replicated by anybody and therefore easily spoofed.

The Galileo system has a civilian unencrypted signal, a commercial encrypted signal you can buy access to, and a government encrypted signal you cannot. The civilian signal can be easily spoofed, and the commercial signal also if our military buys the keys.

The american GPS satellites are perfectly placed to act as spoofers, and have all the necessary hardware already onboard, to do their main jobs. It would surprise me a great deal if they could not be programmed to spoof either the russian or the new Galileo system, but of course that capability would properly be kept secret

So if the bad guys equip their weapons with civilian or commercial Galileo receivers, those are pretty easy to jam. If they use government receivers, then one of the governments involved is a conspirator and is committing an act of war against whomever the bad guys are targeting. Galileo does not represent a real threat.

On the other hand, a little competition is a good thing. It may be that the american military will be forced to compete against Galileo by providing a better civilian service, thereby causing everyone to buy american GPS receivers which can be disabled in an emergency. This has already begun by the removal of selective availability, an intentional degradation of the civilian signals, and is continuing in the form of new more accurate civilian signals on the next generation american GPS.

As a patriot, I want my military to have as much control over navigation capability as they think they need. As a civilian GPS user, I want as much accuracy as possible. By providing competition, Galileo forces the american military to improve the second to maintain the first.

LETS SHOOT DOWN THE GPS SATELITES!

this is a great idea

Europe just needs to be able to shoot the U.S. satellites down in order to ensure they never shoot the Galileo satellites down

Balance needs to be struck somewhere - WHY SHOULD THE US HAVE CONTROL OF EVERYTHING?

In answer to the British question (whose side are we on?) i say the British need to cast aside both these powers and become as independant and selfsufficient as possible. Even if the cost is high (to the economy) We could rest assured neither powers would invade because this would put them at odds with one-another.

by a reader on Tue, 10/26/2004 - 16:54 | reply

Balance needs to be struck somewhere...

No, it doesn't. The opposite is the case. Because if even one system capable of being used to destroy the United States is left under the inalienable control of the criminally insane, it is just as much of a disaster for the world as if they all were.

by Editor on Tue, 10/26/2004 - 17:19 | reply

Do We Have a Winner?

Now that it has been confirmed that the mobile labs discovered in Iraq were built for the purpose of manufacturing biological weapons – and for evading inspections at that – are we going to declare WMD the winner of our What Will Be Found First? poll?

No, because our criterion was that:

Nuclear, biological or chemical weapons, or incontrovertible evidence that they were recently destroyed or smuggled out should be found. The mobile bio-weapons labs are merely evidence that Saddam had a WMD program which (in case anyone has forgotten) we already had quite sufficient evidence of before the war began.

Likewise we are not going to accept news of Baghdad Bob's failed attempt to surrender as a substitute for his being “captured alive, found dead, or appearing in public in a new job”. Again, it's not the same. We already knew he existed.

So, no winner yet.

Thu, 05/29/2003 - 12:26 | permalink

Is The World alone in its opt...

Is The World alone in its optimism that WMD will be found?

by a reader on Mon, 06/16/2003 - 09:13 | reply

The World Not Alone

No.

Look at this.

And this.

This too.

And here.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://curi.blogspot.com/>

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 06/16/2003 - 10:00 | reply

Copyright © 2005 Setting The World To Rights

Ignorance is a Battlefield

In a comment on an op-ed on the Command Post, Simon Barnett writes:

Mohammed Al Faisal, recently convicted in the UK for preaching the use of chemical weapons against... well everyone that didn't agree with him in fact – in his poisonous sermons. He gave a brief interview on the BBC during his trial in which he explained how he had gone to university, was an educated man, (the establishment in question was in fact the University of Riddayh) and how he KNEW from his studies there that the Jewish Holocaust was a fabrication used to bring about a state of Israel.

I was eating whilst I was watching the interview and nearly choked to death. At the end of the interview I waited patiently for either the reporter or anchor to point out that the Jewish homeland was created after the fall of the Ottoman empire in WWI and the Holocaust was in WWII. It never came. Either they didn't know or didn't care. I stopped watching the BBC and switched to CNN – permanently.

Ignorance, even in the 'educated', is as much a battlefield in the [War on Terrorism] as Afghanistan or Iraq.

Quite right. Everyone should read our series, A Short History of Israel and, as our readers would say, tell everyone they know to read it too.

Fri, 05/30/2003 - 14:45 | permalink

Actually, he was correct, tec...

Actually, he was correct, technically speaking. European Jews began settling in Palestine even before WWI, as a matter of fact still in the 19th century. The Zionist movement did pick up steam following the defeat of the Ottoman empire, and the take over of the ME by the Eropean, especially GB. The Balfur declaration came about in 1917, and it was the basis for the future Jewish state. But the official and formal recognition of the state of Israel came only in 1948, and the Holocaust played a huge role in making it happen.

Alisa.

by Alisa on Thu, 06/05/2003 - 03:17 | reply

What his position is

His position is:

he KNEW from his studies there that the Jewish Holocaust was a fabrication used to bring about a state of Israel.

Which is, of course, not correct, technically or otherwise.

~Woty

<http://woty.blogspot.com>

by Woty on Thu, 06/05/2003 - 13:44 | reply

Neither Death Nor Taxes

'Nothing is certain but death and taxes', said Benjamin Franklin, but we think that he was too pessimistic. We deny that taxes are inevitable or desirable, and we see no reason to take a different attitude towards death. Though it is not yet known how to do away with either, doing away with them is just a matter of knowing how.

Death from old age is not a fundamental part of what makes us human any more than defecation is. They are both merely unfortunate and entirely contingent accidents of nature. What makes us human is the ability to think, to create new ideas about the world. Death gets in the way of thinking. It is alien to everything truly human and we should try to get rid of it.

The explanation for why we die is quite simple: the human body is a collection of design kludges brought about by millions of years of random trial and the elimination of error. The human body evolved, not to live for as long as possible but to pass on genes. Our lifespan is merely the accidental consequence of adaptations selected for that purpose.

But we have different, better purposes in mind. So what can we do about this? We could contemplate designing a human body Version 2.0 that would last longer, but this would be extremely difficult and is definitely not something we could even begin to embark on today. We can work on replacing organs when they fail, but that will only take us so far. A better, more general approach is that advocated by Aubrey de Grey, a geneticist at Cambridge University. The idea is to intervene using biotechnology to remove damage to our bodies as it accumulates, before it poses a serious problem. It is called Engineering Negligible Senescence (ENS). The recent discovery of the chemical that allows stem cells to divide indefinitely often is an important step towards ENS:

Scientists have identified a molecule that allows special cells from embryos, called stem cells, to multiply without limit.

The UK researchers have dubbed the molecule Nanog, after the mythological Celtic land of the ever young.

Stem cells found in embryos are special because they can turn into almost any type of cell in the body, whether it is a heart cell, skin cell or brain cell.

Research into these cells is expected to lead to revolutionary new treatments for a range of conditions from Parkinson's Disease to heart failure and diabetes...

"If Nanog has the same effect in humans as we have found in mice, this will be a key step in developing embryonic stem cells for medical treatments."

The end of death as an inevitable part of human life is now one step closer. Hurray!

Sun, 06/01/2003 - 00:05 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Death "designed in" -- by whom?

While I applaud the development you've reported on here, I must register a minor quibble. Death is not an "unfortunate accident." It's an epiphenomenon, a characteristic that arises from innumerable other, more fundamental characteristics of the design of organic life.

Evolutionists will tell you that death is integral to the mechanism by which species advance and differentiate. Creationists will tell you that death is part of the Divine plan, that this world is merely a preparatory stage for the next, far more important one. Both these views are teleological, one obviously, the other more subtly. They deflect attention from the central value of life -- itself -- to its exact opposite.

Regardless of whether the evolutionist or the creationist is more correct, Man has more control over his life in this world than any of the lesser species. That we've come so far, and appear poised to go this much farther, is a truly wondrous thing, a ringing affirmation of the glory of the mind.

Curmudgeon Emeritus, Palace Of Reason

by fporretto on Sun, 06/01/2003 - 11:50 | reply

Prolonging life is good and p...

Prolonging life is good and possible, but how can we ever know if we have combated death? It would take eternity to find out, wouldn't it?

Alice

http://libertarian_parent_in_the_countryside.blogspot.com/

by a reader on Sun, 06/01/2003 - 15:00 | reply

How Could We Know?

We could know in the same way as we know anything else: if that was an implication of our best explanatory theories in the relevant area. If, given our best understanding of physics, biology, and the relevant technology, it one day follows that it is extremely likely that no person will ever die again, then we'd know that in the same sense as we now know that with present-day technology, a typical lifespan will always be 76 years or whatever. And of course it's a testable theory.

by David Deutsch on Sun, 06/01/2003 - 15:44 | reply

There is no proof

Alice:

It's never possible to prove that death has been eliminated. Proof only works in maths, and even then it is not absolutely reliable. It is possible for the best available explanation to be that people don't have to die permanently anymore, though.

For example, if humans had multiple redundant backups of themselves in many locations throughout the universe, and it was known how to make them active again, it would be reasonable to say that people didn't have to die anymore.

~Woty
<http://woty.blogspot.com>

by Woty on Sun, 06/01/2003 - 15:46 | reply

Math

Woty wrote: "Proof only works in maths, and even then it is not absolutely reliable. "

Another way to say that is proof doesn't work in math.

-- Elliot Temple
<http://curi.blogspot.com/>

by Elliot Temple on Sun, 06/01/2003 - 20:07 | reply

Maths

There is a form of argument called proof, that is an effective way of demonstrating things in maths, and that there is no equivalent in other fields.

~Woty
<http://woty.blogspot.com>

by Woty on Sun, 06/01/2003 - 23:17 | reply

Math

Syllogisms are effective and seem equivalent to me.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://curi.blogspot.com/>

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 06/02/2003 - 01:33 | reply

Proofs

Predicate logic is even better than Aristotalian syllogisms, but both rely on the creation of tautological axioms, which I doubt many people can agree on outside of pure mathematics.

Anyway, I expect that degenerative diseases will be eliminated before radical life extension becomes a reality. People will always die, even if by accident.

Master of None

by Michael Williams on Mon, 06/02/2003 - 23:13 | reply

Error correction

Michael:

What if there was a way to make accidental death non-permanent?

~Woty

<http://woty.blogspot.com>

by Woty on Tue, 06/03/2003 - 01:37 | reply

Backups

"For example, if humans had multiple redundant backups of themselves in many locations throughout the universe, and it was known how to make them active again, it would be reasonable to say that people didn't have to die anymore."

Yes they would.

Having one or more "backups" of yourself doesn't do you any more good than having a twin sibling does.

by a reader on Tue, 06/03/2003 - 12:58 | reply

Backups

I meant backups of the content of your mind, not genetic backups.

~Woty

<http://woty.blogspot.com>

by Woty on Tue, 06/03/2003 - 13:24 | reply

Still doesn't help. A backup...

Still doesn't help. A backup of the content of your mind simply produces other people who think they're you.

by a reader on Wed, 06/04/2003 - 00:00 | reply

Are Human Copies Fungible?

Short Answer: Yes.

Slightly Longer Answer (for people who have read The Fabric of Reality):

Imagine a bunch of universes, which are all different times in the last year, and are all in the history of this present. In each you will find a brain state, that is different than my present one, and is in a different time and a different place than my present one. But you won't balk at saying it's me.

Slightly Longer Answer (for people who have not read The Fabric of Reality):

The idea that the particular matter that makes up my brain, is privileged, is mysticism.

Another Answer:

If we make a double of someone, and it acts as if it is that person, what sort of explanation will say it is not that person (besides a bad one)?

(Click link on sidebar to purchase The Fabric of Reality, the best book ever)

-- Elliot Temple
<http://curi.blogspot.com/>

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 06/04/2003 - 05:19 | reply

We should be satisfied with t...

We should be satisfied with the good long lives modern medicine allow and then die with dignity.

by a reader on Wed, 06/04/2003 - 10:21 | reply

New Scientist article

See also this article.

by a reader on Wed, 06/04/2003 - 15:03 | reply

Copies

Creating copies or backups of oneself clearly would not obviate death. As the previous poster pointed out, they would not be you, even though they would be just like you.

Even if the copies are fungible to other people, you yourself would still be dead. Same goes for transporters in Star Trek :)

Aside from my expectation that we will never be able to back-up a human.

Master of None

by Michael Williams on Wed, 06/04/2003 - 16:11 | reply

Re: Copies

Brains are complicated, and I expect it will be a very long time before their emergent properties are fully understood.

However, the local structure of brains is relatively simple. Suppose artificial neurons are developed, that act just like the meaty ones, but can use a backup power source other than sugary oxygenated blood, and/or fully preserve their state when shut down. Nanoscale installers operate on your brain over the course of months or years, replacing individual original neurons one by one with copies of the improved model.

For the sake of argument, the installers only operate while you are conscious. Individual neurons die continually, with no detectable effect to us, so presumably the temporary loss of neuron while its state is copied would likewise have no detectable effect.

At the end of the replacement process, are "you" dead?

by Kevin on Wed, 06/04/2003 - 17:12 | reply

Copies

And the same goes for changing from one time to another, right?

How can that be the same person, if he's in a whole different universe? (To quote Fabric, "Other times are just special cases of other universes.")

-- Elliot Temple
<http://curi.blogspot.com/>

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 06/04/2003 - 17:16 | reply

"Imagine a bunch of universes..."

"Imagine a bunch of universes, which are all different times in the last year, and are all in the history of this present. In each you will find a brain state, that is different than my present one, and is in a different time and a different place than my present one. But you won't balk at saying it's me."

No, but you would. And if you gathered them all together, and then I shot you (but not them), their presence would not be much consolation.

by Ken on Thu, 06/05/2003 - 00:38 | reply

sigh

Look, I understand your thesis: fungibility does not exist, all matter is special, blah blah blah, (or maybe only when consciousness is involved) but do you have an argument for this?

-- Elliot Temple
<http://curi.blogspot.com/>

by Elliot Temple on Thu, 06/05/2003 - 04:07 | reply

Copies

Our arguments are at least as weighty as your appeals to authority. Frankly, the question hinges on axiomatic beliefs, and I doubt that we'll agree on them.

If dying neurons were progressively replaced with artificial neurons, my intuition tells me that yes, it would still be "you". Additionally, I completely agree with Ken: the existence of other-universe-"yous" may be fine for the rest of us, but for you yourself it's meaningless.

I'm not sure what arguments you're putting in my mouth by saying "fungibility does not exist, all matter is special, blah blah blah". Special how? Fungibility is relative. What could possibly serve as proof?

Master of None

by Michael Williams on Thu, 06/05/2003 - 05:03 | reply

Epistemolgy Again

Our arguments are at least as weighty as your appeals to authority.

Erm, which appeal?

Frankly, the question hinges on axiomatic beliefs, and I doubt that we'll agree on them.

I have no such beliefs. The correct approach to knowledge, is to acknowledge that we cannot know anything with certainty, but still to hold our best explanations to be tentatively true.

(out of order) What could possibly serve as proof?

Of course, nothing, ala fallibility. That's not the point, we need good explanations. As a general rule, if reality behaves as if something is true, it's a good explanation that it's true.

the existence of other-universe-"yous" may be fine for the rest of us, but for you yourself it's meaningless.

The notion that the copy would act as if it was me, and be the same for other people, but would not be "me", is the notion that the specific matter making me up is privileged (but can, apparently, gradually bestow this privilege on other bits of matter a little at a time ala artificial neuron replacement). In the absence of an explanation for this privilege, I have no choice but to consider it mysticism.

I'm not sure what arguments you're putting in my mouth

That was to Ken, who claims I will balk at considering me-2-seconds-ago me. I know many adults disassociate from their former selves WRT things like hating highschool, but this is really pushing it.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://curi.blogspot.com/>

by Elliot Temple on Thu, 06/05/2003 - 06:21 | reply

Copies

And what if the replaced natural neurons, rather than being discarded, were being assembled into a functioning recreation of your brain in exactly the state it was in at some point in time?

Which would be you?

The artificial, but continuous you?

Or the natural, discontinuous you in a state identical to a previous natural state?

I think, for most of us, the continuity seems more important than the material or the precision of the state-match. I think our sense of identity is tied to the idea of a single mind evolving rather than a sequence of brain states; so even perfect copies would still be "other people".

This might be an illusion, but it's a difficult one to shake off, because it's central to how we think of our existence.

by Gil on Thu, 06/05/2003 - 07:34 | reply

I can't believe no one mentioned this

Think about what happens if we eliminate death.

If it is universal, the population increases by over 328,000 people literally overnight (well, ok not literally, it would take 25hours). The population growth rate not quite doubles.

If it is not universal it means the average age among wealthy populations gets higher and higher relative to everyone else, until they are prime for non-natural death at the hands of the younger, stronger, mortals.

It would mean birth control would have to become universal, and not optional. It would mean forced abortions. It would mean food shortages.

It is unpleasant that, as individuals, we have to die, but that's just the way reality goes.

by Jay Aziza on Wed, 12/20/2006 - 19:34 | reply

Unless We Move to Another Planet

by a reader on Wed, 12/20/2006 - 23:17 | reply

Copyright © 2008 Setting The World To Rights

Weapons of Mass Distortion

The Wall Street Journal has something to say about the current rash of complaints about the lack of WMDs so far found in Iraq:

For ... opponents of [the] war, it isn't enough that a tyrant and his psychopath sons have been deposed. It doesn't count that mass graves have been uncovered, that torture chambers have been exposed, or that Saddam's victims can speak freely for the first time in 30 years. The critics are now claiming the war was illegitimate because no one has yet found a pile of anthrax in downtown Baghdad.

[...] That Saddam had biological or chemical weapons was a probability that everyone assumed to be true, even those who were against the war. U.N. inspections in the 1990s had proved that Iraq had such weapons, including 30,000 liters of anthrax, and Saddam had used chemical weapons against Iran and Iraq's own Kurds. The French themselves insisted that disarming Saddam of WMD, as opposed to deposing him, had to be the core of U.N. Resolution 1441.

[...] What seems to be going on here is an attempt to damage the credibility of Mr. Blair, President Bush and other war supporters. If their backing for the war is morally vindicated, they will emerge as even larger forces on the world stage, and so they must be tarnished after the fact as dissemblers.

So where are the WMD? We don't know. Check out Andrew Sullivan's take on it though. Also L.T. Smash asks:

Saddam was an evil and ambitious man, who cast a shadow of darkness over the lives of millions. He had to go. As we uncover scores of mass graves and further evidence of his atrocities every day, only one burning question remains: How could anyone in good conscience have opposed the liberation of Iraq?

We don't know the answer to that one either.

Nobody's found Saddam either, but that doesn't mean he didn't exist and wasn't a threat.

After 9/11, the US has a right, nay a responsibility to take out terrorism-sponsoring regimes. Arresting individual criminals after the event/s isn't good enough. Even if the WMDs didn't exist at all (which I don't believe for a minute), it was still better to take out the Ba'athists than leave them in place murdering their own people and helping out terrorists who threatened freedom.

Alice

http://libertarian_parent_in_the_countryside.blogspot.com/

by a reader on Tue, 06/03/2003 - 17:43 | reply

If WMDs were not the point of...

If WMDs were not the point of the invasion, why did Blair say they were?

by a reader on Wed, 06/04/2003 - 10:19 | reply

Rationalization

Isn't this all one big rationalization for war?

by a reader on Wed, 06/04/2003 - 12:32 | reply

Although I was and am for the...

Although I was and am for the war, I think it is simply inadequate to argue that for each new grave we find "how could you not support the liberation of Iraq?" Because there are plenty of potentially reasonable ways. Suppose you are under the impression that using the same amount of money, ten times more lives could have been saved if it were used in other ways. Or suppose you believe that a few thousand American deaths in the war and the long presence afterward are simply not a fair price to pay for the liberation of a foreign people in a foreign land, alien to American culture and values. These theories are wrong, but pointing in shock at them and crying about the morality of saving Iraqi children doesn't refute them.

I think that at this point, there is a real issue of credibility. Leaders united on apparently incontrovertible intelligence that Saddam had these weapons. Its worth finding out why things didn't go as planned. But this is a political issue, not a moral one.

by Daniel Strimpel on Wed, 06/04/2003 - 15:06 | reply

Well said. Alisa....

Well said.

Alisa.

by Alisa on Thu, 06/05/2003 - 03:00 | reply

About WMDs

Can I point out that the reason that people fear WMDs is that some of them are small and easily hidden. 30,000 liters is less than 150 55-gallon drums, and Iraq is 171,599 square miles in area.

Three questions:

What are the odds of finding this stuff in a couple of months?
What are the odds that some of will never be found because the people that hid it are dead/disappeared?
What is the likelihood that anything would be found if Saddam were still in power?

by a reader on Thu, 06/05/2003 - 06:01 | reply

My Answer

My answer is that you could save 10 times as many people today, but you could lose many thousands or even millions tomorrow. That is what WMDs are designed to do.

Everyone of these dictators who kills his own people or his neighbors is a weapon of mass destruction.

by a reader on Thu, 06/05/2003 - 06:09 | reply

Oiiiiiiiiii

Everyone of these dictators who kills his own people or his neighbors is a weapon of mass destruction.

And the ones who have oil and therefore lots of money can get much more effective weapons than their poorer counterparts. So oil actually matters in legitimate ways.

~Woty
<http://woty.blogspot.com>

by Woty on Thu, 06/05/2003 - 13:42 | reply

Re: Oil

Sure oil matters, having Iraq sell oil on the open market means Saudi Arabia has less leverage. Having a free and prosperous Iraq in the middle of a bunch of medieval theocracies/kleptocratic dictatorships is going to be worth a lot strategically.

by a reader on Thu, 06/05/2003 - 16:29 | reply

Check out the dissident frog...

Check out the dissident frogman's comment here:
<http://www.thedissidentfrogman.com/dacha/000168.html>

by Chris on Tue, 06/10/2003 - 16:44 | reply

Weapons of Mass destruction

Oh my God - People people people...are you all for real? You don't find Bush evil? Who are the terrorist? is it bin Laden? or al Qaeda? maybe the Taliban? And where are these mass graves your talking about? I have heard and why are we worried about them when we're busy making more. And speaking of Iraqi oil we won't see a drop of it for a long time, if ever, because Iraqi's have plenty of old explosives to keep them shut down for a long, long time.

Weapons of Mass destruction was all they could talk about. Don't you find placing the blame squarely were if belongs a good thing? And if you're willing to write that off then shame on you. You should never have children or raise them because you wouldn't know the difference between the truth and a lie.

by Burnie123 on Sun, 01/16/2005 - 00:47 | reply

Re: Weapons of Mass destruction

Burnie123 wrote:

Oh my God - People people people...are you all for real?

No, we're just playing a really, really elaborate joke on you.

You don't find Bush evil?

He's not evil. He's wrong about some things, but not evil.

Who are the terrorist? is it bin Laden? or al Qaeda?
maybe the Taliban?

Those are examples of evil terrorist organisations, but not the only ones.

And where are these mass graves your talking about?

Iraq, I done saw it the news.

I have heard and why are we worried about them when we're busy making more.

Um, no we're not. Even the terrorists who the Coalition sends to the big Virginarium in the sky will get buried in a nice little plot. It'll have flowers on it and everything, honest.

And speaking of Iraqi oil we won't see a drop of it for a long time, if ever, because Iraqi's have plenty of old explosives to keep them shut down for a long, long time.

I see. And they're keeping the oil wells shut down for what reason?

Oh, I see, so the US doesn't steal the oil despite the fact that they could easily have bought it. Okay they would have had to pay ~~Saddam Hussein's pimp~~ Kofi Annan a cut but it's still a lot less expensive than a war.

Weapons of Mass destruction was all they could talk about.

Apart from Saddam Hussein being a tyrant and a terror sponsor and their desire to spread democracy in the Middle East...

Don't you find placing the blame squarely where it belongs a good thing?

Yes. We blame Saddam Hussein and his fellow tyrants and terrorists for their evil crimes and we blame the UN for being stuffed to the gills with apologists for these terrible people.

And if you're willing to write that off then shame on you. You should never have children or raise them because you wouldn't know the difference between the truth and a lie.

A statement is true if and only if it corresponds to the fact it purports to describe. The truth is the set of statements that is true. A lie would be where a person intentionally makes an untrue statement. A mistake would be where a person unintentionally makes an untrue statement. A mistake and a lie are not equivalent. I hope this helps.

by Alan Forrester on Mon, 01/17/2005 - 02:48 | reply

Is Selling Land a Crime?

The other day, we asked whether it is a crime to buy land. The question was rhetorical, but we were remiss in not mentioning that in Palestinian Authority territory, it is not merely a crime, but a capital offence, to sell land to Jews.

As Le Monde Diplomatique explains:

Since Jordan had made land sales to Israelis a crime punishable by death (from 1973-87 about 100 people were sentenced by Jordanian courts to death in absentia), the PA has imposed its own death penalty for such sales, including land in Jerusalem. This was announced by Freh Abu Meidan, the justice minister, on 6 May 1997. Twenty-two Palestinians have been since arrested and the Palestinian legislative council has begun debating a law to restrict sales.

Le Monde Diplomatique goes on to point out that individual Jews and Jewish charities have sometimes stooped to such shocking tactics as paying "astronomical prices" or finding new homes for the vendors, out of reach of the ~~terrorist overlords~~ Palestinian Authority.

Even Amnesty International has found something to complain about, namely that the Palestinian ~~in~~security forces often don't even bother with trials for these offences:

Unlawful killings, including possible extrajudicial executions, continued to occur. Three land-dealers were found dead during May after the Minister of Justice, Freih Abu Middein, announced that the Palestinian Authority would begin applying a Jordanian law which provided for the death penalty for those convicted of selling land to Jews. There were fears that statements by the Minister of Justice and the failure to condemn the killings appeared to constitute permission to security services to carry out extrajudicial executions with impunity. In June the Palestinian Authority made a public statement supporting the death sentence for land-dealers but rejecting any killing without trial and conviction.

israelis/palestinians

An NGO-type friend recently said that 3 times as many Palestinians as Israelis die through Israeli/Palestinian violence each year, and that Israeli soldiers kill many many innocent civilians (women and children was the phrase) in cross fire, through bulldozing houses etc.

Do you have any advice about where I might be able to verify the non-veracity of these claims?

by emma on Tue, 06/03/2003 - 21:33 | reply

Re: israelis/palestinians

A quick Google search turns up "The War on Non-Combatants" at The Village Voice, & "Has Israel Used Indiscriminate Force?" at The Middle East Forum.

by Kevin on Tue, 06/03/2003 - 22:48 | reply

You imply that the settlement...

You imply that the settlements are just a bunch of dwellings bought by Jews for the purpose of living peaceful lives but in fact the settlements are funded by the Israeli government and their purpose is to grab more territory for the Israeli State. Notice that in the Road Map, Israel is required to stop its settlement activity. If the Israeli State is not engaging in any such activity, why that stipulation? The truth is, the settlements are part of the occupation, and again, Israel needs to end the illegal occupation of Palestinian territory if it wants peace.

by a reader on Wed, 06/04/2003 - 10:17 | reply

Still true?

Is this still true? The links appear to be from 1997, not 2003. Could it be that things have changed since then? What evidence do you have that it is still the case?

by a reader on Wed, 06/04/2003 - 10:29 | reply

If both sides continue saying...

If both sides continue saying that they will not stop until the other side stops, where will peace come from? Isn't it the case that for peace to break out, one side or the other has to say enough is enough and that they will stop aggressing against the other?

by a reader on Wed, 06/04/2003 - 12:17 | reply

Both sides

See, the problem is that not all violence is aggression. Some of it is self defense. Some examples of self defense are killing terrorist leaders, destroying hostile bomb factories, and destroying the buildings terrorists operate from. On the other hand, not all violence is self defense. Some is aggression. A good example of aggression is going into a public place and blowing yourself up in order to kill as many Jews as possible. Another good example of aggression is building bombs for others to use for this purpose. Another is providing the funds for this activity.

The two sides are not equal, and the Israelis ceasing to defend themselves will not end this conflict.

~Woty

<http://woty.blogspot.com>

"Violence?" is not the question.

by Woty on Wed, 06/04/2003 - 13:48 | reply

AI Criticisms

Interestingly critical article about Amnesty International here.

by a reader on Wed, 06/04/2003 - 15:09 | reply

'Innocent' civilians?

In a survey released yesterday, 80% of people in the P.A. territories supported the statement: "The rights and needs of the Palestinian people cannot be taken care of as long as the state of Israel exists."

Here's one for American readers: "Now I'm going to read a list of political leaders. For each one, tell me how much confidence you have in each leader to do the right thing regarding world affairs". In the P.A., 71% had "a lot of confidence" or "some confidence" in Osama bin Laden - the highest figure of any place surveyed. They want you dead, too.

by a reader on Wed, 06/04/2003 - 16:14 | reply

Re: You imply that the settlement...

There are predominantly Arab towns in Israel; what's the problem with having predominantly Jewish towns in a prospective Palestine?

A couple of questions for you: How many Jewish refugees were expelled from Muslim countries? How many fled Europe in/around WWII? Why aren't those Jewish refugees all now in UN-sponsored towns on the fringes of those various Muslim and European countries, blowing up their innocent civilians?

by a reader on Wed, 06/04/2003 - 16:29 | reply

"A [different] reader" wrote:...

"A [different] reader" wrote: "Israel needs to end the illegal occupation of Palestinian territory if it wants peace."

You think?

Sharon: "Israel is a society governed by the rule of law, thus we will immediately begin to remove unauthorized outposts".

Hamas: "We will never be ready to lay down arms until the liberation of the last centimeter of the land of Palestine" - i.e. Israel.

Please tell me who wants peace, and who doesn't.

by a reader on Wed, 06/04/2003 - 16:48 | reply

Homesteading or Buying?

Is your argument that the land was purchased on the free market from whoever owned it? Or is your argument that Jews have gone to remote locations and homesteaded land without permission from anyone (except the Israeli government)? If the former, you have a good case, if the latter, no State would allow such illegal immigrants.

by a reader on Thu, 06/05/2003 - 14:40 | reply

Intifada stats

Regarding the first post on this thread, I have exactly what you are looking for.

<http://www.ict.org.il/articles/articledet.cfm?articleid=440>

A complete statistical breakdown of casualties in the intifada. I think you may be shocked at what hasn't been told to you by the media.

by Daniel Strimpel on Thu, 06/05/2003 - 17:36 | reply

Settlements again

Does this (WSJ/AP) support your case? :

Palestinians consider the outposts on West Bank hilltops efforts to further expand Jewish settlement in the West Bank and Gaza Strip and create new obstacles to a Palestinian state. They say all Israeli settlements are illegal encroachment on their land.

In what was perhaps an effort to strike a balance between the two sides, Mr. Sharon announced at the summit that an undisclosed number of outposts would be dismantled. Signaling that it may avoid full compliance, Israel has said some of the outposts serve a security function -- overlooking roads, for example -- and should stay. However, an adviser to Mr. Sharon, said if the Palestinians rein in militant groups that have attacked Israelis, then the security outposts could become unnecessary and would be removed down the line.

Palestinian leaders said that was not good enough. "When the time for implementation of the road map comes, we expect that they will take down all the outposts ," Palestinian Culture Minister Ziad Abu Amr said. Information Minister Nabil Amr said that even if Mr. Sharon were to dismantle all outposts , it still would leave a more significant requirement of the road map unfulfilled: Israel's obligation in the plan's first phase to freeze all Jewish settlement construction.

The Peace Now group, which opposes settlement in the West Bank, says 117 unauthorized outposts have been created since 1998. Some are uninhabited while others consist of a few trailers with less than a dozen inhabitants.

by a reader on Fri, 06/06/2003 - 09:30 | reply

An Opinion Poll in Iraq

This article in the Weekly Standard (via the ever-trenchant Emperor Misha) is worth reading. Even though the survey it reports is unscientific, our own wild guess is that it is in the right ballpark in gauging Iraqi opinion.

It found support for the war much higher now (77 percent) than before it happened (62 percent said they had been opposed). And it showed respondents supportive of coalition troops' presence--65 percent said the troops should stay

If subsequent polls confirm these Iraqi opinions, will those who so loudly urged deference to the Baghdad Street take their own advice and give the liberation of Iraq their belated support?

(No, they won't.)

Wed, 06/04/2003 - 02:48 | permalink

Firstly, it was not deference...

Firstly, it was not deference to the Baghdad Street, it was not about Iraqis, it was about our own freedom. We object to being coerced to pay for the war in Iraq, and it is completely naive to think that our "kinder, gentler" States were fighting this war to liberate the Iraqi people. The whole reason for this war was to increase the legitimacy of our own States, i.e., the States were doing this to gain power. Look at all the new tyrannical legislation there has been since 9-11. War is the excuse to grab power. Why do you think they have yet to find the WMDs?

by a reader on Wed, 06/04/2003 - 10:09 | reply

What about our own opinion? T...

What about our own opinion? The opinion of the British and American tax payers and those who support them?

by a reader on Wed, 06/04/2003 - 12:31 | reply

What about it?

Do most people in the West think we should have left Saddam in place? I don't think so. Or if they do, no doubt the antiwar US Libertarian party (and maybe the antiwar Lib Dems in the UK) will romp home in the next round of elections!!

Alice

by a reader on Wed, 06/04/2003 - 23:33 | reply

Copyright © 2005 Setting The World To Rights

There Was a Nazi Spy in Britain in WW2 After All

Until now, it has been thought that

All Nazi spies in Britain during the War were apprehended and turned, saving lives and shortening the War.

This was an astonishing tour de force, not only of counter-espionage but also of applied psychology, which is in our opinion far too little known and studied. Why is the same thing not being done to all the murderous bastards who are captured nowadays?

Anyway, now it turns out that they missed one:

Two amateur historians have uncovered the story of an audacious spy, who infiltrated the RAF in the middle of World War II and escaped back to Germany in a stolen RAF Hurricane.

Augustin Preucil came to Britain along with scores of other Czech pilots when mainland Europe fell under Nazi domination.

[...]

Preucil had taken off with another pilot, a young Pole, to practice dogfights over the sea.

The Pole returned to base reporting he had seen Preucil in a steep dive and assumed he had crashed. In fact Preucil had flown his machine across the North Sea to Belgium.

There he landed on a farm and was offered food and shelter by the farmer and his family .

But Preucil immediately betrayed them to the Gestapo and the family were imprisoned.

Preucil went on to work for the Gestapo mainly by infiltrating Czech political prisoner groups in concentration camps; it is known that some of those he betrayed were shot.

When Germany was finally defeated Preucil was captured by the Czechs and put on trial for treason.

He was executed in 1947.

We are, as a rule, opposed to the death penalty but ... hurray!

Wed, 06/04/2003 - 23:51 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

why?

We are, as a rule, opposed to the death penalty but ... hurray!

Why?

by a reader on Fri, 06/06/2003 - 09:32 | reply

Fallibility?

Fallibility?

Alice

by a reader on Fri, 06/06/2003 - 14:06 | reply

Death Penalty

The death penalty is based on punishment instead of reparations, which many libertarians seem not to like. Maybe that's why. And, as Alice suggests, in the present, our courts make quite a number of mistakes.

I want to be clear that's not my position.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://curi.blogspot.com/>

by Elliot Temple on Fri, 06/06/2003 - 19:08 | reply

Re: Death Penatly

One big problem with the death penalty is that it's based on revenge rather than self-defense. This harms good people as well as the bad people who are executed. It deprives good people of the opportunity to learn things about the bad people that can be used to prevent future crimes, for example.

~Woty

<http://woty.blogspot.com>

by Woty on Fri, 06/06/2003 - 20:03 | reply

DP

Every person's situation contains some knowledge that could be extracted about morality adn the human condition etc. etc. Ideally, society could integrate all this knowledge into its institutions.

But we don't know how to take criminals seriously yet in an organized and secure fashion. Our best theories involve imprisonment and death. I see no tangible difference between these in terms of learning from criminals. In both cases, if the criminal was right, we would not know.

An argument FOR the death penalty would be that its cheaper, and therefore easier on the taxpayers. But I don't think this is actually the case, after all is said and done.

Then there is revenge. This seems harmless, since it harms good people (in the way Woty said above) no more than life imprisonment does. And morally, my intuition says that there is no substantial differenc between executing a serial rapist/murderer and locking him/her up for life in maximum security prisons.

by Daniel Strimpel on Fri, 06/06/2003 - 21:08 | reply

Get rid of the traitor.

Get rid of the traitor

by a reader on Mon, 11/29/2004 - 21:23 | reply

Shock, Horror! Government Puts Spin on Policy!

Why have we not yet seen such a headline in the media? For although it may be ludicrous, this is now the principal argument for retrospective opposition to the liberation of Iraq.

This opposition centres on trying to uncover a high-level conspiracy to alter intelligence reports to make them seem more significant. In other words they think that somebody may have got their secretary to do a find-and-replace of "may have weapons" to "does have weapons".

Yet it is not in dispute that Saddam Hussein was/is a big fan of weapons of mass destruction: he has not only owned them in the past but has used them on his enemies both domestic and foreign. The evidence provided by the mobile bio-weapons laboratories found scrubbed clean is that he was still committed to retaining this capability until just before the end (unless you wish to believe that caustic cleaning fluid was only used to cover up the embarrassing smell of Iraqi conscripts' underwear).

These mobile laboratories were mentioned by Colin Powell in his UN Presentation. Iraq denied their existence, and at the time, we could not be sure that that was a lie. Nor could we be sure that any other weapons of mass destruction existed there either, but we had good reasons to believe that they did. And the main reason why we couldn't be sure was that Saddam insisted on obfuscating the investigation of the UN inspectors. Not the actions of an innocent government.

But why did we think it so urgent and important to invade Iraq on the basis that they probably had WMD and that they might use them to harm or threaten us? After all, North Korea had already started telling anyone who would listen about their intentions to use WMD on everybody in sight, so they definitely have them. (Or do they? Isn't it perfectly conceivable that they are lying too? Should we act on the assumption that they are?)

The fact of the matter is, the Middle East is a large and unstable area which is important to us for various reasons but keeps telling us in words and deeds that it hates us and wishes we were all dead. It would be a great thing for the world, and for the region itself, if it were to become peaceful and start putting its impressive resources into manufacturing cheap cars and electronic goods instead of various types of nasty weapon that serve no purpose other than slaughtering their civilian populations and ours. Yet history tells us that it is very rare for entrenched psychotic societies suddenly to become friendly and start manufacturing cheap and/or high quality consumer goods without the saultory intervention of us, reforming their system of government by force or the credible threat of force.

Here's where the spin part comes in. In the light of the above, our government(s) decide to liberate Iraq. And they decide that given the nature of the opposition to this proposed liberation, they will emphasise the perfectly real and imminent threat of horrific death on our part, which everyone can understand and be afraid of, and de-emphasise the closely related and equally real 'making the world a better, safer place' aspect that sadly doesn't wash with significant sections of the modern trendy-lefty isolationist cheese-eating population. It must be the greatest deception in modern history, we don't think.

What if we never prove that there were/are WMD in Iraq? Well, while we are on the subject of 'what-ifs': what if we never prove that there was a high-level conspiracy to change intelligence reports? Will people stop believing there was one?

Don't forget that today's trendy theory (that the Government over-emphasised WMD in order to enable them to make the world a better, safer place) is not what the opponents said was happening at the time. What they said was that Bush, an infamous American oil baron (and President, but that was neither here nor there) had got his buddy/lapdog Tony to help him steal Iraq's oil. Surely nobody who was even slightly informed and/or sane could have believed that, so why haven't any opponents of the war stood up and given the real reason why they thought the war was happening – until now? Maybe because the truth – that the Government was trying to make the world a better, safer place – is not a terribly compelling anti-war argument, any more than it is a compelling pro-war one. Especially now that the war has been overwhelmingly successful by any reasonable criterion. So why haven't we seen the aforementioned headline? Perhaps a better question would be: why haven't we seen the headline "Shock, Horror! Opponents Put Spin on Government Policy" instead?

Fri, 06/06/2003 - 17:41 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Weapons of Mass Distraction from the real point?

I can't understand the obsession with this issue at all. So what if we didn't find any WMDs? Were the antiwar people swayed by that argument in the first place? No. Were the pro-war people motivated by finding WMDs, as opposed to making damned sure no Iraqi WMDs were ever used on NYC? I don't think so.

We know Saddam had the capability, and, at various times, the WMDs. He used some of them.

There are a million and one reasons why no actual user-friendly nuclear missiles have been stumbled across in a Baghdad cellar.

Imagine: you're an evil dictator, threatened with being deposed by the US. Do you:

- a) hand over your WMDs like a good boy,
- b) dismantle and/or hide the fuckers, maintaining as much capability of reproducing them as you can, or
- c) dirty-bomb London as fast as you can?

I'm for b). Let's not get so distracted by "hard" evidence (ie trophies we can hold in our hands) that we forget the soft stuff... like, mass graves with thousands of bodies in them, for example.

Alice

http://libertarian_parent_in_the_countryside.blogspot.com/

by a reader on Fri, 06/06/2003 - 18:19 | reply

Lies of over-emphasis

You have said here before I think that the Iraqi invasion was a sort of projection of the real war of competing moral traditions in the West.

You have said elsewhere that it is sometimes right to lie to one's enemies, as the Allies did during WW2.

Is it acceptable for politicians in the West to tell lies of over-emphasis to other politicians and to the public for the sake of making the right things happen? Where do we draw the line?

by Tom Robinson on Fri, 06/06/2003 - 20:23 | reply

Spin is Not Good

However predictable spin is, though, that doesn't make it right. Better to sell your good ideas honestly on the open market, with free handy integrity added on.

Arguing that the war was for the finding of WMDs and then not finding any WMDs is arguably very bad for the Forces of Rightness. They could have been open about their morals instead of emphasising an excuse to "please" their enemies. Seems they may have shot themselves in the foot with that one.

Alice

by a reader on Sat, 06/07/2003 - 11:54 | reply

Spin is good

Alice

You seem to be pro-war. So I suspect that you would condemn a government policy that would prevent the war from happening. One such government policy would be complete honesty on politicians' part about their reasons for war. This is just a result of the logic of the situation: that large sections of American and British society do not accept any kind of "making the world a better place" argument when it involves war.

by Daniel Strimpel on Sat, 06/07/2003 - 15:08 | reply

Helping freedoms take root

The risk we have taken in invading Iraq and setting up a democracy is that Iraq will degenerate into religious civil war once our forces have withdrawn. After many deaths, democracy may crumble and a new Islamofacist government emerge.

Making an assessment of this risk must have been hard. If our leaders were over-emphasising the immediate risk from WMDs in order to push through the invasion then the risk assessment was probably not done properly. OTOH, could it ever have been done properly?

The answer is to stay in Iraq for decades until capitalism and democracy have taken firm root. I guess this was probably the intention.

Ok, so I answered my own question. It probably is ok to lie within a democracy - sometimes. Doh!

by Tom Robinson on Sat, 06/07/2003 - 15:42 | reply

Spin and Lying

I think that spin (choosing which valid arguments to present according to how effective you think they would be) is a good thing. It isn't lying, and at present I don't see any credible evidence that Bush and Blair lied about WMD.

Lying to deceive the enemy is fine. But I find it hard to think of a situation where lying to change the outcome of a public debate, in the most advanced countries, is defensible. Certainly this wasn't one. Fallibilists do not want to participate in a political decision-making process that cannot decide against them even if they are wrong.

by David Deutsch on Sun, 06/08/2003 - 03:23 | reply

Theories of the state

I am not sure who are "they" in "What they said was that...", and who are these opponents of the war in "so why haven't any opponents of the war stood up and given the real reason why they thought the war was happening until now".

One thing I am sure of is that "they" do not include me, nor many antiwar libertarians I know. I have argued the libertarian case against the war in my Laissez Faire Economic Times piece "Political Economy of the 'War on Terror'", reproduced at <http://www.pierrelemieux.org/arteconwar.html>. Although I did not distinguish well enough the so-called "war on terror" and the war in Iraq (mea culpa),

I certainly argued nothing like what the convenient anti-war straw man is purported to have believed.

Another thing we can be (relatively) sure of is that a naive theory of the state cannot be relied upon to explain what states do or predict what they will do. "The Government was trying to make the world a better, safer place"? (Flectamus genua.) Perhaps this is what some people would like states to do, but more serious theories of the state and historical evidence show that this is not what states do in fact.

Pierre Lemieux
<http://www.pierrelemieux.org>

by Pierre Lemieux on Sun, 06/08/2003 - 10:12 | reply

The wrong emphasis?

Hmmm. Spin isn't necessarily done with good motives. It's necessary- one can't present any kind of political policy without some spin on it- and can be very good of course, but it can also be nothing more than evil propaganda. I can't see that Bush and Blair did anything wrong, but I don't know the details of what they said. If, for example, they promised people that WMDs in workable form would be found, they may have done something wrong.

Any mistakes they made in terms of presenting ideas to the public should be measured by the damage to their good cause that bad presentation results in, IMO. Over-emphasis on WMDs might be a misjudgement, IMO. More explicit statements about tackling Islamofascist terrorism, would, IMO, be a better emphasis, and not alienate anyone who isn't already antiwar.

It's quite possible that good governments will be mistakenly appeasing towards the forces of evil, and very difficult to judge whether this has happened without the kind of long-term perspectives that hindsight eventually offers. I just wonder if the Liberal antiwar left in the West has been appeased too much, and if this whole emphasis on WMDs as "proof" to shut them up isn't part of that: how do we know that a change of emphasis by the governments onto deeper issues would not have inspired more positive support from the undecideds, rather than more dangerous hostility from the peaceniks?

Alice

http://libertarian_parent_in_the_countryside.blogspot.com/

by a reader on Sun, 06/08/2003 - 11:51 | reply

Conspiracy theories suck

Pierre Lemieux wrote:

"Another thing we can be (relatively) sure of is that a naive theory of the state cannot be relied upon to explain what states do or predict what they will do. "The Government was trying to make the world a better, safer place"? (Flectamus genua.) Perhaps this is what some people would like states to do, but more serious theories of the state and historical evidence show that this is not what states do in fact."

Western states do stupid and destructive things when the overwhelming majority of people want them to follow policies that lead to stupid and destructive things and not otherwise. The war on drugs is a result of the scientific bullshit about drugs that is so widespread in our society. Where the economy has come under state control in the West this is a result of people wanting that control in place and voting for it. The suffering many children undergo in school is the result of most people believing a false theory about education.

Your entire viewpoint is a bad conspiracy theory based on the idea that when something bad happens as a result of state action it is because the state intended something bad to happen, when in fact most of the bad stuff is an unintended result of their poor understanding of the world. I find it ironic that a classical liberal who should surely hold that the state is as thick as two short planks should instead see it as an all-powerful evil force.

Both in the case of the war on terror and the war on Iraq I see no reason to think that it is anything other than well-intentioned although some of the specific legislation may be stupid. The terrorists genuinely do hate our guts and want to kill as many people as humanly possible, as such getting rid of states that sponsor terrorism, as Iraq undoubtedly did, is good. Similarly, getting rid of evil aggressive tyrants who have WMD is good. The war on terror is good.

by a reader on Sun, 06/08/2003 - 17:53 | reply

States States States runs away screaming

Pierre,

The fact that the US government is a State, does not imply that everything it does is Wrong, nor that it can never have good motivations. The notion that the US government wanted to make the world a better place in 2003, does not mean we think all governments want to do that at all points in time.

Also, a State is just a kind of organisation, with a difference that is irrelevant to many discussions.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://curi.blogspot.com/>

by Elliot Temple on Sun, 06/08/2003 - 21:55 | reply

Theories of the state (bis)

Dear Elliot,

"The fact that the US government is a State, does not imply that everything it does is Wrong..."

It depends on what you mean by "Wrong," or its opposite, "Right." Some theories of the state, like the Hegelian theory, claim that the state is the incarnation of right and that, therefore, it cannot do wrong. At the very opposite, the most realistic theories of the state hold that everything (or nearly everything) that a state does is wrong because it arbitrarily and coercively violates the preferences of some individuals. This has been quite conclusively demonstrated by the Public Choice school of economics which has developed over the past 50 years. (Or just remember Arrow's theorem: the state cannot be both democratic and rational.) Perhaps the best extension of Public Choice is to be found in Anthony de Jasay's The State, a book which, in my opinion, is a must for anybody talking about the state (even if the book is a bit technical, requiring some background in economic theory, including welfare economics).

"The notion that the US government wanted to make the world a better place in 2003, does not mean we think all governments want to do that at all points in time."

Did the US state want to make the world a better world by attacking a third-world, third-rate tyrant, thousands of kilometers from the American shores? There are good reasons to believe that the American state (and the British state) more naturally wanted to increase its legitimacy and its power. Otherwise, our (taxpayer supported) knights in shining armor would have attacked North Korea or perhaps China (although, it is true that there is the risk that the Chinese tyrant would have fought back more seriously).

Now, it is not impossible that one of the motivations of the American tyrant (let's call a cat a cat, even if Western states may still be "good tyrants", to borrow Lockean terminology from Randy Simmons). Of course, this would require quite a "conspiracy", but we can safely dismiss the simplistic view that the conspiracy buzzword is an argument. In fact, any theory of the state must explain why, since the 19th century (and, with a vengeance, the 20th), states claim to pursue the welfare of the whole population. We know that they can't do this, because one individual's welfare is another's burden. But what is most important to realize here is that the Nice State is often more dangerous than the Egoistic State. "What has always made the state a hell on earth," wrote German poet Friedrich Hölderlin, "has been precisely that man has tried to make it his heaven. (On the Nice State, see my LFET piece, reproduced at <http://www.pierrelemieux.org/artnice.html>.)

"Also, a State is just a kind of organisation, with a difference that is irrelevant to many discussions."

It is true that the state is only a kind of organization, but the difference is very material here: the state is based on coercion and violence.

P.

Pierre Lemieux
www.pierrelemieux.org

by a reader on Tue, 06/10/2003 - 11:49 | reply

P., you wrote: "It is true..."

P., you wrote:

"It is true that the state is only a kind of organization, but the difference is very material here: the state is based on coercion and violence."

Are you saying that violence and coercion are always wrong?

by a reader on Tue, 06/10/2003 - 13:30 | reply

Answer to "A reader"

"Are you saying that violence and coercion are always wrong?"

No.

There are unassailable (I think) moral arguments for the right of self-defense. Of course, they don't imply the right of an organization ("a secret band of robbers and murderers," as Lysander Spooner said of a state that was much less powerful than today) to control me more under the excuse of "self-defending" me!

Moreover, a moral argument against violence would not change the fact that violence exists, and will certainly exist as long as all men have not been transformed into angels. Indeed, counterviolence and the threat of violence are the ONLY way to protect individual liberty against violence. Of course, this does not mean allowing tyrants who disarm the populace to become more powerful and more powerfully armed all the time.

(I have written two books, and innumerable articles, on the right to keep and bear arms.)

Pierre Lemieux
www.pierrelemieux.org

by a reader on Tue, 06/10/2003 - 14:34 | reply

Duncan Smith Lays Into Blair

I just caught this in the FT:

The Tories claimed Mr Blair failed to meet his pledge last week that the government would be open with both parliamentary inquiries. "It would be quite incredible if any inquiry into Downing Street's use of intelligence material did not take evidence from Mr Campbell . . .

who is associated with every allegation," said Iain

Duncan Smith, the Tory leader.

What the hell is Duncan Smith doing? It seems like the height of cynical political BS. Wasn't he in favour of the war? It's this kind of thing that leaves me with a sour taste in my mouth when it comes to politicians.

by a reader on Tue, 06/10/2003 - 15:36 | reply

Copyright © 2008 Setting The World To Rights

6. Eleven Years of Fighting, Six Days of War

This is the sixth part of our series, "A Short History of Israel". If you wish to read the preceding parts, see the Table of Contents for links to them. We welcome comments and criticisms. Do tell us what you think.

.....

When Israel declared independence, the Arab League's boycott of Jews in Palestine became the anti-Israel boycott, enforced by law in every Arab country, and was then broadened in scope and institutionalised: individuals or companies anywhere in the world that had any dealings with Israel were not permitted to do business anywhere in the Arab world; companies that did business with those companies were also boycotted. Travellers with an Israeli stamp in their passports were not permitted to enter any Arab country. Many multinational companies complied with the boycott. Many did not, but in 1993 a study by the Israeli Chambers of Commerce estimated that the total loss to the Israeli economy caused by the boycott had been some $45 billion.

Arab governments also used boycotts and other pressures to have Israel excluded from international organisations. As a result, for instance, Israel is to this day the only country in the world not permitted to join the International Red Cross. It is the only member of the United Nations not permitted to sit on the Security Council. It is also not permitted to participate in the World Court, and is excluded from most United Nations organisations such as UNICEF.

Syria built a military base on the Golan Heights, with gun emplacements cut out of the rock and invisible from the air, and a complex system of fortifications linked by underground tunnels. From there, long-range artillery dominated a region of northern Israel and caused a steady stream of deaths, injury and destruction.

France continued to sell weapons to Israel. In 1957, Israel began building a nuclear reactor and research facility at Dimona in the Negev, purchasing French technology to do so, and used this to manufacture its own nuclear weapons.

In 1959, the Egyptian Army suddenly crossed the Sinai peninsula. Israel's intelligence and early warning systems failed to detect the threat until hundreds of Egyptian tanks were at the border, where they faced no more than thirty tanks on the Israeli side. Israel was unprepared and took a further 24 hours to mobilise an army and rush it southwards to face the invasion. But the Egyptians did not invade. Instead they gradually withdrew.

One of the perennial strategic facts of the Arab-Israeli conflict has been that because of Israel's small population, the only way it can raise an army large enough to repel a full-scale invasion is by mobilising more or less every eligible citizen. Such a mobilisation can be achieved in the remarkably short time of 48 hours; however, this is at the cost of shutting down most of Israel's civilian economy, so each such mobilisation is in itself a major economic disaster, and to remain mobilised for very long would bankrupt the country.

Israel's options for defending itself against attacks other than invasion were similarly limited. It adopted a policy of retaliation. When Arab soldiers had killed Israelis or collaborated with terrorists, the IDF might retaliate by shelling or bombing military installations or other valued property of the country in question. When terrorists could be identified as coming from a particular village, the IDF might raid that village, order the inhabitants out, and blow up houses. The IDF also became skilled at guarding the border, so that infiltrators were often killed there before they could do any further harm. And Israel developed a formidable intelligence service, the Mossad.

In 1962, President Kennedy initiated a historic change in the United States' attitude towards the Middle East (against the State Department's fervent opposition) by authorising the first ever sale of American weapons – Hawk anti-aircraft missiles – to Israel. The British government, too, was willing to overrule the opposition of the Foreign Office and authorise arms sales to Israel.

In 1964, Syria proposed to the Arab League that the Palestinian Arab refugees, who were still being kept in camps in various Arab countries, could be used to destabilise Israel. The proposal was accepted, and the Arab League set up the Palestine Liberation Organisation (PLO) with the purpose, according to its founding manifesto, of 'liquidating Israel'. Despite its name, the PLO did not campaign for self-government for Palestinian Arabs, nor was any attempt made to install the PLO, or any Palestinian Arabs, as the government of those parts of Palestine that had already been 'liberated' in 1948 (namely Gaza, the West Bank and East Jerusalem). The PLO soon fragmented into factions with widely differing ideologies and allegiances, but all agreeing on the basic purpose (Arab government over the whole of Palestine, and the destruction of Israel), and using the same basic means: murder of Jews. Arafat's Fatah movement, which had been in the process of formation at around the same time, became the largest single faction.

The Soviet Union, as part of its massive, mainly secret campaign to destabilise the West by supporting terrorist organisations, provided extensive training and other services for the PLO. The PLO was far better armed and funded than any other terrorist organisation before or since – and it gradually made its presence felt in an increasingly ferocious and spectacular campaign of murder.

Egypt, Syria and Jordan again established a unified military command structure to prepare for war with Israel. Arab leaders made increasingly bellicose speeches. In 1965, Nasser said: “we aim at the destruction of the State of Israel. The immediate aim: perfection of Arab military might. The national aim: the eradication of Israel.”

In 1967, Syria stepped up its artillery attacks from the Golan Heights. Cross-border artillery duels followed. Several Syrian fighter aircraft were shot down in dogfights over the Heights. The Soviet Union gave Syria fabricated evidence that Israeli armour was massing in northern Israel preparing to invade. Syria massed its forces on the border and invoked its defence treaty with Egypt. Jordan then signed the treaty too.

In mid-May, Nasser again moved the Egyptian army across Sinai to the Israeli border, ordering the UN to withdraw its Emergency Force, which it did immediately and without objection. He again sealed the Straits of Tiran to Israel-related shipping. The United States proposed international action to break the blockade, but no country was enthusiastic to take any action, and none was taken. The Israeli government pointed out that the blockade was an act of war and threatened to lift it by force. Nasser replied “The Jews threaten to make war. I reply: Welcome! We are ready for war.” Iraq joined the alliance with Egypt, its President saying: “The existence of Israel is an error which must be rectified. This is our opportunity to wipe out the ignominy which has been with us since 1948. Our goal is clear – to wipe Israel off the map.” All over the Arab world, huge demonstrations clamoured for this. Ahmed Shukeiry, the leader of the PLO, declared in a speech in (Jordanian-occupied) East Jerusalem that after the forthcoming victory, all Israelis not born in the country would be expelled. When he was informed that the majority of Israelis were born in the country, he replied: “Those who survive will remain in Palestine, but I estimate that none of them will survive.”

The Soviet Union sent seventy warships to the Eastern Mediterranean and again made ominous hints about protecting its allies, especially Syria.

The IDF, on high alert since the Egyptian deployment in Sinai, was now fully mobilised. Even so, it was nominally the weaker force. Its total strength was 264,000 soldiers, 80% of whom were reservists, with 800 tanks and 300 combat aircraft. It was facing three armies, totalling 347,000 soldiers, most of whom had been training for this moment for years, with 1,900 tanks and 700 combat aircraft – and few Iraqis had yet arrived.

Israel struck first. Its air force attacked the Egyptian air force. Many Egyptian aircraft were destroyed on the ground, and others in combat. At Nasser's behest, the Syrian and Jordanian air forces attacked Israel. They were effectively destroyed. Britain, France and the United States imposed an immediate arms embargo on both sides. The Soviet Union continued to supply weapons to the Arabs. The IDF, now with air supremacy, attacked on the ground in Sinai and defeated the Egyptian army. Soon they had captured the whole peninsula, opened the Straits of Tiran, and halted at the Suez Canal. Then, despite their fear of direct Soviet intervention, they attacked and captured the Golan Heights.

On the first day of the war, the Israeli Prime Minister Levi Eshkol had sent a secret message to King Hussein of Jordan via the UN: "We are engaged in defensive fighting on the Egyptian sector, and we shall not engage ourselves in any action against Jordan, unless Jordan attacks us. Should Jordan attack Israel, we shall go against her with all our might." But thanks to the fog of war and erroneous reports from Nasser of Egyptian victories, King Hussein believed that Israel was about to be defeated. Even when Jordanian forces began shelling West Jerusalem, the IDF still held off for several hours. The Knesset building was among those hit, and members adjourned to the cellar. Finally the IDF attacked, captured East Jerusalem in fierce street-to-street fighting, defeated the Jordanian Army and captured the West Bank. Lebanon, which had not participated in the threats against Israel, was not attacked.

All these engagements were decisive victories and took only six days (hence this war is known as the Six Day War) but they were not easy victories. All three Arab armies fought competently and bravely in many engagements. Their effectiveness and morale were impaired mainly by the elimination of their air power during the first hours of the war, an action which cost Israel itself nearly a quarter of its fighter aircraft. In all, Israel lost 777 dead and 2,586 wounded during the six days – proportionately more than the United States lost during the Vietnam war. Nevertheless, among Israelis, grief was now combined with an overwhelming sense of relief that they had survived.

At the end of the war, Israel controlled more than three times as much territory as it had six days earlier. This time it did not annexe it (with the exception of Jerusalem – see below) or expel anyone from it (though some 325,000 Arabs chose for various reasons to leave the West Bank for Jordan). Instead, it proposed a peace plan to the Arab countries, via the United States government, under which it would return all the territory it had just captured, with the exception of East Jerusalem and some border adjustments, in return for recognition of Israel's right to live in peace within those borders. The Arab leaders did not respond to the Israeli proposal as such, and formulated no peace plan of their own. In the Declaration of Khartoum, they demanded that Israel withdraw from all the territory it had captured during the Six Day War, without receiving peace or recognition. The Declaration set out the: "main principles by which the Arab States abide, namely, no peace with Israel, no recognition of Israel, no negotiations with it, and insistence on the rights of the Palestinian people in their own country." The latter rights were, principally, the right to undo the partition of Palestine and establish a unitary Arab state there. Israel's Foreign Minister Abba Eban commented: "I think that this is the first war in history that on the morrow the victors sued for peace and the vanquished called for unconditional surrender.”

The UN Security Council then issued its deliberately ambiguous Resolution 242 which Israel interpreted as being similar to its own land-for-peace proposal and the Arab countries interpreted as endorsing their demand for unconditional withdrawal.

Part 7. Settlements

Sat, 06/07/2003 - 19:13 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

eleven years of fighting, six days of war

A very good article! It's well written, it's factual, and it covers nearly all of the relevant bases from that period.

An interesting point that is NOT made (although the basic facts are there) is the nature of changing alliances vis-a-vis Israel. Prior to 1967, France was Israel's primary military ally, and the United States preferred a hands-off approach. After the Six-Day War (and because of it), France refused to sell any military equipment of any sort to Israel, and refused to deliver equipment that had been paid for; this resulted in the active courting of America. This new relationship was consummated six years later, in 1973, when Israel again had to fight for its life, and the United States stepped in as a true friend -- a role it has assumed ever since. (I hope more details of this reversal will appear in the next installment.)

Another interesting point -- which, again, this article does not make, but for which the facts are available -- is Israel's status as an undeclared nuclear power. Israel had to fight for its very life, in 1967 and again in 1973; by 1973 Israeli nuclear weapons almost certainly existed. That they were NOT used, even at a time of desperate need, is a powerful testament to the high moral standards of Israel as a country and the IDF as a fighting force. (It also stands in contradiction to the alarmist propaganda, currently rampant in the Arab world, about the "global threat" of Israeli nuclear weapons.)

One other comment -- Israel's highly-regarded intelligence services (including the Mossad, the IDF's Military Intelligence apparatus, and others) have contributed greatly to Israel's survival over the years, starting from the very earliest days. It's a pity to see the fascinating tale of Israeli intelligence given short shrift here... but I do recognize that it's beyond the scope of this series.

Please do keep up the good work!

best wishes,
Daniel

by Daniel in Medford on Mon, 06/09/2003 - 17:55 | reply

About time!

I'm at work right now and found this site via The Dissident Frogman

(which I found via deanesmay.com whom I work with, Mr. Esmay that is).

For a long while I've been looking for factual information dealing with the formation of the modern nation of Israel. While not as detailed as I'd like, which Daniel above pointed out, it's a very good primer and a good jumping off point to start more detailed studies. I read all 6 chapters in one sitting here and found them very interesting. The Six Day War was something I've always meant to study in more detail and this only whets my appetite. As you stated in your introduction, I too am surprised how many people accept falsehood as fact, almost too willingly. And then refuse to accept reality and are quick to label true facts as anything but. Perhaps someone here, or perhaps the author of this series themselves, can recommend books for further study. On a topic such as this, or in religious matters, I'm very careful about what I read for obvious reasons.

Keep up the great work,

Kevin

by a reader on Thu, 06/12/2003 - 09:48 | reply

Re: About time!

You might like to read the book listed first in the references we gave:

Israel, A History, by Martin Gilbert

by Sarah Fitz-Claridge on Thu, 06/12/2003 - 17:38 | reply

how israel?

I am a filipino and quite antonish with the way Israel surived and one of the supremes! WHAT MADE THE ARABS HATE SO MUCH THE ISRAELS?

by a reader on Sun, 11/30/2003 - 08:58 | reply

Re: how israel?

"WHAT MADE THE ARABS HATE SO MUCH THE ISRAELIS?"

It's Jews they hate.

Why? Well, it certainly wasn't the existence of Israel. Look what their attitude to Jews was in 1840: The Damascus Affair.

As for the root causes, perhaps there are some pointers here: Symposium on Islamic Anti-Semitism.

by a reader on Sun, 11/30/2003 - 19:43 | reply

Eleven Years of Fighting, Six Days of War

The sixth part of our series, A Short History of Israel, is now up. It begins:

The Arab League's anti-Jewish boycott became the anti-Israel boycott, enforced by law in every Arab country, and was broadened in scope: individuals or companies anywhere in the world that had any dealings with Israel were not permitted to do business anywhere in the Arab world; companies that did business with those companies were also boycotted. Travellers with an Israeli stamp in their passports were not permitted to enter any Arab country.

If you want to read the series from the beginning, start here.

Sun, 06/08/2003 - 07:55 | permalink

Shocking!

I want to thank you for this superb series. I was shocked to read this:

Israel is to this day the only country in the world not permitted to join the International Red Cross. It is the only member of the United Nations not permitted to sit on the Security Council. It is also not permitted to participate in the World Court, and is excluded from most United Nations organisations such as UNICEF.

Am I the only one who doesn't know these facts? One thing I'd like to see is a list of references for where I can read more about each fact you present.

by Sylvia Crombie on Tue, 06/10/2003 - 16:09

The Stuff of Dreams

It's not quite as sexy as a Colt M4A1 with M203 grenade launcher, or even a serious pump action shotgun ("Make my day.") but there is something very cool about this piece of kit. Oh, the satisfaction one might get, if, upon being attacked by a would-be rapist, one's jacket would coolly deliver an 80,000-volt shock to him.

Once the jacket is armed, a squeeze on the trigger will deliver a 30-second shock of 80,000 volts. A single nine volt battery provides enough power for at least 20 shocks.

Ms Nugent said: "It's like armour but we have designed it so that you can wear it just like any jacket. If you are in an area where you feel nervous, you just arm it. I wanted to create something like a safe space around yourself."

The couple had the idea after Ms Nugent complained of feeling frightened walking home in Boston after parking her car.

One in three American women will be the victim of violent crime in her lifetime, according to FBI statistics. Most of these attacks, Mr Whiton found, involved "grabbing and grappling, often seizing the victim from behind", rather than an attack from a distance with a weapon. In Britain, police record 2.6 million violent crimes a year.

So far, 10 of the jackets have been made, some experimenting with different styles and technology. Three are now being "test worn" by friends of the inventors and volunteers. All the women say that they feel a new sense of safety when they wear it although none has yet used it in anger.

If you need more guineapigs for the tests, Setting The World To Rights will be delighted to help. Oh yeah, one small problem to iron out first: this jacket would be illegal in England, given that self-defence is a crime here. D'oh!

I want one like... right now!

by Leo on Mon, 06/09/2003 - 01:30 | reply

mmmmmmm, Voltage...

mmmmmmm, Voltage

by Daniel Strimpel on Mon, 06/09/2003 - 16:20 | reply

Worth testing?

Would it be worth testing in the courts the illegality of this jacket in the UK? It is so clearly for self-defence, would a jury really convict a woman of a crime (what crime?) if she was wearing it armed when attacked?

by a reader on Tue, 06/10/2003 - 12:39 | reply

I notice they have a model pl...

I notice they have a model planned for use against domestic violence. Um, isn't that just a little bit...crazy? Who's going to walk around their house with a protective device in the event of a domestic brawl? And what routine abuser is going to let it slide?

by a reader on Thu, 06/12/2003 - 00:59 | reply

About the domestic violence m...

About the domestic violence model--I agree with the previous poster, it sounds crazy. The abuser would be enraged and liable to further violence.

by Sylvia Crombie on Thu, 06/12/2003 - 08:38 | reply

Re>About the domestic violence model

Sylvia Crombie:

Something doesn't have to be useful in every single case to be useful. It is enough if there's a certain type of situation in which it is useful, even a fairly unusual one.

by a reader on Thu, 06/12/2003 - 13:32 | reply

"Would it be worth testing in...

"Would it be worth testing in the courts the illegality of this jacket in the UK? It is so clearly for self-defence, would a jury really convict a woman of a crime (what crime?) if she was wearing it armed when attacked?"

But Your Honour, if I'd not been wearing that jacket, I would have ended up like the 17 women he is known to have raped and murdered.

...

But Your Honour, you don't understand! It was self-defense!

...

Self-defense isn't legal?

...

D'oh!

dvgbits bows

by dvgbits on Tue, 06/17/2003 - 11:50 | reply

Copyright © 2005 Setting The World To Rights

The Economic Case Against the Euro

Wilhelm Nolling, a former Bundesbank Director, former member of both Houses of the German Parliament, now Professor of Economics at Hamburg University, understands the devastating economic case against the Euro:

"Germany is suffering its worst economic crisis in decades [...] We are in bad shape and euro membership has played a major role in limiting our policy-making room for manoeuvre."

[...]

"The present euro zone structure is devastating for Germany ... Our economy is bleeding. And I am convinced the UK would be crazy to join - you should stay out for as long as I can foresee."

Wow!

If it ever comes to the referendum, we hope the No campaign uses its TV slot to air an interview with this man.

It's also well worth reading what William Hague has to say about this:

Neither France nor Germany is now keeping within the budget deficit limits which they themselves set for the euro zone. The Germans have tried, but are unable to do so. The French, unencumbered by any Germanic impulse to obey the rules, are simply unwilling to do so. One may wonder at the credibility of rules so swiftly broken, but wonder all the more that the Germans are prevented by euro membership from using either of the main policy instruments for tackling recession or deflation. The result could be great discontent: the product of a politically motivated project which economically is one of gargantuan stupidity.

Yes, gargantuan stupidity. And yet the economic arguments against Britain joining the Euro are as nothing compared with the political ones!

What are these so-called "political arguments"?

What are these so-called "political arguments"? [scratches head]

by a reader on Tue, 06/10/2003 - 12:30 | reply

Euro

Arguing against the euro because it deprives national states of "policy instruments" (meddling with short-term interest rates, and other such social-engineering games) is like arguing against hunting because it prevents animals from killing people. The only sensible economic argument against the euro is that is that it arbitrarily restrains individual choices. Individual preferences is what economics is about.

by a reader on Tue, 06/10/2003 - 12:31 | reply

Which political arguments?

The questioner who asked what political arguments has a good point. Is it the "we must keep the head of the queen on our coins for the tourists" one? Or the "sovereignty" one? Or the xenophic "we hate foreigners" one? Or what? What political argument is there that isn't an economic one?

by a reader on Tue, 06/10/2003 - 13:35 | reply

About the Euro

Where else can I find information about the Euro? I have read these articles and still feel I lack information.

by Sylvia Crombie on Tue, 06/10/2003 - 16:15 | reply how?

how does the Euro restrain individual choice?

by a reader on Wed, 01/26/2005 - 10:11 | reply

Euro

Why should europe have any more problems with a single currency, where the United States does not?

by a reader on Sun, 01/15/2006 - 02:51 | reply

because the united states wor

because the united states works as an individual economy, eheras europe still works in individual economies, which can have veeey different needs!

by a reader on Thu, 04/06/2006 - 08:49 | reply

why can't we all in euroland why can't we all in euroland work together under 1 economy then

by a reader on Tue, 06/27/2006 - 09:27 | reply

Political arguments

"What political argument is there that isn't an economic one?"

Plenty, mate. Life is not all about money and economics. That's the major flaw in the whole Communist-Leninist programme: it regards people as means of production, without imagination and emotions.

If you don't understand that the populations of individual countries have a sense of nationhood, of a shared culture which is different from that of their neighbours - something that ghastly Eurocrats like the Welsh windbag clearly have not enough brains to grasp - then it's difficult to see how to explain it to you.

However, the fact that the Germans are trying to obey the rules and failing, while the French can't be bothered to try, in itself shows that countries have different cultures. Every empire that has tried to squeeze diverse cultures into one straitjacket has ended up falling catastrophically apart.

As to the USA: although there are big differences between its various states, there is still one unifying culture.

by Yoni on Sun, 09/10/2006 - 11:39 | reply

The EU is not a straitjacket

While almost all countries on this planet are straitjackets formed from wars fought for personal gains of a few leaders, the EU is not. All EU countries are democracies, and those of you who do not like the way its going, can vote NO to it all. If we pro-EU people ever manage to convince the rest of you that it is a good idea, the EU will become the first "nation" built bottom-up.

And yes the Euro might not be the best idea (economically) for those of us living in rich european countries, however, I see it as a great opportunity for us to help the development of eastern europe economies. The euro needs the strong help of the the Danish Crown, the Swedish Crown and last but not least, the Brittish Pound.

by Björn from Sweden on Mon, 01/08/2007 - 10:54 | reply

The EURO DEBATE!!!!!!!!!!!!!!

after reading all the information available to us we had come to an unanimous decision that we feel very strongly that Britain should continue using the pound. Our economy is currently well good and the economy will continue to develop with a lower inflation and a sustainable level of employment joining the euro will only reduce this and cause the British economy to fall into a slump like the German economy is experiencing!!!

by John And Hannah on Fri, 03/16/2007 - 14:37 | reply

AGAINST THE EURO

We feel very strongly that having the Euro will result in a loss of identity for the UK. Having the Queen on our currency is a sign of patriotism and individuality. Therefore the Euro will banish this and for that we should not have it.

by Emily, Laura and Carmen on Fri, 05/04/2007 - 08:39 | reply

How to Ruin a Good Idea

Capitalism tends to encourage good ideas and weed out bad ones, so charging for road use, in particular, is a good idea. However, like any other good idea, it can be ruined by being implemented in the worst possible way and with the worst possible objectives. That is what the British Labour Government now seems determined to do:

Transport Secretary Alistair Darling wants to set pay-as-you-drive charges using satellite tracking devices fixed to cars.

The tolls would be highest for rush hour traffic – including commuters, motorway users and school run parents – and on busier routes...

The minister told the paper: "We have a choice in the next 25 to 30 years: either build more and more motorways – astronomically expensive, environmentally damaging, and I doubt if we could actually do it – or we take a radically different look at how we manage the system.

"That is where road pricing comes in. I am convinced that unless we look at the possibility of road pricing, then future generations will not forgive us."

But he conceded the technology meant implementation was probably 10 years away.

Mr Darling said the government would not want to make money out of the scheme.

This justification for the scheme is based on environmental pseudo-science. In reality, motorways are good: they enable people to move about more easily. They take up negligible land and need do little or no damage to the environment. The idea that we can't build more of them is just silly: we did it in the past and we have become far more prosperous since then.

The fact that the system will be government-run is also a bad omen. Giving the government the means to track every car in the country has a horrible potential for abuse. Even the assurance that the government will try to avoid making money out of road charging is a sign of the wrong attitude. When a business makes a profit it is because people want its services. For the government to avoid making money means they will avoid making roads easy and pleasant to use and that won't benefit anybody.

Tue, 06/10/2003 - 06:11 | permalink

Unnecessarily Intrusive

I thought I remembered seeing articles in Reason magazine about toll roads that could read stickers on cars at the entrance. And a quick search found a reference from 1996:

Today's electronic toll collection technology makes it possible to charge people in real time. A small electronic tag affixed to the car can be "read" by a radio signal as the car passes a toll collection point at normal speed. Depending on the type of account, the fee is charged either to the user's credit card or to the user's account with the toll company. This system makes it easy to charge prices which vary by time of day, permitting more sophisticated forms of road pricing, including congestion pricing. Such fully electronic congestion pricing is now in use on the (private) 91 Express Lanes on the Riverside Freeway in Southern California.

I assume that this technology has significantly improved since 1996. Tracking every vehicle's location via satellite seems unnecessary and intended for other purposes.

I am a bit confused, however, about The World's position on governmental motives. Sometimes you seem to assume that moral purity motivates the actions of the British and American governments, and at other times you exhibit skepticism about the motives (e.g. "A horrible potential for abuse").

I prefer the latter.

by Gil on Tue, 06/10/2003 - 16:46 | reply

No Contradiction

Gil wrote:

"I am a bit confused, however, about The World's position on governmental motives. Sometimes you seem to assume that moral purity motivates the actions of the British and American governments, and at other times you exhibit skepticism about the motives (e.g. "A horrible potential for abuse")."

It just happens that in fact the government has good theories in some areas and bad theories in others. Alastair Darling is clearly an idiot when it comes to roads and seems determined to set up a system that would give the government a large amount of unnecessary power which could be abused, and would be abused by this government since the pursuit of a screamingly stupid transport policy like this is abused. Whether it would be abused in other ways only time would tell.

It's quite easy to discriminate between when they're being honest and when they're not quite a lot of the time. When it comes to terrorism you can tell that Blair and Bush mean what they say because it actually makes sense. When it comes to ID cards you can tell the British government are talking nonsense because they want to hide the fact that they're control freaks because the stated reasons for wanting ID cards are rubbish.

by Alan Forrester on Tue, 06/10/2003 - 17:14 | reply

How To Ruin A Good Idea

Okay, perhaps I'm missing something obvious here. But if the British government wants to encourage people to travel during non-peak periods, what's wrong with setting up ordinary toll booths? Pick up a ticket when you enter the roadway, pay when you leave the roadway (with your ticket indicating how far you've traveled). Make the fees higher during peak periods, lower during offpeak periods.

Why is it necessary to track where specific cars go in order to collect money from them?

Daniel in Medford

by Daniel in Medford on Tue, 06/10/2003 - 20:02 | reply

"They take up negligible land...

"They take up negligible land and need do little or no damage to the environment. The idea that we can't build more of them is just silly: we did it in the past and we have become far more prosperous since then."

OK, armed with a pencil and a back of an envelope, some criticism.

A 4 lane divided highway requires about a 50 m wide right of way (Roughly, 4 lanes by 3 meters, another 10 for the median strip, 10 on either side of the right of way, 12 more for shoulders= over 50m). 20km of that accounts for a square kilometer of land, and one'll need a couple interchanges at least that take up land at least 200m on the side, for another 0.08km².

1.08km² of land isn't negligible, I think - particularly in an area where there is congestion - meaning there are people there - meaning the land is probably being used. Highways in the Mojave Desert aren't so congested.

Now, putting aside environmental concerns, which I am not qualified to address, we can go into the practicalities of actually building the thing.

The land (negligible or not) making up the right of way will be privately owned. And will have to be obtained from the owner. Now, states mostly use eminent domain for this - but I think that this would count as a difficulty! I don't think libertarians like the idea of the state expropriating private property.

Now, if a private entity were building the highway they would have to encounter the truism that my perceived value of my property is $\max(\text{its utility to me, its utility to other people})$ - which makes it rather difficult to deal with Mr. Smith who figures if his filling station is on land key for a \$1bn expressway project that he ought to get at least \$10mn - even though if it were not on the key right of way he'd be happy to take \$1mn.

So I don't think that the quoted statement is valid. Moreover, arguing that in the past we built roads and have become more prosperous doesn't necessarily work now - the situation has changed. Mainly because where roads are property values have gone up, the land is being used (because of the roads!) and it's fairly useless to build a new road where nothing at all is right now - it has to connect to something at some point.

by a reader on Wed, 06/11/2003 - 16:56 | reply

um

a(nother) reader writes:

1.08km² of land isn't negligible, I think

Uh, by comparison to what? Nothing is "negligible, I think" if you don't compare it to anything else (or perhaps, only to itself). Yes of course if one sits and ponders a 1.08km² piece of land by itself, it Seems Large. But, by your calculation you've got this 1.08km² coming from a stretch of road 20 km long. Why can't I chime in and say don't worry, that 20 km road is crossing a square patch of land 20 x 20 or 400 km²? (Well, it is.) So we're really talking about carving out 0.25% of that patch for road. Zero-point-two-five-percent of a square patch is Negligible, I Think.

What's that? You don't want me to compare road to the square patch that it's crossing? What then? You gotta compare it to something.

by a reader on Thu, 06/12/2003 - 05:48 | reply

i know!

lets compare the road to 1/100th of the square patch it crosses. now it's 25% of the area, which is clearly lots. ^_~

-- Elliot Temple

<http://curi.blogspot.com/>

by Elliot Temple on Thu, 06/12/2003 - 05:54 | reply

Too many calculations for me!...

Too many calculations for me! What's the bottom line?

by Sylvia Crombie on Thu, 06/12/2003 - 08:34 | reply

The World right (gasp)

Sylvia,

The bottom line is that roads take very little space, as the original entry says.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://curi.blogspot.com/>

by Elliot Temple on Thu, 06/12/2003 - 09:43 | reply

Not at all. To take an ext...

Not at all.

To take an extreme case, it's very difficult to drive into Manhattan. Ah, let us build another road. A square kilometer of land taken out of Manhattan, however arranged, up north or under the river into New Jersey, would take up an enormous amount of Manhattan.

Congested areas generally are congested with already-economically-productive land, not just road.

More to the point, nobody's bothered to address how such 'little' land is supposed to be purchased.

by a reader on Thu, 06/12/2003 - 16:33 | reply

wow good point

Well, it is true that a square kilometer coming from Manhattan is a more significant amount of space, relative to the size of Manhattan (about 59 km², and 21.5 km long, according to this). Almost 1.7% of its land area! So yes, to put a new 4-lane divided highway (your example) running the length of Manhattan would represent a slightly more significant amount of land. (1.7% is not an "enormous amount", though...) Wow good point!

Even better, just imagine carving that square kilometer for our 4-lane divided highway out of just the area between 23rd and 34th street. (It could curve back and forth like a snake, or something.) Even more less negligible!

Question: why are we still carving 1.08 square kilometers out of these smaller places?? Can't we make a shorter, skinnier new road? Do roads come quantized in 20 km, 4-lane-divided chunks? Is the issue really whether it is affordable (price-wise and area-wise) to put in a 4-lane divided highway running the length of Manhattan? That's the test of Whether Roads Take Up Negligible Land?

At some point if you want to start convincing people of something, you're going to have to talk about concepts such as "density". Also about road usage: how much new road do we need to carve out of Manhattan? By continually insisting on carving this 20 km long 4-lane divided highway out of smaller and smaller areas (a shopping mall? my bedroom?), obviously you're eventually going to wind up with a conclusion that it's "not negligible, I think".

(P.S. The fact that land values and current usage vary from place to place have no bearing on the the rebuttal I was trying to make, nor on the original point of whether "roads take up negligible space" is a true statement, which it is, I reckon.)

by a reader on Thu, 06/12/2003 - 18:12 | reply

Not Always Negligible

The problem is that we shouldn't be talking about roads in terms of the space they consume. We should be referring to the cost of building them. A road through my suburban neighborhood will be cheap, in terms of cost to build, maintain, and lost economic output, compared to a same size road in Manhattan. This is because, if you are to build a road of any useful length in Manhattan, you'll have to move something else, which more than likely produces some economic output. It's all about displacement. That said, 99% of the time the best solution is probably to build another road.

by a reader on Thu, 06/12/2003 - 21:08 | reply

And one more time... from the same dude...

OK! So, the space taken up is not necessarily negligible. It can be expensive. Because there are things there!

All right. Now -for the third time- how do you get the road built without expropriating people's property for less than they feel like selling it? Recall $\max(\text{utility to me}, \text{utility to someone else})$ pricing function. I'm sure this kind of thing has been brought up before and I'm unfamiliar with the standard Libertarian approach to this situation.

My main point in bringing up all these things is that it really detracts like heck from a site that does a decent job of bringing up silly unqualified things that people say to be saying things that are themselves.... dubious...? Dubious to the point where in my opinion anyway it sort of negates the whole point the root post was attempting to make.

by a reader on Thu, 06/12/2003 - 22:49 | reply

Come again

A...whaaaa?!?!?

by a reader on Thu, 06/12/2003 - 23:31 | reply

The problem is that we sho...

The problem is that we shouldn't be talking about roads in terms of the space they consume. We should be referring to the cost of building them.

Well why not both? Yes, cost is an important consideration as well. Surely you are correct, some road projects cost more than others. And this changes World's original point.... how?

That said, 99% of the time the best solution is probably to build another road.

Well then it looks like we all agree. Splendid.

by a reader on Fri, 06/13/2003 - 01:03 | reply

taqveem

i have went on your site and i have been trying to find why is it a good idea for a motorway i needed it for monday why don't you write about the popullation will increase and i need a good a good idea for pollution is going to be there but something will happen... [what will happen]

by a reader on Sat, 10/16/2004 - 10:29 | reply

Iran Tries the Insanity Defence

North Korea's mass-murdering tyrants have been trying for many months to plead insanity ("we're not bad, we're mad") in the hope of getting handouts and a free pass to do their evil stuff with impunity. Their latest mad idea is to claim that they need their nuclear weapons to reduce the size of their army. Er ...

yeeeees. (An army, by the way, whose sole use, ever, has been to kill, rob and oppress (1) the people of North Korea, and (2) the people of South Korea.) The North Korean statement also cites two other weighty reasons why it is right for their mass-murdering dictator to have the power to slaughter millions more anywhere in the world at the touch of a button, namely (1) that US foreign policy isn't unilateralist enough:

But the Bush administration is adamantly insisting on the [sic] multilateral talks and (2) that the US has accused them of having a nuclear weapons programme:

Such attitude [sic] from the US only more saliently reveals the sinister design of the Bush administration to dramatise the DPRK's "nuclear threat" before the world community.

OK that's impressively mad. But now Iran's tyrants – who have for decades been cultivating their reputation as mad mullahs by the effective method of being mullahs and behaving madly – have decided that they can't let North Korea out-mad them. So they have claimed that their sole reason for developing nuclear weapons (which, for good measure, they also deny doing) is that the United States is trying to prevent them from doing so:

Iran warned Monday that foreign pressure over its nuclear capabilities, branded a threat to peace by Washington, would backfire and harden Iran's position.

[...]

"Excessive pressure on Iran would untie the hands of those who do not believe in dialogue," said Foreign Ministry spokesman Hamid Reza Asefi. "Even those who favor constructive talks would not accept the language of force and threat.”

Uh huh. In other words, if the United States declares once and for all that it will do nothing if Iran acquires nuclear weapons, those in Iran who “favour constructive talks” will be strengthened and this will cause the ones who favour destructive action to give up their nuclear weapons programme. And the fairies at the bottom of the garden will do the weapons inspections.

He also had a friendly warning for President Bush:

“We are always alert about America's policies ... but we have no doubt the Americans won't be deluded into mistaking Iran for Iraq. Such a mistake would be irreparable,” he said.

Irreparable for him, yes. Had Mr Bush lived up to the urban-myth caricatures and mistaken Iran for Iraq recently, the mass-murdering tyrants of Iran would now be history. And that would have been a bad thing why?

Anyway, nice try Mr Asefi (and Mr Kim), but it's not going to work. In politics (as often in the courtroom too) those who try to get away with murder by pleading insanity are in fact both bad and mad. And it's obvious to everyone but them. Perhaps the maddest thing about the surviving Axis of Evil members is that they haven't yet noticed that blustering veiled threats to murder Americans is no longer good tactics.

Wed, 06/11/2003 - 07:27 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

What do we expect?

I don't get this. They aren't pleading insanity, they just have evil crap ideas. All evil ideas look like madness if you examine them closely enough, because they don't make real actual sense.

Basically, North Korea and Iran are both evil and ridiculously irrational. Well, yes, of course. What else do we expect? (Unless we're idiots; are we idiots?)

On the other hand, their madness does contain the method that has made them both relatively successful so far. Which it would be a serious mistake to underestimate.

Alice

http://libertarian_parent_in_the_countryside.blogspot.com/

by a reader on Wed, 06/11/2003 - 16:11 | reply

Bad Boys Behaving Like Bad Boys

Well, so far they're living up to their reputations... which includes stupidity, as Alice points out. They're engaging in precisely the behavior that got President Bush's attention in Iraq.

The difference is that, as near as anybody is saying, it seems probable that North Korea already has a nuclear weapon (maybe even two)... while Iran doesn't yet.

I can think of no better way to ensure invasion than to say, "If we had nuclear weapons, we'd use them!! But we don't have them yet."

Daniel

by Daniel in Medford on Thu, 06/12/2003 - 00:39 | reply

Is Iran next? Or France North...

Is Iran next? Or ~~France~~ North Korea?

by tony hutton on Thu, 06/12/2003 - 08:40 | reply

Anthropomorphism

Sir David Attenborough thinks that dolphins are deep thinkers.

Why? Well, apparently they are able to herd fish:

Dusky dolphins use teamwork to corral huge shoals of anchovies into a tight ball, while some bottlenose dolphins use walls of mud or tail-thrashes to scare mullet out of the water. Off the coast of Brazil, dolphins have even formed a successful fishing partnership with humans.

Yeah, because inborn fish-herding behaviour could never evolve in a species that lives solely on fish, could it?

And isn't Sir David just a teeny bit fazed by the fact that it is possible to write zoology textbooks specifying which species uses which herding tactic?

They can communicate too:

As highly social mammals, dolphins possess amazing communication skills using sound and body language to keep in touch. In Hawaii, they can even understand us, through a special sign language that the scientists have developed.

But again, it doesn't seem to occur to Sir David that this is simply the dolphin using a program in its brain that evolved so that dolphins could send a fixed repertoire of signals under predetermined conditions. We humans might see their meaning as saying "food over here" or "Hey, baby! How about doin' the horizontal mambo?", but to them it's just ... well that's the point isn't it? What is the point of imagining that there is such a thing as what it is like to them? Why aren't similar documentaries made about the deep thoughts of our (or for that matter the dolphins') immune system, as it tracks down bad cells and spares the good, with a sophistication, ability to 'learn', and complexity of communication that makes a dolphin look like a floating beer can by comparison.

It might be fun to have a companion sentient species to talk to. But dolphins are dimwits, their immense intellectual achievements in the field of putting frisbees into baskets notwithstanding. They show a very limited ability to learn language but the language always refers to moving objects around and putting them in specific places. If there was a dolphin that was capable of having a conversation about art, philosophy, music, physics, mathematics or even Big Brother, that would be a sign of intelligence. But there isn't. Thinking involves being able to create new and better ideas. There is no reason to think that dolphins learn, in the human sense of the word, any more than a word processor learns science when a scientist types a paper which it then reformats and prints out. Dolphins are just slotting parameters, provided by humans, into a program hardwired into the dolphin brain by evolution. The only creativity involved is that provided by the gullible humans who interpret the resulting behaviour.

Thu, 06/12/2003 - 07:56 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

I have to disagree strongly w...

I have to disagree strongly with this ignorant post. You would never say that if you had a dog. I know for a fact that my dog understands me and can communicate with me. A lot more than some humans I could name.

Sorry if this is a repeat. I tried posting this before but it hasn't shown up.

by Sylvia Crombie on Thu, 06/12/2003 - 08:44 | reply

d00d fribees pwn

I consider "But dolphins are dimwits, their immense intellectual achievements in the field of putting frisbees into baskets notwithstanding." an unfair attack on the value of frisbees.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://curi.blogspot.com/>

by Elliot Temple on Thu, 06/12/2003 - 08:55 | reply

Not just dogs, warcraft III too

I (also) have to disagree with this ignorant post. You would never say that if you had warcraft III. I know for a fact that warcraft understands me and can communicate with me. A lot more than some humans I could name.

And unlike some people, I'm going to back this up!

Warcraft understands when I communicate with it: all my troops go just where I tell them. And it responds too. Every unit will acknowledge me when I address it, and warcraft announces various things that it thinks I might be interested in without prompting.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://curi.blogspot.com/>

by Elliot Temple on Thu, 06/12/2003 - 09:52 | reply

heh...

Very funny, Elloit. So, like in Starcraft, is the sexy medic hitting on me when I click on her a lot? I hope so! That would make my evenings at home less boring knowing that a program has learned to flirt with me.

Suck that dolphins!

Kevin D.

by a reader on Thu, 06/12/2003 - 10:10 | reply

heh...

Kevin D:

The thing is, Elliot isn't just being funny. He's implicitly giving an argument in support of The World's post. Namely: what evidence does anyone have about dolphins or dogs being capable of having deep thoughts, that Elliot doesn't also have, in spades, about his Warcraft program?

by David Deutsch on Thu, 06/12/2003 - 13:40 | reply

anthropomorphising the relatives

Anyone got any ideas about why humans go all anthropomorphic about mammals? And why it's mostly mammals rather than other kinds of living creatures that get the oohs and aahs?

Did it originate with hunter-gatherer man teaming up with dog-ancestors? Or was it linked with the domestication of cows, sheep, goats, pigs, camels, llamas, whatever? And why on earth do we go gooey over cats - for their rat-catching abilities?

If I'd read Guns, Germs and Steel I might know the answer to this. sigh

I suppose if one spends a lifetime giving soft voiceovers in an anthropomorphic fashion, some of it will eventually rub off.

by emma on Thu, 06/12/2003 - 15:33 | reply

Um

I don't know whether animals have "deep thoughts" or not, because I have no idea what you all mean by "deep thoughts".

Any clarification, at all, please?

Thanks,

Alice

http://libertarian_parent_in_the_countryside.blogspot.com/

Oh... darn...

I thought he was being sarcastic. Oh. Well, if your right I see what your saying.

Personally I feel it's all boiled down to a series of programmed responses. (Warcraft included.) How are dolphins trained to do those neat tricks with the frisbee? Their actions are reinforced with food. They're doing the trick because they've been programmed to "think" that "if I do this, I'll get that". That's why the programming needs to be reinforced from time to time. Even after the training is completed they'll still get that fish every once in awhile to make sure the behaviour is repeated. Same with house pets. You train an animal using food.

But that isn't to say that animals are robots. No, they possess emotions as well. Nowhere near as complex as human emotion but the basics are there and they sense changes. Tells your dog he's an idiot in a sweet tone and he'll wag his tail 'till the cows come home. Too often humans want to inflect human traits and characteristics upon animals to somehow make them more "human" than they are. Like Sigmund Freud said, "Sometimes a cigar is just a cigar."

I'll give you what I feel is a fine example of how different humans and the rest of nature really is. Humans produce no good for nature. Our very existance is a strain upon the natural system. Remove humanity from the world equation and nature would find it's perfect balance forever. Yet, humans are supposively a product of nature. Why would nature produce a creature who provided no value to it's system? It's like we were created to exist outside and above the natural system. I wonder why this is...

Shallow Thoughts

Alice wrote:

"I don't know whether animals have "deep thoughts" or not, because I have no idea what you all mean by "deep thoughts"."

Thinking = ability to create new ideas, deep thinking = ability to create deep new ideas, i.e. - ideas that explain a lot. Dolphins, and all other non-human animals that we know of do not exhibit this ability, they're stupid.

emma wrote:

"Anyone got any ideas about why humans go all anthropomorphic about mammals? And why it's mostly mammals rather than other kinds of living creatures that get the oohs and aahs?"

Basically anthropomorphisers think, "It looks a bit like me, it exhibits complex behaviour, therefore it's smart."

and emma also wrote:

"If I'd read Guns, Germs and Steel I might know the answer to this."

You'd probably be better off with a book by Thomas Sowell if you want to actually understand the kinds of things Jared Diamond writes about in that book.

by Alan Forrester on Thu, 06/12/2003 - 16:38 | reply

relative intelligence

It's a good topic of conversation, and a controversy that we're not going to settle here.

Yeah, the anthropomorphic fallacy is present in spades here. But rejecting the idea out of hand doesn't help much either.

Personally, I think the jury is still out on this one. If dolphins are intelligent by our standards (e.g. can communicate meaningfully in ways that are not hard-wired, can come up with brand-new ideas and teach them to others, and so on) -- well, it may take us a while to prove it. DISproving their intelligence would be a lot harder to do convincingly.

There's a psychological desire, in some people, to project our 'selves' onto others, as inappropriate as it may seem to others. There's also an equally irrational desire, in some people, to assume without question that no one can measure up to ourselves. I don't think either viewpoint does anyone justice.

Try this as a thought experiment -- you're an intelligent dolphin. Say you're as bright as a human five-year-old, although naturally you don't have anything like a human five-year-old's upbringing. Say that you've discovered, more or less to your surprise, that HUMANS are intelligent, and you're interested in showing them that you are, too. How would you go about it? Remember that what looks like intelligent behavior to YOU might not look that way to others. (An intelligent dolphin, for example, might never get around to the idea of writing.)

If you think that demonstrating your human-five-year-old-equivalent intelligence would be easy, how about if you were as intelligent as a dog? How about as intelligent as a cat? (Do cats and dogs have roughly equal intelligence? If you think they do, how do you know?)

For better or for worse, we humans only know about gauging intelligence with those who think the way we do. (We're not even all that good at THAT; listen to a debate at the UN sometime.) Gauging the intelligence of a species that doesn't have much of ANYTHING in common with us -- well, I won't say it can't be done. But I wouldn't dismiss it casually either.

cheers,

Daniel

by Daniel in Medford on Thu, 06/12/2003 - 16:47 | reply

Mammals

It makes perfect sense to me to surmise that animals that are closest to us biologically probably share many of our cognitive experiences also. That the internal experience of a chimpanzee or a dog has a lot in common with that of a human is difficult to prove, but to assume that it doesn't is to place the burden of proof on the wrong side (it defies common sense).

Indeed, to take an extreme case, to assume that there was some kind of absolute qualitative distinction between the mind of the last ape and that of the first human smacks of superstition.

Of course, only an idiot would suggest that dolphins are "deep" thinkers in comparison with the average human. The dolphins have done nothing to suggest that they are capable of anything of the sort. But we should not take intelligence as the sole or even the main criterion for valuing life. There are humans (e.g. Stalin) who are very highly intelligent but whose contribution to the world has been a hefty minus. I think a kind-but-stupid person is more valuable than a cruel-but-intelligent one.

We should value higher animals as sentient beings.

by a reader on Thu, 06/12/2003 - 16:49 | reply

Dogs Are Idiots

Sylvia Crombie wrote:

"I have to disagree strongly with this ignorant post. You would never say that if you had a dog. I know for a fact that my dog understands me and can communicate with me. A lot more than some humans I could name."

I can't help but be reminded of an episode of The Simpsons where Mr Burns and Smithers are talking about dogs.

Mr Burns: Dogs are idiots. Think about it, if I came along and started slobbering on your crotch what would you think?

Smithers: If you did it sir?

by Alan Forrester on Thu, 06/12/2003 - 16:53 | reply

Shark dies after naked tank prank

http://news.bbc.co.uk/2/hi/england/southern_counties/2984936.stm

by Tom Robinson on Thu, 06/12/2003 - 18:49 | reply

thinking etc

"deep thinking = ability to create deep new ideas"

So, potential to think = thinking?

Confused.

Alice

by a reader on Thu, 06/12/2003 - 21:50 | reply

Anyone know if dolphins taste good?

A) David was right about what I meant

B) we aren't looking to prove animals aren't intelligent, but rather seeking the best explanation. proof is impossible.

C) when we say "animals aren't intelligent" we mean intelligence in the boolean sense. it's not matter of degree, an entity simply is or isn't. either it can learn, or it cannot. there is no inbetween.

D) the idea of "5 year old intelligence" is extremely disturbing. your average 5yo may not have a lot of knowledge but that's it.

E) Does anyone really think the only thing stopping dolphins building houses is they didn't get hands?

-- Elliot Temple

<http://curi.blogspot.com/>

by Elliot Temple on Thu, 06/12/2003 - 22:25 | reply

Takes a big man to call a dolphin a nitwit.

For someone who cites zoology textbooks, you certainly don't seem to have read many of them.

Behaviors such as mimicry, group hunting techniques, playing, and problem solving don't necessarily constitute deep thinking, it's true. But they do lead to it in many cases. They are precisely the behaviors that every human being first demonstrates when attempting to socialize and communicate.

Babies learn how to talk by mimicking. Does that make them stupid? Does the fact that they eventually learn to say certain things to achieve desirable results mean that they're just little survival machines? No. That's how it's supposed to work! Mimicry is the preamble to communication, and communication begins with reinforcement. We all learn different languages the same way, by first taking in lists of words for simple things that we want or need. (My Spanish is weak, but I still remember how to ask where the bathroom is... I'm a nitwit en Espanol.)

That is why we anthropomorphize machines and animals that demonstrate those kind of behaviors... because those behaviors are instinctive to humans who are trying to learn, and instinctively recognizable to other humans who are evolved to help them.

As far as putting frisbees in baskets goes, basic human IQ tests still use simple problems and analogies (because most abstract thought and "deep thinking" is too subjective to measure). You could say that college level engineers learn calculus in order to obtain material benefits later, on the same level that a pigeon learns to peck a certain button to get a drug. (I wouldn't recommend it though, because I'm sure most of them feel they're thinking pretty deeply most of the time.) It almost sounds as if you are saying that solving problems in order to get food relegates a creature to substandard intelligence. The opposite is true.

It's no coincidence that predators are the most "intelligent" animals there are. The evolution of group hunting behavior, to which you refer so slightly, is the prime suspect for the birth of our own big brains. Let's face it, we can eat almost any other animal there is... not because we're big or strong, but because we're smart enough to use many different hunting methods. "Thinking deep thoughts" may just be a side effect of this kind of mental activity, or it may be something specific to our makeup and circumstances. Regardless, the biological correlation between predation and brain complexity isn't in dispute. It's a pretty basic fact. That's why Attenborough is calling attention to the hunting behavior; not because he's so astounded that dolphins figured out how to hunt fish (golly gee), but because group hunting behavior is a prime indicator for a more evolved intelligence. Group hunters form communities; then you get social structures, communication, relationships, all sorts of nice brainfood.

And since it often seems that we're smarter than we really need to be (do we really need as much language as we've got?), it's a decent hypothesis that other creatures with high levels of hunting skills may have high levels of the other mental "tricks".

The claim that "dolphins are stupid" is completely irrelevant to the whole purpose of Attenborough's show. He's not studying dolphins in the desperate hopes that one of them will someday be able to give him financial advice. I doubt he's got high aspirations of dolphin art. He's doing this because learning about the intelligence of another species is extremely useful. We know so little about our own intelligence that any chance to study a contrast in behavior shouldn't be passed up. Dolphins in particular provide a handy test subject because their intelligence shows so many similarities to our own; we're not working from something so alien that we have no way to observe or quantify.

With regards to the article: I was very impressed by the fact that they can understand pointing. That means they can read semi-abstract human body language, expressed through fingers... pretty impressive for an animal who spends its entire life around things with fins. I don't doubt that given time and research, we'll be able to communicate with dolphins better than we do now. And I hope we don't neglect killer whales, either... who are possibly even more intelligent.

AND anuddah ting!

this is simply the dolphin using a program in its brain that evolved so that dolphins could send a fixed repertoire of signals under predetermined conditions.

This is known in scientific circles as communicating. (The program in its brain is known as thought.)

by a reader on Thu, 06/12/2003 - 22:58 | reply

ho hum

By your (author of "AND anuddah ting!") definitions, computer programs think.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://curi.blogspot.com/>

by Elliot Temple on Thu, 06/12/2003 - 23:10 | reply

A phenomenon that cannot be defined is not nonexistent thereby.

I second "a reader"'s comments. Some of this thread strikes me as labouring something fairly obvious. It may be intensely difficult (and interesting) to define what makes us think some behaviour is at a particular point on the intelligence spectrum, but it's not that hard to just observe.

Here's an approximate order:

People
Dogs monkeys dolphins cats cows mice spiders ants viruses

We can argue till the viruses come home about the exact order, but no one's going to deny that it's something like that. (Except you, Mr Temple, though I suspect you are only playing.)

It is an interesting question where computer programmes would come in the hierarchy. Personally I'd say about at the level of spiders. It's also an interesting question, though not one I would raise in company where it would be likely to give offence, to ask where people at different levels of mental impairment would come.

by a reader on Fri, 06/13/2003 - 16:08 | reply

Not a matter of degree

Sombody wrote:

"It may be intensely difficult (and interesting) to define what makes us think some behaviour is at a particular point on the intelligence spectrum, but it's not that hard to just observe...

"We can argue till the viruses come home about the exact order, but no one's going to deny that it's something like that."

Thinking = ability to generate entirely new memes (as humans do), not following a programme in the brain predetermined by biology (as all known non-human animals do).

Your statement above is approximately as ridiculous as this statement: "It may be intensely difficult (and interesting) to define what makes us think that some object is able to evolve by natural selection but it's just not that hard to observe, here's an approximate order:

rocks
chairs
galaxies viruses bacteria starfish wolves"

It is NOT the case that the difference between these different objects is a matter of the degree to which they are able to evolve by natural selection, it is simply the case that some can and some can't and that's all there is to it.

It is not the case that dolphins (or any other animal) are able to create entirely new memes to some degree they cannot generate new memes beyond the programme in their brain AT ALL.

by Alan Forrester on Fri, 06/13/2003 - 17:19 | reply

Culture threshold?

I don't think we're going to resolve all this until we've got some really good passive scanning technology and a heck of a lot of computing power. (Anybody know how SQUID magnetometers are coming along?) Then we can look inside active brains at all the stages of an organism's development and try to analyse computationally what's going on (assuming Roger Penrose is wrong about quantum stuff going on in microtubules).

The World's position is testable when it comes to humans, where it attributes all human behaviour to wholly culturally-received and self-generated knowledge. This is great, it sticks its neck out (but see my final paragraph below). Its position wrt dolphins, that however complicated their performance, it's all just parameters fed into a genetically pre-determined program, seems too dismissive. Why can't sets of parameters be regarded as primitive memes? After all, dolphins presumably can copy one another. One example from the show which grabbed me was when a dolphin was given the impossible task of fetching some object from the floating basket that wasn't actually in there (perhaps it was the frisbee). Rather than just exploding, it helpfully(?) brought up the empty basket for inspection and nudged the 'no' button. This could be seen as a primitive kind of grammar, because the putative meaning ("what frisbee, dumbass") was independent of the expressive elements. I propose that we selectively breed dolphins for such "grammatical" intelligence for two hundred generations. If they cross a language threshold, using their sonic clicks as voices, then they may develop a simple culture. Consequently, if we turned them loose, there might then be selection pressure on their genes to provide some more brainspace. After another 10,000 generations, who knows? My guess is that intelligence is not all or nothing, but just a constant succession of overrides, which roughly speaking get less and less hardware dependent. If there is a boolean, it's the language threshold, because with a culture you don't have to start overriding from scratch. I don't see a fundamental difference between simple memes overriding genes and new meme's overriding old meme's.

When I sprain my ankle and my genes cause so much painful swelling that I choose not to run up the stairs, how is that not an example of genetic influence? OK, if my grandpa's in the attic and he's having a heart attack then I might choose to run up anyway, but the pain is still weighed up before I make the choice.

by Tom Robinson on Fri, 06/13/2003 - 20:43 | reply

Boolean

A Reader, (wanna give yourself numbers or something guys?)

"We can argue till the viruses come home about the exact order, but no one's going to deny that it's something like that. (Except you, Mr Temple, though I suspect you are only playing.)"

Although my style may be playful at times, I assure you my position is dead serious. stares menacingly

Tom,

"When I sprain my ankle and my genes cause so much painful swelling that I choose not to run up the stairs, how is that not an example of genetic influence?"

That's like saying genes encourage typing by giving us fingers. We don't deny genes can indirectly effect behavior in that manner.

Anyway, our best theories of intelligence say we have a conjecture machine in our brains, and a refutation/criticism machine too. Having those, or not, is boolean. Our best theories of dolphin brains say they have various hardwired behaviors just like a Warcraft III program (various units even carry out coordinated tasks, and if the code is object oriented, then we could say the various units communicate with each other to carry out complex, coordinated battle manoeuvres... or in other words we could say Warcraft III units have language as much as dolphins.)

-- Elliot Temple

<http://curi.blogspot.com/>

by Elliot Temple on Fri, 06/13/2003 - 21:35 | reply

Re: Culture Threshold

The World's position ... attributes all human behaviour to wholly culturally-received and self-generated knowledge

I'd rather say: all differences in behaviour between humans. Also, "behaviour" here doesn't mean a particular set of muscle movements like running up stairs. It means a particular set of ways (rules, algorithms) of responding, with muscle movements etc, to given situations, where the 'situations' can include states of one's own body like swollen ankles.

by David Deutsch on Fri, 06/13/2003 - 21:37 | reply

Names!

Elliot suggested:

A Reader, (wanna give yourself numbers or something guys?)

How about names instead? If you want to remain anonymous, you could just choose a different name. Like I have on this comment:

Bettina Fotherington

by Sarah Fitz-Claridge on Sat, 06/14/2003 - 08:36 | reply

Jordan

Well I completely disagree like many others with this piece. I am known for my opinionative view, and in this (rare) case I am on the opposing team. Dolphins are obviously able to at least understand humans, or at least the ones in the show, as they did exactly what the instructors asked. But then again this just might be some circus act you say, well if it was then why would dolphins act in intelligence over instinct in the wild? Just a few things to consider.

by a reader on Thu, 06/17/2004 - 09:36 | reply

READ THIS! Dr. Cassandra Everthorn

My research has lead me to beleive that idoits who spend all day writing an opionative pieces of writing are actually are just unable to accept the possiblity that someone might actually know something more than them and that maybe what they are saying is right. Well to all the idoits who actually go through all of this misinterpreted and annoying replies, get out there and do something. Exercise! Who knows maybe you could quit smoking and have a new positive view on life! So stop reading this crap and get out there.

by a reader on Thu, 06/17/2004 - 10:16 | reply

animals do have feelings

ok first of all if you think your going to tell my dog he's an idiot get ready to get bit or braked at cause it seems my animals does have feeling and of coures everyone has they own opinon but if you really pay attintion to animals you'll noticed to some are brought up to be like humans and like cats getting there nails clipped ok thats like us getting a leg cut of we have to get use to it you know what im saying but the deep thought's thing i dont know about but animals are in a way like humans so if anyone has a commet do email me and we shall chat but for now tata

by a reader on Wed, 04/20/2005 - 19:15 | reply

Some have probably got better

Some have probably got better English than you as well.

by a reader on Thu, 04/21/2005 - 16:02 | reply

Re: Some have probably got better English

There is a relevant "classic" cartoon -- hey, it's from July 1993, before September -- by Peter Steiner in the New Yorker. It is widely reproduced; copies that look like they might stick around for a while are here, here, and here, and can probably always be found here.

by Kevin on Thu, 04/21/2005 - 20:14 | reply

On Loyalty

1: True Allies, True Loyalty

2: Who? Whom?

3: The Individual and the Nation

Thu, 06/12/2003 - 09:12 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

7. Settlements

This is the seventh part of our acclaimed series, "A Short History of Israel". If you wish to read the preceding parts, see the Table of Contents for links to them. We welcome comments and criticisms. Do tell us what you think.

.....

Given that there was to be no land-for-peace deal in the immediate future, Israel faced the problem of what to do with that land, which had 1.2 million Arab inhabitants. A small minority of Jewish Israelis favoured returning it unconditionally to Jordan and Egypt, mainly on the grounds that anything less would cast Israel in the role of occupier and create increasing resentment among the population. Another small minority wanted Israel to annexe the captured territory. The great majority opposed both these ideas, because both of them would destroy the possibility of any future land-for-peace deal. Also, returning unconditionally to the situation that had just ended in a war seemed perverse and irresponsible, and in the meantime the territories constituted a much-needed buffer against attack. The closest Jordanian soldier or artillery piece was now separated from Tel Aviv by 40 miles, plus the River Jordan, as opposed to 12 before. The Egyptian army, which had been an hour's drive from Tel Aviv and within artillery range of Ashdod and Ashkelon, was now 200 miles away and across the Suez Canal. With the Syrian guns silenced, children and teenagers in Northern Israel who had seldom in their lives slept above ground, could now do so safely. This normalisation highlighted the blighted lifestyles that Israelis within range of those guns had been leading, and made returning the Golan Heights to the Syrian army unthinkable to many. And with Sharm-el-Sheikh in Israeli hands, the blockade of Eilat was lifted, and Israelis were in no mood to trust international promises on that issue again – indeed, none were offered this time.

The Jerusalem issue was especially uncontroversial among Jewish Israelis. Israel annexed East Jerusalem, reuniting the city. Arabs living there were given the option of becoming Israeli citizens or retaining their Jordanian nationality with a right of residence in Israel. Jewish sightseers and worshippers were able to visit the Old City for the first time in 19 years. The Jewish holy places had been desecrated and allowed to fall into disrepair. Work began on restoring them and the Jewish Quarter.

A military government was instituted in the West Bank and Gaza, with orders to prevent violence but otherwise to interfere as little as possible in the lives of the residents. Residents were allowed to trade freely with Arab countries, and to visit them. They were also allowed to trade with, and seek jobs in, Israel, and many did so. Tens of thousands of Palestinian Arabs were allowed to return from Jordan to the West Bank, where businesses flourished under the influx of Israeli and foreign tourists. Arabs from the West Bank and Gaza became a common sight relaxing on Israeli beaches. The Palestinian Arab press became the freest in the Arab world, and institutions such as human-rights organisations and a competent civil service gradually developed.

One of the most controversial and complex issues raised by Israel's capture of the West Bank and Gaza was whether Jews should be allowed to live there, and if so, under what conditions. The Israeli government's initial attitude was to ban Jews altogether, except for day visits. However, within months, public opinion had forced them to make some exceptions. To the Jews of Hebron, for instance, the period between 1936 (when the last Jews had been forced to leave the city) and 1967 was no more than a brief interlude, of a familiar type, in their long history. Jews had lived near the holy sites in Hebron, and been expelled, and had returned, many times over the millennia. That some religious Jews wanted to live there again had nothing to do with Israel or Zionism. Indeed, the community massacred in 1929 had been largely anti-Zionist. But the prospect of the Israeli government joining the long list of rulers of Hebron who had attempted to keep the city forcibly Jew-free, was too much for the Israeli public to bear. So when a group of religious Jews, including some children of those who had been murdered in 1929, pretended to be Swedish tourists and checked in to a hotel in the centre of Hebron, and then refused to return to Israel, the Israeli government eventually relented and let them stay, on condition that they not live within the city, but build new houses on the outskirts, a short distance from the main Jewish holy site. These became Kiryat Arba, the first of what have come to be known as 'Jewish settlements'.

In the great majority of the settlements, the inhabitants have always gone to some lengths to be good neighbours to the local Arab communities, trading with them, employing them, providing services such as health care, and trying to maintain good relations even when this is not reciprocated and even when terrorist murders occur. But the Jews of Hebron have a programme of gradually re-taking possession of the ancient Jewish Quarter (most of which was razed and desecrated under the Jordanian occupation) from the existing occupants whom they regard as squatters. They have sometimes used intimidation and assault – not only against Arabs but also against Israeli police – to achieve this. Today, tension between the 6,000 Jews and the 150,000 Arabs of Hebron runs very high. There are frequent murders, mostly in the form of terrorist attacks on Jews, but in 1994 a Kiryat Arba doctor opened fire in a mosque in Hebron, murdering 29 Arabs before being killed himself.

An example of a very different type of settlement is Gush Etzion.

Established in 1970, it is built on land at the southern approaches to Jerusalem, which had been purchased by the Jewish Agency in the early days of the Mandate. It had first been a collective farm, which was abandoned during the riots of 1929. An attempt to re-settle it was cut short by the riots of 1936. In 1943, four villages were built there. Orchards were planted and the villages prospered. Five years later, just before the declaration of the State of Israel, Gush Etzion was attacked by the Jordanian Army and Arab irregulars, heading for Jerusalem. It was besieged, and the defenders radioed for reinforcements. The Haganah could spare only 35 men, but they were ambushed on the way there and all were killed. Further attempts to lift the siege failed too. This became one of the epic sieges of the War of Independence, with the defenders isolated for many months, beating off attack after attack but suffering terrible casualties. Finally, with Jordanian armoured vehicles inside the defences, the surviving defenders surrendered. At one of the villages, Kfar Etzion, there were only fifteen of them left. They were asked to stand in a row for a photograph and were murdered by machine gun fire. Some of the surviving civilians, including an Arab family who were friends of the Kfar Etzion people and had taken shelter there, were then murdered too, and the remainder were taken to captivity in Jordan together with the other Gush Etzion survivors. Despite its outcome, the battle is considered by Zionists to be a key event in their history, epitomising the permanent commitment of Jews to their land. Ben Gurion said: "I can think of no battle in the annals of the Israel Defense Forces which was more magnificent, more tragic or more heroic than the struggle for Gush Etzion ... If there exists a Jewish Jerusalem, our foremost thanks go to the defenders of Gush Etzion".

After the War of Independence, the Jordanians destroyed all trace of Gush Etzion, uprooting the orchards, razing the villages and building an army base there. They also built a refugee camp for Palestinian Arabs. This must have seemed appropriate to them – billeting expelled Arabs on the property of expelled Jews – as, indeed, the mirror-image of that policy seemed appropriate to the Israeli authorities during the same period: many Jewish refugees were billeted in former Arab homes. However, in other respects the two sides' policies were not symmetrical. Israel was, and had been throughout, seeking a negotiated solution to the issue of refugees, and other issues, based on partition, while the Arab countries were still rejecting both partition and negotiation on principle. Also, as Golda Meir, who had been Foreign Minister during Israel's brief occupation of Gaza in 1956, recalled:

Then I toured the Gaza Strip, from which the fedayeen had gone out on their murderous assignments for so many months and in which the Egyptians had kept a quarter of a million men, women and children (of whom nearly 60 percent were Arab refugees) in the most shameful poverty and destitution.

I was appalled by what I saw there and by the fact that these miserable people had been maintained in such a degrading condition for over eight years only so that the Arab leaders could show the refugee camps to visitors and make political capital out of them ...

I couldn't help comparing what I saw in the Gaza Strip to what we had done – even with all the mistakes we had made – for the Jews who had come to Israel in those same eight years.

When the survivors of Gush Etzion were released in 1950 and arrived in Israel, they were not confined to camps.

After the Six Day War, a group including some of the children of the original inhabitants of Kfar Etzion petitioned the Israeli government to be allowed to return to the village and rebuild it. The petition was granted.

During the following few years the escalating attacks on Israel (see Part 3), the continuing insistence of Arab governments on withdrawal without peace, and the consequent total lack of progress towards either peace or withdrawal, caused Israelis and Israeli political parties to re-think their policies on the West Bank, Gaza and the Golan Heights, and in particular on Jewish settlement there. For a period of at least a decade, all the major political groupings came to approve of some further Jewish settlement. Their positions were roughly as follows:

- So long as a negotiated peace was not on offer, Labour Party supporters and their allies wanted to impose viable and defensible borders unilaterally, as far as this was possible. To this end, they supported the building of new settlements close to the 1948 cease-fire line, in areas that they expected to be recognised as part of Israel in a future peace treaty. They also supported the establishment of settlements that could serve as military outposts in the Jordan valley, and some settlements in Sinai. They also sought to demonstrate, in this way, that the Arab governments' policy of relentless war would have long-term costs in addition to the short-term ones that the IDF was inflicting.
- Likud supporters were not expecting the Arab countries' implacable stance to change in the foreseeable future, regardless of what Israel did. They reasserted the Revised Zionist position that the whole of Palestine should become Israel, and that Jews should be free to purchase land anywhere. In addition, when in power, they favoured financial support for settlements. Few, however, advocated annexation of the West Bank and Gaza for the foreseeable future.
- Religious Jews underwent a fundamental reversal of attitude. They increasingly took the view that Jews had a religious duty to inhabit all sites of historical or religious Jewish significance in Palestine, and a right to be protected there by the IDF. Many of these sites were in or near Arab population centres.

No significant faction, in any of these groupings, advocated the confiscation of land or property belonging to individual Arabs. Nor was any such policy ever implemented, though it is alleged that Israeli adjudicators often made unjust decisions when determining the ownership of unoccupied land, and that some Arab absentee landowners were prevented by bureaucratic means from claiming compensation for land seized for security purposes.

Within months of the end of the Six Day War, Israel was again under attack.

Part 8: The Yom Kippur War

Thu, 06/12/2003 - 17:39 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Part 7: Settlements

Very well written!

by Daniel in Medford on Thu, 06/12/2003 - 21:42 | reply

The Fourth Geneva Convention

Ever heard of it?

by a reader on Thu, 08/07/2003 - 18:26 | reply

Re: The Fourth Geneva Convention

International law being as vague as it is, and given the nature and political agendas of the UN and other elements of the international-law culture, it is perhaps not surprising that international conventions are routinely interpreted as de-legitimising Israel and justifying violence against Jews.

If there were indeed an international Convention establishing an absolute right to keep a territory Jew-free, so that systematically expelling Jews from their homes throughout any given territory would be an act of philanthropy meriting the Nobel Peace Prize, while any Jew returning to his home there, or buying a new home from a willing seller, would be committing a war crime that merits his being summarily shot or blown to pieces, then that Convention would be evil, would it not? But as it happens, contrary to what 'a reader' evidently thinks, there is no such Convention. We largely agree with the Israeli government's interpretation here, that Israel's 'settlements' policy over the years has not violated the Fourth Geneva Convention or any other provision of international law. In particular, we agree that:

- The provisions of the Geneva Convention regarding forced population transfer to occupied sovereign territory cannot be viewed as prohibiting the voluntary return of individuals to the towns and villages from which they, or their ancestors, had been ousted. Nor does it prohibit the movement of individuals to land which was not under the legitimate sovereignty of any state and which is not subject to private ownership. In this regard, Israeli settlements have been established only after an exhaustive investigation process, under the supervision of the communities are established on private Arab land.

Supreme Court of Israel, designed to ensure that no

- It should be emphasised that the movement of individuals to the territory is entirely voluntary, while the settlements themselves are not intended to displace Arab inhabitants, nor do they do so in practice.

We do admit, however, that the very existence of Israel violates various Declarations and Resolutions of international bodies, such as the UN General Assembly Resolution 3379 (since reluctantly reversed) that "Zionism is Racism". However, those Resolutions are evil too, and do not have the force of international law.

by Editor on Thu, 08/07/2003 - 19:38 | reply

(I also posted the "FGC" comment)

I've only skimmed over your writings here, but I have to say that I think they're awful.

The position you seem to be in is one of wanting to do some objective inquiry, but not to the extent that it might threaten that you accept the Israeli/Zionist position in most regards to begin with. Maybe I'm wrong, but that's what I see.

I see this because, even in my limited perusal, I can see what another commentator has noted: that you give reasons and excuses for Israeli misdeeds, but leave Palestinian and Arab misdeeds as being just naked, evil undertakings. One need only to look at your comments on the Irgun being a terrorist organization to see this -- I think you begin by essentially saying "Yes, Irgun was a terrorist organization, but it was also much more than that, unlike Palestinian terrorist organizations like the PLO, Islamic Jihad, and Hamas." It would not take any real research, Editor, but only a consistent reading of a decent newspaper for you to realize that Hamas, in particular, sponsors hospitals and schools more than it sponsors terror. If the Irgun ever sponsored a school, it was probably only a school for assassins.

I see your bias also in your omissions. Did you think it was responsible of you to have written about "Settlements" without once mentioning the Fourth Geneva Convention, regardless of your personal opinion on it? Does it count for nothing that the United States -- Israel's monolithic ally -- believes that the FGC does apply in the Occupied Territories? And your explanation of your position on the FGC is weak -- in fact, Israel holds that the FGC does not apply to the OT because the FGC applies only to the territories of signatory states, and the OT never rightfully belonged to a signatory state. In essence, this is a position that holds that there are no rights until states create them -- not a very American position, to say the least.

(As an aside, your bias is extremely evident in your extrapolation from my eight words your remarkable diatribe about how I "evidently think" that there is a convention promoting the ethnic cleansing of Jews. Even for the internet, your comments are incredibly low-brow. I might also note that the resolution that created Israel was a General Assembly resolution [186], which did not have the force of international law. Whether or not it was evil is arguable.)

I see your bias also in your mischaracterizations. I note that someone else has beaten me to pointing out problems with your comments on "Arab immigration" in the Mandate period, but let me highlight one thing. You wrote, "The number of Arab immigrants to Palestine during the Mandate period is unknown and highly controversial, but the net increase in the Arab Palestinian population was about twice the net increase in the Jewish Palestinian population." (Should you have credited Joan Peters is some of your statistics??) Well, given that the Arab population was about eight times the Jewish population at the beginning of the period, we can expect that equal levels of natural growth would make the net increase in the Arab Palestinian population EIGHT TIMES the net increase in the Jewish Palestinian population, so that it was "about twice" that amount is remarkable in that the ratio is SO LOW. But of course your insinuation is something else entirely.

Again, I have only skimmed your report -- what I have seen leads me to believe there is no value to me in looking any further at it. I think you are ultimately embarrassing yourself in presenting this as anything other than a Israel-biased account of the situation. I would hope that you would just take it down -- it's that bad. Maybe you could try to take a fresh look at the situation, but I think you really need to take a fresh look at yourself and try to figure out exactly where you're coming from on this issue, and what baggage you might be bringing to it -- frankly, you are bringing an awful lot. Sorry.

(The most objective general history of the Israel-Palestine situation that I have found, in case anyone is reading, is "Righteous Victims" by Benny Morris. Morris is probably the foremost of the "New Historians," and, while he is a pretty staunch Zionist, he is also [and probably moreso] a committed historian.

Anyone who wants to write their own comments on the situation for the consumption of others should also look to the UNISPAL documents that are available on the internet. These are hardly all-encompassing, but they at least give a reasonably objective accounting of certain aspects of the history from the Mandate period and all the UN activities.)

by a reader on Fri, 08/08/2003 - 16:02 | reply

Speaking of Tendentious Propagandistic Bias

A reader wrote

'Should you have credited Joan Peters is some of your statistics??'

The statistics were not from Joan Peters, they were from an article that admits her book has rather more polemics than it does common sense, although she happens to have found a good argument about that one issue.

'The most objective general history of the Israel-Palestine situation that I have found, in case anyone is reading, is "Righteous Victims" by Benny Morris. Morris is probably the foremost of the "New Historians," and, while he is a pretty staunch Zionist, he is also [and probably moreso] a committed historian.'

Morris is a liar. Read Fabricating Israeli History by Efraim Karsh for his persistent, flagrant disregard for truth. This includes entirely deliberate misquotation of David Ben-Gurion with the sole purpose of utterly inverting the meaning of his words. He is rank charlatan, not an historian.

by Alan Forrester on Fri, 10/17/2003 - 20:50 | reply

Setting The World To Rights

Ideas have consequences.

home | archives | polls | search

Settlements

The seventh part of our much acclaimed series, A Short History of Israel, is now up. If you want to read the series from the beginning, start here.

Thu, 06/12/2003 - 17:54 | permalink

Copyright © 2005 Setting The World To Rights

A Nuclear-Powered Spaceship!

At last, reason has found a way past the objections of the Environmental religion.

An ambitious and controversial mission to explore the other planets of the solar system using nuclear-powered spacecraft has come a step closer after Nasa gave a giant aerospace company the go-ahead to develop revolutionary new engines.

The aim is to build an interplanetary space probe powerful enough to fly vast distances and still to have enough power to collect scientific information and send it back to Earth.

Hurray!

Sat, 06/14/2003 - 02:48 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

FLASH: Several Physical Laws Yet To Be Repealed By Congress!

Nuclear power could indeed be used to provide the energy a spacecraft's propulsion requires, but there's another gotcha that the power of the atom cannot address, and which is perhaps the strongest reason for which chemical rockets have dominated space travel so far: conservation of momentum, a.k.a. Newton's Third Law. Until we learn how to finesse that law -- and I doubt we will -- a self-propelled spacecraft will need to eject reaction mass behind it to accelerate. A nuclear reactor doesn't naturally meet that need, whereas a chemical rocket propellant does.

This one is going to take some really hard thought.

Curmudgeon Emeritus, Palace Of Reason

by fporretto on Sat, 06/14/2003 - 11:16 | reply

Reaction mass isn't a 'gotcha'

I think there are straightforward ways of solving this problem. (At least, straightforward from the physics point of view.) Basically, to economise on reaction mass you have to use more reaction velocity. The exhaust of chemical rockets travels at a few hundred metres per second relative to the rocket. For ion rockets it could in principle go up to a reasonable fraction of the speed of light. So I guess the new engine will be an ion rocket powered by a nuclear reactor.

by David Deutsch on Sat, 06/14/2003 - 13:51 | reply

Deep Space One

Nasa's Deep space one probe tested electrically driven Ion Propulsion. This system could provide much of the transit thrust, but would probably still need to be augmented with a chemical system.

The reactor proposal is exciting because it will provide the scientists with a great deal more power to drive a more complex and detailed set of experiments than could be performed with a solar powered craft.

by mailleta on Sat, 06/14/2003 - 13:51 | reply

New type of rocket

This new type of rocket could do the biz!

<http://dma.ing.uniroma1.it/users/bruno/Petro.prn.pdf>

It combines aspects of chemical rockets and ion drives.

Chemical rockets are limited because

- (a) there's only so much chemical energy in the fuel, and
- (b) if the exhaust gets too hot the nozzle starts to melt, which limits thermodynamic efficiency

OTOH ion drives are efficient but the thrust has hitherto been poor.

The new plasma rocket would use microwaves to heat the propellant to a scorching plasma, with a nozzle shaped out of a magnetic field.

It's not been tested yet but the plasma confinement bit should be helped by all that expensive fusion research that's been done in the past 50 years.

It probably needs bags of electricity to run, so great news about getting a fission reactor past the ecopuritans :-D

by Tom Robinson on Sat, 06/14/2003 - 17:59 | reply

David Kay

Dr David Kay was chief nuclear weapons inspector in Iraq during 1991-2. in his evidence before the House Armed Services Committee on September 10, 2002, which is worth reading in full, he said, of Iraq's previous WMD programme:

What is much less well understood is the impact that the discovery of the gigantic scope and indigenous nature of Saddam's weapons program had on the prospects of being able to eliminate this program by inspection alone. We now know that the Iraqi efforts to build an arsenal of weapons of mass destruction:

- Spanned more than a decade;
- Cost more than $20 Billion;
- Involved more than 40,000 Iraqis and succeed in mastering all the technical and most of the productions steps necessary to acquire a devil's armory of nuclear, chemical and biological weapons as well as the missiles necessary to deliver them over vast distances.

[...]

The nuclear weapons secrets are now Iraqi secrets well understood by Iraq's technical elite, and the production capabilities necessary to turn these "secrets" into weapons are part and parcel of the domestic infrastructure of Iraq which will survive even the most draconian of sanctions regimes. Simply put, Iraq is not Libya, but very much like post-Versailles Germany in terms of its ability to maintain a weapons capability in the teeth of international inspections. As long as a government remains in Baghdad committed to acquiring WMD, that capability can be expected to become – and without much warning – a reality.

Anyway, the good news is that David Kay has just been appointed Special Advisor for Strategy regarding Iraqi Weapons of Mass Destruction Programs.

Dr. Kay, 63, will be based in Iraq and will be in charge of refining the overall approach for the search for Iraq's weapons of mass destruction.

Sat, 06/14/2003 - 19:24 | permalink

Copyright © 2005 Setting The World To Rights

What Caused This Death?

What is the explanation for this?:

An Egyptian woman married to a man with six daughters from previous marriages drowned herself Saturday just hours after giving birth to a girl because she feared her husband's reaction to fathering another daughter.

Our explanation is simple: the husband is a vile bastard.

But does everyone else agree? Keen to welcome other voices into the gentle bosom of Setting The World To Rights, we asked others what they think, and here, in their own words, are their answers:

Psychologist: Clearly, this tragic event was caused by a clinical depression brought on by a post-natal hormonal imbalance.

Sociobiologist: A certain mutant gene, activated by her pregnancy, gave her an increased tendency to commit suicide.

Astrologer: Jupiter's alignment with Venus, which represents motherhood, shortened her lifeline.

Leftist: When people live in such poverty, desperation is the natural result, and this sort of sad event is inevitable.

Palestinian: What a waste! If she was going to kill herself, she could have taken some Jews with her.

Egyptian Government: We are investigating the possibility that this was not a suicide, and have already captured several Mossad agents.

Environmentalist: This is a catastrophe: dead bodies in the canal endanger the water snails. We demand that earth barriers be put up alongside all canals to protect them from such attacks in future.

Postmodernist Idiotarian: By Western logic, this was a tragedy. But the West is too powerful, and should stop assuming that its values are the only truth. The West should stop trying to suppress the freedom of other cultures to live according to their own values. It is wrong for us to denigrate Egypt's amazing culture.

Idiotarian Economist: An individual's preferences are revealed in his actions. This individual clearly preferred to die. It was her choice, based on her perception of the costs and benefits of her options.

Muslim cleric: She killed herself virtuously, out of recognition of her personal failure to fulfil her duty to obey her husband and bear him sons.

Libertarian: During this suicide, the only force initiated was by the woman against herself. She had a right to do this. Therefore, nothing bad happened.

Frank's Rumsfeld: Rarr!

So, gentle reader, what do you think? Your voice is welcome too, dear friend.

Sun, 06/15/2003 - 16:31 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Your explanation sucks too!

It seems to me that The World's real explanation:

Our explanation is simple: the husband is a vile bastard.

is as bad as the fake ones.

Why don't you assign most of the responsibility to the person who made the insanely stupid choices (to marry a bastard, to bear his child, to kill herself when something fairly likely came to pass, etc.)?

Are you denying free will and individual responsibility for decisions?

If so, as I said, it seems just as foolish as the others you've "quoted".

My explanation is a little less simple but a lot more accurate:

The woman was an idiot. This tragedy is mostly the result of her stupidity and partially the result of her association with a bastard of a husband and a backward culture.

by Gil on Sun, 06/15/2003 - 21:09 | reply

Loony feminist nonsense

Your explanation is the loony feminist one, right?

Of course the man must be evil and the woman couldn't have acted any more rationally, despite that none of the personal details are actually known?

I wonder if she thought about the baby's future, at any point.

Alice

http://libertarian_parent_in_the_countryside.blogspot.com/

by a reader on Sun, 06/15/2003 - 21:42 | reply

None of Henry VIII's wives resorted to suicide...

Gil said:

>insanely stupid choices (to marry a bastard, to bear his child, to kill herself when something fairly likely came to pass, etc.)

Marrying a bastard is not a such a difficult thing to do in a culture where arranged marriages are prevalent, and where bf-gf relationships are frowned upon or forbidden, so there's no prior experimentation.

As for bearing his child, well, in many parts of the West it was not a crime for a husband to rape his wife until fairly recently. And I suspect that in rural Egypt the education of girls is not seen as a priority.

Alice said:

>Of course the man must be evil and the woman couldn't have acted any more rationally, despite that none of the personal details are actually known?

Presumably The World is asking us for the most likely explanation based upon what we know.

People who have just given birth are usually exhausted. Most people who try to kill themselves are surely in the most horrendous state of anguish and aren't capable of making rational judgements. The person most responsible for helping her through this plight was probably her husband. However, not only did he fail to do so, it seems that he helped to cause it in the first place, with his cruel and stupid threat (stupid because he could have chosen to murder or divorce her without telling her beforehand).

Also, the husband had divorced previous wives for the blameless act of not bearing him any sons, despite the fact that a divorced woman in his locality is shunned, and may have no economic independence.

Clearly he was indeed a vile bastard. If he hadn't been so, even in his backward culture, the outcome would probably have been different.

by Tom Robinson on Sun, 06/15/2003 - 23:17 | reply

Egypt isn't the USA

Gil,

Living in Egypt is different than the US. She almost certainly had no choice in the marriage, and did not have a choice in bearing his child. You don't withhold sex from someone who is supported by society in beating you within an inch of your life. You don't defy your father, when he tells you to marry, for the same reason. She didn't choose her situation. However, her husband did choose to marry her, intimidate her, beat her, blame her for the daughter thing, etc

"Think like an American woman" isn't a possible choice for girls in Egypt.

Alice,

Do you really think we arrived at our position by examining their genders!?

-- Elliot Temple

<http://curi.blogspot.com/>

by Elliot Temple on Sun, 06/15/2003 - 23:30 | reply

Reading this entry, what stood...

Reading this entry, what stood out at me the most was the similarity between the Astrologer's explanation and the "scientists'" explanation. Both are 100% blind to moral agency, so much so that they seem to be motivated by the desire to rid such situations as this one of any trace of morality. They seem to have constructed awkward, counter-intuitive explanations of the situation for the sole purpose of avoiding any mention of such things as blame, responsibility, choices, obligations etc. etc. etc.

Quite disturbing really.

by Daniel Strimpel on Mon, 06/16/2003 - 00:02 | reply

"Loony feminist nonsense", sc...

"Loony feminist nonsense", screeches Alice from the comfort of her Western life. "Of course the man must be evil and the woman couldn't have acted any more rationally, despite that none of the personal details are actually known?"

I wonder if she thought about the baby's future, at any point."

You can make such a harsh judgement of the woman if you want to but that judgement implicitly lets the husband off the hook, and that is a mistake. To say of the woman that she could have chosen differently is to assert that she should have been able to overcome the cultural pressures on her. While there is a grain of truth in that judgement--it would have been better all round if she had been able to resist the pressure--Alice's judgement implies that we have control over our unconscious minds. In fact we don't. Overcoming the sort of pressure that woman was under is not trivial as Alice suggests. To get angry about this woman's "lack of rationality" is to assert that knowledge creation is easy.

by a reader on Mon, 06/16/2003 - 09:10 | reply

Culture

In a sense, the husband was acting under pressure from their culture just as surely as the wife was. That does not exculpate him though, and it does not exculpate the wife either. Both must bear responsibility for their actions.

by Chris on Mon, 06/16/2003 - 10:00 | reply

Re; Culture

If a business man jumps off the roof, and someone said the cause of death was stress, we would rightly insist that his own bad theories also played a role, and if he had a fairly normal US life, we could say the suicide was his own fault, and also wrong of him.

However, the balance of factors in this case is different. There were very few opportunities in this woman's life to choose better theories, so she is very little to blame. On the other hand, the husband had plenty of chances to not marry her, not go psycho about having daughters, not intimidate her, not beat her, not divorce/shame former wives, etc

-- Elliot Temple

<http://curi.blogspot.com/>

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 06/16/2003 - 10:13 | reply

Generalisations

If we want to learn about the world, we can and should draw generalisations from the evidence. What we shouldn't do is apply generalisations to individual situations as if they were iron laws.

Missing out a "probably" is blurring the line between rational judgement and bigotry.

The baby would be better off with a divorced mother than a dead one. I'm interested to see how entrenched the loony feminist meme actually is these days.

Alice

by a reader on Mon, 06/16/2003 - 10:18 | reply

Loony Feminist Explanation

The loony feminist explanation would be: "the man is to blame and the woman is the victim because society gives men all the power and all the choices and everything women do is caused by their situation which men have chosen to force them into".

The World's explanation is "given what we are told of this particular situation and what we know of the society in question, it is overwhelmingly likely that this particular man is to blame because he made a series of egregiously (even by the standards of that society) immoral choices without which the whole thing would not have happened".

It's true that the woman must have made a choice to commit suicide, and that may have been morally wrong. But even if it was, suppose she had behaved rightly instead: the chances are that the situation would still be a catastrophic tragedy for her and the child (and the other six children), and that tragedy would have been caused by the immoral behaviour of the husband.

by David Deutsch on Mon, 06/16/2003 - 13:54 | reply

Loony Feminist Explanation

David,

I'm sorry but it seems to me that the only difference between the Loony Feminist Explanation and The World's explanation is that The World has applied the Loony Feminist Explanation framework to this particular case.

by Gil on Mon, 06/16/2003 - 16:17 | reply

Loony Feminist Explanation

Gil:

I'm sorry but it seems to me that the only difference between the Loony Feminist Explanation and The World's explanation is that The World has applied the Loony Feminist Explanation framework to this particular case.

It seems to me that the only difference between your comment and

The World never gets anything right is that you have applied the latter explanation framework to this particular item.

(Actually it doesn't. But the logic would be the same as yours.)

by David Deutsch on Mon, 06/16/2003 - 16:46 | reply

So we agree?

David,

Since you don't dispute any fact or make any argument, do we agree that The World has applied The Loony Feminist Explanation framework to this case, and is wrong?

Great!

If this is not the case, then please explain what flaws in the Loony Feminist Explanation it has recognized and applied to this case.

Also, I hope The World prefers its readers to adopt the initial stance that:

The World is sometimes wrong, let me think of criticisms...

over:

The World is always right, I'll adopt their position and defend it reflexively.

Also, I realize that The World was trying to give a pithy explanation rather than a long-winded analysis. I just think that it should have recognized the primary responsibility of the woman for her actions as well as the significant influences of the husband, the culture, etc. Failure to do this is precisely the error that the ridiculed explanations commit (to varying degrees).

by Gil on Mon, 06/16/2003 - 18:05 | reply

Gil

I realize that The World was trying to give a pithy explanation rather than a long-winded analysis. I just think that it should have recognized the primary responsibility of the woman for her actions

Well you would say that, wouldn't you. Typical man.

by Sarah Fitz-Claridge on Mon, 06/16/2003 - 18:33 | reply

So We Agree?

Gil:

If this is not the case, then please explain what flaws in the Loony Feminist Explanation it has recognized and applied to this case.

The World's explanation is fundamentally different from that of the loony feminists. It is not "this particular man has done to this woman what the loony feminists mistakenly say all men do to all women, and for the same reasons" -- though that would be a fundamental difference in itself. Instead, The World locates the prime cause of the situation in a series of individual choices made by the husband, which he could have made differently. The loony feminist explanation ignores individual agency and explains the cause collectively, either in his nature as a man, or in the way society allocates power. Likewise with the woman, the loony feminist explanation exonerates her on principle, with the corresponding collectivist reason. The World's explanation is again about the individual and does not fully exonerate the woman ("

[she] must have made a choice, [which] may have been morally wrong"), and makes clear that her exact causal and moral role in the situation depends on the individual choices she made, not on her sex or what society she was living in.

The nature of the society (and the sexes of the participants) appear in the loony feminist explanation as determinants of the participants' actions, whereas in The World's explanation it appears only as evidence of what the facts (regarding who decided what) were. If it turned out that that evidence was misleading and those facts were different, The World's way of explaining the situation could just as easily put the blame elsewhere. The loony feminists' explanation is simply incompatible with certain facts being different, or with the conclusion being other than to blame the man and regard the woman as his victim.

by David Deutsch on Mon, 06/16/2003 - 19:55 | reply

Sarah

Well you would say that, wouldn't you. Typical man.

I resent that! I'm an exceptional man.

by Gil on Mon, 06/16/2003 - 21:23 | reply

David

I accept your answer.

I just find it hard to believe that the meager evidence of that short article was sufficient for you to confidently assign primary blame to the husband. I would need a lot more information before reaching such a conclusion.

Perhaps it's that feminist intuition I've heard so much about.

by Gil on Mon, 06/16/2003 - 21:33 | reply

Sources

Gil,

If I were to find a source (two? three?) for "violence against women is the norm in Egypt" would you change your view?

-- Elliot Temple

<http://curi.blogspot.com/>

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 06/17/2003 - 00:33 | reply

Norm?

Elliot,

By "the norm", do you mean that it's common, or virtually without exception?

Unless it's the latter, or close, then it doesn't make sense to apply it to this case, does it?

All I know about this case is that somebody claims that the husband threatened to kill or divorce her if she bore a girl. And that he has a history of divorcing (not killing) wives who bear girls. And (I assume) that she knew that when she married him.

I don't know about violence in this family, I don't know about how the marriage came about, I don't know what the woman's motives were for any of her actions.

Yes, you can probably say "But for the husband, the woman would be alive." But that doesn't mean he's the primarily responsible agent here (with the information we have, including stats about Egypt). We could also say "But for Mohammed she would be alive" or "But for the position of the moon, she would be alive" (people might be more concerned about flooding than this baby's gender...).

My view is not "The husband had nothing to do with it." My view is that I don't know enough about the lives of these people to say how much of the responsibility is his vs. hers vs. other factors'.

In the absence of substantial (more than I've seen) evidence to the contrary, I think it's a good policy to assign responsibility to the person committing the act.

by Gil on Tue, 06/17/2003 - 00:53 | reply

Gil's flawed logic

My view is that I don't know enough about the lives of these people to say how much of the responsibility is his vs. hers vs. other factors'. In the absence of substantial (more than I've seen) evidence to the contrary, I think it's a good policy to assign responsibility to the person committing the act.

Gil, quit while you are ahead (figuratively speaking since you lost long ago). David is right and his explanation clarifies succinctly why. Also, there is plenty of information about how common, indeed, institutionalised is oppression of women and violence towards them in Egypt and other muslim countries. With internet at hand (and many books written about the subject), your insistence on lack of 'evidence' seems pretty feeble.

Also, there is a common fallacy perpetrated by those who argue against feminism and any position that is perceived as such. Feminism is collectivist, destructive and as such to be abhorred, however, its existence does not invalidate the reality that women have been oppressed by both the society and individual men (taking advantages of the legal and social rules) in the past. Women, as a rule, had no freedom of choice nor education to change their situation.

However, just because, despite these conditions, there were examples of loving marriages or occasional respect for female mind in those time, that did not make it any easier for the womankind in general. (I am just reading a book about the woman's lot in 17th century Britain by Antonia Fraser. Both an informative and horrifying reading...)

Gil, there is plenty of information and evidence out there. Just go and get it, instead of building straw feminists on this blog...

Gabriel Syme at gabriel at samizdata dot net

by a reader on Tue, 06/17/2003 - 11:10 | reply

Gil's flawed logic

Ok, this is the last comment I'll make on this topic.

My only point in commenting at all here was to point out that assigning responsibility to the husband on such meager specific evidence as that in the referenced article seemed to discount the moral agency of the woman.

I'm well aware of the oppression of women in that society and others, but I'm reluctant to assume that things that are common must hold for a particular case. This seems prejudicial to me, and disrespectful to the woman at least as much as to the man.

David's "succinct" explanation of The World's pronouncement was that it was based on the specific facts of this individual case and the choices those individuals made. I didn't see enough such facts to warrant such a pronouncement.

Apparently the suggestion that people here are guilty of some of the mistakes of collectivist "loony feminism" has touched the nerves of many who fancy themselves as individualists.

Perhaps reflexive denial is not the best response to the suggestion.

These are easy mistakes to make. We all make them.

by Gil on Tue, 06/17/2003 - 18:53 | reply

Sexism & suicide

Gabriel,

If what you are saying is correct then female suicide rates in Egypt would be high. In fact according to this website (sorry I don't know how to do the linking): <http://www.uni-wuerzburg.de/IASR/suicide-rates.htm> it shows that Egypt has the lowest female suicide rate in the world. If the typical Egyptian male is a 'sexist pig' (who is likely to want a son much more than a daughter) it would still be highly untypical for his wife to commit suicide as a result.

I'd wager my house that there were other more significant factors involved.

Paul P

by a reader on Thu, 06/19/2003 - 12:35 | reply

Something...

Something I agree with The World, how odd. And it's funny too.

And the Leonist says: Vile bastard husband indeed, death to all vile bastards!

Alice, Gil, shame on you! Get down of your pedestals!

Leo,

<http://eraserewind.blogspot.com>

by Leo on Wed, 06/25/2003 - 16:05 | reply

Sociobiology and scientific illiteracy.

"Sociobiology" is supposed to consist of blaming things on "mutant genes"? Sheesh. Now that's just sheer scientific illiteracy. I recommend a remedial dose of Cosmides and Tooby.

by a reader on Sat, 07/05/2003 - 22:21 | reply

Re: Sociobiology and scientific illiteracy.

Cosmides and Tooby say:

Evolutionary psychology is not behavior genetics.

Behavior geneticists are interested in the extent to which differences between people in a given environment can be accounted for by differences in their genes. EPs are interested in individual differences only insofar as these are the manifestation of an underlying architecture shared by all human beings. Because their genetic basis is universal and species-typical, the heritability of complex adaptations (of the eye, for example) is usually low, not high. Moreover, sexual recombination constrains the design of genetic systems, such that the genetic basis of any complex adaptation (such as a cognitive mechanism) must be universal and species-typical (Tooby and Cosmides, 1990b). This means the genetic basis for the human cognitive architecture is universal, creating what is sometimes called the psychic unity of humankind.

By that definition our criticism, and our mockery, are intended entirely for behaviour geneticists and not at all for 'evolutionary psychologists'. However, we doubt that the latter science, thus defined, can possibly discover anything of philosophical significance about human beings. It is on a par, in that respect, with the equally worthy sciences of, say, botany or entomology.

Moreover, Cosmides and Tooby hint that they doubt the claim of behaviour genetics to have a subject matter in the case of humans. Though it is not clear that they doubt it strongly enough, we are not inclined to quibble.

by Editor on Wed, 05/18/2005 - 16:49 | reply

Ashamed to be Pro-American?

We were disgusted to discover the cruel way some Americans treated a group of French children:

A group of French schoolchildren has been forced to cancel a summer exchange trip to America after being told that the students were no longer welcome because of anti-French sentiment following opposition to war in Iraq.

"Makes you feel ashamed to be pro-American!" commented one chap we know. He seemed to think that Americans visiting France would be treated better than the French schoolchildren would have been treated in America.

According to the Telegraph,

Their parents had each paid £900 for the trip, which was abruptly called off last month in an email sent by Court van Rooten, a French teacher at Springside School. He also cancelled the return trip to France due to be made by American students next year.

"It is with great regret that we have decided to suspend the exchange for this summer and the next," he wrote. "The main reason for this is that we do not feel that we can ensure a truly comfortable or hospitable stay for your students as the anti-French sentiment here in the US is very strong."

Since our friend was misled, we expect others might be too, so we thought we'd better provide The World's Exclusive Translation, for those of you not totally fluent in Weasel:

"It is with great glee that we have decided to suspend the exchange for this summer and the next. The main reason for this is that we are callous, spiteful, idiotarian losers who feel not the slightest compunction about using children to make a political point. Making Americans look bad is our raison d'être, and we don't care who gets hurt in the process. We're teaching those American bastards a lesson for their failure to understand that the sun shines out of every French arse."

But wait! We didn't need to translate: Mr van Rooten just could not resist spelling it out himself. The Telegraph story continues:

Mr van Rooten added that he and his colleagues at Springside had experienced "unpleasant moments (from colleagues, friends, students – and even family) because of our allegiance to the French." To bolster his argument, he wrote: "A Pennsylvania senator has introduced a bill in the state legislature to ban the sale of all French alcohol in the state liquor stores."

[...]

Mr van Rooten added: "It is unfortunate when the world situation dictates what we do in our schools and with our students, but I know you understand that this difficult decision was made with the best interests and well-being of your students and chaperones in mind."

Mais oui, mon ami, whatever made you think we might doubt your ~~political motives~~ intentions? Naturellement nous don't think que vous êtes a slimy Anti-American macaque capitulard bouffeur de fromage who couldn't wait to make the children suffer in this way.

"The parents are frankly scandalised by this xenophobic view. We don't understand it. We have been friends with this school for many years and I am disappointed with their attitude and the fact that they cancelled the visit without any consultation or discussion and informed me in an email."

...which is exactly the result the dimwitted low-life of a teacher wanted.

Victorine Robin, whose son Pierre, 16, was among the exchange group, said: "It was to have been his first trip to the US and he was so excited he'd been talking about it non-stop since September. It's every young person's dream to go to America, and as he will be 17 in August it was also a birthday present.

"Now he's desperately disappointed. I find it a great pity that, because of adults and politics, these youngsters are being punished. They had nothing to do with the war, and it went over the heads of most of them, so why should they suffer this injustice?"

A very good question, Madame Robin. But we doubt Mr van Rooten will deign to explain why he chose to deprive those children of the American holiday that certainly would have been enjoyable.

Mon, 06/16/2003 - 06:28 | permalink

Prejudiced

Are you sure your interpretation is not prejudiced? What evidence is there that your interpretation is correct? Aren't you being a bit cynical?

by a reader on Mon, 06/16/2003 - 08:52 | reply

What more evidence do you wan...

What more evidence do you want than what was in the Telegraph article?

by a reader on Mon, 06/16/2003 - 08:54 | reply

Cynical

Come now -- do you really think those kids would enjoy A SCHOOL EXCHANGE trip?

by a reader on Mon, 06/16/2003 - 09:15 | reply

Translation?

It would be nice to know what "macaque capitulard bouffeur de fromage" means.

by Chris on Mon, 06/16/2003 - 10:05 | reply

Re: Cynical

When you have normal parents, and you've never heard of TCS, and you go to school every day, and you probably like school about as much as being around your parents anyway, a school exchange trip might be quite nice. And when you live in France, and its a trip to the USA, :-D

-- Elliot Temple

<http://curi.blogspot.com/>

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 06/16/2003 - 10:05 | reply

Discount translation services

The relevant cognate to capitulard is, to the surprise of all our Libertarian readers, not 'capitalist' but 'capitulate'. Fromage (as every Canadian who has spent hours searching the fridge for items mistakenly placed upside down eventually learns) is cheese. And a macaque is a macaque, since we lack an Academy of the English Language to mandate a grauitously different term.

by Kevin on Mon, 06/16/2003 - 15:45 | reply

Mr van Rooten Replies on The World

That is – in another universe – the one in which this goes through.

by Sarah Fitz-Claridge on Tue, 06/17/2003 - 06:46 | reply

Sarah Fitz-Claridge

"That is ♦ in another universe ♦ the one in which this goes through."

Don't you think it will go through? You trust these bastards????
Anyone ever tell you you're naive?

by a reader on Tue, 06/17/2003 - 11:00 | reply

Mr van Rooten replies

"Everything on The World is a pack of lies. They're showing they're ignorance and xenophobia. Witch is not surprising when you consider their funded by the CIA, MI5, MI6, MI7 and the Bush/Blair Jewish conspiracy. If they were in my class I'd teach them better ideas. I wouldn't no how to make a political point and it gave me no pleasure to call off the trip.

The pleasure was in getting all that attention from the media. I'm in the papers! Have you seen me in the papers? Any other media outlets want to interview me?"

dvgbits bows

by dvgbits on Tue, 06/17/2003 - 11:41 | reply

Mr van Rooten's more likely reply

The article on Setting The World To Rights did not inspire confidence. Has there ever been a blog so misnamed? If the folks at The World think they are setting the world to rights, why don't they have the guts to include their bylines? What are they afraid of? The guy who wrote this article should check his facts before mouthing off about something and someone he knows nothing about.

by a reader on Tue, 06/17/2003 - 12:10 | reply

What will be the outcome of the Middle East Road Map to Peace?

view

results

- It will be just like Oslo.
- It would work if only the Jews would accept it, but the hard-liners won't let them.
- It would work if only the Palestinians would accept it, but they don't want to.
- It will lose its way because it has missed the boat and lost the moral high ground above the roadblocks.
- It's too early to tell; it depends on what Bush knows.
- That region is inherently violent. There will never be peace because the hatreds run too deep.
- It will cause a major catastrophe.
- It will work more or less as planned.

Vote

Mon, 06/16/2003 - 07:37 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Discussing this question

It hasn't got a chance in hell of working. Does anyone in their right mind think it will work??

by a reader on Mon, 06/16/2003 - 08:42 | reply

Let's not get too pessimistic!

It hasn't got a chance in hell of working. Does anyone in their right mind think it will work??

Call me out of my mind but I think it's too soon to say for sure it won't work.

by a reader on Mon, 06/16/2003 - 08:48 | reply

What possible way could it wo...

What possible way could it work? If anyone would like to say why this time will be different from all the others, let's hear it.

by Chris on Mon, 06/16/2003 - 10:03 | reply

Reason For Hope

I am quite optimistic about the future for Israel, not exactly because of the Road Map, but perhaps the Road Map will help. Two reasons for hope are (1) the current more positive stance of the American government towards Israel and (2) the new Israeli government policy of increased force and the threat of force against the terrorists.

The Israeli government's announcement (sort of) that everyone in Hamas is the enemy of the peace process and is therefore going to be killed – and their showing that they mean business – will ratchet up the pressure on everyone in Hamas. Other terrorists will be experiencing increased pressure too: they will be next.

This is also going to increase the pressure on ordinary Hamas-supporting Palestinians. In the past, the Israeli government's policy of avoiding civilian casualties at all costs resulted in terrorists surrounding themselves with human shields. But their new, more forceful policy is such that ordinary Palestinians will now want to avoid having Hamas people in their cars and homes in case they too get killed in Israeli action against the terrorists. They will eventually start to complain when terrorists move next door, not because they have suddenly grown out of their hatred of Jews, but for the simple pragmatic reason of not wanting to get caught in the crossfire. Force and the threat of force is vital here, just as it was vital in Iraq. Reason doesn't work with terrorists and terrorist supporters. Force and the threat of force will concentrate their minds.

The other thing that gives me hope is that the Americans have not come out against this new Israeli policy. The effect of their praising the Palestinian so-called Prime Minister and deeming Hamas the enemy of the peace process provides a way for ordinary Palestinians (with a little push, as above) to jump over to the side of peace.

I just hope that they don't forget the importance of the true democracy bit. Natan Sharansky is right about that.

by Sarah Fitz-Claridge on Mon, 06/16/2003 - 11:00 | reply

Will Israel Attacking Hamas help Abbas?

Eugene Volokh passes along an opinion today that argues that the Israeli hard-line against Hamas will strengthen Abbas' position and the chances for peace.

by Gil on Mon, 06/16/2003 - 22:59 | reply

Question

To the people who voted for:

It will lose its way because it has missed the boat and lost the moral high ground above the roadblocks.

What does this mean?

~Woty

<http://woty.blogspot.com>

by Woty on Tue, 06/17/2003 - 20:48 | reply

What does this mean?

That they chose randomly?

That they voted accidentally when the cat jumped on their keyboard?

That they read just the first bit ("It will lose its way") and voted before reading the rest of the sentence?

--

Sarah Fitz-Claridge

<http://www.fitz-claridge.com/>

by Sarah Fitz-Claridge on Tue, 06/17/2003 - 21:07 | reply

mixed metaphors

I count about 4 mixed metaphors in that cryptic choice.

by Daniel Strimpel on Fri, 06/20/2003 - 02:13 | reply

Has it got "a chance in hell?"

How can you say it doesn't have "a chance in hell" of working?

This IS a chance in hell. A chance in hell is therefore the ONLY chance it has of working.

by a reader on Wed, 06/25/2003 - 14:06 | reply

Hell

Could you describe the boundaries of hell please?

My atlas seems to be out of date.

by Gil on Thu, 06/26/2003 - 00:06 | reply

Atlas

Gil, if you'd like it to be labelled 'Gehenna' your atlas is not sufficiently out of date, but it's immediately west/southwest of the walled city, and only a couple hundred yards wide. Apparently the 1949 UN Armistice line followed it, so A Reader's concern is understandable.

by Kevin on Thu, 06/26/2003 - 15:40 | reply

It won't until the Mullas are in power!

Until the Islamic Republic of Iran exists and pays the terrorists in Lebanon and among the Palestinians with the money that actually belongs to the Iranian people ,desprately in need of it I might add, NO peace map has any chance of survival.

Editor's Note: We think that this commenter means while, not 'until'.

by a reader on Sat, 07/19/2003 - 15:50 | reply

Israelis should defend themselves

Dear Sarah,

I didn't vote on this one. I can't see any option that I really like amongst the list. Voting in online polls is a bit silly, since there is no way to have a representative, random sample. The results may be interesting to some, but are statistically troubled by self-selection error. As well, voting isn't reason. It isn't like counting noses ever solved a problem, nor is it the case that one man standing alone is necessarily wrong while millions voting the other way must know what they are on about.

With particular respect to Israel, I do like the fact that the Israelis, or at least their government, are going about taking deliberate and forceful actions in self-defense. Defensive and retaliatory force are justified. I think it is a very bad idea to tolerate terrorists bombing cafes, malls, or flying aircraft into buildings.

Having said as much, I do think there are obligations on those who engage in defensive or retaliatory force. Doing so should obligate the force user to select their targets accurately.

I'm quite sure that al Qaeda hated Saddam Hussein's policies and politics just as much as they hated the USA. The inaccuracy of reports claiming that Saddam was behind the attacks on the World Trade Center remains an important issue. While I completely agree with Dana Carvey's choice quip, "If Saddam didn't have weapons of mass destruction, he was an idiot for not letting every inspector see every site they wanted," I'm not convinced that those weapons presented a clear and present danger to the USA. There was no evidence of uranium purchases from Africa, for example.

I use these items as sort of comparative literature. On the whole, from what I've seen, Israel has done an adequate job of targeting terrorists and their direct accomplices and supporters. I think it is to the Israeli's credit that they have not invaded and occupied Syria or Egypt or Lebanon in this latest round of actions, and much to their credit that when they did agree that they were occupying a part of Egypt (the Sinai) they came to a peace conference at Camp David and returned that property to Egypt.

Unfortunately, I don't see much prospect for the USA leaving Afghanistan to be run by Afghans or leaving Iraq to be run by Iraqis, any more than I was able to see the USA leave Vietnam to be run by the Vietnamese except at the last instant, in the worst possible way. Talk about betrayals.

Regards,

Jim

davidson@net1.net

<http://www.ezez.com/free/freejim.html>

by planetaryjim on Fri, 11/07/2003 - 04:54 | reply

Sustainability through FMSL

FMSL is about a child-centric, self-sustainable approach to solving the problems of the world.

If we first ensure that there is enough for every child, we can then be sure that there will be enough for every adult. A child's future right to food, shelter and education is more important than its parents' immediate right to reproduce. A certain degree of financial security must be mandatory for marriage so that the children to be born are not denied their basic rights. Compulsory financial security of some kind, if required at marriage, by law, would significantly prevent birth into poverty and consequent evils. FMSL is a law that requires a predetermined level of financial security before a legal marriage can take place. Such a law would make it more likely that children live in sanitary conditions, are less likely to go hungry and shelter less and have access to quality education and information. Those children will be more likely to attain success in life and develop into useful citizens.

When the poor decrease in number, the government will not have to provide cheap transport, subsidized goods, free education and free healthcare. Money saved in this manner could be used instead to improve infrastructure and enforce law and order.

More prosperous people would mean that more people will be able to afford environmentally friendly resources and technologies. We can then continue our progress without causing a threat to our own survival or to the survival of other species.

I believe that the child centric approach is our best shot against overpopulation, poverty, environmental hazards and all other associated evils. All that is required is that proof of financial security in any form - property, cash, income proof etc. be required in all nations for legal marriage. Human life will flourish to only as much as can be sustained. A UN directive to implement the FMSL law would aid greatly in accomplishing this.

by cooloften123 on Fri, 11/26/2004 - 13:19 | reply

Yeah, Right.

I'm not sure what the comment above has to do with the Middle East roadmap, but I'll respond anyway...

If you add restrictions to legal marriage, all you'll achieve is fewer legal marriages.

You won't inhibit many people from living together or having children. In fact, you'll probably cause more children to be born out of wedlock, perhaps reducing the percentage of fathers who feel a real obligation to support their children once their relationship sours.

I agree that it's good to promote the idea that people should have good economic prospects before taking on the awesome responsibility of having children. But, I don't think that laws will accomplish this. You have to change people's minds.

Gil

by Gil on Fri, 11/26/2004 - 22:24 | reply

words like terrorists

Terrorist is a word, not a person. It is used for people we want to fight and not help. Some of those people called terrorists believe they fight for justice, and more certainly many are people who's friends and children are killed by bombs. I have two children. I hate it when they cry. I have the pictures of children in body bags, and their mums, and young men in casual clothes. They have no medals and they have no planes. They fight in their own land, not abroad, and they are called insurgents.

He people we want to fight have been seen as dirty, sub-human, worthless, ugly, stupid etc., while we create puppet governments to lead them into poverty, steal their land= and giving gas to Sadaam to gas them.

Are you aware as we debate the 'road map' - which incidentally is not a road not a map, but a face-saving exercise for the harsh cruel Jewish State - that Palestinian farmers are having their wheat crops sprayed in the desert so they can be forcibly moved into 'conurbations', and the land appropriated. This is achievable, because their leaders, their rites are unrecognised, because they are 'worthless' - tradition is worthless. Instead gain, and pride can be made, as politicians we step in and out of the limelight. It is best left to them, and to their fighters. Israel should be prosecuted for war crimes, and their nuclear bombs confiscated (they should be invaded).

The modern army man is a spoilt, pampered civil servant in fancy-dress uniform, who gets mad and complains when shot at by a rifle:

"Where was the support - the planes and bombs?"

by a reader on Fri, 05/06/2005 - 23:50 | reply

home | archives | polls | search

Copyright © 2008 Setting The World To Rights

A New Poll! Vote Now!

The question we are asking in this new poll is:

What will be the outcome of the Road Map to Peace in the Middle East?

Vote now!

Mon, 06/16/2003 - 07:56 | permlink

Against the Legitimacy of the Iranian Regime

Scrappleface has an excellent argument against the legitimacy of the current Iranian regime.

Mon, 06/16/2003 - 21:45 | permalink

Peter Snow Has Never Seen The Simpsons!

OK, maybe there's another explanation, but the way he said "D'oh!" this morning on the BBC1 breakfast programme was so wildly incorrect, it is difficult to believe he could ever have watched The Simpsons. Perhaps he should spend less time in front of the cameras and more time in front of the box.

Snow was reporting the virulently anti-American results of a massive international poll the BBC commissioned (never let it be said that British taxpayers' hard-earned cash is being misused) to ~~bolster their useless anti-American case~~ discuss in this programme tonight.

"What The World Thinks Of America" will be aired on BBC 2 at 2100 BST. For goodness' sake watch The Simpsons before tonight, Mr Plow, er, Snow.

N.B. We at The World wish to take this opportunity to object in the strongest possible terms to the implication that we endorse the anti-American views peddled on this programme.

Tue, 06/17/2003 - 07:04 | permalink

Which Reminds Me...

I am hoping that Aeon Skoble will write for Setting The World To Rights at some point. And not just about The Simpsons.

by Sarah Fitz-Claridge on Tue, 06/17/2003 - 08:14 | reply

What's he say?

points at subject line

-- Elliot Temple

<http://curi.blogspot.com/>

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 06/17/2003 - 09:20 | reply

god dammit

what'd he say? points at 's' and 'd' keys to indicate they are next to each other

-- Elliot Temple

<http://curi.blogspot.com/>

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 06/17/2003 - 09:26 | reply

What he said

The line he was reading was: "D'oh!, as Homer Simpson would say" or words to that effect. The "D'oh!" was ... well... it is difficult to describe. It wasn't even close to the right tone/inflection, and he did not even pronounce it the way the master does. It did not sound as though he was merely refusing to stoop to Homer's level (as he might see it): it sounded as though he had simply no idea what this "D'oh!" was or how to pronounce it.

by Sarah Fitz-Claridge on Tue, 06/17/2003 - 10:47 | reply

I've seen the simpsons but i'...

I've seen the simpsons but i've not seen Homer saying "D'oh!" so I think you're being a bit unfair on Snow.

by a reader on Tue, 06/17/2003 - 10:49 | reply

How does he say it? I haven't...

How does he say it? I haven't watched that show in years.

by dvgbits on Tue, 06/17/2003 - 11:20 | reply

Try this

"How does he say it?"

Try this page:

http://www.bbc.co.uk/cult/simpsons/mania_tour/clip0.shtml

by a reader on Tue, 06/17/2003 - 12:00 | reply

"Im just proud to be part of ...

"Im just proud to be part of a country that gave the world The Simpsons" -- Jonathan Franzen

by a reader on Tue, 06/17/2003 - 12:18 | reply

"When asked who was the bigge...

"When asked who was the bigger threat, only Al Queda was considered more dangerous than the USA" -- Peter Snow, speaking about the poll which will be revealed tonight.

by a reader on Tue, 06/17/2003 - 12:22 | reply

"Victory?"

"We're French! We don't even have a word for it!"

- Homer Simpson, Episode DABF08, Tales from the Public Domain

by a reader on Tue, 06/17/2003 - 15:40 | reply

Re: "Victory?"

Not to mention originating les macaques capitulards bouffeurs de fromage, lo these many years ago.

(BTW, those still wondering how "D'oh" is pronounced can pop over here.)

by Kevin on Tue, 06/17/2003 - 17:12 | reply

Someone Regrets the Passing of Saddam

Guess who...

Here's a clue. (Scroll up on the linked page to read our piece about this person.)

Wed, 06/18/2003 - 08:04 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Why We Use the Word 'Idiotarian'

Using the word 'idiotarian' has some obvious disadvantages. It is inherently insulting, and hence potentially misleading in a context where one is trying to make factual statements. It has unintended connotations: users of the word do not mean to imply that idiotarians necessarily have low intelligence. It looks frivolous, and is therefore distracting in any serious piece. It is new and may soon be obsolete. Also, as a general rule, consideration for the reader should make one reluctant to use terms with which many people are unfamiliar.

Nevertheless, we use the i-word from time to time here on The World. Why?

Because there is no alternative. The fact is, there is a huge and influential segment of Western public opinion which systematically sides with evil without itself adopting the evildoers' objectives. That's an approximate definition: as with other terms such as 'left-wing', 'right-wing' or 'anarchist', there are about as many definitions of 'idiotarian' as there are users of the term. But there can be no doubt that idiotarianism is a distinctive political stance playing a major role in contemporary politics. As we have said before, it is mind-boggling that such a significant strand of political thought did not even have a name before 2002 when Charles Johnson coined the term 'idiotarian'.

We don't see any option but to use it. For instance, although idiotarianism is predominantly associated with political parties of the left, 'idiotarian' is by no means synonymous with 'left-wing' or 'Democrat': one has only to consider the likes of Tom Lantos (or perhaps Tony Blair), or, on the right, Pat Buchanan or Matthew Parris. Likewise, idiotarianism usually involves, say, moral relativism, yet there are moral relativists who are anti-idiotarians, and there are people who believe in right and wrong but think that idiotarian policies are the morally right ones. The term "useful idiots", allegedly coined by Lenin, has a similar though narrower meaning, but it also has similar disadvantages; and the term "cicadas", coined by Oriana Fallaci, has gained little or no currency.

So until someone tells us a better idea, we are going to have to live with the disadvantages of 'idiotarian'. And there are consolations:

OK, it's insulting, but it's insulting something bad. (And even idiotarians might take consolation from the fact that long-lived terms often become detached from their original meanings: 'Tory' was once a term of abuse meaning 'thief'; 'hysterical' meant 'affected by one's womb'.) Its psychological connotations are not wholly inappropriate: it is a psychological stratagem more than a political theory. A lighthearted touch is no bad thing in political writing. And as for the term being unfamiliar: well, this very item will put an end to that, won't it?

UPDATE: We're still hoping that someone will do this study.

UPDATE: We now have a new word for "idiotarian": "villepinist".

Wed, 06/18/2003 - 22:32 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

What it means

I think the biggest problem with using the term idiotarian is that so many people don't understand what it means.

So, I suggest that when you use the term you include a link to a page like this one that makes it clear. The definition used there is:

The species of delusion within the moral community of mankind that gives aid and comfort to terrorists and tyrants operating outside it.

There's a lot more than the definition worth reading there.

by Gil on Thu, 06/19/2003 - 00:06 | reply

What is the psychological stratagem?

I'm beginning to understand what idiotarianism is, and to recognise it, but I completely fail to understand what motivates idiotarians. Why do they 'seek to prevent the triumph of Good over Evil, at any price' (Kolya)

It's enormously frustrating not to understand, because on occasions one simply feels beseiged

Is it because they think it's sexy or wise (in a nodding, knowing sort of way) to rebel against whoever triumphs, in order to secure the love of others like themselves? Are they afraid of authority because of crushing defeats in their past? Do they have stuff in common with pacifists or even vegetarians? Why are they so slow to believe that people tend to want the right things?

Please can someone enlighten me as to what the psychological stratagem is, then we can work out how to fight it.

by Tom Robinson on Thu, 06/19/2003 - 00:10 | reply

Stratagem

Tom Robinson

I've heard a few good answers to your question. One theory (credited to David Deutsch) is that, after the trauma of WWII and the blotting out of Nazism, people wanted to blot out violence in general by pretending it doesn't exist. For children, violence is forbidden as a topic of conversation at the dinner table, forbidden on the TV and is never discussed in school. In fact, violence of any kind is punished in school, regardless of who is at fault. The result is systematic ignorance about the proper use of force, that is, idiotarianism.

Another possibility is that idiotarianism arises out of resentment of authority. If you grow up oppressed by your parents, you may end up seeing the world in terms of power relations, authorities trying to fuck you over. This could translate to a hatred of America, and of successful people and countries in general.

by Daniel Strimpel on Thu, 06/19/2003 - 04:09 | reply

The idiotarian stratagem

What motivates idiotarianism is the same impulse that motivates true morality: the quest for self-validation through identification with intrinsically worthwhile goals.

Where idiotarianism goes astray is in its pathological conception of what constitute worthwhile goals. Whereas moral people try to discover and embrace that which is conducive to human flourishing; idiotarianism perceives relative success as evidence of malfeasance, and relative failure as evidence of victimhood. The entire intellectual edifice that idiotarians construct is just a rationalisation of what is, at root, an unsavoury emotional disposition, namely a form of self-righteous resentment, writ large.

Put more succinctly, idiotarianism is a rationalisation of a pathological identification with people whose own bad values are the cause of their misfortune.

By the way, I think the term "idiotarianism" obscures more than it reveals. I prefer my own term, "moral inversion", because it brings out the fact that the cardinal error concerns morality rather than rationality, and it captures the Alice in Wonderland quality of idiotarian argumentation, which is characterised by a rational attempt at defending a moral falsehood, rather than by arbitrary irrationality.

by Kolya on Thu, 06/19/2003 - 15:34 | reply

Defining 'idiotarian'

Doesn't the definition quoted by Gil have the weakness that a certain class of actual evildoers and wannabe evildoers (those 'operating in a moral community', whatever that means) also count as 'idiotarians'? And doesn't that defeat the whole purpose of having a separate term?

And isn't the same true of Kolya's term 'moral inversion' as well?

Defining idiotarian

David,

I think being an evildoer or a wannabe evildoer places you outside of the "Moral community of mankind".

You'd be in the "Immoral community of mankind".

by Gil on Thu, 06/19/2003 - 19:16 | reply

Idiotarianism is part of the same continuum as evil

In terms of their psychology and philosophical content, idiotarianism and outright evil differ only in degree. Both are parts of the moral inversion continuum. Both are driven by a logic-of-situation imperative to deny the true explanation for human progress and to discredit those who live by it. That is the reason why idiotarians and evil-doers from widely diverse backgrounds all agree on hating and blaming the morally most progressive peoples, such as Americans and Jews.

Where an individual ends up on this moral inversion continuum depends more on contingent factors, than on their own philosophical commitments. Their moral and intellectual trajectory is largely shaped by the objective logical and epistemic constraints of trying to pin the blame for the failure of immoral cultures, at the feet of the most virtuous cultures.

Moral inverters learn what to think and how to argue partly from the intrinsic logic of this predicament, and partly by memic transmission from others who have trodden the same ground before them. Generally speaking, an individual moral inverter's only substantive contribution to his or her own stance is deciding how far to go down this road.

I think the transition of German culture from pre-WWII idiotarianism, to the extreme evil of Nazism, and then, following its defeat, back to idiotarianism again, bears out my thesis that evil and idiotarianism are parts of the same continuum, and can be inter-converted under suitable external circumstances.

Having said that, for many practical purposes the distinction between evil-doers and their mere apologists, is very real and very important. So I agree that having a separate term for the latter is useful. But I still think that "idiotarianism" works better as an in-jibe, than as a term that is conducive to the enlightenment of the uninitiated.

The reason is that it obscures the fundamental psychological and moral relationship between full-blown evil and its precursor stance, which we might more accurately call "proevil".

by Kolya on Thu, 06/19/2003 - 20:46 | reply

Idiotarianism is part of the same continuum as evil

I agree with Kolya here.

The differences between idiotarians and "full-blown evil" people is more a matter of degree than kind.

I think I said as much when commenting on Woty's blog.

I understand the desire to want to make the distinction. We want to say something like "They're not bad, they're just mistaken!" But what does "bad" mean, if not being mistaken about fundamental moral issues and being willing to act (or not act) based on those mistakes?

Nobody's perfect, but many people have made and acted on choices that place them on the road to evil.

by Gil on Thu, 06/19/2003 - 21:09 | reply

I agree

Im pleased to see that my previous intuition on the evil vs. misguided question is in fact in agreement with Kolya's and Gil's.

by Daniel Strimpel on Fri, 06/20/2003 - 17:41 | reply

terms

So should we call idiotarians "idiotarians", "moral inverters" or "proevil"?

Proevil sounds evil to me. Are we making too-fine distinctions here? Why the desire to have a term different than "evil" (tho' that sounds a bit too Biblical for me) or "bad"?

Is it because you're hoping your idiotarian friends and relations won't be so offended and you want to persuade them they're wrong? is there some denial here?

Sylvia

by Sylvia Crombie on Fri, 06/20/2003 - 19:09 | reply

Idiotarian/Evil Difference

A difference between idiotarians and evil people, is that idiotarians don't want us to die. I think this merits two terms.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://curi.blogspot.com/>

by Elliot Temple on Fri, 06/20/2003 - 22:23 | reply

Honest disagreement

Gil wrote:

I understand the desire to want to make the distinction. We want to say something like "They're not bad, they're just mistaken!" But what does "bad" mean, if not being mistaken about fundamental moral issues and being willing to act (or not act) based on those mistakes?

Sylvia wrote:

Is it because you're hoping your idiotarian friends and relations won't be so offended and you want to persuade them they're wrong? is there some denial here?

I think it's about as offensive to call someone an idiotarian as it is to call them evil. I don't want to make excuses for people who side with evil, and I think most of them ought to know better.

However, I think there is a difference between being complicit in evil, and actually being evil. One example: Some people opposed the US invasion of Iraq because they wanted to be able to continue torturing people. Some other people opposed the invasion of Iraq because it conflicted with their idea of what nations should do in a peaceful world, and these people did not consider the torture to be an important consideration.

Similarly -- some people say that in Nazi Germany, most people didn't actively agree with what was going on, but they had no choice and just did what they were told. This is idiotarian. Some people think the Nazis were right. This is evil.

People who are unable or unwilling to consider the torture in Iraq or the moral culpability of the Germans are unable to take the right side in many vital issues. But that is not the same as actively wanting evil to triumph.

~Woty

<http://woty.blogspot.com>

by Woty on Fri, 06/20/2003 - 22:30 | reply

Idiotarianism is similar to evil, but quite different

In case this wasn't clear from my last comment, I think that from a causal point of view what is important is the continuity between idiotarianism and evil. But from a moral point of view it is their difference that is important. "Moral inversion" is my name for the unified causal explanation for the psychological and cultural mechanisms that give rise to both phenomena.

But I fully agree with David and Woty that when discussing the morality of the two conditions, there is an important difference between them -- one which justifies having two separate terms. The distinction is important, not least, because evil people such as

Hamas operatives and Saddam Hussein can merit being killed in extra-judicial ways, whereas idiotarians cannot.

I still don't like the word "idiotarianism" and have never used it except when debating the nuances of its meaning with other readers of LGF. We need a term whose meaning is more apparent and which has connotations of immorality, rather than irrationality.

To that end, I propose the term "morality denial". Chomsky, the French, The European Union, and all those who believe America to be guilty of unilateralism, are morality deniers.

by Kolya on Sun, 06/22/2003 - 09:46 | reply

Brilliant

What a very interesting and illuminating thread. Great stuff. Thank you.

Alice

by a reader on Sun, 06/22/2003 - 22:03 | reply

who are the idiots?

The author of this blog is right about two things: the term "idiotarian" is inherently insulting, and potentially, if not inevitably, misleading. As I understand it, the argument here is that one is an idiot if one supports evil, particularly while in a state of moral denial.

Historical moment: Donald Rumsfeld shakes hands with Saddam Hussein. Idiot?

Historical moment: Franklin Roosevelt allies with Stalin to beat Hitler. Idiot?

Historical moment: Man buys wife diamond, sold to support brutal civil war in Sierra Leone or Algeria. Idiot?

Historical moment: Catholic Church officials fail to dismiss known pedophiles. Idiots?

Historical moment: You or I or anyone buys carton of Tropicana orange juice, made with fruit picked by illegal immigrants working under slave-labor conditions. Or we buy clothes made in Chinese sweatshops, etc etc. Idiots?

Historical moment: GWBush choosing to spend Vietnam war stateside, not fighting evil in Southeast Asia. Idiot?

Historical moment: You or I put gas in car, and a portion of the money lands in Saudi Arabia, used to prop up repressive and arguably evil regime. Car perhaps made by Ford, whose founder once used his profits to disseminate anti-Semitic propaganda. Idiots?

Historical moment: US allies with Taliban to fight Russians in Afghanistan. Idiots?

One man's opinion: for all the bile heaped on the hapless heads of the liberals of the world, they are far from the most powerful forces of moral relativism. That prize goes to business and government. History shows, without question, that either will ally with virtually anyone if the alliance advances their interests. While it's not inevitable that either will support evil, it happens all the time, whether with local governments and small businesses, or "big" gov't and big biz.

Certainly it is honorable to be infuriated by the presence of evil in the world. But it seems to me that the so-called left wing is a poor target - or at least, a potentially misleading one. Not only because the left has demonstrably acted as a force that countered evil in the past - fighting, for example, segregation and labor abuses when the mainstream was prepared to tolerate them - but because the left isn't all that powerful.

Thus the term "idiotarian" to me represents a facile and shortsighted interpretation of the role evil plays in the world - and the role we as Americans play in its support.

by a reader on Wed, 06/25/2003 - 13:39 | reply

My, if this isn't a case of...

...the pot calling the kettle "idiotarian".

by a reader on Wed, 06/25/2003 - 16:42 | reply

Idiotarian counter term.

Personally, I like "Idiotarian", at least as an internal shorthand - the fact that it's inherently insulting is a plus, not a minus - but I agree that it's not precise as a general use term that's intrinsically understandable by the casual reader.

I'd like to propose "antirational" [and "antirationalism" as descriptive of the phenomena]: describes someone who willfully pursues a counter rational philosophy, even though they're capable [in other areas] of applying rational thought to situations. The antirational person goes to great and often strident lengths to bolster arguments and positions that even casual observers can see on examination bear no resemblance to fact, data, evidence or any other basis other than "faith".

"Antirationalism" describes a philosophy of denial based upon adherence to viewing the world and reality as one would like it to be, rather than as it is.

I'm not sure that "evil" and "immoral" should be a part of the definitions: those are often by products of pursuing an antirational stance, rather than inherent to the antirationalist.

It has the benefit that "idiotarian" lacks: a casual reader can look at the term in context, and deduce from the root words and context the definition, whereas idiotarian can be fuzzy even in contextual use.

Sherman Barnes

by Ironbear on Wed, 06/25/2003 - 23:17 | reply

I have the alternative

I posted about it here.

by a reader on Fri, 06/27/2003 - 10:54 | reply

The Idiotarian vs. the merely Unprincipled

"business and government ... will ally with virtually anyone if the alliance advances their interests." - a reader

That to me is the key difference between the Idiotarian and the merely Unprincipled.

The unprincipled will cynically make choices that further his own interests.

The idiotarian will cynically make choices that harm his own interests. He'll cut off his nose to spite his face. Example: what small-L liberal would ever, ever defend the sovereignty of Taliban Afghanistan? What feminist? Answer: quite a few would, and did, because they wanted to deny Bush's will more than they wanted to bring the freedoms they claim to love to Afghanistan.

(And I agree that the motivation for this perversity can be traced to resentment, which Nietzsche saw as one of the great motivators of human thought.)

Reader X

by a reader on Sun, 06/29/2003 - 07:49 | reply

you're right

Listen, cats:

The bottom line here is that you all like calling people who disagree with you "idiots."

Being good smart people, you're constructing a series of rationales that justify this behavior. The writer above, for example, essentially is saying, "Idiotarians are people who deliberately chose wrong over right." Naturally such people deserve only scorn. And their behavior would indeed be a perversity if it worked like that, but I have news for you:

It doesn't.

The people you disagree with think they're right. And they may be right. But that isn't important to this crowd; you're sure that you're right and they're idiots and so you call them "idiotarians," taking a smug, and dare I say resentful, satisfaction in your rhetorical bravery.

So here's what you should do: give up this flimsy pseudo-rationalism and go down to your local campus or your lefty bookstore and just shout, "You're all a bunch of god-damn idiots!" Go ahead. Roll in it. When someone asks you why, answer, "Because you're wrong!" If you think, like the guy at the top, that this makes them evil, go ahead and squeeze off a few rounds on 'em.

You know you want it. You do. You really, really do. That's what this is about. And that last guy is right - resentment is at the core of this - the smug bile of a bunch of wannabe supermen (and women) who feel that only the lilliputian minds of their fellow citizens prevent the arrival of The Good, The Just, and The Perfect.

I used to have a friend who would joke, "the world would be a great place if not for all the stupid people." That's the level that this debate operates at - without the joke.

by a reader on Wed, 07/02/2003 - 03:50 | reply

Logical Fallacies Are Fun

A Reader wrote "Being good smart people, you're constructing a series of rationales that justify this behavior."

Yup, we sure did! The thing is, this "criticism" applies to all the cases where we are right and explain why, in addition to applying to the cases A Reader intended. So, it applies regardless of whether we are right or wrong, and thus hasn't got any content as a criticism.

But I suppose I'm just rationalising...

-- Elliot Temple

<http://curi.blogspot.com/>

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 07/02/2003 - 05:40 | reply

so then

.... what are you (to take one example) right about, and what are the "idiotarians" wrong about?

by a reader on Wed, 07/02/2003 - 15:17 | reply

What are idiotarians wrong about?

".... what are you (to take one example) right about, and what are the "idiotarians" wrong about?"

They typically blame Islamofascist terrorism on Western colonialism. In reality, it has nothing to do with that and everything to do with their culture being evil, racist, anticapitalist, anti-freedom and self-destructive. There is no possibility that they will stop as a result of anything other than being devastatingly and comprehensively defeated, in particular ignoring them or making concessions to them will only lead to more death. They must be stopped, not coddled.

by Alan Forrester on Wed, 07/02/2003 - 18:00 | reply

oh, I get it

See, you've got the same problem going on - you choose an argument based on articles of faith, not reality.

You argue that the left "typically" blames the West for Islamofascism. More accurately, the left is typically aware of the connections between the west and the Islamofascists - years of support to the Taliban (not to mention Saddam), years of support to repressive Arab regimes. This is not the same as "blaming." Do we bear some responsibility? Of course. Total responsibility? No. Your article of faith is "the idiotarians blame America" but it is more accurate to say that the left is willing to confront America's partial responsibility for the state of things. To deny that history is to deny reality.

Your second article of faith is that Islamofascism can be isolated and destroyed. Let's assume that you're correct that it is "inherently evil." I'll buy that. But what is this "Islamofascism"? And how can it be totally destroyed? Was it the Taliban? Now that they're gone, is it gone? Will it be gone if we kill Bin Laden? Or his "senior officials"? Suppose you nuked everyone in Afghanistan, Iraq, Syria and Iran? Would it be gone then? How will you know when it's gone? What IS it? Have we been doing the right things to stop it? I don't know. Maybe what we're doing is fostering it. We coddled it for years, and we're still coddling it (see: Saudi Arabia), so how do we stop? Do we have to bomb everybody? Everywhere?

"Screw these silly sophist hairsplitters," you say. "It's evil and it must be destroyed." Good luck. Call me when you're done.

by a reader on Wed, 07/02/2003 - 21:10 | reply

Not leftists, idiotarians

A reader is outraged by what he or she deems criticism of "leftists", but the piece was not about "left" vs. "right", it was about the word "idiotarian", which is NOT synonymous with "leftist". There are plenty of "right-wing" idiotarians too. And there are plenty of left-wing people who are not at all idiotarian. Tony Blair does not strike me as being very idiotarian. That is why a new word is needed. We can argue about whether the word "idiotarian" is the one to use or not, but let us not obscure the point that we do need to be able to refer to this group somehow.

--

Sarah Fitz-Claridge

<http://www.fitz-claridge.com/>

by Sarah Fitz-Claridge on Thu, 07/03/2003 - 23:13 | reply

true, true

It's true that this particular web community is a little more reasoned than many online outposts of "left" or "right." Libertarianism is an important thread in the overall Western political tapestry, and like liberalism, conservatism, socialism and freemarketeerism it's home to intelligent people and fools alike.

Which is why the term "idiotarian" is useless, in addition to being insulting. To recap: the sum of the argument here seems to be that the "idiotarian" is a person who chooses wrong over right, evil over good, dumb over smart, etc etc. The group can't seem to decide whether they are hoodwinked (like Lenin's "useful idiots") or conscious cultural saboteurs, but the bottom line of the definition is that idiotarians support what the anti-idiotarian considers wrong.

By this definition, there is an idiot in every occupied chair. Everyone is doing something wrong by someone's definition. Just as every political philosophy becomes idiotic when extended to its logical extremes.

Personally, the word suggests to me a person who has reached the illogical fringe of his or her ideological passion, and remains unable to see it. This would include lefties who preach world revolution, or righties who preach world domination, or libertarians who rail against government, etc etc. But the words "extremist" or "fundamentalist" or "ideologue" are much more descriptive, accurate, and useful in these cases. "Idiotarian" is an insult, nothing more, telling me nothing about the individual referenced and everything about the speaker's opinion.

So back to my original point: "idiotarian" is primarily useful for insulting people with whom one disagrees. It is dismissive, reductive, and, while catchy, juvenile. It implies that the "right" positions are so self-evident that only an idiot would fail to embrace them.

In fact, the "right" positions - on everything from military intervention to abortion to taxation to internationalism - are anything but clear. The jury is still way, way out on the dominant neoconservative American ideology of the day, whose rabid anti-tax, anti-state domestic policies would seem to be on a collision course with its overtly interventionist, strong-state foreign and anti-terror policies. And that is only the tip of an iceberg of confusion. As we globalize, nothing is clear, besides the fact that the competition for wealth, power and resources will only get more intense.

Which leads me to conclude that anyone who walks around laying blanket terms like "idiotarian" on anyone is as likely to be an idiot as they are to be right. Why would someone take such a chance?

Because it is fun and a rush to insult people. It makes the user feel large and in charge. It's a boner word. Some may use it in good faith and with reasoned justification (as there are, in fact, idiots in the world), but as I surf the net and the "anti-idiotarian" screeds that abound, it seems that the majority use it as a schoolyard dismissal for those whose opinions differ from their own.

by a reader on Wed, 07/09/2003 - 19:33 | reply

Idiotarian = someone we disagree with?

In reply to a reader above:

If you scan our posts, you will find that we use the term idiotarian quite rarely and very carefully, and only when no other term will convey the meaning. Our usage simply does not bear the interpretation but the bottom line of the definition is that idiotarians support what the anti-idiotarian considers wrong that you place on it. For instance, here we explicitly deny that a certain category of people with whom we disagree are all idiotarians:

But in any case, it's not just idiotarians. Why is nearly everyone, even the US administration, strangely subdued about this?

And as you scan our home page, you will see that we level vehement criticism at all sorts of people and schools of thought, without, in the great majority of cases, calling them idiotarians. Nor do we believe that they are.

by Editor on Wed, 07/09/2003 - 22:15 | reply

SO

... acknowledging that your site's use of the term is more measured than that of many others, what IS an idiotarian?

by a reader on Thu, 07/10/2003 - 00:51 | reply

what does the world think an idiotarian is? read the entry.....

quoting from the original entry:

The fact is, there is a huge and influential segment of Western public opinion which systematically sides with evil without itself adopting the evildoers' objectives.

back to my words, if you make excuses for terrorists, but do not want good people (or anyone at all, normally) to die, that's a good example

-- Elliot Temple

see, that's what's so frustrating

It sounds like a definition ... it looks like a definition ... but let's analyze it. A "huge segment" of society that "systematically sides with evil" ? That's not a definition, it's an accusation. Does that include the person who fills their car with Saudi gas? The person who voted for Reagan & through him supported the Taliban? The person who marched in New York to oppose Bush's war on Iraq because it didn't target Al Qaeda? The person who marched to demand a UN imprimatur on the Iraqi war? The person who marched because they believe killing is wrong?

Give me an example of someone (or some movement) you believe "systematically sides with evil."

Because, you see, everyone in America can be accused of that crime, just by virtue of our dependence on gasoline alone. Then there's all manner of arguably evil regimes which we either support (e.g. the Saudis, the Chinese communists) or ignore (e.g. Burma). Is our Congress entirely composed of idiotarians? Is our president an idiotarian?

by a reader on Thu, 07/10/2003 - 17:50 | reply

I love the internet...

...because nowadays I am sure to find someone who has bothered to write what I would have written, thus saving me the time and energy. So, thanks for that.

"Personally, the word suggests to me a person who has reached the illogical fringe of his or her ideological passion, and remains unable to see it."

Yes, "ideologue" is the word.

I suppose to people convinced of their Critical Righteousness, differentiating between the blind ideologue and the seeing bad guy is useful if one's project is to "Set to Right" someone who is wrong - and one wants to decide whether to use persuasion versus a shotgun...though Kolya's continuum theory is a little worrisome...especially if a shotgun-leaning crowd takes him a little too seriously...since, well, shoot them all, and be efficient, no?

The sad thing about this group of people is that they have, to my mind, always shared that "elementary school" tendency to name-call and form in-groups. Which is really too bad, because it means that they consistently lose the posters they need to challenge their theories so as to improve them; instead, they opt for in-group jokes and pseudo-criticism.

Thanks, again. A delightful read, your posts...

Siding with evil?

Someone wrote:

'everyone in American can be accused of that crime [siding with evil], just by virtue of our dependence on gasoline alone.'

How so?

by Alan Forrester on Sat, 11/20/2004 - 02:33 | reply

I'm not capable of complex thought, but...

I don't think it is a difficult as some are making this out to be: an idiotarian is, by definition, someone who, when given the definition, still does not understand what an idiotarian is.

In other words, if you "get it" you use the word sparingly to illuminate a specific lapse in internal-external consistency. If you don't "get it" you try to make the term apply to every possible situation, thereby rendering it senseless.

A simple picture:

A man named Henry purchases an apple from an apple cart. The apple vendor is a rabid anti-abortionist who uses his apple funds to target doctors.

Henry is not an idiotarian.

A known criminal has access to legally-obtained funds. A woman named Sue swallows her disdain for the criminal and her unsubstantiated fears that there is a hidden evil in the collaboration, and works with the criminal to fund a relief effort for poor children. The poor children benefit, but later the criminal robs an orphanage.

Sue is not an idiotarian.

One night a man named Herbert hears screams coming from his neighbor's house. The next morning, Herbert discovers the bodies of his neighbors stacked like firewood on their front lawn, and the killer sitting in their kitchen, enjoying a breakfast of ham and eggs. Herbert invites the murderer back to his house for a sympathetic conversation about his motives and a light lunch, in the hopes that he won't be targeted next.

Herbert is an idiotarian.

by A passerby on Fri, 02/25/2005 - 23:16 | reply

Fighting the Minions of W.A.C.K.I.E.

What is an IDIOT? What is IDIOCY? How can one tell? Who is fighting the war against them?

Good questions!

I'm glad I asked! :-)

Merriam-Websters has 2 answers:

IDIOT: A foolish or stupid person.

IDIOCY: Something notably stupid or foolish.

On IDIOTARIAN, IDIOTARIANS, and IDIOTARIANISM the compilers, and guardians of our beautiful and expanding language are sadly silent.

The snobbish nitpickers! Who appointed them to decide what constitutes a legitimate word in the English language?

Who in the hell do they think they are?

The freakin' French, for cryin' out loud??

My God! The Inhumanity!

I too have seen my share of idiots, and idiocy, and have written about it on MY Blog Sneakeasy's Joint over the past few years.

I, The Mad Macedonian, secure in my Branch MacejugoserbulgariGreekadonian Compound, on occasion expose the minions of the World Allied Conspiratorial Kongress of Idiotarians Everywhere (better known as W.A.C.K.I.E.).

by Kiril Kundurazieff on Sun, 05/08/2005 - 08:09 | reply

I've been reading this over,

I've been reading this over, having very recently been intrigued in this group from reading the excellent Taking Children Seriously site.

First of all, I'd like to state that I fall into the category of "Moral relativist but not idiotarian" mentioned previously. To me, moral relativism is not a denial of morality- far from it. It is the belief that it is impossible for humans to know true morality, or even if it exists, so they create their relative morality. Since one creates one's own, there is no excuse for hypocrisy or moral cowardice.

Second, instead of "Idiotarian," how about just simply "Amoralists?"

by a reader on Sat, 06/18/2005 - 11:05 | reply

'can't know truth with certai

'can't know truth with certainty' is fallibility, not relativism relativism denies there is a truth, and therefore that there is better or worse, more or less true. thus a relativist must insist there is no such thing as progress, and discussion never gets anywhere (where would it go?).

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 07/05/2005 - 22:41 | reply

Copyright © 2008 Setting The World To Rights

8. The Yom Kippur War

This is the eighth part of our acclaimed series, "A Short History of Israel". If you wish to read the preceding parts, see the Table of Contents for links to them. We welcome comments and criticisms. Do tell us what you think.

.....

Within months of the end of the Six Day War, Nasser embarked on the War of Attrition – a series of attacks by land, sea and air, predominantly on Israeli military targets. These were designed to be sufficiently frequent and deadly to force Israel to remain in a constant state of war-readiness, but on any particular occasion to be insufficient to provoke all-out war. Some of the aircraft participating in the war were flown by Soviet pilots who were among the 20,000 Soviet 'advisors' (in reality, soldiers and military technicians) who were stationed in Egypt.

Israel responded by shooting back, by building a line of massive fortifications along the Suez Canal, and also by retaliating harshly against both military targets and civilian infrastructure. Nevertheless the War of Attrition, which lasted from 1967 to 1970, cost Israel 1,524 dead and about 2,700 wounded.

Egypt sustained much higher casualties and enormous damage, and Israel showed no sign of withdrawing unconditionally. In 1970, Egypt and Israel agreed to a ceasefire proposed by the US, one of whose terms was that neither country would build new military installations within 50 kilometres of the Canal. Egypt immediately began doing so, installing state-of-the-art surface-to-air missile sites, supplied by the Soviet Union and manned by Soviet 'advisors'. A series of 'peace initiatives' by the UN and the US followed, all of which eventually dissipated because Egypt, supported by the Soviet Union, insisted on a promise of unconditional withdrawal as a precondition for negotiating. Nasser died suddenly, but his successor, Anwar Sadat, at first continued his policies unchanged.

Following the Six Day War, pan-Arab nationalism was in decline. Palestinian nationalism burgeoned. People who would previously have described themselves simply as 'Arabs', or 'Palestinian Arabs', became 'Palestinians', and most of them regarded the PLO as their national movement. A diplomatic and media campaign was launched in the West to legitimise the Palestinian nation, with the slogan 'a democratic and secular state in Palestine'. Arafat became leader of the PLO. He said in 1970: "Our basic aim is to liberate the land from the Mediterranean Sea to the Jordan River. We are not concerned with what took place in June 1967 or in eliminating the consequences of the June war. The Palestinian revolution's basic concern is the uprooting of the Zionist entity from our land".

In addition to murdering several hundred Israelis between 1967 and 1973, the PLO globalised its terrorist campaign. PLO terrorists attacked Jewish and Israeli targets in Europe. They hijacked Western airliners and held passengers hostage. They tried to take over Jordan, and the Syrian army entered Jordan intending to assist them. After King Hussein secretly appealed to Israel for help, Israeli aircraft flew low over the Syrian tanks and the Syrians turned back without a shot being fired. As a result the PLO were violently expelled from Jordan by the Jordanian army and fled to Lebanon.

Under the pseudonym 'Black September' (named after the month in which they had been expelled from Jordan), the PLO attacked the Olympic Games in Munich in 1972, holding eleven Israeli athletes hostage and then murdering them. Some of the terrorists were captured, but were released a few weeks later, allegedly in a secret deal between the PLO and the German government (under which Germany would be spared further terrorist attacks). Mossad tracked down the terrorists, and during the following years, killed all but two of them. One of those two was Abu Daoud, who in 1999 won the Palestine Prize for Culture for his autobiography, Memoirs of a Palestinian Terrorist.

In 1972, Sadat ordered all Soviet 'advisors' out of the country. Thus, in a move that was almost unparalleled during the Cold War, Egypt left the Soviet fold. Only four years earlier, Czechoslovakia's attempt to do something much more modest had been harshly suppressed by the Red Army. But on this occasion, the Soviets chose to comply. Syria now became, and remained until the end of the Cold War, the Soviet Union's principal client state in the Middle East. Sadat's immediate motive was to give himself more room for manoeuvre – and in particular, the option of making war in his own time and in his own way, without having to clear each decision with his superpower sponsor.

On October 6, 1973, in a brilliant and meticulously planned strike, the Egyptian army crossed the Suez Canal, overwhelming or bypassing the supposedly impregnable defences, and advanced into Sinai. At the same time, the Syrian army attacked the Golan Heights, recaptured them, and began advancing towards the Israeli border. Israel was caught completely by surprise.

Many factors had combined to bring this about. Intelligence about the Arabs' military build-up had been overlooked or misinterpreted. The Israeli defences were severely under-manned. In May of that year, a similar build-up had occurred, the IDF's Chief of Staff, David Elazar, had ordered a partial mobilisation, and when no invasion materialised, he and the government had been criticised for wasting public money. In August, Syria had massed a huge force on the border; Israel had ignored it and the force had been withdrawn.

October 6 was Yom Kippur, a public holiday in Israel and the holiest day in the Jewish calendar (hence this war is often called the Yom Kippur War), when many soldiers were home on leave.

On the morning of October 6, when the Mossad at last reported that an invasion would take place that evening (it actually came at 2pm), the government had refused Elazar's recommendation to launch a pre-emptive strike like that of 1967, because the US had warned Israel to confine itself to clearly defensive operations. The government also refused Elazar's request for full mobilisation, on the grounds that this might be interpreted as provocative. Only a partial mobilisation of 50,000 reservists was authorised. Later in the day, this limit was increased to 100,000. Elazar disobeyed these orders and sent out immediate call-up notices to 150,000 reservists, but even that was too little, too late.

The IDF's contingency planning had assumed that the Israeli Air Force could slow any enemy advance during the first 48 hours of an invasion. But in the event, Israeli aircraft suffered severe losses from the Soviet-built missile batteries on the Egyptian side of the Canal, and were prevented from flying low enough to affect the battle on the ground. The Syrians, too, had installed mobile missile batteries on the Golan Heights, with similar effect in that much smaller area.

The Syrians and Egyptians had assembled huge armies – a total of 1,150,000 soldiers. Only a small fraction of these were yet committed: the initial Canal crossing had been accomplished by an elite force of only 8,000 (against defenders numbering fewer than 500) immediately followed by a few tens of thousands. Syria had attacked with 1,200 tanks against the defenders' 170. On both the Egyptian and the Syrian fronts, the advances were slowed by the tenacity and sacrifice of small IDF units – most of whom had never seen combat before – and by the skill of local IDF commanders.

Israel appealed to King Hussein not to join the fighting – reminding him of his misjudgement six years earlier. Though at first he seemed to be heeding the warning, the IDF still had to deploy some of its overstretched forces (which by the end of the second day had reached 200,000, two thirds of its fully-mobilised strength) to defend against possible attack from Jordan. The Lebanese armed forces remained inactive, though PLO forces in Lebanon shelled Israeli towns that lay in the path of the Syrian advance.

During the second day, IDF reinforcements reached the Golan Heights and began to drive the Syrians back, but at the cost of heavy losses in lives and equipment. In Sinai, complex battles raged, but the Israeli reinforcements made no headway, succeeding only in preventing the Egyptians from advancing beyond the range of their anti-aircraft missile sites.

Both sides were now using ammunition and supplies at a prodigious rate, but the Soviet Union was replenishing the Arab armies in massive airlifts. Israelis were shocked when Britain refused to meet even existing contracts for ammunition. Britain had imposed another arms embargo 'on both sides', except that it continued to supply Jordan (which it considered a 'non-combatant'), and to train Egyptian military pilots.

About a week into the war, huge tank battles began – the second largest in history (the largest being the battle of Kursk in the Second World War). The Egyptian Army, having been reinforced and re-supplied, made a determined breakout from their positions on the eastern side of the Canal, heading for the passes through which Sinai could be crossed. The Syrians fighting on the Golan Heights were reinforced by 15,000 Iraqi troops and hundreds of tanks, as well as elite forces, with tanks, from Jordan.

The IDF eventually won both these battles, destroying a significant proportion of the Egyptian and Syrian tanks, and nearly all the Iraqi ones, though again at great cost in Israeli lives. But it had now run critically short of ammunition and equipment. In particular, its British-made Chieftain tanks, a key weapon on both fronts, were about to run out of ammunition and become useless. US President Richard Nixon, after long hesitation, decided to end his own embargo and re-supply Israel. However, Britain refused to allow its airfields or airspace to be used for this purpose. Portugal was persuaded to allow US aircraft to land en route to Israel, but most of these supplies arrived too late to be used.

IDF General Ariel Sharon, who had been urging an out-flanking counterattack across the Suez Canal since the second day of the war, was finally given permission to launch one on the ninth day. On its way to making the crossing, his force had the bad luck to run into two Egyptian divisions that had just been deployed there following the previous day's battle. It fought its way through and crossed on a pre-fabricated bridge. Its first priority then was to attack and destroy the missile batteries. The second was to cut off supplies to the Egyptian army on the east side of the Canal. This was eventually achieved, and with that, the war against Egypt was won.

Meanwhile a last, all-out counter-attack by the Syrians, Iraqis and Jordanians was defeated at the Golan Heights. The Arab armies were no longer capable of effective resistance. The roads to Damascus in the east, and to Cairo in the west, were open to the IDF. The UN Security Council convened and ordered an immediate ceasefire.

Despite the military victory, Israelis were profoundly shocked by the Yom Kippur War. 2,688 of them had been killed, thousands wounded, and it seemed to many that their world had come closer to being destroyed than at any time since the Holocaust. Israeli society and politics were permanently changed. Some concluded that the policy of retaining Sinai and the Golan as buffer zones had been vindicated, since a similar war starting at the 1948/9 ceasefire lines would have been fought out in Israel's cities, whose populations would have had nowhere to flee to. Others concluded that the war had proved that the concept of a 'buffer zone' was outdated and that the territories had no great military value: the enemy had crossed the border with apparent ease despite Israel's massive fixed defences, and victory had been achieved not through any defences but through counterattack. The huge scale of the war, the role that had been played by the Soviet Union and the decisive effect of advanced weapons (such as anti-aircraft missiles), made it clear to most Israelis that for the foreseeable future Israel's security would depend on a close relationship with the US.

The cost of the war – the equivalent of Israel's entire gross national product for one year – forced Israel to apply to the US for loans and aid. All this was demoralising in a culture that deemed itself to be predicated on self-reliance and self-defence. The ruling Labour coalition suffered a severe loss of public confidence, which it has never fully regained. There was a mood of national pessimism.

The effect on the Arab world was in some ways the mirror image of the effect on Israel: despite the catastrophic military defeat, heavy casualties and stupendous economic cost, the consensus among Arabs was that honour had been regained and that a significant strategic victory had been won. But on the other hand, Sadat, along with many Egyptians, also concluded that if even this assault had been repelled, despite its good planning, good cooperation among Arab states, surprise, modern weapons, force of numbers, enthusiastic superpower assistance, and good luck, then Israel was there to stay. Also, Israel's new relationship with the US would make it all the stronger.

Four years later in 1977, after a series of successful US-brokered 'disengagement agreements' in which Israel returned parts of Sinai in return for Egyptian promises to keep it demilitarised, Sadat exploited the new mood in Egypt in a way that astounded the world: in a speech to the Egyptian Parliament, he declared his willingness to make peace with Israel.

Part 9: The Rise of the PLO

Thu, 06/19/2003 - 18:07 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

why?

The only comment that I have is that this website talks for Israel more than it does to the Arabs, and that is not a nice thing to do I think. If you guys like Israel that much the just at least do not say bad things at the Arabs because the Arabs are not just animals , but they are human just like you are. In my opinion, the Arab were fighting in the Yom Kippur war not because they hated Israel, but because they wanted to take their lands back. Thank you.

by manar on Wed, 04/13/2005 - 14:13 | reply

Re: why?

In this document we have done nothing other than summarise the history of factual events.

However, your opinion that "the Arabs were fighting in the Yom Kippur war [...] because they wanted to take their lands back” – in other words, attributing to the Egyptian and Syrian governments in 1973 the basic Israeli position of land-for-peace – is completely ahistorical. It is incompatible with, for instance, the Declaration of Khartoum (see Part 6) and with the entire conduct of Egyptian and Syrian military and foreign policy during the run-up to that war and long afterwards.

by Editor on Fri, 06/03/2005 - 16:29 | reply

I think you should reconsider

I think you should reconsider your last comment, that the Arabs were fighting to recapture lost lands was completely ahistorical. Any student of Israeli-Arab history can see that the Arabs ventured to war in 1973 for two reasons: to erase the stigma of defeat after the 1967 war and to recapture the Sinai and the Golan. I think you should look again at the entire conduct of Syrian and Egyptian military and foreign policy leading up to the war. In fact, they differed immensely. Syria believed Nasser, that what had been taken by force could only be taken back by force. Egypt hoped instead to shock the Israelis into accepting his overtures for negotiations over the Sinai. These divergence of war aims led to the Arabs' ultimate defeat, as the Egyptians carried out only limited attacks into the Sinai after their initial crossing of the Suez and Israel could fight the Arabs piecemeal. At the end of the war, Israel had Egypt by the throat, but not Syria. Syria, in fact, made life very uncomfortable for the salient of Israeli forces had pushed into their front. But the war, as you mentioned, woke the Israelis up. After '67 they thought of themselves as a mini-superpower. But the war, far from shocking the Israelis to the negotiating table, alarmed them. They knew they could no longer let the Syrians and Egyptians wage a war against them on two fronts. This led Kissinger to include as a foreign policy objective the intention to drive a wedge between the two countries, for Arab independence and Arab unity, especially after Nasser turned apparent defeat in '56 into victory, was anathema to the IDF.

Dear Editor or Manar: If you disagree with my comment, please email me. I'll be glad to discuss this with you. If you issue a response, also email me please.

by James on Sat, 05/13/2006 - 02:28 | reply

Any assistance would be great

I am currently in my final year of high school and i am studying at the moment Arab-Israel history. I am presently completing an assignment on the Yom Kippur War and subsequently i am surfing the web looking for information. So my question is would you be able to guide me to some other sources of information if at all possible.

And by the way this site has been extremely helpful thus far in regards to research.

Any assistance would be greatly appreciated.

Roy

by a reader on Mon, 07/24/2006 - 02:12 | reply

yom kippur war

this is good and has some sources listed at the bottom

<http://www.jewishvirtuallibrary.org/jsource/myths2/1973War.html>

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/blog/>

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 07/24/2006 - 04:59 | reply

Re: Any assistance would be great

Martin Gilbert's book is good. So is Elliot's link above.

<http://domino.un.org/UNISPAL.NSF> is an archive of documents relating to the UN/LoN and Israel/Palestine. Can be searched, but also browsed by date. So you can impress your examiners by citing primary sources.

by Editor on Mon, 07/24/2006 - 07:07 | reply

Assistance was very useful

I just wanted to thank you Mr Temple for your assistance and the site you guided me to was very helpful.

Thankyou

by a reader on Tue, 07/25/2006 - 13:09 | reply

YOM kippur

i just wanted to say that the main reason Egypt is said to have lost the Yom Kippur war is because of the US. The US provided the Israelis with enormous amounts of support. including the sat. pictures that stated to israeli generals that there was a gap between the 2nd and 3rd army. in addtion, If Saddat wanted to end the Israeli occupation of the Middle East he could have ended their existance if he had decided to eliminate his 3rd army along side the WHOLE israeli army. giving the arab nations involved an advantage because israel would have no defense and in at moment the world would notice the support that the US was giving Israel when they would immediatly defend israel with all their might.

by a reader on Mon, 11/13/2006 - 06:52 | reply

home | archives | polls | search

Copyright © 2008 Setting The World To Rights

The Yom Kippur War

The eighth installment in our acclaimed series, "A Short History of Israel", is now up. Here is a quote from The Yom Kippur War:

Under the pseudonym 'Black September' (named after the month in which they had been expelled from Jordan), the PLO attacked the Olympic Games in Munich in 1972, holding eleven Israeli athletes hostage and then murdering them. Some of the terrorists were captured, but were released a few weeks later, allegedly in a secret deal between the PLO and the German government (under which Germany would be spared further terrorist attacks). Mossad tracked down the terrorists, and during the following years, killed all but two of them. One of those two was Abu Daoud, who in 1999 won the Palestine Prize for Culture for his autobiography, Memoirs of a Palestinian Terrorist.

If you have not read the preceding parts, you can find them linked from the Table of Contents.

Thu, 06/19/2003 - 18:39 | permalink

Subdued Reactions to the Iranian Protests

Why are the current protests in Iran, which might seem to represent everything that the Left stands for, receiving little or no support from the Left? Why, given that they may be the beginning of an enormously important change in the geopolitical scene, are they receiving remarkably little coverage in the media? Many bloggers, including, for instance, Andrew Sullivan and Meryl Yourish (and references therein), have been commenting, but no one seems to have an explanation.

Also, is it really the Left, or is it idiotarians? Is their silence telling us something about the nature of idiotarianism? (Check out the excellent discussion about idiotarianism in the Comments on our item here.) But in any case, it's not just idiotarians. Why is nearly everyone, even the US administration, strangely subdued about this?

Fri, 06/20/2003 - 20:50 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Is it Islam or the Axis Of Evil?

Probably, the Administration is playing Iran quietly because the president doesn't want to fuel the belief, still simmering in the Middle East, that our War On Terror is really a campaign against Islam. Iran is an explicit theocracy, so the connection would be too easily established.

Mind you, I think that 1) Washington ought to come out explicitly in support of the overthrow of the theocracy and 2) announce that its anti-terror campaign really is aimed at defanging and civilizing Islam. But the Administration doesn't hire a lot of hairy-eyed vendors of flamethrower rhetoric who advocate nuking the Moon, so my views are, ah, under-represented there.

Curmudgeon Emeritus, Palace Of Reason

by fporretto on Sat, 06/21/2003 - 01:14 | reply

Fiery protests in London

"Two more people have set themselves on fire outside the French Embassy in central London on Friday"

<http://news.bbc.co.uk/1/hi/england/london/3006746.stm>

And the same has happened in other European cities.

Can you imagine the coverage this would have got if Iraqis in Europe had done this to protest the Iraq war? But if Iranians protest the Iranian regime, or France's complicity, that's not news.

by a reader on Sat, 06/21/2003 - 02:39 | reply

Some views from an Iranian Student

Someone has finally noticed it, Halleluyah!

Here are my views, as a participant in these demonstrations, concerning the reasons for this lack of coverage:

US administration: Well, since Carter's administration showed its superhuman lack of judgement in Iranian politics, we in Iran have been convinced through the years, that a major part of the US admin. simply doesn't know what to do with Iran. In these days, the actions of the US state department show clearly that it is the centre of the ignorants as far as Iran is concerned. We here are hoping the neo-conservatives finally win over the Iran policy to see , at last, some rational US policy in Iran.

The argument that US backing of the protests will jeopardize the 'purity' of Iranian protests and might back fire is utter RUBBISH! We in Iran have passed this stupidity , almost purified by suffering these past 25 years, of 'America is GUILTY for everything'. We, my generation ie. the youth, have FINALLY understood, that the west consists of different ideas and groups . that not all of it is pure goodness, but a major part of it represents actually the best of what humanity has been able to achieve, and that it should be ideas and actions of each group that determines whether or not they should be supported or trusted, not some worn prejudice! So we NEED U.S. active support for our struggle for freedom, believe us!

EU: well, I think you all know that EU policy is that of pure hypocrisy and near-sighted economical gains in the middle east. They are literally plundering Iran in return for their clandestine support for the regime. We have no expectations from THEM!

The Left and the Media: well, you know the answer already, as is clear from other posts in this webpage.

by a reader on Fri, 07/18/2003 - 23:06 | reply

Anti-Semitism Watch: European Union, Malaysia

In the early 20th century, the Tsarist Russian secret police distilled the essence of traditional anti-Semitic conspiracy theories into a document, the Protocols of the Elders of Zion, purporting to be the master plan for The Jews to take over the world. It has been a staple of anti-Semitism ever since – and also a red flag: for surprisingly often, as soon as casual anti-Semitism takes that additional step beyond snide remarks about ‘a shitty little country’ and crosses the line into out-and-out evil, you will find the Protocols.

The Protocols are cited in the Charter of Hamas, as one of the justifications for their objective of driving the Jews out of Israel through an uncompromising and unrelenting campaign of mass murder.

The European Union still draws a distinction between various branches of Hamas. Thus the EU's pretence of not being complicit in mass murder hinges on the idea that there is some sort of firewall within Hamas, such that when a murderer asks for funds, the administrator says “sorry, the Jew-killing will have to wait until more jihad-enabled funds come in; all the millions currently in the account are earmarked for arms dumps hospitals and suicide-bomber indoctrination factories primary schools”. And the murderer says “oh, OK then”.

In a speech at his Party's annual assembly last week, Prime Minister Mahathir Mohamad of Malaysia gave one of his notorious diatribes, touching on anti-Western, anti-Israeli and anti-Semitic themes. Party officials at the assembly handed out copies of The International Jew, the anti-Semitic tract written by Henry Ford (yes, the Henry Ford – though he later renounced it), which contains – guess what? – a version of the Protocols. To the best of our knowledge, no Western leader has criticized either the speech or the reading matter provided.

Former New York Mayor Rudi Giuliani was once again at the right place at the right time doing the right thing this week as he led the US delegation to an international conference on anti-Semitism. That such a conference took place at all is a very good sign. That many of the nations participated unwillingly is not so good.

Copyright © 2008 Setting The World To Rights

Embryology Authority Runs Amok, Tries to Kill Child

The Powers That Be are in a shameful state of moral confusion about embryos and stem cell research and all that sort of thing.

Take the case of James Harry Whitaker for example:

James Harry Whitaker was born on Monday after being genetically matched, while still an IVF embryo, to his four-year-old brother Charlie, who has a rare form of anaemia.

His parents Jayson and Michelle had to travel to the United States after UK authorities refused to give them permission for treatment

[...]

The [Human Fertility and Embryology Authority] defended its decision not to allow treatment, however. A spokeswoman said the outcome of the Whitaker's case would be considered as evidence for a future review of guidelines, but it was unlikely to lead to immediate changes in the authority's policy.

She said: "We have to look at the benefit for the embryo, not just the sibling. Perhaps some day in the future our policy will change. But at the moment we have to be quite strict in the way we issue licences, on a case-by-case basis, and looking at the scientific, medical, and moral issues before making any decision.

But what she really means is that they are refusing to take into account the moral issue, and are taking refuge in sticking to the Regulations, however odious and immoral. If a four-year-old child is thereby condemned to death, well, they are only following orders so they can't be doing anything wrong, right? And maybe they'll change their policy some day in the future! What kind of a moral defence is that, for killing a child?

"There is clear guidance. HFEA policy states that women are allowed to have treatment only for the benefit of the embryo. It is a tough decision to make."

The HFEA said Charlie's case differed from that of Zain

Hashmi, whose parents were granted permission to screen a new baby to save their son, because Zain's rare blood condition was hereditary.

The authority said in the Hashmi case the potential child was at risk from the disease, but in the Whitaker case, the primary purpose of the child would be as a donor and the child was at no extra risk of contracting the disease Charlie had by virtue of being his sibling.

So, just to make this clear: the British government's policy is that it is all right to have Child 2 via IVF and embryo-selection in order to try to save Child 1 from a horrible life-threatening disease if and only if there's a significant risk that Child 2 might get the same horrible life-threatening disease. However, if there is no such risk then the parents are not allowed to select Child 2 in order to save Child 1.

Take a deep breath and consider the Alice-in-Wonderland-type non-logic of this position. In the case where the parents could end up with two children with the disease, the treatment is deemed to be right. In the case where at least one child definitely won't have the disease it is deemed to be wrong. So wrong as to justify letting a child die for lack of it. If the policy were the other way round the government might have a point, but this is just insane.

The argument for it is supposed to be that it is wrong to have the embryo undergo a medical procedure that is not for his benefit without his consent. But first, embryos that do not yet have brains cannot think and so cannot give or withhold consent, nor can one get a person's consent to bring them into existence. As we said, if the procedure in question involved a significant risk to the 'saviour sibling' (as they are known in this field), there would be a moral issue here, but all the actual procedure involves is taking cord blood that would just have been thrown away anyway.

So this is an issue over which the US authorities are saner than the British ones. Note also that the American Medical Association seems to be sensible too – they support allowing stem cell research. Anti-abortionists object to such research since it involves small clusters of cells that come from dividing egg cells that might otherwise develop into people. Presumably since masturbation or contraception kill millions of sperm that might otherwise develop into new people, they are morally equivalent to mass murder. All together now:

Every sperm is sacred.

Every sperm is great.

If a sperm is wasted,

God gets quite irate.

Sun, 06/22/2003 - 14:45 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

You know...

As a pro-choicer with many friends and loved ones who are pro-life (most of them female), I get rather weary of the tired old "well aren't sperm and eggs human too?" chestnut. If you can find a pro-lifer on the planet who believes that, I'd be shocked.

There is a perfectly reasonable moral position that human life begins at conception--one which can be constructed on entirely non-theistic grounds, in fact, and there are a number of atheist pro-lifers. I tend to believe that, even in jest, rhetoric like yours here tends to make reasonable people roll their eyes rather than really think about the issue.

I think a lot of people interested in putting forward stem-cell research would get a lot farther if they stopped treating their opponents as irrational boobs and fools. It may be emotionally satisfying but I'm not sure it's going to get the results you want.

by a reader on Mon, 06/23/2003 - 15:40 | reply

The status of sperm

There is a perfectly reasonable moral position that human life begins at conception--one which can be constructed on entirely non-theistic grounds

So, please tell us what it is, briefly. Then we'll understand why pro-lifers shouldn't believe that sperm are sacred.

by Tom Robinson on Mon, 06/23/2003 - 19:00 | reply

Human Life -- The Prequel

Though the sperm is a nonviable product, and the egg is much the same, the sperm-egg combination is both viable and genetically distinct from either of its parents. Accidents and deliberate molestations notwithstanding, it will mature into recognizably protected human life. There is no qualitative change along the way that separates the zygote from the baby it will eventually become.

Aristotle would have had something to say here about "essence versus accident."

Now, before anyone puts words in my mouth, this is not an airtight case for banning all abortions. Among other considerations, that question must account for the enforceability of such a law, the cost of enforcement in terms of other rights sacrificed, and the loss of respect for all law that would follow if it were widely violated without penalty, as we have good reason to believe it would. (E.g., Brazil, which has the strongest anti-abortion laws in the world, suffers more than 1,000,000 abortions per year, by conservative estimates.)

However, it is a strong case against the deliberate creation of zygotes and embryos for the purpose of sacrificing them for the benefit of others.

Curmudgeon Emeritus, Palace Of Reason

by fporretto on Mon, 06/23/2003 - 21:31 | reply

Or an alternative...

Would it be possible for sperm to be considered sacred while also acknowledging the fact that they typically do go to waste? Like, 99.999% (not sure how many nines to put there) of the time?

You can consider rain to be sacred without wishing to bottle up every drop of it that might hit infertile ground, after all. It's possible to respect the raw materials of life without taking it to Catholic levels.

Not that that's important, really... just remarking.

Stem cell research issues are different from pro-life issues in a subtle but essential way. You can go back and forth on whether or not a fetus is a human being for ages without coming to a definite conclusion, but you do need that definite conclusion before you can go creating a market for fetuses. Saying, "It's not human because we reeeeeally need it," is probably not going to work.

In a way, abortion actually makes the stem cell debate more difficult. If the only available fetuses were the ones lost naturally, then the few who raised a ruckus over them would be ignored. Sort of like that pesky medicinal marijuana issue: it wouldn't be a problem to legalize it if only people wouldn't keep getting high off the stuff. ;)

- Ewin

by a reader on Mon, 06/23/2003 - 21:45 | reply

Only a loon loves a spermatozoon

Though the sperm is a nonviable product, and the egg is much the same, the sperm-egg combination is both viable and genetically distinct from either of its parents.

Why is a lone sperm not viable, does it not thrash its tail with great purpose and competently carry its unpaired chromosomes?

If that doesn't persuade, why not rewind to the point where the successful sperm is just about to plink through the outermost membrane of the giant ovum. Here we have a viable physical system that's genetically distinct from the mother. But that description also applies to her chocolate labrador. In fact, until the fertilised egg has anchored to the womb wall, her chocolate labrador is more viable (assuming she remembers to feed it). And every time a virile man passes a fertile young woman on the street there are trillions of genetically distinct and viable sperm-egg combinations within a 3-metre radius. Are they then morally obliged to go out for dinner that evening?

enforceability of such a law ... the loss of respect for all law that would follow if it were widely violated

Isn't the law to do with morality? Don't people want to be moral?

Would it be possible for sperm to be considered sacred while also acknowledging the fact that they typically do go to waste? Like, 99.999% (not sure how many nines to put there) of the time?

Not really. What if the Archbishop of Canterbury decided to dynamite all England's cathedrals except York Minster? Everyone in the Church of England would hate him, even the Bishop of Reading.

Sacred just means extremely valuable. It's used by some people because they're not allowed to value something unless it's loved by a supernatural being first. Something is either valuable to you or it isn't. I need water to survive. However, a particular raindrop would only be valuable to me if I was both about to die of thirst and I happened to pipped to the ground in exactly the right place at 3:17pm face up with my mouth open, etc.

There are some things that are supposedly sacred but in practice are not treated that way. For example, a scrawny cow wandering around a Delhi slum, chewing on cardboard.

If sperm are sacred they should all be frozen in sperm banks by law until some time in the future when we've constructed sperm paradise.

Saying, "It's not human because we reeeeeally need it," is probably not going to work

Has anybody actually said that?

by Tom Robinson on Tue, 06/24/2003 - 18:38 | reply

Where Does The Line Fall?

Your word games are rather silly, Tom. An individual sperm cell or ovum has no claim to anyone's indulgence. Unless sperm and ovum are mated under specially supportive circumstances, neither has a chance of ever acquiring the human status that would entitle it to rights. A purposive act committed under a narrow range of conditions is required to form a human zygote.

BUT... once the sperm and ovum have been allowed to form a zygote, you DO have a creature that, in the absence of violence or accident, would develop to human status. To create a human zygote for the purpose of killing it is to treat it as indistinguishable from a meat animal: a support to human life with no independent significance.

Here's a clarifying question: Imagine that the zygote was allowed to mature beyond the usual few days at which stem cells are extracted from it. I think you'll grant that after 18 years, we'd all concede that the result possessed a right to life. Probably most of us would grant it a lot sooner. So when does that right actually attach to the developing zygote... embryo... fetus... baby... toddler... preteen... "Dad, can I borrow the car tonight?"

We're not talking about a "regular" gestation here, so the usual legal dividing line of emergence from the mother's body is absent. What age, event, or other discrete consideration would cause this creature to acquire a right to life? What is the qualitative change that brings about personhood?

Curmudgeon Emeritus, Palace Of Reason

by fporretto on Tue, 06/24/2003 - 22:07 | reply

Re: Where Does The Line Fall?

Curmudgeon:

"once the sperm and ovum have been allowed to form a zygote, you DO have a creature that, in the absence of violence or accident, would develop to human status."

Does a sperm-egg pair immediately prior to conception satisfy this criterion or not?

by David Deutsch on Tue, 06/24/2003 - 22:45 | reply

sigh

Okay, some facts (even if rule #32 of "Rules of abortion debates (derived from calvinball rules)" states "It is halal to weigh the facts cited by anti-abortionists as equal to the facts cited by pro-choicers.")

Sperm and Eggs are technically called gametes, and are said to be haploid, meaning that each has exactly one half of the genetic complement necessary for a human being. Neither is in a position to even multiply: Eggs are specialized cells, and the number that a female has are fixed while still in the womb. Sperm are generated by a process known as meiosis, a specialized form of cell division that results in cells having half the genetic complement of the original, which WAS a normal cell, and which are incapable of further division. Without the capability of division, they cannot multiply and sustain an organism themselves. Both are of human origin, with DNA that can be clearly identified as being human in origin. If not, then how else could authorities, using sperm samples from a raped woman, be able to positively identify her assailant? Conversely, several convicted "rapists" have been freed when DNA analysis of the sperm samples proved that the sperm didn't come from them.

But is the combination, before union and merging of the DNA, a human? Alas, the very question betrays an earnest effort on the part of Mr. Deutsch to avoid the implications of the subsequent fusion which not only DOES have a full compliment of provably human DNA, but starts dividing and growing as if there was no tomorrow. This is done by insisting that pro-lifers have a focus that they do not possess, being an accusation that neither the author of this topic, nor the other supporting commenters thereof, have proven or demonstrated. Instead, a ditty from a non-prolife web site is uttered: It rhymes. It supports an unproven accusation tailored to ignore the facts and divert attention away from the interesting sleigh of hand that subtly changes the discussion from that of embryos, to eggs, to sperm, as if to imply that all are the same thing. Thus, TRUTH has also been uttered.

Hasn't it?

yeah, riiiiight.

The question is also rather pointless: ALL human beings alive today have come about by the fusion of a definite egg and a distinct sperm that FORMERLY were separate. If this obvious fact is supposed to raise suspicions about the humanity of those destined to be aborted, it also should raise suspicions about the humanity of those not aborted. It seems to me that the distinguishing characteristic between those that are aborted and those who are not, does not lie in the method of conception that ALL human beings share.

I am quite sure that, if one looks long and hard enough, you will be able to find a web site or some wild preacher who supports the sentiment that "sperm are sacred". Of course, I am way ahead of you already, since I have, quite providentially, already discovered a pro-abortion website whose authors and commenters demonstrate an abysmal knowledge of human biology that could only be explained by them having failed Sex ed in high school. They actually don't know the difference between sperm, eggs, and embryos! Can you imagine that? If they know so little about human biology, what makes them think they know anything about what God thinks about sperm, eggs, and growing embryos, much less about what He thinks about a practice that discriminates against a human being based on their age and possessing a temporary physical disability?

Back to the topic at hand. The incident cited is pretty much a demonstration of the failure of socialized, government run medicine. In such a structure, there are NO insurance companies doing screening for appropriate "interventions", so the government has to do the screening, so as to preserve resources for the truly needy, and not waste them on hypochondriacs. The confusion of the author is understandable, since it would involve entertaining the, probably astounding, concept that the fetus is a patient. If a fetus has a problem, then intervention is justified: if it helps someone else, then that's a bonus. But the fetus does not have a problem, then it does not qualify as a patient. Medical intervention is not required. Authorization denied.

Sure, the fetus can be a donor, but the rules currently require that the donor give their informed consent. As with everything else, an exception to these rules has to be raised with respect to fetuses. If this exception is not honored, then The Basis For Abortion Is Mortally Threatened, And We Cannot Have That, Can We? (nudge nudge wink wink)

Unfortunately, if one has to consider the fetus as a patient of a human doctor, then it just might be because it itself is a human, deserving of patient rights. No one less than Dr. Bernard Nathanson, a staunch promoter and defender of abortion rights changed his opinion on abortion when he became a professor of pre-natal care and was forced to consider the implications of regarding beings he used to butcher as his patients!

I am not surprised that this thought did not occur to the editor: I am currently writing a conjecture at my website that postulates the possibility that pro-abortionists suffer from a fundamental inability to process the concept that a fetus is a human being "created equal, and endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights," to the same extent and with the same efficiency as the concept that "a woman has the right to choose to kill an unborn human being." (yes, yes, I know the standard line is supposed to be that she has a right to choose an abortion. I took the liberty of substituting the definition of abortion in place of the word itself. That IS the definition of Abortion, isn't it? When it comes to setting the world to rights, clarity of definition and the eschewing of euphemisms would be helpful, no?)

Ugh, I forgot to sign up. My Nom-d'internet is Ptah Aegyptus, e-mail ptah at sixies dot net .

by a reader on Wed, 06/25/2003 - 02:09 | reply

Abortion

Ptah Aegyptus wrote:

Sperm and Eggs are technically called gametes, and are said to be haploid, meaning that each has exactly one half of the genetic complement necessary for a human being. Neither is in a position to even multiply: Eggs are specialized cells, and the number that a female has are fixed while still in the womb. Sperm are generated by a process known as meiosis, a specialized form of cell division that results in cells having half the genetic complement of the original, which WAS a normal cell, and which are incapable of further division. Without the capability of division, they cannot multiply and sustain an organism themselves.

No one is disputing that fetuses have distinct human DNA. That would be rather absurd. The debate is not over the facts, but rather the moral implications of the facts. "A fetus is a person" simply does not follow from "fetuses have unique human DNA that can develop into a person unless it is aborted". If it did, then it would convince people who think that abortion is wrong if and only if fetuses are people. Since it doesn't, additional arguments are necessary.

Ptah Aegyptus also wrote:

Can you imagine that? If they know so little about human biology, what makes them think they know anything about what God thinks about sperm, eggs, and growing embryos, much less about what He thinks about a practice that discriminates against a human being based on their age and possessing a temporary physical disability?

Before humans had discovered the difference between sperm, ova, and growing embryos, was it wrong to have a position on abortion? If so, was it then wrong to oppose abortion?

~Woty

<http://woty.davidsj.com>

by Woty on Wed, 06/25/2003 - 03:04 | reply

Uh huh. Yeah...

Woty wrote:

No one is disputing that fetuses have distinct human DNA. That would be rather absurd. The debate is not over the facts...

Really? takes another look at the initial topic and the subsequent comments, eyes big as saucers Hmph. Sure fooled me. However, I will leave it to the judgment of the truly inquiring and open minds who will come after, read this topic and the comments, to decide if I could be forgiven for having taken literally the confessions of ignorance as to the differences between sperm, eggs, and embryos, or demonstrations indicating the lack of knowledge thereof.

but rather the moral implications of the facts. "A fetus is a person" simply does not follow from "fetuses have unique human DNA that can develop into a person unless it is aborted". If it did, then it would convince people who think that abortion is wrong if and only if fetuses are people. Since it doesn't, additional arguments are necessary.

Ah yes, the "human being is not a person" distinction, made sacred by the bald assertion of 7 old men in a building in Washington DC in 1973. Actually, the statement that "persons have unalienable rights" is equally in the same position: it depends on who sets the definitions, and whether there is a physical reality to "unalienable rights", on the same level as physical things and actions such as "human beings" and "abortion". Those things and actions can be pointed at and discussed without self-serving ambiguities. Retreating to a position deliberately rife with ambiguities is a good defensive position, but does not lend itself to being regarded as a person wanting to make a moral decision.

A bit of history: when the Dred Scott case was decided, Chief Justice Taney made a distinction between persons and citizens, ruling that Dred Scott couldn't sue for his freedom because he wasn't a citizen, and thus had no standing to sue.

When the 14th Amendment was added, the authors deliberately chose the word "person", instead of "citizen", precisely to avoid Chief Justice Taney's self-serving, artificial, loophole creating, distinction. No doubt, after it passed, they slapped the dust off their hands and thought smugly, "There! THAT problem won't come up again!"

And darned if, a century later, the Supreme Court went and did it AGAIN!

sighs Oh well, I suppose I shouldn't have been surprised that a society that vitally relies on the loophole creating assertion that "A human being is not a person", would eventually wind up with a debate on "what the meaning of the word 'is' is," should I?

But don't think that this charade hasn't been noticed.

Woty wrote:

Before humans had discovered the difference between sperm, ova, and growing embryos, was it wrong to have a position on abortion? If so, was it then wrong to oppose abortion?

Let's be blunt: Abortion is supported because it solves a set of problems posed by a woman who has an unwanted pregnancy that would come home to roost the moment the "fetus" (greek for "unborn child" BTW) becomes a born fetus.

Some more history: The set of problems arising from an unwanted pregnancy have existed since time immemorial, with abortion being the most modern "solution" that is deemed the "cleanest", most "sanitary", and "socially acceptable" alternative to the previously practiced solution of infanticide. Some cultures and societies accepted it as a valid solution to the aforementioned set of problems, and allowed its practice. Others did not. As a culture, we (apparently) decided it was "wrong", and chose to neither practice it nor tolerate its practice. (Before the development of the partial birth abortion method, the preferred method for aborting pregnancies beyond 8 months involved performing a C-section, removing the "product of conception", and leaving it squalling in a bucket in the operating room. Nurses were fired for raiding said buckets and taking said refuse to be adopted. In my mind, the distance between that and infanticide is not spacious.)

Alas, the problem of unwanted pregnancies, eventually resulting in the appearance of inconvenient human beings, still remained. It doesn't seem to matter to some that over 99.99% of the persons in the world are human beings. Extend the definition to 100%? Oh no!

Can't have that! An exception must be raised when it comes to the human Fetus, and if this exception is not honored, then the Moral Basis For Abortion Is Mortally Threatened, And We Cannot Have That, Can We? (nudge nudge wink wink)

Ptah

by ptah on Wed, 06/25/2003 - 14:02 | reply

Confused (yet again)

I don't understand what this whole thing is about. Aren't the 2 children alive and well? I'm confused. So they had a baby designed to be as genetically close as his brother so they could use cord blood to save him, what does that have to do with abortions? Or am I missing something?

Also, how come sperm is the same thing as an embryo? And you forgot to mention menstruation, but they didn't make a song out of it :D

Leo,
<http://eraserewind.blogspot.com>

by Leo on Wed, 06/25/2003 - 15:34 | reply

Moral divide over moral dividing line.

Ptah wrote:

An individual sperm cell or ovum has no claim to anyone's indulgence. Unless sperm and ovum are mated under specially supportive circumstances, neither has a chance of ever acquiring the human status

An individual zygote or uterus has no claim to anyone's indulgence. Unless zygote and uterine wall are mated under specially supportive circumstances, neither has a chance of ever acquiring human status.

To create a human zygote for the purpose of killing it is to treat it as indistinguishable from a meat animal

The purpose of an unwanted pregnancy is not to terminate the foetus, the unwanted pregnancy is typically a byproduct of poor contraception. The original purpose was simply to make whoopee.

What does it mean to consider that whatever makes a human being important as a human being is present in a small cluster of cells? It means that a mature conscious human being is indistinguishable from a meat animal. It also brings much real misery into the world in countries where abortions are illegal or hugely frowned upon.

We don't yet agree on where the moral dividing line can be drawn. According to child psychologists long-term memory doesn't set in until the age of two. Thank goodness they're not in charge.

by Tom Robinson on Wed, 06/25/2003 - 15:52 | reply

blinks

Tom Robinson quotes:

Ptah wrote:

An individual sperm cell or ovum has no claim to anyone's indulgence....

I beg your pardon, Mr Robinson? Please check your references before posting, sir, for it was fporretto you quoted, not I.

And I suggest considering the differences between the categories of kind and degree. At least Woty agrees that, in principle, there is no difference in kind between a zygote and an octogenarian, in that they are the same kind of being. Terms such as zygote, embryo, fetus, baby, child, toddler, pre-teen, teen, and adult are terms of degree, distinguishing between stages of physical development driven by time. To look at an embryo and complain "it doesn't look like a human being to me!" is to be misled by appearances. We allowed science to disabuse us of the notion, when we looked up at the sky, that we were the center of the universe: "Look at how they all go around US!" Its about time we allowed science to disabuse us of other superficial notions as well.

I agree with your statement in one respect: The human zygote (being human by possession of human DNA, by the way, and thus does not need to "qualify" for that distinction) has many hurdles to leap before it meets the artificial criteria set forth to qualify for protection under the law as a more privileged "person". It is one thing for it to fail due to possessing genetic flaws or being unable to attach to the uterine wall, or some other NATURAL hurdle that ALL pre-born human beings must surmount. It is quite another for it to be proceeding along swimmingly, only to be premeditatively terminated to prevent it from qualifying under the artificial criteria now in vogue separating certain human beings from more "privileged" persons, and for reasons which, if appealed to when "premeditately terminating" a "person", would land them in jail. Or the electric chair.

BTW, blowing away a competitor who's threatening to qualify to run a race is clearly illegal, but am I the only one who has the nagging feeling that it's unsporting as well?

Ptah

by ptah on Wed, 06/25/2003 - 17:15 | reply

Interaction counts.

Sorry to Ptah and to Fporretto for my quotation error above.

Ptah,

Yes, the fertilised egg and the eighty-year-old person that it develops into are the same kind of thing in terms of DNA. They are different stages of the same biological organism. However, they are not the same kind of thing from a moral perspective.

The moral status of something should not be based on what it might or probably will eventually become but on what it actually is now (including perhaps a record of its history). The point about abortions and stem cell research is that we can safely and effectively change what embryo cells can become.

It seems super-unlikely that a small lump of cells can think, hurt, make a choice, perceive colour, anything like that. The philosophy of mind emanating from The World accords with Karl Popper's theory of knowledge which implies that a mind develops by trial and error. For this trial and error to get underway you need ongoing interaction with a rich environment perceived by well-developed sense organs. Not much (in any) of this has happened before birth.

It's not so much

it doesn't look like a human being to me

It's more like

it doesn't interact like a human being to me

We don't yet have agreement on where to draw the line. The pro-lifers' DNA argument puts the line way too early. This wouldn't matter so much except for the fact that much conspicuous evil results from the sperm-meets-egg starting line or the related "ensoulment" idea. And also because we might be able to do so many good things with embryonic stem cells and by pre-screening frozen embryos. I don't see why we shouldn't eventually allow ourselves to alter germline DNA. Immunity to AIDS spliced in?

by Tom Robinson on Thu, 06/26/2003 - 00:52 | reply

Monkeys Are "Potential Humans"

Rocks too, btw. They just need to be effected in just the right way. If you're confused, there's a quote something like: practically anything can be a computer if you shine the right kind of light on it. and of course the being effected could involve re-shaping the rock, adding stuff, etc...

if you claim adding stuff is not allowed, i'd insist that an egg and sperm wouldn't be able to get larger in size w/out adding stuff from outside themselves. if you claim design is not allowed, well it's not impossible, just unlikely, with rocks and monkeys.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://curi.blogspot.com/>

by Elliot Temple on Thu, 06/26/2003 - 01:49 | reply

"...from a moral perspective": Tom Robinson

Moral perspective? MORAL PERSPECTIVE?

sighs

Well, I suppose, since the debate no longer revolves around what is now acknowledged as the known facts, that some progress has been made. However, you sounding a trumpet call to move the debate from the clear, sunny fields of known facts into the dark, boggy swamp of post modern American morals, where the only belief that certainly will be voiced, once within, will be the belief that nothing is certain, informs me that you do not share my opinion that we are making "progress".

sighs again

Well, if you insist.

Oh by the way, before we commence...

By what right, by what code, by what standard?

VOICE it, sir. Voice the particulars of the "moral" code that you are using to decide what is right and wrong in this debate. If we are to run into a swamp, hoping to lead others after us, let us at least demonstrate the quality of our maps and compasses to those who put their trust in us, so that they may decide if the paths have a chance of leading to light, rather than into an infestation of alligators.

All in favor of avoiding the alligators, fall in over there by the tree. All not in favor, please go back home to mommy before you hurt yourselves.

At the risk of being tedious and lengthy yet again, I shall assert mine.

I hold that, within the context of a secular society, that Human Life is the supreme value, and is the criterion upon which all other morals, laws, practices, beliefs, and behaviors, are to be judged. While I do not deny the existence of other values worthy of pursuit, I hold that, within the context of a secular society, they are LESSER values, and MUST YIELD as subservient when their pursuit involves the injury or death of another human being. Instead, they form a hierarchy, some more important than others, but with their status determined by the degree to which they advance and support the supreme value of Human Life. To believe that there exists some other value, moral, law, practice, belief or behavior as being higher than human life means that, in the event of conflict, that human life must yield, and may be taken if necessary for the sake of the higher value. I hold that the only thing worth killing for is to support the DIRECT preservation of Human life.

All in favor of the death penalty only in the case that human life is taken, and not when the violator has offended some practice, belief, behavior, or a person's finances or material "quality of life", please follow me.

I hold that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable Rights, that among these are Life, Liberty and the pursuit of Happiness. Based on this, and understanding that the rhetorical use of the word "men" is shorthand for all members of the human race, I assert that the definition of a "lesser class" of human being is that they possess fewer rights than the "privileged class". For all humans to be created equal, each human must possess the same rights. This is not rhetoric. This is not opinion. This is Mathematical Set Theory. Any mis-distribution of rights is, by definition, discriminatory.

All in favor of all human beings having the same rights, please follow me.

However, I DO NOT hold that all discrimination is wrong. All issues of right and wrong are based on whether the society's key values are violated or upheld. In American society, a form of discrimination based on age is logically, yes necessarily and enthusiastically, pursued. Laws are passed excluding young members of the society from certain activities and duties, as well as prohibiting older members of the society from certain behaviors toward the young that would be otherwise permissible and defensible. These laws, invariably, can be demonstrated as having the goal of protecting the life of the young, in deference to the supreme value of Human Life, but in clear opposition to the important, but definitely lesser, value of "liberty". Nevertheless, society rightly deplors discrimination, and so all these laws have strict time limits to ensure that this discrimination is not a permanent feature in individual lives, and that "paternal laws" are not imposed on those who require no parents. So important is this principle that many bad laws are passed using the ruse that it "protects the young".

All who normally oppose discrimination, but favor a time limited form of discrimination in order to ensure that the young are protected until they are ready to protect themselves, please follow me.

Not a complete list, but a good start. The remainder won't make sense until we're in the swamp and at a fork in what passes for a path through it.

Ptah

by ptah on Thu, 06/26/2003 - 16:30 | reply

Crossing the line

Ptah wrote:

"I hold that, within the context of a secular society, that Human Life is the supreme value, and is the criterion upon which all other morals, laws, practices, beliefs, and behaviors, are to be judged. While I do not deny the existence of other values worthy of pursuit, I hold that, within the context of a secular society, they are LESSER values, and MUST YIELD as subservient when their pursuit involves the injury or death of another human being. "Instead, they form a hierarchy, some more important than others, but with their status determined by the degree to which they advance and support the supreme value of Human Life. To believe that there exists some other value, moral, law, practice, belief or behavior as being higher than human life means that, in the event of conflict, that human life must yield, and may be taken if necessary for the sake of the higher value. I hold that the only thing worth killing for is to support the DIRECT preservation of Human life."

What counts as a human being? It can't simply something that's alive and has human genetic material, if it was blowing your nose or scratching your arse, both of which kill cells would be morally equivalent to mass murder. So what is the relevant criterion?

Well, let's think about this. Suppose that an AI were created by running suitable software on a silicon based computer with an architecture close to that of the human brain and that it was capable of having conversations, learning new things and so on. Would you feel comfortable with pulling the plug on it? I am going to presume that the answer to that question is no. It follows that the class of things one is allowed to kill is not dependent on biology but instead on thinking.

There is no particular reason to suppose that embryos think while they are in the womb and many reasons to presume otherwise. These include things like it would not be evolutionarily advantageous to think before leaving the womb, babies being very stupid when they pop out and so on. Whether this specific theory about when the child thinks or not is true is debatable, but there must be some point between conception and when the child starts to talk when the baby starts thinking before that point it is not a thinking person, after that point he is. Correspondingly the child's moral status changes after crossing that line, before it crosses the line it doesn't count morally, afterward he does.

One last thought experiment, one of the molecules that enables stem cells to grow into any kind of cell has been discovered. Sooner or later advances like this will make it possible to turn any cell into any other kind of cell and at some point we'll be able to turn any cell in the body into a new human being. Based on your policy of taking measures to make sure that any cells that are biologically human and could be grown into people are grown into people there are two responses to this. Either, we must force everybody to have cell samples taken and made into human beings at the maximum rate that can be done without killing them. Or we must stop the development of such technology. In either case we will be forced to turn the West into a closed society. Which policy should we adopt?

by Alan Forrester on Thu, 06/26/2003 - 18:17 | reply

Don't worry folks...

THIS won't take long.

Mr Forrester, let's do another thought experiment.

You scratch your arse.

NOW you scratch your boss's wife's arse.

Moral: the difference is only DNA.

Another thought experiment.

You shoot yourself.

NOW you shoot your bo-

Uhhh, skip that.

However, the difference is still only DNA.

Ptah

by ptah on Thu, 06/26/2003 - 22:29 | reply

What, Me Worry?

Ptah,

Your reply to Alan indicates to me that you didn't understand his comment.

His point is that DNA does NOT make the person, and you persist in asserting that it does.

If you and your boss' spouse were identical twins with identical DNA, it would still make a difference whose ass you scratched because you'd be different people!

A person is not DNA. A person is a mind that can grow knowledge. A bunch of cells that might someday become a person is not a person yet.

by Gil on Fri, 06/27/2003 - 23:48 | reply

Oh really?

Gil, I shall leave it to other readers, with a more questioning and impartial frame of mind, and who will bother to read ALL the posts AND who possess a memory to remember them between the time they start the page and the time they reach YOUR comment, to decide if I ever claimed that DNA was a person. It is to accuse me of ignorance of biology. Again, I will leave it to those other readers to decide who REALLY knows, demonstrates, and attempts to argue based on a knowledge of biology, and who does not.

Did YOU bother to read BOTH posts? I invited ALAN, a male, to scratch a female's arse. DNA would be the way to determine if the cells under his fingernails was his or his boss's wife's. I did not say, as you imply I claim, that his Boss's wife is now under his fingernails. And it is a known fact that identical twins are of the same sex. Reducto ad absurdum works against the question only if you show that MY supporting argument is contradictory by being absurd, not if you use the Straw man fallacy, assert I used different premises (identical twins), and THEN prove the resulting argument as absurd. Nor has Alan disproven the proposition that a zygote is deserving of the same protections as adults despite its stage of development by Reducto by merely DECLARING it absurd: The question of whether it is absurd or not is implied by the argument under question. Declaring it absurd and then claiming to have disproven it via Reducto is itself the fallacy of Arguing in a circle.

While on the subject of Reducto, I point out that, when responding to the proposition that a human zygote (fertilized egg) is deserving of the same protections as an adult human being (which, in the current legal environment is a synonym for being a "privileged" person), it is NOT proving contradiction or absurdity to say that the logical consequence will be that it will be required that all human eggs and all human sperm MUST be joined into human zygotes. The question revolves around how a human zygote should be treated after it is created, not the irrelevant (and purposefully distracting) question of whether a human zygote is to be created in the first place, and whether failing to so is a violation of the rights of a human being that doesn't yet exist. For the record, I personally have no problems whatsoever violating the dignity, rights or sanctity of the minds or bodies of nonexistent human beings, and will vigorously defend the right of existing human beings to do the same against non-existent human beings.

However, just because you don't see it, doesn't PROVE that it doesn't exist. Hell, in science, sometimes even SEEING it still doesn't prove that it exists!

(And don't pull a dowsism by quoting my statement and removing "nonexistent" from the sentence. I don't think anyone here is that big of a prick, but don't disappoint me, please.)

While on the meta-subject of proof, I should point out the predilection of using the word "person" instead of "Human being" upon which you and others insist upon. Before Roe Vs. Wade, if you had bothered to ask anyone on the street, they would have said that the two were synonyms for the same set of human beings. The Supreme Court did not PROVE that there was a real difference. They DECLARED that the two terms were different. It was argumentum ad baculum appeal to the stick of their authority. I remind people that such arguments have declared fallacious, and that it is okay to ignore the "argument". (That doesn't mean that their proposition is right or wrong, just that they were lazy and took a stupid short cut.)

I have no objections to Alan blowing his nose or scratching his own arse and rendering havoc to his own cells, since they can be provably shown to be his own via their DNA. "I can do what I want with my own body" is axiomatic and is not being questioned here. PROVING its ONLY your own body you're mucking around with is a far different matter. Let us not resurrect the old chestnut that "The baby is part of the woman's body, and she can do what she wants with her own body, so abortion is not wrong." Please leave THAT old nag where Biology shot and buried her. If you wish to debate the issue of "what if the mother cloned herself?", then you are free to do so, but how would any conclusions we reach debating THAT side issue apply in the (vast) majority of pregnancies where the mother did NOT clone herself?

I will leave it to others to decide if Alan's appeal to technology that currently exists only in the future as moral justification for behavior taking place in the here and now, is persuasive.

I suppress the temptation to make a snide comment about the cognitive facilities of pro-abortionists, and instead must marvel at the non-appearance of a pro-abortion derivative of the troll: Past experience on Usenet made me expect one to have popped up three days ago. This is a credit to the visitors to this site: We may disagree, and may try hard to push our viewpoints, but I, for one, feel that the discussion has been civil so far.

Ptah

by ptah on Sat, 06/28/2003 - 15:40 | reply

Calm down a bit, there

Well, Ptah, you did reference "...the implications of the subsequent fusion which not only DOES have a full compliment [sic] of provably human DNA, but starts dividing and growing as if there was no tomorrow" in your initial effort to counter the 'every sperm is scared' theory. I readily admit that this quote should not be interpreted as "a single cell is a person, simply because it has a full complement of DNA." I think that your capital-letter condemnation of Gil was a bit uncivil, though-- especially since I plucked that quote from your first post (unless you were the anonymous first poster). I waggle a reproving finger at you.

Fortunately, we all agree that gametes deserve no protection, and that children who have been born do. The pesky nine months in between, though, have been quite the bone of contention.

The original article actually was concerned with in vitro fertilization, and under what conditions the creation of fertilized eggs not intended for gestation is acceptable. Since Ptah believes that humanity begins at fertilization, it then follows that the creation of multiple zygotes from which to make a selection is wrong. Also, the extraction of embryonic stem cells from a zygote (which basically destroys it) is wrong.

I disagree. While there is some biologist bias at work in my case, I believe that (for example) an eight-cell embryo, which is no larger than the original egg and nominally undifferentiated, is not a person. Unfortunately for me, this view robs me of a convenient demarcation line for when humanity begins.

There is some confusion on the original subject of the seemingly absurd British view on embryo selection. The reasoning behind it was touched upon by Ptah, but I believe that I can clarify. The government policy does indeed ignore the health of Child 1 (who is hardly a "hypochondriac")-- but by allowing embryo selection in the case of a heritable condition, the policy's intention is to prevent a "case where the parents could end up with two children with the disease" that the author feared.

I disagree with this policy, just as the author did. If it is moral to use embryo selection in order to ensure that Child 2 is disease-free, then it is at least as moral to use such selection to save the life of Child 1.

-Mitch

Rising Nucleotides

by Mitch on Mon, 06/30/2003 - 06:52 | reply

Hmm...

Mitch writes:

I think that your capital-letter condemnation of Gil was a bit uncivil, though-- especially since I plucked that quote from your first post (unless you were the anonymous first poster). I waggle a reproving finger at you.

You admit that it's quite a stretch from what I said to what Gil said I was saying. The question revolves around whether he made an honest mistake of interpretation of what I said, or tried to twist what I said into something else for the express purpose of creating a straw man upon which to argue Reducto ad absurdum. My conclusion, given the care I've tried to be clear, was that he was attempting the latter. My response was definitely not the customary way pro-lifers handle pro-abortion proponents like him, or Alan for that matter, and I thought a lot about the consequences before hitting the "post" button. Before you waggle your finger at me, however, ask yourself if you would have wagged it at a pro-abortionist smacking down, in the same way and manner, a pro-lifer who committed the same faux pas. Let me clue you in: pro-abortionists wouldn't have hesitated a microsecond if the victim was a pro-lifer, and would have used much more sarcastic terms to put them, and all other pro-lifers, into as unfavorable light as possible.

Somehow, I get the impression you would have smiled and given the pro-abortionist a pass.

Mitch also said (emphasis mine):

While there is some biologist bias at work in my case,

Thank you for stating your possible bias.

I believe that (for example) an eight-cell embryo, which is no larger than the original egg and nominally undifferentiated, is not a person. Unfortunately for me, this view robs me of a convenient demarcation line for when humanity begins.

That last sentence, which I bolded, precisely articulates my concern: There has to be an undeniable, undisputable, unquestionable "demarcation line for when humanity begins." I will assume that your use of the word "convenient" means, "easy to identify".

Mitch continues:

I disagree with this policy, just as the author did. If it is moral to use embryo selection in order to ensure that Child 2 is disease-free, then it is at least as moral to use such selection to save the life of Child 1.

This is going to probably be misunderstood, but I'll try: I agree with Mitch that both statements are part of the same set of morals, and that it is contradictory to hold one to be valid and the other not valid. You accept one, you have to accept the other. My concern is that there are other moral statements that are "necessarily" part of the same set that, by the same reasoning, are decidedly unsavory. (such as "It is morally acceptable to exploit the body of one human being without permission to help another," and "The intentions held by one human being is sufficient justification to determine the destiny of another human being," among others.)

I put "necessarily" in quotes, since I am always willing and ready to re-evaluate my arguments and reasoning as to their moral kinship, and believe that "reasoning together", rather than "debating", is the preferable way of confirming or denying what I believe. Believe me, I've TRIED to do that, but it just seems to me that most pro-abortionists freak out when asked to evaluate arguments that entertain seriously, even if only for the sake of argument, the premise that their concept of personhood doesn't scale, or shouldn't scale.

To give credit where due, you, Mitch, are the most likely person I've encountered that's capable of doing that.

Ptah

by ptah on Tue, 07/01/2003 - 13:25 | reply

ahhh crumbs...

By that last line, I'm mean that Mitch is capable of entertaining seriously, even if only for the sake of argument, the premise that their concept of personhood doesn't scale, or shouldn't scale, without "freaking out". That's supposed to be a compliment.

Ptah

by ptah on Tue, 07/01/2003 - 13:28 | reply

Meta

Ptah,

I don't want to get involved in an elaborate meta-discussion about who said/meant what, but in case you're interested, your conclusion:

The question revolves around whether he made an honest mistake of interpretation of what I said, or tried to twist what I said into something else for the express purpose of creating a straw man upon which to argue Reducto ad absurdum. My conclusion, given the care I've tried to be clear, was that he was attempting the latter.

was wrong.

Your "argument" was:

You scratch your arse.

NOW you scratch your boss's wife's arse.

Moral: the difference is only DNA.

By this I thought you were saying that these two actions, which yield radically different social repercussions, were different entirely because the skin cells under his fingernails would have different DNA after these actions. I was led to this conclusion, partly because you have asserted that the time of conception was a reasonable demarcation point largely because that's when the cells contain a full complement of DNA.

I changed the scenario, knowingly, to identical twins to show that it is NOT the DNA that makes the difference, but that in fact two people have completely separate identities independently of their DNA makeup. A small change to your scenario illustrates how wrong this approach of over-emphasizing the DNA is. I was not trying to imply that my scenario was yours. I was trying to imply that yours, as I understood it, proved nothing interesting, and that DNA does not constitute personhood, but, rather, minds do.

I also was not trying to characterize your position as saying that his boss's wife was under his fingernails, just that the DNA difference is somehow vital to this scenario rather than the identity of the scratchee. I was saying that the DNA and the identity of the scratchee are different things, and used the identical twins to show that.

If I have misunderstood your argument, perhaps you could state it more explicitly so that it would be clearer to me and, perhaps, others.

by Gil on Tue, 07/01/2003 - 17:40 | reply

The game is afoot!

I've been examined and analysed. Cool. :-)

In referring to the point at which humanity begins, I think that I meant 'convenient' in an intellectual sense. This is approximately the grayest gray area known to man, and here I am, only certain that the transition to possessing individual rights occurs... somewhere... during gestation.

Moral issue #2: "The intentions held by one human being is sufficient justification to determine the destiny of another human being."

I'm interpreting the reference to destiny as referring to genetic makeup. This is certainly a moral issue. Anyone who agrees with the creation of 'spare' zygotes is likely to also accept screening of said zygotes for a Horrible Genetic Disease that the parents are known to carry. Intentional selection of a 'savior' child is the next moral step. Farther up the ladder, there are things like selecting for gender... and by that point, a decent portion of people will have strong reservations.

Moral issue #1: "It is morally acceptable to exploit the body of one human being without permission to help another."

This is, indeed, a bit... 'morally rude,' if you will. You cannot get the permission of a newborn baby, but neither can she deny it. This does not make a procedure automatically acceptable, of course. In the example in the original article, it seems that only a sample of cells from the cord was necessary, and I believe that would steer around this moral issue. If we had a theoretical situation where a tissue or organ had to be taken from the actual body of the infant, then a risk/benefit analysis would ensue. There could easily be situations where you could get most people to agree that the righteousness of the help trumped the moral concerns about permission to take a sample.

I don't think that I understand what you mean about the scaling of the concept of personhood. It takes an awful lot to make me freak out, though. And, for that matter, a shouting match serves no intellectual purpose. So, do write back.

Mitch

Rising Nucleotides

by Mitch on Wed, 07/02/2003 - 00:09 | reply

Note to self...

You're better as the straight man...* Given the nature and shortness of my post, I'll take responsibility for not being clear enough and causing confusion on Gil's part.

Gil first. Whether something is "interesting" or not is not only personal, but quite subjective: I don't think O.J. merely thought that the DNA evidence gathered at the crime scene pointing at him was merely "interesting". In fact, he had an incentive to make sure everyone agreed it "wasn't interesting". "Interesting" wasn't on his mind when he heard that.

You're probably thinking that I think that unique DNA defines personhood. Not my intent: Your Arse is yours, so you scratching it should have no consequences. Scratching an arse that's NOT yours potentially DOES. The appeal to identical twins only means that there is one chance out of 6 billion plus that the identity test will fail. Not zero, but close enough to me. Heck, the DNA evidence against OJ was good to 1 out of a million: good enough to force the defense team to attack the chain of custody instead of the test itself.

Currently, this is not an issue: I would say that 100% of the people doing embryo research TODAY are not doing it on their identical twin's embryo. Neither are abortionists, nor their paying customers. Would you bet against a DNA match in those cases? I don't think so.

What happens when cloning becomes common? Good question, and I thank you for the initial question that helped me realize a few interesting episodes in Star Trek, Next Generation. There was one where a world full of clones took the cells of Riker and the substitute doctor (whose name I forget) to clone fresh bodies. Riker and the doctor went in and terminated their own clones. The leader called them murderers, but I wondered why they didn't think themselves so. It just became clear: There'd be all kinds of abuses of clones based on the "Its my DNA, so I should decide what to do with cells from my own body" argument. (Doesn't hold water for pregnant women, but does for clones) Slaves? Sources for body parts? Certainly there'd be laws governing the creation of clones and their disposition, since one can picture abuses of human beings that, by your definition, would be people. However, there should be no doubt that people who make clones of OTHER people to exploit for their own purposes would be guilty: Not the same DNA. Not THEIR DNA. (This is hypothetical, discussing laws of a fictional government governing a technology we don't have yet. Need to think about it, though.)

BTW, Here's a link to a reference on birth rate of identical twins, which puts the twinning rate at 4 per 1000. Thus, it works out that slightly more than 99.2% of the people DON'T suffer from this problem.

Now Mitch: "The game is afoot!"??? looks around what ARE we hunting for? If it's for the truth (or at least enough solid ground to base a realistic morality upon), then I'm game. No bag limit, I hope!

Firstly, on the question of "destiny". I used the term to refer to determining the future of the unborn human being in question. Will they live or die? What will they be used for? After they have served their purpose, what will they be their fate?

Let's think about this: the parents are NOT screening AGAINST the disease in question, but deliberately FOR the disease. One of the (I admit very strong) arguments FOR abortion is to PREVENT the birth of such children and their subsequent misery. If to save child A from X, they want to conceive child B WITH the Disease, then who's to save Child B? Another child C, also with X? A vicious cycle that can only be prevented by ABORTING child B before birth, but AFTER taking what they need to save Child A (Moral #1). If this was their intention from the beginning, then they're deciding the destiny of B (Moral #2). I heard of one woman who sex selected and gave birth to a second child, for the express purpose of providing a compatible kidney for his brother.

It's very late, and I desperately need to get to bed since (speaking of arses),

I'm up to mine in alligators at work. What I mean by "scaling of personhood" is the notion that someone starts off with 0% personhood, and as it grows, gets more personhood, with it reaching 100% shortly before birth. shakes head What CAN you do with a 30% person that you can't do with an 80% person? Moral quagmire IMHO, since the vast majority of our experience has been with 100% persons, and the experience of treating negros as 2/3rds of a person wasn't what we would NOW call a raging success. "Human being" is more precise and scientific. Should we use HB instead because we want to save keystrokes?

G'night all. gets bad feeling he left something out, though

Ptah

by ptah on Thu, 07/03/2003 - 03:32 | reply

It was very sticky, and I couldn't move

I recall that episode of Star Trek: TNG, and my interpretation was that since the crewpeople hadn't given permission to be cloned, and duplicating a person without permission being a very bad thing, the only way to rectify the situation was to terminate the clone before he or she emerged from the tube. A standard 'lesser of two evils' sort of choice.

Later, on Deep Space Nine, Odo tells us that killing your own clone is still murder. In that case, the clone was already a walking, talking person, so we would all likely agree that person had rights as an individual. I do not feel that this is inconsistent with the earlier Star Trek example, and not just because I support abortion. The actions of Riker and co. were somewhat justified because the clones were wrongfully created in the first place. Quite the mess, really.

Back in the real world, I'm coming to the conclusion that anything which involves an unborn baby is, indeed, a moral quagmire. (Ah! I used the Q word) You bring up an interesting example on the subject of scalable personhood. The infamous "three-fifths compromise" in the US Constitution is, in fact, the only example I can think of where people are counted as a specific fraction of a whole person. Those were definitely unfortunate times in human history, but being 60% of a person in the eyes of Congress wasn't the crux of the matter. The central issue is that slaves were property, and therefore had no rights recognized by the government, so you could do whatever you wanted to them, and there was no legal recourse. Embryos and fetuses are in a similar situation today, since they lack legal personhood-- though there are laws on these matters. What I cannot tell you at this time, unfortunately, is how things should be.

I support the vague (and therefore vulnerable to attack) position on abortion that after the fifth month or so, it shouldn't be done. "You didn't take responsibility, and get it over with when you should have." Pro-choice people generally disapprove of positions or laws like that, because it gives the pro-lifers an inch, when (by definition) they want the whole mile.

It would be easier to just pick up an "Abortion is always acceptable" placard, but I just don't believe that. At, say, eight months, I can't see a sufficient difference as compared to infanticide.

"sigh" I obviously need to think about this futher. I think I'll do a piece on some aspect of the matter over at Nucleotides, especially since I haven't done anything on a biological subject yet.

by Mitch on Sat, 07/05/2003 - 22:19 | reply

nods

Sorry for the long delay: Still up to my hips in alligators at work.

Given the litigious nature of our society, I wouldn't be surprised if we eventually get some kind of legislation on cloning and the rights of the original owners of the cells from which the clones originate.

Personally, to me the problem is not as much that the situation is a quagmire (it certainly is), but that many don't seem to want to agree on what a signpost in the quagmire would look like. I'm not talking about disputing about particular signposts, but more like not wanting to adhere to any principles that would allow us to recognize a signpost if we happened to run into one.

For me, a helpful method has been to seek to avoid prejudice and hypocrisy. It means asking "do I want to discriminate against someone because of their age? Because of their physical appearance? Because of any temporary physical disability?" I couple these considerations with a healthy appreciation of the (historically proven) ability of human oppressors to rationalize and justify their behavior. In some correspondence with Leo (who commented earlier), he mentioned that, in the presence of doubt, one should err on the side of caution and prudence.

One of these days, I shall definitely have to pop by Nucleotides and see what you have, mitch.

Ptah

by ptah on Thu, 07/10/2003 - 18:53 | reply

Summary, Questions, and Meta

I'm trying to frame the arguments in a more concise way so I can understand them. Questions from me start with a B:

This might be wrong, missing some arguments, and some of this is inferred, so feel free to correct:

Shared assumptions:

A human starts after a human sperm and human egg join to form an embryo. As soon as they're together, they're an embryo and they're human.

B: Side question from me, at what point of their joining is it a human?

Innocent persons should not be killed.

(Possibly also "Innocent intelligent beings should not be killed.")

Pro-embryo life:

A human is the same as a person.

An embryo if not interfered with will develop into a full-grown human and therefore should be considered human.

Pro-abortion/Pro-choice:

A human isn't the same thing as a person.

To be a person, a creature requires both human DNA and a mind.

An embryo doesn't have a mind and is therefore not a person.

An embryo requires sustenance and can't develop independently without it, so the idea that it will develop into a human without interference is questionable.

B: It seems that from the court case, that British law implies that an embryo + the agreement from a willing donor to provide sustenance (not to abort) is a person?

B: What exactly is a mind? How does one know whether another creature has a mind? A certain mass of brain cells? A certain demonstration of intelligence?

I'm putting the meta at the end so people can skip it if desired:

So far the argument has been very slow to come to actual explanations for believing one side or the other. I'm finding this a bit frustrating as I seem to have a very short attention span. It's not a mental illness so much as a not being eager to read lots of junk in order to get the point. I prefer more conciseness in arguments and for other stuff to be obviously separated so I can skip them if I want. Maybe follow this format and put meta at the end?

It doesn't seem right to ridicule those who disagree with one - to assume that one's evidence and arguments are so obviously clear that only an idiot would believe something else (I don't think even an idiot deserves ridicule. Pity maybe.) This seems counter-productive and just not very nice.

I think this could even apply to making fun of ideas. People get their self-image mixed up with their ideas pretty frequently, I think. Making fun of their ideas could make it more difficult for them to accept the potentially better idea. Accepting the better idea becomes linked with accepting that they are stupid idiots who deserve ridicule.

Of course, everyone is free to do what they want. I appreciate the authors who have kindly provided this forum even if I don't always like the jokes.

Cheers,
Becky Moon

by beckyam on Sun, 07/17/2005 - 14:51 | reply

Define "viable"

A fertilized egg removed for the womb could not survive. At conception you have 1 1/2 cells. No organs, no brain, nothing distinguishable. 1 cell. Consider the second before conception - sperm a millimeter away from egg. Human? Consider a moment later - sperm touching egg. Human? Consider a moment later - sperm partially inside egg, but genetic material still separate. Human? How about when DNA has entered the egg, but not yet the nucleus? Or when it has entered the nucleus but not yet integrated with the egg DNA. Which of these events defines conception?

Just as there is no concrete point at which you can call an embryo a human, also conception itself is an arbitrary point in time. It seems to me that it makes more sense to define the development of a brain and the capacity to feel pain as defining human - even though that does not happen at any exact time.

Your concessions for incest and rape are proof that you recognize a fundamental difference between babies and embryos.

No one who supports exceptions to anti-abortion laws would ever suggest that it would be OK to kill an already born baby because of rape, incest, or health problems.

Just so you know, I used to be "pro-life" myself, and I held the same arguments you do. I do not, therefor, look down on your opinion as stupid. I respect atheist pro-lifers far more than religious people (who only know what's moral if a book tells them), especially when they are anti-war and anti-death penalty. It is at least consistent.

I believe, however, that it is misguided.

The basic principal for action should always be whether or not a particular action hurts an individual. An "individual-to-be" is no more capable of being hurt than an "individual-who-could-be" and therefor it is a reasonable comparison to say that abortion is no more or less moral than allowing a woman's period to pass without fertilizing her - as that is an egg which could develop into a human, if...

by Jay Aziza on Wed, 12/20/2006 - 19:54 | reply

“What The World Thinks”

As part of their ongoing campaign of anti-Americanism, the BBC recently presented a programme based on a worldwide poll of attitudes to the USA.

(Incidentally, in their trailers for this abomination, they happened to say something true: “It's time to hear what The World thinks.”

QuickTime movie

Sound only

OK we're kidding. The capitalisation of the link in the quote is ours. Here is the full context. Notice how the American flag casts an ominous shadow across the world as it passes overhead.)

Anyway, the poll was a pointless exercise. We already know what ‘the world’ (in that sense) thinks: it thinks that it would be a much better place if more aircraft were to hit American buildings. There is neither authority nor wisdom in this opinion, just spite.

Thu, 07/03/2003 - 13:37 | permlink

It Takes All Sorts

Frank's President is abducted by Belgian agents.

Woty has more to say about the nature of idiotarianism, including a discussion of whether the Pope is an idiotarian.

Apple Computer have announced some great new hardware and software.

Scrappleface has two characteristically trenchant arguments disguised as humour. Pity he's opposed to abortion.

James Randi rightly castigates the Canadian province of British Columbia for giving official credence to "Traditional Chinese Medicine".

All of them Setting the World to Rights, in their own way.

Mon, 06/23/2003 - 22:54 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

British Columbia

BC is an interesting place - its main exports are marijuana, timber, and gas (in that order); its main imports are heroin and unemployed Newfies.

The move to officially recognize "Traditional Chinese Medicine" is probably a consequence of the great increase in BC's Chinese population in the years since Thatcher munished Hong Kong. However, this blog demonstrates its unfamiliarity with BC politics in its assumption that the government is capable of giving credence to anything.

by a reader on Tue, 06/24/2003 - 18:33 | reply

Macblaspheny

See

http://www.thehoucks.com/happynowhere/Apple_Switch_Parody_DivX.avi

http://www.thehoucks.com/happynowhere/Apple_Switch_Parody_DivX.avi

by a reader on Wed, 06/25/2003 - 15:12 | reply

Copyright © 2007 Setting The World To Rights

9. The Rise of the PLO

This is the ninth part of our acclaimed series, "A Short History of Israel". If you wish to read the preceding parts, see the Table of Contents for links to them. We welcome comments and criticisms. Do tell us what you think.

.....

Six months before Sadat's historic policy change, a Likud-based coalition had taken power for the first time in Israel. So it now fell to the Likud leader, Menachem Begin, a former Irgun commander, longstanding champion of the cause of unrestricted Jewish settlement, and implacable opponent of any hint of appeasement, or trust, of Israel's enemies, to decide how to respond to Sadat's overture.

On the same evening, Begin invited Sadat to Jerusalem to address the Knesset.

The broad elements of the peace treaty – peace and recognition for Israel, in return for the Sinai peninsula, which Israel had captured from Egypt during the Six Day War – were agreed immediately. This was the first time that any Arab nation had agreed to the principle of the partition of Palestine. But the details became the subject of gruelling negotiations which lasted until 1979. For the Israelis, one of the most difficult of the Egyptian demands was that the Jewish settlements that had been built in Sinai be evacuated, but they eventually agreed to this. In an operation overseen by Ariel Sharon (then a member of the Cabinet), 2,800 bitterly resisting inhabitants were forcibly evicted by IDF soldiers, and their homes and orchards razed to the ground to make it impossible for them to return.

Sadat and Begin shared the Nobel Peace Prize for this treaty. To this day, Egypt and Israel have adhered to it. They maintain fully accredited embassies in each other's countries, trade is officially permitted, as are tourism and all other normal exchanges between neighbours. No threats of war, implicit, explicit or indirect, are issued. Egypt does not tolerate the launching of terrorist attacks on Israel from its soil (though Israel has a longstanding complaint that Egypt does not prevent the smuggling of weapons to terrorists operating from Gaza). However, although the treaty required the parties to "seek to foster mutual understanding and tolerance and ... abstain from hostile propaganda against each other", there was no specific provision for a cessation of anti-Semitic incitement in the Egyptian press and other government-controlled media, or in the mosques and schools. Such incitement continued to increase. Today, very few Israeli businesspeople or tourists actually visit Egypt, because of the risk to their lives.

The rage of the Arab world was turned against Egypt. All Arab countries broke off or scaled back diplomatic and trading relations with it. Saudi aid was cut off. But the US made good the financial losses, and Egypt came to be regarded as a US ally in the region. Gradually, relations with the Arab world have been restored, so that by now, the only significant hostility that remains towards Egypt is from Islamic fundamentalists. However, Egypt has still not regained its former position as the generally accepted leader of the Arab world. Iraq under Saddam Hussein tried hard to take over that position.

With the assistance of France and Germany, Iraq began to build a nuclear reactor at Osirak, for the purpose of manufacturing nuclear weapons. When Iran (which was fighting a bitter war with Iraq at the time in which some one million people were to die) had attacked this reactor but failed to do much damage, Saddam Hussein had said that the attack had been futile anyway, because the target was Israel alone. In June 1981, Israeli aircraft attacked and destroyed the reactor, just before it was to have become operational. This action was ferociously criticised by every other nation and by almost every shade of opinion everywhere in the world, including the US government and including the Israeli Labour Party. The US determined that Israel had violated the terms of its purchase of US aircraft by using them for such a purpose, which they said "cannot but seriously add to the already tense situation in the area". As punishment, the US suspended deliveries of aircraft to Israel.

In an impassioned defence of his decision before the Knesset, Begin said:

Two European governments, in return for oil, have assisted the Iraqi tyrant in the construction of atomic weapons. We again call upon them to desist from this horrifying, inhuman deed. Under no circumstances will we allow an enemy to develop weapons of mass destruction against our people.

We shall defend the citizens of Israel in time, and with all the means at our disposal.

The Gulf War (Operation Desert Storm) a decade later changed the minds of many Americans about the morality of the Osirak raid, and about whether its effect was to increase or decrease tension in the area, and about whether the US should have opposed or supported it. Subsequently, US and world opinion has moved even further. In January 2000, when David Ivry, who had led the Israeli Air Force at the time of the Osirak raid, became Israeli Ambassador in Washington, he received a gift from Richard Cheney (now US Vice President). It was a satellite photograph of the Osirak site, with the inscription: "For General David Ivry – With thanks and appreciation for the outstanding job he did on the Iraqi nuclear program in 1981, which made our job much easier in Desert Storm."

In October 1981, Sadat was murdered by Islamic fundamentalists for making peace with Israel. The Vice-President of Egypt, Hosni Mubarak, became President, which he remains to this day.

Terrorism, and the PLO in particular, had been playing an ever-increasing role in the region and in the world, and had become an accepted feature of the political scene. In May 1974, PLO terrorists took control of a school at Ma'alot in northern Israel, and murdered 22 children. In October 1974 an Arab summit conference at Rabat declared the PLO the 'sole representative' of the Palestinian people. In November 1974 the UN endorsed that decision by granting the PLO observer status – in effect, UN membership in all but name.

In many respects the PLO had (and continues to have) access to more privileges of membership of the UN than Israel. Arafat declared "The goal of our struggle is the end of Israel, and there can be no compromise or mediations. We don't want peace, we want victory. Peace for us means Israel's destruction, and nothing else." Eleven days later, armed with a pistol, he addressed the General Assembly of the UN, and received a standing ovation. The following year, the General Assembly, with 75 countries in favour and 35 dissenting, passed a resolution declaring Zionism to be a form of racism. This was not received with uniform enthusiasm everywhere – for instance, the centre-left Observer newspaper in Britain noted that all the states defined as 'Islamic' in their constitutions had voted for the resolution, while Israel's constitution guaranteed equal rights to all citizens regardless of religion or race – but nor was the resolution enthusiastically opposed by any nation or significant political faction outside Israel and the US. It took until 1991 for the General Assembly, under intense US pressure, to rescind the resolution, with 25 member states still voting to retain it and 13 abstaining. At the same time, continuous US pressure to recognise anti-Semitism as a form of racism was resisted until 1993. Over the years, Arab delegates to the UN have repeatedly, and sometimes successfully, attempted to introduce anti-Semitic blood libels into the official records of the UN. Israel has often been censured both by the UN General Assembly and the UN Security Council, but neither body has ever censured the PLO or any Arab state for any attack on Israel.

In Lebanon, a civil war began in 1975. It centred on the tensions between Lebanese Christians and Lebanese Muslims, but, as order broke down, many different factions fought for turf and influence on behalf of many kinds of religion and ideology. Among the foreign parties to participate with armed forces were Syria and the PLO. The PLO established what was often called a 'state within a state' in southern Lebanon. By 1982, it maintained an army of some 15,000 there, with artillery and long-range rockets, with which they mounted a continuous bombardment of northern Israel. They were protected by an anti-aircraft missile network, and a range of other weapons including tanks. Almost daily, they sent teams into Israel to make terrorist attacks,

In 1982, Israel invaded Lebanon. The Syrian army and air force intervened with aircraft and tanks but were defeated – in the case of the air force, humiliatingly. The PLO retreated northwards, entered the city of Beirut and made a stand there. After holding out there for several months as the Israelis systematically shelled or bombed every building containing PLO fighters, an operation that cost many civilian as well as PLO lives, they agreed to leave Lebanon, and set up a new base in Tunisia.

Israel withdrew from most of Lebanon, retaining a 25-mile buffer zone to protect its northern border.

The Israelis had been welcomed in Lebanon by the Christian factions, who held the PLO responsible for destabilising the fragile balance that had previously existed between them and the Muslims. The Christian militias became allies of the IDF. During the Israeli advance northwards, one of those militias, the Phalangists, was assigned the task of rooting out PLO fighters in two Palestinian refugee camps in Lebanon, Sabra and Shatila. The Phalangist leader, Lebanese President Bashir Gemayel, and 25 of his followers, had just been assassinated in a bomb attack widely attributed to the PLO. The Phalangists took revenge on the civilian inhabitants of the camps, murdering hundreds. An Israeli commission of inquiry subsequently found that Ariel Sharon, then Israel's Defence Minister, had been negligent in not foreseeing such an event, and he was forced to resign from that post.

The Israeli political movement Peace Now, which had been founded in 1978 and advocated unconditional withdrawal from the West Bank, Gaza and the Golan Heights (and now from the Lebanon buffer zone) followed by negotiations suing for peace, received a surge of support. On September 25, 1982, a Peace Now demonstration in Tel Aviv attracted 400,000 participants, 10% of Israel's population at that time.

In 1981, Israel had annexed the Golan Heights, but although Begin mooted a plan to give the inhabitants of the West Bank and Gaza full Israeli citizenship and then to annexe those territories, no serious steps were ever taken to implement it because there was insufficient support for it from almost any side in Israel, including the Likud Party itself. Israel had become deeply split on the issue of Jewish settlements in the West Bank and Gaza Strip. The right-wing and religious parties, though they could agree on no long term policy for the territories, were nevertheless enthusiastically in favour of Jewish settlement. Thanks, again, to the electoral system, the settlement movement attracted more and more government assistance – to the extent that the traditional Zionist project of building settlements in Israel proper all but ceased. New immigrants and people on low incomes were now being attracted in large numbers to the settlements, not out of any prior connections, religious feelings, or nationalistic zeal, but because they received heavily subsidised housing and a living standard not available to them elsewhere. And every additional settler enlarged the constituency for more subsidies.

Part 10 ...And Then The World Changed

Wed, 06/25/2003 - 05:07 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

The 1982 September War

What would your response be to Martin Gilbert's reading of the war in Lebanon in 1982? It seems to me that this is the turning point in his book away from a sympathetic account of Israeli history to something openly disapproving (I wonder whether it is contributed to by the rise of Likud which is not where his political sympathies lie?)

by emma on Thu, 08/23/2007 - 21:56 | reply

The Rise of the PLO

The ninth installment in our highly acclaimed series, "A Short History of Israel", is now available.

If you have not read the preceding parts, you can find them linked from the Table of Contents.

Wed, 06/25/2003 - 05:53 | permalink

More Significant Than a Smoking Gun

A 'smoking gun' in Iraq (namely, nuclear, biological or chemical weapons, or incontrovertible evidence that they were recently destroyed or smuggled out) has yet to be found.

This is more significant than any find of chemical or even biological weapons could be.

It shows that Saddam was planning to resume building nuclear weapons the moment the pressure was off.

Wed, 06/25/2003 - 22:57 | permalink

Shame On You, Sci Fi Channel

It is the twenty-first century and we are living in the most advanced, rational civilisation that has ever existed. And yet, a substantial proportion of our fellow citizens still waste their sense of wonder on rubbish like telepathy, astrology and UFO sightings.

One of the most blatantly irrational aspects of contemporary culture is the cynical way in which institutions that should and do know better (particularly the media, though governments are not blameless either) pander to this tendency. Browse the so-called 'documentary' channels on your cable TV, and you are more likely to find a program on astrology than on astronomy.

It should not be necessary for us to stress – but let's do so anyway – that we are not calling for regulation or censorship (even self-censorship) as a means of replacing bad television by good. In fact we are implacably opposed to any such measure, which would be rather like trying to cure pneumonia by firing a Gatling gun at the patient's head. The problem originates in the foolish audiences, not the venal producers, and we have no objection to bad programmes being produced and aired whenever there is a market for them. But it is one thing to show bad programmes, and quite another to endorse their content, either explicitly or by associating them with genuine science or genuine news reporting. It is dishonest to present notorious falsehoods or silly urban myths as if they were true. It is irresponsible to treat nonsense with the respect due to genuine discovery. And it is wilfully stupid to claim that one does not know, or need not take a position on, the difference.

The Sci Fi Channel shows such programmes too, but at least it has the (thin) defence that most of its other programmes are avowedly fictional. But now they too have crossed the red line. They are sponsoring a campaign to have the US government be "more forthcoming and aggressive in investigating UFO sightings" and to reveal "what the Pentagon knows" about them.

"The Sci-Fi channel has had an interest in [UFOs] for some time. The difference here is that they are focusing attention on the serious, factual side of the issue, and that scientists have not had a chance to thoroughly examine it," Rothschild said.

"Of course it could help programming. But Sci-Fi thought they had some resources they could bring to the table.”

Shame on you, Sci-Fi Channel.

Sun, 06/29/2003 - 00:12 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

UFO? Cui Bono?

As absurd as the SciFi Channel's exhortation seems on the surface, examination of its campaign ought not to stop there.

Follow the money, friends. Follow the money.

Curmudgeon Emeritus, Palace Of Reason

by fporretto on Sun, 06/29/2003 - 12:09 | reply

The Real Shame...

is that SciFi cancelled MST3K. The bastards.

by a reader on Sun, 06/29/2003 - 21:39 | reply

Do you know of any actual "no...

Do you know of any actual "notorious falsehoods or silly urban myths" being presented by SciFi or it is just your practice to paint any sort of program on UFOs with ad hominem attacks?

The way you present it here, it sounds like you haven't seen anything beyond these two edited press releases and have automatically assumed that there is absolutely nothing to learn. It is logical to go to the state to try to figure what people are seeing -- most of the time, they are seeing military projects.

"UFO sightings" have led to the discovery of high-altitude sprites and ball lightning, in addition to blowing the cover off of the SR-71 (or RS-71) and the F-117 deployments. Dismissing observations out of hand is not science; it is the exact sort of mysticism that you profess to oppose.

by Phelps on Mon, 06/30/2003 - 20:32 | reply

What We Mean By "UFOs"

Phelps:

"UFO sightings" have led to the discovery of high-altitude sprites and ball lightning, in addition to blowing the cover off of the SR-71 (or RS-71) and the F-117 deployments.

LOL. Yes you're quite right: we should have made it clear that by "UFO sightings" we mean purported sightings of technology of extraterrestrial origin, and not the kind of unidentified flying object that hits you on the back of the head during a football match.

However, if anything, a campaign to make the government reveal the attributes of secret military aircraft before they deem that the time is right would be even more reprehensible than one to make it reveal its alleged knowledge of extraterrestrial intelligence, and almost as futile.

by Editor on Mon, 06/30/2003 - 20:49 | reply

Bookshops included.

I'm sure I'm not alone in being annoyed and depressed by the way small bookshops often put wicca-pyramids-on-Mars type codswallop on the same shelf as popular science titles.

by Tom Robinson on Tue, 07/01/2003 - 01:12 | reply

_Felix

Well, I enjoy all this crap. I mean I do admit that it's crap and don't think it should have any repercussions on the real world, but I enjoy pretending that things exist, like, say, giant birds of prey unknown to science, or super-fast cold-war-era russian saucer-shaped vehicles, or global hi-tec stone-age societies, or talking ghosts of mongooses, for the duration of a TV program or while I'm reading a book (and not beyond that).

Imaginary mysteries and fantasies of lost or hidden knowledge and things like that are wonderfully enjoyable. (If you know of any real ones, kindly present them to me instead of all this boring politics.)

Yes, pseudoscience sucks, but imagination is fun. I'm not sure what you can do about that; putting a disclaimer before these programs that says "the following is all bullshit" doesn't appeal to me, as a consumer of them, nor presumably to the program makers.

I also think James Randi is a lot of fun. Probably your best tactic is to follow in his footsteps and debunk things hilariously, rather than grouching about the Sci-Fi channel and its kin, at least if they don't cross any "red line". Like I say, I enjoy them, they're good.

by a reader on Tue, 07/01/2003 - 06:07 | reply

oops

Excuse me... I forgot to log in, and put my name on the subject line. Must have been distracted by the aliens landing in my garden.

by _Felix on Tue, 07/01/2003 - 06:13 | reply

Bullshit!

Speaking of bullshit, Penn & Teller had a great series on Showtime called "Bullshit!" where they exposed lots of paranormal, junk science claims.

Check out if it airs again in your area.

by Gil on Tue, 07/01/2003 - 18:04 | reply

People..

..have the RIGHT to waste THEIR time. Coz its THEIR time.

by Phylo on Thu, 04/19/2007 - 12:47 | reply

"Not Right" does not mean "No Rights"

It's not about rights. (Obviously, people have a right to...)

It's about what people ought to do.

by a reader on Thu, 04/19/2007 - 21:54 | reply

Silly Holy Man

Some people have wondered why we did not mention religion when we wrote:

And yet, a substantial proportion of our fellow citizens still waste their sense of wonder on rubbish like telepathy, astrology and UFO sightings.

Isn't all that true of religions too?

Well, it is and it isn't. Religions share with those beliefs the property of being factually false, and of defining a sub-culture of uncritical believers. On the other hand, some religious traditions also contain evolved, mostly inexplicit, knowledge which is highly valuable. While atheists nowadays can obtain all those deep truths elsewhere, and in most cases better, that does not make religion rubbish in the sense that telepathy, astrology and sightings of extraterrestrial spaceships are. And religions have all sorts of cultural resonances and historical significance, to say nothing of their more contingent connections with things like the arts. Even if it is true that UFO-loonies once contributed to the discovery of some meteorological phenomenon or other, that is not quite in the same league as having delivered the concept of objective right and wrong, or of the unity of mankind, to Western civilization. To dismiss all that just because the religion isn't actually true is like saying that Shakespeare is worthless because his descriptions of Macbeth or Richard III are historically inaccurate. So in short, when religious people marvel at their religion, they are not necessarily "wasting their sense of wonder" at all.

But now – wouldn't you know it? – just as we atheists are drawing these fine distinctions to distinguish religion from pure rubbish, some Holy Man (or more precisely, Silly Man) in Scotland is busily trying to erase them again:

An exorcist yesterday called for a 'crusade from the pulpits' against the growing power of the occult.

Father Jim McManus said paganism and witchcraft were intertwined with evil and needed to be stamped out.

[...]

The 62-year-old priest - the only Catholic clergyman to perform the service of "deliverance" regularly - said devil worship could only lead to tragedy.

Fr McManus said: "Witchcraft has as its basis an evil source - devil worship..."

Presumably, unlike the cynical TV executives we spoke of, he doesn't know better. Perhaps he hasn't thought about it - not thinking about such things being an occupational hazard of the Faithful. But nevertheless, by speaking in this manner of the non-existent "source" of non-existent "witchcraft", what he is doing is endorsing the claims of the lunatics. (So are these people who object to Harry Potter, by the way.) Lunatics who, incidentally, adhere to a rival religion.

Oh well. It's not really our job to set religion to rights, is it? So - as you were, everyone: here endeth the sermon.

Tue, 07/01/2003 - 16:50 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

We Bow To Your Superior (?) Intellect, O Wise One!

"Religions share with those beliefs the property of being factually false, and of defining a sub-culture of uncritical believers."

Oh? That's news to me -- a practicing Roman Catholic (who used to be an agnostic) who holds a doctorate in astrophysics.

The arrogance with which atheists approach religious conviction amazes me. You can no more prove your convictions than I can prove mine. Neither of us can disprove the other's creed, either. That's in the nature of religious belief, which occupies the realm of things which can neither be proved nor disproved on this side of the grave. Yet you find it perfectly acceptable to deride my convictions, and me for holding them, even so.

There's a quality called "humility," and another called "tact." Over the centuries they've proved both useful and attractive. Verbum sat sapienti.

Curmudgeon Emeritus, Palace Of Reason

by fporretto on Tue, 07/01/2003 - 20:56 | reply

Stories contain meaning

I think all those things like telepathy, astrology, etc are fun games. I think they make sense in the sphere of imaginative story-telling. I don't think they should compete with the world of facts and science. Nor should religion, which is also a kind of fun story.

Stories can contain significant moral meaning (witness Harry Potter) without having to pass themselves off as history. They mean something to people, and influence them for the better.

So there's no excuse for religion to continue getting metaphor and fact mixed up, but recreational superstitious nonsense may have imaginative/other value, if understood for what it actually is; art.

Alice

by a reader on Tue, 07/01/2003 - 22:45 | reply

proof

we're fallibilists here. we know that you can't have certain knowledge. IOW, you can't prove anything. but this doesn't mean we don't know anything. we certainly do have (tentative) best theories that we hold true. the basic argument against God is: postulating God solves no problem, and doesn't explain anything. that's pretty damning.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://curi.blogspot.com/>

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 07/02/2003 - 01:34 | reply

Commercials

You complain at "cynical" TV executives and accuse them of "pandering". I don't like pandas but I still think this is an unfair thing to say about people who are just making entertaining and misleading TV programs. You might as well say it about adverts.

Astrophysics is all about spheres, and Catholicism is a load of balls, so I can see how an interest in one might lead to the other. O physics, preserve us from metaphysics.

by _Felix on Wed, 07/02/2003 - 07:40 | reply

Fleshing Out

Elliot wrote:

"we're fallibilists here. we know that you can't have certain knowledge. IOW, you can't prove anything. but this doesn't mean we don't know anything. we certainly do have (tentative) best theories that we hold true. the basic argument against God is: postulating God solves no problem, and doesn't explain anything. that's pretty damning."

Just going to be slightly more specific about why the whole God idea is a non-starter. God is all-powerful, therefore God could make the world act in any way he liked and so the idea of God can't explain why the world behaves one way rather than another. So as an explanation God doesn't work. Note that bringing up the idea that God couldn't disobey the laws of logic does nothing to alleviate this problem, because the explanation for why God couldn't break such laws has nothing to do with God himself, nor does it come anywhere near to restraining God's abilities strictly enough to explain anything about the world in which we live.

by Alan Forrester on Wed, 07/02/2003 - 12:44 | reply

Documentaries = Commercials?

"You complain at "cynical" TV executives and accuse them of "pandering". I don't like pandas but I still think this is an unfair thing to say about people who are just making entertaining and misleading TV programs. You might as well say it about adverts."

I don't think anyone really expects adverts to make true factual claims, they do expect it from documentaries.

by Alan Forrester on Wed, 07/02/2003 - 12:47 | reply

Hubris

Why does god have to be all powerful? The Greek gods weren't. The Greeks also had a word for the position you hold: hubris.

I believe in mathematics and it shows us that no matter what axioms we choose, there will always be something unprovable with our axioms. That is the fault I find with most agnostic people. They think their axioms can explain everything.

by a reader on Wed, 07/02/2003 - 14:46 | reply

You've Missed The Point

I know of very few Christians who claim that God's purpose is to "make the world act in any way he liked." The mere fact that He could but does not use His omnipotence to influence the world into behaving one way or the other is not relevant to His existence.

You conclude, "the idea of God cannot explain why the world behaves in a certain way rather than others." I'm sitting here reading this and trying to figure out why that statement bothers me. Slowly, I realize that I don't use God as an explanation for the day-to-day action of the world. In fact, it seems that one would have to be irrational to think that God controls everything. When a tree limb blows down in a storm and falls on my car, I think "Gee, gravity works..." I don't think "God, why did you do that???" Christians (most of them, anyways) believe that events are part of a plan in which we are actors capable of choice in a defined system. This is a step removed from what you're saying. You seem to be saying that Christians irrationally believe that God controls the behaviors of the world, for instance, gravity. Most Christians wouldn't say that God's making gravity. They believe that He set the laws of the universe, for instance, gravitational attraction, and then set events in motion -- to be undisturbed by His hand (for the most part).

Basically, who gives a hoot that the idea of God can't explain why the world behaves a certain way? People tend to think that Newtonian physics (and maybe more exotic formulations, too) explain why the world behaves as it does. Does that mean that God couldn't have set up Newtonian physics? At this point, it turns on what a previous poster was talking about -- observable fact. As he said, there is no way to tell one way or the other, which puts us on pretty equal footing. Christianity isn't like the Greek and Roman religions with gods of nature, used as explanation for observable events. My question: what gives you the idea that the idea of God should explain events?

Forgive me if I have misunderstood your post. I welcome further conversation on this topic.

by Rob Michael on Wed, 07/02/2003 - 15:23 | reply

Objective right and wrong

"that is not quite in the same league as having delivered the concept of objective right and wrong, or of the unity of mankind, to Western civilization."

ob◆jec◆tive

adj.

1. Of or having to do with a material object.
2. Having actual existence or reality.
3.
 - a. Uninfluenced by emotions or personal prejudices: an objective critic.
 - b. Based on observable phenomena; presented factually: an objective appraisal.

Religion didn't give Western civilization the concept of objective right and wrong, it gave Western civilization the concept of a collective standard of right and wrong.

by a reader on Wed, 07/02/2003 - 18:45 | reply

Re: Objective right and wrong

A reader wrote:

Religion didn't give Western civilization the concept of objective right and wrong, it gave Western civilization the concept of a collective standard of right and wrong.

No. Many people think that's what it did. But that doesn't make them right.

by David Deutsch on Wed, 07/02/2003 - 20:07 | reply

Re :You've Missed the Point

Rob Michael wrote:

"I know of very few Christians who claim that God's purpose is to "make the world act in any way he liked." The mere fact that He could but does not use His omnipotence to influence the world into behaving one way or the other is not relevant to His existence."

It's really very simple. The only reason to adopt a theory is that it solves some problem. God is inherently incapable of doing that, His existence literally cannot explain anything at all. This includes moral explanations, moral explanations of the form "X is right because God said so," are junk, worthless and utterly useless. God could have made X right or wrong or morally neutral or given it any other moral status he wanted, so God can't be the explanation of the moral status of X. There will be an explanation of the moral status of X but it will have nothing at all to do with God. (Unless it's a question like "Should we teach children that God exists?" The answer is no.)

Given that God is totally incapable of explaining anything at all, including morality, there is no reason to think that he exists. Just because the notion of God is frequently associated with some good moral ideas is no reason to accept his existence. Sociobiology (very bad explanation) is often lauded by people who work on evolutionary biology (very good explanation). This association should not restrain us from trashing sociobiology as not being worth the ink that is wasted on it, similarly there is no reason to hold back on criticising the idea of God as being rubbish.

by Alan Forrester on Thu, 07/03/2003 - 15:21 | reply

You've Missed The Point, Again

Alan writes: "The only reason to adopt a theory is that it solves some problem."

That may be true for some, but I think you'd be hard pressed to find the Christian who regards God as a 'theory.' Most Christians (I might as well keep speaking for most of them -- they haven't complained so far) wouldn't describe their belief in God as belief in a theory that they believe solves some moral, supermoral, or literal problems.

An important distinction: A theory is some general principle that explains observed phenomena. A belief is an article of faith/conviction that is held to be true. The theory relies on evidence of some sort. The belief can be corroborated by evidence but does not necessarily rely on it.

You note that His existence literally explains nothing. I'm confused as to your use of the word "literally." Is it just emphasis? In any case, for Christians, God provides the answer to the question "Why?" And, though there is not literal proof lying around as to His existence, there is also nothing lying around that says that He does not exist.

Your argument boils down (again) to proof, where, as has been noted before, Christians and athiests are on pretty even footing.

by Rob Michael on Thu, 07/03/2003 - 18:02 | reply

Even Footing?

Rob Michael says (to Alan):

Your argument boils down (again) to proof, where, as has been noted before, Christians and athiests are on pretty even footing.

This is very misleading. While it's true that neither can be proven, their footing as far as what a reasonable person should believe is far from even.

We cannot prove or disprove the theory "Undetectable turtles control the weather on Tuesdays". But, is it equally reasonable to believe it or not? Does it really answer the question "Why?" (e.g. Why did it rain last Tuesday?)

I don't think so.

While the original article took some license by saying that religions have the "property of being factually false", I think saying that "Religion is untenable to a person with a good epistemology" is fair. And they amount to the same thing in terms of whether we should adopt it.

by Gil on Thu, 07/03/2003 - 18:35 | reply

I'm not missing the point

Rob Michael wrote:

"Alan writes: "The only reason to adopt a theory is that it solves some problem.""

"That may be true for some, but I think you'd be hard pressed to find the Christian who regards God as a 'theory.' Most Christians (I might as well keep speaking for most of them -- they haven't complained so far) wouldn't describe their belief in God as belief in a theory that they believe solves some moral, supermoral, or literal problems..."

"You note that His existence literally explains nothing. I'm confused as to your use of the word "literally." Is it just emphasis? In any case, for Christians, God provides the answer to the question "Why?" And, though there is not literal proof lying around as to His existence, there is also nothing lying around that says that He does not exist."

You have now started talking nonsense. First you say that the idea of God doesn't solve any problem and that no Christian wants the idea of God to do so and then you say it answers the question "Why?" You can't have it both ways, "Why?", which presumably means "What is the meaning of life?" or something like that IS A PROBLEM. A problem is simply some feature of our current worldview that seems unsatisfactory. If your idea that for Christians God is the answer to the question "Why?" is correct, then it follows that Christians think the idea of God solves the "Why?" problem. As I have argued the idea of God is incapable of solving any problem and so it cannot be a solution, or even the general gist of a solution to the "Why?" problem and Christians are simply mistaken when they think that God can answer this question.

It is not conceivable that some of the stuff in the Bible or in Christian or Jewish tradition (such as the idea of objective morality and maybe other stuff but I don't really know) has a bearing on the "why?" problem but that is entirely separate from the idea that the existence of God solves the "Why?" problem.

I am not asking for proof I am pointing that nobody who has the slightest interest in explanation should invoke the idea of God.

by Alan Forrester on Fri, 07/04/2003 - 02:20 | reply

Gullible viewers

"I don't think anyone really expects adverts to make true factual claims, they do expect it from documentaries."

Surely this is their own problem?

Possibly a hundred years or so ago at the dawn of advertising, many people were taken in by bogus adverts. Should the advertisers have stopped advertising, rather than the people getting wiser?

by _Felix on Fri, 07/04/2003 - 06:13 | reply

Factually True Religions?

Curmudgeon and Gil: At most one religion can be factually true. Hence the overwhelming majority of religions are factually false (though, as the article pointed out, some of them contain truths).

Curmudgeon: Surely a practicing Catholic in particular is not permitted to deny the above.

by David Deutsch on Sat, 07/05/2003 - 04:14 | reply

Still Missing It

Alan writes: "First you say that the idea of God doesn't solve any problem and that no Christian wants the idea of God to do so and then you say it answers the question 'Why?'"

No, actually, read farther up and notice that you said that the idea of God doesn't solve any problem, not I. I responded to your statement that theories are adopted to solve problems by saying that God is not a theory for Christians -- please note how I didn't even address the God solving a problem issue. Read the next paragraph down from that and you'll see where I talked about theories and beliefs. That is the difference between what you're saying and what Christians are saying regarding God. It would be helpful if you'd read what I'm writing instead of what you think I'm writing.

David, the Catholic Church does not practice exclusivism. It maintains like the article that all religions contain some truth:

CCC 843

The Catholic Church recognizes in other religions that search, among shadows and images, for the God who is unknown yet near since he gives life and breath in all things and wants all men to be saved. Thus, the Church considers all goodness and truth found in these religions as "a preparation for the Gospel and given by him who enlightens all men that they may at length have life.

by Rob Michael on Mon, 07/07/2003 - 15:20 | reply

Re: Factually True Religions?

Rob Michael:

David, the Catholic Church does not practice exclusivism. It maintains like the article that all religions contain some truth

And does it (or do you) maintain that containing some truth is the same as being true? Does it (or do you) deny that not being true is the same as being false?

If it does, it is not rejecting "exclusivism", it is rejecting logic.

If it doesn't, then I don't see how what you have said contradicts the proposition that the overwhelming majority of religions are false, and that this is trivially provable.

by David Deutsch on Mon, 07/07/2003 - 16:01 | reply

True Religions

To answer David's questions:

I do not maintain that containing some truth is the same as being true, nor would I expect the Catholic Church to do so, for as you put it, such an act would be a rejection of logic.

I also believe that every proposition is either true or false. However, there is a difference between the actual truth value of something and whether or not we can know the truth value. This is why one often sees people talking about relative truths. In many cases it is easier to say that one proposition is clearly more true than others without saying that it is absolutely true.

Nowhere is this more clear than in discussion about ethics. Philosophers have been frustratingly unable to pin down right and wrong; truth and untruth are similarly slippery labels. And yet we speak in terms of more right, more wrong all the time. In ethics we do that to skip over the impossible calculation of whether an act is absolutely right and absolutely wrong. With regard to religion, a similar assumption is made regarding what is true and what is not.

They call that faith and, as you say, it has very little to do with logic.

by Rob Michael on Mon, 07/07/2003 - 23:05 | reply

Copyright © 2008 Setting The World To Rights

Elegance Against Ignorance

Several good posts in a row on Alan Forrester's Elegance Against Ignorance, some of them on themes that we have touched on here recently:

This one is about the futility of trying to make horror films more effective by pretending that they are true stories:

it is with The Mothman Prophecies, a film that repeatedly made me want to remove all my skin with a potato peeler and jump in a vat of piranha infested hydrochloric acid just to relieve the boredom.

This one briefly links luminous fish with Republicans.

This one is about schoolteachers being "thieving bastards".

And this one is about the "coolest plane ever".

Wed, 07/02/2003 - 20:25 | permalink

Happy America Day

Go and read Bill Whittle's essay Trinity (Part 1) now.

When you've done that, you won't need any urging to read Trinity (Part 2).

And after that ... Onwards, America, and all who share her values:
onwards to the stars!

Sat, 07/05/2003 - 01:08 | permalink

Announcing a New Blog: Taking Children Seriously (The TCS Blog)

The other day, we urged you to read Bill Whittle's latest essay. In one part of that essay, he mentioned optimism and its role in a creative capitalist society. On the brand new blog, Taking Children Seriously you will find a fascinating piece on this. Don't miss it!

Sun, 07/06/2003 - 18:05 | permalink

Slavery

Slavery – the ownership of one person by another – was an accepted feature of almost every society, everywhere in the world, for most of human history. This was one of the greatest of all evils. One of the many interrelated glories of our own society (The West) is that it has eradicated this evil within itself, fought it with great (but not yet total) success elsewhere, and put it permanently on the defensive morally and intellectually.

President Bush, visiting Senegal today, made some comments about slavery:

“Liberty and life were stolen and sold,” Bush said after touring a centuries-old house that was used as a processing center for countless thousands of Africans who were herded aboard ships that took them into slavery in America.

“Human beings delivered, sorted, weighed, branded with marks of commercial enterprises and loaded as cargo on a voyage without return,” Bush said. “One of the largest migrations in history was also one of the greatest crimes of history.”

There can be no doubt that this is the literal truth. And yet, in context, there is something misleading about the last sentence. For it seems to endorse a theory of historical causality which, though widespread, is a wicked calumny, namely that slavery was essentially a Western institution, a Western crime against the peoples of other societies. Speaking about the evil of slavery in terms of the historical actions of America in particular was a magnanimous and arguably appropriate thing for a US President to do while standing in this terrible place, where Americans committed appalling crimes against humanity on a massive scale. Nevertheless it will give comfort to those who would place a similar, and now utterly erroneous, interpretation on present-day events. We, who are not standing in that place, need to incorporate the broader context into our world view as well. It is very well known that Westerners took several million slaves from Africa; but, for instance, the history of Africa and slavery is not complete without the story of the African Arabs who kidnapped and enslaved an estimated million Westerners, and of how that evil tradition was ended.

Most importantly, though the West perpetrated slavery, it also (particularly Britain and the US, unlike others) rejected slavery, chose to abolish slavery, fought bitter wars against slavery, and created the arguments, the conceptual framework – including the very concept of a ‘crime against humanity’ – and the way of life that is incompatible with slavery and is the only real protection against its return.

Tue, 07/08/2003 - 21:02 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

I could not agree more

One of the things that has irritated me for years is how, in America, the word "slavery" is almost universally used to refer to enslavement of Africans in the United States.

Any history text used by a public school will inevitably use the word "slavery" only in that context. I agree that it was big part of our history, but big enough to redefine the word?

by Ewin on Thu, 07/10/2003 - 23:53 | reply

10: ... And Then the World Changed

This is the tenth and final part of our series, "A Short History of Israel". If you wish to read the preceding parts, see the Table of Contents for links to them. We welcome comments and criticisms. Do tell us what you think.

The fundamentalist Islamic terrorist organisations, Hamas (founded in 1982) and Islamic Jihad (founded in 1979) began to compete with the PLO for support and power. Violence against Jews was one of the principal means of acquiring both.

In 1987, a campaign of relatively low-level but non-stop violence, known as the Intifada, began in the West Bank and Gaza. Often presented by the Western media as 'children throwing stones at tanks, and being shot at in return', it was actually quite a complex war. Rioting crowds of youths throwing rocks and sometimes petrol bombs kept Israeli soldiers on the streets to protect their bases, Jewish settlements, and Jerusalem. Stabbings and occasionally sniping and grenade throwing caused deaths among Israelis, but during the Intifada, Arabs murdered far more Arabs than Israelis: Between 1987 and 1991, about 20 Israelis were murdered in the Intifada, about half of them civilians (though thousands were injured), but during the same period, 528 Arabs were murdered by the PLO, Hamas and Islamic Jihad. The victims were 'collaborators' – which in practice could mean not only any Arab who warned Jews of impending attacks, but any Arab who had any sort of friendly dealings with Jews. Personal and political scores were also settled. Also during those four years, 697 Arabs were killed by Israeli soldiers, the overwhelming majority of them during riots. 78 of them were under 15 years old.

Throughout the Intifada period (and to this day), terrorist murders by Hamas and Islamic Jihad, including suicide bombings, continued. Some analysts believed that support among Palestinians for these Islamic organisations might soon exceed that of the secular PLO; furthermore, a new generation of young radicals, the local leaders of the Intifada, were also challenging the ageing PLO leadership who were in exile with Arafat in Tunisia. For the first time, it appeared that the PLO and Israel might have a common interest, in counteracting those forces.

The Israeli elections of 1992 brought in a Labour-led coalition under Yitzchak Rabin. In January 1993, in total secrecy, Israeli and PLO negotiators met in Oslo to begin what later came to be known as the 'Oslo Peace Process'. This culminated in 1994 and 1995 with the Cairo Treaty and an agreement known as 'Oslo II'. These brought an end to Israeli rule in Gaza (excluding only the Jewish settlements there), plus an area to be known as 'Area A', which contained all the Arab cities of the West Bank with the exception of the small Jewish enclave at the centre of Hebron. Israeli forces would withdraw completely from those areas. A new organisation, the Palestine Authority, with the triumphantly returning Arafat as its Chairman, would have "legislative, executive and judicial powers and responsibilities", with complete control over the internal affairs of Gaza and Area A, including control over a Palestinian police force, armed by Israel. It would also exert civilian control over another area of the West Bank, 'Area B', which contained most of the Arab villages, but Israel would retain its military presence there. The IDF would retain control over the remainder of the territory, Area C, which contained 4% of the Arab inhabitants of the West Bank and all the Jewish settlements. The PLO, in return, renounced terrorism, agreed to prevent terrorism by other organisations, cease anti-Semitic and anti-Israeli incitement, and alter the term in its Constitution that called for the destruction of Israel. Free and fair elections would be held. Negotiations about the 'final status' would begin immediately, and a timetable was agreed for settling all the disputed issues, including the status of Jerusalem and of Palestinian refugees, culminating in the creation of a State of Palestine alongside Israel.

In the Oslo agreements the PLO accepted the principle of partition – a 'two-state solution' – which the Arabs had rejected in 1947 and which previously only Egypt had accepted. Arafat won the Nobel Peace Prize for this, along with Rabin and Shimon Peres, Israel's foreign minister and architect of the Oslo agreements. However, within a few days of the Cairo treaty, Arafat had made a speech in a mosque saying that the Palestinians would 'continue their jihad until they had liberated Jerusalem'. This was dismissed by many as mere rhetoric, but from then on, Arafat and other PLO leaders began making systematically different statements when they were speaking in Arabic from when they were addressing Western audiences. In the latter case, they maintained the line that they had taken the historic decision to renounce violence and accept the partition of Palestine; in the former, they said that the Oslo peace process was merely a stepping stone to their original objective of a unitary Arab state in the whole of Palestine. The PLO's renunciation of the relevant item in its Constitution was equivocal. The PLO's emblem remained a map of the whole of pre-1947 Palestine. The emblem of Fatah (Arafat's faction which is the principal constituent of the PLO) remained a similar map covered by crossed rifles and a grenade. Palestinian schools in Gaza and Areas A and B taught the doctrine of a unitary Arab state following the destruction of Israel.

Anti-Semitic incitement and blood libels became part of the culture to an extent not previously known in history with the possible exception of Nazi Germany. In 1999 Arafat's wife Suha, in a speech in the presence of US First Lady Hillary Clinton, accused Israel of using poison gas on Arab children, and of causing "cancer and other horrible diseases". In Hamas-run schools and nurseries, children were taught that their purpose in life was to kill Jews and to become 'martyrs' (i.e. suicide murderers). The PLO swept aside the structures of civil society, such as the civil service and free press, and established totalitarian control with all positions of even the slightest influence filled by PLO loyalists and controlled ultimately by Arafat alone. Opponents were systematically intimidated or murdered. Only Hamas and Islamic Jihad survived to oppose the PLO, and even they had many members imprisoned.

Israel and Jordan signed a peace treaty with similar provisions to the treaty with Egypt. The treaty has been scrupulously adhered to, and in practice, Israel's relations with Jordan are somewhat warmer than the 'cold peace' that prevails with Egypt. Several other Arab countries have established trading, but not full diplomatic, links with Israel. Other Arab countries, notably Saudi Arabia, Iraq and Libya, remain implacably opposed to Israel and maintain the old boycotts and support for terrorism.

Following the fall of the Soviet Union in about 1989, Russia and former Communist Bloc states had re-established full diplomatic and other relations with Israel (and the Czech Republic resumed a fairly warm friendship). Now, another batch of states such as India, China and the Vatican, which had previously been hostile to Israel, followed suit.

One of the provisions of the Israel-Jordan treaty was that Jordan abolished its law that had in effect made selling land to Jews punishable by death. Ironically, the incoming Palestine Authority revived that law. Property owners who had sold their land to Jewish settlements, and real-estate agents who had brokered such deals, were executed. The new Mufti of Jerusalem (now a PLO appointee) ruled that such criminals must be denied a Muslim burial.

In 1995, Rabin was murdered by a religious Jew opposed to the Oslo peace process.

He was succeeded as Israeli Prime Minister by Peres, who lost the subsequent election and a Likud-led coalition took power.

An election in the Palestinian-controlled areas confirmed Arafat in power with 90% of the vote and no serious opposition. Terrorist violence and murders of Israelis by Hamas and Islamic Jihad, including occasional spectacular mass murders, increased.

In 1999, Ehud Barak was elected Prime Minister (under a slightly altered electoral system that elected the Prime Minister directly and hence gave him a powerful mandate) at the head of a new Labour-led coalition. Barak embarked aggressively upon a quest for peace. He ordered a unilateral withdrawal from the buffer zone in Lebanon. The Lebanese terrorist group Hizbollah, which had previously specialised in suicide bombings against Israeli forces in the buffer zone, now concentrated on terrorism across the Israeli border.

Israeli and Syrian ministers met under US auspices to 'talk about talks'. Syria demanded a promise of unconditional withdrawal from the Golan Heights as a precondition for negotiations. No progress was made.

Barak, together with US President Clinton, constructed a peace plan under which all Jewish settlements except those contiguous with Israel would be forcibly evacuated. The whole of Gaza and some 96% of the West Bank (including some border adjustments in which West Bank land would be swapped for equal areas of Israeli land), plus East Jerusalem including the Jewish holy sites, would form a new State of Palestine.

In reply, the Palestinian negotiators demanded that every person of Palestinian descent be allowed the 'right of return' to Israel. The negotiations broke up.

The PLO initiated a 'second Intifada', this time based on terrorism and suicide bombings. The Barak government continued to press for peace. Under a previously negotiated agreement, the IDF transferred control of Jacob's Tomb (an ancient Jewish shrine) to the Palestinian police force. Immediately, the tomb was desecrated and then destroyed stone by stone by an Arab mob which included the Palestinian policemen guarding it. Two Israeli reservists who lost their way near Ramallah were captured by the PLO. An Arab mob entered the building where they were being held and tore them apart. Their murderers appeared on the balcony waving their bloodied hands to the cheers of the crowd and then threw the bodies to the crowd for further desecration. A Palestinian policeman murdered his Israeli counterpart on one of the joint patrols that had been agreed. Gunmen entered a joint security meeting and murdered the Israeli policemen taking part. Widespread violence continued.

With elections imminent in which Barak faced defeat, last-ditch peace talks were held at Egyptian town of Taba. Arafat gave a vitriolic speech accusing Israel of being "fascist". The talks broke up and terrorist murders of Israelis increased further, with Arafat now taking a leading role. All Hamas and Islamic Jihad prisoners in PLO custody were released.

On February 6, 2001, Ariel Sharon became Prime Minister of Israel. He appointed Natan Sharansky as one of his Deputy Prime Ministers. He declared that Israel would make 'painful concessions' in return for peace, but only in return for peace.

On September 11, terrorists attacked the World Trade Center in New York and the Pentagon in Washington, D.C., murdering thousands of Americans. Palestinians took to the streets to celebrate.

The world changed.

Thu, 07/10/2003 - 08:32 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Loretta

Excellent. Much of this I had forgotten, and some of it I did not even know. A good read, well done and concise.

Since 9/11 and the Iraq conflict, the UN has shown itself to be a useless, impotent, and obsolete institution, and certainly western appreciation of Israel (now in hindsight) has been vastly changed.

Better late than never.

by a reader on Sun, 07/13/2003 - 23:36 | reply

continuous murder of men women and children your murdering people on land stolen from them how can you deny that.

the appreciation of israel is vastly changed who are you trying to persuade ? for those of us who have spent time in palestine attempting to improve the health of children know better we were taken into a home and shown pools of urine from you soldiers on the roof you know its true.

so what do my comments make me ? an anti-semite i despise most of the human race without favor

by dan lyn on Fri, 07/29/2005 - 18:38 | reply

Anti-Human

If you prefer anti-human to anti-semite, I'm fine with calling you that.

Gil

by Gil on Tue, 08/02/2005 - 22:22 | reply

Let the truth ring!

I am so glad that there is something out there to dispell the Arab propaganda and the biased Western media against Israel. There has NEVER been a "Palestinian" nation, society, or country. The word Palestine itself is a made up word by the Romans when they took the Jews' land away. The Arab invasions which deposited the Arabs in the Jewish kingdom DOES NOT make it Arab. I really though Bush had the guts to stand up to the Jew-hating Arabs and deny a terrorist state next to innocent Israelis, but I guess not. I fear America is losing her nerve folks...

by Christopher on Fri, 09/09/2005 - 16:23 | reply

Arafat

More questions prompted by reading Gilbert, whose account of Rabin and Arafat's negotiations is very positive (gushing, almost).

Was Rabin wrong to negotiate with Arafat at all?

Should he have taken a step-by-step line in which the PLO would be held responsible for stopping terrorism against Israelis before they were given various kinds of economic and political autonomy within the occupied territories?

by emma on Thu, 08/23/2007 - 22:02 | reply

Copyright © 2007 Setting The World To Rights

...And Then The World Changed

Here is the tenth and final part of our series, A Short History of Israel. And here is a quote from it:

Barak, together with US President Clinton, constructed a peace plan under which all Jewish settlements except those contiguous with Israel would be forcibly evacuated. The whole of Gaza and some 96% of the West Bank (including some border adjustments in which West Bank land would be swapped for equal areas of Israeli land), plus East Jerusalem including the Jewish holy sites, would form a new State of Palestine.

In reply, the Palestinian negotiators demanded that every person of Palestinian descent be allowed the 'right of return' to Israel. The negotiations broke up.

The PLO initiated a "second Intifada", this time based on terrorism and suicide bombings. The Barak government continued to press for peace.

So, what do you think of this series? Would you like to suggest any changes? Keep in mind that the aim was to produce a short, facts-only history.

Thu, 07/10/2003 - 08:49 | permlink

Allied Complicity in the Holocaust

It has been known for some time that President Franklin D. Roosevelt was suspicious of Jews and uncritically believed anti-Semitic myths of astonishing (to present-day eyes) crudeness. This may have contributed to his behaviour before and during the Holocaust, when the United States participated enthusiastically in the seamless international effort to prevent most of the Jews of Europe from escaping.

His successor, President Truman, has been regarded as a saner and better man in this regard, because he put pressure on the British to treat Holocaust survivors less harshly, and because he was the first to recognise the State of Israel. Yet despite the fact that he seems genuinely to have sympathised with the Holocaust survivors, some recently-discovered diary entries suggest that as far as personal anti-Semitism goes, he was the equal of Roosevelt, if not worse:

On July 21, 1947, Truman wrote about a conversation he had with Henry Morgenthau, the former treasury secretary under President Franklin D. Roosevelt and a Jew.

"Had ten minutes conversation with Henry Morgenthau about Jewish ship in Palistine [sic]," Truman wrote. "Told him I would talk to Gen[eral] Marshall about it."

"He'd no business, whatever to call me. The Jews have no sense of proportion nor do they have any judgement on world affairs."

In the same entry Truman goes on to say, "The Jews, I find are very, very selfish. They care not how many Estonians, Latvians, Finns, Poles, Yugoslavs or Greeks get murdered or mistreated as D[isplaced] P[ersons] as long as the Jews get special treatment.

(As if there are such things as 'unselfish' groups of genocide victims. As if the wartime representatives of those European nations had campaigned against the Holocaust with the same enthusiasm with which they pursued their own agendas and grievances – or, indeed, as if they had spoken out against the Holocaust at all. And as if, to a person with a true "sense of proportion [and] judgement", the treatment of non-Jewish Estonians, Latvians, Finns, Poles, Yugoslavs or Greeks during the war should have seemed similar to what happened to the Jews.)

Truman's stereotype of the selfish Jew incapable of subtlety, his re-interpretation of commonplace events in sinister terms when Jews are involved, and the impression of visceral spite only imperfectly held in check by reason and morality, are all ancient themes of anti-Semitism. So is the technique of the Big Lie:

Yet when they have power, physical, financial or political neither Hitler nor Stalin has anything on them for cruelty or mistreatment to the under dog.

Note that Truman wrote this at a time when Israel was still a dream, when most European Jews were still imprisoned in internment camps, and when many had just been murdered after the Holocaust by Europeans who were themselves victims of the Nazis.

Allied complicity in the Holocaust is a difficult and painful issue to contemplate, even today. That is not only because it involves coming to terms with a history of wrongdoing by earlier generations of our own society, but also because that wrongdoing, important though it is, is only a small part of a bigger picture. As with the era of slavery in the US, no account of American or British complicity in the Holocaust can be complete without a full acknowledgement that their culpability was of an entirely different order from that of the European collaborators, let alone from that of the murderers themselves and of the society and culture that authorised the murders. To make reasonable judgements in these matters, we need to remember the context. With Western civilisation fearing, and then fighting, for its own survival, it was a different age. The idea of the Holocaust, of genocide and crimes against humanity, had yet to come into focus as central concepts in political morality. One indication of this is that American Jews did not, at the time, judge Roosevelt harshly, and continued to support him overwhelmingly just as they had throughout his term of office. Yes, the British and Americans did not care to rescue the Jews; they even thought that the Germans had a point in hating them. They treated the survivors shamefully – but it would not have occurred to them to kill them. Such an idea would have occasioned revulsion much deeper than that of having nouveau-riche Jews trying to join the Country Club or children with skullcaps being top of the class. With the Germans it was the other way round, and that is the measure of the difference.

Nevertheless, the issue of Allied complicity in the Holocaust does have to be addressed and understood, because the remnants of the implicitly anti-Semitic ideas and attitudes that caused it are still a living part of present-day Western culture. They are still doing harm. They are all the harder to address because of the overlay of self-deception, denial and double-talk that 'political correctness' has forced on this and other issues.

Fri, 07/11/2003 - 16:42 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Different age?

"With Western civilisation fearing, and then fighting, for its own survival, it was a different age."

Doing the same thing now. The more things change, the more they stay the same?

by a reader on Sat, 07/12/2003 - 20:08 | reply

Learn More About Truman Before Making Judgments

If you go back to Harry Truman's personal history, allegations of anti-Semitism are awfully difficult to sustain.

It's entirely possible for his diary entry to be a normal sort of exasperation rather than hate. Morgenthau almost certainly was WAY out of the chain of command when he called. I'm quite sure the overall approach re: Israel was not diplomatically polished (hard, when you have no diplomats), and that its focus did not include the "big picture" Truman had to deal with at the time. To someone facing Truman's burdens and in his position, this would be exasperating.

Looks like an issue out of nothing to me.

Joe Katzman

Winds of Change.NET

"Liberty. Discovery. Humanity. Victory."

by a reader on Mon, 07/14/2003 - 12:39 | reply

Truman and Morgenthau

Truman was being pestered by Morgenthau and other Jewish pressure group representatives about Palestine at the time, and it would only get more intensive and annoying the more things heated up over the partition. I'm not at all surprised that he blew off steam in the privacy of his own diary. Also keep in mind that Morgenthau was not exactly the most temperate of men - he was the author of the Morgenthau plan that would have left Germany a permanent agricultural colony, and from all accounts played heavily to Roosevelt's anti-German bigotry, which was, if anything, even more monumental than Roosevelt's WASPish anti-Semitism.

Finally, there's the rest of the passage:

"Put an underdog on top and it makes no difference whether his name is Russian, Jewish, Negro, Management, Labor, Mormon, Baptist he goes haywire. I've found very, very few who remember their past condition when prosperity comes."

That is, in fact, the opposite of particularist prejudice - he was classifying Jewish behavior as part of a general human trait that he deplored.

In the end, Truman did recognize Israel. He also desegregated the Army in spite of his personal racism. I respect men who don't let their personal prejudices (whatever they might be) dictate their actions.

Saw Bamford on CNN yesterday, going on again about the USS Liberty. Now that is an anti-Semite.

by a reader on Mon, 07/14/2003 - 12:49 | reply

Twin Ruler

The whole "holocaust" narrative is getting rather bizaire: now, they are saying that the Poles and the Russians were even more antiSemitic than the Germans.

by a reader on Tue, 09/02/2003 - 12:34 | reply

What Was Found First?

Late last month, Baghdad Bob turned up safe but not so well-looking on our TV screens:

Arabiya news TV transmitted night an interview with Mohammad Saeed Al-Sahaf, information minister of the deposed Iraqi regime.

[...]

He said he will never return to politics and will focus on taking care of his family and on writing about the war.

He expressed sorrow for seeing coalition forces capture the Capital city of Iraq, Baghdad. He said he was not considering leaving Iraq to the USA or Britain, and asserted time will reveal more about the circumstances of war.

In another interview with Abu Dhabi TV, aired Thursday, Al-Sahaf has blamed "slow battle reports" for being misinformed about the situation in Baghdad shortly before U.S.-led coalition forces manage to capture the city.

So the correct answer in our poll asking what would be found first following the coalition's victory, was Baghdad Bob.

What percentage of the voters guessed correctly? Only 24%. Six per cent thought that Saddam would be more likely to be found first. The most popular answer was "the smoking gun", with 39% of the vote. The least popular answers were the quagmire and Janeane Garofalo's apology, each receiving 3%. Evidently some of our readers have a sense of humour. A quarter of the voters were sceptical that any of these things would be found within one year.

Sat, 07/12/2003 - 11:27 | permalink

Where to Find The Carnival of The Vanities

As we have not been part of the blogosphere for very long, we were at first baffled by references to the Carnival of the Vanities. Somewhere, we read that this 'Carnival' is a way for brilliant but unknown bloggers to get noticed. 'That's us!', we thought. So we decided that a bit of detective work was in order. Several glasses of Champagne later, we discovered that the Carnival of the Vanities was conceived by Bigwig of Silflay Hraka in September last year. He solicited bloggers' best work of the week (or ever, if they preferred), and then published them as a list. After several weeks of compiling the list himself, Bigwig hit on the idea of getting a different blog to host it each week, presumably to avoid burnout. The Carnival of the Vanities is now a splendid way to find high-quality blog content with very little effort, and we think it is worth visiting every week to find hitherto undiscovered gems.

There is only one problem: it is not always easy to find out where the next Carnival is unless you know where the current one is. Not any more! From now on, there will be permanent links in the sidebar of Setting The World To Rights (below the list of blogs) to the current Carnival of the Vanities, and to the host of the next one, for the benefit of any of you bloggers who might want to submit your work.

Re the Champagne: We hasten to add that this was purchased before the current boycott.

Mon, 07/14/2003 - 01:26 | permalink

champagne

That's the answer! To avoid disappointment, buy up a lifetime's supply of valued merchandise from any country or other grouping that you fear you may shortly need to boycott on moral grounds. :)

by a reader on Fri, 07/25/2003 - 22:04 | reply

Champagne

Luckily, there are some absolutely fabulous New World equivalents, so it is not too traumatic.

by Sarah Fitz-Claridge on Thu, 07/31/2003 - 09:36 | reply

Copyright © 2005 Setting The World To Rights

‘villepinism’?

We have previously noted that, while the term ‘idiotarianism’ has several obvious disadvantages, we occasionally have to use it because there is no alternative with the same meaning in common use.

Now, a reader of Woty Freeman's blog, Kolya Wolf, has suggested a new term to replace ‘idiotarianism’, namely villepinism (and ‘villepinist’ to replace ‘idiotarian’), after the current French foreign minister, Dominique de Villepin.

A few notes on this proposal:

- We think the word should begin with a lower-case ‘v’ because de Villepin was not the originator of villepinism, only a prominent exponent. We capitalize ‘Stalinism’ and ‘Thatcherism’, but not ‘quisling’ or ‘boycott’.
- It is ‘villepinism’ and not ‘villepinisme’ because it is an English word. The French translation might well be ‘villepinisme’.
- Recall our definition: “systematically siding with evil without actually adopting the evildoers’ objectives” and then look at this description of current French foreign policy.

What do our readers think?

UPDATE: Do you think we need a new word for “idiotarian”? Vote in our poll.

Thu, 07/17/2003 - 00:33 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Excellent

I like it a lot! Very clever. Unlike idiotarian, it's not a term that can easily be subverted.

by a reader on Thu, 07/17/2003 - 09:09 | reply

I love it! Go go go...

I love it!

Go go go

by a reader on Thu, 07/17/2003 - 11:25 | reply

Silly villies

From another post by Woty:

Villepinists know that some ideas are morally invalid – but they do not realize that these sort of ideas can drive people [.....] they can't know that Islamic fundamentalism is an ideology that people live for and center their lives around. They think it is impossible for this to be the case, since it is clearly immoral and unreasonable to choose such a life

Interesting, huh?

by Tom Robinson on Thu, 07/17/2003 - 18:32 | reply

IDIOTARIAN: (n) 1. (archaic) ...

IDIOTARIAN: (n) 1. (archaic) An idiot. 2. Someone who has offended an idiot.

http://jessewalker.blogspot.com/2003_07_13_jessewalker_archive.html#105846354996467544

by a reader on Thu, 07/17/2003 - 18:53 | reply

New word for idiotarian

The term "idiotarian" exemplifies an ad hominem attack, and for that reason should be dropped. It has a despising/hateful/taunting quality, in common with all ad hominem attacks. "Villepinist" is too bound to the current situation and in a few years is likely to be forgotten. "Fool" is an old four-letter word that has fallen out of favor, and was often used like "idiotarian" has been used since 9/11. It got a bad rap in the New Testament.

http://www.gospelchapel.com/Devotions/10_97/devotion_10-13-97.html "Heedless" is a nice, neutral term, which, I think, captures the essence of the issue.

by a reader on Tue, 07/29/2003 - 20:08 | reply

what?

heedless is not neutral, it's bad. and no string of letters if inherently ad hominem.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://curi.blogspot.com/>

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 07/29/2003 - 20:30 | reply

Ad hominem

Nothing is inherently anything. I stand by my statement about what sort of statement is ad hominem. Reasoning argumentation will often involve describing key points that the opposing side has ignored, as a way of strengthening one side of an argument at the expense of the other. Arguments ad hominem ridicule/put down/denigrate the other side, contributing only emotional energy/excitement to the discussion. Usage of the term "idiotarian" functions this way. Showing how the opposition is "heedless" of various points and then describing the relation of these points to the issue at hand is an entirely valid way of reasoning.

Example:SOLDIER #1:

Where'd you get the coconuts?

ARTHUR:

We found them.

SOLDIER #1:

Found them? In Mercia? The coconut's tropical!

ARTHUR:

What do you mean?

SOLDIER #1:

Well, this is a temperate zone.

ARTHUR:

The swallow may fly south with the sun or the house martin or the plover may seek warmer climes in winter, yet these are not strangers to our land?

SOLDIER #1:

Are you suggesting coconuts migrate?

...

I guess you could call finding fault with an opposing argument "bad" but then you would seem to deny the utility of argumentation reasoning altogether.

by a reader on Tue, 07/29/2003 - 21:04 | reply

sigh

idiotarian has an established meaning that is not ad hominem. heedless does not.

idiotarian refers to a certain politic philosophy. it helps facillitate communication between clueful people. it is not intended as an argument. it refers to the sort that side with evil, but do not want evil things to happen. that is a phrase with content. whether any given person is in fact an idiotarian is an open question, and calling someone one won't cut it when that's in dispute. but hell, calling someone a democrat doesn't prove they are one either.

labeling people is useful anyway, cause it helps us communicate.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://curi.blogspot.com/>

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 07/29/2003 - 21:31 | reply

Gone but not Forgotten

"'Villepinist" is too bound to the current situation and in a few years is likely to be forgotten.'

Villepin won't be forgotten, anymore than Quisling or Neville Chamberlain was forgotten.

by a reader on Wed, 07/30/2003 - 14:39 | reply

There we go again

Arguing over words rather than substance. Make up a word and attach it to a meaningful descriptive sentence. It is done all the time. If it is a good word and the description sufficiently summarizes the issue the word will come to mean what it means. Wrongheaded.

by a reader on Sat, 10/11/2003 - 14:44 | reply

encourage thinking

Dear Friends,

I think villepinism is a dangerous term because it promotes thinking. Thus, I am for it.

It seems very likely that many people will read idiotarian and immediately suppose they know what it means. Whereas, with villepinism, some may be tempted to look it up, do a Google search, or find places where it is talked about.

Regards,

Jim

davidson@net1.net

<http://www.ezez.com/free/freejim.html>

by planetaryjim on Fri, 11/07/2003 - 03:24 | reply

A Reader

IDIOT, n.

A member of a large and powerful tribe whose influence in human affairs has always been dominant and controlling. The Idiot's activity is not confined to any special field of thought or action, but "pervades and regulates the whole." He has the last word in everything; his decision is unappealable. He sets the fashions and opinion of taste, dictates the limitations of speech and circumscribes conduct with a dead-line.

A.B.

The Devil's Dictionary

(although, in 1906 they made him call it the Cynic's Wordbook, because they were idiots).

by a reader on Wed, 09/29/2004 - 03:30 | reply

Don't use a current figure. P

Don't use a current figure. Perhaps something like chamberlainist would be better.

by a reader on Sat, 06/18/2005 - 11:52 | reply

Pre-Emptying Pre-Emption

The media and the Left are currently gripped by an extraordinary obsession with the non-story of "Bush's Lie" – his allegation prior to the liberation of Iraq that Saddam had tried to obtain uranium from Africa.

Joel Mowbray's concise analysis (via LGF) hits the nail on the head. Aside from journalists and others who are merely interested in sensationalising stories, there's a more important group in the Bush-lied brigade:

Somewhat less self-interested – though no less pernicious – are the folks who are perpetuating the myth because they want to torpedo any future pre-emptive attacks. On CNN last week (debating this columnist), Nation editor Katrina vanden Heuvel was clear about her motives for assailing Bush: "The preemptive doctrine... has now turned out to be an abysmal failure based on the fact that it is predicated on having 100 percent reliable intelligence – and we've seen an administration which clearly manipulated intelligence to take us into war."

If vanden Heuvel and her cohorts can convince enough voters that the war was based on a lie, a President's ability to defend America with pre-emptive strikes will be seriously diminished. And that's exactly what the left wants.

In other words, this is all about pre-emptying pre-emption: making it prohibitively expensive politically for any US President to use military action in future to prevent mass murders.

Since, as Joel Mowbray also remarks, "not a day goes by when terrorists and other thugs aren't plotting to murder Americans and our way of life", and since no purely defensive measures against terrorist mass murder can be effective indefinitely, the only possible alternatives to taking military action in advance of a preventable attack are taking it after the attack or not taking it at all. Either way, the attack itself is then guaranteed: successfully pre-empting pre-emption means successfully guaranteeing a mass murder that could have been prevented.

You will recall that we define idiotarians (villepinists?) as those who systematically side with evil without themselves adopting the evildoers' objectives. The campaign against pre-emption is a textbook example of that, is it not?

Fri, 07/18/2003 - 12:07 | permalink

the only pre-emption ...

that I am in principle opposed to is the Bush admin's pre-emption of our democratic process. If he did indeed knowingly mislead the American public and Congress in order to garner Congressional authorization for a war, then that is a grave offense indeed.

For more see: <http://radio.weblogs.com/0126471/2003/07/17.html>

by a reader on Fri, 07/18/2003 - 13:51 | reply

Pre-Emptive Strikes Have Costs, Too

While I agree with The World that pre-emptive strikes are sometimes justified and proper, I disagree with the implication that any attempts to ensure that the standards of evidence used in such a decision be quite high are "idiotarian" or "villepinist".

Yes, pre-emptive strikes can prevent tragedies, but mistaken pre-emptive strikes can cause them. There should be a high standard before taking such actions.

When you discuss pre-emption and its potential benefits, it's misleading if you don't also consider its potential costs.

If every policy that makes crime prevention more difficult than a tyrant can imagine is "idiotarian" (because it sides with hypothetical criminals), then every decent person in the world is idiotarian. In order to be a bad thing, this "siding with evil" must be unreasonable after considering all of the relevant factors, not just because it fits a simplistic pattern of making some evil easier.

It could very well be that these people are on the wrong side of the idiotarian line, but it's important to remember that some people who want to make pre-emption difficult are on the good side of it.

by Gil on Fri, 07/18/2003 - 19:20 | reply

Re: Pre-Emptive Strikes Have Costs, Too

Gil wrote:

When you discuss pre-emption and its potential benefits, it's misleading if you don't also consider its potential costs.

Very good point. I guess it definitely becomes idiotarian/villepinist when it, in effect, amounts to trying to prevent pre-emptive military action altogether.

by David Deutsch on Fri, 07/18/2003 - 20:06 | reply

Re: Pre-Emptive Strikes Have Costs, Too

we have very high standards. people arguing for high standards are almost always looking for higher standards, especially ones that are infeasible to meet, because they are in fact idiotarians.

There is no credible threat for the standards to be lowered much (from people who like bloodbaths, I guess), btw, so they don't have that excuse.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://curi.blogspot.com/>

by Elliot Temple on Sat, 07/19/2003 - 02:52 | reply

Are these standards falsifiable?

Is there any evidence that would convince you that taking the pre-emptive action was a mistake ? (such as failing to find WMD)

by a reader on Sat, 07/19/2003 - 20:03 | reply

Of course these standards are falsifiable

Is there any evidence that would convince you that taking the pre-emptive action was a mistake ? (such as failing to find WMD)

Of course there is. If it turns out that Saddam was not in fact an evil tyrant, and that Bush and Blair knew this but faked all those threats that were coming from him, and that they faked the evidence of all those people he murdered and tortured and oppressed, and that it was really US forces all along who attacked Iran, Kuwait and Israel, then I for one will seriously consider not voting Bush in for a second term.

Also, if it turns out that World War 2 actually preceded World War 1, and that Napoleon was really a garden gnome, I will have to make other, albeit smaller, revisions in my conception of world history.

by a reader on Sat, 07/19/2003 - 22:23 | reply

Re: Of course these standards are falsifiable

So the standard is not: This government poses an immediate threat to your life and liberty. The standard is: This government murdered, tortured and oppressed it's citizens.

Isn't this true of most of the governments of South America, Africa and Asia? So these regimes must be overthrown as well.

by a reader on Sun, 07/20/2003 - 01:48 | reply

no no no

stop trying to put words in our mouths. it's not a mechanical criterion thing. rather we must use argument on a case by case basis.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://curi.blogspot.com/>

by Elliot Temple on Sun, 07/20/2003 - 16:27 | reply

Re: Gil

Gil writes:

When you discuss pre-emption and its potential benefits, it's misleading if you don't also consider its potential costs.

Yes, it is misleading if one doesn't consider the potential costs of pre-emption. That's why I'm so glad that those costs were indeed considered and taken into account.

Remember: the statement "but you should take X into account", true or not, does not constitute an argument that we didn't take X into account - even if you think we didn't. Say I wanna drive to the mall. You: "but remember you should take the cost of gas into account." But maybe I did. Even if I still end up driving to the mall. In any event the fact that I choose to drive to the mall doesn't mean I didn't take the price of gas into account.

Many if not most of the people who use the "but you should take into account" line seem strangely incapable of comprehending that I can take their concern X into account and still decide that doing the opposite of what they want is the best course of action overall. To such people, if I disagree with them, I must not have thought about the issue enough, not as deeply as them! I hope you're not one of these arrogant people.

by a reader on Mon, 07/21/2003 - 21:54 | reply

further discussion on pre-emptive strikes

> Is there any evidence that would convince you that taking the > pre-emptive action was a mistake ? (such as failing to find WMD)

You say "the pre-emptive action", so I presume the question relates to the pre-emptive American attack on Iraq (and not the pre-emptive attack on Afghanistan, or proposed pre-emptive strikes in the future)...

The reader who wrote "of course these standards are falsifiable" was, to my way of thinking, being a bit too flip on a serious subject. A strong and valid point was made, however -- pre-emptive action in Iraq was justified on several counts. Most of them have not changed a bit; some of them, by their very nature, CANNOT change.

For example, UNSC Resolution 1441 required Saddam to comply completely, unreservedly, and immediately to a list of inspection-related activities. He did not. His actions made it quite clear that he was jerking the world around, and that, whatever his WMD activities might have been, he had no slightest intention of being forthcoming about them. It was known that he HAD had WMD, and that no credible evidence had been presented for him having destroyed all of them; the obvious conclusion was that he still had some of them. It was known that he had no compunctions against USING his WMD, for he had done so before. It was known that he provided financial and material aid to terrorists, including terrorists hostile to the United States. It was known that he himself was hostile to the United States.

The inescapable conclusion from these facts, in early 2003, was that Saddam's regime posed a significant threat to the United States. He had an interest in helping terror attacks against the United States, and it could not be proven that he did NOT have WMD; what we DID know was that, if he had them, and saw an opportunity to use them (or to encourage others to use them) against the United States, he would do so.

No new revelations can possibly change what we knew in early 2003, which were more than sufficient to justify an American pre-emptive strike against Iraq.

Let's try a personal example. If you threaten me every day or so; if sometimes your insults include vague death threats; if one day those threats expand to include my family; and if, one dusky evening, I spot you lurking on my property, carrying something that looks very much like a weapon, what do I do? If I'm smart, I act on the information I have, and I call the police immediately. Perhaps I take action myself to stop you.

Now, suppose that, after I tackle you to the ground and hold you until the police arrive, it turns out that you're unarmed. You were carrying a water pistol, because you enjoy carrying them; it was unloaded. You were on my property looking for a shortcut to the local YMCA. You were wearing dark clothing because you've run out of clean laundry. Would that make my "pre-emptive attack" on you unjustified?

I would argue that, no, my attack would be eminently justifiable, IN TERMS OF WHAT I KNEW AT THE TIME. It was not my choice, in this hypothetical scenario, to be threatened; it was not my choice to be trespassed upon. But the prospect of tackling someone unnecessarily, from my point of view, is infinitely preferable to the other alternative -- doing nothing, and watching helplessly as you visit mayhem on me and my family, precisely as you threatened to do. (Yes, in this scenario, you are unarmed. But I don't know that yet, so these two alternatives will seem equally probable to me.)

(I'll ignore the legal issues -- what if I break your arm in the process of tackling you? Can you, and should you, sue me? -- because they're not relevant, and because I don't live in Britain...)

In short, I believe the pre-emptive strike against Iraq was the correct thing to do, BASED ON WHAT WAS KNOWN AT THE TIME. Yes, it was also an extremely humanitarian thing to do; there have been other benefits after the fact. But the primary reason for attacking Iraq, in my opinion, was that there was plenty of cause to see him as a threat -- a view Saddam himself seemed to enjoy encouraging.

In re pre-emptive strikes as a general tactic -- yes, of course, the standards for going ahead with one must be quite high. David Deutsch and Elliot Temple have the right idea, in my opinion; set the standards high, and, when those standards are met, DON'T HESITATE.

sincerely,
Daniel in Medford

by a reader on Mon, 07/21/2003 - 22:02 | reply

to expand

a choice is right or it is not right. period. what happens has no effect on this. a simple way to see that what happens can have no bearing: physics is deterministic so the outcome was predetermined when the choice was made anyway.

another point is: we cannot choose based on information we do not have; we are not wrong to make choices without being omniscient. so if you oppose some choice you have 2 lines of attack: 1) the choice was best possible under circumstances, BUT the person was wrongly negligent in allowing himself to be ignorant and make such bad choices 2) the person chose wrong given what he knew

"it turned out badly" cannot cut it as a direct argument.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://curi.blogspot.com/>

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 07/21/2003 - 22:31 | reply

Re: Gil

A reader wrote:

Many if not most of the people who use the "but you should take into account" line seem strangely incapable of comprehending that I can take their concern X into account and still decide that doing the opposite of what they want is the best course of action overall. To such people, if I disagree with them, I must not have thought about the issue enough, not as deeply as them! I hope you're not one of these arrogant people.

No, I'm not one of those arrogant people.

I was not criticizing the campaign in Iraq (of which I approve). I'm satisfied that the costs and benefits were weighed, and that the actions taken were reasonable and justified.

I was just pointing out that the argument in the original post could be interpreted as implying that any argument that seeks to have high standards of evidence before engaging in pre-emptive strikes necessarily makes things easier on the bad guys and is thus idiotarian. It seemed to only examine one side of the ledger.

I wanted to point out that it isn't enough to only examine whether bad people might be helped, but whether the proposal makes it more likely that the right thing will happen, considering both the benefits and the costs.

by Gil on Tue, 07/22/2003 - 17:28 | reply

More about why the lie matters ...

<http://radio.weblogs.com/0126471/2003/07/22.html#a86>

by a reader on Tue, 07/22/2003 - 23:46 | reply

yes but

Gil,

good points, except you've forgotten the point (or assertion, let's say) made in the original post: that the critics are trying to "pre-empt pre-emption" itself. That is, take pre-emption off the table completely as an option (because it's predicated on 100 percent knowledge and you can never have that, or similar arguments). You can disagree with that assertion and say "no they're not, they're just demanding high/higher standards", and indeed that is probably true of some people. But apparently not Katrina Vandenheuvel if the excerpt quoted from her is any indication: "the preemptive doctrine" is a "failure", in her view. In other words, no pre-emption. Sure sounds like a villipenism to me. But you're right, this statement being a villipenism doesn't mean that all requests for high/higher standards of evidence on these matters are. On the other hand, I don't think anyone said otherwise in the first place. best,

by a reader on Wed, 07/23/2003 - 00:37 | reply

In a Nearby Universe: EU Drops Cuba Sanctions

Following an announcement by Cuban leader Fidel Castro that the three dissidents he executed were Jews, the EU immediately abandoned the policy of cultural sanctions that it had planned against Cuba. (Namely, reducing the number of operas to which Castro is invited when he visits European capitals.)

"Castro's regime may murder people but we can't deny that it is partly a political organisation that builds hospitals and performs other good works, so it would be wrong to impose sanctions," said an EU spokesman. "After all, we wouldn't want to give the impression that the EU is run by slimy, hypocritical, lying scumbags."

Sat, 07/19/2003 - 21:29 | permalink

A new word for “idiotarian”?

No, let's keep the word “idiotarian”.

37% (152 votes)

Fallaci's term “cicada”;

1% (6 votes)

Kolya Wolf's term “villepinist”;

23% (92 votes)

There is no such thing so no word is necessary.

5% (20 votes)

“Leftist”;

6% (25 votes)

“Idiot”;

4% (17 votes)

“antirational”;

7% (27 votes)

“French” (Just kidding!)

17% (69 votes)

Total votes: 408

Sun, 07/20/2003 - 14:50 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

A random villepinism

French Foreign Minister Dominique de Villepin led the pro-Palestinian line during the talks between Shalom and the European ministers.

"It is not possible to ignore the historic place and standing of Arafat," he said, "and he has the popular support of most of the Palestinian community."

<http://www.haaretzdaily.com/hasen/spages/320439.html>

by a reader on Mon, 07/21/2003 - 17:37 | reply

Hmmm.

Contramericans?

Ptah

by ptah on Wed, 07/23/2003 - 15:49 | reply

The anti-idiotarian and the drunk

The trouble with "idiotarianism" is that it's used just like the drunk uses the lamppost: more for propping up one's position, than for the illumination it provides.

by a reader on Sun, 07/27/2003 - 06:31 | reply

Villepin doesn't deserve ANY recognition.

The trouble with "villepinist" is that it acknowledges Villepin - he (like France in general), is better left ignored.

by a reader on Thu, 07/31/2003 - 23:20 | reply

Another "It is not possible..." from the French?

America can - America will!

by a reader on Thu, 07/31/2003 - 23:23 | reply

Villepin embodies a widespread pseudo-liberal fallacy

Modern philosophy lacks a coherent explanation for the nature of morality. There are roughly three kinds of response to this predicament: the religious, the objective, and the anti-objective.

The religious response is intellectually indefensible, but in some of its more evolved forms contains considerable moral wisdom. The objective approach shares with the religious approach a commitment to the existence of an objective right and wrong, but freely admits that the philosophical justification for this commitment remains to be elucidated. The anti-objective approach is founded on the denial of the existence of an objective right and wrong; and on looking instead to procedural mechanisms for developing a consensus about moral values.

The most notable feature of this anti-objective approach is that its adherents hate their pro-objective opponents, more than they hate outright doers of evil. That is how they come to be systematic apologists for evil -- time and again they conclude that their enemy's enemy is their friend.

This is the underlying explanation for the political morality of a great swath of Western intellectuals, including most academics. We need a succinct descriptive term in order to facilitate discussion of this widespread and culturally malign mentality, of which Dominique de Villepin is such a shining paragon.

In the service of this cause, Villepin deserves all the recognition we can give him.

by Kolya on Fri, 08/01/2003 - 07:32 | reply

One problem with keeping it "idiotarian"

The problem I have with keeping the word "idiotarian" (even though I think it's the right word to use) is the fact that the left is notorious for redefining words to suit themselves. Just like they've strived since Bush took office to redefine "patriotic" as being against the country or government. That's just one example though. I'm sure they'd try and redefine "idiotarian" too.

by a reader on Mon, 08/11/2003 - 20:29 | reply

Understanding it

In order to give "idiotarianism" (or Villepinism, or whatever) the right name it would help if we understood where this pathological conception of morality comes from. I just spent another exhausting after-dinner conversation trying to persuade an anti-war friend that Bush was right to take us to war in Iraq when he did, and something struck me afterward.

Instead of trying to persuade her to switch sides by criticising her position, I should have been encouraging her to criticise my position. I suppose this would be like leading a horse to water, but anyway:

Some think tank should set up a call centre next time there's a just war on the cards. Each idiotarian caller is paid 25 cence on their credit card for every good question or criticism they make to the well-trained telephone moralist. (The telemoralist has access to detailed computer files citing arguments, counterarguments, newspaper sources, etc). These 25 cence payments keep stacking up until the caller repeats a circular argument, or falls back on "peace is better than war", or "Bush is slimy and he pollutes rivers", "we need more information before rushing to judgement" or "the Catholics were just as bad in Northern Ireland" or whatever.

In this way,

- (a) we get to know far more about idiotarians
- (b) idiotarians are forced to confront reality

Actually, maybe it would be more effective to make the payments to charity (the charity would be selected by agreement from a list).

The caller must answer 4 or 5 questions before the critical session begins in order to establish his credentials as a Villepinist. (As an extra guide, lie detecting software would be installed on the call centre's computers)

I know this scheme has about as much chance of being implemented as every Palestinian kid getting a free trip to Disneyland, but what the heck. Someone slap me down...

by Tom Robinson on Tue, 08/12/2003 - 03:57 | reply

From the horse's mouth

Villepin makes new call to end "tragic cycle" in Middle East

Fri Aug 22, 5:38 AM ET

PARIS (AFP) - French Foreign Minister Dominique de Villepin urged Israel and the Palestinians must try to break out of their "tragic cycle" of violence as the region appeared headed for even more violence.

Speaking on the privately-owned RTL radio station, De Villepin said both sides needed to make concessions to stop the cycle of violence, and he called for a new effort by the European Union to get involved.

The Israelis had to promise to pull out of the Palestinian territories to give their inhabitants "the feeling that their life is going to change," while the Palestinians had to "very clearly give up carrying out attacks," he said.

The French official also called for the international community to broaden its efforts for peace, and said the United States could not act on its own.

"Europe must get involved again," he added.

The statement came as the Palestinian militant groups Islamic Jihad and Hamas issued a joint statement formally ending their seven-week-old truce with Israel.

by a reader on Sun, 08/24/2003 - 15:02 | reply

Keep both words

I suggest keeping both words (idiotarian and villepinist). Use idiotarian for the broad category of someone who is generally an idiot, with various kinds of incorrect reasoning. And use villepinist for the subcategory of idiotarians who are characterized by the more specific reasoning error of siding with evil without wanting the consequences.

Henry Sturman

by Henry Sturman on Thu, 08/28/2003 - 12:30 | reply

More From de Villepin

"We are all aware of the gravity and the urgency of the moment," de Villepin told France-Inter radio. "We must act. It's the duty of the international community."

What is?

by Gil on Tue, 09/16/2003 - 00:01 | reply

De Villepin: Terrorism exploded in postwar Iraq

PARIS - Iraq has gone from being a terrorist-free country under Saddam Hussein to seeing an "explosion" of terrorism since the US-led war this year, French Foreign Minister Dominique de Villepin said Thursday in a speech directly contradicting White House assertions.

"There was no verified link between al-Qaeda and Saddam Hussein's regime, no terrorism before the regime fell," de Villepin told a Paris conference of diplomats, scientists and businessmen focusing on religion and politics in Asia.

"And yet, afterwards, there has been an explosion of terrorism, an increase in opportunities of attacks and a more fragile situation," he said. ...

"We must make sure that each crisis on the international stage is well looked after, which explains the French position which strongly believes that, rather than treat the Iraqi crisis urgently and hastily, it would be better to first tackle a settlement of the Palestinian conflict," he said.

<http://www.middle-east-online.com/english/?id=7236>

by a reader on Sun, 10/12/2003 - 07:41 | reply

Villepin compares domestic critics to Nazi collaborators

Having recently emerged battered from national education strikes and months of street demonstrations over reduced retirement benefits, Jacques Chirac's administration is looking on with dismay at media encouragement for right-wing intellectual claims that France is now the weak man of Europe, mired in hypocrisy nationally and internationally, indifferent to popular needs such as care of the aged, and shaken by the aftershocks of vain defiance of the US-led war in Iraq. In short, that France is going down the pan.

"Reading these books, France is in agony, powerless and irretrievably condemned to decline," Dominique de Villepin, the suave but widely mistrusted Foreign Minister, complained over two pages in Le Monde last week, comparing today's prophets of doom to anti-republicans who collaborated with the Nazis.

<http://observer.guardian.co.uk/international/story/0,6903,1061130,00.html>

by a reader on Sun, 10/12/2003 - 07:49 | reply

miggle's ghost

I would like to know just what "historic place and standing" that inbred gentleman is talking about.

by a reader on Tue, 03/16/2004 - 16:56 | reply

home | archives | polls | search

Copyright © 2008 Setting The World To Rights

A New Word For “Idiotarian”?

In the light of recent discussions on Setting The World To Rights, our latest poll asks whether we need a new word for “idiotarian”. Vote now!

Sun, 07/20/2003 - 15:20 | permalink

Oliver Kamm

Oliver Kamm is one of the most trenchant writers and consistently clear thinkers on a wide variety of issues. Do not let the fact that he says he's left-wing put you off, for he is the opposite of loony. He is the opposite of idiotarian/villepinist. He is no friend to tyranny on the small scale or the large. And he does not spare anyone who is any of those things.

Yesterday's concise, rueful comment about one facet of contemporary anti-Semitism is a good example of his work. But then you should also read this about the current BBC/David Kelly scandal. And this about the alliance between far-left socialists and Islamofascists, and this about the moral bankruptcy of the once-proud New Statesman magazine. And this, and this ... oh just go and read the whole site.

Mon, 07/21/2003 - 16:17 | permalink

Indeed, an interesting blog. ...

Indeed, an interesting blog.
I didn't find anything in it to justify the "left-wing" label.

by Boris A.Kupersmidt on Sat, 08/09/2003 - 20:52 | reply

Anti-Life

Why would Life, a group that opposes abortion because they see themselves as "pro-life", also oppose in-vitro fertilisation (IVF)? IVF is a medical technique which, for some couples, makes the difference between their being able to have a child or not. One might think that simple arithmetic would say that the forces of good and life are one up on such a deal since one life is more than none. But not according to Life. Why?

Life director Nuala Scarisbrick says that even the fulfilment of a couple's dream of parenthood does not justify what goes on inside the fertility clinic...

Guidelines limit the number of embryos that can be implanted into a patient at two, or three in exceptional circumstance - but often, a woman can produce many more than this number.

Once those considered to have the "best chance" of producing a pregnancy are selected, the rest are either frozen for later use, donated for research, or simply destroyed.

To most infertile couples, their desperation makes this an uncomfortable, but in the end unavoidable trade-off.

Nuala told BBC News Online: "You are deliberately setting out to create human beings - and then destroy them..."

The woman in charge of regulating IVF treatments in UK for much of the last decade, Dame Ruth Deech said that the argument was not necessarily so clear-cut.

She told BBC News Online: "I was told by one of the leading fertility researchers that, in nature, a sexually active woman will produce many fertilised embryos that fail to implant and are lost.

"When I heard that, I found it quite comforting with regard to this question."

Nevertheless, say Life, it presents a terrible ethical dilemma for any woman contemplating IVF - and one in which her desperation for a child may cloud her judgment.

Life is similarly outraged by the idea of using eggs from aborted fetuses for fertility treatment and also disapproves of stem cell research.

Do you begin to see a pattern here? Can you think of an appropriate name for this pattern? IVF, embryonic stem cell research and similar treatments have the potential greatly to increase the quality of life of thinking human beings with hopes, dreams and aspirations and to create new thinking human beings where none would have existed otherwise. We find it chilling that some people are willing to sacrifice this for the sake of an entity with no more humanity than a nail clipping or a used condom.

Their position is anti-life.

Wed, 07/23/2003 - 20:50 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Sides are talking past each other Groups and individuals like Life feel that it is immoral to kill one, many, or any human beings in order to give life to one. Their opinion is that "killing for life" is a contradiction. You write that the "entity" has no more life than any piece of human DNA lying around. Pro-life groups disagree.

by Rob Michael on Thu, 07/24/2003 - 19:48 | reply

Yuck.

Rob is right in the title of his response:

Only through a particular understanding of what "life" means--yours, naturally--does your conclusion make sense. But that conceptual understanding of what constitutes life is the very thing at issue. Your reasoning there is a bit circular. (You also mischaracterize the pro-life position as one whose aim it is to promote the highest sheer number of warm bodies, which isn't the case.)

It's also more than a little self-serving. I should emphasize that I'm pro-choice myself, before going on.

Even the most liberal availability of fertility services, like in vitro, will never outweigh the number of abortions that happen in a given year. The demand for the former won't ever outweigh that of the latter. So even your factual claim--that fertility services of the kind you mention will bring on a new era of life, life, everywhere--seems to be suspect.

The reasons for this are simple, and obvious. We are, individually, far more likely to be fertile than not, and far more likely to produce an unwanted pregnancy than to be unable to produce one at all. To call their position "anti-life" is empirically and conceptually dishonest.

Compare places which have very liberal law concerning birth control and widely available fertility services to places which have neither of those things. Whose rate of population growth is higher?

To pro-lifers, the value of life isn't a numbers game, and it says nothing good about the pro-choice position that its adherents can't even separate out these simple conceptual issues without loading them down with their own presuppositions. As a pro-choice person myself, I'm dismayed at how incoherent a moral and philosophical position is in evidence in posts like these. It is one reason among many that the pro-choice movement is starting to lose ground.

by a reader on Thu, 07/24/2003 - 20:22 | reply

Slippery Slopes

It might not apply to this group, but I think many people oppose advanced research with human embryos because they are afraid that even good techniques today might make "bad" techniques more likely to be acceptable in the future.

This is the "Slippery Slope" argument. There are cases where these sorts of arguments are valid. I agree with The World that this is certainly not one of them.

Eugene Volokh wrote a lengthy analysis of slippery slope arguments that might interest some readers.

by Gil on Thu, 07/24/2003 - 21:04 | reply

Mischaracterization

"A reader" above is correct, and it's strange to see such a bizarre mischaracterization of the pro-life position on this normally rational site.

Master of None

by Michael Williams on Thu, 07/24/2003 - 21:40 | reply

A story

"Mummy, where do I come from?"

"Well, dear... I was hoping you would ask that one day. Are you sitting comfortably? (Mummy starts) Once upon a time there was this dead abnormal foetus which is a creature that is not quite a baby yet (shows picture) and they sliced it in bits, took some eggs from it, mixed them with a bit of random sperm, and you got to be one of the lucky eggs that was fertilised, isn't it wonderful?"

by a reader on Thu, 07/24/2003 - 22:27 | reply

Re: "Mummy, where do I come from?"

there was this dead abnormal foetus which is a creature that is not quite a baby yet (shows picture) and they sliced it in bits, took some eggs from it, mixed them with a bit of random sperm, and you got to be one of the lucky eggs that was fertilised, isn't it wonderful?"

And before it was a yucky abnormal creature that was not quite a baby yet, it was a bunch of chemicals. And before that, it was various pieces of chewed-up cow. And before that, grass. And before that, mostly just air and water. And out of all that miscellaneous stuff which otherwise no one would give tuppence for, because of the knowledge and creativity and skill of various people, a couple who would otherwise not have been able to have a child, now do.

And yes, all of that is absolutely wonderful. What part of it isn't?

by David Deutsch on Thu, 07/24/2003 - 22:56 | reply

Re: "Mummy, where do I come from?"

Hmmm....I suppose that in the case of ordinary conception this cheerful little tale would go something like:

"Once upon a time there were two special gametes(which are really little creatures that aren't quite a baby, yet(shows diagram), so Mommy and Daddy joined their bodies together just below the belly, made a lot of noise, caused the neighbors to wonder if someone was being tortured, and, at the end of all this, Daddy managed to squirt his little creature into Mommy(along with about 100 million similar ones that just ended up being discarded), where it joined with Mommy's little creature (thus preventing that creature's excretion about two weeks later) and started growing and dividing and eventually became you."

So? What is the point here? It is conceivable(pun only slightly intended;-) that this story is what it appears to be on the surface(a simple explanation of how the child came to be) but, given the use of rather loaded terms and the sarcastic tone of the whole thing, it is probably meant to implicitly reinforce the idea that This is A Very Bad Thing That Was Done, and we should press our all-wise shepards in DC, London, Brussels or wherever to Do Something About It, preferably with huge fines and long prison terms attached for Evil People who dare to defy The People's Will in the matter. Apart from being an atrocious message to give a child who was conceived in such a way, it promotes the now-commonplace silliness about stem cells/cloning/biotech/anything remotely similar or related. It promotes the idea that there is something inherently mysterious or incomprehensible about how humans develop, and that nothing good can come from modifying or interfering with the process in any way.

And this is perniciously wrong, since it gets in the way of creating very important knowledge, namely how to create new people under various circumstances, and keep them(and already-existing people) alive, happy, and healthy for longer and longer.

Brian

by bk_2112 on Fri, 07/25/2003 - 01:25 | reply

The Strange Ironies of Life

'Only through a particular understanding of what "life" means--yours, naturally--does your conclusion make sense. But that conceptual understanding of what constitutes life is the very thing at issue. Your reasoning there is a bit circular. (You also mischaracterize the pro-life position as one whose aim it is to promote the highest sheer number of warm bodies, which isn't the case.)'

You don't find it even a little bit ironic that a group that chooses to name itself Life is undertaking a policy that systematically makes the quality of life of many people a lot poorer than it would be otherwise? (For such is the real point if you had bothered to read it closely enough.)

To quote:

'IVF, embryonic stem cell research and similar treatments have the potential greatly to increase the quality of life of thinking human beings with hopes, dreams and aspirations and to create new thinking human beings where none would have existed otherwise.'

'To pro-lifers, the value of life isn't a numbers game, and it says nothing good about the pro-choice position that its adherents can't even separate out these simple conceptual issues without loading them down with their own presuppositions. As a pro-choice person myself, I'm dismayed at how incoherent a moral and philosophical position is in evidence in posts like these. It is one reason among many that the pro-choice movement is starting to lose ground.'

The pro-choice position is not incoherent. Anything that thinks, i.e. - creates new knowledge, counts morally anything that doesn't think doesn't count morally. Hence, embryos, cows and rocks don't count, but thinking people do.

Nor would anyone sensible deny that anti-abortion types don't see morality as a numbers game, the argument above counts on them not seeing it that way, since quality of life comes into the argument. However, since they draw the moral line in the wrong place their views have rather uncomfortable moral consequences, like being willing to allow people to die or go childless rather than destroy a small clump of cells, hence the characterisation of their position as pro-life seems a bit inappropriate.

by Alan Forrester on Fri, 07/25/2003 - 01:31 | reply

Re: Ironies

Alan, by your reckoning of what "counts morally" children and mentally disabled people don't count. It isn't a stretch at all to say that the same requirement - creating new knowledge - would rule out people who are comatose or senile. Are you really ready to say that children, Down syndrom people, and the elderly don't have moral worth?

And, since you used the ability to create knowledge as a measure of when something has moral worth, could you perhaps tell me when an embryo is advanced enough to have crossed that line and attained enough worth to deserve the protections we afford other moral worthies?

by Rob Michael on Fri, 07/25/2003 - 02:46 | reply

my fucking god

have you noticed the point of IVF is to take sperm and egg cells that would NOT become a person and put them 2gether to make a person?

if that's not sufficient, then i have a question for the pro-lifers (so i won't mischaracterise your position :-D): are condoms murder?

-- Elliot Temple

<http://curi.blogspot.com/>

by Elliot Temple on Fri, 07/25/2003 - 06:48 | reply

children don't think????

Dear Rob Michael,

Are you seriously suggesting that children, Down's Syndrome people and the elderly don't think? People start creating knowledge the moment they emerge from the womb, and stop when their hearts stop beating. Not all of them are writing novels or splitting atoms, but that doesn't mean they aren't thinking.

Sheesh.

Emma

by a reader on Fri, 07/25/2003 - 09:33 | reply

Elliot and reader

Elliot,

Pro-lifer's aren't objecting to making and carrying to term one fertilized egg. They're objecting because IVF requires the making of many fertilized eggs that are then destroyed while only one are two are implanted. Pro-lifers believe that each conceived person (fertilized egg) deserves to be brought to term.

Oh, and Elliot, using a condom wouldn't be murder because its use doesn't kill a human being. It only prevents the conception of one (which is also regarded as morally wrong, though less wrong than murder).

Emma,

How do you know babies start creating knowledge from the moment they emerge from the womb?? They can't show it. Why is a baby outside the womb creating knowledge and a baby at the beginning of the third trimester not creating knowledge? You, like Alan, are drawing a line at birth that does not exist.

by Rob Michael on Fri, 07/25/2003 - 14:29 | reply

A Question

Are "pro-life" women queueing up to host and raise the fertilized embryos that would otherwise be discarded?

It seems to me that if they really believed that these are human beings, if they had any interest in being parents they'd want to rescue these children and prevent their murders. Since adoptive parents prefer to get children as young as possible, this seems ideal.

Are they doing this?

I realize that the natural parents might object to this, but I suspect that many wouldn't.

by Gil on Fri, 07/25/2003 - 16:41 | reply

fertilised eggs

Can you explain why the moment the egg becomes fertilised was chosen for when pro-lifers consider it a person? It seems arbitrary to me.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://curi.blogspot.com/>

by Elliot Temple on Fri, 07/25/2003 - 18:25 | reply

Roe, Roe, Roe Your Boat....

Gil,

You write that pro-lifers don't actually believe that embryos are children. You proceed to that conclusion by stating that if pro-lifers did believe, then they would be clamoring to "adopt" the embryos in order to preserve them. Even if we were to set aside the question of who "owns" those embryos and who has rights over those embryos (such as the court-created right to interact with one's genetic offspring), you would still face the question of responsibility. If I were to go to a town hall meeting and shoot at the mayor, no one would support my defense that my fellow townspeople should had a responsibility disarm me and that I am therefore not responsible for the moral harm that I have caused (whether I hit him or not).

It would be a charitable act to "adopt" the embryos and charitable acts are by definition not a duty or responsibility owed to society at large. Your contention that a charitable act would prove the integrity of pro-lifers does not support the position that IVF is morally permissible.

And it seems a rather nasty policy to attack a group's sincerity in order to cast doubt on their message. I see very few pro-lifers attempting to say that "everyone really knows that humanity begins at birth, those pro-choice folks are just too wrapped up in being right to admit it." An attack like that on the group Life or even on the Catholic Church through the ongoing scandal is not just an attack on the integrity of the organization, but an attempt to nullify in the public eye the values and point-of-view that underlie it.

Elliot,

The moment of conception (chosen by pro-lifers as the starting of personhood) is no more arbitrarily chosen than the moment of birth (chosen by pro-choicers and others as the point at which we acknowledge basic human rights owed). Christian pro-lifers who rely on the scripture as a source of guidance would refer you to Jeremiah 1:5 "Before I formed you in the womb I knew you." For non-Christian pro-lifers, it becomes a question of what rights are owed to whom and when. The general answers are that human rights are possessed by humans (duh) and that they possess these during their life, but not before it and not after it. The endpoint of life is perhaps less difficult to pin down than the beginning, owing to technology that helps us pinpoint heart failure and brain-death and cessation of activity, but even then our doctors and health-care providers find opportunity to delineate the point at which a person no longer has the right to control their own destiny (as when hospitals and insurance providers order the removal of feeding tubes and hydrating drips to save money).

So, human rights are possessed by living humans. The relevant question for us is: are embryos alive and are they human. They are unquestionably alive. The smallest bacteria (and viruses too, say some scientists) are accorded the label "life." If you're willing to grant that an embryo is alive then the question is narrowed even further to whether or not it is human. Clearly a single piece of DNA is not human. It is a piece of a human. How many pieces make up a human? This is an unanswerable trick question -- after all, a person does not lose rights if he loses a piece of himself, say a toe or a hand. He doesn't even lose rights if he loses a piece of his brain or ceases brain-functioning completely (in many cases it is said that such people can be "brought back" from the edge). Even total disruption of brain processes does not remove a human from his or her rights (as in an epileptic fit). The reason I took the time to point all this out is to demonstrate that humanity does not rest solely on one body part or any sum total of human pieces. In the absence, then, of any clear biological guide to when a human life begins, many people err on the side of caution, deciding that it is better to not accidentally kill people. Even unknowingly killing someone is generally frowned upon in our society. Along similar lines, I personally believe that a duty is owed to (or a right possessed by) any probable-humans (such as embryos). So many times when referring to someone who has died young we hear that "They had such a life in store for them that they will never get the chance to have..." Clearly, the potential for life is valued in our society. This is an even better indicator that potential humans (like embryos) possess some right.

by Rob Michael on Fri, 07/25/2003 - 20:25 | reply

My Question

Rob,

I didn't write what you say I wrote. I understand how you could infer what you did, but I was genuinely curious if this was happening.

I didn't mean to suggest that a lack of this adoption would prove that "pro-lifers" don't believe what they say. I just thought that such a belief would lead to an interest in such adoption, and if it isn't happening, that would require some explanation (and I can think of a few, but none incredibly compelling).

So, again. Is it happening? And if not, why not?

by Gil on Fri, 07/25/2003 - 21:00 | reply

who does the thinking?

Dear Rob Michael,

Leaving aside the question of EXACTLY when life begins (I said that humans are thinking as soon as they leave the womb not so much to define a starting point for life, but because all of us can agree that we can see them doing it from that point on), may I ask the question again that I really wanted an answer to?

Were you suggesting that children, Down's Syndrome people and the elderly don't create new knowledge? [way up in a comment entitled Ironies]

Emma

by a reader on Fri, 07/25/2003 - 22:01 | reply

Thinking as a rule...

Gil,

I'm sorry I took your comments the wrong way. To my knowledge, no attempts to "adopt" unwanted embryos have been made. As for explanations, the most readily that come to mind are (as I mentioned above) questions of ownership of embryos and the possibility that the genetic parents may come to feel that they have a right to see their genetic offspring. Also, it is not generally recognized that people who advocate conventional adoption should adopt every home-less child they can. That in no way diminishes their advocacy of adoption. For instance, though I support adoption, I am in no position to raise a child. Though I lack the opportunity to raise a child, my support of adoption as a general principle is not diminished.

Emma,

My comments in "Re:Ironies" were directed at Alan who claimed that anything that thinks (creates knowledge) has moral worth. I think its arguable that babies, the mentally infirm (through disability or age), and the comatose don't have thoughts like the rest of humanity. The difference may be in brain structure or brain function, but in either case the brain is not functioning normally. I wrote that to point out that the lack of normal brain function does not mean those people do not have rights. In the same way, people having epileptic fits are also regarded as human life that has rights, even though they are not thinking during their fits and their brains lose all "normal" functioning. All of my discussion of thoughts and thinking is to provide examples of why thinking as a general rule of the measure of moral worth is not a particularly defensible principle. Using "thinking" as the rule may have unintended consequences for people who want to declare birth the point at which human life begins. In fact, our technologies are advanced enough to get EEGs of unborn babies. These show that there is brain activity very early in the development of a foetus. Thus, Alan's rule that thinking marks moral worth would extend moral worth to unborn children at least to some point father back in their development than birth.

by Rob Michael on Sat, 07/26/2003 - 06:48 | reply

abortion

Rob Michael,

i agree pro-choicers who think birth = human are arbitrary. however, some of us prefer thinking=human, because that is the defining characteristic of humanity.

i also agree we should err on the side of caution. but if a foetus doesn't yet have a brain with electrical impulses in it, we know it doesn't think yet, so we are erring on the side of caution very strongly.

if it does not yet think, it is just a mishmash of chemicals that can't be upset by being destroyed anymore than a rock. its moral value, until it does think, comes only from actual people (namely its parents) wanting to have a child. if they don't, as a libertarian, i acknowledge they have a legal right to have an abortion (just like my neighbors could destroy their TV instead of keeping it, or instead of giving it to me, even if I want it). whether this was the right decision is another question (but in the general case of accidental/unwanted pregnancy, i say it is the right answer).

to disagree I'm fairly sure you need to believe in souls or somesuch...

-- Elliot Temple

<http://curi.blogspot.com/>

by Elliot Temple on Sat, 07/26/2003 - 18:53 | reply

Quick! Kill it before it thinks!

Somewhere during this discussion two qualifiers were established in order to determine if a foetus possessed the rights afforded to living humans. The fact that a foetus is a living organism was not questioned. The second qualification was discussed in Rob Michael's post 'Roe Roe...' above. From that it has now been asserted by Elliot that a foetus does not possess thought and thus does not have moral worth. This is, in my opinion, a bad deduction for two reasons.

The first reason is a catch twenty-two scenario. Elliot demonstrated that a foetus doesn't think and thus has no moral value other than the value placed on it by wanting parents. This doesn't change the fact that the foetus will grow, will develop a brain, and will think. By killing the foetus before it can think doesn't mean it was never going to think. Given time, the foetus will develop thought and be of worth to more than just wanting parents. To absolve a person from wrongdoing concerning the destruction of a foetus simply because it was not thinking at the time does not allow that the foetus was eventually going to think. A harsher understanding; killing an undeveloped foetus who doesn't think and killing a five-year-old child who does think accomplish the same thing: the destruction of a living organism capable of thought.

The second reason involves an understanding of moral worth. Both Rob and Elliot fail to address the possibility that an organism/animal/human might have moral worth simply because it is alive and not because of any inalienable rights. For instance, who among pro-lifers would kill a stray dog? The dog has no owner who values the cast out. It is even debatable that the beast has thought, at least in the manner that makes human thought valuable. Despite this apparent lack of value most people would find it morally wrong to kill the dog. Why? Because the killing of an animal (except for food) is unarguably wrong. It has been ingrained into most people that it is wrong to kill anything. Some go as far as to say that ending a tree's life is wrong. Obviously trees can't possess thought and yet they have an apparent worth.

For these two reasons I reject Elliot's assertion that unwanted fetuses can be aborted simply because they are mishmashes of chemicals that can't be upset. I attest that a foetus will become capable of thought and is worth more than dogs, trees, or Elliot. I'm just kidding Elliot. I apologize. I couldn't resist.

by Tom Anthony on Sun, 07/27/2003 - 07:30 | reply

Can fetuses become human alone?

no, they can't. they need active help from the mother.

"this doesn't change the fact that the fetus will grow, will develop a brain, and will think." -- no, all it takes to kill one is to fail to help it w/ nutrients, housing, etc also i don't see the content in the claim that a fetus is "alive". are computers alive? cats? what's it matter? the standard use of the word has a lot to do with motion, but in an age of cars that seems kinda silly.

"Because the killing of an animal (except for food) is unarguably wrong." -- oh, well if it's unarguable i guess you win...

-- Elliot Temple

<http://curi.blogspot.com/>

by Elliot Temple on Sun, 07/27/2003 - 18:50 | reply

Good Point

Tom Anthony makes a very strong case against the idea that a fetus starts to have moral value when it begins to think like a human.

After all, if he himself "couldn't resist" insulting Elliot in an online post that permits previewing and editing before posting, then perhaps humans don't have a mind that can create knowledge and control the actions of the body. Perhaps they are just slaves to simple electro-chemical reactions just like trees and stray dogs.

by Gil on Sun, 07/27/2003 - 19:17 | reply

I can't leave for a minute...

Maybe we could get back on track.

Specifically, I'd like to address Elliot's post "abortion." He writes that "thinking is the defining characteristic of humanity." I only have a slight problem with his formulation and I promise I won't resort to the existence of souls to disagree. When you say "thinking" I'm pretty sure you are referring to "human thinking" and maybe even "normal human thinking." After all, dogs, rats, and apes think, but they don't possess rights. This idea that human thinking should entitle one to human rights is a bad standard for several reasons. I mention many of them above, but it seems that I wasn't clear enough.

According to the "human thinking" standard, one has to fulfill two requirements to have human rights. They must be human and they must be thinking. The question of whether a fetus is human was addressed in the last paragraph of my comment "Roe, Roe, Roe your boat...." and was not met with any opposing comments. I will simply refer you there for consideration of this first part of the "human thinking" standard.

The second part of this standard is the most important. Basically, it states that thinking things possess rights in accordance with their type. Thus, thinking humans have human rights (and maybe thinking dogs have canine rights -- whatever they may be). The reason I phrase it like this is because it is not clear whether proponents of this standard believe that thinking humans possess rights because they are thinking or that the fact that they are thinking is merely an indicator that they have rights and the thinking part is not necessarily the source of the rights. On the one hand, I am inclined to believe that proponents believe the latter because obviously people retain their rights when they are sleeping/comatose/vegetative/having an epileptic fit (and thus not thinking) and therefore the source of the rights is not in their thought. On the other hand, it could be that we're playing a little fast and loose with words and when proponents of the standard wrote "thinking" for "human thinking" they meant "human brain activity." With this clarification, human rights would then be possessed by things by reason of their human brain activity. As I mentioned in a previous comment, legal rights are still retained by people in a vegetative state -- in other words, when they have no brain activity. It seems that most people believe that human rights are retained as well.

This, at the very least, makes clear that rights are not associated with human thinking/brain activity alone. It is much more reasonable to believe there is something else either by itself or in addition to human thinking that indicates the possession of human rights.

As for Elliot's comments on life in his post "Can fetuses become human alone?", I don't seriously believe that his position rests on the idea that fetuses are not alive. This, too, has already been covered without rejection in my post "Roe, Roe, Roe your boat." Fetuses clearly are alive. The real question that Thomas was trying to address was whether the state of being alive gets them anything (like rights). I'm also puzzled by Elliot's remark that fetuses rely on the mother and therefore do not possess rights. That is equally true of a baby and yet the baby has rights. It is a real stretch to say that dependency on another negates rights.

by Rob Michael on Mon, 07/28/2003 - 00:57 | reply

Life or Something Like It

In Rob Michael's post 'I can't leave for a minute...' he briefly touches on a concept of animal rights (though his post is in no way is about animal rights.) In his words,

'...maybe thinking dogs have canine rights -- whatever they may be.'

I bring this up because I think it is important to note that in our fifty states and the District of Columbia animals are afforded anti-cruelty statutes. All fifty states and the District have these statutes that are intended to prevent the mistreatment of animals, wild or tame. While these statutes don't confer any rights upon animals, they do indicate that the mistreatment or destruction of a living organism will not go unpunished. It is from these statutes that I gather the population of the United States believes in the inviolability of living creatures as I stated in a previous post.

'...the killing of an animal (except for food) is unarguably wrong.'

A refusal to see a fetus as a living organism, even one lacking humanity, is a way in which people can assuage their inherent dislike of killing living things. Those that don't outright disregard fetuses as being alive find other methods of assuaging their feelings. For example, the flippant manner in which Elliot disregards the importance of whether a fetus is alive or not.

by Tom Anthony on Mon, 07/28/2003 - 06:26 | reply

Logical Fallacies Are Fun

the subject line auto-completed g

anyway, the majority of ppl in the USA thinking somethign doesn't make it true.

and you haven't told me A) what "alive" means and B) what that matters

-- Elliot Temple

<http://curi.blogspot.com/>

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 07/28/2003 - 08:27 | reply

Who said anything about truth???

Life is a property of all plants and animals until the time of their death. Life is a period of time, from creation until death. 'Alive' means life in existence or operation, though not in the sense that computers and cars operate. This is important because, like I said earlier, killing living things is wrong, human or animal or other. This is not something new or unheard of. Thousands of years of religious morals and hundreds of years of American statute indicate that this concept isn't unusual. In case you didn't know, the majority rules in this country (in general) and statutes that reflect the majority opinion are upheld as 'right' in this country.

That's what I mean when I say alive and why it is important.

by Tom Anthony on Tue, 07/29/2003 - 19:10 | reply truth

oh, my bad about truth. next time you assert something i'll just assume you mean it's false instead.

anyway, A) how do you decide what is or is not alive?

B) if 'majority rules' is how we decide what is true, how do we decide which propositions got a majority? it can't be by taking a vote on that, because of the infinite regress issue.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://curi.blogspot.com/>

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 07/29/2003 - 19:53 | reply

Sanctity of life? Really?

The question of "life" is ridiculous. Plenty of things that we do not hesitate to kill are "alive." Bacteria are alive. Mosquitos are alive. Cockroaches are alive. Ticks and mites and tapeworms... all life. Only certain people on the fringes revere this life so vehemently that they refuse to kill these innocent creatures.

The only difference between the life of a cockroach and the life of a zygote, embryo, or early stage fetus is genetic makeup. Please argue the relevant points and not broad concepts like "life" that have no specific bearing. Everyone knows that a fetus is comprised of living cells. So what?

by grs on Wed, 07/30/2003 - 05:24 | reply

i think ur being being a bit

i think ur being being a bit one sided and selective in your description there. asshole.

by a reader on Tue, 05/17/2005 - 02:12 | reply

Further Thoughts on the Death Penalty

We recently remarked, in regard to the World War 2 spy Augustin Preucil, that "We are, as a rule, opposed to the death penalty". More specifically, although we do not oppose the death penalty on principle, we are opposed to its use in advanced countries under present conditions. An anonymous reader asked why.

It is because human beings are valuable. Destroying one requires justification. We do not mean that as a pious slogan or aspiration. Even very bad people are valuable in the literal sense that their brains contain irreplaceable knowledge from which innocent people might benefit. This might range from practical information about crimes that others might be planning, to memories of the experiences and bad decisions that made them criminals (which might interest historians and psychologists in the future), to the knowledge of how to put a smile on their own children's faces.

This value is finite, but it might be large, and paradoxically, sometimes bad people are valuable precisely because they are so bad. A couple of days ago, as Bill Whittle put it: "two of the most malignant and cruel mass murderers, rapists and torturers to ever walk the earth have departed the planet". Saddam Hussein's sons. Since they apparently chose to die rather than be arrested, the issue of the death penalty does not arise, but suppose they had been captured alive. Surely taking such prisoners would have been much like finding a stack of fat dossiers marked "WMD Concealment Plans", "Our Agents in the US", and "Secret Deals With France". Could it be right to burn such dossiers half read, just to give some bad people "what they deserve"?

Yes, sometimes it could. Sometimes the trial and judicial execution of the tyrant is a legitimate war aim. But it also seems obvious that at other times there is more to be gained by using the information in the tyrant's brain to save lives, prevent future wars and advance human knowledge. And what is true of great tyrants can be true of petty murderers too. Moreover, if we accept that sometimes it is right to keep bad people alive precisely because they have committed terrible crimes, then we have a further argument that the death penalty should be reserved not just for exceptional crimes but for exceptional situations: for can it be right to say to two murderers: "you will be spared because an evil as great as yours needs to be studied, but you will die for your crime because it was not evil enough”?

Fri, 07/25/2003 - 23:48 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Huh?

I find this post quite confusing.

I don't see any support in it for the assertion that we might want to keep someone alive indefinitely just because his crime was so evil. You have only described the value of extracting certain specialized knowledge that he might have. This is not the same thing (although there is some psychological and historical value that might correlate with this).

But, surely, this is only a reason to keep him alive temporarily. At some point, we're unlikely to get anything more useful from him than from a typical murderer.

And choosing to not execute some because we might not execute others as quickly doesn't make any sense to me. We want to treat people fairly, not equally. If one person deserves execution, then another person's treatment should be irrelevant.

I expected The World's reason to avoid executions to have something to do with our fallibility and the moral horror of executing the innocent.

by Gil on Sat, 07/26/2003 - 00:28 | reply

Reasons

Responding to Gil's comments:

I don't see any support in it for the assertion that we might want to keep someone alive indefinitely just because his crime was so evil. You have only described the value of extracting certain specialized knowledge that he might have. This is not the same thing (although there is some psychological and historical value that might correlate with this).

Well, if the psychological and historical value might correlate with the degree of evil, then it can happen that it is right to keep a criminal alive because his crime was so evil, can't it?

But, surely, this is only a reason to keep him alive temporarily.

How long is temporarily? A criminal might reveal decades years later that he had committed additional crimes (thus exonerating someone else who had been under suspicion). A researcher might want to interview all murderers in a given category, to test the theory that a certain type of childhood experience predisposes a person to murder. A historian might want to interview a tyrant decades later to test a startling new theory about the events in which the tyrant too part.

We want to treat people fairly, not equally. If one person deserves execution, then another person's treatment should be irrelevant.

No it shouldn't. If a penal system gives incentives to evil people to commit worse crimes than they otherwise would, that is an undesirable property.

I expected The World's reason to avoid executions to have something to do with our fallibility and the moral horror of executing the innocent.

Well, the title is "Further Thoughts on the Death Penalty", not "The Complete Case Against the Death Penalty".

by David Deutsch on Sat, 07/26/2003 - 17:24 | reply

Who Should Pay?

Who does The World think should pay for keeping murderers alive for the potential research value of some of them?

Do you say that this cost should be socialized and borne by the unwilling? Today, this seems to be the only option.

Or, should just those who think it's worthwhile to maintain the health and confinement of murderers bear the full cost of doing so?

If it's the latter, do you expect researchers (and their voluntary benefactors) to be willing to pay for this themselves?

And again, today we don't really have a mechanism for transferring these costs to those who want to bear them. So is The World advocating, in the current political system, stealing from the unwilling to finance the research interests of others?

by Gil on Sat, 07/26/2003 - 21:16 | reply

Reductio Ad Absurdum

Gil,

You could say the same thing about the war, couldn't you?

-- Elliot Temple

<http://curi.blogspot.com/>

by Elliot Temple on Sat, 07/26/2003 - 22:07 | reply

Public Goods

I could, but I wouldn't.

I recognize a difference between government activities that are necessary and sufficient to protect our liberty in ways that require force vs. engaging in all other imaginable activities that purport to provide public goods.

I can see an argument for requiring people to support (financially) the former activity to some extent (although I'd like to move away from this involuntary support as soon as possible) but I can't see any such moral argument for the latter.

by Gil on Sun, 07/27/2003 - 19:02 | reply

Harm-preventing versus Benefit-conferring

Gil is right on target when he separates government activity that seeks to prevent harm to the state and activity that seeks to confer a benefit on the state. In fact, our legal system also makes a distinction between the two. When determining if the government has performed a taking of property requiring compensation according to the Fifth Amendment, the courts have noted that when the government acts to prevent harm, no compensation is required, but when the government acts merely to create a benefit, compensation to the owner is required. If the same standard were applied to David's argument above, the benefit-conferring act of preserving prisoners' lives would be set apart from the harm-preventing act of the war on terror. This is why the rationale proposed for opposing the death penalty in the original post and in David's response are wrong. Were it true that there is a sufficient benefit to prolonging people's lives, it would mean that killing anyone ever would be a bad thing. And I doubt very much that the author believes that (killing in self-defense and in war come to mind).

If capital punishment is a bad thing, it's bad not because there is some benefit to society still to be gained in the prisoners (after all, it would be beneficial to society to ban smoking and alcohol altogether and few libertarians are arguing for MORE government restriction) but because of something else. David's rationale are utilitarian in their entirety. They are based only on how much good can be gained or how much harm can be prevented by preserving prisoners' lives. The utilitarian conception is completely lacking in room for human rights. The very definition of a right is something that is possessed and retained by a person even though such possession may not be good for society as a whole. I personally, and a great many other people, do believe in things like legal and human rights. One of them is the right to life. And unlike the rights to freedom and autonomy which can be curtailed in individuals who too greatly infringe other peoples rights (like criminals), the right to life is not one that is capable of being limited without killing the person. Thus, the object of the death penalty is not to prevent further infringement of a person of other people's rights, but to punish, to take revenge on a criminal. And I am not willing to support punishment or revenge as an object.

If the death penalty were the only solution for preventing the infringement of others' rights, then it would serve a purpose other than revenge. But, since life imprisonment does fulfill that objective, capital punishment infringes too much upon the rights of the criminal.

by Rob Michael on Mon, 07/28/2003 - 01:30 | reply

purposes other than revenge

Rob Michael makes some important and thought-provoking points. I'd like to address one in particular: that the death penalty is immoral if no purpose is served other than revenge, and that prevention of the infringement of the rights of others is insufficient by itself, since life imprisonment can handle that.

Good as far as it goes. But there are circumstances where life imprisonment is simply not good enough. To cite a case that's surely been brought up on this site before, consider life imprisonment for convicted terrorists.

Historically speaking, terrorists under a life sentence typically do not serve out their terms; they are traded, as part of "negotiation" or under the threat of more terror. (Right now, for example, Palestinian terrorists, with blood on their hands, are being released from Israeli prisons -- in part because the United States insisted on it, as a "good-will gesture".)

It hardly needs to be said that this gives no incentive for convicted terrorists to fear a life sentence. And released terrorists have gone on to commit more crimes, over and over again.

In other words, a strong case can be made for the execution of convicted terrorists with blood on their hands. (Yes, in some cases, intelligence benefits may be gained from them; they certainly will share no secrets once they are dead. But they will likewise share no secrets if they are released... and releasing them has its own dangers.)

I am not trying to make the case for a death penalty, for I am by no means certain I have made up my own mind on the subject. I do wish to point out other possibilities than those mentioned so far in this forum.

One other thought. It has long been my view that, by violating the rules of civilized conduct in a society, a criminal to some degree is relieved of the privileges of that society. (For example, a consistent traffic offender may have his license revoked, and have to do without a luxury his fellows take for granted. A more serious offense might be punishable by imprisonment; the criminal's right to freedom is temporarily revoked.)

A more serious punishment (one rarely used in the West anymore) would be eviction -- revocation of one's citizenship, and forcible relocation outside the nation's borders. (Perhaps one reason this is no longer used much is the question of where to send them. Once it could safely be assumed that territory outside one's own borders was lawless no-man's-land; this is no longer true, and forcing one's own malcontents on others, friend or foe, has consequences.)

The pattern is simple: by violating the rules that hold our society together, one has given up claim to enjoying the privileges of that society. Ideally, such privileges should be withheld in proportion to the crime that was committed; more serious crimes would result in fewer rights held by the criminal.

Apply this to the death penalty. Under what circumstances would a criminal have violated the rules of civilized society to such a degree that, not simply his liberty, but his life, becomes forfeit? What crimes would justify such a response? And if you believe that NO crimes warrant that response, why not?

respectfully yours,
Daniel in Medford

by a reader on Mon, 07/28/2003 - 20:19 | reply

Do we have rights?

Great post Daniel. You've touched on some issues I wanted to address, but didn't for lack of time. You wrote that it may be right to execute convicted terrorists (and maybe other so-called political prisoners). But, to be perfectly clear, support for the death penalty in that instance is contingent upon the failure of a life-sentence without possibility of parole to take a criminal out of society. Even I would support capital punishment in that specific situation.

You correctly note that rights are denied to criminals, often in proportion to their crimes. I mentioned this in my comment, "Harm-preventing versus Benefit-conferring," when I noted that denial of the right of freedom and right of autonomy are central to our justice system. Those rights can be ignored for a set amount of time or indefinitely (in a life sentence) depending on the nature of the crime. But the right of living is, in my opinion, very different from one of autonomy and freedom simply because the any neglect of that right simultaneously and permanently denies every other right possessed by a human. Society when imprisoning someone is collectively saying to the criminal, "We no longer recognize your right of autonomy because you infringe too much on the rights of others and by your captivity for so many years such infringement will be prevented and deterred in the future." The key here is that the right is still possessed by the criminal even though he has lost the recognition of that right by his community. When society executes someone, it is denying the very existence of the right of living (and concurrently every other right possessed by that person).

Human rights are not something that are contingent upon society. They are possessed by fact of our humanity, not because we belong to a particularly liberal civilization. The Founders knew that rights weren't something bestowed by a government. In fact, they were so concerned that strong government would infringe upon rights that some of them insisted on a Bill of Rights that limited government action. I cannot emphasize enough that I am human and therefore in possession of human rights. Were we to deny a person's human rights we would in actuality be denying their humanity. We would be saying to that person, "You are no better than the beasts."

by a reader on Tue, 07/29/2003 - 13:36 | reply

Good knowledge, maybe good future too

Even very bad people are valuable in the literal sense that their brains contain irreplaceable knowledge from which innocent people might benefit.

I used to think that murderers' lives should be spared because they had the potential to reform and lead good lives after their jail sentence was over (which might benefit the lives of others, but let's not go there..)

Of course, in believing this I was assigning moral worth on the basis of possible futures rather than on present status. So in that respect my understanding was no better than that of the "pro-life" gene freaks!

by Tom Robinson on Sat, 08/02/2003 - 00:10 | reply

Death Penalty, Costs, Regulations

I'm a bit out of place here, not being a libertarian, but I have a few comments.

Re Who Should Pay? Imposing death is a cheap, quick and easy way of dealing with an individual who presents a problem, so it's always a temptation, even the first resort rather than the last. There is always a political constituency for any proposal to expand the use of death as a solution. And any use of death which is legitimized tends to outgrow the limits the original enactors had in mind. The end state of progress in that direction could be horrific.

Back in the 1970s, opponents of legalized abortion predicted that it would lead to euthanasia and other more casual applications of death. Those of us, like myself, who believed in a woman's right to control her own body disputed this. But it looks like the abortion precedent has indeed emboldened other advocates of death. Some are pushing to open the door to the horror of widespread legal euthanasia, by way of so-called "physician assisted suicide". And the death penalty for criminals is reaching new heights of popularity in America.

George R. Stewart, in a famous passage of the novel Earth Abides, tells of a post-apocalyptic community which votes unanimously to put a miscreant to death. He portrays this decision as the beginning of "the state". But the difference between that isolated and vulnerable settlement and our current society, with its elaborate justice system and prisons, could hardly be greater. Apart perhaps from certain wartime situations described elsewhere on this page, it is hardly ever "necessary" for us to kill a convicted criminal.

Moreover, to give our judges and juries and governors the authority to put a person to death is, in my view, deeply corrupting to the political system.

Re Harm-preventing versus Benefit-conferring: This isn't an accurate statement of the law on this point. Ordinarily, government actions under the police power (i.e., laws or regulations to protect the public health, safety and welfare) may have economic consequences to individuals, but they are not owed any compensation. Government action to take real estate require compensation to the property owner under the 5th Amendment.

(Obviously police power actions are usually harm-preventing, and taking real estate is usually benefit-conferring, but that is not the distinction between the two concepts. For example, a regulation may promote a benefit, or eminent domain can be used to abate a hazard.)

The Pennsylvania Coal case in 1922 created the concept that a regulation may equal a taking of real estate, invoking the 5th amendment compensation requirement (or an invalidation of the regulation). Subsequent cases clarified that mere diminution in value of a property (e.g., by zoning it for residential rather than commercial use) is not a 5th Amendment "taking". Indeed, it is rare for property owners to successfully claim a regulatory taking.

Moreover, there are many other kinds of economic interests, besides ownership of interests in real estate, which may be negatively affected by a regulatory action. You could have a warehouse full of valuable widgets which a new regulation suddenly makes worthless. A traffic control order could make a street one-way and put your gas station out of business. A restaurant inspector could force you to spend hundreds of thousands of dollars buying new refrigerators. None of these have even the theoretical basis for a legal claim against the government for compensation. Nor should they.

by Larry Kestenbaum on Sat, 08/02/2003 - 06:07 | reply

Some are pushing to open the ...

Some are pushing to open the door to the horror of widespread legal euthanasia, by way of so-called "physician assisted suicide". And the death penalty for criminals is reaching new heights of popularity in America.

What bad is there in euthanasia? I for one, find it horrifying that such measures are illegal.

There are groups of people who are freezing human bodies after death, to enable their revival at a later time, when their bodies can be fixed and revived. If I were to catch a dangerous brain destroying disease now that would surely lead to my death in say a year, I would rather take my chances with cryonics now than wait my brain and self to rot for the whole year (after which there would probably be nothing left to save of me).

So the true horror is that euthanasia is illegal.

by id on Mon, 08/04/2003 - 10:32 | reply

Euthanasia, Suicide and All That

Voluntary euthanasia is the same thing as suicide with a little help. Involuntary euthanasia is the same thing as murder. These two categories of "gentle death" should be opposed just as suicide and murder are opposed. The grounds used to justify voluntary euthanasia are often capable of supporting involuntary euthanasia. For example, proponents of voluntary euthanasia say that it will save medical resources, the financial resources of the families involved and relieve suffering. These justifications also hold true for compulsory euthanasia.

There are several objections to those justifications. The first and most obvious is that the role of medicine is to preserve life, not to prevent suffering. In fact, many life-preserving medical techniques are quite painful. Were we to decide that our system should be one of pain-prevention, then there is no longer a reason to pursue uncomfortable treatments that may yet save lives -- the underlying justification for such treatments (like chemotherapy or even a simple colonoscopy) is lost.

A second objection is that in establishing the legitimacy of voluntary euthanasia, we also establish an expectation that the elderly and infirm will choose that option. After all, euthanasia will be regarded as a positively moral action that preserves the dignity of the person, prevents the suffering of age or disease, prevents the prolonged suffering of the family, and ultimately saves money and medical resources. All these justifications for euthanasia leave the elderly and infirm that do want to prolong their lives with no way of saying so that is not regarded as selfish.

Finally, by categorizing voluntary euthanasia under "medical care" we give it the illusion that a doctor can help in the decision to die. The term "physician assisted suicide" reveals how necessary the medical caregiver is to the act. Proponents of voluntary euthanasia say that it is their own decision to make, but clearly that decision cannot be made alone. It isn't hard to imagine the scenario where an elderly patient asks her doctor of many years to help her die, that she misses her husband. (The asking in itself makes the act not just her own) The doctor refuses, saying that he is a life-preserver, not a bringer of death. (Here, too, the act could not be her own, he must help) Fine, she says, I will find a doctor who will kill me. And here we see the reality of the situation. She would not die but for the actions of another person. And a new market has opened, one in which death doctors are sought out not because of their skill at preserving life or even their skill in medically preventing suffering, but because they have been given legal authority to deal death. That authority to deal death has very little, in reality, with preventing suffering and a great deal to do with providing a legal method of opting out of life.

by Rob Michael on Mon, 08/04/2003 - 17:00 | reply

suicide

"The grounds used to justify voluntary euthanasia are often capable of supporting involuntary euthanasia. For example, proponents of voluntary euthanasia say that it will save medical resources, the financial resources of the families involved and relieve suffering. These justifications also hold true for compulsory euthanasia."

To translate, some of the arguments used to justify.....etc etc.....valid example.....and this concludes to: some of the supporters of euthanasia are idiots. however, if you want to win the argument, you need to do more than counter some rival theories.

"The term "physician assisted suicide" reveals how necessary the medical caregiver is to the act. Proponents of voluntary euthanasia say that it is their own decision to make, but clearly that decision cannot be made alone."

The term "plumber assisted toilet-repair" reveals how necessary the plumber is to the act. Proponents of voluntary toilet-repair say that it is their own decision to make (as long as they can pay for it), but clearly that decision cannot be made alone.

anyway, suicide is a "victimless crime" right? what's your counter to the standard point of "If there is no victim, how can it be a crime?" (works with euthanasia too, but not compulsory euthanasia)

-- Elliot Temple

<http://curi.blogspot.com/>

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 08/04/2003 - 18:18 | reply

Suicide and Euthanasia

This is a great issue to use to test whether somebody takes individual rights seriously.

If you think that people have individual rights to their lives and to pursue their goals without the permission or approval of others, then you must acknowledge their right to make an informed decision to choose death; and that physicians assisting them are helping, not hurting, their patients (because their job is not to prolong life; but, rather, to help their patients solve their health-related problems by their own lights).

If not, then you really think that people are slaves of the state, or society, or the religious or some other tyrants.

The right to die is fundamental. If you don't have it, then your life does not belong to you; your existence is under the control of others.

Gil

by Gil on Mon, 08/04/2003 - 20:42 | reply

Body Mechanic

Gil above stated it very eloquently: it's a simple matter of self-ownership, which to me is self-evident. the objector's arguments against physician-assisted suicide is based on assumptions underpinned by nothing more than tradition at best.

as the owner of my body, what i want from a doctor is for them to be a facilitator of my will regarding the physical aspect of my life. not a moral captor holding me hostage to society and whatever it is from which i might be seeking to deliver myself, but a physical service provider: a body mechanic - and i decide when i get scrapped, not the mechanic.

i wouldn't advocate forcing anyone to assist, but it being illegal is morally indefensible. the line between vice and virtue is one which can only be drawn by the individual. to do so robs individuals of the ability to make moral decisions "by their own lights", as Gil put it. some prioritise pain minimisation over longevity and that is the individual's right, as it is to define the acceptable parameters. this right is a fact, the denial of which is simply the denial of it, not a moral pillar. indeed for the reasons given above it's the opposite.

regarding the death penalty i'm in the human-fallibility camp. i'd have no qualms if convictions were 100% accurate but the only person who can be absolutely certain whodunnit is the victim..

by susan28 on Wed, 09/12/2007 - 01:00 | reply

I am in agreement

I am in agreement with the general article and with Gil about the horror of applying the death penalty to an innocent person.

One other reason I would put forth for avoiding the use of the death penalty is that it requires someone else (not someone who is a murderer) to do the killing. It seems like there would be some increased risk that the innocent killer would come to have less regard for human life and also might be more prone to having some emotional or psychological problems.

I suppose one way to avoid this would be to have only death row inmates doing the actual killing. Perhaps by allowing one of the inmates to stay at the 'end' of the row, so to speak, so long as they were willing to perform the deed? That seems pretty twisted... nevermind.

Becky

by Becky Moon on Thu, 09/13/2007 - 17:07 | reply

Copyright © 2008 Setting The World To Rights

Piracy

We tend to think of piracy on the high seas as an archaic crime, but in fact, according to the International Maritime Bureau, it is very much still with us:

There were 234 actual and attempted attacks in the period, against 171 in the first half of 2002 and just 79 in 1992 when the centre began collating data.

Six areas accounted for two-thirds of the incidents: Indonesia, Bangladesh, Nigeria, India, the Malacca Strait and the Gulf of Aden. Some areas are so dangerous that the IMB advises vessels simply to avoid them.

Ships' masters should keep 50 or 100 miles off Somalia and avoid anchoring off the Indonesian coast in the Malacca Strait, the IMB says in a report published on Thursday.

Ships are attacked when they are berthed, at anchorage and steaming. Attacks are frequently violent. In the first six months of the year 16 seafarers were killed, 20 are missing, 116 were injured, assaulted or threatened and 193 held hostage.

One can hardly trade with the people of a country when it is inadvisable for ships to get within a hundred miles of their shores. As long as there are places in the world where the rule of law is absent, trade will not be entirely free, which is one of the reasons why it is important for the West to promote the ideals of the Open Society in other areas of the world.

Sat, 07/26/2003 - 17:49 | permlink

The Twilight of the Villepinist Libertarians

You are about to enter another dimension, a dimension of sight and sound but not of mind. A journey into an ugly land of imaginary facts and twisted argument where the normal rules of logic do not apply. Next stop, the Butler Shaffer Zone!

To illustrate just how at variance with reality Mr Shaffer's views are, we have added links to the following quotes from him. Now follow us, gentle readers, into the BS Zone:

It is interesting to observe so many Americans trying to find "meaning" in the Bush administration's war against an endless parade of "enemies." From Afghanistan to Iraq to North Korea, the state continues to concoct "threats" for the consumption of a public that is neither empirically nor analytically demanding.

The media are quick to play their assigned roles, providing state-generated "information" and self-styled "experts" to convince the rest of us that everything the White House tells us is "just so," and that anyone who dissents from – or even questions – the state's purposes or policies is likely an apologist for terrorism!

Shaffer continues in this vein for a while and then proceeds to the real (or should we say surreal?) point:

Of course, it is not in the interests of the state – or of those who profit from statism – to have the nature of political systems explored; for to do so, might cause even the institutionally-deferential students to catch on to the vicious game being played at their expense. It is not enough to understand that the state often resorts to war: war is its fundamental nature. Every political institution from the local Weed Control Authority to the United States of America – depends, for its existence, upon men and women being conditioned to submit to the force and violence exercised by government authorities. The state is nothing more than institutionalized violence that we have become conditioned to revere.

But, back in reality, Western states aren't really like that. As libertarians, we have a lot of sympathy for the idea that taxation is theft. If the government takes the view that you have to pay tax, you don't get to decline. It would be better if there were many organisations offering the services provided by governments enabling people to choose a policy that suits them. However, there is plenty of critical discussion of governments in the media and on the internet, and democracy provides a way to get rid of the government if people think somebody else might do better, which amounts to another way of criticising government policy. The same is true for trial by jury. The fact is that Western politics is overwhelmingly less violent than any other political system in human history. The World is sometimes critical of government policy but we do not fear the knock at the door. Nor is Shaffer at any risk of being bumped off or censored. To secure this peace we must be willing to fight against terrorists who would disrupt it, and the states that sponsor them. Backing away from this responsibility will not bring about peace – let alone a perfect libertarian paradise. Nor will the twilight ramblings of Mr Shaffer bring us one millimetre closer to a better society.

Mon, 07/28/2003 - 10:47 | permlink

Villepinist

Villepinist (n) - a term made up by right-wing neocon warmongers to smear valid arguments by pro-peace, true libertarians.

(credit to Jesse Walker for inspiration)

by a reader on Tue, 07/29/2003 - 20:13 | reply

if the labels fit, wear them murders (warmongering) A Reader with a gun (right-wing) and makes pastries with his blood (neocon) leaving just some smears (smeared him good!)

-- Elliot Temple

<http://curi.blogspot.com/>

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 07/29/2003 - 20:38 | reply

How is the name of a diplomatic pinup, a smear?

French Foreign Envoy a Diplomatic Pinup (AP Online)

He is everything France likes about itself: cultured, literary, eloquent and more than a little dashing. As the government's point man in efforts to slow Washington's drive for war against Iraq, Dominique de Villepin has used his charm to full effect.

At the U.N. Security Council, the French foreign minister has faced down Secretary of State Colin Powell in pressing for more U.N. weapons inspections. In a rare move, U.N. delegates broke protocol to applaud de

Villepin after his impassioned appeal last week that war should be a last resort.

by Kolya on Tue, 07/29/2003 - 22:12 | reply

Libertarian traditions

It seems to me that "The World" despite it's claims of having respect for traditions does not have a respect for libertarian traditions. One of these traditions is a skepticism that the intentions of those in power are the same as what they claim. Another of these traditions is a skepticism that even when intentions are not in question the results of a governmental action will be as intended. Traditions such as these did not start with Rothbard. They are at least 200 years old. As with all traditions the knowledge contained within them is not explicit. (Sometimes this knowledge is made explicit. E.g. : Tullock and Buchanan's examination of the democratic process)

As for Shaffer it seems that in part he is simply reiterating George Washington when he said: "Government is not reason, it is not eloquence, it is force; like a fire, a troublesome servant and a fearful master."

by a reader on Wed, 07/30/2003 - 02:25 | reply

Conjecture

Conjecture: The majority of European libertarians are pro-war.

The majority of North American libertarians are anti-war.

by a reader on Wed, 07/30/2003 - 03:20 | reply

manifest truth?

we disagree with the libertarian insistence that government leaders persistently lie about their views and motives. but i assure you we have taken that view into consideration.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://curi.blogspot.com/>

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 07/30/2003 - 03:38 | reply

Who are "We"?

Um...Elliot, you might want to reconsider your disagreement with the "insistence that government leaders persistently lie about their views and motives." I think overwhelming historical evidence is against you on this one (as well as Public Choice theory, which was referenced earlier). In fact, I think that persistently lying about one's views and motives has become a prerequisite to electability in most democracies.

Would all those who agree that government leaders DO NOT persistently lie about their views and motives please come forward and defend this remarkable claim?

And I'm not interested in a semantic game about what "persistently" means. No libertarian claims that politicians ALWAYS lie. Just that they do it often, when it suits their purposes, and these purposes are not the same as the interests of the public.

by Gil on Wed, 07/30/2003 - 17:26 | reply

apparently not you...

even people like terrorist leaders who are just asking to be KILLED for it, tell the truth about their worldviews frequently and loudly.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://curi.blogspot.com/>

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 07/30/2003 - 18:11 | reply

Conjecture = false, I think

Conjecture: The majority of European libertarians are pro-war. The majority of North American libertarians are anti-war.

British, quite possibly; European: sadly not true (at least, in my vast experience of European libertarians).

--

Sarah Fitz-Claridge

<http://www.fitz-claridge.com/>

by Sarah Fitz-Claridge on Tue, 08/05/2003 - 21:13 | reply

Villepinist is not a smear

A reader wrote:

'Villepinist (n) - a term made up by right-wing neocon warmongers to smear valid arguments by pro-peace, true libertarians.'

First of all, villepinist doesn't just apply to libertarians, it also applies to many lefties, like most of the Democratic Party, a substantial chunk of Labour in Britain and some right wing bastards like Kenneth Clarke of the British Conservative Party. None of these people are libertarian, all of them are villepinists.

Second, it isn't a smear of any kind. Villepin opposed the war on Iraq, so did villepinist libertarians. From whence does the smeariness originate?

by Alan Forrester on Wed, 08/06/2003 - 23:59 | reply

Respect for Tradition

'It seems to me that "The World" despite it's claims of having respect for traditions does not have a respect for libertarian traditions.'

I do have respect for the libertarian tradition, it contains a lot of valuable knowledge, it is also flawed and respect does not consist of mindlessly cleaving to traditions but of trying to improve them.

'One of these traditions is a skepticism that the intentions of those in power are the same as what they claim.'

Government officials often do tell the truth about their intentions. I don't doubt that Tony Blair's intentions of, say, making the NHS work are sincere, it's just that they are hopelessly flawed and utterly unworkable, he just doesn't have the knowledge available to realise that. I'll take cockup over conspiracy in the vast majority of cases.

'Another of these traditions is a skepticism that even when intentions are not in question the results of a governmental action will be as intended.'

In some cases the outcomes of some specific policies will be more or less what the government intends. The Iraq war happens to be one of them, the NHS is not. The NHS is inherently unworkable and based on fundamental misconceptions about politics, economics, human nature and so on. The Iraq war was based on a relatively clear understanding of the situation that required the removal of Saddam and how that can be accomplished.

by Alan Forrester on Thu, 08/07/2003 - 00:15 | reply

Outcomes

The very existence of Israel is an example of how very powerful governments cannot control the outcome of the actions they take.

What allied or axis power visualised a Jewish state as one of the outcomes of WWII ? The U.S. has a very powerful military, but it ultimately has no control over what happens in Iraq (unless mass genocide is an option).

by a reader on Thu, 08/07/2003 - 01:07 | reply

The Line Between Villepinism and Evil

Israeli Guy has written an interesting post about the International Solidarity Movement. The ISM is trying to demolish the wall that the Israeli government is erecting to protect Israelis from terrorism. More significantly:

The news item in Channel 1 showed a video from the scene, it showed a bunch of Palestinians marching with ISM people in front. The ISM members were shouting in English a very familiar Arab slogan:

"From the river to the sea Palestine will be free"

He goes on to translate this for the benefit of readers who are unfamiliar with the region's history. The "river" is the Jordan River which marks the eastern border of Israel and the West Bank. The "sea" is the Mediterranean Sea to the west of Israel.

"From the river to the sea, Palestine will be free" means abolish Israel and include its territory in a unitary Arab state. This is the position of non-compromise and non-coexistence that made peace between the Arabs and Israel impossible for decades because it was, for all practical purposes, a call to genocide. It is a position that even the PLO ostensibly renounced over a decade ago and is today openly advocated only by the likes of Hamas and Islamic Jihad.

And Al Qaeda. And the ISM.

So at the very least the ISM are villepinists (idiotarians), but is that too charitable a word for them? They are calling for the destruction of Israel, they are actively sabotaging Israeli security, and giving aid to murderers... Are the ISM merely villepinists or have they crossed the line that separates mere fellow-travelling from evil?

Wed, 07/30/2003 - 23:49 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Villepinism

in what dictionary did you pull the word villepinism out of?

by a reader on Mon, 10/25/2004 - 01:32 | reply

Re: villeepinism

Follow the links above.

by Editor on Mon, 10/25/2004 - 01:44 | reply

Discussion on Rantburg.com

This post and our current poll proposing the word villepinism as a replacement for idiotarianism is being discussed on Rantburg.com.

Wed, 07/30/2003 - 18:24 | permalink

Better living through neologisms

"Villepinist" is good, but "Villepinhead" is better.

by a reader on Thu, 07/31/2003 - 15:16 | reply

Vas "ist"?

I am thinking that "villepin" is to be preferred, since villepins simply share a notable attribute with the person; they are not his followers, and would themselves be no different did he not exist (c.f. "quisling", "leninist").

by a reader on Sun, 08/03/2003 - 16:15 | reply

About Korea

InstaPundit calls this “a memorable Korean fiscing”. We agree: we're going to remember it. (But watch out for the formatting which, on our browser, goes wrong near the end and fails to distinguish the fisker from the fished. Still, you're unlikely to be confused: by that point you won't need formatting clues to distinguish true from false!)

Meanwhile, rumour has it that, in regard to North Korea's weapons of mass destruction, North Korea is about to drop its demand for the US to address the problem unilaterally, and is caving in to the American plan for multilateral talks. By the way, the villepinists are tied in all sorts of knots over this issue: among other things, they'd love to side with North Korea against American unilateralism. But then, evil dictators never do follow the script that villepinists fondly imagine for them.

Thu, 07/31/2003 - 23:44 | permalink

Sullivan Inflicts Collateral Damage

We are fans of Andrew Sullivan's blog, and have been watching in admiration as, with his usual clear-sighted rationality and humanity, he has been destroying all the arguments against legalising gay marriage. But now he has drawn a most unfortunate and unfair comparison:

Now the Israeli government is intent on breaking up marriages it doesn't like. A new law would prevent Palestinians from the West Bank and Gaza Strip who marry Israeli Arabs from living with their spouses in Israel.

Now, whatever one may think of this proposed law, to characterize it in terms of an intention to break up marriages that a government "doesn't like" is a bit like saying that the US invaded Iraq because it didn't like the design of its statues: this measure has nothing to do with anyone liking one type of marriage and disliking another. It has to do with life and death. The Israeli government is considering taking the power to prevent certain people from entering Israel, not because it can't bear the thought of Israeli Arabs cavorting beneath the sheets with non-Israeli Arabs, but because it can't bear the thought of people getting a free pass into the country and blowing Jewish children to pieces.

This new law is a horrifying attack on a basic freedom - to marry the person you love;

No, it is not about attacking basic freedoms either. It is a temporary wartime measure that is distinctly less draconian than those taken by, say, Britain when it was at war. If it is passed at all, it will expire automatically after one year unless it is specifically renewed by the Knesset for a further one-year period. Contentious even today, there is zero chance that it would ever be renewed if and when the danger that it addresses no longer exists.

Nor is it about forbidden love. It is about forbidden hatred. No – not even that: for hatred remains legal. This is about forbidden murder. The fact is that the existing right of non-Israelis to gain citizenship, with its automatic right of entry and freedom of movement in Israel, by the expedient of marrying an Israeli Arab, has already been used many times as a means of murdering people. For instance, this murder of sixteen people was carried out by a Hamas man who had gained entry to Israel by marrying an Israeli Arab woman. The Israeli security services say that there have been nineteen such cases so far, involving 87 murders. To do nothing about this situation out of deference to 'Love' would be an obscenity.

and it smacks of racism of the worst sort.

It may be the wrong law. It may even be a bad law. But it is not racism, nor does it smack of racism. It would be racism to ban marriage (and indeed sex) between races, as the Nazis did – and as the Americans did, within living memory, but which Israel never has done. It would be racism to give Israeli Arab marriages an inferior legal status to Israeli Jewish marriages – but Israelis of all races have, and have always had, full legal equality. (And by the way, although same-sex marriages are not yet allowed in Israel, Israel is making progress in that direction at a time when America seems to be regressing: for instance, same-sex couples in Tel Aviv are now eligible for the same benefits as married couples, according to new Tel Aviv municipality regulations.) But even those leftist and politically-correct opponents of the proposed measure who do call it "racist" in some contrived and tenuous sense, cannot in all conscience or reason call it racism of the worst sort. We all know what racism of the worst sort is, and to use that term here is exaggeration of the worst sort: crude, spiteful, and, one could say with much greater justice, smacking of anti-Semitism. And here is some more:

Israel contends it is protecting itself from terrorists using the law to get into Israel to attack Israelis.

There are surely better ways of doing that.

Now, we don't know whether this new law would be effective at saving lives or whether there are "better ways of doing that". That depends on information and expertise which, frankly, we do not have. We're not even going to take a position, at the moment, on whether the number of lives saved would indeed be worth the inconvenience inflicted on innocent people. Perhaps they wouldn't. But the fact is that Israel's people, including Israeli Arabs, are in danger of violent death every day (despite the current "ceasefire"), from murderers who are trying desperately to enter the country by every conceivable means. And the only reason that many times the current number are not being killed and maimed is that Israel's Defence Forces have been keeping those murderers out through extraordinary skill and heroism, and, yes, by extraordinary measures that also impinge on the lives of innocent people.

Whenever you see an argument of the form "Israel contends that it is doing so-and-so in self-defence, but that is not its real motive", think carefully. For as Fiamma Nirenstein said recently in a superb reflection on contemporary anti-Semitism, the onus should be on anyone who makes such an argument to substantiate it: "you cannot use false stereotypes. You must demonstrate what you assert: that the army ruthlessly storms poor Arab villages that have nothing to do with terrorism; that it shoots children on purpose; that it kills journalists with pleasure". Andrew Sullivan's allegation that Israel's purported reason for these new immigration restrictions is a lie and that its real reason is racism, is just as unsubstantiated and just as false as those.

Morally, we have now passed the low point of Sullivan's piece. Logically, he saves the worst for last:

One of the more brilliant insights of Orwell's "Nineteen Eighty-Four" is that one sign of freedom is the ability to construct human relationships without the state intervening. With this new law, Israel's presence in the West Bank corrupts its own democracy one little bit more.

Israel's democracy is not corrupt, nor is this law part of Israel's policy in the West Bank. This is an internal Israeli measure, concerning the interaction between immigration law and counter-terrorism. It may be an effective measure or an ineffective one. It may, for various reasons, be unwise or perhaps wrong. But it is not a corrupt policy or an undemocratic one, any more than it is racist. Criticising it in such terms is just a mistake.

In the matter of gay marriages, Andrew Sullivan is currently engaged in a titanic battle against institutions – the Catholic Church, and political institutions of the right such as the Republican party – with which he fundamentally identifies. The fact that he is absolutely right and they absolutely wrong (as well as terrifyingly irrational) in that matter cannot make this experience any less lonely or any less bruising for him. We guess that as a tiny side-effect of it, he has lost concentration for a moment and let off a broadside against an innocent bystander who, in the heat and confusion of battle, seemed to resemble his enemy. A bystander which just happens to be Israel. And yet we shall not do him the discourtesy of making allowances. He deserves better.

Fri, 08/01/2003 - 19:50 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

only in Israel...

Perhaps I'm misinterpreting the law here... but my understanding was that the new law, if enacted, would NOT forbid marriages between Israeli Arabs and Palestinians. All that would happen is that such Palestinians would not automatically get Israeli citizenship, as they had in the past. (Nor are they categorically denied Israeli citizenship; the Israeli Interior Minister would decide each one on a case-by-case basis.)

In any event, there's certainly nothing (except financial issues, maybe) to stop an Israeli Arab and a Palestinian from marrying elsewhere.

Israel has, to the best of my knowledge, an amazingly broad standard for accepting prospective new citizens. If we include its unique Law Of Return, which grants automatic Israeli citizenship to anyone with at least one Jewish grandparent, I'd argue that Israel is more accepting of new citizens than most countries, if not all, worldwide.

To accuse Israel of racism, because such amazingly liberal policies have been tightened up a bit (under strictly temporary emergency conditions), is disingenuous.

And yes, this pains me too, for I've also become a voracious reader of Andrew Sullivan's writing.

Daniel in Medford

by a reader on Fri, 08/01/2003 - 23:35 | reply

bravo

very nice piece

-- Elliot Temple

<http://curi.blogspot.com/>

by Elliot Temple on Sat, 08/02/2003 - 00:33 | reply

Right on

Brilliant. I hope you sent it to Sullivan, and I hope he has the decency to respond. If not, I'll lose a lot of respect for him.

by a reader on Wed, 08/06/2003 - 20:32 | reply

We Did Send It To Sullivan

Brilliant. I hope you sent it to Sullivan, and I hope he has the decency to respond.

Thank you. Yes, we did send it to Andrew Sullivan, but instead of replying, he simply upped and went on holiday! Can you imagine? It's almost as though he thought there were things more important than blogging or even politics itself! Doesn't he know there's a war on?

by Editor on Thu, 08/07/2003 - 00:57 | reply

oh dear

man, i didn't know sullivan was so openly ~~gay~~ religious. sigh

-- Elliot Temple

<http://curi.blogspot.com/>

by Elliot Temple on Thu, 08/07/2003 - 01:10 | reply

Cool Down, Folks

JunkScience.com tries to cool down the global-warming debate by explaining why global warming is not a weapon of mass destruction. A prominent British scientist recently claimed that it was, citing as evidence the 1500 Indians who died in a 120° pre-monsoon heat wave and comparing them with the victims of 9/11. JunkScience concludes:

As to India's killer heat wave, it sounds like the Indians need more economic development so that they can afford better living conditions and better medical care.

In contrast to India, temperatures hit 127 degrees in Palm Springs, Calif., this year with no reported heat-related deaths. You figure out what the difference is.

If there is a "weapon of mass destruction" associated with global warming, it's the global warmers themselves. Their preferred policy of energy regulation and restriction would reduce economic progress and development, especially in the third world.

Since "wealth is health," it's easy to see who and what the real threat is.

Yes indeed. Meanwhile Samizdata quotes the newsletter of the 1st Battalion The Queen's Lancashire Regiment to tell us just how hot it is in Basra. Ironic, isn't it, that these admirable and competent professionals, who helped save the world from a real WMD threat, have to suffer in the heat while eminent professors sip lemonade in cool offices in England exploiting the issue to promote their favourite fad.

Sun, 08/03/2003 - 13:12 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Euro Gerrymandering

The Labour Party's apparent desperation to foist the Euro on Britain has plumbed new depths: they are contemplating extending the franchise for the Euro Referendum to EU nationals resident in the UK:

There are more than 725,000 people from elsewhere in the EU living in the UK, with the number set to increase dramatically once the union is enlarged from 15 to 25 member states next year...

A Whitehall insider said: "They're allowed to vote in local elections. You might say Europeans do have a vested interest in voting in the European elections. The same could be said to apply for a euro referendum."

This is a transparent ploy to boost numbers in favour of the Euro. It may yet backfire, for not all EU citizens yearn for a Super-State, and those who choose to reside in Britain may well include more than the average proportion of Anglophiles. But in any case, this proposal is indefensible. There is only one place in the world that has the Pound as a currency and that is Britain, and if Britain adopts the Euro it will be extremely difficult to reverse that decision. Hence a "yes" vote and a "no" vote are not symmetrical, so any attempt to bias the vote in favour of "yes" is not only reprehensible, but endangers the very purpose of the referendum, which is surely to provide legitimacy for this momentous constitutional change. What legitimacy would it have, if the Euro replaces the Pound on the basis that British citizens were outvoted on the issue by large numbers of visitors from the EU? Even those who do not accept the devastating economic and political arguments against the Euro must surely agree that this is vote is too important to be fiddled or rigged in any way.

Tue, 08/05/2003 - 21:01 | permalink

A frivolous point, but..

Both Cyprus and Lebanon have (different) Pounds for their currency.

by a reader on Wed, 08/06/2003 - 11:46 | reply

not frivolous point

"Even those who do not accept the devastating economic and political arguments against the Euro must surely agree that this is vote is too important to [be -- typo guys...] fiddled or rigged in any way."

I don't agree the importance of the vote is why it shouldn't be rigged. Or that it's right to rig less important votes.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://curi.blogspot.com/>

[Editor's note: Typo corrected. Thank you.]

by Elliot Temple on Thu, 08/07/2003 - 01:06 | reply

Idiotarian No Longer

Two of the participants in this discussion on Rantburg suggest that there is room for both terms 'idiotarian' and 'villepinist', because they have slightly different shades of meaning. Even though they do not seem to agree on what the distinction is, they may have a point. Maybe a distinction will evolve.

Anyway, these Confessions of an Anti-Sanctions Activist (via Elegance Against Ignorance) are a must-read for anyone who is interested in the nature of the phenomenon, under any name.

Thu, 08/07/2003 - 03:05 | permalink

Khomeini in Exile

An Iranian religious dissident who enjoys a special status and influence in Iranian society flees from his home in the holy city of Qom and goes into exile, describing the Iranian regime as “the world's worst dictatorship”. As sinister agents of the regime search for him abroad, fearing that he may become a focus of religious resistance to their rule, he expresses the hope that Iran's escalating protest movement, “would in not too long develop into a popular revolution”. The dissident's name? Khomeini.

Anyone who can remember the political scene in 1978, or knows its history, will find the above eerily familiar. Is it a description of the key events preceding the Iranian revolution? No. This is today, and this is a different Khomeini. Not Ayatollah Ruholla Khomeini the founder of the Islamic Republic, but his grandson, Hussein Khomeini.

So, as the undercover death squads of the Revolutionary Guard scour Najaf for Khomeini, and the student protests on the streets in Iran are brutally suppressed, why isn't he (and why aren't they?) getting the intense press coverage and publicity for his cause that his grandfather enjoyed? Why is he not a trendy icon already? Why are there no mountains of multi-cultural excuses being made for him? Where is the relentless demonisation of the government whose overthrow he seeks? And perhaps not least, why is he not being harboured by France?

Simple. What's different this time is that this devoutly Islamic Khomeini is not a murderous throwback to the fourteenth century. This Khomeini is not an utterly implacable enemy of the West. This Khomeini, who apparently sensed that something might be amiss when his favourite uncle was murdered after refusing to endorse the regime, has called for the separation of religion and state, and for “a democratic regime that does not make use of religion as a means of oppressing the people and strangling society”. But all those sins, though they disqualify him from automatic adulation by the trendies, lefties, journalists and villepinists, are not enough to get him ignored as completely as he has been. This, we bet, is what really puts him beyond the pale:

“Freedom is more important than bread. If the Americans will provide it, let them come ...”

You are absolutely right !

As an Iranian student living in Iran now (that's why i don't put my name here) I wanted to thank you for this post. Here for the first time I see the correct view of all the tragedy that has been going on in Iran, expressed in a western blog.

The way Khomeini (senior) was endorsed and made to a prophet like figure by western media, especially the lefties, the French government and the Democrats in the US, not to mention the BBC Farsi Radio that acted as his mouthpiece during the months before the revolution, and comparing it with all the crimes he and his followers committed after coming to power, all the executions, mass graves, murders and torture chambers you haven't even heard of going on to this very day, and its consequences for the region and the world, presents a truly horrifying picture.

It is a fact that Islamic fundamentalism couldn't have grown in to such a monster if it wasn't for the success of that dark revolution 25 years ago-this is one of the responsibilities Iranian people must accept and help amend in the future , after the liberation of Iran. (By the way, I propose giving Mr. Carter another Nobel prize for his accomplishments as well!)

The fact that Khomeini's grandson is not getting much attention is worsened by the kind of attention the so-called reformist(!) president Khatami is getting from the west.

As one who unfortunately voted for him in 1997 under the illusion that he was a new Gorbachev, I can say with utmost certainty that he is nothing but a political prostitute of this regime, breaking more and more business deals with the west and giving the mullas a false respectable face they do not have (and the EU an excuse for their plunderings of Iranian wealth)

Many Iranian youth are in prisons facing torture at this moment for shouting death to Khamenei and asking Khatami to resign more than a month ago, and yet still in many western media the demonstration are presented as pro-reform. What can one say to this?

Actually we in Iran might be the only people who understand Israelis frustrations with this attention paid to Arafat, because we have one here ourselves.

By the way, after reading your excellent history of Israel and as a very pro-Israeli Iranian (though I am officially a Moslem!) there is a question that bothers me and I wish to ask you:

I have read a lot of reports, including in the Iranian resistance groups publications abroad, about Israel's alleged 4 billion dollars arms deal with the Iranian regime.

Is that true? What was really going on?

This is very disturbing news for me.

Thanks again for this excellent post.

An Iranian Student

by a reader on Mon, 08/11/2003 - 09:57 | reply

Wow

If the previous post is legitimate, then it's very heartening that there are Iranian students with internet access and such a great political perspective.

Even if it isn't, those who are battling the current regime are very brave and I wish them the best. It's a shame that the vast majority of people in Iran don't join them and topple the government. There are a lot of American forces nearby that I suspect would be mobilized to help if it appeared that a vast, popular, uprising in Iran was being brutally repressed.

Gil

by Gil on Mon, 08/11/2003 - 18:33 | reply

It is a legitimate post!

As far as I can tell, I am legitimately real! :)

But I have to explain a few things perhaps, about the situation inside Iran:

My position towards Israel constitutes, unfortunately, a small minority (as far as I can tell).

American ideals however have a much wider appeal, especially for my generation. But still many of the philosophical foundations of democratic thinking is widely missing.

There exist also a lot of paranoia, mostly among our parents, like elsewhere in the middle east. (It is especially directed towards Britain for some historical reasons and it's quite funny sometimes!)

However what is heartening about Iran is the fact that for the first time, the vast majority of people have really understood what a religious system means and are looking for something new.

They know what they don't want, but not still what they want.

So there is a great potential here, whether it can lead to something concrete is the big challenge, and here the West can help a lot if it wanted to.

The case of Israel is a good example.

Unlike Arabs, Iranians have nothing personal against Israel, and actually Palestinians are even more disliked, especially after the revolution.

The real reason for anathema is simply ignorance. Most people still think that since the land was named Palestine and the Arabs in it are called Palestinians, they were the true owners and Israelis are outsiders. They simply don't know much about the real history.

On the other hand, there has always been vicious conflict between Iran and the Arabic world. Arabic countries call the Persian Gulf, Arabic Gulf- they call Iranians 'Ajam' which means something like goat (for the way they pronounced Arabic words) - Iranians also have very bitter memories of Arabs, they conquered Iran, killed, burnt and took Iranians as slaves and treated Iranians as second class citizens, together with Jews and Christians...

That is also why Iranians actually invented Shiitism (though I wished they hadn't), actually to separate themselves from the rest of the Arabic world. (Many Sunni fundamentalists consider Shiites as heretics)

There are also historical ties with Israel , dating back to the time of Cyrus, and the more Iranians are turning towards their historical heritage and moving away from Islamic identity, the more such historical ties could gain importance.

Before Israel , Iran was the only land in the middle east that kept its ancient identity and refused to become Arabic. Now there are two such countries! :)

Saddam once expressed the situation very clearly: "Two people shouldn't have been born, the Ajams and the Zionists".

So here is natural potential for future allegiance. What would come of it depends on us all.

We in Iran also have seen the result of idealistic left and vellepinist intellectualism and policies: the 1979 revolution.

We see how demonstration after demonstration is held in Europe in support of Palestinians , but no one even bothers about all that is happening in Iran. We see human shields going to Iraq to prevent American Crimes but this regime inside Iran is portrayed as moving towards democracy, even though it stones women, takes out eye bulbs and cuts hand and feet to this day. We see how Bush is portrayed as a villain but Khatami is given a PhD by a Belgian University...And that makes many of us here to think and to rethink popular and fashionable political trends, and some of us understand something. :)

That's why you see people here light candles after 9/11. That's why I hear people in taxis support American invasion of Iraq....

As for a popular uprising, there are a lot of difficulties. Iran is a country with more than 16 centuries of religious tyranny. There are simply not much culture of cooperation left after all these years. People learn that if they don't care for themselves no one will. A lot of damage has been done to this culture during centuries, the fact that it still exists at all is really quite remarkable.

The regime is also very brutal. Yet you see demonstrations every once in a while-it shows the degree of desperation- but it is unfortunately not very organized.

This is Iran now: a mainly muslim land whose majority are ,for the first time, looking for something new, for something that makes more sense, who are not satisfied with what they have been told, who want change...but they are just at the beginning of this road.

An Iranian Student

by a reader on Tue, 08/12/2003 - 08:13 | reply

Wow

It saddens my heart to read how things are going in Iran. I personally never truly understood how bad things are there, and I suspect that I still don't. It has been very good to hear about how things are going in there - one cannot here much about Iran in the main media, and what one hears is usually so faulty that it isn't worth listening to.

Have you considered blogging more about how things are going in Iran? I'm sure there are lots of people who would want to know how things are there, and how they might be able to help. I'm sure there are ways we can help you make Iran a better place, I just don't quite know how.

by id on Tue, 08/12/2003 - 11:27 | reply

Iranian Blogs

Id,

Jeff Jarvis has been doing a good job of publicizing the situation in Iran and referencing Iranian weblogs and other sources. Check out some of the Middle East links on his sidebar, and some of those will lead you to even more.

Iranian blogging exists, and it's a great thing.

Gil

by Gil on Tue, 08/12/2003 - 16:36 | reply

Reply to 'An Iranian Student'

"Israel's alleged 4 billion dollars arms deal with the Iranian regime."

In the early years of the regime, Israel did try to build bridges to it by selling weapons, rather as the US did (with Israel's help) in the Iran-Contra affair. Remember that at that time even many of those in the West who most despised and feared the Iranian regime did not want it to be overthrown by Saddam. However, any talk of an arms deal under present-day circumstances, and such a massive one at that, can only be a crazy conspiracy theory. It's not one we've heard of though. Can you provide a hyperlink?

by Editor on Wed, 08/13/2003 - 22:45 | reply

Iranian anti-semitism

I have to say I don't agree with "Iranian Student" about the potential of Iran-Israel cultural future alligence. Besides the Islamic anti-semitism, which has much diminished after 25 years of theocracy, there are the usual conspiracy theories of how the zioninst control the world, lead american policies and the like.

There abounds also the view of jews as moineylenders and materialists full of greed.

Besides all of this, Iran has its own brand of anti-semitism, even before the revolution, which is now increasing as its islamic counterpart is losing ground. According to it, both Chrsitianity and Islam, being semitic religions, are offsprings of Judaism from whome they inherit their violance and inhumanity. Then this is usually contrasted with the iranian (sometimes even called the 'aryan') religions and mentalities such as Zoroastrianism and Mithraism which are portrayed as very moral, non violent and humanistic.

I appreciate the goodwill in his comments above, but it is more wishfull thinking than an analysis of the facts.

by a reader on Thu, 08/14/2003 - 07:49 | reply

some links

I also meant during the Iran-Iraq war.

Here is a good article about the economical side of Mulla mafia:
http://www.forbes.com/free_forbes/2003/0721/056.html

Here are some other links about Iran's struggles for freedom:

<http://www.krsi.net/us-en/> read especially this article:
<http://krsi.net/news/detail.asp?NewsID=316>

<http://www.daneshjoo.org>
<http://www.mehr.org>

AIS

by a reader on Fri, 08/15/2003 - 10:12 | reply

Re: Iranian anti-semitism

I have come across that brand of anti-semitism, but it is not yet prevalent among ordinary poeple. However after the experience of the 20th century, I agree that ignoring or taking lightley anything of this sort no matter how stupid or small and unimportant it might seem at the time could be dangerous.

AIS

by a reader on Fri, 08/15/2003 - 10:37 | reply

World Class Hypocrisy

Sha!'s permalinks don't work, so we'll reproduce the item below. But before you read it, try guessing: what reason has the Arab League just given for not recognising the current provisional government of Iraq? Is it because...

- Iraq is a predominantly Arab country?
- Iraq is a predominantly Muslim country?
- Iraq is a member of the UN?
- It's quite hot in Iraq right now?
- ...

It couldn't be any of those, could it? And it's not even:

- Iraq was liberated by the United States.

Well...

In a completely unsurprising move, The Arab League yesterday decided that it would not recognize Iraq's recently appointed Governing Council. In his statements explaining why, Amr Moussa, Egypt's Foreign Minister and the current Secretary-General of the Arab League, said that although the Council is a good start, it isn't elected and thus lacks a certain amount of credibility.

Er, what? Could you say that again Mr Moussa? We're not sure whether to believe you.

In his column today, Tom Friedman points out the pot-calling-the-kettle-black aspect of this statement:

I love that quote. I love it, first of all, for its bold, gutsy, shameless, world-class hypocrisy. Mr. Moussa presides over an Arab League in which not one of the 22 member states has a leader elected in a free and fair election. On top of it, before the war, Mr. Moussa did all he could to shield Saddam Hussein from attack, although Saddam had never held a real election in his life. Yet, there was Mr. Moussa questioning the new U.S.-appointed Iraqi Council, which, even in its infant form, is already the most representative government

Iraq has ever had.

Friedman uses this as a jumping-off point to demonstrate, once again, that the Arab world is shitting itself at the possibility of democracy actually coming to the neighborhood. Although why anyone should be so concerned about statements from the Arab League is anybody's guess. Moussa heads a pathetic, toothless organization. In more than 50-years of activity, the League has done absolutely nothing, other than to serve as a debating society wherein Arab tyrants condemn Israel and condemn other Arabs for not condemning Israel strongly enough.

If a new wave of democracy also succeeds in doing away with the Arab League, it will only be icing on the cake.

True. But why do away with it? Regime-change it! Turn it away from the Dark Side. Last one to become democratic doesn't get recognised. This shall be called the Moussa Doctrine in honour of its originator.

Sat, 08/09/2003 - 22:19 | permalink

Limbaugh v Arnie - We Tentatively Endorse Arnie

Knowing little about California politics and less about Arnold Schwarzenegger's politics, we were going to pass on this momentous issue of the day – until Rush Limbaugh told us just enough:

Here [sic] me now and believe me later, my friends: all these conservative orgasms over Arnold Schwarzenegger are - like the "Gorbasm" liberals experienced over Mikhail Sergeevich Gorbachev - fake. I know that (R) next to Schwarzenegger's name excites the White House, but his own words prove he's not a conservative.

Hmm. Well, not a Limbaugh conservative ... that may not be a fatal flaw. We're not conservatives either. Let's hear more.

[...]

He said that he wanted businesses to come back to California so that the state government could collect enough tax revenues to provide social programs. This is the sort of obtuse comment middle-of-the-road Democrats always make, forgetting that businesses are leaving the state because they are tired of paying high taxes for those big government social programs."

Yeah, well politicians talk like that. What are you going to do? For what it's worth, he put it better when talking to Fox News:

"[We have to] bring businesses back to California. We have the most unfriendly business environment right now in California of any state. Businesses are leaving every day. They're expanding outside of the state. That means that people are getting laid off. Jobs are lost."

And if he believes in balanced budgets and is an admirer of Milton Friedman...

Anyway, back to Rush:

[...] "He has told the press he is 'very liberal' about social programs

Again, does that mean increased programmes entrenching poverty?

Or:

supports abortion

Hurray!

and homosexual adoption,

Cool.

and advocates 'sensible gun controls.'

Well, we're not going to shoot a guy for that, are we?

His entree into politics last year was a proposition Democrats endorsed because it raised state spending for what amounted to state babysitting - before-school and after-school programs that cost the state up to $455 million a year.

"Up to" $455 million? That means "less than", right? Well, taxation is far too high already, that's for sure. But ... well, in some countries, $455 million is a lot of money. In California it's the cost of the extra air conditioning needed for right-wingers to cool down after hearing about it. Peanuts. Let's move on.

He has complained openly about the party's conservatism....

Good.

Talk magazine described him as 'impatient' with the religious right....

Wahoo!

[H]e expressed disgust with the Republicans who impeached Clinton. 'That was another thing I will never forgive the Republican Party for,' he said. 'We spent one year wasting time because there was a human failure. I was ashamed to call myself a Republican during that period.'^

Yes, yes! So were we! (No wait, we're not Republicans in the first place, but you know what we mean.)

(No, those weren't Gorbasmis. We just got a little carried away.)

OK Rush, you convinced us. Californians: if this is the worst that can be said by way of trashing Arnie, you're not going to find a better Governor anywhere.

Tue, 08/12/2003 - 13:10 | permalink

Arnie

For abortion? boo. For homosexual adoption? boo. Arnie is a liberal claiming to be a Republican. A fake.

by a reader on Tue, 08/12/2003 - 18:17 | reply

Gay adoption

A reader wrote:

'For homosexual adoption? boo.'

Quite right! Those evil fags, they take our jobs, they take our children, they take our women, oh, wait, nah, strike that last bit, they don't take our women, that's the problem, us heteros are getting all henpecked, it's evil I tells ya, evil!!!

But seriously, what's wrong with gay adoption?

by Alan Forrester on Wed, 08/13/2003 - 00:20 | reply

What a weird entry. The Wo...

What a weird entry.

The World says "Hurray!" to the fact that AS "supports abortion", indicating that supporting abortion is prominent or at least significant on The World's list of priorities for the next governor of the state of California. The reason why that's weird is that, given Roe v. Wade, in the US as things stand there's not a damn thing the governor of the state of California (or any other state for that matter) can do about abortion, so why the heck does The World care? (By the way, yes: I also think it's weird that social-conservatives care about this position in gubernatorial candidates, as well.)

But overall it's also a weird entry because of the simple fact that it's not at all clear why The World would care who becomes governor of California or poo-poo the "Peanuts" which California's taxpayers are shelling out for this or that social program which, as far as I can tell, The World knows absolutely nothing about.

I mean, unless I'm wrong in assuming that The World does not live in California.

by a reader on Wed, 08/13/2003 - 00:43 | reply

why care?

we care if he is for or against abortion because it tells us about his views, esp on morality and superstition.

the point of the peanuts comment was simply that any mistake Arnold made on that issue wasn't all that damning.

The World also does have readers who live in California, btw. and even for those who don't live there, it's still interesting. i mean, I don't live in Israeli, but I didn't object to the history of the region.

nor do i object to posts about the political situation in Iran.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://curi.blogspot.com/>

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 08/13/2003 - 02:09 | reply

Well, it IS the WORLD, neh?

The place may be in disrepair, but California is still a part of it, is it not? I mean, why discuss Iraq, or Israel? The World is hardly based out of the Middle East, is it? Very odd happenings are in the works in CA, with the recall, and it's an interesting topic.

Why so weird?

-Dan Frank

by a reader on Wed, 08/13/2003 - 02:10 | reply

Hmmm...maybe The World is ...

Hmmm...maybe The World is glad to see that the current front-runner to replace Davis is quite sensible, not another of the bible-thumping wastes of scarce protoplasm that have well-established parasitic relationships w/ the RP in most of the U.S. Someone who is "economically conservative & socially moderate"- in other words, inclined to allow individual choices in social/cultural matters as long as those involved are consenting and responsible (adults only, but hey, you gotta start somewhere), and to leave market players free to discover/create/exploit/trade valuable subjective-preferences data to the long-term benefit of all(more widely known as "conducting business for profit") without too much interference.

Someone who will oversee the 4th largest economy on Earth, who will probably not join(at least not too actively) the appalling crusade to deny us all access to proper regenerative medicine. Who does not believe that being elected means that the whole electorate shares his religious/moral/cultural beliefs. Sounds perfectly reasonable for The World to take an interest...because, longer term, a "moderate trend" could help loosen the Religious Right's parasitic grip on the RP, and help take the advocacy of truly progressive positions (such as being pro-choice, pro-families of affinity, pro-stem-cell/therapeutic cloning research, pro-sex-without-hangups-and-guilt, pro-autonomy, pro-child, etc.) out of the hands of some of the nuttiest idiotarians in existence, and help place such positions within a more consistent market-oriented framework that will allow individuals to maximize their fulfillment in every conceivable direction, with a minimum of undesired impact on others.

Oh, by the way, you can be a Republican & liberal, or a Democrat & conservative.

Brian

by bk_2112 on Wed, 08/13/2003 - 02:38 | reply

[curi/Elliot] we care if he i...

[curi/Elliot] we care if he is for or against abortion because it tells us about his views, esp on morality and superstition.

In other words, Support For Abortion is sort of a semi-religious piety test on which you (and The World?) find the Correct answer to be essential in all political candidates whether or not "abortion" as such has relevance to the post in question. I understand.

[curi/Elliot] the point of the peanuts comment was simply that any mistake Arnold made on that issue wasn't all that damning.

Right - from The World's perch outside of California, the public outlays Arnold caused us inside of California to pay by that Proposition looks like "Peanuts" to The World. Yes, that I understood. It's just that I don't appreciate this kind of comment. (easy for The World to say, and all, not helping to pick up the tab..)

P.S. I'm not saying I'm against Arnie's candidacy. Just that these are silly reasons for supporting it let alone caring about the whole thing. Sure I take an interest in Israeli elections, but my opinion is guided by factors of more import than which candidate worships the correct Go.... er, "supports abortion".

by a reader on Wed, 08/13/2003 - 18:11 | reply

Straw Man

"A Reader", in his/her enthusiasm to get righteously angry, purposely misconstrued what Elliot said.

Posts that respond to imaginary straw men tend not to be particularly illuminating. And no, being indignant doesn't raise your intellectual stature.

by Daniel Strimpel on Thu, 08/14/2003 - 16:26 | reply

455 million dollars might be ...

455 million dollars might be peanut for a surplus economy but it could break your neck when you could not find money to pay for all your spending. My advice to you is try to spend MUCH MUCH more than you earn and when billing statement comes, see how $100 more spending which I assume that is peanut to your income, can break your kneecap. Make sense?

Words can fool men but nature doesn't give a damn!

by Lan Nguyen on Thu, 08/14/2003 - 18:02 | reply

Copyright © 2005 Setting The World To Rights

Conspiracy Theories – 1: The Basics

According to a recent poll in the German newspaper Die Zeit, one in five Germans believes that the U.S. government may have sponsored the 9-11 attacks. Among those under 30, the proportion is one in three. Conspiracy theories as insane as that one, or worse, currently corrupt the political thinking of the great majority of people in the world, including a substantial and influential minority in the West.

A conspiracy theory is

- an explanation of observed events in current affairs and history ... which
- alleges that those events were planned and caused in secret by powerful (or allegedly powerful) conspirators, who thereby...
- benefit at the expense of others, and who therefore...
- lie, and suppress evidence, about their secret actions, and...
- lie about the motives for their public actions.

Conspiracy theories are widely regarded as characteristic of irrational modes of thinking. The very term 'conspiracy theory' is usually reserved for irrational explanations meeting the above criteria. For conspiracies do happen. Criminal conspiracies are proved every day in courts. Political conspiracies are discovered from time to time. If we can rationally explain a bank robbery as being the consequence of a conspiracy, why not a war? Or the world economic system? What distinguishes a conspiracy theory (irrational, by definition) from a sane opinion that a particular group of people worked in secret to bring about certain observed events for their own immoral purposes?

Here, the irrefutability of conspiracy theories is usually cited: to a conspiracy theorist, everything that happens, or could possibly happen, constitutes evidence for the conspiracy. If the alleged conspirators seem to benefit, then that is evidence against them. If they do not, then that is just evidence that the media and/or other conspirators are concealing the facts, or that something much more valuable is secretly at stake.

But there is more to it than irrefutability. There is more to it even than the tendency to invent (rather than merely reinterpret) evidence to conform to the conspiracy theory. For it is no coincidence that every (irrational) conspiracy theory is in fact false. Underlying their invalid arguments and mishandling of evidence in judging explanations, there is a pathological mistake in the conspiracy theorists' conception of what constitutes an explanation in the first place.

Part 2

Wed, 08/13/2003 - 21:49 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Low-rent creationism

Conspiracism is to political science and economics as creationism is to evolutionary biology: an intellectually indolent quest for a nice pat answer without having to learn how things actually happen, usually in broad daylight.

by Alan Furman on Thu, 08/14/2003 - 06:01 | reply

You neocons are posting this ...

You neocons are posting this to hide your conspiracy.

by a reader on Thu, 08/14/2003 - 11:29 | reply

who do you work for, a reader...

who do you work for, a reader? WHO DO YOU WORK FOR?

by a reader on Thu, 08/14/2003 - 16:10 | reply

They are not dumb, they are just driven by their motives

In absent of an absolute truth, we judge and reason by weighting evidences on a relative scale. Intellectual honest people are VERY aware of their premises' short coming hence more likely they will not fall into the conspiracy camp easily. On the other hand, conspiracy theorists are driven by their motives so they do not bother to utilize the critical thinking tools that they have learned and used well in their day-to-day professional career or they would be un-employed for the rest of their life. The tools have been there in their world 3 library, they just block it with their motives when falling in love with the conspiracy theorem.

Words can fool men but nature doesn't give a damn!

by Lan Nguyen on Fri, 08/15/2003 - 18:22 | reply

Is that counting for Bush also?

Bush also told the world his Conspiracy theorie. and started WAR with it. Well the FBI hasnt updated theyr website yet, how come?

There are many false Conspirancys in the WWW, but on TV there is only 1 false Conspiracy Theorie, but its ok cause its the goverment that telling that theorie.

<http://www.fbi.gov/mostwant/terrorists/terubl.htm>

CAUTION

Usama Bin Laden is wanted in connection with the August 7, 1998, bombings of the United States Embassies in Dar es Salaam, Tanzania, and Nairobi, Kenya. These attacks killed over 200 people. In addition, Bin Laden is a suspect in other terrorist attacks throughout the world.

by a reader on Fri, 08/22/2003 - 17:28 | reply

A theory is only a theory because it hasn't been proven

Had someone suggested in 1972 that the president of the United States personally knew about and authorized secret agents to literally break into his political opponents hotel room in order to find information to be used against him in the coming campaign, most ordinary people would have called them a "conspiracy theorist". But they would have been right. Had some one suggested that the US government sent CIA officials to assassinate the democratically elected rulers of socialist South American countries, or that the administration was making arms trade deals with Iran to fund insurgents in a democratic society, they would be labeled a "conspiracy theorist". But these things happened. There is this stigma attached to the word "conspiracy" as though it belief in one automatically makes them insane or at least without credibility. But the fact remains that conspiracies exist. A conspiracy is just a group of people getting together to discuss the details of a crime. The rich and powerful commit crime just as often as anyone else. And often times they work together. Watergate, the Iran-Contra affair, and CIA support of military coups against the democratically elected governments in Chile, Guatemala, and Nicaragua, including the murder of their leaders, as well as the many unsuccessful attempts to do the same in Cuba, were all conspiracies. The only reason some ideas are conspiracy "theories" is because insufficient evidence exists to prove them. Which you would expect, if the conspirators had covered their tracks well.

We know these things happened, and yet, being so long ago (20 years?) we conclude they are no longer relevant, and choose to continue to believe that something like that could never happen.

What is important is not proving whether or not the official version of 9/11 - physically - is accurate. To say that one should never question the purity of the American government is to insure that if they ever tried to do something like that, they would succeed. Indeed, if they were in anyway involved, the best way to prevent any real investigation, to prevent being questioned, is to accuse anyone who doubts them of being unpatriotic. This is exactly what Pop Mekanics and McCain have said (and I used to really like him). This is what millions of American citizens think to themselves. This is what is written as if it went without saying in the original article here.

"Conspiracy theories as insane as that one, or worse, currently corrupt the political thinking of the great majority of people in the world"

Insane, as though it were not only false, but as if it were unthinkable.

Perhaps physically everything happened on 9/11 as the official version says. That doesn't mean the CIA couldn't have trained the hijackers, or provided funding, or even just suggested the idea in the first place.

I'm not saying those things happened. But to call belief in that possibility "insane" is dangerously close minded.

It is acknowledged that conspiracies actually happen, in politics as in organized crime. Considering that we must look at every possibility in as much detail as we can and not discount certain things as "conspiracy theories" just because we really really don't want to believe them.

by Jay Aziza on Wed, 12/20/2006 - 16:53 | reply

Motive, opportunity, will Obviously there are some theories out there which are born of hearsay, conjecture, misinformation, and ignorance.

Others have not really been addressed in any serious way - and probably could not be, because no one would have written out documents.

The people who object to them, (Popular Mechanics, John McCain, 9/11myths.com) tend to point out the reasons why such and such could have physically happened the way the official version says it did, or why such and such theory is impossible.

They then also say something along the lines of it being both unscientific and and detrimental to America to suggest such things. But how it happened is not the point, and never was.

Never mind that they were supposedly unable to find any of 4 blackboxes at the WTC center site (which are specifically designed to withstand a crash - that is the entire point of their existence - and give of a signal to aid in their recovery) but they were able to find a passport made of paper within hours - which happened to belong to one of the "terrorists"; it could happen.

Never mind that the damage to the pentagon was substantially smaller than the size of the plane which was supposed to have hit it, and that there was no sign of pieces of wing, engine or other plane parts visible anywhere on the site (or that video of the event was confiscated, or that it just happened to hit the one wing of the building which had just been reinforced and was largely empty due to the renovation), perhaps the engines vaporized but the fuselage punched through, it could happen.

Never mind that WTC 7 (which housed the FBI, CIA, and SEC - including the files on prosecuting Enron and dozens of other corrupt corporations) collapsed entirely due to fire and being hit with falling debris - unlike WTC 3, 4, 5, 6 and every other building in the area - which is unprecedented in all the rest of history. That too could be a coincidence.

If every thing physically happened exactly the way the official version says, that does not in anyway make it less likely Americans - and specifically the government - was directly involved.

If they were, we would likely never know. They certainly had a lot to gain from it, much more than the Islamists did.

It would not have taken much.

Say a few core members of the PNAC (<http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/PNAC> , <http://www.newamericancentury.org/>), a couple high level, trusted CIA agents, and 2 or three trusted Saudi Arabians, Bin Ladens perhaps.

The PNAC is a primary think tank of the neocon movement, and includes people who have held high government positions for the past half century and other rich and powerful people, including Dick Cheney, Donald Rumsfeld, Paul Wolfowitz, Jeb Bush, Zalmay Khalilzad, Richard Perle, Richard Armitage, Dan Quayle, and Steve Forbes.

I am not saying this happened. Just consider the possibility.

Say, hypothetically, they plan what the targets should be, maximum effect, minimum actual damage, and believable. Something symbolic, but not catastrophic. A military target to justify a military response, and plenty of civilian deaths to get the American people agitated. They maybe provide limited cash, but that's it, for fear of ever being caught.

Mostly what they would have provided was the idea, what to do, how to do it. They would have wanted clues planted well in advance - for example, having the volunteers train at a US flight school, when they could just as easily trained in their own country, or a neutral one. They might have made sure to set up certain military training exercises, certain security camera angles, stuff which could seem perfectly innocent, but which would help make it easier to carry out, and easier to know who to blame. Bin Laden's original idea was to hit some 10-20 targets at once, on both coasts, but they would have shot that idea down, because they wanted to limit the actual damage. Then, through the Arab contacts, they found some people looking to martyr themselves. The actual hijackers have no idea that they are actually enacting a plan partially developed by and for the US leadership, they feel they are doing God's work by killing thousands of corrupt infidels. And the end result is the Islamists are able to up their recruiting a million percent, and the PNAC gets almost absolute power and one step closer to their stated goal of world domination.

Their principals (emphasis mine):

- we [the US] need to increase defense spending significantly if we are to carry out our global responsibilities today and modernize our armed forces for the future;

- we need to strengthen our ties to democratic allies and to challenge regimes hostile to our interests and values;
- we need to promote the cause of political and economic freedom abroad;
- we need to accept responsibility for America's unique role in preserving and extending an international order friendly to our security, our prosperity, and our principles.

<http://www.newamericancentury.org/statementofprinciples.htm>

They spelled out in better detail how to achieve this in a report they released in 2000:

(<http://www.newamericancentury.org/RebuildingAmericasDefenses.pdf>)

"while the unresolved conflict in Iraq provides the immediate justification [for US military presence], the need for a substantial American force presence in the Gulf transcends the issue of the regime of Saddam Hussein"

"Over the long term, Iran may well prove as large a threat to U.S. interests in the Gulf as Iraq has. And even should U.S.-Iranian relations improve, retaining forward-based forces in the region would still be an essential element in U.S. security strategy given the longstanding American interests in the region".

"...advanced forms of biological warfare that can target specific genotypes may transform biological warfare from the realm of terror to a politically useful tool"

"...the process of transformation, even if it brings revolutionary change, is likely to be a long one, absent some catastrophic and catalyzing event — like a new Pearl Harbor."

This last one is most telling, since there is strong evidence that the US government, including possibly President Roosevelt, knew that the Japanese were planning the attack, and deliberately failed to warn the base because a surprise attack would better appal the American people and build their support for the war.

(
<http://www.thenewamerican.com/departments/feature/1999/070499.htm>
<http://www.fff.org/freedom/1291c.asp> <http://www.independent.org/events/transcript.asp?eventID=28>)

by David Craig Hiser on Wed, 12/20/2006 - 17:04 | reply

Perhaps YOU suggested the idea to the hijackers

Prove me wrong.

by a reader on Thu, 12/21/2006 - 00:34 | reply

Conspiracies, rational and irrational

Jay and David argue that there is something cynical, perhaps uncritical about those who reject the notion of a conspiracy by the US government in the happenings of 9/11. If all these people were saying was that nothing other than the official version could ever, even in principle, happen, Jay and David would be correct. But, in the real world, it is Jay and David who are cynical and uncritical, as evident from their methodology.

For instance, Jay says

The only reason some ideas are conspiracy "theories" is because insufficient evidence exists to prove them. Which you would expect, if the conspirators had covered their tracks well.

This is the tip of the iceberg of the false methodology used by Jay, David and their like-minded conspiracists. The truth is that a theory is, logically, never proven; they are disproven. A conspiracy theory, however, is never disproven, even in principle. Just read a bit more, and you'd see that Jay and David confirm this. Jay writes,

Perhaps physically everything happened on 9/11 as the official version says. That doesn't mean the CIA couldn't have trained the hijackers, or provided funding, or even just suggested the idea in the first place.

David similarly writes,

If every thing physically happened exactly the way the official version says, that does not in anyway make it less likely Americans - and specifically the government - was directly involved. If they were, we would likely never know.

That is, even if we disprove the central claim of the 9/11 conspiracists, i.e. that the events of 9/11 did not take place according to the official description, Jay and David will inform us that is not in the least sufficient to discard their conspiracy version of events. This central feature, that their theories are in principle unfalsifiable is what makes them unscientific, and what's more, irrational. So when Jay replies to calling such conspiracy theories "insane" by The World by "as though it were not only false, but as if it were unthinkable" he gets it right despite his sarcasm--if we take "thinkable" to mean "rationally thinkable."

Jay and David also share the irrational assumption that discovering truth and uncovering realities is a matter of belief. The truth is, however, that the growth of knowledge comes about through trial and the elimination of error. Jay says,

Considering that we must look at every possibility in as much detail as we can and not discount certain things as "conspiracy theories" just because we really really don't want to believe them. [Emphasis mine]

But how can we, logically, consider every possibility, of which there is an infinite number? And why should we at all believe in a theory, as though we have no better way of examining, criticizing, and discarding the wrong ones? Real conspiracies, like the CIA involvement in coups, or the Watergate and Iran-contra were all uncovered in this rational way, not by irrational beliefs and false methodologies. So, presenting them as examples by Jay is at best irrelevant to his approach.

-- Cyrus Ferdowsi, <http://libiran.blogspot.com>

by Liberal Iranian on Thu, 12/28/2006 - 02:50 | reply

Excellent Points, Appalling Metaphors

American Digest gives a succinct, point-by-point account of how bad government, responding to silly people, caused yesterday's blackout. But spoils it by referring to that process as "Self-Inflicted Terrorism". It is not terrorism: none of those responsible intended the blackout to happen. None of them wanted any harm to come to its victims. None of them are today dancing in the streets. None are planning how to cause bigger and more painful blackouts in the future.

Steven Milloy of junkscience.com is rightly angry about the millions of poor people who have died of malaria and other insect-borne diseases because of the ban on DDT. (By the way, Americans are now starting to die of this policy too, through the West Nile virus.) So angry is he, that he can't resist an uncalled-for and utterly false closing remark:

Let's hope that in the 21st century our society comes to realize that genocide by junk science is no different than genocide by the gas chamber.

First of all, it was not genocide: the DDT ban was not intended to exterminate any ethnic or cultural group, nor did it in fact do so. And second, causing deaths through foolish negligence in the belief that one is saving lives and preventing other massive harm is different, very different, morally, from causing deaths wilfully and maliciously. The instigators of the DDT ban may have been unforgivably casual about the possibility of such deaths (some regarded them as a form of population control), but if another way had been found to prevent malaria, they would not have campaigned against it; nor did they send in death squads armed with mosquitos to forcibly infect any survivors.

This sort of metaphor is quite rare from anyone who, as in the above cases, is in other respects talking sense and making excellent points. But it is very common in idiotarian writing. (We noted an example recently; and see also this one.) For idiotarians have a dual motive: they not only want to attract the readers' attention to their boring pet issue by using a startling metaphor of evil violence, they also want to diminish evil violence itself by comparing it with their boring pet issue.

Blacked Out

American Digest gives a succinct, point-by-point account of how bad government, responding to silly people, caused yesterday's blackout.

How does American Digest know what caused the blackout before anyone else does? It seems to me that they are simply jumping to a conclusion based on their ideas about politics, and that The World (while clearly not of the opinion that all problems are due to "bad government, responding to silly people") is, being broadly in agreement, repeating it uncritically. I can certainly think of plausible events that I would argue do not fit this theory at all, but I wonder whether American Digest would not try hard to make them fit. Let me put it another way: once what actually happened becomes known, might the evidence refute this theory? If so, why treat it as established beyond reasonable doubt? If not, well....

by Kevin on Fri, 08/15/2003 - 20:21 | reply

Re: Blacked Out

Kevin said:

once what actually happened becomes known, might the evidence refute this theory?

Yes.

If so, why treat it as established beyond reasonable doubt?

Good point. We should have said: "a succinct, point-by-point account of the sort of behaviour by bad government, responding to silly people, which impedes problem-solving and sometimes causes systems to break down, and which might be responsible in this case".

by Editor on Fri, 08/15/2003 - 20:42 | reply

Metaphor appropriate

I think:

Let's hope that in the 21st century our society comes to realize that genocide by junk science is no different than genocide by the gas chamber.

is an excellent way to end that article. First of all, the DDT ban did in fact more or less target a specific ethnic or cultural group. Namely black people in Africa. The fact that it didn't exterminate all of them, or that not all victims were black, doesn't make the term genocide incorrect. Just as the fact that the Nazis didn't kill all Jews and the fact that not all their victims were Jews makes the term genocide incorrect.

Second, the result was intended by some, by their own admission. So for those, the term genocide is literally correct. For those people the act meets both criteria to be a proper genocide: a specific population was targeted and the result was intended.

Third, most proponents surely know about the result, or would have been able to learn about the result. Not changing their mind with that knowledge makes the result as good as intended.

That leaves those people who really didn't intend the result and who really were (justifiably?) unaware of the result. Well, a metaphor is just that, a metaphor. It's a comparison to make a point, in bold language, without claiming that one is exactly the same as the other. Some intelligence is assumed in the reader, to be able to read behind the lines. Language is not as exact as mathematics. I don't think doing that is necessarily wrong. I think that when the author makes the point there's no difference, he doesn't literally mean there's no difference. He means there's no difference in terms of an important aspect: for the victims it makes no difference whether they were killed intentionally or by foolishness.

The road to hell is paved with good intentions. And good intentions form a far greater danger than bad intentions. For it is far more common for people to do evil things (well, things with unintended horrible results) with good intentions than evil things with bad intentions.

Henry Sturman

by Henry Sturman on Sun, 08/24/2003 - 14:45 | reply

DDT myths

Sorry to comment on such an old issue, I hope you will let this comment through anyway.

There quite an important point in the DDT debate that nobody here seems aware of: It is nothing but a persistent myth that the US ban on DDT in 1972 has caused any deaths due to malaria.

The 1972 ban on DDT in the US had specific exceptions for campaigns against disease-carrying insects (as well as for agricultural uses where no other means were effective), and it had no direct consequences at all in the developing countries - where DDT has been used over all the years - and still is being used today inside the houses, where it poses no threat to wildlife.

It is thus not only Steven Milloy's comparison of DDT with genocide which is appallingly ridiculous - his claims about 80 millions "preventable" deaths is exactly as wrong.

The US ban has not cost a single african life - and if you took the time to check your sorces, you would immediately realise that it simply could not possibly have done so due to the nature of both the ban as well as the very spraying being done inside the houses.

Steven Milloy knows this perfectly well, but getting serious information out clearly has never been the thrust of his various astroturf groups.

A more proper title of your remark could have been "Missing points, ridiculous metaphors". You might justly add willfully misleading as well.

Robert Schultz

by Robert Schultz on Mon, 03/06/2006 - 00:45 | reply

Re: DDT Myths

Thank you for the comment.

Of course the US ban "has not cost a single African life", because it does not have the force of law in Africa. However, one of the allegations is that various forms of pressure from Western governments and NGOs have caused anti-malaria campaigns to become far less effective through hostility to DDT.

We make no claim to be experts on the history or present status of anti-malaria campaigns. One problem with "checking sources" in this field is that the conclusions reached by various sources seem to be largely predictable from their political philosophies – right-wingers being broadly opposed to the anti-DDT campaign and concluding that it has resulted in many deaths, and left-wingers disagreeing on one or both of those points. However, as you rightly imply, this should not be an insuperable problem to those who want to discover the truth.

To this end, could you please set us right about the purely factual statements expressed in this open letter, in which the organisation "Africa Fighting Malaria" claims that

WHO's 1979 global strategy for malaria control called on countries to de-emphasize IRS

[That's 'indoor residual spraying' – presumably the very thing you say has continued unimpeded] and to increase emphasis on case detection and treatment. In 1985, the World Health Assembly (WHA) resolution 38.24 called on malaria-endemic countries to move away from IRS and to dismantle the vertical malaria control programmes and move towards a more horizontal "community-based" system of malaria control. The 1979 strategy and the WHA resolution effectively destroyed organized malaria control programs in many developing countries. WHA resolution 38.24 caused a devastating loss of talented malaria control personnel and a loss of strict scientific guidance over malaria control programs. This immensely destructive resolution was based on a false assumption that a community-based system is the only framework within which malaria control can be sustained. Acceptance of the resolution ignored the fact that many highly successful and long lasting malaria control programmes are run vertically and have been sustained for decades.

Countries that chose not to decentralise their malaria control activities and chose to retain IRS for malaria control have not witnessed the rise in malaria cases experienced by those countries that complied with the WHO's resolution.

If that is true, and if this WHO policy and similar Western policies were indeed influenced by environmentalism, then Western environmental politics have indeed caused many deaths from malaria in other countries.

But is it true? Is Africa Against Malaria being "wilfully misleading" in your opinion? If so, why do you think that is? And more importantly, could you direct us to the sources that explain what the truth of the matter is?

by Editor on Mon, 03/06/2006 - 10:35 | reply

DDT

Sorry if I interfere with a discussion, but you ask for evidence on DDT. How about Tim Lambert's page?

<http://timlambert.org/2005/12/ddt-ban-myth-bingo/>

It offers refutations of all of Steven Milloys claims, including the ones also made by the front group "Africa fighting malaria".

Best regards,

Christoffer Harder

by Christoffer Bugge Harder on Thu, 05/18/2006 - 13:53 | reply

Re: DDT

Thank you for the link! Far from "interfering with the discussion", you have provided exactly what we asked for.

Unfortunately, the only mention we can see of Africa Fighting Malaria on that web page is a link to this page, which does not purport to refute any claim of Africa Fighting Malaria. (Have we missed the passage containing the refutation? Please let us know.)

Nor does it call it a "front group". Perhaps you could enlighten us: for whom is Africa Against Malaria a front group, and what does that tell us about its claims which we quoted above?

by Editor on Thu, 05/18/2006 - 15:23 | reply

Thank you for the answer.

Thank you for the answer.

Most of the numerous claims of AFM - that WHO and other international fora are imposing a kind of "de-facto" ban on DDT, that it could eradicate malaria, that resistance is a small or nonexistant problem, that South Africa reduced malaria by 95% and so on - are in my opinion quite effectively refuted by the other links that Tim Lambert offers in his "Bingo" game, if you follow them.

Furthermore, it should be noted that the decisions of international organisation to lobby for a phaseout of DDT does not mean that spraying against malaria mosquitoes are ended - they are simply promoting a shift to pyrethroids or other poisons, which are just as effective, but often more expensive. Another claim of the AFM is that the EU is threatening with sanctions against Uganda because of their use of DDT - but the EU actions are only directed against agricultural use of DDT. Not only does this use of DDT pose a threat to raptors, but it also could destroy the effect of DDT in the fight against malaria because of the rapid resurgence of resistant mosquitos always associated with excessive spraying.

Furthermore, Roger Bate from AFM advocated the use of DDT in Sri Lanka after the Tsunami, even though it is well known that DDT is useless in Sri Lanka because of widespread resistance. The DDT use was voluntarily given up in Sri Lanka exactly because of that more than 30 years ago.

Steven Milloys claims about 90 mio. deaths on this page

http://www.junkscience.com/malaria_clock.htm

are apparently completely unfounded, since the US ban on DDT had no effect in Africa and furthermore contained specific exceptions for uses of DDT related to disease controlling.

Why do they purport such false claims? I cannot really see other reasons for doing so than to smear environmentalists. Since both AFM and Junkscience receive significant fundings from industry groups critical to environmental movements, and since AFMs only real goal seems to be advocating excessive use of DDT (a strategy positively known to be of no use in many places), I think that the term Astro turf (or front group is appropriate.

Best regards

Christoffer

by Christoffer Bugge Harder on Thu, 05/18/2006 - 20:02 | reply

Addition

Just to point that out,

I know that this topic is a little technical, and that many people simply tend to side with the position on their political wing, as you correctly note.

I will make no claim to be "unbiased", since I am generally pro-environment as well as left-leaning.

But I consider myself a somewhat reasonable human being. As a biology student having taken classes in toxicology, organic chemistry, ornithology and majoring in evolutionary biology, I will also make the vain claim to have some kind of grasp on the facts in this debate. To be explicit, my opinion on the whole DDT matter is

1: The ban in most countries on agricultural use of DDT was fully justified by well-documented environmental hazards. As mentioned, such spraying would very likely contribute to the rise of resistance and be a much greater danger to the usefulness of DDT in the antimalaria fight

2: this resistance problem was and is the main reason for the halting use of DDT as an antimalarial drug

3: The claims of Milloy and others about millions of deaths resulting from a nonexisting DDT ban are absolutely bogus, to say the least - Milloy is not "justly angry", he is just angry.

4: However, if there is no alternative, just as effective and less dangerous insecticide than DDT, poor countries where malaria is endemic should continue to use DDT in IRS - if this is likely to be effective (which is not the case in many countries)

5: Finally, if environmentalists or Western governments want the developing countries to abandon their use of DDT in the antimalarial fight, they should compensate them for any costs and provide a guaranteed just as effective alternative toxin.

This is also the position of almost all environmental organisations I have ever heard speaking out in this matter. I consider this a somewhat balanced point of view. I hope you do not see it as merely propaganda.

Best regards,

Christoffer

by Christoffer Bugge Harder on Thu, 05/18/2006 - 20:33 | reply

A factual issue and a terminological cone

Perhaps we could focus on one factual issue:

AFP says that the WHO and other such organisations called on malaria-endemic countries to move away from 'indoor residual spraying' with DDT. Are you saying that this is (1) simply a lie: they only campaigned against agricultural use of DDT; or (2) true but misleading, because 'indoor residual spraying' continued just as effectively with different chemicals?

And a terminological one:

Are you saying that any group that is financed by people who agree with its policies is fairly called a "front group"? Surely by that standard, all campaigning groups are front groups. Wouldn't a front group usually have the additional attribute that it is set up for one ostensible purpose, by people who actually have a different agenda, usually a less popular or attractive one. This is, for instance, how Oliver Kamm uses the term when he says that "Respect is a front organisation for the Socialist Workers' Party".

by Editor on Thu, 05/18/2006 - 22:54 | reply

Concerning the factual issue

Concerning the factual issue: AFMs statement about the WHO position is more or less "true but misleading". I do not know exactly when IRS with pyrethroids and other DDTalternatives started out - but the main reason for the cease in the use of DDT is mosquito resistance, not environmental pressure, a fact that AFM systematically omits. In this article(<http://www.fightingmalaria.org/news.php?ID=360>), AFM advocates spraying of DDT in Sri Lanka, even though everyone in the field knows very well that DDT is useless in Sri Lanka exactly because of this. Check WHO's DDT and Malaria pages <http://malaria.who.int/>

Regarding the terminology - I agree to your terminology, I certainly do not see every lobby group as a front or astroturf group. www.malaria.org is an example of an honest group getting industry funds. It actually is fighting malaria and is run by qualified scientists in the field.

But AFM is no such anti-malaria group. Its almost sole objective seems to be promoting DDT use, and it clearly has little idea about the factual stuff. It is established by two ideologues (Bate and Tren), and it seems to have little interest in other topics than to hurl accusations against environmentalist groups. It is established not to fight malaria, but to fight environmental groups, and it is financed by well known antienvironmental interests - these characteristics qualify it as a front group.

Best regards,

Christoffer

by Christoffer Bugge Harder on Mon, 05/22/2006 - 10:11 | reply

Any answers from the editors?

Dear Editors,

have you no answers at all to Christoffer Bugge Harders facts? Does this mean that you acknowledge what he says.

by Kaspar Jørgensen on Thu, 06/22/2006 - 12:57 | reply

Answers

Which of his facts do you want to see a comment on?

-- Elliot Temple
My Blog

by Elliot Temple on Thu, 06/22/2006 - 18:45 | reply

What is right and what is wrong about DDT?

Dear Editors,

I don't know that much about the DDT issues, but judging from this debate, I would say that Christopher Bugge Harder has me convinced here. I checked some of the sources he quotes, and I checked the homepage "Junk Science". The first ones seem quite reliable and with many facts, while the latter seems to be full of half-truths, op-eds and clearly propagandistic notions, such as the clock showing the costs of the Kyoto Protocol. John Quiggins homepage also, in my view, rebuts many of the allegations presented on Junk Science, and quite effectively. I studied the death clock counting malaria deaths presented on Junk Science thoroughly, but nowhere did it offer any links whatsoever between the US ban on DDT in the 70s and the deaths from malaria in Africa. That seems quite a weak basis for such harsh allegations, don't you think?

Is there such a ban on DDT that you seem to presuppose, or isn't there? That shouldn't be that complicated to sort out.

Has EU or US policies on DDT cost lives in Africa? Does WHO advocate DDT spraying or not? What effect has the US ban on DDT had in Africa?

Yours sincerely,

Kaspar Jørgensen

by Kaspar Jørgensen on Mon, 06/26/2006 - 11:01 | reply

Re: Concerning the factual issue

But AFM is no such anti-malaria group. Its almost sole objective seems to be promoting DDT use, and it clearly has little idea about the factual stuff. It is established by two ideologues (Bate and Tren), and it seems to have little interest in other topics than to hurl accusations against environmentalist groups. It is established not to fight malaria, but to fight environmental groups, and it is financed by well known antienvironmental interests

But how would hurling false accusations against environmentalist groups serve to promote DDT use?

And are these 'antienvironmental interests' companies who want to sell more DDT, or what?

by Editor on Mon, 06/26/2006 - 19:08 | reply

www.malaria.org

www.malaria.org is an example of an honest group getting industry funds. It actually is fighting malaria and is run by qualified scientists in the field.

Near the top of www.malaria.org's DDT page is an endorsement of Africa Fighting Malaria. In fact the endorsement appears to refer to the very campaign by AFM that we linked to above. Has this honest group run by qualified scientists in the field been duped by the dishonest one which has little idea about the factual stuff?

by Editor on Mon, 06/26/2006 - 19:22 | reply

AFM and DDT

Dear editors,

you asked: "...how would hurling false accusations against environmentalist groups serve to promote DDT use"?

The immediate answer to this is very straightforward: If you succeed in depicting your opponants as naive, "GAIA"-fanatics, religious pagans and anti-man treehuggers unaware of scientific facts, it will be much easier for organisations like AFM to stand forward as the rational, cool-headed and considerate part in the case. If you actually manage to make people believe that the unspecified environmental movement has been guilty in the death of 90 million African children and that DDT would have saved them were it not for this evil movement, it will not be difficult convincing people that DDT should be sprayed everywhere.

It is at the core of the antienvironmental movement to depict its opponants as religious, anti-man people unaffected by facts. Check publications by e.g. Dixy Lee Ray, Michael Sanera, Gregg Easterbrook and Steven Milloy, if you do not believe me. The DDT case is a very important such "battlefield".

It is hardly necessary to argue neither about Roger Bate's or Steven Milloy's well-known anti-environmental positions nor about their many earlier fraudulent claims. Are you seriously challenging the fact that these people can be fairly described as "antienvironmentalists"? Can you point out any remote connection between the US 1972 agriculture ban on DDT on one side and malaria deaths in Africa on the other, as alleged on Milloys "Death clock" page? Why make such an obviously false claim if not to smear environmental movements?

As both AFM and most environmental groups acknowledge, DDT has become the epitome of an "evil pesticide". The rise of the environmental movements was very much linked to the struggle against DDT - and the US agriculture ban of 1972 was one of its first great "victories". If Roger Bate, Steven Milloy or other "junk scientists" could cast doubts upon the validity of the US DDT ban, they believe that they can also cast doubt about the motifs and the honesty of the environmental movement.

You may, of course, disagree, but I do not think that I have to descend into conspiracy theories to drive these points home, neither in your view.

Concerning the resistance development: If you are doubting that resistance to DDT is a major problem, you can check this homepage (http://www.pesticideresistance.org/DB/pesticide_profile.php?pageNum_rstPesticides=10&totalRows_rstPesticides=448&formulationid=97)

This article (<http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2005/06/04/AR2005060400130.html>) also does a good job in explaining the rise of resistance as the main problem and reason for switching away from DDT use.

AFM advocates DDT spraying almost everywhere as if it were some kind of miracle medicine. Why do they suggest DDT spraying in areas where it is known to everybody with some knowledge in the field that it will be of no use (like in Sri Lanka, as quoted formerly)? Surely, they cannot possibly have much idea about the factual stuff (which is scarcely surprising since none of them are scientists) when they argue like that. I assume you will grant this.

Will you accuse me of being a conspiracy theorist if I make the claim that the primary goal of AFM is to promote DDT use because it is a convenient way to attack environmental movements at their original core - and not because of consideration for Asian or African malaria victims? And if you disagree, can you then suggest any other plausible reason for loudly endorsing spraying treatments which are known beforehand to be completely ineffective?

I do consider malaria.org a lobby group, and I do not agree with their points of view, but they are honest about the resistance problem, and they make the distinction between agricultural use (which is indeed banned) of DDT, and the disease control (which is not banned and never has been). I have not seen them accuse environmental groups of being responsible for millions of deaths, either. If you want to prevent something, you often side with just about everybody, but you can ask themselves why they link to AFM. However, I still find it difficult to honestly describe AFM as anything but ideological with little knowledge about the factual stuff. As said above, if you do not agree to this, could you then answer the question why they, then, are advocating DDT spraying in areas where it is positively known to have no effect and furthermore be a waste of money?

Best regards,

Christoffer Bugge Harder

P.S: If you acknowledge that DDT is not banned, as you seem to do, then why do you claim above that "Steven Milloy is justly angry about the millions of poor people who have died of malaria and other insect-borne diseases because of the ban on DDT"?

by Christoffer Bugge Harder on Sat, 07/08/2006 - 19:06 | reply

Regarding my last comment: I

Regarding my last comment: I hope I did not sound too indignant or rude - I am not too familiar with colloquial English. I did not intend to insult you by any means. I am also sorry for the poor spelling.

Still, I would like to see you comment on the claims of AFM and Steven Milloy in the light of the information I linked to. Do you maintain that some kind of DDT ban has cost millions of lives, that WHO are opposed to DDT spraying, that they do not fund IRS spraying with other chemicals, or that development of resistance was not the main reason for switching away from DDT?

Best regards

Christoffer Bugge Harder

by Christoffer Bugge Harder on Fri, 07/14/2006 - 10:43 | reply

Some other interesting posts

Some other interesting posts about claims of possible wonders of DDT spraying in Sri Lanka and India:

<http://info-pollution.com/ddtban.htm>

This is the indian doctor V.P. Sharma:

<http://www.ias.ac.in/currsci/dec102003/1532.pdf>

Does the editor still believe the claims of AFM or Steven Milloy?

Regards,

Christoffer Harder

by Christoffer Bugge Harder on Tue, 07/18/2006 - 14:53 | reply

AFM and DDT

If you actually manage to make people believe that the unspecified environmental movement has been guilty in the death of 90 million African children and that DDT would have saved them were it not for this evil movement, it will not be difficult convincing people that DDT should be sprayed everywhere.

Presumably when you say 'everywhere', this is hyperbole. What places do you mean specifically? And does the AFM advocate spraying in those places, or is this a secret agenda of theirs which they will only begin to advocate once sufficiently many people believe that the unspecified environmental movement has been guilty in the death of 90 million African children and that DDT would have saved them were it not for this evil movement?

by Editor on Tue, 07/18/2006 - 15:14 | reply

Dear editors, first of al

Dear editors,

first of all, I am not sure if I get the mood of your reply right. I am not a native English speaker, so if I am missing completely out on something, it is my mistake. Are you being ironic or thinking that I am promoting conspiracy theories?

"Presumably when you say 'everywhere', this is hyperbole".

You are right; "Everywhere" is somewhat polemical. However, I have never (and I do mean never in the literary sense) read any longer pieces from AFM about how to fight malaria that have not contained lots of recommendations to spray DDT, no matter where in the world.

"What places do you mean specifically"?

There are quite a few places, but to begin with, we can look on this page, to which have referred previously:

<http://www.fightingmalaria.org/news.php?ID=360>

Here, AFM suggests spraying with DDT in Sri Lanka, as well as in Southeast Asia as well. (They also quote Charles Wurster of EDF for a fake quote about malaria as an efficient population control mechanism).

It has long been known that the malaria-carrying mosquitoes in Sri Lanka as well as in most of India are resistant to DDT. In fact, DDT was used excessively in Sri Lanka both before and after 1963, but when malaria resurged in the late 1960 and the singhalese went back to the DDT sprayguns, DDT had lost it efficiency. So Sri Lanka abandoned DDT spraying in the 60ies and 70ies - because it did not work anymore. I cannot find any link whatsoever to supposedly green pressure in this process.

Can you suggest any sensible reasons for AFM to suggest DDT spraying in e.g. Sri Lanka? They do not even mention the fact that malaria mosquitoes in Sri Lanka are resistant, or that DDT use quickly leads to resistance development anyway.

In another article (http://www.aei.org/publications/pubID.21911,filter.all/pub_detail.asp), Roger Bate has moderated this point of view a little - here, he does recognise the possibility of resistance to DDT, but soon after claims that the major role of DDT is as a repellent, not as insecticide. But Bate fails to recognise that resistance of the mosquitoes is a two-way system: Physiological resistance (the poison is ingested but causes no harm) and behavioural resistance (the insect tend to avoid DDT sprayed surfaces). In either case, DDT becomes useless because the mosquitoes are either unaffected or simply decide to rest outside houses. AFM's suggestion has already been tried without success.

If AFM claims to have a grasp on reality, they should not post such an utterly false allegation.

I hope it answers your question,

Regards,

Christoffer

by a reader on Sun, 07/23/2006 - 01:21 | reply

"Presumably when you say 'eve

"Presumably when you say 'everywhere', this is hyperbole".

You are right; "Everywhere" is somewhat polemical. However, I have never (and I do mean never in the literary sense) read any longer pieces from AFM about how to fight malaria that have not contained lots of recommendations to spray DDT, no matter where in the world.

Perhaps they only brought up DDT spraying regarding places they advocate it?

I think what the editor was getting at is they don't advocate DDT spraying everywhere. For example, not in my house. There is a logic to where they do and do not advocate spraying DDT. This logic includes that they only advocate spraying DDT in places where it will do something useful such as kill mosquitos. Saying they advocate spraying "everywhere" does not consider and address the actual logic of their position.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/blog/>

by Elliot Temple on Sun, 07/23/2006 - 01:42 | reply

"I think what the editor was

"I think what the editor was getting at is they don't advocate DDT spraying everywhere. For example, not in my house".

I do not know if I do not express myself sufficiently clearly, but I do, of course, understand what the Editor hinted at.

And of course, I do not suggest that the AFM are literally advocating spraying DDT "everywhere" - like in your house (in the U.S.A, I suppose).

Rather, AFM seems to me to advocate spraying with DDT almost everywhere where malaria is endemic. Furthermore, they almost never seem to consider alternative solutions and are always accompanying their spraying suggestions with harsh attacks on governments and environmental organisations.

"There is a logic to where they do and do not advocate spraying DDT. This logic includes that they only advocate spraying DDT in places where it will do something useful such as kill mosquitos".

You do not seem to actually having read my last post. If there indeed is such a logic, as you claim, could you be so kind to explain the logic in suggesting spraying DDT in e.g. India or Sri Lanka after the last tsunami?

In these places, it is well known by all relevant experts (like V.P. Sharma, Indias leading malaria expert) to be futile, because the mosquitoes are genetically as well as behaviourally resistant to DDT.

"Saying they advocate spraying "everywhere" does not consider and address the actual logic of their position".

As said before, if you add everywhere "where malaria is endemic", it is, in my view, very close to the truth.

AFM is a subdivision of the American Enterprise Institute, and it is not run by qualified scientists in the field. It can be fairly described as an organisation established to fight environmentalists and government intervention disrupting free market economies. This is, of course, a perfectly legitimate political goal, but it is not respectable to hide it under a thin veil of science, especially not when you are unaware (willingly or not) of central scientific problems in the DDT approach.

I repeat that I do not oppose spraying with DDT in places where it can be expected to be effective, and where no other remedy is likely to be effective or can be afforded. But it is foolish to launch it as a miracle medicine in the way that the AFM is doing it.

Regards

Christoffer

by Christoffer Bugge Harder on Tue, 08/01/2006 - 17:34 | reply

Everywhere where malaria is endemic

Does the open letter from AFM that we cited, and which initiated this entire discussion of them, advocate spraying "almost everywhere where malaria is endemic"?

Does it "almost never consider alternative solutions" to DDT?

Does it misrepresent their true agenda?

by Editor on Tue, 08/01/2006 - 18:47 | reply

DDT and libertarian think tanks

Dear editors,

you have asked me many times about both the factual and the terminological issues, and I have adressed all your questions repeatedly and posed some counter-questions. This far, you have been evading a little.

I will briefly answer your last questions:

1: "Does the open letter from AFM that we cited, and which initiated this entire discussion of them, advocate spraying "almost everywhere where malaria is endemic"?"

Yes. The sense of the letter is to give the impression that DDT would work wonders if only the eco-lobbyists or WHO would allow it. Of course, they do not mention every single country in the world, but it is a specific and uncritical endorsement of the necessity of DDT. And of course, they fail to mention any problems regarding DDT resistance (as usual), as I have written to you three times.

"Does it "almost never consider alternative solutions" to DDT"?

Yes and no. They do mention ITN (bednets) and other strategies as important, but they also always add that ITN alone is not sufficient and that IRS with DDT is essential in combination. They also seem to imply that "IRS" simply means "DDT spraying".

"Does it misrepresent their true agenda"?

To answer this question, you have to make inferences about Roger Bate's and his fellows' motives. Honestly, my immediate answer is "yes".

If you think I am too harsh or promoting conspiracy theories, you can check this page for more on the libertarian think tanks and the DDT issue: http://www.sourcewatch.org/index.php?title=Malaria_and_DDT

I do not doubt that many libertarians are honestly interested in fighting malaria and believe that misguided or careless environmentalists are impeding this fight (and they are indeed right in claiming that some environmentalists are severely misguided). I hope you do not feel patronised if I would group you in this segment - I mean it as a sincere compliment.

However, Roger Bate is, like Steven Milloy, renowned for obviously disingenuous claims about environmental or health issues and for the founding of and participation in dubious astroturf groups like "European Science and Environment Forum" or "Tech Central Station" and the likes. And, like Milloy, he simply cannot be ignorant about the falsity of many of the claims he makes. I can provide you with a multitude of such examples if you are interested.

So, quite honestly, I will argue that Bate's primary agenda is to attack environmentalists, liberals, UN, WHO and other groups he sees as enemies and anti-market groups, and that AFM and the DDT fight is simply a convenient battlefield. I do not think that neither Bate nor Milloy care much for sick African children.

Regards,

Christoffer

P.S: Now when I have answered your questions: I would appreciate if you, too, would answer these questions that I have posed repeatedly:

1: When you say that Milloy is "justly angry....because of the ban on DDT", then to which DDT ban are you referring?

2: Can you point out any link whatsoever on Milloy's "Death Clock" page that offers a connection between the 1972 US agriculture ban and malaria deaths in Africa?

3: Can you explain the presumed logic of advocating spraying of DDT in India and Sri Lanka, where it is known to be of little or no use?

4: If you think AFM has a good grasp on the realities, then why do they fail to mention the resistance in Sri Lanka as mentioned, when their promoted strategy there (IRS spraying with DDT) has already been tried repeatedly, has failed and subsequently been abandoned years ago? If they are unaware of this, then are they not quite poorly informed for malaria eradication experts in your view? And if they are aware of the problem, do you then agree that their claims can be fairly described as "dishonest"?

by Christoffer Bugge Harder on Tue, 08/01/2006 - 23:19 | reply

Comments?

To the editors,

have you come up with any answers to my questions?

Regards,

Christoffer

by Christoffer Bugge Harder on Sat, 08/05/2006 - 10:53 | reply

Everywhere

1: "Does the open letter from AFM that we cited, and which initiated this entire discussion of them, advocate spraying "almost everywhere where malaria is endemic"?"

Yes.

Does it advocate using DDT outside houses? Or other than in coordinated spraying campaigns?

by Editor on Sat, 08/05/2006 - 15:12 | reply

Re: DDT and libertarian think tanks

In reply to your questions.

Question 1 (what DDT ban): We answered that in the second paragraph of this comment above.

Question 2 (any link whatsoever between US DDT ban and malaria deaths in Africa): See answer to Question 1.

Question 3: (Logic of advocating DDT spraying where it is known to be of no use): None. But could you provide a link to someone advocating this? Do you mean the reference to Sri Lanka in that open letter?

Question 4 (Could one be honest, knowledgeable, and still advocate the above): No, not honest, knowledgeable and sane. Unless one had a hidden agenda.

The trouble with the specific hidden agenda you propose is that it implies that the critics have some reasons for being opposed to environmental movement (and the anti-DDT campaign in particular), which have filled them with passion for their cause, but about which they (and you) are staying silent, and they are instead trying to promote that cause with arguments they know to be invalid and allegations they know to be false.

This could happen, in some exotic set of circumstances. We are open to the possibility that it has happened to those people for reasons of which we as yet have no inkling. But their opponents, including, so far, you, show no sign of acknowledgement that they are alleging any such thing, or have anything a priori bizarre to explain.

by Editor on Sat, 08/05/2006 - 15:25 | reply

Africa fighting malaria does

Africa fighting malaria does suggest spraying with DDT in Sri Lanka and India - there is about 100 hits on google with the search words ""africa fighting malaria" Sri lanka tsunami ddt".

You can read this AFM article, if you still doubt what I say:
<http://www.fightingmalaria.org/news.php?ID=360>

This article repeats Steve Milloys charges (90 mio. deaths due to a "de facto ban". How can you have a de facto DDT ban when it is still being used in 23 countries?

It fails to notice that the mosquitoes in Sri Lanka are resistant to DDT and that spraying with DDT has been tried and subsequently abandoned, not because of environmental pressure, but because it was not effective anymore.

Check this source out for the whole story: <http://info-pollution.com/ddtban.htm>

It furthermore spreads the fake quote about EDF executive Charles Wurster praising DDT for helping to reduce the population pressure.

Do you maintain that the AFM is a well informed, unpartisan group only devoted to save human lives? Then why do they endorse spraying DDT in Sri Lanka? You answered yourself that it was not possible to suggest spraying DDT where mosquitoes are resistant and still be "honest, knowledgeable and sane. Unless one had a hidden agenda".

Do you think that it is "exotic" to suggest that AFM or Junkscience could have a hidden agenda? They are both funded by industries with conflicting interests, and they are both trying their best to hide their sources. In my view, their hidden agenda is patent and obvious.

As I wrote, both Steve Milloy and Roger Bate has a long history of membership of other Astroturf groups also slamming environmental or health groups for advocating restrictions on the chemical industries or tobacco firms.

Everybody who regularly read libertarian/conservative manifestos will know that they are sceptical about environmentalists because they often advocate legislation or regulation interfering with the free market economy. Is this an exotic accusation in your view?

It does seem to me that you are seriously interested in getting this right, and I respect a libertarian point of view. But from a somewhat balanced point of view, it is hard to respect people like Roger Bate and Steve Milloy - at least if you have some knowledge about both science and propaganda. It seems to me that you are, excuse me, displaying a bit of naiveté in your approach to the astroturf machinery and its motifs as well as to the amount of propaganda in the case. Are you struggling to imagine that people apparently making wellmeaning and humane appeals could have such dubious agendas?

Regards,

Christoffer

by Christoffer Bugge Harder on Tue, 08/08/2006 - 11:41 | reply

Dear editors, does this ar

Dear editors,

does this article

<http://www.fightingmalaria.org/news.php?ID=360>

from AFM clearly endorse spraying in a resistant neighbourhood, or does it not?

Could you explain the presumed logic in AFM's spraying suggestions you claimed to exist to me, in this article? As a person academically trained in science, I frankly do not see it.

And if you do not see it either, could you then suggest a reason for suggesting futile spraying you consider likely?

Regards,

Christoffer

by Christoffer Bugge Harder on Thu, 08/10/2006 - 06:41 | reply

answer

Does the article clearly endorse spraying DDT where mosquitos are resistant? No. I searched "resist" and only found: "Worse yet, area mosquitoes have built up a resistance to anti-malarial drugs, rendering them useless." which is referring to anti-malarial drug resistance, not DDT resistance.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/blog/>

by Elliot Temple on Thu, 08/10/2006 - 16:30 | reply

Re: answer

I think the idea is that, although the article doesn't explicitly say so, it's hard to read it as not endorsing spraying DDT in Sri Lanka, and we are also assured that spraying DDT in Sri Lanka is known to all reputable scientists in the field to be futile. Is that correct, Christoffer?

by David Deutsch on Thu, 08/10/2006 - 17:38 | reply

Re: answer

Searching "sri lanka" i don't see where the article tells us Sri Lanka has resistant mosquitos. BTW I also searched "spray".

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/blog/>

by Elliot Temple on Thu, 08/10/2006 - 18:18 | reply

Elliott, of course the c

Elliott,

of course the cited AFM article does not mention the fact that the mosquitoes of Sri Lanka are resistant to DDT - you do not seem to realise that this is exactly my point? They just endorse spraying it there without mentioning this inconvenient fact.

However, the mosquitoes in Sri Lanka are indeed resistant to DDT. I have posted other links with documentation, but if you do not believe them, read WHO's note on malaria and the tsunami about Sri Lanka:

http://www.who.int/malaria/docs/Asia_tsunami_malaria_risk-v1-5Jan.pdf

You can also check this page about widespread DDT resistance in many disease-transmitting insects all over the world:

http://www.pesticideresistance.org/DB/pesticide_profile.php?pageNum_rstPesticides=10&totalRows_rstPesticides=448&formulationid=97

And David, you have got it quite right. The cited AFM article quite explicitly argues that spraying DDT in Sri Lanka could prevent lots of needless deaths. As said before, DDT has never been banned for disease-control in Sri Lanka, and it was actually sprayed after the resurgence of malaria there in the late 60ies. But now it did not work anymore because of the build-up of resistance - therefore, it was subsequently abandoned. As also shown in my above comments, AFM and Roger Bate know this perfectly well.

As I have said repeatedly, AFM wants to generate the impression that DDT could work wonders if only Western environmentalists, governments or lobby groups would let it. Apparently, it is much more important for AFM to attack environmentalists, WHO or governments than getting the facts right.

Elliot, could you answer these questions directly:

Does the cited article endorse spraying in Sri Lanka?

Are the malaria vector in Sri Lanka resistant to DDT?

Why does AFM then suggest spraying DDT in Sri Lanka?

Regards,

Christoffer

by Christoffer Bugge Harder on Fri, 08/11/2006 - 22:04 | reply

sri lanka resistance

I didn't mean to deny the mosquitos in Sri Lanka are resistant. I don't know and I'll look at your links. I thought you were saying that by reading just the AFM article we could see they endorse spraying in resistant neighborhoods. Now I see that your argument is that the article says to spray in Sri Lanka, and independent sources say DDT won't work in Sri Lanka.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/blog/>

by Elliot Temple on Sat, 08/12/2006 - 04:39 | reply

sri lanka

<http://www.malaria.org/ddtlancet.html> seems to be in agreement with your pdf that one species of mosquito in Sri Lanka was considered resistant many years ago.

i don't see how resistant (100%, 90%, or what?), whether there are other types of mosquitos in the area, or anything about how long it takes resistances to evolve away when not used.

So I can't tell if it will work. One way to find out would be to try it. others ways to find out that take time would be possibly condemning a lot of people to die.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/blog/>

by Elliot Temple on Sun, 08/13/2006 - 16:40 | reply

Elliot, the document h

Elliot,

the document

http://www.who.int/malaria/docs/Asia_tsunami_malaria_risk-v1-5Jan.pdf

very explicitly shows that the "one DDT resistant mosquito species" you refer to is the only malaria vector in Sri Lanka (Anopheles culifacies) - check the map of vector species.

You seem to think that the alternative to spraying DDT is doing nothing. As matter of fact, DDT is not the only insecticide available (though one would be excused for believing so if one only gets its information from AFM or other libertarian/conservative groups).

The WHO page also states boldly that this species has been "considered resistant to DDT for many years, but is still sensitive to organophosphates, such as malathion, and pyrethroids". Since these insecticides are actually known to be effective, while DDT most likely will not be, could it then be an idea to try these compounds out, if one really want to save lives in Sri Lanka (and not just use the topic to rant and rave about misanthropic environmentalists or silly governments like the AFM)?

As the previously posted links show, DDT spraying has been tried against resurging malaria in the 70ies in Sri Lanka - and it failed. Why waste time to wait and see with DDT when we have better (and less environmentally toxic) insecticides? Well, it surely cannot be because of worries about Sri Lankan lives.

As a soggy liberal by american standars, I will be happy if WHO, WWF and my government spend some of my tax money to finance effective spraying with insecticides in Sri Lanka. This is not DDT. The only unqualified advantage of DDT is that it is cheap. I do not mind if the politicians raise my taxes to pay the difference. I would recommend them to consult some other "experts" than AFM on the topic, if they want maximum value for their money.

Regards,

Christoffer

by Christoffer Bugge Harder on Tue, 08/15/2006 - 01:58 | reply

Hello, editors?

So, have you checked the comments? And do you maintain that AFM is a well-informed group, or that my accusations are "exotic"? Do you still not see any link between AFM and the other libertarian think tanks?

Regards,

Christoffer

by Christoffer Bugge Harder on Wed, 08/23/2006 - 22:35 | reply

Re: Hello, editors?

Patience. There's a war on, you know.

by Editor on Wed, 08/23/2006 - 22:45 | reply

Still no comments? Just aski

Still no comments? Just asking in your own interest, of course. I do not know if the war is over.

It's just, you know, that nasty or naive liberal hypocrites reading this page might get the impression that you did not happen to have any qualified answers to the posed questions and had spoken out without bothering to check your sources. Some liberals might even discredit Steven Milloy as a typical example of an idiotarian writer (financed by dubious troubled industries) with a boring pet issue, as you so eloquently put it.

Since I cannot possibly imagine this to be the case, I just wanted to hear if you could submit the comments and supporting evidence you undoubtedly have.

Best regards,

Christoffer

by Christoffer Bugge Harder on Fri, 09/08/2006 - 14:39 | reply

DDT

I agree with most of what you say, Christoffer.

But:

Finally, if environmentalists or Western governments want the developing countries to abandon their use of DDT in the antimalarial fight, they should compensate them for any costs ...

Why? Why 'should' they? Why is it always the responsibility of the West? Why do you treat Africans as children who can never take responsibility for themselves? If you do, they will indeed never take responsibility and will behave like children.

Which is pretty much where Africa is today, largely as a result of the actions of idiots like Geldof and Bono and their ilk (I only mention them as examples!).

by Yoni on Sun, 09/10/2006 - 11:12 | reply

Children

What do you have against children?

Surely children are the worst possible example of people who can "never take responsibility for themselves", because every responsible person ever was once a child.

Couldn't you have chosen, say, African Americans, who have been criticized for having a culture of dependence? Or Palestinians who won't take responsibility for their actions, and blame the occupation (OK, that's not very true. That's just what the Western media says. Palestinian terror organizations actually like to claim credit for killings.)

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/blog/>

by Elliot Temple on Sun, 09/10/2006 - 18:47 | reply

No, I couldn't

First of all, my use of 'children' was rhetorical, while yours is absurdly literal. Surprisingly, I do know that children do eventually grow up; but while they are still children between certain ages - typically, up to around age 6 in emotionally healthy ones - they are still learning the concept of responsibility.

I love children; perhaps that is related to the fact that I understand them quite well. I wasn't accusing them of anything, but only pointing out a fact, namely that they are not adults. Children behaving like children are lovable; adults consistently behaving like 3-year olds are suffering from some serious disorder.

I don't know enough about African Americans; your comment about them may or may not be correct.

There are no 'Palestinians'.

by Yoni on Sun, 09/10/2006 - 23:19 | reply

Evolving Away

Christoffer,

Could you cite research addressing how long it takes for resistance to DDT to evolve away when it is not in use? Or if that is unknown, confirm as such.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/blog/>

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 09/12/2006 - 00:14 | reply

Ageism

Yoni,

Tell me if I understand you properly.

Children are naturally childish and infantile. They do things that would be immoral if an adult did them. Sometimes they are even immoral for children, and that's when they must be punished. But generally, when children act in those ways, it's lovable. But when adults do, it's unforgivably immoral.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/blog/>

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 09/12/2006 - 00:41 | reply

"Finally, if environmentalist

"Finally, if environmentalists or Western governments want the developing countries to abandon their use of DDT in the antimalarial fight, they should compensate them for any costs ..."

Yoni, I did not mean to imply that the West is responsible for any ills in Africa with this phrase, or that Africans are like children. (Actually, in the DDT case it appears to be conservatives/libertarians blaming the West, i.e. the environmentalists, for ills in Africa)!

I am simply saying that since DDT does still work against malaria-carrying mosquitoes in some places when used in IRS, and since DDT is usually cheaper than most other remedies, it will naturally be the chemical of choice of poor Africans - or other people in the quite few remaining poor places where DDT is still effective.

DDT will be used by African people in their own houses, someone will be willing to sell DDT to them, and the Africans have a fully legitimate right to seek protection from malaria. This is a perfectly understandable transaction.

And then - IF environmentalists and/or governments want DDT banned in such cases, THEY should pay the Africans the difference. THEY are the ones wanting to interfere with a transaction in which they have a much smaller business than the other people involved. To me, this seems right up the alley even of a libertarian perspective.

To simply ban DDT without securing an alternative strategy economically available for average Africans would be exactly what libertarian/conservative lobby groups are always blaming the environmentalists for in the DDT debate -risking poor peoples lives just because of worries about wildlife and relatively minor health concerns. That is exactly why DDT is not banned and never has been in the antimalarial fight, contrary to popular belief in far right-circles.

Hope this was clarifying.

Regards,

Christoffer

by Christoffer Bugge Harder on Tue, 09/12/2006 - 08:18 | reply

Who Pays?

If DDT is wrong to use because of catastrophic environmental damage, then it is wrong for Africans, or anyone, to use it, whether they are poor or not. They have no right to money for a different chemical that would be right to use.

If the environmentalists object to DDT on purely grounds of personal taste, then they should indeed offer to pay Africans to do something other than use DDT.

This is the same as:

If a company wants to dump toxic waste in the river, then environmentalists who object don't have to pay for alternative toxic waste disposal.

But if environmentalists like parks, and object to the owner of a park turning it into a mall, then they should buy the land or pay him not to do that.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/blog/>

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 09/12/2006 - 08:25 | reply

Alternatives to DDT

Hi Elliot,

DDT can do and has done much harm to the environment (i.e. raptors, grebes, herons and non-pest insects) when sprayed carelessly, but apparently it is not toxic to humans - at least, the minor health concerns (premature births and a extremely remote and never substantially supported link to cancer) are nothing to talk about in the shadow of the clear and present health problems with millions of deaths due to malaria in e.g. tropical Africa. The environmentalists opposes the use of DDT because it almost wiped out all raptors and other large birds on top of the food chain in Western Europe and the U.S.A.

However, if we were to choose between saving wildlife and saving poor Africans, no reasonable person would prohibit Africans from spraying their own homes with DDT because of worries about raptors - as Rachel Carson boldly stated in "The silent spring"! IRS spraying inside houses poses very little threat to wildlife, but it has been shown numerous times that once DDT is on the market, it can be very difficult to limit its use to certain fields when spaying is done by uneducated people in poorly functioning states.

Therefore, if DDT is effective against malaria and governments or environmentalists want to protect wildlife, governments or environmentalists should definitely pay the poor Africans, if they want them to use another insecticide.

Regarding the resistance problem: Normally, resistant rats, bacteria or bugs are deficient in some other respect. If so, the mutant phenotypes will quickly be subject to counterselection once the treatment with penicillin, anticoagulants or other remedies ceases, because they are less fit than normal rats under normal circumstances. If the mutation is dominant, it will usually be eliminated rapidly.

The problem is that DDT resistant flies and mosquitoes do not seem to suffer any particular disadvantage to normal mosquitoes and flies - i.e., the mutation is selectively neutral without treatment and highly advantageous when DDT is sprayed. Therefore, it will remain in the population and only be eliminated slowly by "genetic drift". Since Sri Lanka virtually bathed themselves in DDT in the sixties, it is fair to assume that almost all mosquitoes who have survived this are resistant. Thus, all descendants are from resistant stocks and the mutation could be fixed or at least widespread for many hundreds or thousand years thereafter. Certainly, an even mild new spraying effort would spark a new wave of resistance, because you would give the resistant mosquitoes a big selective advantage, and selection always works very strongly on big populations.

I do not think any large-scale surveys about DDT resistance in Sri Lanka has been done in the last 25 years, but at that time, it was of completely no use at all, and there is every reason to believe that DDT would at best have a minor effect, if any at all.

If I were a Sinhalese, I would try something else than DDT. I would furthermore recommend anyone not to listen to Africa Fighting Malaria, because it is very easy to see that the real goal of this organisation is to use the DDT debate as a weapon in their fight against environmental regulation, environmentalists and governments generally. They do not care about Sinhalese, malaria victims or resistance mechanisms, and they obviously do not care about any scientific facts or whether their allegations against environmental group has any string of truth to them. They are making arguments that are supposed to sound reasonable in the ears of lay readers unfamiliar with the scientific facts, but which collapses at a closer examination.

You can check this article about DDT resistance in fruit flies, a model organism closely related to Anopheles mosquitoes:

<http://www.news-medical.net/?id=12329>

Regards,

Christoffer

by Christoffer Bugge Harder on Tue, 09/12/2006 - 21:34 | reply

DDT Resistance

As I read your link, it says that it was a widely held belief among scientists that resistance would evolve away, and they've only just discovered that this is sometimes false, at least for fruit flies.

If that's the case, shouldn't your position be, "I know your view seems reasonable, and your motivations are rational, however there is this new information you may be interested in. It's far from conclusive, but take a look."

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/blog/>

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 09/12/2006 - 22:11 | reply

Elliot, you have apparent

Elliot,

you have apparently not fully understood the article, especially regarding the consequences if there is a cost to mutants. This is understandable, since the topic is somewhat technical. Let me try to explain the best I can.

It is indeed a wildly held belief that resistant mutants will suffer a cost under normal circumstances and that these will tend to evolve away subsequently. But "evolving away" does not mean that ALL resistant mosquitoes will be quickly eliminated after treatment ceases. Normally, a "mutation-selection-drift-equilibrium" will arise, in which the mutant gene will still be present, but in small numbers.

As the article says and as I said, the model organisms most widely studied with respect to resistance - rats and bacteria - have been deficient in some other respect. Rats resistant to warfarin (an anticoagulant rat poison) were deficient in vitamin K synthesis, and therefore, the mutation causing the resistance will tend to be eliminated by the course of time - however slowly - from the population when the selective agent, the poison, is no longer there.

But if this is the case, the proper strategy when dealing with e.g. DDT on mosquitoes is to change the insecticide once resistance has emerged! This is what has been done when dealing with rats, and this is also exactly what the article also says. Resistance is very difficult to get rid of again, and because mosquitoes are fast breeders, they will quickly reach a large population size when treatment ceases. To have any chance of eradicating malaria, you must act very fast and coordinatedly with a new drug, before the inevitable resistance gets any chance to spread.

The speed at which the mutant phenotype disappears depend much on the dominance interactions.

Is the mutant

1: Recessive (you have to be homozygous (have two copies of the mutant gene) to display the mutant phenotype)?

2: Codominant (the heterozygote shows both characteristics),

3: Incompletely dominant (the heterozygote shows some but not all features of both homozygotes) or 4: fully dominant (both heterozygotes and the mutant homozygotes show the mutant phenotype)?

It is by far the most common that a newly arisen mutant gene be recessive with respect to the wildtype. In the three first cases, the resistance mutation will only be removed slowly, because it can "hide" in the heterozygotes (you know, like cystic fibrosis, dwarfism and albinism in humans). When this is the case, there is no selection against heterozygotes, either because they do not display the mutant phenotype, or because the cost associated with the mutant gene is only present in the homozygous mutant, which will always be much rarer than heterozygotes.

Even when the mutant is fully dominant (scenario 4) and counterselection applies to all carriers of just a single copy of the mutant gene, it still depends on the size of the population and the strength of the counterselection under normal circumstances - coupled with the frequency of the recurrent treatments.

This does not mean that once resistance has developed, ALL members of a population will necessarily be resistant long thereafter. The resistance genes will most likely only be present in some or a few individuals after some time without treatment, as said. But as long as they are present, they will rise to high frequencies once the treatment with the respective remedy starts over again - and since many pest species are reproducing themselves rapidly, they will only need a short time to reach the same population size as before the treatment started.

And all this is of the above is written under the assumption that resistance conveys some kind of cost when the relevant toxic treatment is not present.

But DDT resistant flies and mosquitoes do not seem to suffer any particular disadvantage to normal mosquitoes and flies - i.e., the mutation is selectively neutral or weakly advantageous even without treatment and, of course, highly advantageous when DDT is sprayed.

In this case, large populations will remain resistant to DDT long after cessation of spraying - there is no evolutionary pressure causing the resistance to evolve away at population level. This seems to be the case with DDT.

DDT can thus be expected to be of very limited value, if any at all, in such places where resistance has been known to be widespread, like Sri Lanka. If one truly cares about preventing malaria in these countries, one should help them getting the more expensive but still effective malathion and pyrethroids. With our present knowledge, it is much more likely that this will be effective.

It is understandable that lay persons do not know these things. I find it much more difficult to accept that professional rants like Roger Bate and Steven Milloy are deliberately trying to generate the impression that DDT could work wonders or eradicate malaria in the Third World if only environmentalists would let it, constantly and spuriously referring to some kind of unspecified "ban", spreading fake quotes about the American EPA wanting to get rid of people and citing death losses of 90 mio. due to the US 1972 ban, which in any case could not possibly have had any effect in Africa since it only applied to agricultural use.

Steven Milloy and Roger Bate cannot possibly be ignorant about these mentioned facts - but they hope that their listeners are. Their claims about DDT can only be termed as disingenious. They know perfectly well that they are deliberately misleading people.

You never see requests for malathion or pyrethroid spraying on "junkscience" or "Africa fighting malaria". One is logically left to conclude that their real issue has absolutely nothing to do with fighting malaria and everything to do with speading false accusations against scientists, governments and environmentalists, and that DDT simply serves as a convenient weapon in this fight.

Bate and Milloy are exactly such examples of idiotarians with a boring pet issue, as the editors put it. As a scientist, I must say that it escapes me how any reasonable person, regardless of political observation, can possibly think that Steven Milloy is "talking sense and making excellent points".

Regards,

Christoffer

by Christoffer Bugge Harder on Wed, 09/13/2006 - 13:23 | reply

AFM's position

Christoffer wrote:

And of course, they fail to mention any problems regarding DDT resistance (as usual), as I have written to you three times.

[...]

why do [AFM] fail to mention the resistance in Sri Lanka

But the thing is, they do. It's just that they also give arguments that the problem of resistance has been misinterpreted and has resulted in a less-than optimal use of DDT. For instance, in this article on their web site Roger Bate claims that "Aid agencies' failure to fund DDT was defended by studies that showed that Sri Lankan mosquitoes were developing resistance to DDT, an argument which ignores the chemical's main benefit. Treated houses repel mosquitoes better than any other insecticide yet tested..."

Now, this may all be false. But unfortunately, arguments of the form "AFM are funded by XYZ", or "Roger Bate is only saying that because..." do not bear on the issue of whether the two claims he makes there are true or false. Nor has anything yet cited here.

It seems that the two claims go together: aid agencies have failed to fund DDT (entirely? or sufficiently? he doesn't say); and the DDT-resistance argument (and other arguments such as the environmental one) have been used to justify this, and have helped to cause it.

Christoffer wrote:

You never see requests for malathion or pyrethroid spraying on "junkscience" or "Africa fighting malaria".

But the thing is, you do. On their FAQ, for instance, they say: "DDT is ... significantly cheaper ... That said, alternative insecticides can and should be used for a number of reasons ... DDT is only suitable on traditional mud structures. As people build more western style houses with painted and plastered walls, malaria control programmes will need suitable alternatives ... In order to control for the development of insecticide resistance, malaria control programmes should use alternative insecticides either on an annual rotational basis or sprayed in a mosaic pattern. DDT will kill the mosquitoes resistant to pyrethroid insecticides and vice versa. Rotational and mosaic spraying has proved effective at controlling insecticide resistance in various parts of the world. Good malaria control programmes should always be seeking alternative insecticides for use in IRS. DDT is still much needed because it forms part of resistance management strategies."

Christoffer wrote:

AFM advocates DDT spraying almost everywhere as if it were some kind of miracle medicine

Yet in the above FAQ quote, AFM are not only advocating the use of pyrethroids (and, by the way, presenting a separate argument why DDT can be useful despite the resistance problem), they also acknowledge that DDT can be ineffective in many situations and are also envisaging that the usefulness of DDT will decline in the future.

by Editor on Wed, 09/13/2006 - 15:02 | reply

DDT Resistance

Christoffer,

You have misrepresented the article which you cited. It begins the conventional wisdom of evolution offers a reassuring word: In the absence of the original chemical threat, most resistance mutations would cause a disadvantage to their hosts and might be expected to quickly leave the genetic landscape once the use of a drug or insecticide is suspended or withdrawn.

(my emphasis)

You argue that, in fact, resistance will not leave quickly. But that is beside the point, as far as discussion of AFM being guilty. As I said above, if you have new evidence/arguments, which go against the conventional wisdom, then it's great to share them, but you would be wrong to blast people who don't know about them yet for being irrational or politically motivated.

Further, as Editor has explained, even if the new ideas about resistance are true, and apply to mosquitos, DDT is still useful.

PS I am not incapable of understanding the technical details of evolution.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/blog/>

by Elliot Temple on Thu, 09/14/2006 - 01:08 | reply

Resistance

Elliot,

I am not sure that you understand the expression "genetic landscape". To "quickly leave the genetic landscape" in evolutionary terms does not usually mean that the gene will be purged altogether once treatment has ceased - rather, it means that it will no longer be widespread in the population and only very rarely be found.

The mutation causing human cystic fibrosis, for example, is highly deleterious and subject to counterselection. But it is not a part of the human genetic landscape, which means that you will, by a random search, almost never find it. But it is still present in the population and could, theoretically, resurge rapidly, should some hardly imaginable evolutionary advantage suddenly arise in connection with it. It has an allele frequency in Denmark of about 0,015, meaning that about 1 in 4200 children will be born with the disease, and it appears to be quite stable, because it has reached an mutation-selection equilibrium, as I said. Still, this mutant is not a part of the genetic landscape, as a geneticist would put it.

If there is no indication that a mutant causes a deleterious phenotype, it will, as the article says, neither be subject to counterselection nor disappear from the genetic landscape.

This is completely conventional wisdom. If AFM do not know about this, they should leave the field to people who do.

I have already in a previous post answered the claims of the Editors and AFM about DDT as a repellent:

"In another article

(http://www.aei.org/publications/pubID.21911,filter.all/pub_detail.asp), Roger Bate has moderated this point of view a little - here, he does recognise the possibility of resistance to DDT, but soon after claims that the major role of DDT is as a repellent, not as insecticide. But Bate fails to recognise that resistance of the mosquitoes is a two-way system: Physiological resistance (the poison is ingested but causes no harm) and behavioural resistance (the insect tend to avoid DDT sprayed surfaces). In either case, DDT becomes useless because the mosquitoes are either unaffected or simply decide to rest outside houses. AFM's suggestion has already been tried without success".

I have also provided a source explaining this:
<http://www.ias.ac.in/currsci/dec102003/1532.pdf>

Resistance is a two-way system: Behavioural and physiological. Behavioural resistance simply means that DDT in IRS do cause the mosquitoes to rest somewhere else, but that its effect on malaria is simply to make the mosquitoes rest outside and fly directly in to bite, or making transmission take place outside.

I have written another lengthy answer to all the Editor's claims, but apparently, it was rejected as spam. Could the editors please check it and post it, please?

regards,

Christoffer

by Christoffer Bugge Harder on Thu, 09/14/2006 - 10:41 | reply

Dear editors, you do not s

Note from Editor: We apologise that the following comment was held up in our spam filter for a while. We rescued and re-posted it on September 15.

Dear editors,

you do not seem to really read neither what I write nor the links I provide you with. Just a few inches above, I have answered your questions based on this AFM article (<http://www.fightingmalaria.org/article.php?min=60&max=75>).

"[T]he chemical's (DDT's) main benefit" according to Roger Bate, repellancy, is not recognised because it is also subject to resistance.

I have written this to you once, but I will happily repeat it. I wrote:

"In another article

(http://www.aei.org/publications/pubID.21911,filter.all/pub_detail.asp),

Roger Bate has moderated this point of view a little - here, he does recognise the possibility of resistance to DDT, but soon after claims that the major role of DDT is as a repellent, not as insecticide. But Bate fails to recognise that resistance of the mosquitoes is a two-way system: Physiological resistance (the poison is ingested but causes no harm) and behavioural resistance (the insect tend to avoid DDT sprayed surfaces). In either case, DDT becomes useless because the mosquitoes are either unaffected or simply decide to rest outside houses. AFM's suggestion has already been tried without success".

The thing is, that mosquitoes can quickly develop behavioural resistance to DDT, as Dr. Sharma, as I have also quoted, mentions:

"[Failure of DDT against malaria] is partly due to six decades of spraying resulting in physiological resistance to DDT and/or pronounced exophilic vector behaviour encouraging extra-domiciliary transmission".

"The excito-repellent effect of DDT, often reported useful in other countries, actually promotes outdoor transmission and therefore helps maintain a huge malaria burden under the influence of An. culicifacies, An. dirus and An. sondaicus".

(from <http://www.ias.ac.in/currsci/dec102003/1532.pdf>)

In this latter case (exophilic vector behaviour), the mosquitoes simply learn not to rest on DDT-sprayed surfaces, but sit on the exterior of the houses and fly directly in to bite or transmit it to people outside houses. In this case, IRS spraying with DDT is futile. I have already answered this claim and provided you with a link to an expert supporting this many weeks ago. It is beyond me why you insist on making the same claims repeatedly without actually reading my posts or checking any of the very same sources I quote, which you have asked me for yourselves.

My comment about AFM failing to mention any problems regarding DDT resistance (as usual) was a comment to the open letter you referred to in your first answer (<http://www.fightingmalaria.org/petition.php>). As I said, this does not mention resistance.

But of course, the AFM has many different articles, and some of them are more elaborated than others. I know that in some articles, the AFM do mention other insecticides. I realise that my comment about this was a bit harsh. But they always make sure to mention DDT, and their overall picture is very misleading. The AFM FAQ quoted by you (<http://www.fightingmalaria.org/faq.php>) e.g. says: "Limited use of DDT for public health has continued to be effective in areas where it is used inside homes. As DDT's chief property is repellency, mosquitoes often avoid the DDT treated homes altogether. In so doing, they avoid the exposure that promotes resistance as well".

But in so doing, the mosquitoes are displaying exactly the avoidance behaviour or behavioural resistance I was referring to. This just means that the mosquitoes will rest outside and fly directly inside to bite, or that the propagation will take place outside instead of inside houses.

The FAQ also claims that IRS spraying is not affecting the exterior environment. Yet, Dr. Sharma continues:

"DDT and its metabolites exceeded the maximum permissible limits in human breast milk and bovine milk. DDT residues in soil were 74 times higher and in whole blood, eight times higher. In groundwater, no DDT was detectable when alternatives were used against the presence of 0.18 to 0.07 mg/l in sprayed areas^{18,19}. Obviously, either DDT sprayed on walls eventually contaminates the environment or it ends up in the environment through diversion for illegal uses".

As I said, AFM practically never write about anything without mentioning that DDT could work wonders.

In this article (<http://www.fightingmalaria.org/news.php?ID=360>), there is many false claims and fake quotes, as I have pointed out a number of times, e.g. the fake Charles Wurster quote. A serious organisation would care not to yield to such sensationalism.

On the same page you link to

(<http://www.fightingmalaria.org/article.php?min=60&max=75>)

Richard Tren is spreading the false claim that EU is threatening Uganda with sanctions if they use DDT. But the EU warnings apply only to agricultural use, not to malaria control - as I have also pointed out to you a number of times.

And the article by Roger Bate on this page repeats the false claim that DDT spraying was stopped in 1963 because of environmental pressure, when (as I have also pointed out) it was in fact due to such a simple fact that the authorities on Sri Lanka simply thought that it was not necessary anymore, because malaria rates had declined so rapidly. As I have also pointed out and provided links to (sorry for repeating myself), DDT WAS tried and sprayed on Sri Lanka after the resurgence of malaria in the 70ies, but now it failed because of resistance. Environmental pressure played no role whatsoever in this process on Sri Lanka - and the environmentalist 's bible, Rachel Carson 's "The silent spring", explicitly made a distinction between the use of DDT in the agriculture and the use against disease vectors like malaria mosquitoes - as I have pointed out numerous times here.....

Dear editors - could you please check the sources I provide you with upon your very own request and read the articles I quote? There is no point in keeping up this debate if you keep making the same claims no matter what I provide.

Regards,

Christoffer

by Christoffer Harder on Thu, 09/14/2006 - 10:57 | reply

Behavioural resistance

"Behavioural resistance simply means that DDT in IRS do cause the mosquitoes to rest somewhere else, but that its effect on malaria is simply to make the mosquitoes rest outside and fly directly in to bite, or making transmission take place outside".

To clarify this: This means that DDT spraying, even when only used as a repellent, will have no impact on malaria transmission. Other chemicals will be much better suited.

I am not out on an "anti-chemical" crusade, it is simply about finding the best chemical solution.

Christoffer

by Christoffer Bugge Harder on Thu, 09/14/2006 - 12:19 | reply

Re: Behavioural resistance

The behavioural resistance to DDT you speak of is otherwise known as the effectiveness of DDT as a mosquito repellent. Is that correct?

Malaria-carrying mosquitoes usually feed only at night. Is that correct? Does their DDT-avoiding behaviour cause them to feed by day?

The paper you cite

<http://www.ias.ac.in/currsci/dec102003/1532.pdf> (thanks for the reference: peer reviewed science is presumably our best guide to what the facts are) says that this behavioural resistance is often reported useful [in fighting malaria] in other countries, but not in India for the following reasons: many of the target population sleep outside their houses or work at night or re-plaster treated walls or refuse to have their walls treated, and coverage rates are too low and the monitoring system is grossly understaffed. Is that correct?

Note added on September 15: Now that we have received your comment that was held up by the spam filter, the significance of this question is increased. This facet of the argument seems to go:

- AFM faction says DDT can be useful even where there is resistance to its insecticidal effects, because it is also a repellent.
- Anti-AFM faction says that this is not so, because the repellent effect merely causes the mosquitoes to avoid houses, but all they do then is feed outside.
- AFM faction acknowledges that this is true in some areas, but notes that it depends on there being people outside the houses at night to feed on. So in some areas, and for some people in every area, DDT is still useful despite both chemical and behavioural resistance.
- Anti-AFM faction replies that this is not so because ... the DDT-avoiding behaviour includes changing from night-time to daytime feeding? Or what?

by Editor on Thu, 09/14/2006 - 16:22 | reply

Genetic Landscape

Christoffer

If a DDT resistance gene leaves the genetic landscape in your sense, ie becomes rare, then DDT would kill most mosquitos, leaving the few resistant ones. And thus using only DDT wouldn't work out very well, but using DDT followed by something else would be wise. Correct?

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/blog/>

by Elliot Temple on Thu, 09/14/2006 - 18:28 | reply

Children

"Children are naturally childish and infantile. They do things that would be immoral if an adult did them. Sometimes they are even immoral for children, and that's when they must be punished. But generally, when children act in those ways, it's lovable. But when adults do, it's unforgivably immoral"

I would love to know how you managed to deduce this misreading of my words. Nowhere did I mention morality, imply an aspect of morality, hint at any shade of anything remotely to do with morality ...

What I actually WROTE was that childish behaviour is healthy in children, but indicative of some (often serious) disorder when exhibited by adults.

Disorders are not moral or immoral: they are damaging to the individual, and often to the individual's human and other environment.

by Yoni on Sat, 09/16/2006 - 16:22 | reply

Genetic landscape

Elliot,

"If a DDT resistance gene leaves the genetic landscape in your sense, ie becomes rare, then DDT would kill most mosquitos, leaving the few resistant ones".

To begin with, "my sense" of the term "genetic landscape" is completely trivial according to anything I have ever read in the technical press. It is not something I have pulled from the sleeve - just to point that out.

But if we assume that DDT is sprayed excessively (ie. not only IRS) AND if we assume that resistance has a selective cost when DDT is not there, then you are most likely right.

The problem is that mosquitoes are fast breeders, and that they will quickly rise to high numbers again after the initial blow from DDT - in a matter of months, the effects of DDT spraying could be barely visible.

And if DDT-resistance, as it seems, is indeed a gain-of-function mutation with no clear disadvantages without treatment, there will be no effect at all. In this case, the whole population might get fixed for resistance, and the mutation will dominate the genetic landscape even in the absence of DDT.

"And thus using only DDT wouldn't work out very well, but using DDT followed by something else would be wise. Correct"?

Not in Sri Lanka. The main problem is that no poison is likely to be able to eradicate malaria - DDT was sprayed everywhere on Sri Lanka in the 60ies and 70ies, and it did not eradicate neither malaria nor the mosquitoes. Using DDT now in a more limited IRS programme would most likely not contribute to fight malaria in Sri Lanka.

But in other places, your strategy might work well. Therefore, it is important to keep one's cool in the DDT debate - it is not the most deadly and evil all pesticides as some extremists put it, but certainly it is neither a miracle medicine, as AFM will have us believe. Their advice about DDT in Sri Lanka is worthless, and its main point seem to be lobbying for DDT use rather than fighting malaria in this case.

You can read on here:

<http://timlambert.org/2005/02/ddt2/>

by Christoffer Bugge Harder on Tue, 09/26/2006 - 19:23 | reply

home | archives | polls | search

Copyright © 2008 Setting The World To Rights

Open Letter

Today we are taking the unusual step of publishing an attributed article on this page. It is an open letter from Jeanie Kennedy, Director of Free Exchange, to Vince Miller, President of the International Society for Individual Liberty, about the debate within the Libertarian movement about the war. We believe that what Jeanie Kennedy has to say has a significance far beyond the dispute between these two Libertarian organisations over the conduct of a conference. It is about setting the world to rights.

Open Letter to Vince Miller, President of the International Society for Individual Liberty

Dear Vince,

As you know, I was extremely upset by the conduct of the recent conference of the International Society for Individual Liberty.

The segment entitled, "Panel Discussion – Liberty and War. US Foreign Policy Today. What is the nature of the order the US government is trying to implement around the world?" had been advertised in the ISIL Peace Institute webpage as a debate. It was nothing of the kind. What ensued was a 'debate' exclusively between different shades of anti-war opinion: the first presentation a family skit which acted embarrassed for the U.S. President and Nation, and the second – astoundingly – a polemic for Islam by a Palestinian, which made outrageously false statements about, and showed an incredible bias against, Zionism and Israel. This was an unbelievably sad and embarrassing presentation for ISIL to have been any part of.

Skits are great for educating people about simple ideas and English dialogue. But they aren't good for the presentation of complex ideas and facts in dispute. By using this technique at an ISIL conference, serious discussion is by-passed, implying that all libertarians are in agreement on the matter. It's okay to have fun lampooning US foreign policy, but wrong to imply that one is either a dove or a simpleton Bush fan. By presenting only one side of the Islamic-Jewish dispute in Palestine/Israel, the implication again is that the truth of the matter is self-evident, and that no one may disagree and be considered libertarian.

One of the presentations ran way overtime. Several of us asked for more time for the Question and Answer section, but only one person got to ask a question and then the session was cut off, with half a dozen people in the line, waiting their turns at the microphone! There was no "debate" as advertised, not even in the Q&A!

Through ISIL's Peace Institute website, you have clearly and explicitly aligned ISIL with the anti-war point of view. And moreover, as President of ISIL, you are responsible for the sidelining of the pro-defense point of view at a major international conference of libertarians.

I cried – I cried because I was experiencing the emotion of extreme frustration. I continued to cry for over a week afterwards, every time I thought of it. Can you imagine a person being appalled at how an unfair, undeserved attack on the reputation of a nation s/he respects, was carried on effectively in her name?

In response to others' similar objections, you wrote:

"Sorry about Dean. It wasn't so much the content, but his style [!] - which I found to be rather inflammatory. An equally powerful opponent who would have been able to counter his arguments would have been much better. And actually we tried to do that but we had a batch of last minute cancelations and we were left scrambling."

Actually, his style was not ranting. What I questioned was the content. Who were those other speakers with opposing viewpoints you say were previously scheduled and who canceled at the last minute? Seriously, I'd like to know; they could be used as future speakers. You had the opportunity to include at least one very knowledgeable opponent on the panel but didn't do so. Tim Starr, a well-known writer and self-defense proponent, had volunteered to be on the panel. Jim Elwood, your Vice President, told him that the subject was being, or had been discussed at a meeting. Why was Tim led to hope that he was going to be asked to join the panel right up until the time of the presentation?

Later that day, when I sat at the speaker's corners, I tearfully told the first speaker, an American citizen himself, that maybe I was old-fashioned, but that I was brought up to believe that when I went abroad, I was to be a proud representative of my country (the USA), and I felt that his whole presentation was anti-U.S. and that I was very upset. At this point, one girl at the table (from the Ukraine, I believe) also became tearful, as it was apparent she understood my reaction. I never thought that to participate an ISIL conference you had to check – not your guns – but your citizenship at the door!

It has become clear to me from this and other experiences that the world political spectrum has had a massive shakeup, such that not only left-right but even Libertarian-non-Libertarian is not currently as important as what, for lack of a better term, might be called the Hawk (or as I prefer, "Eagle") vs. Dove debate.

Lenin used to say of liberal-leftists, that they were "useful idiots."

Have you heard of the new term among some libertarians, "idiotarian" or "villepinism?" Idiotarians or villepinists are those people who systematically side with evil without themselves adopting the evildoers' objectives. Villepinists sneer at what they consider "simplistic" flag-waving Americans, and their libertarian contingent are not exceptions. I consider my own sense of patriotism bound up with core libertarian principles: America's practice of, and cultural respect for, liberty, especially in comparison to the countries where our terrorist enemies breed. The U.S. cannot defend against every possible terrorist attack on U.S. soil, and must take their war on us, to them.

I believe that the villepinist branch of Libertarianism is going to die, and the sooner we step away from it, the better off we will be. It is important to libertarians who are in favor of victory over terrorism to promote their ideas, facilitating the evolution of those ideas into even better ideas. If we do not, people out there who would be open to our ideas will never find us, and that will not help the ideas develop.

When it is clear that it is going to be a constant uphill struggle to get one's ideas on the table in the organization, because in good faith, that organization's leaders/members are strongly opposed to that position and thus can't really do more than pay lip service to giving one's ideas a forum, then, without any need for personal rancor or hostility, it may well make the most sense to create a new focus for all those who might be interested in one's ideas. There is a good reason to strike out in a new organization – not to hurt the old organization or brand anyone evil, but, by offering people a choice, to facilitate the full and open competition of ideas that will lead to the growth of knowledge. If being true to anti-idiotarian libertarianism means we are initially a small movement, well, so be it. But if we do not step away we will never grow, because others who feel like us will not be able to find us. We have to speak out.

If ISIL is to flourish, then it should be a coalition of hawks and doves, Americans and non-Americans, men and women. To cut off one polarity would not be the act of a world-wide freedom movement. I hope and expect that ISIL will publish an opposing article in the FNN newsletter, and have real foreign policy debates at future conferences.

Very truly yours,

Jeanie Kennedy, MBA
Director, Free Exchange
A San Francisco Supper Club
Dedicated to Secular Individualism

Fri, 08/15/2003 - 17:24 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Thanks for this!

I've found myself distancing from the libertarian organizations, because of the anti-Bush and anti-Iraq and anti-defense ideas they are wholeheartedly embracing. Thanks for letting me know that I am not alone.

by a reader on Sat, 08/16/2003 - 16:21 | reply

To Sarah, David, and et al,

Do you really think that no one feels a similar sense of betrayal from your position on the war?

by a reader on Sat, 08/16/2003 - 16:55 | reply

A sense of betrayal

Speaking for myself, I see no indication that anyone has betrayed anyone in this matter. Libertarians have always held diverse views about all sorts of issues, and one of them has always been the issue of war, its causes, and its morality. Recent events such as the 9-11 attack have caused many people on all sides of this issue to elevate its priority in their minds, and to devote more effort to arguing for their side. This raises a purely practical problem, not only for Libertarians but for all sorts of movements and organisations, of whether the movement or organisation as a whole should take a position on the war (in which case, members who take the opposite view have to choose whether to continue to identify themselves as supporters of that group or to support or form rival groups), or not (in which case the organisation chooses to refrain from influencing a debate which, both sides agree, now has increased importance and urgency).

There already are many different organisations and movements that are broadly in the libertarian camp. Being separate means, among other things, that they have the flexibility to oppose each other on some issues, while remaining allies on others. Organisations split all the time, and merge all the time, for perfectly sound and decent reasons: betrayal seldom comes into it.

So if anyone feels betrayed at the line being taken by Jeanie Kennedy (or for that matter by Vince Miller), or by us at Setting the World to Rights, I think they are making a serious mistake. I would remind them that libertarians, like rational people generally, do not claim jurisdiction over each other's opinions. As for betrayal, I would direct them to our series On Loyalty.

by David Deutsch on Sat, 08/16/2003 - 17:39 | reply

Anonymous Coward response

Interesting that a person suggesting Sarah and David have betrayed the Libertarian cause would choose to remain anonymous. Why not come out and write under your own name? What are you afraid of?

John Frank

by a reader on Sat, 08/16/2003 - 20:34 | reply

So not all 'Libertarians' are bad then

I must admit, I have a problem with so-called 'Libertarians'. They talk a lot about freedom but when it comes down to it they are a bunch of hypocrites. I was therefore pleased to read Ms Kennedy's Open Letter as it clearly distinguishes the sad and sorry dross of 'Liberia' from the Libertarians who are busy Setting The World to Rights. I wish you well and look forward to seeing how this plays out in the world at large.

- David Anderson

by a reader on Sat, 08/16/2003 - 20:42 | reply

Perhaps betrayal was the wrong word.....

I agree that no such betrayal took place. Feeling a sense of betrayal is not the same as actually being betrayed.

However, as someone who has a fairly high regard for the TCS philosophy, I find it very disappointing that many of the people advocating TCS would take a pro-war position. (Based on what I consider shoddy arguments)

The "Open Letter" conveys Jeanie Kennedy's disappointment with the ISIL.

I am disappointed with "The World".

My comment was just a reminder that those living in glass houses might want to do something more productive than throw stones.

P.S. I was not "suggesting Sarah and David have betrayed the Libertarian cause".

by a reader on Sat, 08/16/2003 - 22:39 | reply

The First Use of the Word, Betrayal

The first use of the word "betrayal" was in a reader's comment, wherein he wrote, "Do you really think that no one feels a similar sense of betrayal from your position on the war?" Betrayal was not a word used in the entirety of my letter. The writer was attributing or projecting his own feelings of betrayal onto me, and/or Sarah and/or David.

Toward a civil society,

Jeanie Kennedy, MBA
Director of Free Exchange
A San Francisco Supper Club

by jeanie kennedy on Sun, 08/17/2003 - 23:01 | reply

Seen the first of the presentation too

That was in Switzerland with many pro-war libertarians...

Unfortunately we did not have the time to debate it. This is the kind of stuff we expect from our ideological enemies: caricature, logical fallacies, narrow view of the world... The kind of presentation also is prone to caricature: you can not sum up all the arguments in some of kind of "humorous dialog" (whatever that was).

I'm glad someone writes about it, and I'll send your letter to people who felt the same in Switzerland.

by liberte on Mon, 08/18/2003 - 08:02 | reply

Libertarianism is anti-war. J...

Libertarianism is anti-war. Just admit you are neocons you fascist dogs!

by a reader on Mon, 08/18/2003 - 13:14 | reply

Essentialism is an error...

...It consists of a cluster of theories and practices which deflect discourse from matters of truth and falsity, or whether to pursue this policy or that, into arguments about the meaning of terms. This converts substantial problems into merely verbal ones...

<http://www.the-rathouse.com/popessent.html>

by Editor on Mon, 08/18/2003 - 13:54 | reply

Damn, foiled again!

A reader wrote:

"Libertarianism is anti-war. Just admit you are neocons you fascist dogs!"

Dammit, he's got us there! (Sarcasm on) To be honest I never really backed war on Iraq to liberate a country under a Stalinist tyrant, or to stop Saddam from rearming and going to war, or to remove a source of backing for international terrorism, I'd just run out of red paint and wanted the blood of Iraqi children to paint the walls of my house. (sarcasm off)

by Alan Forrester on Tue, 08/19/2003 - 01:35 | reply

lol, this is kinda funny. It...

lol, this is kinda funny. It seems like another case of people agreeing with each other, and then building respect for each other based on that agreement, then disagreeing with each other. Some know how to deal with that disagreement, others do not.

If anything it's the indication of healthy minds who think for themselves, even if they are sometimes "wrong." I'd be worried if everyone had the same feelings and thoughts on the war, Bush, and all those other things.

by entivore on Tue, 08/19/2003 - 05:30 | reply

Collectivist Thinking and Criminal Gangs

Jeanie Kennedy tells us that "I was brought up to believe that when I went abroad, I was to be a proud representative of my country (the USA)." Many of us were, Jeanie. Later, some of us grew up, cast aside collectivist thinking, and realized that we are individuals and don't "represent" anything but ourselves. It is unfortunate but true that the world has been divided up into geographical areas dominated by gangs of criminals who call themselves "the government." If I were to travel abroad and hear someone ridiculing or demeaning the criminals who dominate the area of the world in which I live, I would not cry; I would cheer.

by a reader on Fri, 08/22/2003 - 01:39 | reply

Collectivist Anti-Government "Thinking"

A Reader criticizes Jeanie Kennedy for saying: "I was brought up to believe that when I went abroad, I was to be a proud representative of my country (the USA)."

The reader accuses her of being insufficiently individualistic for supporting "the gang of criminals" dominating her geographical area. But Kennedy made it explicitly clear that: "I consider my own sense of patriotism bound up with core libertarian principles: America's practice of, and cultural respect for, liberty, especially in comparison to the countries where our terrorist enemies breed." She is clearly supporting those aspects of her government that reflect her highest political values, rather than a reflexive support for whatever policies they happen to have.

This is consistent with individualism.

On the other hand, the reader summarizes:

If I were to travel abroad and hear someone ridiculing or demeaning the criminals who dominate the area of the world in which I live, I would not cry; I would cheer.

The reader's opposition to his government seems to be independent of its policies. He has not used his independent judgment about the merits of its policies, but has aligned himself with the collective of government-haters who do not think for themselves about the merits of the policies.

Pot - Kettle

Gil

by Gil on Fri, 08/22/2003 - 17:14 | reply

yay gil exactly right

-- Elliot Temple

<http://curi.blogspot.com/>

by Elliot Temple on Fri, 08/22/2003 - 18:55 | reply

Government Is an Extortion Racket

If a criminal gang extorts my wealth with threats of violence and incarceration, then, no, I don't care what use that criminal gang makes of the money it extorted. I realize that much of it is used to buy the votes and support of dimwitted sheep, by spending it to advance causes they approve of. Perhaps "Gil" is one of these dimwitted sheep?

by a reader on Fri, 08/22/2003 - 21:42 | reply

Separate Issues

I agree with the reader that government funding via compulsory taxation is immoral. And I can assure him that my vote has never been purchased by any politician.

But it seems that even "dimwitted sheep" have a greater capacity than he does to separate issues. While I object to my money being extorted, I am not indifferent to that money being used to save my life vs. to gas my neighbors. The reader's apparent indifference between these possibilities strikes me as quite troubling.

Gil

by Gil on Fri, 08/22/2003 - 23:50 | reply

irony

i've said in the past, and Gil is well aware of this I'm sure, that one of the rifts among libertarians goes something like: they all see the truth in the statement "taxes are theft". that's what makes them libertarians. but the difference is, some libertarians don't know anything else (and some do). i think it's ironic you would repeat The One Truth at me...

-- Elliot Temple

<http://curi.blogspot.com/>

by Elliot Temple on Sat, 08/23/2003 - 00:02 | reply

".....where our terrorist enemies breed."

They breed in our schools (Dylan Klebold & Eric Harris), our universities (Theodore Kaczynski) and our military (Timothy McVeigh) Who will be the next Timothy McVeigh to come out of this gulf war?

by a reader on Sat, 08/23/2003 - 03:48 | reply

Government & the Mafia

"Gil" and his cheerleader "Elliot" are much impressed that the gang of criminals that extorted their wealth is now using that wealth to "save their lives." This is particularly amusing in light of the fact that, as with the extortion racket run by the Mafia, those who create and sustain the threat to their victims' lives are the very same extortionists who are running the racket. Truly, human gullibility knows no bounds.

by a reader on Mon, 08/25/2003 - 07:06 | reply

Gullibility

It would be convenient for anti-government ideology if it were true that all security threats were caused by those (the government) who extort money for security protection.

Convenience and ideological dogmatism seem sufficient to control the reader's interpretation of the facts of reality.

My standards are a bit higher, and I recognize threats to liberty that are unrelated to government activity.

Gil

by Gil on Mon, 08/25/2003 - 16:43 | reply

Gullibility 2

And another thing...

Even if it were the case (which it isn't!) that all of our security woes were caused by actions of the government, it would still not follow that the government should immediately cease all of its activities, or that one of its recent activities wasn't the best possible thing for us (or, at least, good).

It's good to think about what the best possible political system would be. And, I agree that this ideal involves a severely-limited, or perhaps non-existent government (as we know it).

But it's bad to confuse that with the notion that the best possible first step towards that ideal is to press the stop-all-government-activity-now-button, or to condemn everything government has done. Such notions lead people to the correct conclusion that the holder is ridiculous.

Convincing people that advocates of liberty are ridiculous is another bad first step.

Gil

by Gil on Mon, 08/25/2003 - 19:54 | reply

Gullibility

One of the later installments of this series will be about the conspiracy theorists' belief that non-conspiracy-theorists are gullible.

by Editor on Mon, 08/25/2003 - 23:20 | reply

more on the criminal gang and separating issues

The U.S Government...

Extracts (steals) over 20% of the nation's wealth, and uses its state and municipal tentacles -- which it essentially, by this point, controls -- to steal another 30% of everything we earn.

It intrudes in every aspect of our personal and financial lives. It tells us the nature of what we can ingest, read, and of the structures in which we live, work, and defecate.

It takes people rightfully and constitutionally pursuing their own happiness and puts them in cages, in greater numbers and for longer durations than murders and rapists.

It once gassed, burned and machinegunned to death 80 innocent people, in violation of nearly the entire Bill of Rights, covered up the truth, and commended those responsible for the mass slaughter.

It once handed over to Stalin two million innocent refugees to be murdered. Two million. That's more than Saddam. That's Pol Pot proportions.

What's its record been in the War on Terrorism?

9/11 happened because of government inadequacy and criminality. The FBI's incompetence in responding to warning signs, and the U.S. government's illegal deprivation of the essential human right of Americans to arm themselves on airplanes caused 9/11 -- regardless of whether the attacks were motivated by America's imperialist foreign policy, or by America's alleged surplus of freedom and Western values.

Thousands were killed in Afghanistan, but bin Laden wasn't found.

Thousands were killed in Iraq, but Saddam and his weapons weren't found.

Americans are being killed there to this day.

The airports have become great places for sexual abuse on the part of security personnel, evacuations happen often over the stupidest things, and terrorists can still bring weapons on planes -- but the pilots and passengers who would want to practice their inalienable right to do so openly can't.

Are you more likely to die from a terrorist attack, or the FDA depriving you of your medicine? Who's really a bigger threat to your life?

Everything the government does might not be wrong or bad according to some odd neoObjectivist definition. But everything it does, so long as it is funded by taxation and applied through the initiation of force, is immoral.

All else aside, it is contradictory for libertarians or Objectivists to advocate war as it exists today, because doing so is advocating the forceful exaction of property from their neighbors for purposes considered inimical by those very people. You can believe that not everything the government does is bad, but you cannot, under libertarian constraints, support the imposition of these policies on your fellow libertarians, whether you consider them idiots or not. If the policies themselves necessitate the use of heavy involuntary funding, which they do, then those policies are inescapably in conflict with the very core of libertarian principles. You can't separate the issues any more than you can separate the intentions of the welfare state from its methods, or the legitimacy of Saddam's 100% election results from the brutal tactics he used to acquire them.

by a reader on Thu, 08/28/2003 - 15:51 | reply

Separating Issues

Ok, let me get this straight.

Should I oppose police investigating burglaries and assaults and murders (and arresting the perpetrators) because they are funded by taxes and because gun control made it harder for individuals to defend themselves?

If not, why should I oppose military actions I judge to be reasonable attempts to use those resources to protect liberty?

Doesn't it make sense to approve of these things, while at the same time advocating changes that increase individual liberty?

Gil

by Gil on Thu, 08/28/2003 - 16:52 | reply

Police investigations and war

Saying something like "should I oppose police investigating burglaries," much like saying "should I oppose the military defending the U.S.", misses the point.

The police don't simply investigate burglaries. They brutalize people, disarm innocents, and cause more crime than they deter. The military, or more accurately the civilian chickenhawks who control them, doesn't just defend the United States. Military action blows children to bits, incites terrorism and causes more problems than it solves.

I support a free market in the industry of justice and a volunteer militia to defend the United States. We would have far less crime and fewer wars and more freedom if this were the case.

That being said, I admit we don't live in an anarcho-capitalist society. I admit we have a government and as libertarians we should ask practical questions as to what's appropriate for them to do and what isn't.

If the government can do something that could be done in a libertarian society, maybe it's appropriate. If, for instance, China invaded us, I would support the military defending us. But I still think that would be better done by an armed, vigilant populace than by a bureaucratic socialist institution like the U.S. military. Everyone would be willing to defend his own home, so there wouldn't be much of a conflict.

An aggressive war on Iraq, like what was last executed, could not have, and would not have, been initiated by the private sector, or by voluntary action. If the slight majority of Americans who supported the war tried to do it on their own, it would have cost them way too much, they would have looked into its true costs and benefits more carefully, and I doubt it would have happened. Wars like the last one happen only because the system privatizes the benefits and socializes the costs. I very much doubt even the most hawkish warmongers I've talked to would have wanted to contribute a thousand dollars each to disarm Saddam, hiring a firm with the reputation of the U.S. government to get the job done. I do think they would -- as would almost every peacenik I've talked with -- do whatever it took to defend their home and country against invasion.

Whereas socialists like to say that those things that the private sector can't or won't do must be done by the state, principled libertarians should only rely on government actions that the private sector would do, but can't because the state won't allow it to. Like investigating crimes and delivering mail -- two things that would happen in anarchy, but we must depend on the government for because it has declared a monopoly in those areas.

Another thing: The police already "investigate" crime. But if they didn't, I certainly would never advocate that the government take on that new function. Libertarians should be careful not to blindly call all past government action fascist, I agree. The U.S. government's horrific record stands alone without need of hyperbole.

But we should also never advocate a new government activity, program, or function. We should never support the government in taking on more power, authority, and responsibility.

by a reader on Thu, 08/28/2003 - 18:44 | reply

Lack of Freedom Breeds Terrorism

Yes, terrorists "breed" in US government schools, which are among the least free institutions within the USA (there haven't been any shootings in non-government schools in America). That is a good argument against those institutions being so unfree, not an argument that the USA is no freer than Afghanistan under the Taliban, Iraq under Saddam, etc.

McVeigh's terrorism was not "bred" into him while he was in the U.S. Army, as he didn't take up terrorism until he was well out of the service. John Allen Mohammed, one of the two beltway snipers, was honorably discharged from the Army because he was suspected of sabotage during Gulf War I but the charges against him could be proved. It's hard to say that the Army actually "bred" terrorism in him, when it inflicted the maximum penalty it could upon him for his anti-US activities. The same goes for the American Muslim who was in the US Army Rangers and murdered some of his fellow Rangers while they were stationed in Kuwait right before Gulf War II. He had expressed reservations about being sent into Iraq to kill his fellow Muslims, so he was relieved of that duty. He then went on to murder some of his fellow Rangers, anyways. He clearly didn't get his motivation to engage in this act of terrorism from the U.S. Army.

Not only is this anonymous coward engaging in a vile equivocation between the relatively high level of freedom in America and that of Taliban-Afghanistan, Saddamite-Iraq, Syria, Iran, etc., he is also grossly equivocating between a few isolated Americans who commit terrorist acts against their fellow Americans entirely of their own initiative, and countries which actively recruit, fund, train, equip, and dispatch terrorists against Americans. That is the sort of country that Iraq was under Saddam, that Afghanistan was under the Taliban, that Pakistan was until Musharraf started cleaning house, and that Iran and Syria still are.

America does not have a "breeding" program for terrorists. There are no US government agencies recruiting, funding, training, equipping, and dispatching people to engage in secret attacks upon innocent civilians in other countries. Yes, we do have covert and clandestine operations through the CIA and the Special Operations Command of the U.S. military, but they don't target innocent civilians. Yes, some innocent civilians do inevitably get killed when the US attacks some legitimate military targets, but the US tries to avoid such collateral damage as much as reasonably possible.

That is totally different, morally, from governments which breed terrorists for the primary purpose of sneak attacks upon innocent civilians.

by timstarr on Fri, 08/29/2003 - 19:48 | reply

terrorist breeding in America

"There are no US government agencies recruiting, funding, training, equipping, and dispatching people to engage in secret attacks upon innocent civilians in other countries. "

What about the Western Hemisphere Institute for Security Cooperation, formerly known as the School of the Americas? The attacks they encourage might not be secret, but they are specifically against civilians.

by a reader on Sat, 08/30/2003 - 00:21 | reply

School Freedom

Yes, terrorists "breed" in US government schools, which are among the least free institutions within the USA (there haven't been any shootings in non-government schools in America). That is a good argument against those institutions being so unfree, not an argument that the USA is no freer than Afghanistan under the Taliban, Iraq under Saddam, etc. Are you seriously arguing that students in most private schools are freer than students in most public schools?

~Woty
<http://woty.davidsj.com>

by Woty on Sat, 08/30/2003 - 10:14 | reply

Missing the point

timstar misses the point. There are people willing to kill him (and anyone else reading this) just as readily in the U.S. as there are in the Muslim world. There are people in all parts of the world willing to embrace ideologies that tell them they are justified in taking terrorist actions. It is more important to understand and refute these ideologies and the psychological roles they play in people lives than it is to wage a military campaign within a certain geographic area.

by a reader on Sat, 08/30/2003 - 15:36 | reply

Soon to be missing in action? I hope not.

A reader writes: "It is more important to understand and refute these ideologies..." So you'll be going to Iran or Saudi Arabia to refute militant Islam? Thanks so much. And it's been nice knowing you.

Six months ago, your plight in attempting such a mission was no better in Iraq, a country then ruled by a Stalinist tyrant whose flag bore the words "God is great" in his handwriting. Your odds of survival are considerably better now, and improving. But to get to this situation it was necessary "to wage a military campaign."

by Alan Furman on Sat, 08/30/2003 - 18:31 | reply

Students Are Freer in Private Schools

Yes, students in private schools are freer than students in public schools. There is a lot of choice in private schools to attend, while there is virtually no choice in public schools to attend.

by timstarr on Sat, 08/30/2003 - 18:34 | reply

No Substitute for Victory

Yes, there are "people willing to kill" me in the US as well as in the rest of the world. The difference is that those in the U.S. do not have State sponsorship, and thus have considerably less resources with which to try to kill me. Not only is the U.S. government not sponsoring them those who wish to kill me, it is trying to stop them from killing me.

As for whether it is "more important to understand and refute" terrorist ideologies, I have yet to hear of a terrorist attack that was stopped by a refutation. "Excuse me, Mr. Terrorist, but the theory you're enacting by mass-murdering innocent civilians is false." "Oh, it is? Well, I guess I'll just have to quit, then."

It is important to understand and refute terrorist ideologies, but understanding and refutation are no substitute for military defeat of terrorists. If anything, their military defeat is a form of refutation of them, since their ideas include the prediction that they will not be defeated militarily.

by timstarr on Sat, 08/30/2003 - 18:42 | reply

WHISC/SOA Doesn't Teach Attacks on Civilians

The notion that the WHISC/SOA "encourages" attacks on civilians is a myth of the anti-American Left, with no truth in it whatsoever. The closest it comes to having a factual basis is that some of the Latin American soldiers who took classes (in things like radio operations) at the SOA were later implicated in attacks on civilians. However, the curriculum at that school does not teach that it is acceptable to make civilians primary targets; quite the opposite, respect for the rights of non-combatants is taught at that school.

by timstarr on Sat, 08/30/2003 - 18:47 | reply

Change of motto

Re: "Soon to be missing in action?" & "No Substitute for Victory"

So perhaps the motto of this web site should be changed to: "Bullets have consequences, ideas really don't matter" or "Ideas have consequences, but bullets have better ones."

By the way what ideologies are being introducing to Afganistan and Iraq by the U.S. forces? Non-militant Islam? Christianity ? The philosophies of Popper? or Plato? or Hegel? or Nietzsche?

I have seen more evidence that Americans are adopting Afgani culture than the other way around.

e.g.: <http://www.hamptonroads.com/pilotonline/military/ml0728fol.html>

by a reader on Sun, 08/31/2003 - 03:54 | reply

Re: No Substitute for Victory

It is important to understand and refute terrorist ideologies, but understanding and refutation are no substitute for military defeat of terrorists. If anything, their military defeat is a form of refutation of them, since their ideas include the prediction that they will not be defeated militarily.

This is a very important point. And here are two further aspects of that form of refutation:

- Often their ideas include the prediction that the West, because of various attributes that they think (mostly erroneously but to some extent accurately) that it must have, will not seriously attempt to defeat them militarily. So the attempt itself, once it is seen to be serious, already has some persuasive effect.
- The war against the West can be seen as an attempt to refute the idea that the Western way of life (with its unique ability to make progress peacefully and resolve moral differences through persuasion) is viable. by introducing cynicism and defeatism into the West's political decision making. Again, a serious attempt to fight back vitiates this attempted refutation.

And to 'a reader' who wants to change our motto: it was not the Americans who introduced bullets into the debate between the West and radical Islam, but yes, sometimes events can refute an idea. Sometimes only events can. This should not be news to anyone.

by Editor on Sun, 08/31/2003 - 04:20 | reply

Ideas do have consequences

Like, the idea that you can get American foreign policy to become more favorable to you if you blow up large buildings containing Americans has had a lot of consequences. First, for Americans, and later, for some of the evil bastards who believed that idea. Until that idea is thoroughly refuted though, more Americans will die, but argument alone can't refute it. With an idea like that, you can argue till the cows come home, but the only way to actually refute it is to demonstrate in practice that it is very very false.

by a reader on Sun, 08/31/2003 - 04:48 | reply

Re: Ideas do have consequences

Do you really think the terrorist were trying to change American foreign policy? I think the payoff for the terrorist was to themselves i.e.: That they could see themselves as heroic and virtuous by striking a blow against "the great satan"

by a reader on Sun, 08/31/2003 - 15:59 | reply

Re: Re: No Substitute for Victory

So wouldn't an H-bomb on Mecca or Bagdad or Kabul be a much better refutation of their theory than a conventional war?

by a reader on Sun, 08/31/2003 - 16:19 | reply

So?

Yes, students in private schools are freer than students in public schools. There is a lot of choice in private schools to attend, while there is virtually no choice in public schools to attend.

This means that private schools are potentially freer, because parents can choose free environments for their kids. It does not mean that the kids who are sent to unfree schools by their parents are any freer.

So I ask again: are you seriously arguing that students who are sent to private schools by their parents are generally freer than students sent to public schools by their parents?

~Woty
<http://woty.davidsj.com>

by Woty on Sun, 08/31/2003 - 19:28 | reply

Al Qaeda's Fantasy Ideology

You're definitely on the right track with the idea that 9-11 was done by the Islamofascists for themselves. I refer you to the article on the right side of this webpage, the first one just under the heading, "Off-Site." It was written by Lee Harris of the Hoover Institution. Mr. Harris says, much more eloquently than I do here, that the 9-11 perpetrators were not out to change our foreign policy, or our government, only to essentially have a morality play for themselves. He points out that this fact does not make these people any less dangerous, however.

I would also like to refer everyone to a great, fairly short article by the heroic Thomas Sowell entitled, "A Tale of Two Wars and their 'Fifth Column' Enemies," which can be found at the following link: <http://groups.yahoo.com/group/fightforliberty/message/25>. Mr. Sowell's perspective, which I respect immensely, is that the current situation regarding The War on Terror is the greatest crisis America has ever faced.

Toward a civil society,
Jeanie Kennedy
Director, Free Exchange
A San Francisco Supper Club
Dedicated to Secular Individualism

by a reader on Sun, 08/31/2003 - 22:20 | reply

Thomas Sowell article

For those who don't want to join the Yahoo group to read the Thomas Sowell article referenced above, it can also be found here:

<http://www.townhall.com/columnists/thomassowell/ts20030821.shtml>

Gil

by Gil on Sun, 08/31/2003 - 22:48 | reply

Americans Becoming Afghanized?

Funny, the only evidence you cite of Americans "adopting Afgani [sic] culture" is that a couple of soldiers killed their wives, then themselves, as if it were somehow uniquely Afghan for husbands to kill their wives, and as if it were unheard of for Americans to kill their wives before we overthrew the Taliban. That's both insulting to Afghans, and unrealistic about the rest of the world. Unfortunately, murderers exist in all societies.

As for what ideas are being introduced to Afghanistan and Iraq, how about the ideas of freedom of speech, freedom of education, freedom for women to not wear burkhas in public, freedom for women to work outside the home, etc.?

by a reader on Mon, 09/01/2003 - 02:04 | reply

BBC Sexes up Another Story?

According to the urban-legends analysis experts Snopes:

It is a common belief that the number of conceptions increases during natural disasters or crises that keep people confined within their homes for unexpectedly long periods of times. Nine months after such events — blackouts, blizzards, earthquakes, erupting volcanoes, ice storms, and even strikes by professional football players — reports about "baby booms" in local hospitals invariably appear in the media. However, these "booms" always turn out to be nothing more than natural fluctuations in the birth rate (or, in many cases, no variation in the birth rate at all).

In particular, the story, widely believed and cited as fact, that there was a 'baby boom' nine months after the great blackout of 1965, is false:

Despite initial reports of New York City hospitals' seeing a dramatic increase in the number of births nine months after the 1965 blackout, later analyses showed the birth rate during that period to be well within the norm.

A series of three articles appearing in The New York Times from August 10-12 in 1966 reported larger-than-average numbers of births at several area hospitals, leading many to declare that the ten-hour overnight blackout the city experienced nine months earlier had led to an unusually high number of conceptions that evening. As often happens, however, people formed predetermined conclusions and then tried to fit the data to them. The birth rate nine months after the blackout did not show a statistically significant difference from the rate of birth recorded during the same period in any of the five previous years.

Earlier today a BBC journalist (if we were adopting the BBC's standards, we should say 'journalist'), Nick Bryant, stated in a BBC News 24 report from New York:

The only talk of boom here is the baby variety. During the last blackout in the 1970s, there was a spike in the birth rate.

Should we believe him? Did he check the story with hospital records? Did he make it up? Did he confuse the 1977 blackout with the 1965 one and fail to check whether it was true?

Is it really true that no one in New York is talking of an economic boom ahead, but only a baby boom? Or is this just gratuitous, spiteful, anti-American wishful thinking?

We just don't know. This is what happens when a news organisation squanders its reputation for getting the facts right.

Presumably this is the same Nick Bryant who recently accused the US Government of "richly embroidering" the Jessica Lynch story.

And we know that this is the same BBC that is currently in disgrace with everyone who cares about standards in journalism and in public service.

Sun, 08/17/2003 - 02:19 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

BBC baby bilge

Forgive me for sounding like a frowsty old crab, but I almost found the not noticeably credible "blackout baby boom" item from the BBC WORSE than the Dr. Kelly scandal. I'm an ex-UK newspaper hack, living in the US, and generally keeping a worried eye on the Beeb as it snaps and foams at the US. This story wouldn't have got past a semi-competent provincial newspaper news editor twenty bloody years ago. "Great idea" - pause, wry smile "but does it stand up?". Chastened reporter goes off to check. Don't they do this anymore?

by a reader on Mon, 08/18/2003 - 16:48 | reply

We're Doomed, Doomed I Tell You!

The venerable left-wing group The Fabian Society has released a report saying that unless a worldwide superstate intervenes to impose stern but fair limits on consumption we will drown in our own filth. Okay, we're paraphrasing slightly:

And acting locally - perhaps by recycling that drinks can or buying locally-grown produce - has little effect unless governments do better at acting globally, says the report's author, Roger Levett. "Individual actions can't make a difference without a regulatory framework to underpin the good done."

In typical anticapitalist style, the Fabian Society blames markets for this 'crisis':

One problem is that economic growth is taken as a key measure of policy success and of a country's development. Instead the priority should be sustainability. "Markets are superb at setting prices, but incapable of recognising costs."

Oh dear, it seems that there is a lot that Fabians are incapable of recognising. One of the key mistakes underlying both environmentalism and socialism is perfectly showcased by this worthless warning, namely the idea that there is such a thing as a 'resource' that is independent of our knowledge about the world. As long as our knowledge about how to make use of the world around us continues to increase so will our "resources". If it should ever cease to grow, then, not to put too fine a point on it, regardless of how earnestly we recycle or how firmly we regulate or how deeply we trust the Fabians and the Government to Know Best - we're doomed.

Tue, 08/19/2003 - 15:25 | permalink

You're forgetting something h...

You're forgetting something here. You don't have to have fixed resources to believe you'll run out. If you are using resources faster than you can discover new ones, you'll run out. Running out isn't good as a general rule. Conservation reduces the consumption of the resources we know about, increasing the amount of time they'll last. More time = greater chances of finding new resources before running out. You seem to not be considering this in your logic, which would make it flawed.

What's concerning a lot of people is the numbers. Higher consumption means greater chances of not finding new solutions in time. Human creativity isn't automagical, and you can't always create new things as you need em. It is very much possible to overdo it and poison yourself or use up all of a resource. Whether there is a significant risk of that at this time is arbitrary, but it's certainly not unreasonable to suspect it.

by entivore on Tue, 08/19/2003 - 17:41 | reply

Not forgetting

'You're forgetting something here. You don't have to have fixed resources to believe you'll run out.'

I would be extremely surprised if the Fabians didn't believe in fixed resources.

'If you are using resources faster than you can discover new ones, you'll run out. Running out isn't good as a general rule. Conservation reduces the consumption of the resources we know about, increasing the amount of time they'll last. More time = greater chances of finding new resources before running out. You seem to not be considering this in your logic, which would make it flawed.'

It's possible this is happening but I don't think it's true and anyway the post isn't about that, it's about what the Fabians think.

Also, higher consumption doesn't necessarily mean running out sooner since the resources don't just spiral down a black hole but are used to keep people as satisfied with their lives as possible so that they can come up with new ideas. Not buying little Jonny a new Nintendo or whatever could be the very thing that prevents him from coming up with a new scientific advance to save the world.

Also, government regulated recycling, as opposed to free market recycling, would suck.

by Alan Forrester on Wed, 08/20/2003 - 00:50 | reply

resources

In a free market, any increase in scarcity of resources will raise their price relative to other things, leading spontaneously to recycling, conservation, use of substitutes, etc. (since the higher prices will make such measures economically rational) and increasing the amount of wealth spent on finding/creating more of the resource in question. No hand-wringing, statist intervention, guilt-tripping, or soapbox evangelizing required.: -)

The restrictions/regulations/costs most often proposed in the name of "conserving scarce resources" or "avoiding (questionable) environmental risks" are also likely to throw up roadblocks in the way of long-term solutions, by restricting the creation of wealth and limiting what can be done with it.

by bk_2112 on Wed, 08/20/2003 - 01:20 | reply

While it is true that scarcit...

While it is true that scarcity of resources will raise their relative price, leading to all that you say, often there are unpredictable spikes in demand or cuts in supply that become more dangerous as the resource nears it's full usage capacity. When it happens to food, we call it a famine, but it can happen to other resources as well. Even if flat out using up a resource without finding another is unlikely to occur, being "maxed out" raises the chances of a sudden blow to supply or spike in demand causing problems.

As far as this post being about the Fabians, I dunno anything about them. However your original post very much appears to attribute the flaw to environmentalism in general. Well anyway, I definantly agree about the government thing. They pretty much can't do anything in an efficient manner. Of course that's not surprising because of all the politics.

by entivore on Wed, 08/20/2003 - 20:10 | reply

Statism makes it better?

'While it is true that scarcity of resources will raise their relative price, leading to all that you say, often there are unpredictable spikes in demand or cuts in supply that become more dangerous as the resource nears it's full usage capacity. When it happens to food, we call it a famine, but it can happen to other resources as well. Even if flat out using up a resource without finding another is unlikely to occur, being "maxed out" raises the chances of a sudden blow to supply or spike in demand causing problems.'

A more poorly coordinated state run system will only exacerbate the problem.

by a reader on Wed, 09/24/2003 - 22:32 | reply

Conspiracy Theories – 2: Lying About Motives

Here's a fairly classic conspiracy theory. It is that the Bush Administration's foreign policy is part of a plot to impose Fascism on America. We don't especially recommend reading it (unless you are entertained by that sort of thing) but look at this passage:

I will examine exactly what the Bush Administration in fact stands for, which is in stark contrast to the claims of Bush's mindless chorus of fawning acolytes.

This "stark contrast" between the conspirators' purported motives and their real motives is at the heart of every political conspiracy theory. For if a conspiracy theory is to explain observed events in current affairs and history, the conspirators' hidden actions must somehow be translated into something significant and visible – a war, a major change in the law, the enrichment of some group and the impoverishment of another – which requires visible actions and efforts by large numbers of people. If, for whatever reason, the real objective of those efforts cannot be acknowledged openly, then many of those people must believe that they are furthering some different objective.

Now, consider a person who favours that ostensible objective and works towards it, but opposes the conspirators' true objective. Such a person is a dupe of the conspirators. Conspiracy theorists always believe in the existence of dupes because they see themselves as desperately warning them to open their eyes and see what would be "blinding ... in its clarity" if they did; but also, the alleged conspiracy itself usually depends on the cooperation of many dupes, such as journalists and political commentators ("Bush's mindless chorus of fawning acolytes") and soldiers and civil servants and of course ordinary voters.

It is in the interests of the conspirators to enlist as many dupes as possible. Every lie the conspirators tell, every secret meeting they hold, every secret decision they take and every secret message they share, incurs a risk of exposure. Therefore, the more dupes are willing to further the aims of the conspiracy without having to participate in the secret planning and without having to conceal their real reasons for supporting the plans, the safer the secret is. Also, the more dupes spontaneously work hard on the conspirators' behalf without wanting a payoff, the fewer real conspirators are needed to achieve the objective. And if there are spoils (there usually are!) the larger the share each conspirator will receive.

So there are lots of dupes. But the question arises: are there any politicians among them?

It is in the nature of conspiracy theories that there is no immediate way of telling. Since the conspiracy depends on the conspirators behaving, in public, exactly as if they were dupes, it must be true that any duped politicians would be behaving in public exactly as if they were conspirators: arguing for the policy, voting for it, trying to discredit its opponents, cutting deals to promote it and so on.

You can see where this is going, can't you? How high are the dupes allowed to rise? For all we know, even some of the highest-ranking Neo-Cons are dupes. Even some members of the Cabinet might be outside the Conspiracy and genuinely be motivated by the arguments and objectives they advance in public.

Could the President himself be a dupe? If he was lying about Iraqi weapons of mass destruction then he was a Conspirator, and of course nothing could ever prove that he wasn't. But there again, there is no evidence that he was lying.

The fact is, all supporters of the Administration's policy could be 'dupes' – or rather, honest holders of the opinions they purport to hold – and still behave exactly as we see them behave. In other words, if there were no conspiracy there at all, we'd never know.

Well, obviously.

And therefore, the conspiracy theory explains exactly nothing. Yet it appends layers of weirdness and complexity to the commonsense picture of the world. There is an unlimited supply of such (non-)explanations, all postulating invisible complexity and all contradicting each other. Even if one of them were true, it would be vanishingly unlikely that anyone would happen to hit on it by a method that was impervious to evidence.

That is one reason why, in practice, conspiracy theories are always false.

But there is also another, more important reason.

Part 3

Thu, 08/21/2003 - 13:51 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Conspirancys

The strangest Conspiracy i heard about 9/11 is:

A Ex-CIA agent in a Cave in Afghanistan was planning these atack with help of his world wide terror network El-Qaida. He was able to get VISA's for guys that where watched by the CIA. But there where no insider in the CIA. And sure no insiders in the US goverment.

Thats strange stuff, but with that theorie they started a WAR on afghanistan.

by a reader on Fri, 08/22/2003 - 17:19 | reply

Not so strange

-The "ex-CIA agent" in question did, after all, admit to the planning on a widely-broadcast videotape. So what's so strange about ascribing the conspiracy to him?

-Nobody ever said there were no insiders in the CIA and/or US government. Maybe there were. "No insiders" is not an essential part of the true conspiracy theory.

by a reader on Fri, 08/22/2003 - 17:31 | reply

we know who the paleos/social...

we know who the paleos/socialists are referring to with their theories...J-E-W-S.

by a reader on Fri, 08/22/2003 - 19:43 | reply

smile

that's spelled N-E-O-C-O-N now ;p

-- Elliot Temple

<http://curi.blogspot.com/>

by Elliot Temple on Fri, 08/22/2003 - 21:21 | reply

Theories

All such theories exist on a continuum, from the absurd, to the plausible, to the "official" view. (None of which may be true)

by a reader on Fri, 08/22/2003 - 22:38 | reply

Conspirancys

To blame the Jews or any other religion for this is nuts i think. But its clever to be critical about those who benefits most of those attacks, Some ppl with strong influence in the US goverment, ppl with strong influence in the CIA. Remember Operation Northwoods and what happend to the man that sopped it, mister John F. Kennedy. I think some company owners have to much influence on the US goverment and also links to some dubios middle east companys. Who benefits most of this attacks? Folow the Money. There are many ppl from difrent Nations and diffrent religions behind this. The Official is not true, so we have to keep searching the trueth, its out there folow the money

by a reader on Sat, 08/23/2003 - 00:50 | reply

mmmhhhhh

<http://www.ericblumrich.com/buddy.html>

by a reader on Sat, 08/23/2003 - 11:43 | reply

Keep open your eyes.

... for irrational conspiracy theories (but I repeat myself):

<http://www.conspiracyplanet.com/channel.cfm?channelid=89&contentid=481>

[Editor's Note:

Please don't post lengthy material in comments and especially not lengthy non-original material; please post links instead.]

by a reader on Sun, 08/24/2003 - 19:15 | reply

ok Links

http://www.unansweredquestions.org/images/Small_9-11_Chart.gif

by a reader on Sun, 08/24/2003 - 22:57 | reply

The Likelihood of an America Fascism

The author of the article referenced above is indeed mistaken that Bush is a Fascist. But there is no question that proto-fascist memes are ambient in American political culture and that these memes have been growing stronger for some time now. These memes are transmitted by the likes of Rush Limbaugh, Ann Coulter, the Freepers, Jerry Falwell etc. This article provides a sober assessment of the danger that is posed by these people and their memes and how that danger is all the greater post 9-11. As the author notes: "European fascism was a terrible thing. An American fascism, though, could very well devastate the world". It always pays to be vigilant. And it doesn't take a conspiracy for fascism to arise.

by a reader on Wed, 05/26/2004 - 05:41 | reply

Conspiracy theory (with a lot of prejudice)

I am not surprised to hear that in a recent newspaper poll 20% of Germans believe that the U.S. government may have sponsored the 9-11 attacks

In my view conspiracy theories are particularly popular between two classes of people. 1) Those who could be described as not very well informed (or 'clueless'), the sort of people that one expect to find in countries of the 'Less Developed World' –In Buenos Aires one of the top best selling (non fiction) title "Hitler Won the War" by the economist W. Graziano, describes how the events of September 11, were part of a plan hatched between President Bush and Bin Laden to take Control of the Globe - And 2) those well educated, like the Germans or the French who are too lazy to look beyond their own back yard and just react out of malice, envy and prejudice. To all of them the more grotesque the theory the more attractive turns out to be.

By South American reader

by a reader on Wed, 09/22/2004 - 02:13 | reply

This example isn't really a conspiracy theory

I can see calling it that, but it seems like a bit of a stretch.

Anyway, it is a misguided version of reality.

The goal of the US is not now and never has been spreading democracy, it is spreading capitalism.

Hence the CIA's participation is overthrowing democratically elected socialist South American leaders. Hence the fight against communism, which is an economic, not political system.

What we want is free markets, which has nothing to do with democracy.

In a democracy the people decide what happens in society.

In a market economy the market - IE those with money - decide what happens in society.

This is an example of the government saying one thing while having an ulterior motive - and the American people do buy it.

It is to the majority of Americans' advantage to go along with it, since our exploitation of other countries (NAFTA) means cheap goods. However, we are still more likely to support government actions if we believe it is an issue of "good vs evil" instead of "might makes right."

By the standards above what I wrote here might be considered a "conspiracy theory" but what is the conspiracy? Who are the conspirators?

A collective blind eye to the emperor's nakedness is not a conspiracy. That corporations have influence over government policy, or that they wish to maximize profits at all costs are not conspiracies.

Fascism is absolute control of individuals by government.

We are working towards an economic version of that.

The number of companies is reduced while their ties to government are increased. Economic freedom is the stated goal, and economic freedom means unrestricted power for those with the most money.

by Robert Paulson on Wed, 12/20/2006 - 17:22 | reply

Free exchange of ideas and goods

"What we want is free markets, which has nothing to do with democracy."

How can one exchange goods freely, if one cannot exchange ideas freely?

by a reader on Thu, 12/21/2006 - 00:30 | reply

Freedom, Capitalism, and Democracy

Mr. Paulson's remarks mistake the relationship between freedom, capitalism and democracy. He denies that free market (capitalism) is related to democracy. He even goes as far as saying that by spreading free markets, Americans are "working toward an economic version" of Fascism, which he defines as "absolute control of individuals by government." Now, how could free market be a version of government control? He believes that is so because in a free market those with money rule, and they control the government too. This last statement is what makes this theory a conspiracy theory, for to do so, those with money (the conspirators) have to rule without violating anyone's freedom in the market, which requires a vast and coordinated conspiracy, hidden motives, and many dupes.

In reality, capitalism is the necessary condition of freedom and liberal democracy and the rule of law is the best system we have come up with in order to realize and protect individual freedoms (including economic freedoms) in our societies. Even if all the US did was to spread free markets, she would be spreading an essential component of any democracy worthy of the name and more importantly freedom.

-- Cyrus Ferdowsi, <http://libiran.blogspot.com>

by Liberal Iranian on Thu, 12/28/2006 - 08:37 | reply

What Is Wrong With These People?

We don't mean the terrorists: we know what is wrong with them.
We mean the media.

Here's what happened in chronological order:

- The terrorist organization Hamas sent a suicide murderer to Israel to perpetrate one of the biggest and most vicious bombings that Israel has ever suffered. It killed eighteen innocent civilians on their way back from a Bar Mitzvah celebration, including five children. It maimed, blinded or scarred over a hundred more, about forty of them children.
- The Israel Defence Forces killed a senior Hamas leader and his two bodyguards.
- Hamas and the other terrorist organizations declared that in retaliation for this act, they are now ending their ceasefire.

The media reported the latter statement as fact:

- Reuters: Israel Kills Hamas Leader, Militants Abandon Truce
- BBC: Palestinian militants have called off their truce and vowed to take revenge for the killing by Israel of one of their leaders in Gaza.
- CNN: Palestinian militant groups Thursday declared an end to their temporary cease-fire with Israel shortly after a senior Hamas leader was killed in an Israeli missile attack in Gaza.
- Associated Press: Palestinian militants called off a tattered two-month-old truce on Thursday after an Israeli helicopter killed a senior Hamas political leader with a volley of missiles.

What could possibly make all these major news organisations (we could not find a single exception) think that blowing up a bus full of Jews isn't "breaking the cease fire"?

Fri, 08/22/2003 - 22:08 | permlink

No this time it was Sharons fault

After the Hamas and other terrorist organisations didnt attack israel anymore sharon didnt stop the attacks on the terrorist, so now they feel offended again, that was not very clever. Those terrorist belong death, but it was the wrong time. Both sides are wrong.

by a reader on Sat, 08/23/2003 - 01:23 | reply

Try Fox News...

...for a little bit better coverage. For example, they refuse to use the term "suicide bomber" and instead use "homicide bomber".

Pat

by Pat on Sat, 08/23/2003 - 04:32 | reply

Suicide or homicide?

'For example, they refuse to use the term "suicide bomber" and instead use "homicide bomber".'

Charles Johnson wrote in a recent post on LGF that suicide bomber is a better term and I agree with him (not that I want to get hung up, use whatever terms you like). Suicide bomber captures the strangely perverse nature of what the Islamonazis are doing. It isn't necessary for them to die in order to kill people they could just plant a bomb, walk away and blow it up safely from a good distance away. Instead they choose to destroy themselves as well. This is spectacularly perverse and evil in a way that just isn't captured by the term homicide bomber. It's a bit like calling the kamikazes fighter pilots. Lastly, it is important for the War on Terror to understand that Islamic terrorists are willing to destroy themselves, we can't afford to think 'no they wouldn't do that cause they'd be killed too,' when contemplating some heinous act the fact is they would do precisely that and worse if at all possible.

by Alan Forrester on Sat, 08/23/2003 - 13:22 | reply

Even Ha'aretz did it

" Hamas ends hudna after assassination"

by a reader on Sat, 08/23/2003 - 22:40 | reply

Re: Try Fox News...

Pat:

Fox News picked up the Associated Press story, including the passage we quoted above:

<http://www.foxnews.com/story/0,2933,95303,00.html>.

by Editor on Sat, 08/23/2003 - 22:47 | reply

I know, I know...

I didn't claim that they were perfect, I just said "...for a little bit better coverage."

I just got back from visiting my right-wing in-laws in Isreal and they refused to watch CNN, whereas they could at least tolerate Fox News. As I said, it is a little bit better.

Pat

by Pat on Sun, 08/24/2003 - 01:31 | reply

what to call them

i like suicide murderer myself. i think it better captures the idea they are evil murdering fucks, while keeping the suicide aspect. the use of a bomb doesn't seem important enough to have priority over these other 2 aspects of what they do, IMO

-- Elliot Temple

<http://curi.blogspot.com/>

by Elliot Temple on Sun, 08/24/2003 - 18:44 | reply

It will never end, but I find...

It will never end, but I find it fascinating that everyone that kills an American or Jew now is labeled as a 'terrorist.'

If another country invaded the U.S. and tried to set up a puppet government while having their armed soldiers all over the place, would I be a terrorist if I did whatever it took to try to kill them? If by blowing myself up or planting bombs to kill enemy soldiers I was able to build on the momentum of the occupying force's home populace being against the occupation, would I not have a reasonable purpose in what I was doing?

Is the U.S. always right?

The killings will continue in Isreal, Iraq, Afghanistan, etc. And the cowboy refuses to 'back down,' so it is going to continue as long as he's in office. It is because he sees any action other than staying in Iraq and thumbing our noses at the enemy as 'backing down' that we are going to get nowhere.

by a reader on Wed, 08/27/2003 - 19:27 | reply

Terrorists

I think the way we're using "terrorist" here is to refer to people who intentionally target innocents in order to change the minds of other people to lead to political change.

If you did that, you'd be a terrorist.

Gil

by Gil on Wed, 08/27/2003 - 20:26 | reply

Fox News idiocy

On FoxNews, the craziest things are said in (dis)respect to civil liberties. Recently, a commentator said that someone with an unfavorable picture of George W. Bush in his place of business should be investigated by the FBI, and that we might have to "bruise the rights" of Middle Easterners and they should just "indulge us" because terrorists hide among them.

Once Neil Cavuto (sp?) complained about the Spiderman movie, saying it was anti-business in that the bad guy was a businessman. He said that the comics were overwhelmingly anti-business and he challenged anyone to think up a single good example of a businessman portrayed in the comics in a good light. I responded with a pithy email: "I can think of one obvious example: Batman." No reply.

FoxNews is not a liberty friendly media source. They are anti-immigrant and rabidly pro-drug war. Bill O'Reilly is a dimwit fascist who can dish it out but can't take it. They're suing Al Franken for his use of the words "fair and balanced," for God's sake!

And they have Geraldo.

Interventionists should consider all the flaws of FoxNews when giving them praise for being so "good" on the war.

by a reader on Fri, 08/29/2003 - 02:27 | reply

Fox News idiocy?

a commentator said that someone with an unfavorable picture of George W. Bush in his place of business should be investigated by the FBI

Just how "unfavorable" was this picture? Complete the following sentence: "Well OK, it was more than unfavorable, it incited..."

they should just "indulge us" because terrorists hide among them.

No, they should not "indulge" us. They should actually embrace measures to find those terrorists who hide among them, even when this gives them extra inconvenience. They should do this not as a favor to us but because it is right.

he challenged anyone to think up a single good example of a businessman portrayed in the comics in a good light. I responded with a pithy email: "I can think of one obvious example: Batman." No reply.

Well here's your reply: Batman is not a businessman. He is a playboy living on inherited wealth, which he spends selflessly, epitomizing what left wingers imagine rich people ought to do. He never earns anything, because earning is exploiting and epitomizes what left wingers hate rich people for.

rabidly pro-drug war

Yeah that's bad.

And they have Geraldo.

Ewww. Yeah you have a point there.

by a reader on Fri, 08/29/2003 - 02:55 | reply

Copyright © 2005 Setting The World To Rights

Mark Steyn On The Weather

Do not be misled by memories of your youth when, on the Continent, wanting to describe someone as exceptionally dull, you remarked: "He is the type who would discuss the weather with you." In England this is an ever-interesting, even thrilling topic said George Mikes in How To Be An Alien. As of today, there is a second place in which the weather is a fascinating and deep topic: the writing of Mark Steyn, in which the dark prophesies of George Galloway, the pissoirs of the Paris Metro, the Afghan Winter and the Iraqi summer, French Bureaucracy and other nightmares of our time are compared with the humane efficiency of...

Read it and be enlightened.

Sat, 08/23/2003 - 22:42 | permlink

What about France?

I read Mark Steyn's article Iraq may be on the edge but France has hit rock bottom abyss linked above. It has some interesting points and is eloquently written, but I have to admit I don't really understand the point made about the heat deaths in France. Or is there a point? It certainly is sad if so many people died of heat, but why would that mean there's something wrong in France?

I also wonder how significant these 10,000 deaths are and to what extent they are really heat related. Remember that in a country the size of France about 200,000 people die every Summer anyway of natural causes. And I'd also like to know whether these are mainly people that might have died anyway in a few months, or whether there are a lot of them who could have lived for years.

Does the author think the French are stupid not to buy air conditioners for their houses? Does the author somehow blame government for this? Does he believe it's governments responsibility to take of its citizens' temperature exposure rather than their own? Or does he just want to make a point about the inefficiency of the funeral services and the bad state of health care in France? If so, I would have liked to see his argument of the link between bad health care and the heat deaths, if there is any, if that is his point anyway. I'm not saying there isn't any, I don't know anything about this event, I'm just saying that if there is some point to be made, I would have been interested in that point.

Or is it only that he wishes to claim that the French don't care about their relatives dying, which I find hard to believe? My apologies, but I haven't been following the news about the heat deaths in France, so maybe that's why I'm missing something. I'm just curious to know what this is about.

Henry Sturman

by Henry Sturman on Tue, 08/26/2003 - 09:55 | reply

Eric Hobsbawm Pushes the Envelope

...but not in a good way. Most villeepinists don't say that it is all right for tyrants like Saddam to murder people, just that it is wrong for us to do anything about it other than talk to them sternly (though not so sternly as to hurt their feelings since that would be an act of cultural imperialism).

However, communist 'historian' Eric Hobsawm descended to the next level way back in 1994 when he said that it was acceptable for the Communist Party to have murdered millions of people in Russia before World War Two:

HOBBSAWM: You didn't have the option. You see, either there was going to be a future or there wasn't going to be a future and this [the Communist Party] was the only thing that offered an acceptable future.

IGNATIEFF: In 1934, millions of people are dying in the Soviet experiment. If you had known that, would it have made a difference to you at that time? To your commitment? To being a Communist?

HOBBSAWM: This is the sort of academic question to which an answer is simply not possible...I don't actually know that it has any bearing on the history that I have written. If I were to give you a retrospective answer which is not the answer of a historian, I would have said, 'Probably not.'

IGNATIEFF: Why?

HOBBSAWM: Because in a period in which, as you might imagine, mass murder and mass suffering are absolutely universal, the chance of a new world being born in great suffering would still have been worth backing. Now the point is, looking back as an historian, I would say that the sacrifices made by the Russian people were probably only marginally worthwhile. The sacrifices were enormous; they were excessive by almost any standard and excessively great. But I'm looking back at it now and I'm saying that because it turns out that the Soviet Union was not the beginning of the world revolution. Had it been, I'm not sure.

IGNATIEFF: What that comes down to is saying that had the radiant tomorrow actually been created, the loss of fifteen, twenty million people might have been justified?

HOBBSAWM: Yes.

(Thanks to Samizdata for the link.)

Of course, it's not at all surprising that Hobsbawm is on the wrong side yet again. The US can't win with Hobsbawm, or the rest of the loony left, no matter what happens. If the US wins a stunning military victory against an evil dictator then the evil US empire has again crushed "someone they didn't like" with their iron fist. If a US soldier dies – or even pauses for a rest on his way to victory – then it's the greatest reverse in military history since Stalingrad.

Hobsbawm's views have nothing to do with facts like the number of people who are going to die, or anything like that. Instead they are all derived from an inner sense of morality that is so twisted that a tyrant slaughtering fifteen million innocent people is acceptable while a free society conducting a war against terrorism is evil.

Tue, 08/26/2003 - 15:23 | permalink

Conspiracy Theories – 3: Unseen Events

When George Mikes (the humourist and author of How to be an Alien) was very young and not yet able to read, he formulated a theory to explain his experiences. It was that no one can read: older people were merely pretending to see meaning in random squiggles of ink on paper, and were secretly laughing at his gullibility.

This had all the formal attributes of a conspiracy theory: it alleged that significant events in Mikes' life (adults reading to him, and trying to teach him to read) were part of a secret plan that involved the conspirators' lying to him about facts and about their own motives, in order to benefit at his expense (in this case merely by being amused). It also explained away his own relative ineffectiveness (his inability to read, compared with other people's apparent ability to), in terms of his powerlessness and their power over him. This is another very common theme of conspiracy theories. His theory differed from a standard conspiracy theory mainly in the way he held it: in particular, in the way he abandoned it.

He did not say how he first came to doubt it, but we can guess what must have been involved: simply taking it seriously as an explanation of reality. Perhaps at some point he noticed that different adults were able to read the same story out of a given book. Such observations would not have proved anything, but they would have multiplied the invisible events that must have been happening if the no-one-can-read theory was true: now, instead of merely laughing at him behind his back, the adults must have been learning stories by heart, and coordinating which ones they were going to pretend were contained in which book. They must have been pretending to find their way to unfamiliar places by reading road signs, feigning frustration when they left the shopping list at home, pretending that mail contained information from distant relatives, and so on. To maintain all those pretences would have involved hidden processes of great complexity, centring on the young Mikes, and laboriously hidden from him.

So what? Nature is full of hidden processes of great complexity; people do often hide things laboriously from other people – not least from children. Mikes was not wrong to be sceptical: initially, he could not have distinguished what he was told about reading from what he was told about Santa Claus and the Tooth Fairy. What was essential, though, was that he be just as sceptical of his own alternative explanation. And more: he needed to be seeking a true explanation, to care whether reality did or did not conform, even in unseen ways, to whatever explanation he adopted. Though his no-one-can-read explanation could never have been proved false, he was not looking for proof. He had not proposed it in order to create an unassailable dogma, but simply because he had a problem imagining a reality in which all those squiggles meant something. But then, given the role that he could see that alleged meaning playing in the lives of the people around him, he would soon have realised that postulating a further slew of apparently meaningless behaviour (the conspiracy) in the reality beyond his immediate perceptions did nothing to solve that problem. In effect it merely raised it again, but all the worse for being projected off the page and out into the wider world.

So, when he thought about the evidence available to him, though he would never have faced disproof, he would have faced a choice: try again to understand the hidden meanings in the squiggles – which might be difficult and, for all he knew, might never work – or attribute everything he saw to the hidden conspiracy. The latter option was guaranteed always to be available. Yet, at some point, he must have realised that the world could not be understood in those terms.

This is the choice which conspiracy theorists make differently and irrationally. They do care about some invisible events: the relatively small number that they love to think about, such as President Bush and his inner circle discussing their evil plan to seize the Iraqi oil fields. But they don't care enough to follow through the implications for the host of other invisible events that would also have to be happening if those were – such as how the conspiracy would recruit its members and how it would agree upon a new plan, and what exactly the conspirators' reward is and how it gets to them. We shall say more about this in the next instalment, but in general terms: conspiracy theorists chronically fail to form a serious model of what reality would be like if their theory of it were true. They paint on a large canvas with only a tiny area of detail, always preferring the security of familiar patterns of thought that are guaranteed to provide the semblance of an explanation, to the uncertainty and difficulty of trying to understand what the facts really are.

Part 4

Thu, 08/28/2003 - 08:39 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

When will 9.11

be Investigated?

Sur UBL was it, but WHO HELPED HIM??????

America WAS never that DEFENCELESS like it was on 9.11.

WAKE UP.

Ask question, dont try to protect the terrorist, but try to find those who helped the terrorist.

by a reader on Fri, 08/29/2003 - 07:05 | reply

Clean, Clear and Incisive

I thank you for your excellent dissection and (pre-autopsy?) of Conspiracy Theories.

I've sensed various aspects of your explanations myself, but I never felt moved to trace the rational path you've taken here, to such powerful and positive ends!

Very fine work, and I really appreciate it, although I'm okay[ⓐ] knu2.com

by a reader on Mon, 09/01/2003 - 06:20 | reply

Nice work

<http://www.ericblumrich.com/buddy.html>

Also a nice about the same thing.

by a reader on Mon, 09/01/2003 - 12:25 | reply

When will 9/11 be investigated

The investigation is done. The result is easy and clear : USA is the lone government who is able to make that kind of huge action and to hide it from the world. More details and proofs are on my web page <http://users.swing.be/muhammadcolumbo/>

Your comments are wellcome

When you will be sure on the autors of 9/11, you will be able to stop its repeat.

by Muhammad Columbo on Thu, 05/12/2005 - 17:47 | reply

i disagree!!!!!!!!!!!!!!

i think you're projecting the above anecdote on everyone who has thought for themselves about 9-11, and you've got it backwards. might i suggest that YOU are the baby; you are the one with the pre-set conclusion ("there's no conspiracy") and you refuse to acknowledge that we adults can indeed read for ourselves!

i am a very rational american and i have seen enough to know that i can point the finger at george tenet and a slew of bush administration officials. i know the way i've been told to think by the new york times et al. i have read enough to know not to buy that programming.

i have heard your smug argument before. have you considered that you're labeling a lot of people you have never met as "conspiracy theorists" and calling them all crazy. that's nuts! how large does that group have to be before you see that YOU'RE the insane one here?

YOU are the person who labels the views of people who ARE thinking for themselves "insane". we don't call ourselves "conspiracy theorists", we who have looked a little deeper than you have so far dared to look. and we don't have disrespect for other views; we INVITE skeptics to challenge our alternative hypothesis (didn't that one guy offer a $100,000 reward if the OFFICIAL explanation could be proven?)

some of the people in your comments have it right:
BEGIN A REAL INVESTIGATION OF 9-11!!!!
AND NOTICE WHO HAS BEEN BLOCKING ONE!!!!

-j

by hmddd on Sat, 12/03/2005 - 17:34 | reply

Does a '9-11 conspiracy' theory pass 'the test'?

Here's another test that all potential conspiracy theories should be able to pass:

Put yourself in the position of the beneficiary, before the alleged event takes place (e.g. Bush before 9-11).

Assume that you wish to achieve his/her aims (e.g. to 'get your hands on Iraqi oil', or 'start a war with Afganistan', etc. etc.)

What possible courses of action are available to you? Which are likely to work, and would be quick, easy, safe, cheap? Which course of action would you take?

Would the alleged 'conspiracy' be anywhere near the top of the list of possible plans you would come up with?

E.g. - if Bush wanted to get his hands on Iraqi oil - what could he do? Why not cut a deal with Iraq? America stops maintaining sanctions, and leans on the UN to lift them completely. In return, Iraq has to ditch all existing agreements and sign up long-term deals with certain American oil companies on American terms...

If you can come up with half a dozen alternate plans to your 'conspiracy theory', which are:

- (a) much simpler
- (b) much more likely to succeed
- (c) less politically damaging if you are found out
- (d) much 'cheaper' (financially, politically, etc.)
- (e) in character (i.e. the course of action has been taken in the past by this group of people - publically and successfully)

then you must conclude that it is highly unlikely that smart, powerful, careful world leaders would choose the more dangerous, more difficult 'conspiracy' plan!

And before you question the intelligence of the 'conspiracy' leaders - if you credit them with enough intelligency, foresight and power to fool or manipulate everybody in the world over a period of years, then you have to credit them with the intelligence to pick the right plan in the first place!

by Mark on Mon, 08/21/2006 - 09:46 | reply

Re: Here's another test

Good point.

by Editor on Mon, 08/21/2006 - 10:54 | reply

Disrespect and sanity (or not)

"YOU are the person who labels the views of people who ARE thinking for themselves "insane". we don't call ourselves "conspiracy theorists", we who have looked a little deeper than you have so far dared to look. and we don't have disrespect for other views"

LOL. You can't have visited Dewdney's rantings on this matter. Dewdney isn't a scientist, but he mocks scientists who take apart his pathetic attempts to 'prove' by way of 'physics' that the CIA (or sometimes Mossad) organised 9/11.

by Yoni on Sat, 09/09/2006 - 22:50 | reply

Syllogisms

"USA is the lone government who is able to make that kind of huge action and to hide it from the world"

So the syllogism goes:

A can do B

Hence, A must have done B.

Yees ... right ...

Nobody says it was done by any one particular government.

Capish?

by Yoni on Sat, 09/09/2006 - 22:52 | reply

both sides of this argument are doing exactly what...

the article says people who believe in conspiracy theories do.

Neither of you are willing to consider evidence which doesn't fit into your already drawn conclusion.

by Jay Aziza on Wed, 12/20/2006 - 17:30 | reply

The test.

We could have negotiated with the USSR and Cuba, too.
Oil may be a major factor, but its not the only one.
If they want more power, both domestically and internationally, a weak showing of negotiating with Saddam would not further that goal.

Please list the 6 alternate plans which are: simpler, more likely to succeed (if the conspiracy theory turned out to be true, then it did succeeded), less politically damaging (if it was all verbal agreements, how could anyone ever "find out"?), cheaper, and in character?

I would ask that you apply the same standard to the Islamic hijackers.

If they were smart enough to execute this plan against the richest most powerful country in the world, would they not have been smart enough to realize the consequences? Would they have wanted to have the US destroy thier entire way of life? Would that have been the best way to achieve thier goals of less US presence in the mid-east?

In the long run, who gained more of thier goals from 9/11, Islamic fundamentalists or the PNAC?

-What history teaches is this – that people and governments have never learnt anything from history, or acted on principles deduced from it.

by Jay Aziza on Wed, 12/20/2006 - 17:37 | reply

Not Analogous

It's easier for a few hijackers to keep a secret than a president working to attack his own country!

And more likely for a few hijackers to be wrong about how to achieve their ends.

by a reader on Wed, 12/20/2006 - 23:57 | reply

Failed test?

Jay tried to apply the same test as Mark's to Islamic fundamentalists' conspiracy to hijack and crash the planes on 9/11. But he did not reach the right answer.

The hijackers had declared their motives before, so there are no hidden motives. This is plainly on display for all to see. In fact, they are trying to convert the world to it. They had also announced their intentions to attack the US. They honour dying in order to achieve this goal, which they hold to be for Allah and sacred. And they believe that they will be rewarded for their actions in Heaven. So there is no "conspiracy theory" here. The conspiracy only exists before 9/11 for what the hijackers had to do in order to make it happen.

What other ways did they have to achieve their goal? More or less nothing else! Their goal was to attack the US. With no army, they were rationally reduced to using isolated acts of violence with whatever they can make do. So they indeed pass Mark's test.

-- Cyrus Ferdowsi, <http://libiran.blogspot.com>

by Liberal Iranian on Thu, 12/28/2006 - 09:06 | reply

Copyright © 2008 Setting The World To Rights

Anti-Semitism Today

It is 2003. The extermination camps of Europe ceased murdering 58 years ago and ever since then the ideologies that created and justified them have been a byword for evil in civilised circles – and even in most uncivilised ones. That anti-Semitism is once again a significant causal force in international politics, and in the internal politics of Western nations, is an idea grotesque almost beyond belief. But believe it we must, for it is a cold fact.

Here are some recent articles on the phenomenon, which everyone should read:

The demonology of SE Asian Islamists by Michael Danby:

Sue and Donna lived in Elwood and Port Melbourne respectively, suburbs in my constituency in Melbourne, where I serve as a federal member of parliament. Sue and Donna were killed whilst enjoying a holiday in Bali, and now Donna leaves behind a disabled four-year-old.

As justification for their murderous acts in Bali, two of the known perpetrators, Amrozi bin Nurhasyim and Imam Samudra, have focused their rhetoric on revenge “against the Jews,” despite the fact that, to the best of my knowledge, there are no Jews in Indonesia.

Fiamma Nirenstein:

If Israel is, and it is indeed, the focal point of anti-Semitic attacks, our attention must be concentrated there. We must measure the moral character of the person we are speaking to on that basis: if you lie about Israel, if you cover it with bias, you are an anti-Semite. If you're prejudiced against Israel, then, you're against the Jews.

This doesn't mean criticizing Israel and its policies is forbidden. However, very little of what we hear about Israel has to do with lucid criticism. Prejudice and bias, not Sharon's personality is the major reason for criticism. The self-defined critics are not the pious interlocutors for the Jews that they pretend to be. So we must tell them: from now on you cannot use the human rights passport for free; you cannot use false stereotypes. You must demonstrate what you assert: that the army ruthlessly storms poor Arab villages that have nothing to do with terrorism; that it shoots children on purpose; that it kills journalists with pleasure. You cannot? You called Jenin a slaughter? Then you are an anti-Semite, just like the old anti-Semites you pretend to hate. You have to convince me that you are not an anti-Semite, now that we know that you do not condemn terrorism, that you have never said a word against the contemporary caricatures of hooked-nosed Jews with a bag of dollars in one hand and a machine gun in the other.

Solomon:

Jewish bank ownership, media ownership, personal flaws...they stand out because they hate you and they don't hate you because of the "occupation" – they hate the "occupation" because they...hate...you.

On Ignoring Anti-Semitism by Ruth R. Wisse:

No extract can sum up this careful and comprehensive analysis. Go and read it all.

Mon, 09/01/2003 - 20:26 | permalink

That's some company to be in...

...thank you for the link - and the pointers. Good stuff.

by Solomon on Tue, 09/02/2003 - 20:38 | reply

Here's Another Interesting One

http://europundits.blogspot.com/2003_09_01_europundits_archive.html#106267265194636376 (except that the PS is, as he says himself, too conspiratorial.)

(Via InstaPundit.)

by Editor on Fri, 09/05/2003 - 03:34 | reply

Bias about bias

Yes, there's a lot of anti-semitism, and many critics of Israel are anti-semitic, and that's very bad. However, Fiamma Nirenstein writes:

[...] if you lie about Israel, if you cover it with bias, you are an anti-Semite. If you're prejudiced against Israel, then, you're against the Jews.

This is of course entirely a non-sequitur. Yes, many of those biased against Israel will be anti-semitic. But by no means all. There are many other reasons people can be biased against Israel. The most important reason for people to be biased against Israel, I would guess, is not anti-semitism but anti-Westism or cultural relativism. Jews mostly belong to the European culture. And Israel is a Western type state, with emphasis on individual rights and rule of law. And that is something that is hated by those who would favor oppression and backwardness, or the "freedom" non-Westerners to enjoy the benefits of a culture of oppression and backwardness (why should only non-Westerners have this "freedom"?).

Also, Israel is seen as a form of Western colonialism in the East. And they are hated for that just as Americans are hated for being in Iraq (by leftist Westerners and non-Iraqi muslims, mostly not by Iraqis themselves). It's not all about anti-semitism, even if part of it is.

Henry Sturman

by Henry Sturman on Sun, 09/07/2003 - 10:52 | reply

Copyright © 2005 Setting The World To Rights

Wolfowitz on the War Against Terror

The war against terror is being fought - and won - in Iraq, says Paul Wolfowitz, placing the current Iraq campaign in its strategic context. And here's David Schneider-Joseph on the same subject. They are right.

Wed, 09/03/2003 - 02:21 | permalink

I understand now.....

So we are going to make Iraq into a liberal democracy while we give billions to dictatorships like Egypt, Pakistan, Uzbekistan etc. Makes perfect sense.

by a reader on Thu, 09/04/2003 - 00:07 | reply

It Does Make Sense

Mr A. Nonymous wrote:

"So we are going to make Iraq into a liberal democracy while we give billions to dictatorships like Egypt, Pakistan, Uzbekistan etc. Makes perfect sense."

Yes, it does make perfect sense. We can only deal with one country at a time. We'll get around to telling the Egyptians, Saudis and so on that their support for terrorism is intolerable and must end but right now we need to deal with Iraq.

by Alan Forrester on Thu, 09/04/2003 - 00:59 | reply

The Most Appropriate Thing Ever

Tomorrow, as part of the celebrations to mark the 85th anniversary of the Polish Air Force, three visiting Israeli F-15 aircraft are going to fly low along the railway tracks leading to the Auschwitz death camp. The pilots, who are descendants of Holocaust survivors, will read the names of victims who were arriving at the camp at that time exactly sixty years earlier. "They will fly over the camp for about a second to honor the ashes of their fathers and grandfathers", said the Israeli ambassador to Poland.

But the Auschwitz museum is opposed to this form of commemoration. It issued a statement saying it "felt such a display was inappropriate" and that it "deplores the demonstration of Israeli military might in this place".

They do not know what they are talking about. This is arguably the most appropriate thing to have happened anywhere, ever. How can someone work at Auschwitz and not know that?

Wed, 09/03/2003 - 21:40 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Violence

I think this is an example of the "Violence Is Bad" meme that I discussed in a recent post on my blog. Many people have drawn the wrong conclusions from the Holocaust.

Some people refuse to recognize that, while violence is often wrong and bad, it is sometimes right and good. They are offended by any "demonstrations of might". They prefer to declare all violence as wrong and imagine that if enough of us demonstrate that we are unwilling and unable to defend ourselves with force, then nobody will take advantage of that.

They are wrong.

Gil

by Gil on Thu, 09/04/2003 - 02:29 | reply

PC rot loses!

The "sheep led to slaughter" model has been tried and found wanting. What part of "Never again!" don't they understand?

by Alan Furman on Thu, 09/04/2003 - 18:59 | reply

The "never" part. They under...

The "never" part. They understand the "again" part just fine. ;-)

by a reader on Thu, 09/04/2003 - 20:43 | reply

Simplicity is not always a virtue...

"deplores the demonstration of Israeli military might in this place"...

The adjective "Israeli" makes me wonder. Are we to assume that, for example, GERMAN military might in Auschwitz was more appropriate?

I agree with Gil. The one virtue of the "all violence is bad" concept is that it's easy to understand. And, as with many other concepts that are easy to understand, it is dead wrong.

Daniel in Medford

by a reader on Thu, 09/04/2003 - 21:23 | reply

They are afraid to look at pa...

They are afraid to look at past sin and hope that bad memory will just fade away if nobody notice.

Words can fool men but nature doesn't give a damn!

by Lan Nguyen on Thu, 09/04/2003 - 21:43 | reply

Not quite

They are afraid to look at past sin and hope that bad memory will just fade away if nobody notice.

I don't think this is a reasonable interpretation of the perspective of people who want to treat the site as a cemetery and think flying over it disturbs the concentration of mourners.

They're wrong, not because they don't want people to remember, but because they think remembering is enough.

~Woty

<http://woty.davidsj.com>

by Woty on Fri, 09/05/2003 - 11:41 | reply

Interesting Quote

There's a pretty good NY Times Magazine article about anti-semitism available online that contains this interesting quote:

"The Germans will never forgive the Jews for Auschwitz."

Gil

by Gil on Fri, 09/05/2003 - 16:21 | reply

Re: Violence

1. If celebrating the anniversary of the Polish Air Force is appropriate then such a fly over certainly is.
2. This fly over seems to be more a celebration of life than of military might.
3. Unfortunately our conclusion that our enemies are wrong & immoral and that we are right & moral is ultimately based on a leap of faith.

by a reader on Fri, 09/05/2003 - 22:30 | reply

All violence is bad

There is a large grain of truth in Pacifism. It is true that war and violence is a very terrible thing even for the good guys. Many of them die or suffer for the rest of their lives, after all. And it is true that there are alternatives to war and violence and that if there is a way for good and truth to win out over evil without having to fight about it, then that is the way we should take.

Pacifists are just wrong in their idea that war and violence is always wrong, and that there are always better ways to deal with evil, and that violence is never right.

Stephen (who can't remember his password and username probably due to almost never using it)

by a reader on Fri, 09/05/2003 - 22:42 | reply

> Since you & I will never...

< I don't think this is a reasonable interpretation of the perspective of people who want to treat the site as a cemetery and think flying over it disturbs the concentration of mourners.

They're wrong, not because they don't want people to remember, but because they think remembering is enough.>>

Since you & I will never be able to glimpse in the soul of the people described above, then interpretation is all depending on your perspective. It's possible that they might think remembering is enough but it's also possible that people want to rewrite the history and they do not want to resurrect the memory of the holocaust. In absence of an absolute truth, my interpretation is very possible and reasonable unless you can prove otherwise. Of course, I can be wrong and so are you.

Words can fool men but nature doesn't give a damn!

by Lan Nguyen on Fri, 09/05/2003 - 23:22 | reply

violence!?

ya really think this is about violence and anti-military memes!? it's 3 planes not shooting at anyone...

aww, c'mon, why did i skim through the TEN comments and not see THEY ARE FUCKING ANTI-SEMITES spelled out a bit more loudly? (yeah yeah, someone noticed the adjective 'israeli'). jews with guns on near germany is inappropriate cause they jews were supposed to die, and the germans failed.

btw i liked the '~~never~~ again' post. and the notion the germans are just afraid to remember their sin seems silly when they're acting like they don't think it was a sin. it seems more like they don't want their Great Attempt tarnished by this act which would show that it failed.

-- Elliot Temple
<http://curi.blogspot.com/>

by a reader on Mon, 09/08/2003 - 20:28 | reply

Of Inquiries

Villepinists like to hold fake inquiries. So the Stop the War Coalition (yes, they still exist – we were surprised too) are planning to hold an inquiry into the conduct of the Iraq war, along the lines of the so-called International War Crimes Tribunal of 1967 dedicated to demonising the Americans and their allies for their conduct in the Vietnam war. No doubt the same mixture of daft conspiracy theories, facts taken out of all context and wilful ignorance of the evils of the totalitarian enemies against whom America and her allies were fighting will be on display. So while any act by American forces will be picked and worried to death by this inquiry, one can be sure that they won't pay much attention to the record of Saddam's regime, just as the left has largely ignored the crimes of the communist regime in Vietnam before, during and after the Vietnam war.

It's not going to be an 'inquiry' in the sense of a quest to discover what really happened. Everybody knows in advance what its conclusion will be, it is as foregone as the result of one of Stalin's show trials. This makes an interesting contrast with another inquiry that is going on right now – the Hutton Inquiry. Despite attempts to forecast that the government will be exonerated or damned nobody really knows what the outcome will be. The reason is simple: genuine inquiries are held when the truth is hard to find and one wants to make every possible effort to find it. Since we don't know the truth about the circumstances surrounding Kelly's death we don't know what the inquiry will find. A real inquiry requires an interest in the truth, whether or not it fits one's preconceptions, and that is absent from everything the Stop the War Coalition and other Villepinists do.

Fri, 09/05/2003 - 12:23 | permalink

War in Irak

By the way, where is Bin Laden?

by a reader on Sat, 09/06/2003 - 11:29 | reply

Bin Laden? Probably dead - why'd you ask?

FWIW, I reckon Bin Laden is dead: probably scorched onto the walls of a cave somewhere in his Impregnable Mountain Fortress (TM). Funny how we haven't actually seen anything of him since around the time we started bombing his Impregnable Mountain Fortress (TM) at Tora-Bora. There've been a few audio tapes of someone who sounds like him, but nothing unambiguous. Until we get solid evidence he's alive I'm betting he's dead. But what does that have to do with Iraq, anyway?

by a reader on Mon, 09/08/2003 - 15:51 | reply

Copyright © 2005 Setting The World To Rights

Is There A Diabetes Epidemic?

In recent years the prevailing wisdom both among journalists and among experts and scientists in the field has been that the incidence of diabetes has increased sharply and that there is currently an epidemic of the disease. Of course diabetes is not infectious, but the word 'epidemic' is used, by extension, to include any health-related events that are occurring at a significantly higher rate than before.

About a year ago, for instance, there was an epidemic of stories in the media claiming that a diabetes epidemic is in progress.

Now, further studies seem to show that this was based on a misinterpretation of data. The headline now is: Diabetes epidemic fails to arrive:

The prevalence of type 2 diabetes may have risen mainly because people are being picked up and treated earlier or are living longer

In other words, people are getting the disease at much the same rate as before, but there are more diabetics because they are being detected younger and living longer. The 'epidemic' was actually caused by a combination of two good developments!

That study was done in Denmark on 470,000 people. A study in the US (much smaller but perhaps more significant because it is the only study addressing this issue which has measured both diagnosed and undiagnosed diabetes) came to a similar conclusion:

The findings in this report indicate that the prevalence of diabetes, either diagnosed or undiagnosed, and impaired fasting glucose did not appear to increase substantially during the 1990s.

Yet we know (or at least, our best theories say) that (1) obesity is on the increase and (2) obesity does precipitate diabetes in a proportion of people. So there should have been an epidemic:

The apparent lack of increase in prevalence is unexpected in light of the increasing prevalence of obesity and overweight in U.S. adults documented by the NHANES surveys.

So there's something rather puzzling going on. What? We don't know.

We just don't know. But research will continue and we will find out. And, probably, the answer will contain something else puzzling. This is the usual way in science. New knowledge takes us from puzzle to puzzle, never to a secure point from which we can speak authoritatively.

Sat, 09/06/2003 - 23:43 | permalink

Copyright © 2005 Setting The World To Rights

Hatred

Oriana Fallaci, author of The Rage and the Pride, a passionate response to 9/11, is on trial for hatred.

We doubt that the people putting her on trial would recognise hatred if it jumped up and killed them in the name of Sharia law.

When Islamofascist terrorists crash three planes full of innocent people into three buildings full of innocent people, that is hatred.

When Islamofascist thugs stone women to death for the crime of travelling with a male other than a relative, or chop off their fingertips for the crime of using nail polish; when Islamofascist terrorists want so badly to kill Jewish children that they are prepared to die for the privilege and train their own children to do the same, that is hatred.

When a person of Oriana Fallaci's insight and bravery draws on her extensive knowledge to condemn the culture that produces people who commit such crimes, that is sanity.

Racial or religious hatred is no part of either the motivation or the intention of this book. Yes, it is unvarnished and uncompromising. It disdains the taboos of 'political correctness', and in particular, the taboo against criticising cultures. It pulls no punches; but nor does it deliver them indiscriminately: her criticisms are specific and they are rooted in the starkly practical problem of what caused the attacks of September 11, 2001 and what can be done about it. She criticises Western culture as well as Islamic for setting up the conditions in which violent Islamofascism has thrived. We do not share her whole analysis, but the core of it is well judged and timely and should be taken on board by everyone who cares about the future of civilisation.

Mon, 09/08/2003 - 17:26 | permalink

The Rage and The Pride

I agree that her book is not racist, and that it contains vital truths. I agree with most of its content.

However, I think that she makes a mistake that we ought to be careful to avoid. She seems to think that Islamic cultures can't ever be modern and will always be enemies, because Islam is too corrupt to reform. I think that taking this attitude makes it more difficult to find solutions, even though she is correct that we will not become more peaceful or secure by pretending that existing Islamic culture is as good as existing Western culture.

But if we think that Islam is incapable of reform, how can we possibly stop people from wanting to kill us?

~Woty

<http://woty.davidsj.com>

by Woty on Wed, 09/10/2003 - 16:18 | reply

Did They Cheer Yesterday As Well?

Shaare Zedek Medical Center, Jerusalem, yesterday:

As the hospital's doctors and nurses waited to treat the wounded, they received word that the attack had killed the head of their emergency room, Dr. David Appelbaum.

Dr Appelbaum was murdered together with his 20-year-old daughter, Naava, who was to have been married that evening.

When the humorist Larry Miller visited the emergency room of another Jerusalem hospital last year, one of the staff told him that her job is hard sometimes:

Downstairs, before we left, the head of the hospital, an Israeli named Audrey, was showing me the children's waiting room. I couldn't help but notice, all around, an Arab woman with her son, an Arab family over there checking in, Arab children playing with the toys while waiting. The doctor saw the look on my face and laughed. "Oh, yes, we treat everyone." I guess I was astonished. She just shrugged. "We're Jews. This is how we live. It's also for the future. They're not going anywhere, and we're not going anywhere. There will eventually be peace. There has to be." When? A month? A year? A hundred years? More? She didn't know. I had to say it. You're incredible. You take everyone, you treat everyone, no one goes first, no one goes last, you just go in order of who needs help. That's, like, Mother Teresa stuff. "We're not saints, we're just doing our jobs. It's not easy, I admit. And it gets hard when they cheer when the bodies are brought in." I looked at her. What did you say? She sighed. "Yes, it gets hard when they cheer." This was one of the times during my trip when I held up my hands and said, "Stop. Wait." I turned and walked away to breathe deeply for a minute. I wonder if they've restocked that mini-bar. Yeah, probably. It's a good hotel.

I didn't meet one Jew the whole trip who didn't think there would be peace, not one. "We can work it out. We have to. They're not going anywhere. Neither are we."

Of course, it gets hard when they cheer.

I guess it does.

But last night will have been even harder.

Wed, 09/10/2003 - 18:48 | permalink

Copyright © 2005 Setting The World To Rights

2003-09-11

We have nothing to add to what has already been said by many others. We are at war. It is a war of those who value and celebrate human life against those who worship death.

Go out and be happy.

Thu, 09/11/2003 - 17:09 | permalink

BLOG-IRAN

Dear Sarah, David & Kevin,

Please join with us and bloggers around the world in supporting the Iranian people against a brutal fanatic terrorist clerical regime that continues to support terror and make problems for not only peace but also for American soldiers and others who are trying to assist the Iraqi people!

Join BLOG-IRAN at <http://www.activistchat.com/blogiran> and help free the Iranian people... LETS BE THE VOICE when everyone else is SILENT!

In Unity & Struggle,
Haleh

by a reader on Fri, 09/12/2003 - 15:43 | reply

Re: BLOG-IRAN

We of course wholeheartedly approve of the efforts of Iranians to free themselves from tyranny, and we approve of BlogIran. But we have to blog about what we know, and frankly we do not know enough about the details of the situation in Iran to comment regularly about it. On this subject we are more usually blog readers than writers.

But we are honoured by your invitation and wish you the best of luck in your noble cause.

by Editor on Fri, 09/12/2003 - 19:40 | reply

The Man Who Should Be Prime Minister

In a Parliamentary system, wartime presents special challenges to the Opposition party. The present Leader of the Opposition in Britain (Iain Duncan-Smith – 'IDS') has sadly failed to meet these challenges. He has engaged in pointless, opportunistic sniping at the Prime Minister's conduct of the war that has no effect but to undermine the policy that they both agree on, without bringing to bear any coherent criticism either on that or most other issues.

For instance, at the last Prime Minister's Question Time, IDS devoted his questions to speculations based on a leaked report of a Parliamentary Committee which, he said, was "another nail in the coffin of this government". On this, as on other occasions, he not only indulged in meaningless pomposity, but came very close to endorsing the idiotarian/villepinist conspiracy theory that the government had lied about Iraqi weapons of mass destruction: "the lying and the spinning won't stop until we get rid of this Prime Minister". The following day the report was published and, although it made some minor criticisms, cleared the government of any such wrongdoing.

Here, for comparison, is how the man who should be Leader of the Opposition (or, indeed, Prime Minister), Michael Portillo, responded to the same challenge (Sky News, September 14 2003), when an interviewer tried to trip him up on this very tricky ground:

"The question that is being debated here is trust in the Prime Minister. I'm one of these people who feels that the Prime Minister outrageously span and manipulated information for five or six years at the beginning of his premiership. I also feel that he was more straightforward and more honest over Iraq than he'd been over anything else. This is like a man who was unconvicted for five years and is now accused of a crime he didn't actually commit. And correspondingly my sympathy at this outrageous miscarriage of justice is somewhat limited."

A near-perfect statement combining full-hearted opposition to the Prime Minister's style of government in general, with uncompromising support for him, not only on the issue of the war, but against the scurrilous conspiracy-theoretic bandwagon with which IDS had not been able to resist associating himself and his party, to the detriment of all.

Sun, 09/14/2003 - 15:00 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Copyright © 2007 Setting The World To Rights

Congratulations

Congratulations to the people of Sweden for taking the historic step of saying No to the Euro despite the advice of their ruling elites.

Congratulations to the people of Hong Kong for standing up for their own freedom against their totalitarian overlords, even though they know that no one would lift a finger to help them if the events of Tiananmen Square, or worse, were to be re-enacted in their city.

Congratulations to the people of Israel for maintaining the vibrant creativity of their culture as well as the world's highest standards of morality in the way they defend themselves, under circumstances where mere survival as a nation would be cause enough for congratulation.

Congratulations to the people, armed forces and government of the United States for taking a stand against evil and having achieved the liberation of two nations in two years, despite widespread and vicious opposition from those who ought to have been helping.

Mon, 09/15/2003 - 17:56 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Thanks

I watch and/or read news every day and I didn't even know until now that there had been pro-democracy protests in Hong Kong.

by a reader on Mon, 09/15/2003 - 18:18 | reply

A small example

Here is a small example of "the world's highest standards of morality in the way they defend themselves":

http://littlegreenfootballs.com/weblog/?entry=8203_Reservist_Mom_Foils_Stabbing.

As LGF said:

"Once again we see the difference between the Palestinian Arabs, who readily sacrifice everything - even their own children - to commit murder, and the Israelis, who take pride in avoiding violence even against those who try to kill them. "

by a reader on Mon, 09/15/2003 - 23:17 | reply

China

Kind of hypocritical to say that China is ruled by "totalitarian overlords". This "reader" is willing to bet that the author of this post owns items produced in the land "totalitarian overlords". Also, curiously, many corporation have left the "land of the free" to set up shop in this land of "totalitarian overlords". Apparently the author of this post thinks that if there were a "magic button" to transform Chinese society that we should push it. That is the epitome of the approach this "reader" repudiates. The perfect Chinese society will have to evolve.

by a reader on Tue, 09/16/2003 - 03:42 | reply

China

I don't understand this criticism.

What does the reader think is the appropriate, non-hypocritical, way to deal with China?

Does the reader think that engaging with China economically is hindering its evolution?

Gil

by Gil on Tue, 09/16/2003 - 05:49 | reply

Congratulations

And congratulations to you for maintaning this blog at this level.

An Iranian Student

by a reader on Tue, 09/16/2003 - 08:06 | reply

Totalitarian overlords

I object to the use of the term "totalitarian overlords". While this term would have been appropriate to China twenty years ago (and North Korea today)it seems inaccurate today. If your standards are such that you need refer to the Chinese government as "totalitarian overlords" then you should refer to the U.S. government as our "oligarchic Christian-Socialist overlords"

by a reader on Wed, 09/17/2003 - 01:12 | reply

home | archives | polls | search

Conspiracy Theories

Conspiracy Theories – 1: The Basics

Conspiracy Theories – 2: Lying About Motives

Conspiracy Theories – 3: Unseen Events

Conspiracy Theories – 4: Collectivism

Conspiracy Theories – 5: Paranoia As Faith

Conspiracy Theories – 6: Theories That Are Merely False

Part 7 coming soon!

Further articles on conspiracy theories:

The War Against Conspiracy Theories

Conspiracy Theories In The Mainstream

Insane Conspiracy Theories In Influential Circles

Islamism, Lunatic Conspiracy Theories, And Death

Tue, 09/16/2003 - 10:08 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Setting The World To Rights

Ideas have consequences.

home | archives | polls | search

In a Nearby Universe...

In a Nearby Universe... 1

In a Nearby Universe... 2

In a Nearby Universe: EU Drops Cuba Sanctions

Tue, 09/16/2003 - 10:17 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

“This Game of Legitimizing Mr. Arafat”

The Israeli Ambassador's speech yesterday to the UN Security Council in the debate on Arafat was a superb, towering indictment of that organisation and of the international community in general. It should have been a historic event, like the speech of Haile Selassie to the League of Nations in 1936. But it won't be, because it went virtually unreported and undiscussed.

You can read it here, though.

The Palestinian representative walked out and told journalists that the speech was “trash”.

By the way, note also the continuing disgraceful adherence of M. Dominique de Villepin to his eponymous doctrine, as pointed out in this comment by Gil.

Tue, 09/16/2003 - 14:59 | permalink

How Reuters reported it

Reuters reported it like this:

Israeli Ambassador Dan Gillerman, dismissing Arafat as a liar and a "professional terrorist," predicted his removal would swiftly lead to an end to the conflict.

Arafat "is at the helm of those who have been supporting mega-terror attacks in the style of the bombing of the twin towers, to bring the region to the brink of catastrophe," Gillerman said, prompting al-Kidwa to walk out of the chamber.

The phrase "predicted his removal would swiftly lead to an end to the conflict" does not refer to anything in the speech. Perhaps the hack who writes Reuters' UN reports tends to go out for a smoke during Israeli speeches, since he knows there's no market for reporting them.

by Editor on Tue, 09/16/2003 - 16:47 | reply

Palestinian

The Palestinian representative walked out and told journalists that the speech was "trash".

What was the Palestinian representative representing? The PLO?
The Palestinian Authority? Arafat? Hamas?

What were they doing there?

~Woty

<http://woty.davidsj.com>

by Woty on Wed, 09/17/2003 - 01:22 | reply

Copyright © 2005 Setting The World To Rights

How Cosy Is The Iron Security Blanket?

The director of the German Christian Democrats' youth wing has found the temerity to point out that the emperor's social insurance system has no clothes:

Philipp Missfelder, chairman of the youth wing of the center-right Christian Democrats, griped that medical care for old folks was creating an intolerable financial burden for the young. It's about time 85-year-olds started paying for their own hip replacements and false teeth, Missfelder declared in an August interview with the Berlin daily Tagesspiegel that was widely quoted by other news media. "In the old days, people got around on crutches," he said.

Chile has substantially cleaned up its system; in the USA one may utter "social security" and "privatization" in the same sentence without being crucified; even EdenSweden has confronted the need for reform. But in the parasitocracies of France and Germany, even to raise the point is taboo. Though the Iron Curtain may have fallen, the Iron Security Blanket remains. Its twilight may be approaching.

Wed, 09/17/2003 - 06:58 | digg | del.icio.us | permlink

Amanpour Insists the Sky is Green

Many stories are told about the eccentric Kaiser Franz-Josef I, penultimate Emperor of Austria-Hungary. Most of them are presumably urban legends, including this one – but that doesn't matter for present purposes: the story is that the Kaiser was visiting an exhibition of modern art. And he said to one of the artists standing proudly by his painting: "well, that isn't bad, but tell me, young man, why have you painted the sky green, and the grass pink?"

"Because that is how I see them, your Majesty", replied the painter.

The Kaiser nodded sympathetically and turned away. But then turned back in puzzlement to ask a supplementary question: "But in that case – how the devil did you happen to choose painting as your profession?"

Likewise Christiane Amanpour sees the world like this:

"I think the press was muzzled, and I think the press self-muzzled. I'm sorry to say, but certainly television and, perhaps, to a certain extent, my station was intimidated by the administration and its foot soldiers at Fox News. And it did, in fact, put a climate of fear and self-censorship, in my view, in terms of the kind of broadcast work we did."

Now, clearly she is a talented and cultured woman. She must have had a choice of many careers. But since she is capable of giving credence to such a whopper of a conspiracy theory (intimidated by Fox News?), and since she seems to have no more understanding of the meanings of the terms "press was muzzled", "intimidated", and "climate of fear" than a deep-sea oyster, one has to wonder how on earth she came to choose journalism as her profession.

Fri, 09/19/2003 - 00:23 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

An Iranian Student

And she used to advertise for Khatami for free...aaah everything adds up now! :)

by a reader on Fri, 09/19/2003 - 07:50 | reply

i would have to say the same ...

i would have to say the same about helen thomas...in fact, i have!

<http://www.all-encompassingly.com/archives/000167.html>

by travis on Tue, 09/30/2003 - 21:04 | reply

Violence in Brazil - A Cry for Help

Dear Sir/Madam:

My name is Maria Enedina Bezerra and I am writing you from Fortaleza, Brazil. I want to inform you about the violence in Brazil. The cities of Brazil are taken by criminals and the population is being terrorized and tortured in the hands these criminals and the government is doing absolutely nothing about it. To be taken at gun point by criminals at broad daylight here has become a common experience for Brazilians. I would like to ask your institution to come down here and make an inquiry about this situation here in Brazil. The world has to know the state of violence in which Brazilians live nowadays. I think that if the international media/press would come down here and make an inquiry or a documentary to show to the world this terrible situation, the Brazilian government would start doing something to change this.

Every day hundreds of motor drivers are assaulted at street crossing at gunpoint and taken to ATM machines. Bandits at daylight also sack houses and apartment buildings. Buses are stopped on far off roads and passengers are herded out of their seats and forced to give all their belongings. Then they are forced to take off their clothes and are put in the luggage compartment of the bus while the bandits leave scotch free with the passengers' money and belongings. This and much more needs to be shown to the world so that some serious measure can be taken to stop this unbearable condition. The population lives terrorized and this is happening in all the major cities of Brazil, such as Rio de Janeiro, São Paulo, Salvador, Recife, Fortaleza, Belo Horizonte, etc.

I was taken at gunpoint this past week and it was the most frightening experience I have ever gone through. I want to make something to change this situation here in Brazil and I need help from a serious institution that is willing to come down here to make an inquiry and possibly a documentary to show to the world what is happening here in Brazil. This violence has to stop, but I think only intense international pressure on the Brazilian government will make this situation change.

You can count on me as a translator if you are coming down here to make a documentary on the state of violence in which we Brazilians live in here. My e-mail address is "neda@unifor.br". I am a professor of Anthropology at the University of Fortaleza and I live in fear 24 hours a day, fear of being killed by the thousands of criminals who roam the streets of Brazil.

Sincerely,
Maria Enedina Bezerra.

by Maria E. Bezerra on Sun, 05/22/2005 - 02:49 | reply

Where are all the parents gone (HIV/AIDS in Kenya)

Dear Sir/Madam

My name is Natanael Nuulimba, I am working with an organisation that works with minority groups in Botswana www.kuru.co.bw . I once watched a program on the TV on the scourge of AIDS in Africa titled :Where are all the parents gone, by Christiane Amanpour. I would like to have access to this material so that we can use it for our information and outreach program. I would like to thank Christiane for the good work that she has done. Please can some one get back to me

Regards

Natanael

by a reader Natanael Nuulimba on Tue, 10/17/2006 - 12:43 | reply

I have read your story and he

I have read your story and hear in your words the trauma you have suffered. You sound injured and terrorized. I hope you receive treatment for the psychological wounds this incident seems to have caused, so that this perpetrator will not continue to cause you harm for the rest of your life. It sounds like counseling would do you much good.

by a concerned reader on Wed, 09/12/2007 - 02:37 | reply

A Spy at Guantanamo Bay?

Let's hope that Captain Lee is innocent and that this is not a major disaster in the War on Terrorism.

An Army Islamic chaplain, who counseled al Qaeda prisoners at the Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, naval base, has been charged with espionage (Via LGF.) And let's also hope that the media – in all other respects eager to seek out and highlight every possible setback in the war, real or imaginary – are going to report this case thoroughly.

Update: There has been a second such case.

Further update: And now the group that the US military relies on to train Muslim chaplains is under investigation by the Justice Department for allegedly supporting terrorism.

Sat, 09/20/2003 - 14:56 | permalink

is it not clear how Americas' is it not clear how Americas' actions in Guantanamo are inflaming the anger of the Arab world. America has yet again displayed to the world how selective it is in complying with international law. Guantanamo bay is in breach of the Geneva War Convention and the Universal Humans Rights Act to name but a few. How can it then implore others to treat their prisoners of war humanly.

by a reader on Sat, 12/11/2004 - 19:00 | reply

Bad v Worse?

Alan Forrester has had it with the British Conservative Party. Why? Just as the government and the Eurocrats are showing signs of ending their Luddite, anti-American, starvation-promoting tactic of banning genetically modified foods, what does the Conservative Party do? It emerges briefly from hibernation to speak out in favour of the ban. On what grounds? Mainly that (1) the ban is popular; and (2) it is opposed by (wait for it...) the government's friends in business. OK they do also make the legitimate conservative point that the introduction of GM crops would be hard to reverse; but under the circumstances, given the benefits of such crops and the fact that there has already been a lengthy delay during which intensive efforts have failed to discover a single danger or disadvantage, this argument is mere window-dressing. In reality there is nothing here but the "pointless, opportunistic sniping ... without bringing to bear any coherent criticism either on that or most other issues" of which we have complained before.

It seems likely now that at the next British election there will be no party that one could unequivocally say was the least bad of the bunch. Therefore one should vote for candidates on their individual merits. In this regard, Alan has come to a radical conclusion:

My local MP voted against the war on Iraq and I would still vote for him in preference to the bunch of oily, weasel brained, political runts that is the Conservative Party. From this moment on, the Conservatives are dead to me.

Given that the war on terror is still in progress, we have to doubt that conclusion, though we do sympathise with the sentiment.

But how did things get this bad?

Mon, 09/22/2003 - 11:51 | permalink

What Are Iran's Missiles For?

What are Iran's new long-range missiles for? Well, suppose that the Mad Mullahs were to paint the answer to that question in giant letters on the missiles themselves. Would anyone take any notice even then?

Meanwhile, Iran is scaling back its "co-operation" with the International Atomic Energy Agency's attempts to "verify" that Iran's nuclear program is peaceful. Has the IAEA considered checking whether anything is painted in large letters on Iran's nuclear installations? You never know.

By the way, let us take this opportunity to express our solidarity with BlogIran and with all those struggling for freedom in Iran.

Wed, 09/24/2003 - 07:22 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Iranian blogs

Here is a link where you can find links to almost all Iranian blogs, especially those from inside Iran (as a late response to a question in the comments' section of another post):
<http://hoder.com/weblog/>

And thanks for the solidarity. I'm still hoping to see a day when a free Iran and Israel are very close allies in the region. This could become the reality!

An Iranian Student

by a reader on Thu, 09/25/2003 - 07:59 | reply

Blog-Iran

Thank you for your strong support and solidarity - if you would like, please grab a BLOG-IRAN banner/logo from <http://www.activistchat.com/blogiran/join.html> and show it proudly :) take care and feel free to email..!

Haleh,
ActivistChat.com

by a reader on Fri, 09/26/2003 - 13:35 | reply

Iranian Blogs (continued)

Actually this is where you can find them all in one page, from the above given blog:
<http://blogsbyiranians.com/>

An Iranian Student

by a reader on Sat, 10/04/2003 - 07:17 | reply

Or alternatively what are the

Or alternatively what are the United States missiles for? Or Russia's or China's or Israel's? Deterrence probably. If you can hit us we are going to hit you. Next question.

by a reader on Thu, 03/17/2005 - 14:55 | reply

Re: Or alternatively what are the Wrong. Iran's missiles are primarily for the purpose that is painted on them.

Not all governments have the same purpose. And so not all missiles do. Just like not all armies do.

by Editor on Thu, 03/17/2005 - 15:13 | reply

No. Iran is a titch compared

No. Iran is a titch compared to Israel. Israel has what? ..a hundred nuclear weapons..advanced aircraft provided by the US.. and God knows what else in their armoury. You must know that if Iran attacked Israel they would invite their own destruction. You mistake Iranian propaganda for their intent..which seems to be at the moment to survive...just like Syria - I don't want them to survive by the way, they are horrible regime...I think we can both agree on that at least.

by a reader on Fri, 03/18/2005 - 20:40 | reply

Agreed, but...

Yes, they want to survive. Most people want to survive, even most homicidal lunatics. But that is no guarantee that they will act reasonably and not attempt Holocausts at the risk of their own lives. Fear regimes, which are inherently unstable, have to do certain things in order to survive. Things which are inherently dangerous to themselves as well as others and which do not always result in survival. A common one is to wage wars of naked aggression against other countries. The history of the twentieth century has many examples – from World War 2 to the invasion of the Falkland Islands – of tyrannical regimes embarking on actions because of the logic of their ideology, which itself was essential to their remaining in power, and nevertheless failing to survive.

Moreover, the rulers of Iran believe that they will survive – in paradise – if they die in the course of a holy war.

by Editor on Fri, 03/18/2005 - 21:16 | reply

Totally disagree. The Iranian

Totally disagree. The Iranians are rational planners - all that 'paradise' stuff is a lot of baloney and propaganda. All this is doing is ramping up the drums of war kind of thing. There is no evidence that they're planning anything as you kind of suggested.

The only reason they are being targeted by the US at the moment is because they are independent and the US wants them out. All the human rights stuff and links to terrorism is just used instrumentally to this end.

They are a fear regime at the moment..not in the way you suggested - although to reiterate they are horrible. The regime is frightened of what the US is going to do.

by a reader on Fri, 03/18/2005 - 23:08 | reply

The mullahs or anyone else in

The mullahs or anyone else in their shoes would do precisely the same. Need to remind you that in fact it was the Shah who started the nuclear research program. Besides, why is it that U.S.'s national interests always take priority over that of anyone else's?

I mean, as a concerned Iranian, just what tune of theirs do we have to dance to next? We had a perfectly democratically elected government in Mossadegue, then they go and topple him and bring back a despot who treats the country as his personal possession and buggers everything up to the inevitable miserable end of a revolution and a perfectly predictable power struggle creating the entity of an Islamic Republic.

Seems the needle has been stuck on the same tune for quite a while; look at Egypt, Saudi Arabia, Kuwait,.... all despotic regimes subjugating their people's will, finally something will have to give. Freedom is not the possession of the U.S to give, all humans aspire to it inately; such unjust regimes will fall, as they have done so in the past.

Most Iranians are sick to death of outside interference, starting with the Brits taking our oil for next to nothing and now the Americans selling us their brand of how we should think and live our lives.

They may bomb us, kill and mame us, but the knowledge can never be destroyed. Any rational leader of a country surrounded by foes, some with nuclear weapons, including Pakistan and Israel, will have no option but to consider the ultimate deterrent. Our history is marred with foriegn invaders for nothing more than our natural resources. It's time to put out people's interests first and not that of the American Stock Markets.

Freedom at last, freedom at last.....

by a reader on Sun, 09/25/2005 - 21:20 | reply

Yeah, right

Rational planners, purely defensive.

Not our enemies at all. Yeah, right.

by a reader on Wed, 09/28/2005 - 22:25 | reply

Iran and Democracy

I think that if we expect nations not to produce nuclear bombs (and surely that is desirable) we must include all nations, including those who have them at present. As for democracy Western style I think it's an illusion. It's a place where mafia's rule. You can't foist it on other more moral societies, Mr Bush. Free speech is an illusion. If I sign my name to this I'm liable to be targeted by one of the mafia's (even a young gang) so where is the free speech? As for Islam, it is obviously based on violence. The threat to kill unbelievers, critics of Mahommed, women whose behaviour deviates from the mullah's reading of the Koran etc. render it one of the great tyrannies of all time...I don't know if that can ever change..???

by a reader on Thu, 05/31/2007 - 17:26 | reply

Rationale of Tyranny

This piece was first published at my blog, here. It was provoked by this thread's comments.

There is a great confusion in the way people think about a tyrannical regime like the Islamic Republic of Iran. Does the regime really mean all the hateful propaganda they spread about the West? Do they mean it when they express a desire to "wipe Israel off the map" or "crush America under their feet"? Or when they write them on the missiles paraded in the streets? Aren't they just trying to survive? Wouldn't everyone else in their shoes do the same? Shouldn't we separate the "intent" (survival) from propaganda? Isn't the Islamic regime just another rational player?

Some of the answers are "yes", and some "no". But the point is these questions miss the actual rationale of tyranny.

I don't have a problem with accepting the Islamic regime, as a whole, as a rational player. But so what? Even rational players have assumptions that go into their decision making. And there is always room for questioning the moral justifications of those assumptions. Yes, even a tyrant could be rational. But does that somehow make his tyranny okay?

Would anyone in a tyrant's shoes do the same under external pressure? No! Why should they? If the outsiders have reasonable demands, one could adequately assure them that their demands are met. One doesn't need to be a violent and abrasive dictator even in an authoritarian system. Even a tyrant really does have options. In particular there is always the option of accepting to dismantle the dictatorship altogether. This has been demonstrated many times in recent history of non-violent revolutions, be it in Eastern Europe or in Chile.

But what about the intent and the propaganda? It is a major (and sometimes deliberate) confusion of logic to claim that the fact that a tyranny's intent is to survive would somehow make the propaganda it spreads less lethal and dangerous. It is the complete opposite. Tyrannies spread hateful and false propaganda because they want to survive. Survival is why they do what they do and propaganda (and repression) is how. And when the why demands that they actually act on the how they won't cringe. There is ample historical evidence for this. Here's one relevant to Iran:

In the second half of the Iran-Iraq war (more or less after Khorramshahr was liberated by the Iranian forces) when Iraq was in a defensive position and was seeking a ceasefire, the Islamic Republic continued the war and said it would not accept the UN resolution No. 598 for a ceasefire. So the war continued for another 4-5 years during which hundreds of thousands of Iranians were killed and the economy was shattered even more.

How did they convince the people to do this? Propaganda, of course, besides a cycle of repression and fear. The walls of Tehran were covered with slogans such as: "War, War, Till Victory!" or "The Path to Quds Goes Through Karbala" or "War, War, Till Mahdi's Revolution!". The only two TV stations were filled with stories of martyrdom, etc. Saddam was kafir (nonbeliever) and the war was one against kufr (nonbelief). Classic tyrannical propaganda methods were practiced. Moreover, almost any voice of dissent was brutally silenced. Those who had differing ideas from the head of the power pyramid, from all stripes and colors even many early supporters, were silenced, jailed and/or executed.

Why did they do this? To survive. Did they believe in all they said? Probably not. In fact, after the intent for survival forced the weakening regime to finally accept the ceasefire in 1988 (or "drink the potion of death" in the words of Khomeini), it was suddenly as if Saddam was no longer kafir or the path to Quds did not go through Karbala.

In short, the strategy of tyranny is set by the intent for survival and its tactics by the propaganda. They go hand in hand. So the question of whether they believe in their own propaganda becomes irrelevant to what they would actually do. They'd do as they see fit for their survival and this could include acting on existing propaganda, or creating new ones. But what is for certain is that we on the outside should never dismiss or devalue the dangers of their propaganda.

-- Cyrus Ferdowsi, <http://libiran.blogspot.com>

by Liberal Iranian on Tue, 06/05/2007 - 09:55 | reply

Copyright © 2008 Setting The World To Rights

Where We Oppose US Foreign Policy

We cheered when the US confronted and defeated the Taliban, and then Saddam Hussein. We fully support the US-led War on Terror. We endorsed America's opposition to European anti-GM-food measures and President Bush's assertion that they were based on "unfounded, unscientific fears", and we likewise side with the US on the issue of the Kyoto Protocol. Yet there is a respect in which we now find ourselves vehemently and conscientiously opposing US foreign policy.

The US is now pushing for a UN Resolution to ban human cloning. Why? The Bush Administration thinks that even newly fertilised eggs deserve to be treated like human beings because "We should not as a society grow life to destroy it, and that's exactly what's taking place". This appalling equivocation between the different meanings of the word 'life' is, like the other arguments presented in defence of this policy, so crude that simplisme hardly begins to describe it. We think that newly fertilised eggs can't think and that destroying them during medical research is morally unproblematic. Further legal impediments to such research will lead to the deaths of thinking human beings and so is a terrible evil. This policy was bad enough when it was limited to the United States. A ban throughout the world would be a catastrophe.

Thu, 09/25/2003 - 23:44 | permalink

Luckily...

We are fortunate in this case that a UN resolution would not actually amount to a global ban.

~Woty
<http://woty.davidsj.com>

by Woty on Fri, 09/26/2003 - 02:29 | reply

Picking and choosing

Certainly the resolution is not a positive move, but who is it likely to attract in the form of specific countries that would oppose it? Who has the most to gain from exploring and exploiting a technology that is banned in America?

Given the present US stand on GM-Food, it would be a tough/hypocritical position to take if they refused to allow the benefits derived from cloning and its spinoff technologies into the country when it becomes convenient, or when the people make an informed choice.

This is business versus morals; which one do you think wins the higher % of coin tosses?

Howard

by Howard Frank on Sun, 09/28/2003 - 20:38 | reply

Consider

Vegitarians who are for abortion... they can depersonalize a human genus, but not a pork chop...

That aside, it's not quite like intentionally making a life which runs a high risk of being malformed, in pain, diminished from what it could be - that's more than merely regrettable, or something to avoid - it's wilfully harming a person.

It really isn't all that hard to dope out - the moral absolutes are limited to simply not causing pain.....

by a reader on Mon, 09/29/2003 - 22:34 | reply

Business vs. Morals?

Howard Frank wrote:

'This is business versus morals; which one do you think wins the higher % of coin tosses?'

Er, what? Could you explain a little further why you think it's business vs morals?

Also, businesses really aren't any worse than anyone else on average morally speaking, imo, since they are groups of people who come together to make money by providing a product or service. One might as well ask 'Out of morality and people who wins most of the time?' Even if you were to pose the question as business vs. moral improvements I don't think it would make much more sense.

Another problem with your question is that it's the wrong question. The appropriate question to ask in most cases is not whether a given person or group makes the right decision most of the time, it is instead whether they are able and willing to correct mistakes when they realise they have made them. It's a bit like asking whether scientists are right or wrong about factual matters most of the time.

Finally, when a person or group is trying to decide between right and wrong they don't use a coin toss, they think.

by Alan Forrester on Tue, 09/30/2003 - 00:34 | reply

Lobbying.

I agree entirely with the World on the issue of the immorality of such a ban and feel strongly enough about it to want to sign up to any organisation that resists such action.

Whilst so-called "pro-lifers" have a very public face and a group to sign up to, what are genuine pro-lifers to do?

Anyone got any ideas?

by a reader on Sun, 10/05/2003 - 13:20 | reply

Bush is an idiot

I'm ashamed to be an American and I'm scared to death of Bush.

by a reader on Wed, 10/08/2003 - 05:11 | reply

Ashamed to be an American?

I hear this a lot.

It always strikes me as strange that one's pride in being an american can be pinned to the actions of the current president.

Should I have been ashamed to be an american if a foolish, technocratic, enviro-idiot like Gore had been elected?

Presidents come and go. Their mistakes don't change what being an american is all about. America is about individual liberty. I'm proud to be a part of that tradition.

If you're ashamed to be an american then maybe you should just be ashamed to be you.

Bush has made many mistakes; but he's gotten the crucial things right. While I think it's foolish to be guided by religious faith (as I think is is on the human cloning issue), he's certainly not an idiot.

Gil

by Gil on Wed, 10/08/2003 - 18:42 | reply

Villepin Demands

French Foreign Minister Dominique de Villepin has demanded that the Coalition transfer power to an Iraqi government by the end of this year.

Steven Den Beste replies:

Stick your demands where the sun doesn't shine.

We'll leave Iraq when we, and the Iraqi people, are ready.

A full and valid rebuttal, in our opinion.

And the wonderful thing is, that is likely to be the response of the Coalition too. Though they will express it in even fewer words. None, to be exact. Just actions.

Mon, 09/29/2003 - 14:25 | permalink

Sticking or Staying?

Do you mean the actions of sticking his demands where the sun doesn't shine? Or, staying in Iraq until we and the Iraqi people are ready?

I suspect putting the former on Pay-Per-View might finance the latter.

Gil

by Gil on Tue, 09/30/2003 - 06:13 | reply

Pay-Per-View

I suspect putting the former on Pay-Per-View might finance the latter.

Yes, but Foggy Bottom might consider this a bum idea.

by a reader on Tue, 09/30/2003 - 14:29 | reply

The David Kelly Affair

Governments are allowed to 'spin' – i.e. to place the most favourable interpretation that they can on the facts. In fact, in our system of government, spinning is an essential part of their job, just as it is the job of any advocate in any adversarial system. What they are not allowed to do is lie. And they did not lie.

The BBC, on the other hand, is a public-service broadcaster and has a duty not to spin. But not only did it spin, it lied. Repeatedly.

That's all there is to this affair.

Mon, 09/29/2003 - 17:19 | permalink

One What?

From the User's Manual of a Philips television:

Your TV consumes energy in the standby mode. Energy consumption contributes to air and water pollution.

Power consumption 1 W.

One Watt!

Getting on one's moral high horse over such a minuscule amount of power has nothing to do with preventing air and water pollution. This is religious ritual. And the religion in question, which systematically seeks and obtains state enforcement of its taboos and has the colossal gall simply to assume that you have nothing more valuable to do with your time and attention than scurry around saving Watts one at a time, stinks.

Thu, 10/02/2003 - 20:41 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Read The Report

You're probably thinking "they haven't found any actual weapons of mass destruction (yet) in Iraq, but they have found the next best thing, namely evidence of WMD programmes".

You must read David Kay's interim report. It cannot be adequately summarised, so you will not understand what has been happening unless you read it.

Update: Andrew Sullivan came to the same conclusion before us.

Fri, 10/03/2003 - 12:27 | permalink

Quiz:

Who first advocated the use of chemical weapons against opposition Kurds and Arabs in Iraq?

- A.Saddam
- B.Chemical Ali
- C.Winston Churchill
- D.The C.I.A.

by a reader on Sun, 10/05/2003 - 16:18 | reply

Quiz on Chemical Weapons

In answer to "a reader"'s question.

The first leader In the Middle East to use chemical weapons may well have been Saladin, who happened to be a Kurd:
<http://www.fordham.edu/halsall/source/1189barbarossa-lets.html>
But Saladin was a humane and honorable man and, if the story is true, he will undoubtedly have targeted only enemy soldiers. This is in stark contrast to his nemesis King Richard of England, who massacred civilians as a matter of policy, though without using chemical weapons:
<http://www.historylearningsite.co.uk/Saladin.htm>

The morality of British leaders improved greatly over the centuries, and by the early twentieth century, it would have been unthinkable for a British army to target civilians at all, let alone with chemicals. However, chemical weapons were still used on combatants in warfare, notably in the First World War, and immediately afterwards, Churchill is said to have advocated using them in that way in Iraq. However, this was never done.

Later, the international community decided to ban such weapons, even against soldiers. America and Britain played a leading role in promoting this ban.

The morality of Middle Eastern leaders, however, did not improve. The first leader in the Middle East to use chemical weapons against civilians was probably Gamal Abdul Nasser:
<http://www.fas.org/nuke/guide/egypt/cw/>

Nasser was idolized and emulated in many ways, including this way, by Saddam Hussein and other Ba'athists such as Chemical Ali.

And your point is?

by a reader on Sun, 10/05/2003 - 17:27 | reply

Re: Quiz on Chemical Weapons

Actually Nasser only used chemical weapons against combatants, as far as we know. If we're wrong, can someone correct us on this?

by Editor on Sun, 10/05/2003 - 18:09 | reply

Churchill

Clearly Saladin didn't use chemical weapons that were in any way like the weapons that have been in use from W.W.I to the present. (If you have any evidence to the contrary please cite it.)

"it would have been unthinkable for a British army to target civilians at all" What was the military objective in Dresden?

I believe Churchill's words were: "I do not understand this squeamishness about the use of gas. I am strongly in favour of using poison gas against uncivilised tribes." And apparently poison gas was used in artillery shells though not in bombs. (again if you have any evidence to the contrary please cite it.)

My point is: it seems odd to apparently have in your Pantheon of heroes someone who advocated exactly what Saddam implemented

by a reader on Tue, 10/07/2003 - 03:51 | reply

Evil resides more in the ends, than in the means

I don't think any weapon, or any military tactic, is necessarily evil under all possible circumstances. It is therefore a mistake to focus our criticism of evil individuals and movements, on their chosen tactics. We should criticise them first and foremost for their intended ends, and only secondarily for the compounding offence of employing means that are not justifiable by the objective merit of those ends.

by Kolya on Wed, 10/08/2003 - 23:12 | reply

Not ends, choices

Evil isn't in the results of an action. Nor the 'means' (I don't think 'means' is very precise/coherent). It's in the choices made.

Sometimes doctors try their very best to save lives, but do things that are physically guaranteed to kill the patient due to imperfect medical knowledge. But this isn't evil murder. The choice the doctor made was to help the patient as best he could.

And it's possible for an assassin to try to wrongly murder a good man, but miss and hit another assassin instead. This act, attempted assassination, was the wrong choice, and evil, but had good results.

-- Elliot Temple

by a reader on Thu, 10/09/2003 - 03:21 | reply

Re: What was the military objective at Dresden?

The irony in that rhetorical question is not justified. Dresden was bombed because it was in the path of the advancing Red Army, which was fighting its way into Nazi Germany. German resistance was still intense and Soviet losses were still heavy. There was no justification for the Western Allies to let up. For a brief description of the situation see http://www.greenhillbooks.com/extracts/Bomber_harris.html

"Martin Gilbert goes so far as to call the raid a direct result of the Yalta agreement – to make emergency use of Anglo-American air power in order to disrupt German reinforcements moving eastward to the Russian front.

...

Those who contend that it was unnecessary, indeed wrong, to attack the city centre ignore the practicalities of trying to bomb with high precision at great distance and in conditions that were not only hard to predict but might conceivably lead to another Nuremberg. If the job was to be done at all it was essential to go for the city as a whole"

by a reader on Thu, 10/09/2003 - 04:51 | reply

Re: Evil resides more in the ends

So what was the end goal for Churchill? Were the Kurds and Arabs an eminent danger to British citizens? No. The goal was to control a newly acquired piece of the British empire. (Acquired from the Ottoman empire after W.W.I.)

by a reader on Sat, 10/11/2003 - 21:39 | reply

Copyright © 2005 Setting The World To Rights

Russian Academy of Sciences Bitchslaps Environmental Movement

(via InstaPundit:)

Iain Murray is somewhat overstating the case when he says that this is "probably the biggest story in the world right now".

A senior adviser to President Vladimir Putin has cast further doubt on whether Russia will ever ratify the Kyoto agreement on limiting emissions of the greenhouse gases linked to global warming.

Andrei Illarionov, who advises the president on economic policy, was speaking the day after Mr Putin refused to set a timetable for Russian ratification, angering supporters of Kyoto around the world.

So long as Russia stays out, the UN protocol setting targets for cutting emissions from the burning of fossil fuels cannot take legal effect.

But it is indeed a significant and under-reported story. Russia is about to help the US to save the world again. To save it several trillion dollars, that is.

Tue, 10/07/2003 - 01:32 | permalink

Hooray for Putin! His gove...

Hooray for Putin!

His government has behaved rather badly over the Iraq war, weapons sales to Iran, but this time he's done something right.

Kyoto is a dreadful document and the sooner it is dead and buried the better off the world - including the environment - will be. Except perhaps for Europe, which was attempting to use Kyoto for its own economic advantage. But who really cares about Europe anymore - its a lost cause!

by a reader on Wed, 10/08/2003 - 07:10 | reply

What's with "bitchslaps" anyway?

I am the only one who finds this offensive? What if this was "kidspansks" or "jewkills"?

Or should I just start taking my "anti-PC" pills again?

by Pat on Tue, 10/14/2003 - 20:40 | reply

Re: What's with "bitchslaps" anyway?

We were intentionally speaking out of character for the sake of ironical emphasis, as was Iain Murray whom we were echoing.

We apologise to Pat and any other dog lovers who may have been offended by the metaphor, and assure them that no animals were harmed in the making of this blog.

by Editor on Wed, 10/15/2003 - 00:09 | reply

Horrors

Our civilisation has fought some horrors recently and even defeated some. Others continue, partly because we have left it far too long and they are now objectively hard to defeat, but mainly because we have yet to find enough common ground amongst ourselves on the morality of opposing them at all. Notably:

Tyranny, torture, starvation and ruin in North Korea. And of course belligerent, genocidal threats.

Mass-murder of Jews in Israel – and the Final Solution of the Israel Problem being planned, unimpeded.

Shame on us.

Sat, 10/04/2003 - 16:12 | permalink

CNN's Mission Accomplished

CNN Newsnight, 3:15am BST today, John King reporting:

The new [public-relations] push coincides with a number of difficulties and setbacks. 91 Americans killed in action since Mr Bush visited an aircraft carrier to declare mission accomplished...

Did he really? Read what the President actually said on that aircraft carrier:

major combat operations in Iraq have ended. In the battle of Iraq, the United States and our allies have prevailed

The word "mission" occurs twice in the speech, on both occasions referring to the uncompleted mission facing the coalition in the War on Terror. He did say a month later to troops in Qatar:

I am happy to see you, and so are the long-suffering people of Iraq. America sent you on a mission to remove a grave threat and to liberate an oppressed people, and that mission has been accomplished.

But that's a different issue, and an undeniably true comment.

Incidentally, more US soldiers than that have died of non-combat causes in Iraq during the same period.

Thu, 10/09/2003 - 02:23 | permlink

Nobel Peace Prize for Saddam

The Pope is tipped to win this year's Nobel Peace Prize for doing everything in his power to keep Saddam Hussein's peaceful regime peacefully in place.

There is no doubt that if the Pope's profound moral insights had been heeded by President Bush, Saddam would still be peacefully in power today. It has been pointed out that the Pope's candidacy faces the obstacle that the jury "is majority female and the pope's position on abortion, contraception, the role of women in the church and homosexuality are well known."

– not to mention other controversial decisions. But it is thought that his decision to speak out at this critical moment in history, as well as his decision not to speak out on a certain other issue, will outweigh all those factors. Indeed, why should they disqualify him, since even being a mass murderer and bloodthirsty dictator has not previously been deemed to disqualify a person from receiving the Peace Prize?

That being so, the Pope's candidacy should nevertheless be set aside, for his contribution to the maintenance of Saddam's Peace is clearly less than that of Saddam himself, so it is Saddam who deserves the Prize.

Thu, 10/09/2003 - 15:17 | permalink

Nobel Peace Prize Deserved

Occasionally a monkey with a typewriter will type something worth saying. Occasionally the Nobel Peace Prize Committee awards the prize to someone who deserves it. This is one of those times.

Bravo to Shirin Ebadi. In receiving the prize, she honours them far more than they honour her.

Update: D'Oh! Perhaps not.

Further Update:

Iranian Nobel peace laureate Shirin Ebadi said Sunday she hoped there would be no military strike on Iran, the focus of US and Israeli concern over its nuclear programme.

"We hope that there will be no attack against Iran, because Iran doesn't have the atomic bomb

How does she know? The Mullahs may be mad, but they're surely not so mad that they reveal their nuclear plans to prominent dissidents. In fact, what on earth is she talking about?

and the Iranian people are peaceful.

Yes. But it's not the Iranian people who will have their finger on the nuclear button. Shouldn't a human-rights activist have noticed the distinct lack of people-power in Iran at the moment? Again, what is she talking about?

After so many years of war, they are tired of conflict."

The people are tired, therefore the rulers are entitled to develop weapons of mass destruction in peace? We don't think so, Shirin Ebadi.

Yes, the Iranian people are tired of war. They are tired of tyranny too. But are they tired enough? Are they asking themselves sufficiently seriously whether they are really going to allow their rulers to threaten Israel and others with nuclear weapons?

obviously not. :( (sigh)

AIS

by a reader on Tue, 10/14/2003 - 04:07 | reply

Uh-oh...

...Headscarf 'strengthens women'

by Pat on Tue, 10/14/2003 - 04:18 | reply

Copyright © 2005 Setting The World To Rights

Three Threats

This week:

- A ten-year-old boy in a small town in Texas phoned in a hoax warning to the police that his school was going to be blown up.
- A famous American holy man advocated blowing up the US State Department's headquarters with a nuclear weapon.
- Syria threatened the security of the world:

Undersecretary of State John Bolton who outlined the administration's case against Damascus to a Senate subcommittee on Tuesday ... reiterated U.S. accusations that Syria is developing chemical, biological and nuclear weapons.

He accused Damascus of taking "a series of hostile actions," including allowing military equipment to flow into Iraq, and "permitting volunteers to pass into Iraq to attack and kill service members during the war", a practice which he says is continuing.

All three threats naturally caused consternation. What was done about them?

- The 10-year-old boy was arrested and will be charged with a felony.
- The holy man got his just deserts: he received a complaint from the State Department and was roundly ridiculed by the media.
- The Syrian regime was gently admonished and informed (with the greatest care not to damage its fragile dignity) that its present behaviour was wrong and unacceptable and might, if continued, incur consequences not including violence.

A world upside-down.

Meanwhile the nations of the world flocked to the defence of the Syrian regime's right to operate terrorist training camps. That's contemptible.

Copyright © 2007 Setting The World To Rights

Update to Nobel Prize Story

We have updated our reaction to Shirin Ebadi's Nobel Peace Prize.

Tue, 10/14/2003 - 02:15 | permalink

Tim Starr Replies to Dean Ahmad

What follows is a letter from Tim Starr to the Editor of Freedom Network News. For those who believe it is just for us to defend ourselves against terrorism, Tim has created a new e-mail list called "Fight For Liberty!" which you are invited to join. You can do so either by sending an email message to fightforliberty-subscribe@yahoogroups.com or at the Yahoo web site here.

Editor:

I very much enjoyed this year's ISIL conference in Vilnius, Lithuania. It was my tenth one in a row, and each one seems to keep on getting better than the last.

Unfortunately, the conference was marred by the lack of representation for the "hawk" side on the panel discussion of war and foreign policy. I would like to try to make up for that deficiency by replying to Dean Ahmad's presentation in this letter.

Ahmad began by pointing out that traditional Islam made great contributions to science, philosophy, and the rule of law. This is true. However, those contributions stopped centuries ago. Also, Ahmad did not mention the "dark side" of Islam. Perhaps this is because he personally rejects those elements of traditional Islam, as do most moderate Muslims today. However, today's militant Islamists intend to restore traditional Islam in its entirety, including its more unlibertarian elements.

This was demonstrated by what militant Islamists did within the regime where they had the most power, Afghanistan, where the Taliban banned music, kite-flying, chess, movies, and carrying guns without a permit (issued at the discretion of the Taliban, of course). Men were forbidden to shave their beards. Women were forbidden to go have professions outside the home or to leave home without wearing a burkha and being accompanied by a male relative. The Taliban also blew up the historic giant statues of Buddha at Bamiyan because they considered them to be pagan and because they considered all representational art to be contrary to Islam. The Taliban imposed the death penalty for homosexuality, for proselytizing non-Islamic religions, and had special religious police to enforce such laws. This is the sort of thing we have in store for us if the Islamists get their way, and it would be a grave mistake for us to ignore the roots of their vision in traditional Islam.

The most unlibertarian aspect of traditional Islam is Jihad. While the literal meaning of the word "jihad" is merely "struggle" or "striving," its meaning in traditional Islam is much more than that. Ibn Khaldun, who is sometimes cited by libertarians as the Islamic Adam Smith, summarized the meaning of "Jihad" according to all schools of Islamic thought thusly:

"In the Muslim community, the holy war is a religious duty, because of the universalism of the (Muslim) mission and (the obligation to) convert everybody to Islam either by persuasion or by force. Therefore, caliphate and royal authority are united in (Islam), so that the person in charge can devote the available strength to both of them."

That clearly says that Jihad means holy war to convert everyone to Islam, and, historically, the spread of Islam was largely by wars of aggression. In the West, Islamic conquerors were only stopped by military force, first at the battle of Poitiers in southern France, and then later at the gates of Vienna, where the Austrians along with their Polish and Lithuanian allies stopped them. In the East, Moslems conquered their way through India, establishing the Mughal Empire. In the West, Islamic civilization culminated in the Ottoman Empire. Traditional Islam is not opposed to imperialist aggression, so long as it is Islamic imperialist aggression.

The history of traditional Islamic civilization is also plagued by democide (mass-murder). When Mohammed conquered Arabia in the 7th century, he massacred and expelled the Jews. When Tamerlane conquered India in 1398, he executed 100,000 prisoners of war in one action alone. Even in Islamic Spain, which has often been cited as an example of tolerance under Islamic rule, Christians and Jews were massacred by the thousands. The Ottomans massacred thousands of Armenians as late as the 1890s.

Since Islamic law permits enslavement of non-Moslems, many of those who were conquered by Moslems were enslaved. For centuries, Serbian boys were enslaved into the Janissaries, the elite soldiers of the Ottoman Sultan. The Islamic slave trade began long before the Western slave trade, and continued long after the West led the world in abolishing slavery. Slavery wasn't officially abolished in Saudi Arabia until the 1960s, and unofficially continues there today, as well as in other Islamic countries like Sudan.

Jews and Christians who were spared execution and enslavement, but failed to convert to Islam, were subject to a form of religious apartheid called "dhimmitude." It is illegal under Islamic law to force people to convert to Islam, but "dhimmi" are obliged to pay a special head tax that is not imposed upon Moslems, and are forbidden to proselytize, to repair old churches/temples, or to build new ones. Their testimony is not admissible in Islamic courts. This "privileged" status was reserved only for Jews and Christians, since

Islam considers them "People of the Book". Islamic law does not require the extension of these privileges to pagans, Hindus, Buddhists, atheists, etc.

The combined effect over time of these Islamic policies of mass-murdering, enslaving, and subjugating non-Moslems was to radically reduce the numbers of non-Moslems living under Islamic rule, until the nineteenth century when the European powers got the Ottoman Empire to improve its treatment of its Jewish and Christian subjects. That is the reality of what Ahmad described as Jews and Christians living "peacefully" under Islamic rule.

Ahmad blamed Western intervention for the lack of freedom in Arab countries, saying that they imitated the socialism of their former colonizers, and that it was racist to hold Arab culture responsible for the lack of freedom in those countries. However, racism is based upon biology, not culture, and there are reasons to think that Arab culture bears some responsibility for the lack of freedom in the Arab world.

The political regimes of the Arab world range from authoritarian monarchies to totalitarian dictatorships, and yet none of the European colonizers of the Middle East were authoritarian monarchies or totalitarian dictatorships. The Arab countries did not imitate the social democracy of their former colonizers, the British and the French; they imitated the totalitarian socialism of Nazi Germany and Soviet Russia. The Arab countries did not imitate the freedom of religion, freedom of expression, and separation of powers of Western Europe; they imitated the orthodoxy, censorship, and autocracy of Eastern Europe. It is no surprise that traditional Islamic rulers were also autocrats who censored unorthodox ideas.

Ahmad then turned to Iraq, and attributed the overthrow of Saddam Hussein to the influence of neoconservatives and falsified intelligence. However, there is no need to fabricate evidence that Saddam Hussein was a fascist dictator with a history of reckless aggression, sponsorship of terrorism, and the development and use of weapons of mass destruction. Saddam Hussein initiated two wars of aggression against Iran and one against Kuwait, launched missiles at Israel, paid $25,000 checks to the families of Palestinian suicide bombers, used chemical weapons against the Iranians and the Kurds, and pursued nuclear power despite having enough oil to provide for all the energy Iraq could have possibly needed for any civilian purpose. These are well-known facts, not a bunch of lies cooked up by some neoconservative conspiracy.

Furthermore, for every piece of pre-war intelligence that has turned out to be false, many more have been confirmed. US inspectors found a nuclear centrifuge buried in the backyard of an Iraqi nuclear scientist. Western journalists found Iraqi intelligence files detailing the Saddam-Osama Pact. Sources considered "highly credible" by the CIA have confirmed meetings between Iraqi intelligence and Ayman al-Zawahiri, Al Qaeda's second-in-command, and that the former head of Iraqi external intelligence, Farouk Hijazi, gave a significant amount of money to Al Qaeda.

Ahmad claimed that neoconservatives want the US to forcibly impose their views upon the rest of the world. The leading neoconservative, William Kristol, denied this when I heard him speak at the World Affairs Council in San Francisco. Only dictatorships that sponsor terrorism and pursue weapons of mass destruction are to be targeted for regime change according to President Bush's National Security Strategy, and even then military force is only a last resort. Ahmad also made much of the fact that some neoconservatives called for the overthrow of Saddam's Ba'athist dictatorship back in 1998. Does that make them "premature anti-Ba'athists"? What's so bad about advocating the overthrow of a ruthless dictator responsible for the death of more Moslems than anyone else in the whole twentieth century?

Finally, Dr. Ahmad turned to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, claiming that more Palestinian than Israeli civilians have been killed in the current Intifada, at a ratio of three to one. He didn't cite any source, so it's impossible to verify this claim. However, the Israelis try to avoid killing Palestinian civilians, and issue statements of apology and regret when they accidentally kill civilians. The Palestinians deliberately try to kill as many Israeli civilians as possible, and celebrate when they succeed. Palestinian terrorists also use civilians as human shields, so as to make it as difficult as possible for the Israelis to attack the terrorists without killing civilians. Many of those Palestinian civilians were killed when the Israelis attacked Palestinian terrorists who were about to kill Israeli civilians. If those attacks had not been prevented, a lot more Israeli civilians would have been killed.

Ahmad singled out Israel for its alleged militarism, racism, and collectivism. However, Israel has never been a military dictatorship, unlike many other countries in the Middle East. Ahmad failed to mention that Israel has about a million Arab citizens whose legal rights are equal to those of Israeli Jews, and much greater than the legal rights of Arabs in Arab countries. For example, Israel is the only country in the Middle East in which Arab women have the right to vote.

Ahmad also failed to mention any of the anti-Jewish policies of the Arab regimes, such as the Palestinian Authority making it a death penalty offense for Palestinians to sell land to Jews and the specific exclusion of Jews from Jordan's Law of Return. Since Israel's founding, hundreds of thousands of Jews have fled to Israel from anti-Semitic persecution in Arab countries. There have been about as many of these Jewish refugees as there were Palestinian refugees from the Israeli War of Independence.

As for Israel's socialism, the only Middle Eastern countries with more economic freedom than Israel are Bahrain and the United Arab Emirates, according to the Heritage Foundation's 2003 Index of Economic Freedom. Compared to Europe, Israel has more economic freedom than Latvia, the Czech Republic, France, and Armenia.

Ahmad blamed Israel alone for the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, saying that it was only Israeli refusal to discuss the Palestinian "Right of Return" that prevented the alleged Palestinian moderates from controlling the hard-liners. However, the history of refugee problems shows that a "right of return" for refugees is not a necessary precondition for the establishment of peace. For instance, more than 15 million Germans were expelled from Czechoslovakia and Poland at the end of WWII. Yet we do not see millions of German refugees from Poland and Czechoslovakia (and their children and grandchildren) living in refugee camps, committing acts of terrorism against Poland and Czechia, and demanding their "right of return." German claims to lost property are being pursued peacefully by lawsuits, not mass-murder. What explains the difference? Germany allowed its refugees to integrate into mainstream German society. The Palestinian refugees have never been allowed to do that. Their Arab rulers have kept them in refugee camps for decades, in order to maintain a permanently disgruntled army of "innocent victims" from which to recruit terrorists to murder Israeli civilians.

Arab political leaders have had at least three opportunities to accept a peaceful settlement in the Middle East in which the Palestinians would have gotten their own state – in 1937, in 1947, and in 2000. Each time, the Arab leaders have refused, because they would have had to accept Jewish sovereignty on "their" land. The Arab leaders refused to accept Jewish independence of Islamic rule before there were any Palestinian refugees from the Israeli War of Independence, and ever since then they have been inflating the number of refugees as much as possible and demanding their right to return in numbers large enough to demographically overwhelm the Israelis, thus eliminating Israel as a bastion of Jewish independence.

In 1967, Israel fought and won the Six Day War, then offered to trade the land it won in that defensive war for peace with its enemies. Egypt and Jordan did eventually take Israel up on this offer, and Israel kept its promises, dismantling settlements in the Sinai Desert and relinquishing territory to Egypt and Jordan. Yet Islamists assassinated Egyptian President Anwar Sadat for the "treason" of making peace with Israel, and Egypt still allows weapons to be smuggled through its territory into Gaza to arm the Islamist terrorists of Hamas, who reject the very existence of Israel.

In 2000, the Barak government of Israel offered Arafat virtually everything he could reasonably want, including $30 billion in compensation for the Palestinian refugees, but Arafat still refused the offer and launched the current wave of terrorist attacks against Israeli civilians, instead.

The militant Islamic terrorists who have declared war on the USA, Israel, all of their allies around the world, and who call for the killing of all Americans, Jews, and those Moslems they consider "apostates" are not animated by an essentially libertarian worldview, or by opposition to imperialism and colonialism. Theirs is a vision of conquest, enslavement and religious apartheid for the whole world that makes Puritanism look mild in comparison, and they have repeatedly demonstrated their willingness to mass-murder anyone who stands in their way, even if they have to commit suicide in the process. It is a mystery to me how anyone who considers himself a libertarian can blame this terrorism upon its intended victims, and characterize the measures taken to defend against it as imperialist aggression.

Tim Starr

Tue, 10/14/2003 - 08:33 | permalink

Copyright © 2005 Setting The World To Rights

Who “Invented Human Rights” And For What Purpose?

E. Nough reports that according to Mahathir Mohamad, the Prime Minister of Malaysia, it was “The Jews” that did it. And why? “So the persecuting them would appear to be wrong”, so that they could continue to “rule the world by proxy”...

In case the E. Nough link doesn't work, [here is the news report of the speech.]

Why are Mahathir Mohamad's evil delusions almost never reported in the mainstream media? Why is he almost invariably described as a “moderate Muslim leader”?

Update: Read Charles Johnson's comments on the speech.

Thu, 10/16/2003 - 13:29 | permalink

Chirac Blocks EU Criticism of Anti-Semitic Statements

According to this story:

At their own summit in Brussels, Belgium, European Union leaders had drafted a harshly worded statement condemning Mahathir's remarks, but French President Jacques Chirac blocked the wording from becoming a part of a final declaration.

Gil

by Gil on Fri, 10/17/2003 - 20:18 | reply

More interesting

More interesting were the comments of our new “ally” Hamid Karzai:

Asked by the AP whether he thought the speech was anti-Semitic, Afghan President Hamid Karzai said: “I don't think so.”

“Dr. Mahathir spoke of the inhibitions within the Islamic world and that those inhibitions must go away, and I entirely agree with that,” Karzai said.

What are the chances that the new leadership of Iraq would be any different?

by a reader on Sat, 10/18/2003 - 04:00 | reply

Copyright © 2005 Setting The World To Rights

Arms Control: What Not To Do

The left has some remarkably silly ideas about law, international law and guns. Now Amnesty International, Oxfam and the International Action Network on Small Arms (Iansa) have banded together to campaign for strict controls on national and international arms trades. They call this the Control Arms campaign.

Under the treaty they propose, governments would be held accountable for not having gun control laws in their own country. Never mind that, as we have written before, gun control does not reduce gun crime and does reduce personal freedom. But why should things like facts and arguments be allowed to get in the way of such a ~~pointless, stupid waste of paper~~ necessary security measure?

The treaty would also make it an offence to sell weapons to countries that might use them to commit atrocities, as well as restricting certain weapons such as landmines that would be banned according to the 1997 Mine Ban Treaty. The US has not signed that Treaty because it is fatally flawed as such proposals very often are.

So who exactly is going to decide which weapons transfers constitute a risk? The answer implicitly given in their ~~unintentionally entertaining~~ highly cogent document Shattered Lives (available here) is: the United Nations. So in summary: the Control Arms campaign wants to take control of the flow of arms away from democratic states and hand it over to a corrupt organisation that encourages terrorism and is dominated by the very governments whose existence depends on the misuse of weapons. Israel, for instance, wouldn't be able to buy so much as a peashooter, while the UN would be falling over itself to give Yasser Arafat nuclear bombs – or at least F-16s – in the name of fairness. Fortunately the campaign is unlikely to succeed, since too many of the UN's influential members are themselves enthusiastic sellers of weapons to corrupt dictatorships.

By the way, selling arms to dictatorships is not always wrong. It may be the right thing to do if the dictator is an ally in the destruction of a more dangerous dictator, or of more dangerous terrorists. This is because it is not guns that cause human rights abuses: they are physical objects that can be used for good or bad purposes. The lion's share of human rights abuses are the result of evil, failed ideologies like Islamism and Communism which seek to eliminate the institutions of rational and peaceful decision making. By seeking a UN monopoly on decisions about who gets to be armed and who has to be disarmed, the Control Arms campaign is trying to do exactly the same.

Fri, 10/17/2003 - 21:39 | permalink

UN Gun Control: Enabler of Genocide

Those who advocate UN gun control don't seem to have learned the lesson of the UN's previous great experiment in gun control - the arms embargo upon the former Yugoslavia. Since the Serbs had already grabbed the contents of the Yugoslavian national army, the main effect of the arms embargo was to prevent the Bosnian Moslems from getting enough heavy weapons to defend themselves. The result was 'ethnic cleansing,' in which the Bosnian Serbs would simply shell a Bosnian Moslem city with artillery, well out of the range of any small arms the Bosnian Moslems might have had, reduce it to rubble, then send in the infantry to exterminate those remaining alive.

by timstarr on Sat, 10/18/2003 - 18:25 | reply

E. Nough on Bush

The Emperor Misha has decided that the President's decision to exempt the PLO from the provisions of the Anti-Terrorism Act 1987 is an amoral step too far, and will not vote for him again. He won't vote Democrat, he'll abstain. Amish Tech Support, unaccountably, agrees.

They're just being silly. Too silly to be worth arguing against, really. But E. Nough, in the course of doing so, makes some wise remarks on a variety of related topics, including an interesting speculation on what might have happened if Al Gore had won the last election. It's not what you think!

Oh, and while you're there at E. Nough's blog, check out his post on the significance of Mahathir Mohamad's recent antisemitic speech.

Mon, 10/20/2003 - 00:14 | permalink

An Amusing Musing on Epistemology

Educational videos usually aren't.

This one is: The Theory of Knowledge.

Update: Note that this is a 25MB QuickTime file.

Wed, 10/22/2003 - 14:07 | permalink

Finding Hidden Weapons in Iraq

US forces have found a major cache of weapons adjacent to a mosque in Iraq, including 317 4-foot rockets and 220 anti-tank mines.

Had Iraq's weapons of mass destruction been hidden there too, they would have been discovered today.

They would not have been discovered until today.

Moreover, these weapons were much easier to find than WMD because these weapons were in a tunnel system hidden underneath another weapons cache (is that smart, or dumb?), which was in use, so bad guys must have been coming and going there from time to time.

Thu, 10/23/2003 - 21:18 | permalink

Silliness

James Randi has invented a “paranormal pyramid”. (Yes, really.) And for good measure, he has performed a very impressive card trick in space without leaving the ground. (By the way, can any of our readers tell us how it was done?)

Meanwhile Princess Diana, dead these six years, has succeeded in becoming sillier.

We have now called three apparently unrelated things “silly” in the past week or so. Coincidence? We don't think so.

Sat, 10/25/2003 - 00:15 | permlink

Terrorist Lacks Credibility

We trust you can all remember Osama Bin Laden's categorical denial on September 16, 2001, that he perpetrated the September 11 attacks. And the respectful credence that these cynical lies were given in the press?

After a suicide bombing in Gaza killed three Americans, Reuters managed to find a member of Palestinian Islamic Jihad (PIJ) with something interesting to say:

“We view it as inappropriate to target Europeans, Americans or any nationality other than the occupation forces,” top Jihad member Nafez Azzam told Reuters, referring to Israel and its hold on the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

By the way, here's a member of the occupation forces being carried from the battlefield after being successfully targeted by Islamic Jihad.

Now let's take a trip down memory lane to February 2003, when four of Palestinian Islamic Jihad members were arrested. Among the items found in their flat were a manifesto for the PIJ:

A written PIJ “manifesto” uncovered during the course of the investigation outlines the goals and command structure of the group. The manifesto stated that the PIJ was led by a Secretary General and a Shura Council, a central advisory committee. The manifesto rejected “any peaceful solution to the Palestinian cause, and the affirmation of the Jihad solution and the martyrdom style as the only choice for liberation.” The manifesto indicated that the only purpose of PIJ was to destroy Israel and end all Western influence (of the “Great Satan-America”) in the region regardless to the cost of the inhabitants.

We wonder how the PIJ intend to end Western influence in the region. Are they planning to do this by asking nicely? Whether or not the PIJ are responsible for this specific bombing, we have no doubt that they will continue to kill Westerners without compunction. But when will the Western media acquire the compunction to stop reporting cynical lies as fact?

Update: E. Nough mentions the PFLP's (and Syrian government's) most recent public lie at the end of this interesting piece.

Sun, 10/26/2003 - 15:19 | permalink

Copyright © 2005 Setting The World To Rights

Reluctant Experts

During the Second World War, many British people who in peacetime barely knew that “faraway” Czechoslovakia existed, now found themselves keeping world maps on their walls and annotating them meticulously. The location of Czechoslovakia as well as even farther-away places like Manchuria, Cyrenaica and the Coral Sea became as familiar to them as that of the local pub.

Geography was not the only subject in which they became reluctant experts. They had to learn some history too. And military strategy and tactics. And logistics and aeronautics and weapons technology. Worst of all, understanding the day-to-day news required a working knowledge of such inherently worthless and boring ideas as ‘Lebensraum’ and the ‘Master Race’.

The sudden need to assimilate large quantities of information in which they would otherwise have had no interest was a burden. Fear was diverting people's attention and creativity away from the positive endeavours that normally move the human race forwards, and into a holding pattern of self-defence. Causing this waste was part of the damage done by the Nazis to the human race.

It may seem inappropriate to dwell on this intangible, psychological injury when the perpetrators also committed some of the worst physical aggression, tyranny and genocide in history. But they are connected. People do not lightly seek out knowledge in subjects that are alien and uncongenial to them.

Today, as citizens in wartime, it is once again incumbent on us to think carefully and rationally about the morality of large-scale violence, and take refuge neither in comforting illusions nor in comforting self-abnegation. That this loss of innocence is necessary is an ugly fact. This, too, is something on which, in a better world, only specialist historians and philosophers would be experts. That every decent person has now developed a sophisticated stance on such things as collateral damage, human shields, weapons of mass destruction and unlawful combat is one of the many psychological injuries that the enemies of civilisation have inflicted on us.

It is often said that Westerners’ indifference to other cultures was a “root cause” of the present war. It was not. Almost the contrary is true: when, one day, the average prudent Westerner no longer feels obliged to be aware of the nuances of the term jihad, or the tenets of Ba'athism, or the intentions behind North Korea's latest military procurement programme, as well as the difference between unmilitarised and militarised anthrax, then the war will be over. Not before.

Mon, 10/27/2003 - 17:19 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

The nuisance of learning

Does the last paragraph mean that when terrorism occurs so infrequently as to become a NUISANCE, then the war will be over? Not before. Hmm. I think I heard something like this once, but not from someone The World seems to have much use for.

by a reader on Tue, 11/02/2004 - 13:25 | reply

Re: The nuisance of learning

Excellent question. We may respond in a post soon.

by Editor on Tue, 11/02/2004 - 14:29 | reply

“The Most Important Task for Liberals Today”

Oliver Kamm, a liberal in the original sense of being in favour of human freedom and institutions that promote it, rightly remarks:

It is no exaggeration that the most important task for liberals in the world order today is to give unreserved support to British and American troops in [their aim of militarily defeating the terrorists in Iraq].

It is odd that both he and Andrew Sullivan (whom he quotes) seem to think that there is a serious possibility that the enemy in Iraq will prevent the emergence of a stable and successful Iraqi democracy. Well, better safe than sorry, but in fact such an outcome could only happen if the US disengages – which would be a betrayal on a scale that would rival that of Munich, 1938. It isn't going to happen.

This article is also worth reading for its excellent summary of the historic failure, and moral emptiness, of French foreign policy.

Tue, 10/28/2003 - 21:52 | permalink

Re:It isn't going to happen.

So you've gone from Popperian fallibilism to predicting the future?

by a reader on Wed, 10/29/2003 - 04:59 | reply

Fallibilism and Prediction

A reader asks:

So you've gone from Popperian fallibilism to predicting the future?

If Popperian fallibilism were incompatible with making predictions, it would be in a fine old mess. The whole of science would be ruled out, for a start.

Fallibilism is not the denial of the possibility of knowledge.

by Editor on Wed, 10/29/2003 - 05:31 | reply

Prediction

So are you claiming to "know" that the U.S. will not disengage?

Do you also "know" what my IBM stock will do this year?

by a reader on Wed, 10/29/2003 - 14:34 | reply

Prediction

I don't understand this criticism.

I think that saying things like "It isn't going to happen." is a perfectly reasonable usage and in no way contradicts fallibilism. It doesn't mean "The probability of this happening is 0." It means that the speaker thinks he has very strong reasons to believe that it isn't going to happen. New events or information could change this belief, but it currently doesn't seem likely enough to consider significant, and he suggests that we proceed under the assumption that it won't happen.

Would you object to: "The sun will rise tomorrow."?

I really don't want everybody to qualify everything they say. We know what they mean, we know they aren't omniscient, they know they aren't omniscient. What would lots of qualifications add to the discussion other than bits and distractions?

Gil

by Gil on Wed, 10/29/2003 - 19:17 | reply

Prediction

How is the prediction "it isn't going to happen" any different from Marx's claim that socialism is inevitable ?

Actually I suspect that the intent of the editor wasn't to put forward a prediction so much as to have a rallying cry for the faithful. "It isn't going to happen." really means "We won't let it happen!"

by a reader on Thu, 10/30/2003 - 03:33 | reply

Prediction

I don't think "We" (meaning the readers of this blog) are in a position to determine whether it happens or not. I think the editor was making a prediction.

If you don't share the editor's confidence that it won't happen, why not just ask what the reasons for that confidence are, rather than criticizing predictions in general?

Gil

by Gil on Thu, 10/30/2003 - 17:43 | reply

Prediction

I am not criticizing predictions in general. I am criticizing a prediction as it is being applied to social phenomena. It is impossible, in practice, to predict the behavior of one individual let alone the behavior of all parties in such a conflict. See Hayek's lecture "The Pretense of Knowledge" While he is discussing economics, the arguments are valid in this instance as well.

by a reader on Fri, 10/31/2003 - 03:22 | reply

Prediction

Yes, certain knowledge about how people will behave is impossible.

But, that doesn't mean we have no knowledge at all in this area, or have no reason to be confident about anything that anybody might (or might not) do.

Again, is your point that you disagree with this particular prediction, or do you have a problem with fallibilists making any claim about human behavior without qualifying it with "I think" or "might"?

Gil

by Gil on Fri, 10/31/2003 - 17:42 | reply

Prediction

Britain will never

- Launch a nuclear attack on South Korea in support of a North Korean invasion.
- Introduce Shari'a law.
- Outlaw hats.
- Elect a government of trained snails.

We predict these things – or at least, we think we predict them. But we could be wrong, perhaps we only think we think we predict them. Or perhaps we couldn't be wrong – we only think we could. Or do we?

by Editor on Fri, 10/31/2003 - 21:52 | reply

trained snails

LOL

by Tom Robinson on Sat, 11/01/2003 - 00:08 | reply

If It isn't going to happen.....

then surely the editor is going to buy in real estate in Iraq. What an incredible investment opportunity! and you would also be helping the Iraqi people! When the stable and successful Iraqi democracy emerges the money will come rolling in!

by a reader on Sat, 11/01/2003 - 04:09 | reply

Real estate

Current (i.e. inherited Baath socialist) Iraqi law prohibits foreign ownership of real estate; if you have a pointer to a futures market, please post it.

by Kevin on Sat, 11/01/2003 - 21:11 | reply

How is it different?

Marxism is an attempt to predict the entire course of human history. Predicting the Americans will stay in Iraq till they're done with establishing a vaguely civilised government is not a prediction about the whole of human history, nor does it resemble such a prediction in any important way.

Try looking at The Poverty of Historicism chapter 15.

by Alan Forrester on Sun, 11/02/2003 - 01:44 | reply

Prediction

As long as George W. Bush is in control of the strategy, the prediction seems pretty good:

"The enemy in Iraq believes America will run," Bush said.
"That's why they're willing to kill innocent civilians, relief workers, coalition troops. America will never run."

Gil

by Gil on Mon, 11/03/2003 - 22:35 | reply

Which is it going to be?

The editor predicts: "a stable and successful Iraqi democracy"

Alan Forrester predicts "a vaguely civilised government"

by a reader on Tue, 11/04/2003 - 03:59 | reply

At the cost of draft?

Dear Editor,

The Pentagon is now making a concerted effort to fill all the draft board and appeals board positions throughout the USA. It appears that the wars in Afghanistan and Iraq are going to require military conscription, a highly coercive institution which seems thoroughly in contrast to setting the world to rights.

As long as the military units in Iraq remain all volunteers, it is not for me to tell them what to do with their time. They did volunteer to be in the military, being shot at whilst on garrison duty comes with that job description, and there is some possibility that some good may come of it. I'm frankly not enthusiastic about the expense to the taxpayers, but as those are also allegedly volunteers, what is it to me?

However, when this goal of a stable and successful Iraqi democracy is used to justify conscription, enslavement, and other forms of coercion I'll give it a pass. Since conscription appears to be predicated on the assumption that Bush is again able to pretend to be elected, perhaps it is a moot point.

Regards,

Jim

davidson@net1.net

<http://www.ezez.com/free/freejim.html>

by planetaryjim on Fri, 11/07/2003 - 03:43 | reply

Cuban Irony

The Communist dictator of Cuba is, naturally enough, opposed to free markets.

The Cuban president went on to condemn free market neoliberalism as creating what he called "savage societies," where people are not taken into account.

In particular, he has been at the forefront of opposition to free trade. Today he urged nations to seek their own alternatives to free trade. Not necessarily Cuban communism, he generously conceded. After all:

"One should not be dogmatic; that is one of the secrets of revolution," said Castro, who led the Cuban revolution that brought him to power in 1959.

Ah yes, lack of dogmatism: the invariable hallmark of blood-soaked tyrants throughout the ages. Of course if any Cubans should seek any such alternatives they'll encounter something a little worse than mere dogmatism.

"Every one of the movements will have different things. There will be things that are similar but not exactly the same," he said.

And what might the common thread be between these similar-but-not-exactly-the-same alternatives to freedom? Why, hatred for America of course:

If Latin American opponents of Washington's free trade policies join forces, they could deal the United States a blow as serious as its loss in the Vietnam War, Bolivian opposition leader Evo Morales said on Thursday.

[...]

"Very soon we could celebrate in Latin America another Vietnam for the United States"

Given this visceral hatred of free trade, isn't it ironic that Castro's chief complaint against the United States is its trade embargo against his regime?

And more ironic is the US doe...

And more ironic is the US doesn't realize the embargo is making Cuba people miserable and Castro more powerful.

by a reader on Thu, 11/06/2003 - 10:00 | reply

No, it's less ironic

Yes, it's ironic that a nation founded on the principle of economic freedom should impose a trade embargo. But it's not that ironic. And the more you think about it, the less ironic it gets. After all, it's ironic that a nation founded on the values of peace may sometimes be compelled to go to war in self-defense, yet sometimes that is necessary and it's not inconsistent.

For a regime founded on the principle of outlawing free trade, not just in special circumstances but as an absolute philosophical conviction worth killing, dying, and being poor for, to complain about trade barriers that's irony.

As for it making Castro more powerful, he could not be more powerful, he is an absolute dictator. However, you may have a point that it makes him more secure in power. Perhaps that's what you meant. Yes, trade sanctions rarely seem to do any good - see Saddam as an example - especially compared with the only moral alternative: righteous violence. Is that what you are advocating?

by a reader on Thu, 11/06/2003 - 23:48 | reply

Why Does the BBC Make These Little ‘Mistakes’?

It's not a big thing in itself. But it has a very big context. Anyway, judge for yourselves.

First, the facts: Engineers at the Technion Institute of Technology in Israel have designed a remote-controlled version of the D-9 armoured bulldozer. In the Technion's press release last week, they explained the purpose of this modification:

Engineering Corps officers and those from the Technological-Logistical Unit of the IDF's Technology Division stated that this innovative development is intended to enable the bulldozer to be operated under fire while the operator controlling it from afar remains behind safe cover. Today, bulldozer operators are exposed to high risks when they demolish buildings in which terrorists are hiding ...

(Boldface ours.)

But the BBC reported the story with a different quote:

“Today the bulldozer drivers are exposed to great danger when they knock down buildings that have militants hiding in them,” Israel's Technion Institute of Technology, which developed the robot version, quoted an unnamed army officer as saying.

(Boldface ours; quotes in original.)

Did the Technion report the officer as saying “militants” or “terrorists”?

The BBC claims to be quoting the Technion. So, did the Technion make two contradictory claims about what the officer said, one to the BBC and one in their own press release? Or is there some innocent explanation for the BBC changing the quote – such as a translation error that just happened to introduce a politically significant change? Or was the BBC flat-out lying? If so, why? Seriously: why would they lie? Note our previous posts on this issue, and the comments on them.

when people enter lists of names into the computer, Elliot often becomes Elliott

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Thu, 05/13/2004 - 18:42 | reply

Copyright © 2007 Setting The World To Rights

Government Offices Full of Monkeys

No, really!

In a capital city where cows roam the streets and elephants plod along in the bus lanes, it's no surprise to find government buildings overrun with monkeys.

But the officials who work there are fed up. They've been bitten, robbed and otherwise tormented by monkeys that ransack files, bring down power lines, screech at visitors and bang on office windows.

The Supreme Court has stepped in, decreeing that New Delhi should be a monkey-free city after citizens filed a lawsuit demanding protection from the animals.

[...]

Last year the monkeys made their presence felt by hanging from window ledges and screeching at reporters arriving for a news conference with visiting U.S. Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld.

Pity he didn't have Chomps with him.

Mon, 11/03/2003 - 01:57 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

It Really Is Happening Again

Antisemitism. "It really is happening again" says Andrew Sullivan.

Hope that he is wrong. Be prepared for him to be right.

And, right now, take his advice and read Natan Sharansky's latest masterpiece On Hating the Jews, which we have already put permanently in our sidebar.

Mon, 11/03/2003 - 19:38 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Happening again in Europe

Happening again in Europe:

<http://www.policyreview.org/oct03/rosenthal.html>

and of course in the Muslim world:

<http://frontpagemag.com/Articles/ReadArticle.asp?ID=10581>

by Alan Furman on Tue, 11/04/2003 - 04:54 | reply

Correction

As a friend of Israel and an admirer of Natan Sharansky, I feel it is my duty to point out -- before someone else who is neither does so -- that the supposed quote from Dr Martin Luther King in the Commentary article is a fabrication. See this Wikipedia article.

by a reader on Tue, 11/04/2003 - 16:48 | reply

On Loving the...

I might be well roasted for saying this, but it is about time we get off the topic of hating Peoples. Sure, there are so many anti-semites. Sure, it is dangerous and unreasonable. However, with all the specific hates and haters in the world, it does not get us very far to generalize first and look for evidence after. Just round up all the usual suspects. Or don't.

Seriously, more usefully, get to the specifics, take action where it is warranted. People aren't blind, but they are all too easily polarized. Instead, work with change. Develop allies. Work with Reason. Call a spade a spade. Forge Alliances. Act together. If there is any opportunity for overlap at the fringes or the center, go for it. Do not love or hate or segregate or integrate with labels. They don't work for any useful long term purpose or gain.

Howard Dean, a Democratic candidate for U.S. president is a good current example of this not so useful debate, and is being criticized for it. Sure the confederate flag is a racist symbol, for some people anyway. So are all flags and causes in general if used that way. Regardless, poor southerners as individuals should not be labeled, other than self-identified poor and southern, and that does not exclude them from the larger debate, reach out, Dean's main point. Criticize not, until you can make lots of elbow room for criticism back. Critique is the better, more useful word. By all means act. Less talk at, more act with. Enough said.

by a reader on Wed, 11/05/2003 - 20:27 | reply

Why?

I might be well roasted for saying this, but it is about time we get off the topic of hating Peoples. Sure, there are so many anti-semites. Sure, it is dangerous and unreasonable.

It's unreasonable and dangerous, but we should stop thinking about it? Why?

~Woty
<http://woty.davidsj.com>

by Woty on Thu, 11/06/2003 - 00:13 | reply

Why

We should not stop thinking about it. That is right, you and I should not stop thinking about it. What makes us different? What gives us common ground? We, you and I, should do whatever we can to deal with it, truth about humanity. All prejudice is based on fear and misunderstanding of the other, barriers to knowing, playing one against the other for gain.

Act to change it, see the evil of prejudice in all its group labels and contested borders and vile histories. Get energized. You have the tools. Do more.

Go beyond identifying or responding only to the hate. Work with people and forces that do not hate. Do not play into the hands of anti-semitism, do not play into the hands of racism, do not play into the hands of those who benefit by all polarizations of the other, fear or hate. There is no room for anti-people. Find ways to triumph over what someone might call us, label us, group us, misunderstand or misuse us.

As you say, Set The World To Rights.

What I read here is worthwhile to think about. The first question is always how do we change it. The other is you and me, how we see. Why do we buy into being categorized? We must believe something about the category. Do not fear The Other. It is tangible and always changing. For one, I believe we must be individuals first, never labels or categories, ourselves or others.

It is always the individual where we meet. Live that.

by a reader on Thu, 11/06/2003 - 02:55 | reply

Think First, Act Later

A Reader exhorts us to "Act", and "Do more", and "Go beyond identifying or responding only to hate." etc.

But, how is one to know what actions to take without having a good theory about his obstacles?

A Reader seems to think that all prejudices are alike, but I disagree and think that anti-semitism is different from the others. We need to try to understand it in order to avoid repeating mistakes.

Gil

by Gil on Thu, 11/06/2003 - 03:51 | reply

Think and Act

Gil, you are right: But, how is one to know what actions to take without having a good theory about his obstacles?

A rhetorical question, which can also be said as a statement: One needs good theories in order to know what action to take.

My theory is that all prejudices are alike in their essence of how they distort thinking, and all prejudices have their personal and individual basis of perpetuation. Prejudices thrive on labels and stereotypes and at their core reveal deep mistrust, fear, anger, hurt, and misunderstanding.

Group prejudices are fostered by group images of who the enemy is. The enemy is/are those whom we fear and who we have feared. Fear and mistrust is a big blind spot and barrier to clear thinking. It is a contagion if left untouched. Lack of contact with those persons we might have prejudices about tends to foster a breeding ground for stereotypes and pat hateful, fearful answers. This is group-think, which paradoxically is not rational thinking, but rather rationalizing or sloganeering or segregating thought.

Predjudice breeds in a vacuum of ideas and inaction. It is critical to break into the group-think of the group, as well as our own tendencies to group-think. It is critical to act. If we do, some will hold to their ideological prejudice. Some will be shaken. Some will change.

Acting to break through prejudice has many ways and many specifics. Causing fear or perpetuating stereotypes only reinforces those who hate and/or fear. Setting the world to rights is a good start at breaking through. The discussion needs to broaden and also needs to offer ideas to be tested and tried.

You each have your own theory about prejudices, no matter what the labels and history of it. Share them. Share it.

by a reader on Thu, 11/06/2003 - 15:05 | reply

Copyright © 2007 Setting The World To Rights

President Bush Knows

Today, President Bush has given another in his series of excellent speeches that show that he is the right person for the job:

Remarks by the President at the 20th Anniversary of the National Endowment for Democracy, November 6, 2003.

Highlights:

In June of 1982, President Ronald Reagan spoke at Westminster Palace and declared, the turning point had arrived in history. He argued that Soviet communism had failed, precisely because it did not respect its own people -- their creativity, their genius and their rights.

President Reagan said that the day of Soviet tyranny was passing, that freedom had a momentum which would not be halted.

[...]

A number of critics were dismissive of that speech by the President. According to one editorial of the time, "It seems hard to be a sophisticated European and also an admirer of Ronald Reagan." (Laughter.) Some observers on both sides of the Atlantic pronounced the speech simplistic and naive, and even dangerous. In fact, Ronald Reagan's words were courageous and optimistic and entirely correct. (Applause.)

[...]

We've witnessed, in little over a generation, the swiftest advance of freedom in the 2,500 year story of democracy.

[...]

Our commitment to democracy is also tested in the Middle East, which is my focus today, and must be a focus of American policy for decades to come. In many nations of the Middle East -- countries of great strategic importance -- democracy has not yet taken root. And the questions arise: Are the peoples of the Middle East somehow beyond the reach of liberty? Are millions of men and women and children condemned by history or culture to live in despotism? Are they alone never to know freedom, and never even to have a choice in the matter? I, for one, do not believe it. I believe every person has the ability and the right to be free. (Applause.)

Some skeptics of democracy assert that the traditions of Islam are inhospitable to the representative government. This "cultural condescension," as Ronald Reagan termed it, has a long history. After the Japanese surrender in 1945, a so-called Japan expert asserted that democracy in that former empire would "never work." Another observer declared the prospects for democracy in post-Hitler Germany are, and I quote, "most uncertain at best" -- he made that claim in 1957.

[...]

For the Palestinian people, the only path to independence and dignity and progress is the path of democracy. (Applause.) And the Palestinian leaders who block and undermine democratic reform, and feed hatred and encourage violence are not leaders at all. They're the main obstacles to peace, and to the success of the Palestinian people.

But read it all. It is quite heartening.

Thu, 11/06/2003 - 22:48 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

BBC Tells Truth about Arafat

This is a highly significant story. Not because it is news (to anyone whose head has not been buried deeply in the sand – or elsewhere – for the last decade), but because of who is reporting it: the BBC:

Palestinian Authority funds go to militants

The Palestinian Authority, headed by Yasser Arafat, is paying members of a Palestinian militant organisation which has been responsible for carrying out suicide attacks against Israeli soldiers and civilians, a BBC investigation has found.

A total of up to $50,000 a month is being sent to members of the al-Aqsa Martyrs' Brigades, an armed group that emerged shortly after the outbreak of the current Palestinian intifada, a BBC Correspondent programme reveals.

Let us hope that these revelations, from this source, have at least as salutary an effect on world opinion – and on US Government opinion in particular – as the Karine A incident.

Sat, 11/08/2003 - 03:53 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

A Paying Membership

It is worthwhile to consider how and why the Middle East greases palms. No pun intended. In a nomadic, non-democratic hierarchy of tribes, loyalties run on deferences, tribal alliances, and money. There is an old phrase in the english language, "blood money". There must certainly be an equivalent in aramaic and the root languages of the Middle East and in all old cultures of the world because that is the way tribal control has been maintained from generation to generation since ancient times. Blood money. Words reveal thoughts and thoughts reveal beliefs about how the world always works. Violence or peace breeds around tribal handshakes, and these are symbols of deference just like words. Follow the blood money, follow the handshakes, follow who watches whose back, and see the subtleties of control. The way control over people is maintained in such societies is by the most simple alliances of power symbolized by money and handshake relationships. If a high priority is placed not losing tribal power, there will be a paying membership. A paying deferential membership represents the thoughts, beliefs, and intentions of a man in his tribe. In tribal memberships multiplied a man represents how both he and his society see the world.

by a reader on Sat, 11/08/2003 - 14:37 | reply

It works the same way in Europe, N. America

Dear Reader,

- > It is worthwhile to consider how and why the Middle East
- > greases palms. No pun intended.

Palm tree oil is very greasy. Since it is worthwhile to consider the how and why of Middle East palm greasing, perhaps you'd be willing to consider how, say, defense contracts are allocated in the military industrial complex of the USA? Or would that not be worth doing, since it would challenge your notions of Western democracies having moral superiority?

- > In a nomadic, non-democratic hierarchy of tribes, loyalties
- > run on deferences, tribal alliances, and money.

Whereas in Europe or the USA, loyalties run on deferences, tribal alliances, and money. Or were you thinking all that deference to the royal family in the UK was something vastly different from the deference to, say, the Saudi royals? Were you thinking that the "our thing" or "cosa nostra" was operating on some other basis?

What is Western democracy but a sham where the votes are counted selectively if at all? There is so much evidence for vote fraud in the USA that nobody with any sense ought to take it seriously. Even groups which have no history of finding conspiracies under every floorboard, such as the Texas Republican Party, have reported hundreds of instances of vote fraud and abuse. E.g., in 1998 that party reported 206 instances, none of which have ever been resolved by the authorities. The evidence of the new Diebold voting machines casting up to 16,000 "negative votes" in certain audited precinct voting is really cool stuff.

- > There is an old phrase in the english language, "blood money".

Indeed. It is a very old tradition in all clan societies. The English had clans before they were conquered by the Romans, and retained many of these important traditions after the Romans went away and before the Norman conquest.

Blood money refers to the money paid to avoid a blood feud. It refers to the compensatory concept of justice, which is different from the punishment concept. Under compensatory law, a person is fined the equivalent of an eye if his crime harmed a victim's eye, the equivalent of a tooth if his crime harmed a victim's tooth, and so forth. Mosaic law worked out a detailed set of these fines and other compensation issues, along with fundamentals of common law justice such as rights of the accused, etc.

- > There must certainly be an equivalent in aramaic and the root
- > languages of the Middle East and in all old cultures of the
- > world

Indeed. Such as the old culture of Europe, which was Celtic before the Romans came with their roads and their gladii to replace the European system of clan rule, largely rule by judges or kritarchy, with the Roman legislative rules (and the corruption which naturally followed).

- > because that is the way tribal control has been maintained
- > from generation to generation since ancient times. Blood money.

Actually, blood money refers to the payment of compensation for a killing which is made, in part, to avoid a blood feud in which the offended clan goes and kills someone from the killer's clan in retribution. Blood money can be a fairly sophisticated tool for avoiding conflict.

- > Words reveal thoughts and thoughts reveal beliefs about how
- > the world always works.

That would appear to be true of, say, your words.

- > Violence or peace breeds around tribal handshakes,

Whereas violence and peace breed around executive handshakes in your much vaunted Western sham democracies.

- > and these are symbols of deference just like words.

So, if you are contemptuous of words as symbols of deference, why are you using words?

- > Follow the blood money, follow the handshakes, follow who
- > watches whose back, and see the subtleties of control.

The interesting thing about clan society is that it is inherently unstable politically. I don't think any differently of Western sham democracies, of course. Clan society is not a culture of hierarchy or control, any more than your Western sham democracies.

Rather, in a clan society each individual forms and breaks alliances to suit his own best interests. The notion that there is a government which should be respected is very foreign to clan participants. The government, to people raised in a clan society, is obviously just some individuals. If they are members of the same clan, they will naturally be expected to wash each other's hands. The notion that such favoritism is unexpected or corrupt is a very Western notion, and one that has not changed the nature or extent of nepotism.

- > The way control over people is maintained in such societies is

- > by the most simple alliances of power symbolized by money
- > and handshake relationships.

And how is that any different from how control is maintained in, say, a society like Washington, DC? Don't the power brokers shake hands and exchange money? Isn't the military industrial complex famous for the ways in which it can allocate subcontracts among the Congressional districts to divide the pork barrel?

- > If a high priority is placed not losing tribal power, there - > will be a paying membership.

Can you not think of corollaries in party politics?

- > A paying deferential membership represents the thoughts,
- > beliefs, and intentions of a man in his tribe. In tribal
- > memberships multiplied a man represents how both he and
- > his society see the world.

I think much the same is true of chosen affiliations (rather than inherited ones) such as party political membership.

Regards,

Jim <http://www.awdal.com/>

by planetaryjim on Tue, 11/11/2003 - 05:04 | reply

Commentary on Greasy Palms

You assume alot about my notions. Sounds like Arafat is just one of the Texas good old boys. Assume what you will, it makes interesting commentary.

by a reader on Tue, 11/11/2003 - 06:49 | reply

Moral detergent acts swiftly on palm grease

Planetary Jim,

Please accept that in addition to loyalties and mafia-style 'friendships', there is such a thing as the rule of law.

Aren't some rules better than others? Isn't the difference to do with morality and better traditions?

If the USA is no different from the Middle East, howcome more people want to live there? Howcome immigrants who settle in America become like other Americans within a generation or two, but, say, Europeans working in the Middle East retain their culture?

And if you think that the answer is solely to do with wealth, power, and military might, please tell us how the excess wealth was generated in the first place.

by Tom Robinson on Tue, 11/11/2003 - 23:34 | reply

excess wealth

clearly it was stolen

- curi

by a reader on Fri, 11/14/2003 - 17:44 | reply

Copyright © 2007 Setting The World To Rights

BBC Does Something Right – Again

Two swallows do not a summer make. Nevertheless, it has to be admitted that the BBC has done something right again in regard to its Middle-East News coverage:

The BBC has appointed a "Middle East policeman" to oversee its coverage of the region amid mounting allegations of anti-Israeli bias.

Malcolm Balen, a former editor of the Nine O'Clock News, has been recruited in an attempt to improve the corporation's reporting of the Middle East and its relationship with the main political players.

[...]

Relations between the corporation and the Israeli government hit a low point this summer when the latter "withdrew co-operation" in protest at a BBC documentary about the country's weapons of mass destruction.

Ariel Sharon, the Israeli prime minister, later barred the BBC from his meeting with the British press during a visit to London.

The BBC has also been the target of Downing Street accusations that it toed a pro-Baghdad line over the Iraq war and that it influenced the Today programme's handling of the dossier story that is the subject of the Hutton Inquiry.

[...]

The BBC denied that the appointment amounted to an admission that it had "got its coverage wrong" but conceded the corporation was sensitive to criticism. He said it was "no longer the case" that the Israelis were refusing to co-operate with BBC journalists.

An accusation frequently levelled against the corporation is that it reports the Arab-Israeli conflict too much from a Palestinian point of view.

Its reluctance to describe suicide bombers as "terrorists" has proved particularly controversial, recently prompting the Simon Wiesenthal Centre to pull out of a BBC series about Nazi genocide.

The corporation faces increasing scrutiny of all areas of its activities during the run-up to the renewal of its royal charter in 2006.

It's of course too early to tell whether there is anything of substance in this step. And the BBC has a long way to go, both morally and factually. But, taken together with this story, it is a hopeful sign.

Tue, 11/11/2003 - 23:07 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Curiosity Provides Some Answers

At the new location of Curiosity, Elliot Temple explains the value of government, from an anarchist perspective.

He also investigates epistemology and charity.

Wed, 11/12/2003 - 21:28 | permalink

Oliver Kamm Takes Down...

During the last day, our favourite liberal Oliver Kamm has taken down:

- Melanie Phillips who is often right but not when she confuses liberalism with moral relativism!
- John Pilger, for whom 'invariably wrong' would be far too kind a designation.
- The BBC – if only 'amazingly sloppy and ignorant of history' were the worst criticism they deserved.
- The Stop The War Coalition (who intend to organise protests against President Bush in London during his forthcoming State Visit): "a front organisation for a totalitarian and antisemitic party of the Fascist Left ... dedicated to the overthrow of parliamentary democracy and to military victory for Saddam Hussein" (Or rather, the Liberal Party's shameful association with that organisation.)

A nice day's blogging, Mr Kamm.

Thu, 11/13/2003 - 01:26 | permalink

An Allegation That Cannot Rationally Be Made Twice.

Andrew Sullivan quotes from two New York Times editorials, one from just before the Liberation of Iraq, and one from yesterday:

"President Bush sketched an expansive vision last night [at his American Enterprise Institute speech] of what he expects to accomplish by a war in Iraq. Instead of focusing on eliminating weapons of mass destruction, or reducing the threat of terror to the United States, Mr. Bush talked about establishing a 'free and peaceful Iraq' that would serve as a 'dramatic and inspiring example' to the entire Arab and Muslim world, provide a stabilizing influence in the Middle East and even help end the Arab-Israeli conflict. The idea of turning Iraq into a model democracy in the Arab world is one some members of the administration have been discussing for a long time." -- New York Times editorial, February 27, 2003.

"The White House recently began shifting its case for the Iraq war from the embarrassing unconventional weapons issue to the lofty vision of creating an exemplary democracy in Iraq." -- New York Times editorial, today.

The NYT's compulsive attempts to fit a square peg into a round hole are irrational and shameful.

Fri, 11/14/2003 - 05:10 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

It's as if they haven't yet r...

It's as if they haven't yet realized the blogosphere exists.

by a reader on Sun, 11/16/2003 - 00:30 | reply

Welcome, President Bush

We join Alan Forrester and Oliver Kamm in welcoming President Bush to Britain on his forthcoming State Visit.

Against a background of “tense rows” between Scotland Yard and the US Secret Service about security measures, some British commentators are playing nasty little word games, in effect complaining about the very fact that the President is to be protected from murder during his visit. Their argument runs something like this: “bloody paranoid Americans seeing non-existent terrorists behind every tree just like they used to see reds under beds how dare they tell us how to run our own security services they just want to suppress legitimate dissent after all why shouldn't thousands of peace marchers be allowed to mob Bush then he'll see how much the world hates him because he's the number one threat to peace and freedom and if he gets assassinated he'll have only himself to blame and it won't be a moment too soon”.

But as Andrew Sullivan says:

I don't believe that the Brits are, as a whole, that hostile either to the war or to Bush. The minority who hates him appeals to the ignorance of those who condescend to him. And the BBC has whipped up anti-Americanism to fever pitch. But my native country isn't renowned for its common sense for nothing. I have faith that the majority will eventually see through the propaganda to the truth.

Indeed.

Sat, 11/15/2003 - 15:12 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Advice On Failure From An Expert

Saddam Hussein says that the Coalition has “misjudged the difficulty” of occupying Iraq.

Well, of course he thinks it's an impossible task. As the only living person ever to have lost power in Iraq, a man whose judgement on this subject has proved spectacularly inaccurate in the past, Saddam is arguably the least qualified person in the world to give such advice.

Unless, perhaps, he means to advise the Coalition: “if you want to succeed in Iraq, on no account do what I did”. Don't worry, Saddam, they won't. They are doing something entirely different, of which you have literally no conception.

Sun, 11/16/2003 - 22:08 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Least qualified?

- (1) One other living person has lost power in Iraq, namely General Jay Garner (<http://www.cbsnews.com/stories/2003/05/13/iraq/main553573.shtml>).
- (2) Failing at something doesn't necessarily make you unqualified to give advice on how to do it well.
- (3) Saddam did manage to 'occupy' Iraq for over two decades.

Pedantic Reader

by a reader on Mon, 11/17/2003 - 21:01 | reply

Carnival of the Vanities 62

We have done our best to include every entry we have received, including the ones that our spam filters put in the Junk Mail box. Sadly, we did not receive any pornographic ones, or they would have had pride of place in the carnival. If your entry is missing, it is not surprising. This is a huge job for which we were quite ill-prepared. So if you are in this unlucky(?) position, instead of leaping to the conclusion that it is a plot to deprive you of your rightful place in the carnival of the vanities, realise that it is just a technical glitch or a mistake, and that we will be mortified to learn that we have missed a further opportunity for editorial fun. And don't despair, simply write to carnival -at- settingtheworldtorights [dot] com, giving us the details again, and we will add your entry in an extra special UPDATE section. (So everyone, just in case our carnival-posting systems turn out to have been fallible – and in case one or two naughty bloggers use this opportunity to slip another post in – be sure to visit the carnival again in a few days to catch any entries that you may have missed the first time.)

Bigwig has set up a list for Carnival announcements. You can subscribe to it by sending an email message to cotvanities-subscribe@yahoogroups.com. But we can tell you that the next carnival will be hosted by Begging to Differ. Get your entries in now! Don't wait until the last minute!

If you haven't read our post, Richard Dawkins, George W. Bush, and Morality, read it now!

Enough of this! Let's get to The World Carnival without further ado:

Have you ever wondered if parenting has to be such a ghastly battle? Whether there could be a better way to interact with children? A way that would be better for you too? Then read this post about Taking Children Seriously.

And to understand why Sarah Fitz-Claridge thinks that the future of liberty depends on taking children seriously, read this post.

Jolly good stuff from fellow optimist, Bruce Hill. Bring the Revolution home!

White Pebble sits in Memory Street and tells a touching little story of chemistry, childhood, and the moment when she ceased to be an omniscient mommy. And she muses on the sharing of national tragedy through live television.

In Amnesty International and Britain...Silly, Overwrought...and Sad, Solomon unlawfully detains Kate Allen of Amnesty International UK, and, without any regard for her human rights, gives her a jolly good fiscing on the subject of why being nice to terrorists is probably not the best way to avoid another 9/11.

Pete of The Smarter Cop amusingly fisks a comment by a member of TruthOut, a group having the dubious distinction of using a 10-foot-tall burning pair of pants as a visual aid.

As James struggles hilariously with a laptop that was presumably manufactured somewhere in the deeper recesses of hell, we cannot help but wonder if he was thinking, "If only Apple made a reasonably-priced range of user-friendly machines that I could be using instead."

Do you enjoy domestic violence discipline? Blush explains how regular beatings can be the cornerstone of a healthy relationship, helping him unwind after a hard day in the office.

Unbillable Hours has a long essay on how wrong Kim Du Toit is about something or other. Oh yes – it was about his position on women and homosexuals. Did we mention it was long?

Chuck has some advice about what not to say out loud to a woman: Did I Say That Outloud? It's a guy thing, he says. So, um ... it's OK for a woman to turn to her best friend Joe, and say "You know I love you, Fred", is it?

BoiFromTroy, the gay, Republican sports fan, is in favour of gay marriage but expects to be "reamed for not being politically correct". Why? Because of his rather queer reason for taking that view.

Bill Wallo asks whether suicide bombers are really avenging angels – or just morally reprehensible: Suicide Bombers and Moral Legitimacy.

PC Watch says that in Australia, Muslim criminals were allowed to go free after stealing, intimidating police officers and destroying police property. Clearly a severe case of victimisation of Muslims. After all, some of the property they stole probably had sharp corners, and shouting that they were going to kill police officers and "fuck their girlfriends" might give them sore throats.

Jack Cluth exposes a shocking case of apathy in regard to the importance of traditional education. A child shuns schooling in favour of frivolous pursuits whilst the parents mock the efforts of dedicated social workers to put the child back on track.

Bryan is furious that a Christian music download service is stealing Apple's iTunes idea and that they have not yet made it possible for Mac people to use the service. The question is: why would we want to?

Madeleine Begun suspects that Bush has security in order to shoot protesters. Little does she know that the real target is unruly bloggers bwahahahaha...

Riverbend explains why America shouldn't bomb Tikrit – because he knows some of the people there and they certainly aren't terrorists. In fact, it is America's brutal treatment that has turned these people into suicide bombers. Erm...

Charles Hill exposes Wal-Mart as a wicked capitalist company that forces people to work for wages lower than those offered by other shops. Evidently Mr Hill doesn't approve of plentiful cheap food and thinks that non-English-speaking illiterates and the like should starve rather than be allowed to do honest work paid at the rate they are worth.

In American Beauty meets The Surrendered Wife, MamaKat says that “for controlling women, ... there is help.” Let's hope she is right!

Gordie is gravely worried about hunger in.... Oregon. No really! That's not a joke!

Jon Henke sets the record straight on the Resume of George W Bush.

Tim Dunlop cheerily declares that “Nothing says fuck you more plainly to Islamofascist terrorists than a couple of men or women publicly and with liberal-democratic state sanction declaring their love for each other and then going off and living nice, normal, middle class lives.”

Carey Gage says: “Somehow I don't think that the ‘laws and customs of war’ include driving a truck filled with explosives into a clearly marked Red Cross building and pushing the detonator, or the use of marked ambulances to transport weapons and personnel.” Quite.

Fringe battles a fellow radio enthusiast over Israel and Palestine. It's a doozy.

Priorities and Frivolities wonders whether Al Qaeda's decentralisation, brought about by the War on Terror, has made it more vulnerable or not.

Blackfive - The Paratrooper of Love has a perceptive discussion of the nature of the Muslim, Arab and European humiliation which is the reason why many people hate America: The Cost of Humiliation.

Supergenius has written about the resignation of Eduard Shevardnadze, now ex-President of the ex-Soviet state of Georgia, following a large and impressive demonstration of people power.

Bill Adams reveals a number of bizarre facts about Kyrgyztan, not least of which is that their unit of measurement for human corpses is the metric ton. The question of why they cannot make do with a simple headcount is perhaps answered by the works of Prof. Gunther Von Hagens, whose artwork challenges traditional ideas of where human limbs and organs should be located in relation to the rest of the body.

If you are fat, oops, sorry, 'have a weight problem', Dean Esmay suggests that you might want to try the Atkins diet or one of the other low-carbohydrate diets.

Here is an amusingly politically correct version of Winter Wonderland.

There is an interesting parallel between this post about hunting and our old post about George Mikes.

In her Political Update, Lynn says: "If you want my vote, don't just tell me what Bush is doing wrong; tell me what you would do right. And I'm sorry but if you compare Bush to Hitler you invalidate anything you say after that."

John Rosenberg writes that the Democrats like talking about states' rights but don't actually mean it.

Feste provides pictures and a little good news from Iraq. These kids, she says, are the hearts and minds we must win to bring real change to the region.

Michael Kantor on how he passed the New York Bar Exam. Anyone who has taken an exam will sympathise with his plight. We know someone who has also passed the bar exam – and been awarded the distinction of Beermeister: Almighty King of the Bar.

Wicked Thoughts has the first Christmas joke of the year – but it is short and did raise a smile.

Many were surprised at President Bush's reference to the Puritans in his recent Whitehall speech. For Mark Pierce it triggered a long but interesting series of thoughts on Thanksgiving, and about the similarities between the situation of the first Pilgrims at Plymouth Colony and that of Iraq today: A Puritan Idealism In Iraq.

For reasons best known to himself, Steven Taylor gives a roundup of the democratic nominees by comparing them to different types of toast. Just remember folks, you heard it here first...

If it's true that in hell the punishment fits the crime then we can only wonder what exactly it is that Josh Fielek thinks Michael Jackson has been doing to trees. Ugh!

Dustin Frelich explains how two approaches to Conservatism have led to a Republican split on the vote to expand Medicare: Conservatives debate Medicare.

Dodgeblogium points out that "the Iraq war has had at least one salutary effect, and that is in smoking out the outright dishonesty and bias of much of the Western media". Did that need smoking out?

Interested Participant tracks the origin of doctors' waiting rooms to Heidelberg, Germany in the 19th century.

OTB announces a rival to the Carnival: the Beltway Traffic Jam. Yes, what today's blogosphere readers really need is a place to find more links to more blogs.

And if that wasn't enough, Sean Hackbarth provides links to some old stories on his site.

Harvey says that this is the relationship advice he wishes his father had given him. God help him!

Patriot Paradox on the silliness of claiming that the police are prosecuting Michael Jackson for child molestation because he's black rather than because their current best theory is that he's actually a child molester. Besides, Michael Jackson hasn't been black for a while now.

How to adapt to the breakneck pace of technological and social change.

King of Fools focuses on the inconvenience of bizarre and irrational laws in Arkansas that require children to wear shoes while shopping.

Daisy argues that you should throw out any house rules that might be causing resentment. That is, rules for your wife! We say: while you're at it, throw out the rules for your children too.

Brian Noggle is worried that the computers in his doctor's office are going to get hacked, or something.

Richard Baker is a physicist who thinks that "Physics is not the search for truth. Instead, it is the search for useful theories." Judge whether that theory is itself either true or useful by reading his Maps of Physics.

Dissecting Leftism says that GWB's relative inarticulateness may be one of his biggest assets.

In days of old/When knights were bold/And paper weren't invented/They wiped their arse/On a blade of grass/And walked away contented. Well, now at last we have reached the age of the next giant advance in wiping technology, and in Wet Vs. Dry, Joe Kelley bravely investigates. Or does he?

Attaboy righteously ~~flattens~~ criticises an uninformed letter writer to his local newspaper, who made the unfortunate mistake of comparing Jessica Lynch to Rachel Corrie.

Peaktalk explains how crime and homelessness have become a political playball between the left and right in the nuclear-weapon-free city of Vancouver: Wrong Point, Wrong Time.

Gunther, in an update on a boycott going on in Austin Texas, where anti-abortion activists have stopped construction of a Planned Parenthood clinic, takes a disturbing look at who is behind the action.

Patterico, a conservative himself, takes on some pet conservative beliefs with which he disagrees: RIGHT-WINGERS (you may have to scroll down to find it).

Curiosity expresses solidarity with Jews.

Admiral Quixote on the problem of compulsory unionism.

Sorge is worried about his sanity. And so he should be.

Reviewing the Bush Administration's record both domestic and foreign, Arthur Silber finds it "almost impossible to comprehend how completely and consistently destructive a single administration could be in less than three years." Test your comprehension skills here.

Wed, 11/26/2003 - 11:07 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Sorry about the length of the...

Sorry about the length of the post; I'm a lawyer, we aren't exactly trained for brevity. - TPB, Esq. <http://unbillablehours.typepad.com>

by a reader on Wed, 11/26/2003 - 18:29 | reply

Length

Long doesn't mean bad. One of our favourite bloggers writes posts that are so long that by the time one has read his masterful analysis of, say, an impending war, it has already started, ended, and been the subject of outrageous revisionist histories. Obligatory reading nevertheless, but it's nice to be forewarned, so that before clicking the link one can put out the cat, the wine, a cigar ... and install broadband.

Update: He's planning to invent a 72-hour day (warning: long!) to cope with this very problem. Excellent news! The only trouble is, it'll be 2104 before the Patent Office reaches the end of his application.

by Editor on Wed, 11/26/2003 - 19:02 | reply

Harsh

Gee, some of your comments are a little harsh. Is that the right spirit for the carnival of the vanities?

by a reader on Wed, 11/26/2003 - 19:43 | reply

Thanks & Re: Harsh

1) Many thanks for hosting - I know it takes a lot of work.

2) I had to laugh at your comment on length - I knew you were linking to the USS Clueless before I clicked on the URL.

3) The last person to comment has a point that this COV was more critical than the others. This is not a bad thing - since bloggers most commonly post their own opinions anyway, there is nothing wrong with posting your opinions, but it was different. For my part, I am OK with it, but prepare for people to comment on it. I will probably be remarking on one of your slams myself at Admiral Quixote's Roundtable ;-)

by Admiral Quixote on Wed, 11/26/2003 - 21:07 | reply

Comment question

BTW, how should we post URLs in your comments? I believe I used standard HTML for my above post, but the URL goes back to your site instead of to www.solport.com.

by Admiral Quixote on Wed, 11/26/2003 - 21:09 | reply

Re: Comment Question

Standard HTML is correct for URLs. You omitted the "http://" at the start of the URL. We've inserted it now.

by Editor on Wed, 11/26/2003 - 22:03 | reply

Re: harsh

You may well be right.

The thing is, the Carnival is supposed to be the Carnival of the Vanities, and people may be reluctant to post to it if they think the host is going to comment less than enthusiastically their work. But on the other hand, if the Carnival is just a lifeless list of links, with only bland content added by each host, it's that much less fun to read (and to host). We did discuss this issue and tried to find the right balance with a very small amount of added spice. Maybe we still didn't get it right.

by Editor on Wed, 11/26/2003 - 22:18 | reply

Thanks

OK - good to know your site requires that. I'll try to remember for next time. BTW, I did go ahead and post about one of your minor digs.

Despite my comments on that particular bias, I think your style of hosting is quite interesting.

by Admiral Quixote on Wed, 11/26/2003 - 22:22 | reply

Commentary

The commentary on the links makes the Carnival worth reading, instead of just scrolling down and looking for post titles that are interesting.

It may deter some people from sending links, but this is Carnival of the Vanities, not The Carnival of Ego-Stroking, surely nobody in the blogosphere is REALLY trying to please everybody... and I don't see a problem with it... there was no ridicule, just some pointed and tongue-in-cheek comments.

Great read... future hosts should take pointers.

by a reader on Wed, 11/26/2003 - 23:50 | reply

Looks good

I didn't notice anything too bad here. Just enough to give some spice as mentioned. Great job, and it must have been a lot of work just reading all the submissions. Maybe I'm biased, though. I was amused by my blurb and am enjoying the mini avalanche of hits - is that an Instalanche once removed?

by Solomon on Thu, 11/27/2003 - 00:37 | reply

Has everyone lost their sense of humour?

I know our sense of humour is a bit English and dry but really, lighten up, people. As my fellow editor said, we were just trying to make it a bit more fun to put together and a bit more fun for the reader. And surely, allowing our biases to show in our comments gives more information about the posts than the titles alone would give.

--

Sarah Fitz-Claridge

<http://www.fitz-claridge.com/>

<http://www.settingtheworldtorights.com/>

by Sarah Fitz-Claridge on Thu, 11/27/2003 - 14:23 | reply

Remarks...

I don't think any of the comments here were too harsh. Very nice round-up as well. Thanks so much for hosting.

Andrew Ian Dodge

by a reader on Thu, 11/27/2003 - 17:09 | reply

Digs Deeper

Following Admiral Quixote's link, I read that Apple has only 3% of the personal computer market. Interestingly, our web server logs show 16% of identifiable hits come from Macs. Perhaps MS Windows owners are unwilling or unable (in either case quite understandably) to actually use their computers as much.

by Kevin on Thu, 11/27/2003 - 19:47 | reply

Or, perhaps...

Or, perhaps since PC owners have so many other applications to choose from, they're more likely to be using their computers for something other than surfing the web.

Gil

by Gil on Thu, 11/27/2003 - 20:24 | reply

PC nonsense and “anti-Christian bigotry” (WTF?!)

Or, perhaps since PC owners have so many other applications to choose from, they're more likely to be using their computers for something other than surfing the web.

Personally, I'd rather spend my time actually doing something useful than spend it going through thousands of applications trying to find ONE that will actually not crash the system, work, and do what you need it to do, and not take days and days to learn. But if you like that kind of thing, obviously, stick to Windows. 8-)

Oh, and about us being “anti-Christian bigots”, Admiral Quixote -- you don't think that that is a teensy bit of an over-reaction to a little joke? Yes, we are atheists, but all we did was make a little joke, and one that was actually more about Christian music than Christianity per se (though what would be wrong with a little joke about that too?!). It is the same kind of joke one might make about, say, Country & Western music, if one dislikes that (as indeed, we do). Goodness! Whatever will we be accused of next?!

(Gil may be a PC type, but at least he has a good sense of humour. Of course being a PC type, he needs that. ;-)

--

Sarah Fitz-Claridge

<http://www.fitz-claridge.com/>

<http://www.takingchildrenseriously.com/>

by Sarah Fitz-Claridge on Fri, 11/28/2003 - 02:11 | reply

You People are Mean - take two

I tried posting this before and somehow my comments are no longer here. I'll try once again.

I agree with the first critic and disagree with the Admiral. Your attempts to spice things up failed and are indeed harsh. Not only are you mean, you are hypocrits. I noticed this is a group blog and your posted links to your other sites at the top - without any sarcastic comments.

Life is too short to waste time with crude writers - especially when there are so many decent blogs out there. The COV lets me see a lot of new blogs, but it also allows me to rule out revisiting hypocrits like you. Good-bye.

by a reader on Mon, 12/01/2003 - 18:39 | reply

logic is neat

if the policy is to criticise blogs the authors think are wrong, then not criticising their own stuff isn't hypocritical, it fits the policy perfectly.

- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by a reader on Tue, 12/02/2003 - 00:39 | reply

The Brownshirts Of Our Time

The Brownshirts of our Time:

Here's what's sad. Clearly, my speech touched hearts and minds; there was room for common ground and for civilized discourse. But not once the word "Palestine" was uttered, not when "Palestine" is seen as a symbol for every downtrodden group of color who are "resisting" the racist-imperialist American and Zionist Empires. Once the "Palestine" litmus test of political respectability was raised, everyone responded on cue, as if programmed and brainwashed. It immediately became a "white" versus "brown" thing, an "oppressed" versus an "oppressor" thing.

These are the Brownshirts of our time. The fact that they are women of color, womanists/feminists is all the more chilling and tragic. And unbelievable. And to me: Practically unbearable.

Yes, something nasty is happening. Something with countless precedents since time immemorial. But something else is happening too, something without precedent in human history. Though still very far from being a majority sentiment, there is nevertheless an unmistakable large-scale, mainstream, gut-level solidarity with Jews (and with Israel), especially in the United States. Consider Charles, founder of LGF, and Frank, and Misha, and Elliot, and Alan, and countless others. Could it be that this difference will make the difference? That the current brownshirts will be the last to have any significant effect on the world?

Thu, 11/20/2003 - 02:44 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

dan truly

consider me too a friend of the Jews.

a person ashamed for not getting it years ago, for letting the TV reports of attacks and suicide bombings blur by in the background, of feeling vaguely connected to the Palestinians because they of course were the "underdogs" and the "oppressed" ones.

no longer.

never again.

not on my watch.

by a reader on Thu, 11/20/2003 - 03:56 | reply

Me too

Turning the gut reaction into useful arguments, that's the thing. I find it hard.

Alice

<http://www.alicebachini.com/>

by a reader on Fri, 11/21/2003 - 17:32 | reply

umm

useful arguments against which coherent rival theories?

-- Elliot Temple

<http://curi.blogspot.com/>

by Elliot Temple on Sat, 11/22/2003 - 16:41 | reply

umm

Why do the rival theories have to be coherent?

It seems to me that they only have to be attractive and (potentially) popular to be a problem against which arguments could be useful.

Many people hold incoherent theories. Perhaps many of these people will not be swayed by argument, but I suspect many of them can be; if the argument is well-suited to them and they're ready for it.

Gil

by Gil on Sat, 11/22/2003 - 22:05 | reply

shrug

fine, arguments against which competitive rival theories? or which relevant rival theories? or which rival theories at all? since when are there any that we lacked arguments against? i know there's out-and-out Jews Are Evil, but we could already defeat that one in an argument no problem, and that's not the solution to it.

-- Elliot

by a reader on Mon, 11/24/2003 - 03:47 | reply

Israel V Jews

I reserve the right to think whatever I want of the Jewish religion, and the people who profess the Jewish faith, and still think Israel, the State, are a bunch of Nazis.

If they were putting up a wall around a bunch of Jews...

by a reader on Mon, 11/24/2003 - 16:17 | reply

A Wall Around A Bunch Of Jews

They are putting up a wall around a bunch of Jews.

They're trying to keep them from getting blown up.

How would you protect people from getting murdered by enemies who have long taken "credit" for just that as their strategy and goal?

Gil

by Gil on Mon, 11/24/2003 - 18:54 | reply

Thinking

I reserve the right to think whatever I want of the Jewish religion, and the people who profess the Jewish faith, and still think Israel, the State, are a bunch of Nazis.

If they were putting up a wall around a bunch of Jews...

You have the right to think whatever you want, but not to be free of the moral consequences of your position. As it stands now, you are standing with evil against good. That you are called on it is not a violation of your rights.

~Woty

<http://woty.davidsj.com>

by Woty on Tue, 11/25/2003 - 03:09 | reply

Richard Dawkins, George W. Bush, and Morality

The Guardian chose sixty people, mostly prominent British thinkers, to give President Bush the benefit of their advice on the occasion of his State Visit. There are some letters of welcome among their contributions, but their predominant tone is just as sneering, angry and empty as you might expect, given the venue. One of the most extreme is, predictably, from Harold Pinter (scroll down), who offers the "war criminal" President a glass of blood to wash down his cucumber sandwiches. But perhaps the most shocking was from the great evolution theorist Richard Dawkins. Readers of his books will be aware of his attention to detail and his nuanced arguments – in his own field. They will not find any of that in his letter to "Mr Bush":

Dear Mr Bush (I'd say President Bush if you had actually been elected),

Such things are often said in jest. But the rest of the letter makes it clear that Dawkins is serious. He really does believe that George W. Bush "stole" the Presidency – though he never states specifically which alleged actions by Bush constitute that theft. And that is our first clue that what we are seeing here is a conspiracy theory.

I've been asked to give advice to you on touching down in Britain. It is this. Go home. You aren't wanted here.

That is false. The Guardian's own opinion poll on that issue reported that in the real Britain, only 36% would have preferred President Bush not to visit, while 43% welcomed his visit.

You aren't wanted anywhere else either,

One pertinent counter-example to this is Iraq, where a majority are in favour of the Americans staying to finish the job. We suspect that Dawkins knows perfectly well that Britain is not the only country in which Bush would be welcome: there are many, but somehow he discounts them all. None of them count as 'anywhere', and people who respect President Bush don't count as 'anyone'. And that holds especially for the people of the United States, as we'll see in a moment.

but you may have been misinformed that Britain was the one place where you would be welcomed.

Once again, a mocking tone is used for what Dawkins intends as a serious factual allegation – that President Bush is a stupid, inarticulate country bumpkin. That this claim is false is clear from overwhelming evidence, most recently the testimony of Dawkins' fellow campaigner against the liberation of Iraq, Menzies Campbell, the Liberal Democrat foreign affairs spokesman.

Wrong. Well, presumably your best pal Tony welcomes you.

It's not that they are "best pals". It's that they have shared values.

But that's about it. Your motorcades, your helicopters, your triggerhappy guards

There is no denying that the President uses motorcades and helicopters (though it is unusual for this to be levelled as a criticism: what is he supposed to use, camels?). But "triggerhappy guards"? What shred of factual substance is there in that allegation? Are US Presidential bodyguards known for opening fire on innocent people? Indeed, have they ever been known to fall short of the highest standards of professionalism? Calling them "triggerhappy" is a fantasy and a libel against honourable and highly competent people.

will try to protect you from the people of Britain, who would otherwise spoil the photo-ops for the folks back home.

Superficially, this is another joke: Dawkins is jocularly pretending that the Americans' concern for the President's safety is feigned, and that its real purpose is to suppress evidence that he is not welcome in Britain. But like all the jokes in this letter, it would not be relevant, and he would not have included it, if the underlying allegation were not intended seriously. And that allegation is, yet again, false. First of all, the President was, in fact, welcome. Second, the degree of totalitarian control that would be necessary to substitute a message different from what the media themselves think is true, is far beyond the real powers of the US Government (though not, of course, beyond the imaginary powers of imaginary conspirators engaging in unspecified skulduggery). Third, the precise location of the demonstrations (which was, of course, all that was at issue) is completely irrelevant to what "photo-ops" there will be for the "folks back home" to see – unless the protestors were allowed close enough to tear the President limb from limb.

But be in no doubt. We despise you here too.

Indeed there can be no doubt that Dawkins despises President Bush, and that he is not the only one. Yet his picture of a Bush-despising nation is yet another fantasy. If there is a grain of truth in it, it is that many in Britain take a rather condescending view of the President. As Andrew Sullivan put it recently: "I don't believe that the Brits are, as a whole, that hostile either to the war or to Bush. The minority who hates him appeals to the ignorance of those who condescend to him.”

After you and Jeb stole the election (by a margin smaller than the number of folks you executed in Texas)

Now, what is the relevance of that comparison? Perhaps it is a matter of symbolism: Bush won by a margin smaller than the number of people whom he ‘killed’ (by refusing to commute their sentences); and let us suppose that all those murderers would have voted for Gore, had they lived (and been released, and registered to vote in Florida). If, in addition, we forget that the people in question were executed for murder and not for their political opinions, then we discover a pleasant symmetry between Bush and the likes of Saddam Hussein, who also retained power by killing those who would otherwise vote against him.

However, if that is the intention, Dawkins himself spoils the symmetry by recognising the legitimacy of Saddam's rule while denying Bush's.

you were rightly written off as a one-term president: a fair advertisement for Drunks For Jesus but otherwise an idle nonentity; inarticulate, unintelligent, an ignorant hick. September 11 changed all that.

Dawkins doesn't intend this to mean that Bush is no longer an ignorant hick. But the accidental meaning is interesting. Many people do seem to have become wiser on that day. In others, it seems to have brought out the worst.

Not that you covered yourself with glory that day. You are said to admire Churchill. Can you imagine Churchill, at such a moment, panicking all around the country from airbase to airbase? Even nasty old Rummy bunkered down where he belonged.

Churchill was known for his physical courage which sometimes crossed the line into recklessness. But he was also known for his grasp of the big picture and for his sense of personal responsibility. So the idea that, as Prime Minister, he would have pointlessly risked his life – and risked conceding a major victory to the enemy – by staying at a location that might be under enemy fire is ludicrous and insulting. The parallel insult to Bush is meaningless and petty.

Now, finally, after many hints, we reach the mother lode of conspiracy theory:

Never mind, your puppeteers from the Project for the New American Century recognised the opportunity they had been waiting for.

Ah, the puppeteers. The Project for a New American Century is a recent favourite for the role of Conspirators, among people who think that way.

September 11 was your golden Pearl Harbor.

Yes, Conspirators traditionally rejoice in the shedding of innocent blood, when it promotes their Sinister Agenda.

This was how you'd get elected in 2004 (not re-elected, elected).

Sigh. Yes, we got the joke the first two times. Except that it wasn't just a joke.

The secret means by which these terrifying Puppeteers rig elections, control the media, pull President Bush's strings and reap their ill-gotten rewards afterwards are not specified, but the overt means by which they get their Agenda implemented are:

You would announce a War on Terror. American troops would win. And you would be the victorious warlord, swaggering in a flight suit before a Mission Accomplished banner.

It worked in Afghanistan. But then those puppeteers moved on to their long-term project: Iraq. Never mind that you had to lie about weapons of mass destruction.

There is no evidence of any such lie.

Never mind that Iraq had not the smallest connection with 9/11.

What? Not even the smallest connection? What about this? Or this? Moreover, might not a regime that rejoiced at the destruction of 9/11, and had already murdered hundreds of thousands, be legitimately considered a threat to the well-being of [its] people, the peace of [the] region, the security of the world?

The good folks back home would never know the difference between Saddam and Osama.

Note the sweeping contempt for the American people that is inherent in this theory.

You would ride the paranoid patriotism aroused by 9/11 all the way into Iraq, and hand out oil and reconstruction contracts to Dick Cheney's boys.

This further conspiracy theory ('it's all about oil') is, as we have noted before, an unusually illogical one (see also this link). "Dick Cheney's boys"? What is the allegation here? That a company that Vice President Cheney once worked for will inflate the invoices for their reconstruction contracts and give a share of the markup to Cheney, who will then pass on a kickback to President Bush? But if they were that open to bribery, what difference would it make that Cheney once worked for the company in question?

Or is the idea that Cheney caused the puppet Bush to start a war as an act of pure friendship for his former colleagues, because they needed the work?

That escapade is now backfiring horribly, as many of us said it would.

Many hoped it would. It hasn't.

No wonder young American travellers are sewing Canadian flags to their rucksacks. What we in Britain won't forgive is that you have dragged us down too.

The means by which Bush "dragged" Mr Blair into liberating Iraq is, again, unspecified, the evidence that any such dragging occurred, again, absent.

Go home.

He has gone home, with the praise of many Britons ringing in his ears.

And the letter is signed:

Richard Dawkins Scientist

Scientists care about facts. In our comments above, we have addressed mainly the errors of fact throughout Dawkins' letter, even though the real issue is a moral one. We have chosen to do that because the two are connected. Dawkins was one of the great thinkers of the twentieth century. When someone of that calibre goes out of his way to publish a stream of factual falsehoods and muddled arguments – and with such passion too – it is not because he is stupid, and it is unlikely to be because he hasn't thought about the issue. It is probably because he is in the wrong about something.

Yet paradoxically, we believe, this wrongness is intimately bound up with an issue on which Dawkins is fundamentally in the right: his objection to religion, and in particular, to the religious conception of morality. Any attempt to base morality on God's alleged words or wishes is indeed invalid. For even if God exists, given human fallibility, we can only ever conclude that an idea is God's through a prior rational argument that it is good, never vice versa.

However, it does not follow from the fact that religious justifications for morality are fallacious, or from atheism itself, that there are no objective moral values, or that all values espoused by religious believers are wrong.

Indeed, the belief that all purportedly objective moral values are necessarily rooted in the supernatural is one which, ironically, Dawkins shares with President Bush and nearly all religious people. And many religious people, especially religious fanatics, share with Dawkins the view that the purportedly objective moral values of other religions are no more than myths and verbal tricks to frighten believers into submission to the priests of false gods.

An atheist who makes that mistake is therefore likely to be especially alienated from morality. Such a person must construct, and distort, their moral view around the non-objectivity of all moral views, and their passion comes from the conviction that people who deem moral questions to be susceptible of true answers are the epitome of evil – indeed, the only evil. That fact that this stance is self-contradictory only serves to increase that passion.

And thence to the dark logic of moral relativism which is that a refusal to take sides between right and wrong always entails siding with wrong against right. And so, those who are committed to the proposition that Bush's morality is no better than that of Saddam or Bin Laden inevitably find their real passion directed against Bush.

Yet the truth is that despite what Bush and Dawkins both think, the morality behind US foreign policy is not actually derived from supposedly revealed knowledge. It comes from the mainstream of our centuries-old secular tradition, as represented, for instance, in the US Declaration of Independence, and in the Common-Law legal systems, of applying reason and criticism to the question "how ought we to live?", and judging practical issues of right and wrong against our evolving understanding of the objectively true answer to that question.

Tue, 11/25/2003 - 02:21 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

praise

Very nice.

- Elliot

by a reader on Tue, 11/25/2003 - 05:15 | reply

more praise

Well done. Sarah

by a reader on Tue, 11/25/2003 - 12:41 | reply

Awesome

Despite the pain of reading Richard Dawkins' letter. Awesome post.

Earlier this year I attended a public lecture given by him at the Oxford Union, promoting a freshly published essay collection. He made it clear that, on moral issues, he wanted to deny religious leaders the automatic right to media coverage. In the Q&A session, he was pressed on this point. Surely priests knew a thing or two about debating right and wrong? He defended his position, and stated that in such matters we should look first to the moral philosophers.

Well, I hope he looks over here at some point!

He's a great scientist, thinker and communicator. Looking back recently, I counted his book 'The Blind Watchmaker' as the beginning of my real education. He is now among the Great And The Good. So his letter deserves an uncompromising, detailed and humane fisting. Looks like this is it.

by Tom Robinson on Tue, 11/25/2003 - 13:11 | reply

Awesome with knobs on

I agree with Tom's appraisal of this post.

I would just add that the "secular tradition" referred to in the last paragraph has been largely sustained by monotheism's gift of the metaphysical assumption that the moral world is real and knowable.

As regards Tom's report that Dawkins wants us to look to moral philosophers for guidance about matters of right and wrong, I wonder which philosophers Dawkins has in mind? Does he mean Karl Marx, who wrote in the Communist Manifesto:

Communism abolishes eternal truths, it abolishes all religion, and all morality, instead of constituting them on a new basis.

Or does he mean Nietzsche, who proclaimed that "God is dead" and that "Morality is the herd-instinct in the individual"? Or perhaps he is thinking of Peter Singer, a self-proclaimed moral rationalist whose reason has led him to conclude that chimpanzees have rights similar to those of human beings?

by Kolya on Tue, 11/25/2003 - 15:27 | reply

Why shouldn't chimpanzees be ...

Why shouldn't chimpanzees be granted rights similar to (if less comprehensive than) those of humans? And, for any given argument against such rights, why wouldn't a similar argument reach the conclusion that humans should have rights considerably less broad in scope than those of a putative superintelligent machine?

by Rich on Tue, 11/25/2003 - 19:48 | reply

monkeys

humans can learn anything.

monkeys can learn nothing not in their genes.

spot the difference.

-- Elliot

by a reader on Tue, 11/25/2003 - 20:50 | reply

There's a significant amount ...

There's a significant amount of evidence for the cultural transmission of tool use in chimpanzees and orangutans in the wild, not to mention the evidence that chimpanzees in captivity can learn symbols that represent concepts. So that criterion isn't going to hold water, unless you argue that it's a matter of degree: in which case, why are humans necessarily on the "rights" rather than "no rights" side?

by Rich on Tue, 11/25/2003 - 21:03 | reply

more praise

Well done. David

by a reader on Tue, 11/25/2003 - 21:11 | reply

what evidence?

what evidence? and how does it prove they didn't have the ability inborn?

meanwhile, do you have an argument with the theory humans can learn anything? or with the theory chimps can't?

- Elliot

by a reader on Tue, 11/25/2003 - 21:13 | reply

A quick google turns up many,...

A quick google turns up many, many pages on cultural transmission in chimpanzees. Here's a review article:

<http://138.251.146.69/cultures3/articles/download/cultures.pdf>

Also, just to be different, here's a page on cultural transmission in orangutans:

<http://www.dukenews.duke.edu/news/newsrelease.asp?p=all&id=1286&catid=2>

The ability can't be inborn if it can spread from one individual to another after birth (unless you claim that the external stimulus is activating inborn skills, which seems highly unlikely to me).

I don't think either humans or chimps can learn "anything". For example, I don't think that either could learn to memorise trillion digit pseudo-random numbers.

by Rich on Tue, 11/25/2003 - 21:27 | reply

why is activation unlikely?

in your scheme, chimps construct from various patterns of photons hitting their eyes a whole behavioral script. they, in their brain, have a behavioral script constructor of some sort. that's all very complicated.

in my scheme, chimps have inborn various behaviors that depend on the contents of certain variables (memory locations), and also have inborn instructions to set the variables based on what they see, hear etc this is all very possible, isn't it?

as to big numbers, that's simply a hardware issue (limited memory). that has nothing to do with how our brains work. in principle, we could give our brains extra memory. then we could memorise big numbers.

chimps, given unlimited extra memory, still couldn't do philosophy.

by a reader on Tue, 11/25/2003 - 22:18 | reply

It's possible in some cases -...

It's possible in some cases - it's roughly comparable to the way humans learn grammars - but not if the diversity of possible behaviours is too high. For example, cultural transmission of words or methods for solving new problems would fall, I would imagine, outside the scope of possible inborn instructions.

How about the ability to visualise rotations of objects in five dimensions (as opposed to just deducing such properties)? (I think the evidence suggests that people can't even visualise general rotations of objects in three dimensions, although I don't have such evidence to hand.)

I agree that there are some things that humans can do that chimps can't even in principle learn to do, but do we really want to say that rights inhere only in entities that can do philosophy?

by Rich on Tue, 11/25/2003 - 22:32 | reply

cubes are enough for me

we can't visualise objects in 5 spacial dimensions because there aren't that many..?

i do want to say only entities that do philosophy have rights, yes. well, it's not just philosophy. but how can one suffer if one doesn't have wants? one can't..... moral entities are entities that make choices. making choices requires being able to consider the options and have values to choose by and such. monkeys don't do that.

look if we could build a metal robot to act like a monkey, and could build it only using the methods i say (inborn instructions and variables), you would agree the robot had no rights, yes? and if such a robot is possible, and could do what monkeys do, then it's a better explanation than deciding monkeys are semi-human. so now you need to point to something convincing to say my model is insufficient.

- Elliot

by a reader on Tue, 11/25/2003 - 23:21 | reply

Setting monkeys to rights?

Rich writes:

Why shouldn't chimpanzees be granted rights similar to (if less comprehensive than) those of humans?

To turn your question around, what quality do you believe entitles an entity to be granted rights?

by Kolya on Tue, 11/25/2003 - 23:31 | reply

The Dimming of Dawkins

That the thread descended (with modification!) from Dawkins to chimps somehow seems appropriate. As I read his letter's excerpts (along with the excellent fisking), this Bright man dimmed, dimmed, dimmed before my eyes. I better not hear about this kind of thing from Daniel Dennett, or I shall have to fall upon my copy of Darwin's Dangerous Idea.

An excellent posting.

Jerome du Bois

by Jerome du Bois on Wed, 11/26/2003 - 02:21 | reply

Humans...

have a hard time sticking to the point.

by a reader on Wed, 11/26/2003 - 02:33 | reply

So what is the "objectively true answer " to the question "how ought we to live?"

And why is it collective? (You did use the word "we" not "I") Indeed, how can there be a collective answer?

Perhaps you have some intuitive idea of what the answer is, but unless you can answer it explicitly, why would you expect anyone else (e.g.:Mr. Dawkins) to agree with your view of morality?

by a reader on Wed, 11/26/2003 - 03:10 | reply

Objective Knowledge

The collective nature of the question "How ought we to live?" is no different from the collective nature of the question "What ought we to believe about the laws of nature?". In neither case does the legitimacy of the question depend on our prevailing ability to answer it explicitly.

But in both cases it is incoherent to argue that such questions are meaningless, while at the same time maintaining that one or more of the proposed answers are actually false. Yet that is precisely Dawkins' position. He believes both that there is no objective morality, and that Bush's moral theories are actually wrong.

by Kolya on Wed, 11/26/2003 - 04:03 | reply

we

in this case, 'we' = 'people' s e m a n t i c s

- Elliot

by a reader on Wed, 11/26/2003 - 04:44 | reply

Too many questions

Eliot said:

we can't visualise objects in 5 spacial dimensions because there aren't that many..?

So you're revising your position to: humans can learn anything, where by "anything" we mean "things that humans can learn"? ;)

i do want to say only entities that do philosophy have rights, yes.

Then you'd deny rights to newborn babies, people with profound learning disabilities, people in comas and so on?

so now you need to point to something convincing to say my model is insufficient.

Would pointing to the lack of any such robot show that it's at least too early to say whether such a model is sufficient?

by a reader on Wed, 11/26/2003 - 19:34 | reply

Pleading ignorance

Kolya said:

To turn your question around, what quality do you believe entitles an entity to be granted rights?

I really don't know, and it's this lack of knowledge that leads me to think that we should err on the side of inclusivity.

But I do think that rights are not an inherent property of the universe, but come down to what can be defended, supported or enforced by a sufficiently large subset of a society.

by a reader on Wed, 11/26/2003 - 19:38 | reply

Postscript

Those last two comments were by me. And I clearly meant Elliot.
It's been one of those days...

by Rich on Wed, 11/26/2003 - 20:17 | reply

anything and more learn anything -- anything would only include physically possible things..?

learning disabilities and babies -- they do philosophy. comparing babies and animals well they don't compare. babies soon learn language. this doesn't happen all of a sudden. they've been human for a long time before they speak. and people with "learning disabilities" ummm they might be a little dense but that's no big deal.

comas -- well, they used to be human, and may be again. that counts for something. you shouldn't lose all rights if you put yourself in stasis for a while.

robot -- umm, pick a monkey behavior and give an argument why that sort of robot couldn't do it. if we can't find any such arguments, then we can tentatively say my model is sufficient.

- Elliot

by a reader on Wed, 11/26/2003 - 20:18 | reply

The limits of ignorance

Rich said:

I do think that rights are not an inherent property of the universe, but come down to what can be defended, supported or enforced by a sufficiently large subset of a society.

I note that the Koran declares monkeys to be despicable:

So when [the Jews] exceeded the limits of what they were prohibited, We said to them: "Be you monkeys, despised and rejected."

Does it not follow from your position that if militant Islam succeeds in its declared aim of conquering the world, apes ought not be granted rights, because such rights could not be "supported or enforced by a sufficiently large subset of a society"?

And what about the rights of women? If bin Laden has his way with the world, would it not follow that women ought not be granted rights, either?

by Kolya on Wed, 11/26/2003 - 22:46 | reply

Chimp Rights.

I don't know how Socrates did it. Having these discussions day in, day out.

I had a dorm neighbor advocate teaching Chimps how to make fire and setting them loose. At least they'd be able to fight for their rights.

They arm bears don't they?

by a reader on Wed, 11/26/2003 - 23:53 | reply

Arming Bears

They arm bears don't they?

No, but they bear arms.

David Schneider-Joseph

by DavidSJ on Thu, 11/27/2003 - 00:25 | reply

Dawkins

Is a cretin as his letter reveals.

by a reader on Thu, 11/27/2003 - 01:17 | reply

Flying President Bush to Omaha

Dawkins and others presuppose that Bush flying to Little Rock (I believe Barksdale is the current home of the Big Ugly Fat Fellow) and on to Omaha (command center of the Apocalypse) was cowardice.

From the beginning I thought it was making a less-than-subtle diplomatic point, and that point was to threaten nuclear war. At the time we did not know the magnitude of the attack or the conspiracy, and to the extent that we were threatened with "decapitation" (i.e. a possible coordinated attack against our leadership), our side was going to 1) protect the leadership, and 2) remind our enemy whom they were dealing with.

A nuclear retaliation would have been of minimal value in dealing with the ragtag miscreants in Afghanistan. But just as the beat cop wears a gun in a holster in plain view, I somehow think that sending the President to Omaha was a polite reminder to our enemy of the powers presidents control.

by a reader on Thu, 11/27/2003 - 01:37 | reply

The Great Thinker

A world-reknown biologist, intellectual and professor at a leading university writes:

After you and Jeb stole the election (by a margin smaller than the number of folks you executed in Texas)...

Ye gods! I hope he holds his students to higher standards of logic and accuracy. Will someone point out to the great thinker the glaring internal contradiction in this single sentence alone? By mocking the small margin of victory, he concedes there was a margin of victory. (By comparing the "margin" to the Death Row population, we can assume that he's thinking about voter margin and not the margin of consenting opinion in the Supreme Court). Well, which is it, Richie? A laughable margin of victory in the vote or a stolen election by judicial appointment?

We've all heard these canards about the Florida Recount as well as capital punishment in Texas 100 times before. But I've never seen someone claim the election was stolen, then concede it wasn't, and then work in the 'Bush the Executioner' meme all in one sentence. The combination of sheer intellectual torpor and ideological fervor is awe-inspiring.

by a reader on Thu, 11/27/2003 - 03:56 | reply

Dawkins ultimate sin..

was to disagree with the editor on his pet issue. So the editor responds: "I cast you into the pits of hell, ye Judas, Richard Dawkins." (failing that I will refer to you in the past tense). The editor's disciples sing his praise: "Very nice!" "Well done!" "Awesome!" "Awesome with knobs on!"

by a reader on Thu, 11/27/2003 - 19:04 | reply

Ultimate Sin?

What was the point of that "Dawkins ultimate sin.." comment?

If the reader thinks that Dawkins was right and the World was wrong, then he should make an argument to support it. I don't see one.

If he thinks that The World is wrong to criticize Dawkins strongly when they think he is wrong (and that the readers who agree are wrong to say so), then he's unclear on the concept of a weblog (and probably many others, as well).

Gil

by Gil on Thu, 11/27/2003 - 20:19 | reply

It's sad

It's sad to hear such nonsense from an important thinker. It's simply sad....One thing I find funny about this epidemic of conspiracy theories is that more people seem to believe in them than not. Then who is being manipulated by these conspirators?

One point about animal rights.

How can you be sure they can't learn? based on what can you be certain they can't feel pain or suffer? And if they do, and they seem to do if you open your eyes, then denying them any rights is an immoral act, a crime. Simple.

An Iranian Student

by a reader on Fri, 11/28/2003 - 03:28 | reply

Kolya said: I note that th...

Kolya said:

I note that the Koran declares monkeys to be despicable

Well, perhaps it does in the original arabic, but that quote could just mean "Be you (monkeys) and (despised) and (rejected)", rather than saying that monkeys are necessarily despised and rejected.

Does it not follow from your position that if militant Islam succeeds in its declared aim of conquering the world, apes ought not be granted rights, because such rights could not be "supported or enforced by a sufficiently large subset of a society"?

No, but it does mean that they wouldn't be granted rights. What I was trying to say is that "ought" is a matter of opinion, and which of those opinions wins out in practice comes down to the ability of those opinions to influence the people with the power; or, in practice, the ability of people with those opinions to preserve and extend their power, which isn't quite the same thing in the short term and certainly not the same thing in the long run.

Perhaps what I ought to have said is that the truth value of abstract moral statements is perhaps unknowable and in any case almost irrelevant to the development of the world. So we can't know the truth value of "X is morally wrong", but only of "Alice believes X is morally wrong" or "Bob doesn't believe X is morally wrong".

- Rich, who often worries that his moral viewpoint is full of contradictions.

by Rich on Fri, 11/28/2003 - 13:25 | reply

Do you really believe this?

Rich said:

Perhaps what I ought to have said is that the truth value of abstract moral statements is perhaps unknowable and in any case almost irrelevant to the development of the world.

Do you believe that the truth value of the statement "slavery is wrong" is unknowable, and that it has been "almost irrelevant" to the development of the world?

To put this another way, do you believe that the statement "slavery is right" is morally just as valid, and that therefore the actual wrongness of slavery has played no causal role in its abolition?

by Kolya on Fri, 11/28/2003 - 14:08 | reply

Yes, actually I think I do

Kolya said:

Do you believe that the truth value of the statement "slavery is wrong" is unknowable, and that it has been "almost irrelevant" to the development of the world?

Yes, actually I think I do. I also think that I believe that slavery is wrong, even though I don't know that this is absolutely true; that an increasing number of people believe that slavery is wrong; that this has tended towards the abolition of slavery; and that this has increased the general felicity of the world.

What would it mean for "slavery is wrong" to be absolutely true? Where in the quarks and gluons and curved spacetime of the world is this wrongness encoded? Nowhere! All that there is are patterns of matter that encode beliefs about the relative rightness or wrongness of such statements, where beliefs are things that can be accessed using heterophenomenological methods, and which make a difference in the world by their consequences outside our skulls.

- Rich

by Rich on Fri, 11/28/2003 - 15:57 | reply

Re: Yes, actually I think I do

Rich said:

that an increasing number of people believe that slavery is wrong; that this has tended towards the abolition of slavery; and that this has increased the general felicity of the world.

The problem with that theory is this: if an increasing number of people had instead tended against the abolition of slavery, and it had therefore not been abolished but further entrenched, then you would still be saying that the "general felicity" had been increased by what had happened, and would still be offering this as an explanation of why it had. Therefore the fact that it 'increased the general felicity' is vacuous as an explanation of why people converged on that opinion, for it means nothing other than that people converged on that opinion.

By contrast, my explanation would run something like this (of course this is a highly telescoped summary, which suffices for present purposes): people were looking for the truth about whether slavery is right or wrong. They were doing this in the context of traditions of rational behaviour and interactions, which facilitate successful truth-seeking. They converged on similar opinions about slavery, because they were all converging on the objective truth about slavery, which is that it is wrong.

If one adopts this explanation, then one is faced with a challenge whenever people, especially in our truth-seeking society, seem to be converging on what one believes is a falsehood. Say - the popularity of appeasement in the inter-war years would be a good example. And this challenge is a good thing in three ways, all of which are unavailable to someone who denies that moral truths can be objective. First, it causes one to question the objective truth of one's own views: if there is no such thing, then the existence of truth-seeking people in large numbers converging on a different opinion is no reason to think about anything. Second, it makes it meaningful to say: they are all agreed on X, but X is still false. The inability of moral relativists to make sense of such a statement is an absolute disaster for their moral thinking - as I think Kolya was trying to point out. And third, it identifies the challenge that one is facing in regard to persuasion, in the case where one is right. For the only way to change the situation of the majority being wrong about something, is to persuade them that they are in fact wrong.

by David Deutsch on Fri, 11/28/2003 - 21:02 | reply

David said:They converged...

David said:

They converged on similar opinions about slavery, because they were all converging on the objective truth about slavery, which is that it is wrong.

I don't accept that they were converging on the objective truth about slavery. In fact, I think that by saying this you're falling into the very fallacy of which I have been accused. At most we can say that there are some particular arrangements of society and circumstances of history in which increasing numbers of people tend to believe that slavery is wrong. There are, for example, other circumstances of history and society in which, as you note, people converge on ideas about morality that we might find reprehensible, such as the tenets of National Socialism.

There is no objective means to determine which of the many sets of moral ideas on which people converge are objectively true and which are objectively false. At most we can say that such-and-such a set of moral ideas will have this or that as necessary consequences if sufficiently many people believe in them, for those sorts of statements are the sorts of things that are amenable to objective investigations. We can also say that this person or that person would like or dislike those consequences. We can find theories (perhaps from evolutionary psychology) that are useful in explaining why people have differing predilections. But what we cannot do is deduce from these preferences or social developments anything whatsoever about the objective truth of the moral assertions.

(And, furthermore, the relative probabilities of all such convergences for human populations are highly contingent, which means any ideas of morality will be highly parochial when we take a wider view. For example, consider an intelligent species whose mode of reproduction necessarily involves the parasitisation of a host of another, equally intelligent, species and consequently the death of said host. Would it then be morally wrong for the first species to reproduce? How are we to balance this with our idea that killing conscious entities is in general wrong?)

Despite all this, I'm not a moral relativist. Instead, I have my own beliefs about what is right and what is wrong, and will argue in favour of these beliefs. My view is that regardless of the absolute truth or falsity of these beliefs (or, indeed, the meaninglessness of the very idea truth or falsity of them), they will tend to produce the sort of society in which I would like to live. And, for me, my beliefs and desires are very important, regardless of how utterly indifferent the greater cosmos might be to them.

- Rich, who thinks he should now immediately go to read "How are Moral Assertions Connected with the World of Facts?"

by Rich on Fri, 11/28/2003 - 21:42 | reply

How do you explain moral progress?

Rich said:

I believe ... the abolition of slavery ... has increased the general felicity of the world

Would you agree that the rule of law, political and religious toleration, representative democracy, and women's emancipation have also tended to increase the general felicity of the world?

Would you also agree that the promoters of the abolition of slavery and the other cause I mentioned have generally tended to argue for them on the grounds that these causes were actually right?

If these people were mistaken, if there is no moral truth towards which modern world has been evolving, how do you explain the amazing coincidence that most of changes brought about by these self-deluded moralists have, by your own subjective standards, "increased the general felicity of the world"?

by Kolya on Sat, 11/29/2003 - 15:18 | reply

More answers than questions

Kolya said:

Would you agree that the rule of law, political and religious toleration, representative democracy, and women's emancipation have also tended to increase the general felicity of the world?

Yes, I think that is undoubtedly the case.

Would you also agree that the promoters of the abolition of slavery and the other cause I mentioned have generally tended to argue for them on the grounds that these causes were actually right?

No, I would say that some of the promoters of those ideas have argued for them on the grounds that they believe that these causes were morally right. Others have argued for them on the grounds that they would naturally lead to consequences that would be beneficial to said promoters. Still others have argued that their consequences would be beneficial to society as a whole, and have believed that this is a good end.

If these people were mistaken, if there is no moral truth towards which modern world has been evolving, how do you explain the amazing coincidence that most of changes brought about by these self-deluded moralists have, by your own subjective standards, "increased the general felicity of the world"?

Because, as it says at the top of this very weblog, ideas have consequences. Even in the absence of any absolute moral truth towards which social and political evolution can be directed, people are still able to judge the likely consequences of their moral beliefs, and to judge that these might be beneficial in the various ways I've noted above. In still other cases, people have argued for things without such motivations, but using arguments or supporting causes that have been consistent with arguments or causes that on general grounds have been expected to cause such improvements or have been found in the past to produce such improvements.

"If people believe X, or if society is based around principle X, then Y will be a consequence" is a statement whose truth or falsity can be established (or at least investigated) using rational methods. "X is morally right" isn't such a statement. "If people want outcome Y and become convinced that X will result in such an outcome then they will tend to believe in X" is also a statement about the way things could be; "Wanting outcome Y is morally right" isn't.

Once again, you are very nearly approaching exactly that variant of the naturalistic fallacy into which you think I've fallen (but into which I haven't). If you think that the modern world necessarily approaches moral truths, how would you explain National Socialism or Communism? From my viewpoint these movements are rather easy to explain: people have at various times tended to be seriously mistaken about the likely outcomes of acting on their beliefs. The ways in which we might avoid such horrible situations in the future are also rather obvious: by improving our methods to rationally deduce the likely outcomes of putting into action our beliefs. Hence, the scientific method, rationalism in general, the open society, the rule of law, widespread education etc. Regardless of the truth or falsity of moral assertions, these are things that will tend to lead to outcomes that are more nearly congruent with people's desires, and so, given that people have such desires and the faculty of rational insight, will be generally supported by most people who understand them.

- Rich, who hasn't forgotten the animal rights subthread; and who thinks he should write up a more coherent version of the ideas he's been putting forward here as an essay on his own weblog.

by Rich on Sun, 11/30/2003 - 19:58 | reply

Re: More answers than questions

Rich wrote:

No, I would say that some of the promoters of those ideas have argued for them on the grounds that they believe that these causes were morally right.

There's a difference, isn't there, between:

- Believe this on the grounds that I believe it; and
- Believe this on the grounds that it is true.

Are you really denying that any of the promoters of those causes ever argued in the second way?

Well, I think that the great majority of arguments for (and indeed against) those causes have been of the second form. A minority have been on grounds of practicality. Few, if any, have ever been, as you claim, of the first form. Arguments of the first form are of course logically nonsense.

by David Deutsch on Sun, 11/30/2003 - 21:23 | reply

Minor retraction

Yes, you are in fact right here, and I was much too sloppy in what I'd written. I am not denying that promoters of those causes ever argued in the second way. Well, actually I did deny that, but I didn't mean to and wouldn't have done if I'd been less tired. What I had intended to say was that people had advanced arguments for the truth of some moral positions because those people believed in those moral positions, but this (clearly) does not make those moral positions true or false.

But although the argument "believe this on the grounds that it is true" may be elaborated upon in superficially persuasive ways, it also, in the case of moral principles, reduces to a vacuous argument: "this is true because it's true". It's similar to the situation in mathematics: we might be able to prove that some theorem is true given some (consistent) set of axioms, but that says nothing at all about the truth of the axioms themselves. (Indeed, I don't really see what it might mean for a set of mathematical axioms to be true in any absolute sense.)

So far as I can tell, nobody in this discussion has yet presented any reasonable objective test for the truth or falsity of moral principles. The idea of the convergence of lots of people on a principle isn't one, for example, because you yourself have suggested that it's meaningful for lots of people to converge on a false position.

- Rich, who is concurrently arguing elsewhere that moral relativism is a bad idea, and now feels the way he did when he stumbled into an argument between people who thought science was the path to absolute truth and others who thought it was all socially constructed theories of no more validity than any others, and then argued against both sides.

by Rich on Sun, 11/30/2003 - 21:53 | reply

Objective vs absolute knowledge

In an earlier comment Rich said:

What would it mean for "slavery is wrong" to be absolutely true? Where in the quarks and gluons and curved spacetime of the world is this wrongness encoded? Nowhere! All that there is are patterns of matter that encode beliefs about the relative rightness or wrongness of such statements, where beliefs are things that can be accessed using heterophenomenological methods, and which make a difference in the world by their consequences outside our skulls.

In his last comment he said:

So far as I can tell, nobody in this discussion has yet presented any reasonable objective test for the truth or falsity of moral principles.

And he signed that comment:

Rich, who is concurrently arguing elsewhere that moral relativism is a bad idea, and now feels the way he did when he stumbled into an argument between people who thought science was the path to absolute truth and others who thought it was all socially constructed theories of no more validity than any others, and then argued against both sides.

It is notable that, whereas the critics of Dawkins' conception of morality have spoken of the possibility of objective moral knowledge, Rich criticises their stance in terms of the impossibility of absolute moral knowledge. The difference between the two is that the term "absolute knowledge" implies certitude derived from the application of some criterion of truth or falsity, whereas "objective knowledge" carries no such connotation.

I hold that knowledge of morality can be objective in exactly the same sense as can knowledge of physical reality. What I mean by this is that there exist non-arbitrary explanations of the phenomena in the respective domains, and that we can search for understanding of those phenomena in ways that tend to lead us closer towards the true explanations.

These objective explanations, whether of physics or morality, are not themselves "encoded" anywhere in the universe, until and unless we or some other sentient beings create them in the course of trying to understand reality. But the underlying realities, both physical and moral, are independent of the existence and state of mind of any sentient beings.

In both cases, the pursuit of seemingly subjective goals, namely seeking better explanations and better ways to live, tends to lead us towards truer knowledge. The nature of the relationship between reality and our knowledge of it, is philosophically somewhat problematic. But Rich has offered no argument why it is more problematic in the moral domain than in the physical domain.

It would be useful if Rich could clarify whether he believes in the possibility of objective knowledge in general, for instance with regard to the physical world, and, if so, in what way that belief is on a sounder philosophical footing than the belief in the possibility of objective moral knowledge.

by Kolya on Wed, 12/03/2003 - 10:56 | reply

Usefulness, not truth

Before I say anything, I'd like to say that I've been thoroughly enjoying this discussion.

Kolya said:

But Rich has offered no argument why it is more problematic in the moral domain than in the physical domain.

As might be clear from my article Maps of Physics, I don't think that science is the search for truth. Instead, science is about inventing theories that make useful predictions about the behaviour of reality. I don't think that scientific theories form successive approximations to some kind of truth, but rather that their domains of applicability successively enlarge into they cover all of reality. (I will argue about this at greater length if anyone is interested.)

However, whereas in the scientific domain we have an "external" test of the usefulness of a theory - if it fails to predict the outcomes of experiments it must be discarded or at least be no longer considered a theory of universal applicability - we don't have such an "external" test of a moral theory. We might be able to fit moral theories into a larger framework (for example, by saying that in application they tend to increase some utility function), but that doesn't remove the central problem (in this example, "Why is increasing the utility function good?").

The best we can do with moral theories, so far as I can tell, is to say that they tend to lead to the sorts of outcomes that we'd like or perhaps that they fit with the innate moral sentiments wired into our brains by natural selection. But this doesn't mean that they are true. At best, we might find that there are such moral sentiments that really are common to all people, and then invent moral theories that are consistent with those sentiments. But that still leaves the issue of extending those moral theories to other sentient beings, which perhaps have evolved quite radically different moral sentiments (as would have the putative aliens I described earlier in the thread).

(As an aside: when I say "true" or "false", I mean absolutely true or false, in the way that mathematical statements might be theorems or else falsehoods.)

- Rich

by Rich on Wed, 12/03/2003 - 13:15 | reply

That conclusion probably woul...

That conclusion probably would follow from such an argument. That seems perfectly fair to me: that conclusion does not invalidate the argument. Or to put it another way, I don't claim that such a putative superintelligent machine is bound to grant me the same rights it might grant its putative brethren.

-Marcus-

by a reader on Wed, 12/03/2003 - 13:34 | reply

The Basis for Science and for and Morality

Rich said

Instead, science is about inventing theories that make useful predictions about the behaviour of reality.

I would argue that this is a bit strong. IMHO, science is about modeling what we observe. There is no way to determine the inherent limitations of our observations. Indeed, idealism is a perfectly respectable philosophy for a physicist to have. Wheeler, for example, stated that the universe could not exist without a primitive act of registration.

Rich also said:

The best we can do with moral theories, so far as I can tell, is to say that they tend to lead to the sorts of outcomes that we'd like or perhaps that they fit with the innate moral sentiments wired into our brains by natural selection.

I differ here too. I think the best we can do is accept that morality is inherently based on faith. It might be faith in God, it might be faith in the existence of self-evident truths. (e.g. We hold these truths to be self-evident....) But, any attempt to derive morality either through pure reasons or from observations ends up faltering.

I have no problem with the requirement of having to have faith. I'm not sure why others find this distressing.

Dan M.

by Dan M. on Wed, 12/03/2003 - 20:01 | reply

amusing

i believe rich, david, kolya and I all agree faith-based truth is no truth at all. we shouldn't believe something without a good reason.

- Elliot

by a reader on Wed, 12/03/2003 - 23:24 | reply

What is "a good reason."

Eliot wrote

I believe rich, david, kolya and I all agree faith-based truth is no truth at all. we shouldn't believe something without a good reason.

So, you are arguing that the truth of a statement is dependant on human beings having good reason to believe it? I've always thought of truth as something that is true whether we know enough to say anything about it or not. For example, either "Jesus was less than or equal to 5 feet in height" or "Jesus was over 5 feet in height" is a true statement. I really don't know which statement is true, but one is.

I'm also not sure what "a good reason" means. For at least some of the major actors in the Enlightenment, the self evident nature of the rights of man was good enough reason for them to base "their lives their fortunes and their sacred honor" on that principal. I'm guessing you differ with that, but I'm wondering what constitutes "a good reason" for you. If it is emperical proof, then there is a wealth of things we take for granted that we have no basis for accepting as true.

Dan M.

by Dan M. on Thu, 12/04/2003 - 00:31 | reply

Truth, not usefulness

Rich said:

I don't think that science is the search for truth. Instead, science is about inventing theories that make useful predictions about the behaviour of reality.

This view of science may be a true description of the mental attitude of the majority of scientists. But it is generally not true of those scientists who make fruitful theoretical discoveries. Whatever Rich may think they are doing, they think they are searching for the truth.

For instance, that is what Einstein thought he was doing when he created the theory of special relativity. The alternative explanation, namely that the problem Einstein was working on at the time was how to "make useful predictions about the behaviour of reality", is factually false. Einstein is known to have been a hard epistemic realist.

Rich can argue that Einstein's perception that he was seeking the truth, does not constitute an argument for the proposition that the truth exists. But I think it does suggest an opening for such an argument. The easiest way to explain this is with a thought experiment.

Consider two AI systems running rival algorithms for doing physics research:

- a non-realist algorithm that operates on past observational data searching for new mathematical formalisms that better fit the existing data; and
- a realist algorithm that seeks to create new, more powerful models of reality, which it tests against existing uncontentious models of reality, and also against past observational data.

I believe that the realist algorithm would outperform its non-realist rival by orders of magnitude. This conjecture is no more an argument for realism than are Einstein's beliefs on the subject. But it does show that the difference between epistemic realism and non-realism is in principle testable, and it creates an opening for a substantive argument for the realist stance. If the assumption of realism proved operationally necessary for the creation of successful new theories, epistemic realism would be corroborated, if for no other reason, by the application of Occam's razor.

by Kolya on Thu, 12/04/2003 - 01:16 | reply

ummmm i didn't say that

So, you are arguing that the truth of a statement is dependant on human beings having good reason to believe it?

no.

what we should believe is dependent on what we have good reason to believe. what's true isn't effected by whether we happen to be right about our beliefs or not.

as to what a good reason is. that's really another subject. all the matters for now is that we can argue over that, and change our mind over that. there is one truth, but our search for truth must not be monistic. there isn't a single golden road to the truth. our search, rather, gets to involve many approaches.

- Elliot

by a reader on Thu, 12/04/2003 - 02:49 | reply

the best way to do physics

Koyla wrote:

{quote}

For instance, that is what Einstein thought he was doing when he created the theory of special relativity. The alternative explanation, namely that the problem Einstein was working on at the time was how to "make useful predictions about the behaviour of reality", is factually false. Einstein is known to have been a hard epistemic realist.

{end quote}

I wouldn't argue with that, but Einstein can be considered the last of the great old physicists. He had strong disagreements with Bohr and the Copenhagen school concerning QM. He was convinced that there was a layer of real, local, hidden variables underlying QM.

At the time, it was a very reasonable position. But, with Bell and Wigner's work, supported by experimentation over the last 30 years, local realistic hidden theories of QM have been shown to be inconsistent with observations. If you look at the foundation of the progress in QM since the '20s, including things like renormalization, you see a tendency to ignore the question of realism. As Feynman said, "shut up and calculate."

So, while, on paper, your proposition sounds reasonable, the data from the last 75 years or so is inconsistent with that understanding.

Dan M.

by Dan M. on Thu, 12/04/2003 - 19:53 | reply

Realism does not reside in hidden variables

Dan said:

So, while, on paper, your proposition sounds reasonable, the data from the last 75 years or so is inconsistent with that understanding.

What's at issue here is the metaphysical proposition that scientific enquiry yields genuine knowledge of the objective world. Nothing that is discovered about the laws of physics, can logically have any bearing on whether that proposition is true.

Speaking of progress in quantum theory – which you mistakenly claim has refuted epistemic realism – I believe that many, if not most, of the workers who have created the subject of quantum computation, have subscribed to the realist conception of the multiverse. This supports my earlier conjecture that the process of scientific discovery is highly dependent on scientists actually seeking the truth.

To paraphrase George Bernard Shaw, those who believe in the truth find it, those who don't make instrumental use of truths discovered by others.

by Kolya on Fri, 12/05/2003 - 02:09 | reply

Local realism is not the only realism

Dan M said:

At the time, it was a very reasonable position. But, with Bell and Wigner's work, supported by experimentation over the last 30 years, local realistic hidden theories of QM have been shown to be inconsistent with observations.

Yes, this is undoubtedly the case. However, I think you're conflating two positions if you're using this to argue against realism in general. That experimental results have violated the Bell inequality by quite a few standard deviations might show that no locally real theory can accurately describe nature, but this doesn't mean that there are no theories that can, and it certainly doesn't mean that there isn't some kind of reality "out there". A world running according to the principles of quantum mechanics (putting aside, for now, difficulties about what constitutes a "measurement") is just as real, by my standards, as a world running by classical mechanics.

- Rich, who'll have more to say about such matters later.

by Rich on Fri, 12/05/2003 - 21:37 | reply

read Fabric of Reality by David Deutsch

read The Fabric of Reality by David Deutsch

we have a local, realist interpretation of QM or on the web see: <http://www.hedweb.com/manworld.htm>

- Elliot

<http://www.curi.us/>

by a reader on Fri, 12/05/2003 - 23:09 | reply

Terminological tangle

Elliot said:

we have a local, realist interpretation of QM

Yes, but we don't have a locally realist interpretation of QM. The MWI is certainly a realist interpretation (in the sense that it is based on physical things rather than ideas or consciousness as fundamental entities). It's also, given a suitable Hamiltonian, a local interpretation (that is, one in which causal influences travel at the speed of light or slower). (Also, given the right Hamiltonian, we can make a quantum mechanical theory that cluster-decomposes, which means that the universe can be broken down into [not necessarily local] subsystems whose behaviours can be independently analysed.) However, the MWI is not a locally realist interpretation in the sense of Einstein, Podolsky and Rosen: that would require that the state of the system determines fully the results of any experiments on local sub-parts of the system.

Of course, it's very possible that I've misunderstood the meanings of various terms under consideration (whose definitions are a real mess, to the point at which one can subscribe to, for example, a locally realist idealism or whatever) or overlooked some aspect of the MWI.

- Rich

by Rich on Sat, 12/06/2003 - 11:27 | reply

Re: Terminological tangle

Rich's definition of 'local' contains the phrase:

the state of the system determines fully the results of any experiments

This is indeed a terminological tangle, but it is easily untangled:

If "determines ... the results of any experiments" is intended to imply that each experiment has exactly one outcome in reality, then it rules out many-universes interpretations and hence cannot be used to determine properties, such as locality or otherwise, of such interpretations.

If it isn't, then in (many-universes-)quantum theory the state of the system does fully determine the results of any experiments (and everything else that happens in reality), and therefore that theory qualifies as local and deterministic under the definition.

All of which is a long way of saying that quantum theory in the many-universes interpretation is local and deterministic, period. Which includes locally realistic, realistically local, globally realistic, realistically deterministic, deterministically realist, locally deterministic, deterministically local, and uncle Tom Cobley and all.

Now, enough of this mysticism. Richard Dawkins would be appalled. :)

by David Deutsch on Sat, 12/06/2003 - 23:08 | reply

David said: If "determines..."

David said:

If "determines ... the results of any experiments" is intended to imply that each experiment has exactly one outcome in reality, then it rules out many-universes interpretations and hence cannot be used to determine properties, such as locality or otherwise, of such interpretations.

Yes, indeed. It seems to me that in Einstein's arguments he's concerned with what we observe being uniquely determined by the state of the system, hence the efforts of those in agreement with him to make local hidden variable theories. But, as I've said, this isn't the only kind of realism and so Dan M, by using the disproof by experiment of all theories based on local hidden variables to dismiss all realistic interpretations of physics, is taking a step too far.

All of which is a long way of saying that quantum theory in the many-universes interpretation is local and deterministic, period. Which includes locally realistic, realistically local, globally realistic, realistically deterministic, deterministically realist, locally deterministic, deterministically local, and uncle Tom Cobby and all.

In his Incompleteness, Nonlocality and Realism, Michael Redhead describes seven different types of locality :)

- Rich, who still hasn't read or digested all of that book it despite it having been on his shelf for many years.

by Rich on Sun, 12/07/2003 - 09:05 | reply

Representations

As a non-physicist (last time I did physics was when I was at school with Rich) I'd like to make a contribution to this discussion.

This discussion seems to hinge around the relationship between representations and "reality" and is negotiating the idea that there is a class of ideas that might work as a causal model outside of any specific context. That is what a universal realist position on morality implies.

You could take it at the level of "in a society characterised by the interaction of human organisms such and such rules always hold true." This in turn assumes that there are characteristics of human societies that are universally true, and that these characteristics can serve as the basis of specific linguistic formulations which will hold true for any of the possible (context dependent) interpretations of that rule in the super complex and changing circumstances that all societies find themselves in.

If this were true, then evidently it would mean that evolutionary fitness would be vastly increased were organisms already provided with these rules internalised. Like a sort of "Universal moral grammar."

But in the face of the imprecision which all formalisations imply due to the gross simplification they represent in relation to a complex and changing world, we have instead evolved with a flexible mind, sensitive to the contingencies of real life. It is sometimes called a conscience. To say that moral universals exist is to deny that morality is fundamentally a specific act of conscience, where an agent is put in the position of relating generalisations to their specific, unique and often surprising circumstances.

The specific, complex, unique and surprising quality of the real is the argument that is used to reassert a form of realism in the face of solipsistic or relativistic arguments (David Deutsch uses this position himself in Fabric of Reality, Roy Bhaskar gives a slightly less Sci-Fi treatment of this form of realism in "Reclaiming Reality.") : It is real because it is capable of surprising you, or in other words, of challenging your assumptions. But if this is a strong criteria for reality, then fixed formulations of moral universals clearly do not fit very well with it.

It is not that reality does not exist, it is that moral universals do not fit very well with it. To privilege the way one thinks and perceives above the complex and indeterminate character of reality leads to a fragmented and unrealistic perspective, of a reality which is far more continuous, complex and causally intermeshed than any of us can imagine, let alone measure.

This implies that all truths are context dependent to an extent, and are all contingent on acts of definition. To illustrate this point how do we draw the distinction, in any absolute universal way, between slavery and economic coercion? Many people exist in a situation of waged labour where physical force will be applied to them if they attempt to join a union. Others exist in a situation of bonded labour in order to pay off debts. Nations can also face such a predicament. At the same time slaves were often controlled by the threat of withholding of their livelihood as much as by physical force.

I am not saying there are no differences between these situations. But it is unhelpful to attempt to analyse them on the basis of one distinction. Also it is politically suspect. To focus solely on the moral universality of the statement "slavery is wrong" is a political act that glosses over the moral complexities and ambiguities of our current situation, where slavery may be marginal by our definitions, but is in substance (by which I broadly mean the concept of unacceptable levels of coercion and economic exploitation being a part of business as usual) very much alive and kicking by the criteria of many others.

A hubris of precision can be highly misleading, especially in social life.

by a reader on Sun, 12/07/2003 - 16:22 | reply

QM and Realism

Rich wrote

Yes, this is undoubtedly the case. However, I think you're conflating two positions if you're using this to argue against realism in general. That experimental results have violated the Bell inequality by quite a few standard deviations might show that no locally real theory can accurately describe nature, but this doesn't mean that there are no theories that can, and it certainly doesn't mean that there isn't some kind of reality "out there". A world running according to the principles of quantum mechanics (putting aside, for now, difficulties about what constitutes a "measurement") is just as real, by my standards, as a world running by classical mechanics.

First of all, the specific point that I was making in my post was that people who dropped or tabled the question of reconciling QM with realism made the most progress in physics. The work of the Copenhagen school, the development of QED and the standard model involved people who dropped, tabled, and tabled the question of realism, respectively.

With all due respect to those attempting to develop quantum computing, I wouldn't rank their work as nearly as critical in the development of physics as the development of QM, QED and the standard model. It is quite possible that some of them accept all the metaphysical implications of MWI, but I know that at least some folks regard it as a convenient fiction.

Having said that, let's go on to realism. I think that I have a stronger definition of realism than you do. If you look at the history of philosophy, you can see realists not just arguing that there are real things apart from us. They argue that the objects of our observations, such as books, tables, or chairs exist apart from us.

As I mentioned elsewhere, Kant has a philosophical view that occupies the middle ground between realism and idealism. Nonenon exists apart from our minds, but it is not the world we live in. Rather we live in the world of phenomenon that is the interface between nomenon and our minds.

Going back to the MWI and non-local "realistic" interpretations, let us see what they require for acceptance. Both require things that are both very real and unseen. In MWI, there is a rich infinity of universes created every attosecond. Indeed, there is a rich infinity of Dan's and Rich's created every attosecond. Both of us will do everything it is theoretically possible for us to do. Each of us will kill millions of people, torture children by the score, etc.

None of this is subject to empirical testing, of course. As far as I can tell, it's all there in the name of symmetry. While I tend to like symmetry as well as the next fellow, the improvable claims of MWI are a bit much for me to swallow in order to obtain this symmetry.

You also mentioned that there could be hidden non-locality. Certainly there could. But, as I'm sure you know, accepting real, hidden violations of well-verified theories has difficulties of its own.

With this type of latitude, I can develop a nifty argument for creationism, bring back the aether, and even develop a fine argument in support of "Last Thursdayism."

Realistic philosophical systems always argued against postulating the reality of things unseen and unseeable. Take for example, the extreme modern realism of Popper. Now, it appears that the only way to keep realism is to refer to the real existence of the unseeable, or what might yet be discovered that will overturn theories that have not been falsified in tens of thousands of experiments over a hundred years.

I'll be happy to admit that this does not falsify realism. But, I think it is very reasonable to point out how problematic it is for realistic interpretations of QM to require the reference to either unseen violations of well-verified theories, such as SR, or unseeable but very real things that strain credibility.

Dan M.

by Dan M. on Mon, 12/08/2003 - 21:13 | reply

Hello World! you!=world

1. None of the positions in the letter and in this article are unbiased.
2. This has to be the funniest political rant I read this year.
3. Fact - there are many people in The World who don't like Mr. Bush.
4. I'm one of them. (And I like FOXNEWS :) the funniest "news chanel")
5. Even slashdot sounds more unbiased than this article - witch sounds more like - Chewbaka Defense.

MOD: Funny +5!

by a reader on Wed, 01/14/2004 - 03:14 | reply

Re: Hello World! you!=world

a reader wrote (in summary):

You're biased.
funny, funny;
biased. (Biased.)

You seem to be saying that our article is biased in some comical way, though it's hard to tell without any specific assertion. The closest you come to being specific is to imply that we claim that no one in the World dislikes Mr Bush. However, we explicitly said the opposite. Several times. So you must have had something else in mind.

More importantly, though, you didn't mention, even indirectly, whether you think that anything we said in this article is false.

Is the article entirely true, but biased; or does it contain any false assertion, in your opinion?

by Editor on Wed, 01/14/2004 - 08:49 | reply

Hello world! (2)

I must apologize for not signing my last message (Hello World! you!=world) as well for any mistakes I have made due to the fact that English is not my native language.

My name is Osman Ergean and my e-mail is: ergean@yaho.com (this is my signature).

First Dawkins is very emotional and out sync with his scientific activity, and makes a huge mistake signing his letter as Scientist. A letter that is more a personal rant in which he expresses his personal opinion. (I won't enter a debate about the view that even a scientific position is based on a personal view of the world.) That doesn't mean he is not a scientist anymore, and those who starting from this letter begin to reconsider his work should reconsider their "way of thinking".

Some of the issues that jumped in my view are:

- 1) Mr. Bush was elected in a debatable election! He is the president according to the constitution. Dawkins has a point, Bush election was in no way a clear and classical win. "The aristocracy" of Leo Strauss has shown its power. Any way Dawkins is walking a thin line here. The point about number of people killed is symbolic in other way, Europe is uneasy with death penalty, no political connection here, just plain ethics.
- 2) Churchill was not reckless, he played his cards well, just like the royal family did, and that was a strong message for all the people at that time. The point of Dawkins, I believe, was that Mr. Bush sent the wrong message - I don't know what the hell is going on, so I'll fly until I find out. Be calm, everything is OK!?!?!? (As someone above pointed Bush was rushed to a central command to send the world a message - Don't mess with us I have WMD. - I don't think that was an appropriate message: panicked and uninformed.)
- 3) The Iraq-9/11 connection, there is no official proof for that, and there is no sign of WMD from Iraq - even with the "convincing" Dick Cheney show-the-photos-show last year at UN. "Dick Cheney's boys" - well is hard not to believe that when all GSM contractors except the Americans were banned from auction (and the rules of the auction were changed several times).
- 4) At the end of the article is an attack on Dawkins religious beliefs, even when in his letter there is no such mention of religion, at least none I could find.

Thank you for your attention and Have a nice day!

by a reader on Wed, 01/14/2004 - 15:03 | reply

In defence of Dawkins

I think that Mr Deutsch is taking Dawkins' letter much too seriously, and delving much too deeply into the hidden innuendoes (I'll illustrate this claim shortly).

Yes, Dawkins' tone is one of belittlement and contempt. As I see it, the letter was written to amuse and entertain like-minded people (such as Guardian readers) depressed and angry at what they see as the stupidity and corruption of the present US administration and the flawed election that brought it into being. I think Dawkins did a smashing job - as usual his attack is hilarious thanks to the combination of its 'fanatical' zeal and the eloquence of its expression. It put a smile on my face in these troubling times, and of course I knew not to take it all literally. I neither knew nor thought it relevant what proportion of people welcomed Bush's state visit. Myself and more-or-less everyone I know feel much the same as Dawkins. My suspicion (wholly unjustified by hard evidence, but I'll state it anyway) is that the vast majority of the 'intelligentsia' in this country think of Bush as being somewhere in between a shockingly ignorant statesman and a dangerous psychopath.

To give an example of your (Deutsch's) overliteralism, consider your response to Dawkins' reference to Bush's 'triggerhappy' guards. I think you have to give Dawkins some poetic license here.

(1) Everyone knows that the real US president's bodyguards could hardly be called 'triggerhappy'. The notion is absurd. Hence, we should look for a non-literal interpretation of Dawkins' remark.

(2) In the Iraq war, the number of 'friendly fire' incidents was needlessly high, and in particular a number of journalists were killed (including, incidentally, the Al Jazeera man Tariq Ayoub, who died after the Al Jazeera offices received a direct hit from an American rocket).

The president's own guards may not be triggerhappy, but they are affiliated with the US armed forces, who are.

Also, the comment about Bush's winning margin being smaller than the number of people executed in the state of Texas is basically a throwaway remark. I think it's silly to try to reconstruct a hidden argument where clearly none was intended, and especially if what you finally come up with (that Dawkins regarded Saddam as a more legitimate leader than Bush) is so clearly absurd. All Dawkins wanted to do here was remind us, in a memorable way, of (a) the narrowness of Bush's (nominal) victory and (b) the fact that under Bush's governorship, a relatively high number of people were executed. Once again, I think he succeeded.

by Neil Fitzgerald on Sat, 11/27/2004 - 02:30 | reply

You're right

I think Neil Fitzgerald is right.

Dawkins succeeded in amusing those like-minded people who care less about whether their ideas are true than that those false and contemptuous ideas get reinforced.

How rude to criticize such a noble effort!

Gil

by Gil on Sat, 11/27/2004 - 07:28 | reply

Gil: Nothing Dawkins says in Gil: Nothing Dawkins says in the letter is outright false. Much of it is just common knowledge (e.g. that lies were told about weapons of mass destruction.)

Anyway why do you think a like-minded person would not care about whether their ideas are true? Do you think we think the way we do just because of short, incendiary pieces like that letter? Do you think if people like Dawkins stopped writing them then everyone would agree with you? Think again.

by a reader on Sat, 11/27/2004 - 13:11 | reply

Wrong

Reader,

No, many things Dawkins says are outright false. Read this post (again?) for some examples.

Well, Neil Fitzgerald seems to be an example of a like-minded person who didn't care much about whether the ideas were true.

But, in general, I admit that most people who agree with Dawkins would prefer to believe that their ideas were true. But, not so much that they are willing to subject those ideas to serious criticism. They seem to find it much more comfortable to shrug all criticisms off as unworthy of consideration, or coming from unworthy sources.

And, no, I think there will always be a subset of humanity that thinks the way Dawkins does whether he continues to write this drivel or not. Morality will always have to be learned, and many won't learn it. Many will prefer to act on envy and illusions of superiority, rather than adopting a proper respect for the autonomy of other individuals and their right to defend themselves and to be defended by surrogates.

I'm not saying that George W. Bush's strategy in Iraq is obviously correct; but I am saying that Dawkins' attitude towards Bush and his actions is pretty obviously wrong.

Gil

by Gil on Sat, 11/27/2004 - 20:41 | reply

Rereading what my first messa

Rereading what my first message, one might say I came to bury Dawkins rather than praise him, but I'd like to explain something.

What I knew all along is that a sizeable chunk of the British population are so vehemently opposed to the policies of Bush's administration, and so deeply unimpressed by Bush as a man, that they despise him. This I know from reading many polls that have been carried out. Now, Dawkins claimed that Bush would be unwelcome if he came to Britain, which was supposedly shot down by pointing to a survey where 'only' 36% wanted him not to come. Bear in mind that it's a somewhat extreme opinion to have in the first place, to think that a statesman is so awful - that so little can be gained by negotiating with them - that you'd think it better that they cancelled their visit. Now suppose someone had invited you to a big party as the guest of honour, but then you found out that 'only' 36% of the other partygoers despised you. Surely you'd feel unwelcome, even if 43% of them felt OK with you being there.

Anyway, here's a more recent poll (I bet I could find you several more with enough patience) saying that 60% of British voters 'dislike' Bush.

60% of British voters 'dislike' Bush

(The increase from 36% to 60% is likely accounted for by Bush's growing unpopularity, and also the fact that one has to 'dislike' Bush quite a lot to want him to cancel state visits.)

In saying that Bush would be unwelcome in Britain, Dawkins was right, no matter how you spin it. It's not at all controversial.

This is what I meant when I said I thought the numbers in the poll you quoted were 'irrelevant'.

(I'm also the previous 'a reader' by the way.)

by Neil Fitzgerald on Sun, 11/28/2004 - 10:14 | reply

Not Wanted Here

Neil,

How many people would need to welcome Bush's visit for Dawkins' "You aren't wanted here" to qualify as false, in your opinion?

In my opinion, the number is 1. But 43% is far more than enough to qualify the statement as a falsehood.

If "You aren't wanted here" means "You aren't wanted here by me and other intellectual snobs and closed-minded people whom I know", then I suspect that everyone who has ever done anything controversial would qualify as "not wanted" in most places.

And, if that's the criterion, it's the statement "You aren't wanted here" that's irrelevant. Why bother saying it if it's always true? Why imply that it supports the case for why Bush should "Go Home"?

I think that if Dawkins were being reasonable, he would agree that "You aren't wanted here" is false. It's true in the same sense that "You aren't the President of the United States" is true: not at all.

What I think he was trying to say was: "A lot of people with whom I identify hate you and don't want you here." Of course, I think he realizes that Bush doesn't and shouldn't care about that (certainly not enough to change his plans), so he expressed himself in a way that was strictly false; so that he could continue his confused rant.

Gil

by Gil on Mon, 11/29/2004 - 05:48 | reply

Twisted

Any statement ever made can be hideously misconstrued. You can defend Bush irrevocably, as I can Dawkins. However Bush can most discernably be bracketed as a poor politician and a paltry human being. Bush has diminished any bouncebackability the U.S could have ensued, appeasing that little place called 'the rest of the world' His and his countries reputation has been utterly and for the foreseeable future irreversibly destroyed. Dawkins for PM !

by Luke on Mon, 12/27/2004 - 14:07 | reply

Here Here!

Bush's 'religious principals' utterly contradict his actions. He gives a bad name to America, Christianity and freedom in general. Yes, freedom is worth fighting for but you do not have to spend billions of dollars on murdering and torturing the inhabitants of another country, which had nothing to do with what supposedly started the war in the first place.

You cannot honestly say that everything Dawkins said is false. You said that only 43% actually wanted Bush in Britain, that's still millions who didn't want him there; it's not exactly a small minority. Dawkins actually represents the view that many people in many countries have. Facts and figures don't mean a thing; he was exaggerating to express a point of view, a point of view that many will support.

by a reader on Mon, 02/28/2005 - 06:09 | reply

letter

I don't think Dawkin's letter was intended as a balanced critique of the Bush administration (several of these have already been spun-out to book length by numerous authors). Rather, I think it was an expression, however rhetorical, of Dawkin's contempt for the President. This is why it was written. This is why it was commissioned by the Guardian. Dawkin's is a great scientist and a master of the well-reasoned argument, but I wouldn't treat his letter as his foray into political debate, but rather as his opinion of Bush expressed.

I think Dubya is a cunt. Dawkins, apparently, thinks likewise.

Kieren.

by Kieren on Wed, 03/16/2005 - 19:49 | reply

Gil's slippery sophistry is w

Gil's slippery sophistry is worthy of a theologian! And as for the project of trying to unravel Dawkins' tirade with percentages and logical minutiae, it's like saying 'Objection, your honour!' in the middle of a fist-fight. You can't blame the man for his emotionality over this subject, and in fact, rather than impugning his intellectual credentials, I think his vehemence evinces a sensitivity to the horrors for which Bush is responsible that is felt by all thoughtful people. He was speaking for the people of Britain, most of whom are by now aware that our very lives have been put at risk by this avaricious monkey. Under the circumstances, I think we're entitled to sound a little shrill.

by Jamie on Fri, 06/10/2005 - 16:21 | reply

Slippery Sophistry?

It seems that Jamie thinks my points may have been technically valid, but miss the larger point (or something).

I find it fascinating that wanting to have a "fistfight" rather than a calm, reasoned, carefully worded discussion of various policy options is now the defense of the anti-war crowd's behavior.

And, while I think Dawkins is spectacularly wrong about Bush and the war, I didn't mean to impugn his intellectual credentials. I think he's brilliant when he's writing about subjects he understands. I certainly didn't resort to calling him a monkey (avaricious or otherwise).

Gil

by Gil on Fri, 06/10/2005 - 17:28 | reply

Sophistry and violence

We are with Gil in this matter. You will not find us, here at The World, defending any factually false statement that we or anyone else may make on the grounds that we feel strongly about it. That is the way to replace debate by violence.

Incidentally, in our piece we repeatedly noted that Dawkins was making some of his points in the form of jokes, not intended to be taken literally. In those cases we tried carefully to address his underlying point as well as his literal one.

by Editor on Fri, 06/10/2005 - 18:03 | reply

In response to 'Gil' and the Editor.

I sincerely apologise if I came across as in being in favour of violence over reasoned debate. Nothing could be further from my intention. I think that what causes people to react with emotion over this issue, even to the detriment of rational argument, is the patent reality that the 'War on Terror' (Bush's war) is an action consisting entirely of violence, with the minimum possible debate. It was clear on the very day that the towers went down in New York that some kind of reprisal would be inevitable, and that blood would be paid for blood. What wasn't clear was the sheer swiftness and scale of the violence to come.

Dawkins' statement is indeed factually flawed, and hysterical, and trivially paranoid to boot. But the tone should be noted, because it arises from a justified and widely shared sense of horror. Yes, there is a place for reasoned debate; but all the reasoned debate in the world withers in the face of violence backed by might. We have all seen the carnage with our own eyes, and I challenge anyone to recall the bloody images spewed out by the media coverage of the 'War on Terror' and to remain unmoved.

This forum's editor may be with Gil in this matter, but I remain with Dawkins. To quote Churchill, with whom Dawkins draws an unfavourable comparison to Bush: "Better jaw jaw jaw, than war war war." If Bush admired the old war-horse as much as he claimed, then perhaps the violence to which Dawkins responds might have been replaced by debate. Given that it is now clear that America was never under threat from Iraq in the first place, maybe the ineffectual 'debating society' (as Bush regards it) called the UN might still be debating, and certain streets in certain countries might not be quite so littered with corpses.

by Jamie on Sat, 06/11/2005 - 13:13 | reply

Entirely Of Violence

Jamie,

The War on Terror has brought about these changes in Afghanistan, and these in Iraq. Of course, these are just a small subset of the many improvements in the lives of the people who have been liberated (not in your name).

The war is not about paying for blood with blood. It's about preventing future bloodshed, by giving potential future terrorists better options. Unfortunately, this often requires fighting those who are violently opposing this improvement in the lives of people who deserve it. I hope you don't count yourself among their supporters.

And, I really don't think you want to start comparing who does the most corpse littering. Certainly of innocents (which should be a consideration).

Gil

by Gil on Sat, 06/11/2005 - 22:31 | reply

Jamie, Are you aware there

Jamie,

Are you aware there are people who feel strongly that the war is right, and that you are rejecting discussion with these people on the grounds that you feel strongly that they are violent?

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 07/05/2005 - 22:44 | reply

Response to Elliot

On the contrary, my grounds for rejecting discussion with the people you mention are that the war IS HAPPENING, regardless of public opinion within the countries whose troops are involved, and I am enough of a pragmatist to recognise the intractability, not to mention the futility, of the debate: wealth and power will do what they must to protect their own interests. On this very forum I have heard more noble and reasoned justifications for the war than were even thought of by those who perpetrate it. That is the point.

by Jamie on Sat, 07/30/2005 - 14:35 | reply

Oh, incidentally...

... I never suggested that those who support the war are themselves violent, merely that, as I would think was patently obvious even to an obfuscating sophist, the war itself is a monstrous violence, one which has snuffed more innocent lives than any 'campaign of terror'. Why must you people ignore this fact? This is THE fact that motivates highly reasonable people, such as Dawkins, to make the kind of rash comments supposedly beins 'fisked' on this forum.

by Jamie on Sat, 07/30/2005 - 14:52 | reply

Incidentally

the war itself [...] has snuffed more innocent lives than any 'campaign of terror'

So the victims of the Taliban and of Saddam's regime were not in terror?

When Molly Ivins made a similar remark, she eventually realised that she owed those victims an apology and ate crow. Good for her.

by Editor on Sat, 07/30/2005 - 15:05 | reply

Yes, it seems Molly Ivins was

Yes, it seems Molly Ivins was very mistaken in her claim that the casualties of the current war out-weighed those of Saddam Hussein's regime. They don't even come close. However, such was not my claim: the comparison I drew was between the death toll inflicted on innocent Afghanis and Iraqis by 'the Allies' in the current war, and that inflicted on western nations by Al Quaida, with whom said innocents had no connection whatever.

The victims of Hussein's regime and of the Taliban were indeed 'in terror' before the despots were deposed, but I don't recall that being used as a justification for the war during the build-up to it. What I remember was talk of Terror, with a capital 'T'; that conflated monster of hocus and shadows conjured up by Bush and his crew to get as many nice, safe, good ol' white folks as scared as possible in an attempt to get them to back his war. Any and all considerations regarding Iraqis and Afghanis became apparent only AFTER the show was underway.

As I say, you lot are far more sophisticated apologists for the Monkey than any he has ever had in his own employ.

by jamie on Sat, 08/13/2005 - 16:08 | reply

we aren't monkeys. are you wheat?

Arguments such as "don't attack if you will lose more soldiers than the enemy would murder if you didn't attack" and similar have a critical flaw. they fail to take into account that the situation after each of the actions is different. you count the dead bodies. but I count the living, and what sort of life they want to have, and what situation they want to live in.

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Sat, 08/13/2005 - 17:07 | reply

Re: I don't recall that being used

The victims of Hussein's regime and of the Taliban were indeed 'in terror' before the despots were deposed, but I don't recall that being used as a justification for the war during the build-up to it. [...] Any and all considerations regarding Iraqis and Afghanis became apparent only AFTER the show was underway

We are flattered to be compared favourably with President Bush and his 'apologists', but your recollections are mistaken.

President Bush on October 7 2002:

The Iraqi regime has violated all of those obligations. It possesses and produces chemical and biological weapons. It is seeking nuclear weapons. It has given shelter and support to terrorism, and practices terror against its own people. The entire world has witnessed Iraq's eleven-year history of defiance, deception and bad faith. [Our emphasis.]

It would be easy to provide countless further counter-examples to your erroneous recollection. However, it might be more edifying for all concerned if we challenge you to find even a single example of a speech by President Bush, listing the justifications for the liberation of Iraq prior to the event, in which the harm inflicted by the Saddam regime on non-Americans, including Iraqis, did not appear among those justifications.

by Editor on Sat, 08/13/2005 - 18:12 | reply

justification and legality

As if I believed that the omission of humanitarian concerns as a justification for war in one of Bush's speeches would prove that it was not the overriding reason for starting the war! Of course it wouldn't, and neither does it's being mentioned prove that it WAS the overriding reason. I guess such lip-service didn't feature strongly in my recollections mainly because at the time I was paying greater attention to Bush's attempts at finding a legal basis for war, as were most of us in Europe.

Humanitarian intervention might have been given as a legal justification for war in 1988, when the Iraqi regime was carrying out its Anfal campaign against the Kurds; at that time, though, the Reagan administration— comprising many of the same officials who would later lead the invasion of Iraq—was supporting Saddam in his war against Iran and kept largely silent. The second major killing campaign of the Saddam regime came in 1991, when Iraqi troops attacked Shiites in the south who had rebelled against the regime in the wake of Saddam's defeat in the Gulf War; the first Bush administration, despite President George H.W. Bush's urging Iraqis to "rise up against the dictator, Saddam Hussein," and despite the presence of hundreds of thousands of American troops within miles of the killing, stood by and did nothing. See Ken Roth, "War in Iraq: Not a Humanitarian Intervention" (Human Rights Watch, January 2004).

by Jamie Whyte on Fri, 08/19/2005 - 13:59 | reply

Recollection

I guess such lip-service didn't feature strongly in my recollections

Previously you said it did not figure at all, and you categorically denied that such lip service had taken place.

Did this lip service feature in your recollection or not?

Also, recollections aside, it's not clear what you are now saying about whether the lip service actually took place or not. You previously said:

Any and all considerations regarding Iraqis and Afghanis became apparent only AFTER the show was underway

In your present opinion, is that statement true or false?

by Editor on Sat, 08/20/2005 - 11:19 | reply

Re: Recollection

Just out of interest, Jamie, prior to looking up the speeches in the context of this thread, had you heard or read any of them? Or were you relying on extracts presented by the media?

by Editor on Fri, 09/23/2005 - 00:58 | reply

re: blah blah blah

It's typical of a person who can justify in their own mind, to the extent that they can sleep easy, the boiling madness of war that they will focus on picking holes in an argument, rather than trying to come to terms with the gist it. This is why I call you 'sophists'. You deliberately miss the point, drawing a discussion away from said point until it is no longer visible. This is why I accuse you of 'obfuscation'.

I know you will take this as a cop-out, and really it is. I can no longer be bothered to argue with intelligent idiots about the justification for the ongoing war in Iraq when I know the argument is intractable. You can no more grow a conscience than I can ignore mine.

So I'll leave you with the last word...

by Jamie on Wed, 11/23/2005 - 16:57 | reply

Can I have the last word(s)?

Can I have the last word(s)?

Long story short: Everyone's Wrong. Or, for the glass-half-full amongst y'all, Everyone's Right.

I remember when the Lancet report came out with the 100,000 figure, and Pro War peeps started clutching desperately at(the previously rubbished) Iraq Body Count.

Given Hussein's Reign Of Terror was aided and abbetted by the US*, could we not divide the victims? How does that work out then?

*And a number of other countries, of course. We'd need a breakdown of Who supplied What, and then What was used to kill How Many.

Oh, and morality's an illusion, a bit like God. We've managed to off God, now it's just morality and free will. Though if we get rid of the latter, the former goes anyway.

by Tumbleweed Pete on Wed, 02/15/2006 - 03:14 | reply

Re: Can I have the last word(s)?

Although US policy towards dictators, including Saddam, was cynical and immoral for many years, the idea that the US 'aided and abetted' Saddam is hyperbolic to the point of fantasy.

we'd need a breakdown of Who supplied What Here it is. What do you need it for?

by Editor on Wed, 02/15/2006 - 03:44 | reply

Well

I needed the breakdown in regards to earlier comments about weighing up numbers killed.

If x wants to kill y, and I gave x a gun, that would be aiding and abetting.

by Tumbleweed Pete on Wed, 02/15/2006 - 10:05 | reply

And another thing...

"cynical and immoral"

Enlightened self-interest, shurely?

by Tumbleweed Pete on Wed, 02/15/2006 - 13:05 | reply

Re: Well

Doesn't that depend on whether he already had a gun or access to a gun? Increasing his gun selection a little might not be important.

Doesn't whether it was bad to do depend on what we could reasonably have expected him to do with the gun, and whether we were negligent, or not, in deciding whether he was OK to sell to?

-- Elliot Temple

Now Blogging Again

by Elliot Temple on Thu, 02/16/2006 - 05:04 | reply

Re: Well, I needed the breakdown...

[For] weighing up numbers killed.

Exactly. And you said you needed to weigh those numbers up in order to "divide the victims" among Iraq's various arms suppliers. What were your results?

by Editor on Thu, 02/16/2006 - 23:23 | reply

"Doesn't that depend on wheth

"Doesn't that depend on whether he already had a gun or access to a gun?"

Not really, no.

"Doesn't whether it was bad to do depend on what we could reasonably have expected him to do with the gun, and whether we were negligent, or not, in deciding whether he was OK to sell to?"

Not where we know X wants to kill Y. What do you think a brutal dictator wants weapons for? Shooting supersized tin cans off of his palace?

"Exactly. And you said you needed to weigh those numbers up in order to "divide the victims" among Iraq's various arms suppliers. What were your results?"

The graph was next to useless. Not that I don't appreciate the effort. I'm still hunting around for the relevant information.

I'll be sure to let y'all know my results, though.

by Tumbleweed Pete on Fri, 02/17/2006 - 14:48 | reply

Dawkins and Pinter

D and P are both the worst kind of champagne Socialist: claiming to be 'Socialists', they are rich, living a life of luxury in some of the most expensive districts in their respective cities, patronising ('You aren't wanted here' - as though I have given this jerk permission to speak for me, any more than the real working classes have given that other unpleasant prat Pinter permission to speak for them), sneering and lying.

On this evidence, Dawkins is no more a scientist than Dewdney is (the idiot mathematician who goes around screeching that 9/11 was a project of the CIA, the Mossad and little green men from Pluto).

by Yoni on Sun, 09/10/2006 - 23:31 | reply

Faulty memory - can pills help this lad?

"The victims of Hussein's regime and of the Taliban were indeed 'in terror' before the despots were deposed, but I don't recall that being used as a justification for the war during the build-up to it"

Then you need to take memory pills. It was used, most emphatically and repeatedly.

Referring to Bush as a 'monkey' is a reflection on your infantile mentality, not on his.

by Yoni on Sun, 09/10/2006 - 23:36 | reply

This is a ridiculous statemen

This is a ridiculous statement. I might be able to spot the difference if you could write it in legible English. Your point is therefore that humans have a greater capacity for reason and learning? Why should this be held as the marker for having rights? What about vegetated humans who will never have the capacity to gain greater intelligence than a pig or dog? should they have their rights limited also? I would guess your answer to "NO". and if it is your are simply exhauling speciesism.....and that is a poor argument!

by a reader on Wed, 03/07/2007 - 13:22 | reply

Copyright © 2008 Setting The World To Rights

Great Posts That Weren't In The Carnival

Bill Whittle is back – with a great new essay, New Math, that no one knows about yet. Quick, go and read it!

You must read E. Nough's comments on a harrowing 'honour killing'.

Oliver Kamm skewers a particularly nasty Liberal Democrat Member of Parliament. He also has some fun with a GLC City Hall official.

Elegance Against Ignorance takes down George Soros. (Spot on – but a shorter fisting would have been more elegant...)

Spoons rages, too concisely, about the US decision to cut loan guarantees to Israel by $290 million.

Cox and Forkum's latest cartoon, and their accompanying article, rage against Communist China's recent appalling threats of war against Taiwan.

And Allah picks his favourite headline of the year. Peace be upon him. As for the newspaper concerned, we're with Alan on this one.

Fri, 11/28/2003 - 21:59 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

New Math

The Math in new math is unfortunately tragically wrong.

For starters the author includes the figures for the IranIraq war in his calculation of the number of people not killed this year, which is nonsense as that war finished years ago.

Figures for those killed as a result of this war would also have to include the higher murder rate among the civilian population caused by the break down of law and order.

Also the 300,000 of his own people Saddam killed through internal repression were not evenly distributed throughout the 30 years, they cluster around the beginning of that time and the early 90's. Also there is some evidence that the number killed through internal repression went up just before the war started and during the war it's self.

While I approve of the war and I believe it will save many lives in the medium to long term, the calculation is not so simple, nor so positive, as Proteus makes out.

by a reader on Sun, 11/30/2003 - 12:30 | reply

Copyright © 2007 Setting The World To Rights

What Are They Trying To Do?

Here's a question, and a partial answer, inspired by several recent posts at Solomonias. But first, the facts:

- Iran has been pursuing a secret nuclear weapons programme in violation of its international obligations for eighteen years. The UN, last to discover this as usual, has decided to "censure" Iran but to take no action.
- Israel has been building a fence to defend its citizens from murder. The United States, because it considers this unnecessary, has punished Israel by withdrawing an unspecified amount in loan guarantees.
- Jewish members of an organisation based in Israel have the blood of 300 Palestinian babies on their hands. Yes, literally. (Well, on their surgical gloves, anyway.) Plus some Jordanian babies and now one Iraqi baby as well.

Now the question: What are they all trying to do?

- The Iranians are gearing up to instigate a Second Holocaust.

The UN cannot bring itself to oppose this, even in the mildest possible way. Whether the Ayatollahs think they can literally achieve it or not, achieving the status of being able to threaten it realistically is extremely important to them. More important than trade. More important than good relations with the Europeans and Americans. Much more important than their actual national security or, of course, the safety or material well-being of their people.

- The Israelis are trying to live rightly and to be happy.
- The Americans? Trying half-heartedly to prevent both.

While saving the world.

Sat, 11/29/2003 - 21:10 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Room For Improvement

Mr Dean of the Democratic Party may sometimes be unable to compose coherent sentences but, as Andrew Sullivan points out, that is as nothing compared with his substantive unsuitability for Presidential office.

Frank of IMAO may have the worst spelling in the blogosphere. But that is utterly unimportant given his subtle grasp of his subject and, of course, his gift of expressing ideas humorously and concisely:

Think about it: how many good ideas are there about politics and social interaction? It's finite. But how many utterly idiotic ideas are there? Infinitely many. So if someone comes up with a new idea, i.e., draws from the infinity of ideas out there, what's the chance of its being one of the finite number of good ideas? Nearly zero. Thus, by being a conservative and just opposing any new idea out there, you'll be right 99% of the time or more. Just do the math.

Here's the rub, though: if a "liberal" idea actually survives the rigors of conservative scrutiny (the beatings, the shootings, etc.), it, being an accepted idea, is now a conservative one. Yes, the dark secret of conservatism is that once, long ago, all their ideas were liberal. But, by being a conservative, not only do you get to be right almost all the time by opposing new ideas, you also automatically gain ownership of all the liberal ideas that are worth keeping. As the scientific community would characterize that, it is totally sweet!

We are not Conservatives. But the above [here, and in the passage below, we could not resist correcting the spelling and other errors] is a very good summary of why we have a lot in common with them. Frank also goes on, in his jocular way, to endorse the fundamental error of Conservatism:

Inevitably, as time has passed, the finite number of good ideas out there have been discovered, and thus there is less and less chance that any liberal will have anything worth saying. Ergo, the ideas they do propose now are increasingly idiotic. And, now facing only the weapons of derision, they survive by sealing themselves off from outside input, huddling together in small enclaves protected from the light of reason. They're like cockroaches, hiding in the walls, and occasionally emerging from the shadows to wreak havoc.

That there is, and always will be, infinite room for improvement, is one of the great liberal truths.

Tue, 12/02/2003 - 22:49 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

But surely if liberals genera...

But surely if liberals generate new ideas that conservatives adopt once they've been scrutinised, then liberals are creative new-ideas inventors that conservatives couldn't do without?

Seems a bit mean to steal ideas from the other side while constantly dissing them. Isn't that just the kind of badness liberals observe and despise in conservatives? "Keep homosexuality criminal! Down with liberals and their evil ideas!" (20 years of gay rights campaigning later) "Vote for us, gay people!" Ahem.

Alice Bachini <http://www.alicebachini.com/>

by a reader on Wed, 12/03/2003 - 23:13 | reply

"stealing" ideas

the idea of stealing ideas about how to live is, aside from exceptional circumstances (copying and selling someone's book on the subject,say) an absurd notion. we should be happy if people like our ideas enough to adopt them. we should not be resentful that they didn't always agree with us; rather we should be glad they've seen the light now.

all stealing really means in this context is being persuaded. which is good.

- Elliot

by a reader on Wed, 12/03/2003 - 23:20 | reply

Thomas Sowell...

...said (almost exactly) the same thing in his book "A Conflict of Visions". It's a gem that sheds much light on the never ending struggle between left and right.

by a reader on Thu, 12/04/2003 - 04:30 | reply

Appeasement Doublethink

A British prison officer has been fired for making a remark, in the aftermath of 9-11, which indirectly implied that he had something against Osama Bin Laden. Why is that grounds for dismissal? Because (the argument goes) if any Muslims had heard the remark, they might have been offended.

But why should they have been?

The officer is a former Coldstream Guardsman with a 21-year unblemished record in the Prison Service.

The Norwich hearing was told that on Nov 15, 2001, he threw some keys into a metal chute at the prison gatehouse. When someone said it sounded as if he had thrown them so hard that they were going through the tray at the bottom of the chute, Mr Rose said: "There's a photo of Osama bin Laden there."

Peter McKinnon, another prison officer, told him to be quiet because two Asian women wearing headscarves and an Asian man were at the window of the gatehouse.

The investigation never discovered whether the visitors heard the comment.

The very idea that hostility towards an enemy who has declared war on our civilization should be taboo, is the epitome of appeasement. It is the idea that threats can be avoided by systematically giving those who are making them the impression that we have no criticism of them, and that nothing that they might do would result in a violent response from us. This is not only false, it is the very thing that invites threats and, eventually, war.

The doublethink is located at the following question: do Muslims, broadly speaking, sympathise with Osama Bin Laden or not? And indeed, do they identify with him so profoundly that even overhearing a casual and indirect expression of opposition to him would cause them unacceptable offence? The authorities can answer neither yes nor no. If yes, they would be disparaging an 'ethnic' group – which is bigotry. If no, then their own assumption that the visitors, purely because they are Muslims, might be offended by an insult to a mass-murderer, would itself be a stunning piece of bigotry. And either way, their behaviour towards officer Rose would be revealed as the outrageous injustice that it is.

This combination of doublethink and appeasement is shocking because it is not an aberration. It is a major factor in present-day Western political opinion. And it is dangerous. It concedes the enemy's fundamental ideological premise: that the war is caused by the West's lack of appeasement of anti-Western violence from the Arab world and other Islamic societies. So long as that remains so, we cannot win the war. The danger is not that we might lose it. It is that the longer the war takes, the greater is the chance that weapons of mass destruction will be successfully used against us. As soon as they are, the world will become a nasty place for a while.

The authorities should reinstate officer Rose. Sack those who sacked him. Locate the Muslims concerned and apologise to them, and to the Muslim community in Britain, for having tarred them with the Bin Laden brush.

Muslim organisations should demand that all of the above be done.

The government should make a declaration that expressions of opposition to the enemy in the current war will never again be grounds for disciplinary proceedings against civil servants.

The rest of us should be frightened and angry if any of that fails to happen.

Wed, 12/03/2003 - 20:27 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Not Appeasement, Just Insane "Political Correctness"

I have to disagree on this one. If this had happened at the UN or at a diplomatic meeting, then perhaps foreign policy would have been a consideration. I don't think it was here. I think this was just a case of insanely stupid political correctness.

I think you're right to suppose that they might have assumed "that the visitors, purely because they are Muslims, might be offended by an insult to a mass-murderer", but I don't think this is pure bigotry because the authorities are merely projecting their own ridiculous sorts of reactions.

In America, we have recently had this incident, in which someone got into big trouble for using the word "Niggers" in an anti-racist context. It's gotten to the point where some people are simply unable to hear certain words or expressions without taking offense, regardless of context.

Your points are good ones, but I think applying this incident as an example of the problems is a bit of a reach.

Gil

by Gil on Thu, 12/04/2003 - 17:39 | reply

Re: Not Appeasement, Just Insane "Political Correctness"

Gil said

It's gotten to the point where some people are simply unable to hear certain words or expressions without taking offense, regardless of context

It got to that point quite some time ago: 'Stoning' sketch from The Life of Brian.

by Editor on Thu, 12/04/2003 - 22:25 | reply

Python Reference

Yes. I think David Bernstein beat you to that reference.

Who's Gill?

Gil

by Gil on Fri, 12/05/2003 - 00:13 | reply

Re: Gill

Whoops. Corrected noww.

by Editor on Fri, 12/05/2003 - 06:52 | reply

the above

Sheer insanity! These people really don't want discussion anymore do they. The prof and spokesperson should be sacked. Why the hell should a person making what in my young day would have been considered a very "right on!!!" anti-racist statement be sent for racial awareness therapy. Have these clowns ever heard of Stalinism? or maybe they still sneakingly believe it was a good idea.

Words have to be understood in context. It's no good getting a fit of the vapours just over the existence of them. Besides, why is it when I watch a Spike Lee film I hear the word nigger about every fifteen seconds, but being spoken by black people. This, apparently, is inoffensive because (let me do your homework for you you leftie clowns) it's post imperial slavery, neo-irony and a mark of black brotherhood and solidarity right? Well kiss my arse. I'm talking goose and ganders. What should be wrong for one should be wrong for all. What these PC assholes are saying is White always wrong, Black always right. It's way more complicated than that.

by a reader on Sun, 12/07/2003 - 17:04 | reply

Another Ungentlemanly Act

Decades pass and tempers cool. Argentina and Britain now have excellent relations. Argentina has long since apologised for starting the Falklands War in 1982 ... you'd think. But no, there has never been an apology. Nor will there be one in the foreseeable future. For the shameful reason that very few Argentinians think that any wrong was done to the Falkland Islanders or to the British people.

Culturally and politically British, the Falkland Islands in the South Atlantic Ocean had long been claimed by the Argentinians for reasons of third-world machismo and spite. On April 2, 1982, their bloody dictator, General Galtieri, needing a device to bolster his flagging popularity, did what dictators love to do: he ordered his people to commit the crimes that they yearned to commit, so that by abasing themselves, they would be at one with him. The Argentinian armed forces captured the Falkland Islands.

Initiating an aggressive war: that is a war crime. Attempting to enslave a free people: that is a crime against humanity. Causing the deaths of 255 British soldiers and three Islanders; maiming others; costing billions; wrecking a peaceful and unique way of life which has not recovered to this day: all those are foul crimes too.

But the Argentinian people do not think so. They do not get it. This moral failing in them caused the war in 1982, and it has not gone away. That they are not invading again at this moment is a matter of expediency to them, not morality.

On the contrary, President Kirchner of Argentina is now demanding that Britain apologise and seek the forgiveness of the Argentinian people. What for? For being invaded? Not quite, but almost. You see, it emerged on Friday that in the frantic rush to prepare the British fleet that would liberate the Islands, corners were cut. Some of the ships were pulled away from their Cold War duties of facing down the Soviet fleet, where they had been deployed with nuclear weapons. To un-install these weapons would take 36 hours, and so it was decided that this should be done while the ships were already under way. The weapons were duly transferred in mid-ocean to other British ships heading back to Britain.

In other words, on their way to a hellish battle in which hundreds of them would die, the British voluntarily disarmed themselves in order to spare enemy lives and safeguard the environment. But by doing this in a way that did not also impair the Navy's remaining effectiveness, they were committing some vague violation of political correctness. That is the transgression which, by the standards of the Argentinian people, warrants apology and forgiveness. Tyranny, aggression and the taking of innocent lives do not. But nuclear equals bad, and therefore the Argentinians were in the right after all. On the basis of that pathetic excuse for a grievance and a justification, and twenty one years later, they are still managing to whine loudly enough to drown out any trace of moral thought.

P.S. Our title echoes that of the movie An Ungentlemanly Act which portrays the outrageousness of the invasion with superb understatement, humour and attention to detail.

Sun, 12/07/2003 - 19:15 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Malvinas, Victorious Falkland War & Hong Kong

Sir,

I somehow feel I should remind you of Hong Kong and the, ahem, thoughtful stance the United Kingdom took against Red China at roughly the same time, back in the late seventies and early eighties.

Of course machismo is an exclusively south american attitude, just as only ungentlemanly dictators would ever follow the notion to wage a splendid little war as a device to turn the public's attention away from, let's say, not so desirable developments.

Whether the sinking of the Belgrano was up to the very highest standard in sportsmanship would only be questioned by an Argentinian or a spoilsport – I'm not the one and do not wish to be the other.

Still, it's an ill wind that blows nobody good, and Argentine got rid of some unsavoury rulers as a result.

Respectfully

Tjalf Boris Pröβdorf

by Tjalf Boris Pröβdorf on Mon, 11/07/2005 - 21:24 | reply

Re: Malvinas, Victorious Falkland War & Hong Kong

Thank you for the comment. Consider us duly reminded of Hong Kong, but we are not sure what your point is. If it is that the British should have held out for a better deal in the handover negotiations, that is certainly arguable. If it is that the British should fight a war to liberate Hong Kong, that is not. There are many positions in between, but whichever of them you were advocating, the relevance to our criticism of the Argentineans, which is the subject of this post, escapes us. Could you elaborate?

by Editor on Tue, 11/08/2005 - 01:14 | reply

Belgrano

1982: British sub sinks Argentine cruiser

Argentina's only cruiser, the General Belgrano, has been sunk by a British nuclear submarine in the South Atlantic.

It is the first serious attack on the Argentine navy by the British since the conflict over the disputed Falkland Islands began last month.

link

I don't understand. They sunk a ship after a war started. What's the criticism?

Not only that, they had a nuclear submarine in the area, but refrained from using nukes. Perhaps machismo isn't so strong in Britain?

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 11/08/2005 - 18:41 | reply

British Amnesia

My friend you are right and wrong.

Yes, the Falklands War in 1982 was a sad thing but if you expect an apology you are wrong. Britain should be giving apologies first.

British opinion leaders have again begun to romanticize the "achievements" of their colonial empire and ignore the bloody crimes and violent history of the building and dismantling of the British Empire.

The British national school curriculum has more or less struck the empire and its crimes out of history. The standard modern world history textbook for 16-year-olds has chapter after chapter on the world wars, the cold war, British and US life, Stalin's terror and the monstrosities of Nazism - but scarcely a word on the British and other European empires which carved up most of the world, or the horrors they perpetrated.

You could perfectly write this:

An Ungentlemanly Act

Decades pass and tempers cool. Britain now have excellent relations with the world. Britain has long since apologised for the crimes committed under their empire... you'd think. But no, there has never been an apology. Nor will there be one in the foreseeable future. For the shameful reason that very few British think that any wrong was done to millions of people.

<http://www.globalpolicy.org/empire/history/2003/0816casual.htm>
<http://www.globalpolicy.org/empire/history/2004/07hyperpower.pdf>

by Alexander d'Agui  on Fri, 04/21/2006 - 07:57 | reply

Re: British Amnesia

The real state of public opinion in Britain is very different from that described in the above comment.

First of all, it is not the case that the British Empire has been "struck out" of history courses in British schools. Here is a typical textbook for 14-year-olds studying National Curriculum History (there is no "standard textbook" as such, because the British National Curriculum does not prescribe textbooks or force particular topics on schools). It is called The Impact of Empire: Colonialism 1500-2000. Nor does it omit the crimes and horrors perpetrated in the name of the Empire. On the contrary, it acknowledges them and emphasises them. Note the chapter headings: there is an entire chapter on slavery and the slave trade in the British Empire, and also an entire chapter on morally judging the Empire, entitled The Good, the Bad and the Ugly.

Far from "romanticising" the British Empire, British opinion is overwhelmingly opposed to it, to such an extent that the very terms 'imperialism', 'empire' and 'colonialism' are now used exclusively as terms of abuse, by virtually all shades of British political opinion. The idea that "very few British think that any wrong was done to millions of people" is pure fantasy. The opposite is the case.

As for apologies from British governments, the main reason Tony Blair, for example, has not apologised much for actions of the British Empire is that he considers himself an implacable enemy of the entire moral and political rationale under which it was established and run – which is in any case no longer approved of by any mainstream political faction in Britain. Despite this, there have in fact been official apologies. For example, Blair apologised to the Irish people for Britain's role in the Potato Famine. The Amritsar Massacre of 1919 in Imperial India was strongly condemned even at the time by the House of Commons, in defiance of much public opinion which then, unlike now, contained a significant element of approval of the massacre.

The changes undergone by the British people both during and since the days of Empire stand, unfortunately, in marked contrast with the unchanged attitude of the Argentinean government and people that we criticised above. While there is no trace of imperial ambition left in British politics, and while Britons show remarkably little inclination to justify even the favourable aspects of their former Empire, let alone its crimes, Argentinean attitudes towards the Falklands war consist of very little other than the same morally bankrupt irredentism that caused them to invade in 1982.

The unjustified Argentine demand for an apology – made by present-day politicians on behalf of a present-day population – is not excused by spuriously linking it to British crimes of earlier generations. To call the Falklands war a “sad thing” in this context while eschewing even a single word of disapproval of the Argentinean invasion is an evasion and a moral equivocation of the very type that our post was about. The war as a whole was indeed a sad thing, but the Argentinean invasion in particular was also an immoral thing, a vicious crime against a peaceful people who had done no wrong to Argentina or any other nation. This would merit an apology but cries out much more for the sincere change of heart that would make an apology unnecessary.

by Editor on Sat, 04/22/2006 - 11:33 | reply

It's always a dilemma

I read the whole thing and I found it quite interesting even though I do not agree with some of the things you say. In any case, I would like to remark the fact that you didn't use any low resorts like making fun of us Argentinians just to make your point. Personally, I appreciate that and it shows how mature you are.

Now, about the subject: All I can say is that sometimes, a war is started because someone who has a lot of power and feels like doing it just to feel even more powerful and show the world what they can do. Personally, I think it would be very unfair to be labeled as "machista" or something like that just because I'm Argentinian. The same way many Argentinian people don't deserve to be labeled like that. Truth is that Galtieri was a sick twisted man and we all despise him nowadays, the same way he was despised back in the 80s. However, there was nothing people could do about it. You said it yourself, he was a DICTATOR, just like Videla back in the 70s. A man who comitted a crime not only against Englad, but also against Argentina and humanity itself for that matter. The Argentinian soldiers were FORCED to do what they did. Nobody over here wanted to start a war against England, except maybe for those conservative old farts who thought it was a smart idea. Not only because a war can't solve anything, but also, because the Argentinian army is way weaker as well.

Nowadays, you see documentaries and movies based upon what happened back then, and many of the Argentinian former-combatants appear crying or giving testimonies about how painful it was to say good bye to their families just because an ignorant savage like Galtieri decided it was time to fight against England. Some of them even killed themselves after the war was over. The point is: I can see why English people would despise us after what happened, but this shouldn't be a massive hatred because we also feel the pain nowadays and we were also victims. This shouldn't be "Argentina against England", it should be "Argentina and England against Galtieri and his dark warriors"

Regarding President Nestor "Penguin Face" Kirchner, you should know that even though he won fair and square, that doesn't mean he represents all of us. Personally, I think he's a lame excuse for a human being who pretends to be a lefty just to earn more votes from ignorant unwashed masses. It probably sounds cruel, but that's the truth.

Is England the one to blame? is Argentina?...I don't know that, I wasn't even in this world back then. I was born in 1985, but I DO know one thing. People always lie and it's imposible to believe something specific. You can always investigate and come up with your own conclusions. For example, I was raised to believe that English people are the ones to blame 100%, the ones with all the responsibility. Nowadays, being 20 years old, I realize that it is always better to read and investigate instead of giving a fictitious verdict.

by Francisco on Sun, 07/16/2006 - 02:34 | reply

take the piss

Mr Dilemma

The only dilemma I saw back in 1982, was when our Royal marines where made to put their face's in the floor so you lot could kick right off and invade our island. I, FOR ONE TOOK THAT VERY PERSONAL.

by a reader on Fri, 10/06/2006 - 21:07 | reply

Don't agree with neither of you

The Malvinas war was a stupid diversionary tactic used by a megalomaniac dictator in a desperate attempt to try to retain his power. People who worked in the government at that time knew it was doomed from the very begging, and I don't believe it was ever intended to succeed.

Moreover, I don't think you can find a single argentine nowadays who thinks it was a good idea, even though at that time, many idiotic people cheered the ruler's decision and waved flags from their cars when it was announced. They seemed to believe it was a 'patriotic' thing to do (which was a much more significant feeling at that time than nowadays). It had nothing to do with the Argentine people's machismo but with the realisation of an old nationalistic feeling that we all have, that those small ilands belong to us due to numerous reasons, amongst which I could highlight:

- the geological and geographical proximity
- the principle of international law of uti possidetis juris, which states that newly formed states should have the same borders that they had before their independence.
- the fact that YOU got them by INVADING them just 150 years before the war.

True, our soldiers -mostly unwillingly except, as Francisco well says, some 'fachos'- fought yours and managed to get 300 brits and 700 argentines killed, plus one of our best ships sunk (which is not much to say, as we were anyway SO not prepared to put a real fight...!). But truth is the whole thing backfired on us, don't you see? There was no gain, no vindictive pleasure... We just screwed ourselves harder...as we always do!

You miss the point when you quote that joke of a president we have -because that's what he is, a bad joke, a populist clown. Its not to him that the UK should apologize. Maybe its not even the UK, but Galtieri's collaborators who should really be apologizing. In truth, I think that what we feel is that we were used to do a wacko's bidding. We need someone to apologize for all the suffering all those argentine soldiers endured FOR NOTHING but to worsen our relations with a country we formerly revered (and which is great, and I profoundly love!).

I guess our justification is that: partly, that we feel them as rightfully ours, but also, that your whole attitude towards the sovereignty of the islands has been very disrespectful all along.

That's my opinion.

by Belén on Sat, 02/17/2007 - 05:12 | reply

I just returned from an unwel

I just returned from an unwelcome business trip to Argentina, and was quite surprised to find that Argentines still seemed to be quite obsessed with a far away group of islands that seem to possess only sheep and English people.

I guess it all boils down to this, as the previous respindant stated: "I guess our justification is that: partly, that we feel them as rightfully ours, but also, that your whole attitude towards the sovereignty of the islands has been very disrespectful all along."

It seems that, due to the divine grace which falls upon Argentina and Argentines alone, that whatever they desire is theirs by right, and that disagreeing with them (on any subject, I suppose)is "disrespectful" enough to warrant them sailing over and putting a boot on your neck. Fortunately, the body politic to which that boot is attached is rather weak, so they have a tough time making it stick.

BTW, the principle of uti possidetis juris is not one the aforementioned Argentine should want to invoke, as it states that "territory and other property remains with its possessor at the end of a conflict, unless provided for by treaty" meaning that, according to the principle he invokes, Britain's claim to sovreignty over the islands is (if it wasn't sound before) now beyond doubt as it booted the Argentines off the islands rather unceremoniously.

I don't know where this Argentine attitude comes from. I have only been there once, but I did find the populace to be rude, arrogant, and rather mad at the rest of the world. Perhaps that is because of their great fall from the beginning of the 20th century. At one time their standard of living surpassed Sweden. What Argentines ought to ask themselves is not why Britain won't give them a few rocks in the sea, but what fault lies within themselves that has brought them to their present miserable condition.

always easier to blame someone else though, isn't it? And it's always pleasant for a weak person to beat up on an even weaker one. It can be an unpleasant surprise, however, when the victim you think is weaker turns out to have claws.

by a reader on Tue, 07/03/2007 - 20:04 | reply

Persona Non Grata

Some people are not welcome at the Iraqi reconstruction table.

The US Department of Defense issued a list of 63 countries whose companies would be welcome to bid for reconstruction contracts. But everyone knows that this was just a diplomatic way of issuing a list of countries that would not be welcome.

Here is that list:

France
Germany
Russia
China
Israel

Is there a common thread running through this list? Andrew Sullivan and Steven Den Beste both give an excellent explanation, and justification, but it covers only about – hmm – we estimate 80% of those cases. Scrappleface humorously suggests that in the interests of friendship, some exceptions should be made to the ban, where a particular country is in a position to make a specialised contribution that cannot reasonably be obtained elsewhere:

"For example, we have a pressing need for more of those terrific human shields. There were a lot of them around before the war, but we can't find them now. While we're figuring out where Saddam hid them, we would welcome some French, German or Russian human shields."

So some are asked to provide human shields while others provide human sacrifices.

All to further the greater purpose of the War on Terrorism.

We do not oppose this policy, by the way. But the depth of the irony of it is just another sign of how bad we have let things get.

Thu, 12/11/2003 - 17:00 | digg | del.icio.us | permlink

The price of sanity

I guess that's the price you have to pay if you are being consistently rational and sane in this mad and moronic world. It arouses hate and hate is bad for safe business.

-AIS

by a reader on Fri, 12/12/2003 - 06:54 | reply

rescind

Canada has been removed from the Coalescence of the Unwilling in recognition of making an effort in the rebuilding. I won't hold my breath, but Israel may be as well for training troops for urban operations.

John Anderson

by a reader on Fri, 12/12/2003 - 23:24 | reply

Canada?

What, did something change overnight?

by Kevin on Sat, 12/13/2003 - 02:37 | reply

Oh, all right then...

For the non-Canadians out there, what did change overnight was our government; the pettily anti-American Jean Chretien has finally retired, and his replacement Paul Martin has promised to repair relations with the US.

by a reader on Sat, 12/13/2003 - 19:23 | reply

Silliness

This is silly. Right to bid on international contracts has nothing to do with what silly leader has spoken or what silly political slight has been committed. It has everything to do with rules of international trade and industrial competence to deliver high quality goods or services in a timely, capable manner for the best price.

Otherwise? Playground politics.

German companies for example, what if anything do they have to do with a payback for not sending troops. German companies just happen to have a corporate headquarters on German soil. This rampant display of silliness raises all the questions of trade and internationality. That BMW plant with all american workers in the southern U.S., for example, sounds awfully German to me. Better not let them drive those German looking cars off the lot on to roads paid for by U.S. tax dollars, might look like a political statement about Germans, uber-capitalism, and Iraq. Worse, now they even have infiltrated the U.S. capital, BMW's in Washington D.C.!

As for the Canadians, no more hockey on U.S. ice. And so on.

If you ask what this has to do with rebuilding Iraq, my answer is absolutely nothing. That is, nothing that makes any more sense than the US Department of Defense having silly payback rules about playing in some foreign sandbox.

I won't play with Canadians, Germans, French, Israelis, Russians, or Chinese any more, until they make up with me and say they're sorry. So There.

by a reader on Sun, 12/14/2003 - 20:47 | reply

ageism

stop equating countries acting badly with children, you fucking ageist

- Elliot

by a reader on Sun, 12/14/2003 - 23:13 | reply

Playground politics and the middle east sandbox

Everything I learned for good and bad about politics and diplomacy is found on the local playground and in the nearby sandbox. You may be getting the point all wrong, so watch your mouth, its always connected directly to your brain. Since you bring up children, in my opinion a child would not still be playing such silly one-up games. Only bully politicians do and some seem to think their bully playground is the world. They seem to get stupider with age. I am talking about chronological adults here. Most children would surely do much better with diplomacy, and for that matter politics, and if that's my ageist attitude, so be it.

Unfortunately only adults well above the age of consent get to play global political sandbox payback. First of all it is not their sandbox. Furthermore, unlike these playground bullies who play at middle east sandbox games, most individuals, French, Germans, Canadians and Americans, do not equate a few stupid feuding politicians with their host countries, or see it as a right to slight capable companies and to ignore the rules of international trade.

by a reader on Mon, 12/15/2003 - 03:49 | reply

Rules of international trade – and other puzzles

Which rule of international trade is being violated by this policy?

Why is "slighting capable companies" not a human right?

And if a child would not be playing such silly one-up games, whom did you observe doing so in your local playground and the nearby sandbox? Was it Saddam?

by David Deutsch on Mon, 12/15/2003 - 07:43 | reply

David said: Which rule of ...

David said:

Which rule of international trade is being violated by this policy?

I'm far from being an expert on international trade in goods and services, but my understanding was that while it's acceptable under the WTO treaties to discriminate on the basis of quality it's not acceptable to discriminate on the basis of country of origin. This is certainly suggested by

The national-treatment provision contains the obligation to treat foreign service suppliers and domestic service suppliers in the same manner. However, it does provide the possibility of different treatment being accorded the service providers of other parties to that accorded to domestic service providers. However, in such cases the conditions of competition should not, as a result, be modified in favour of the domestic service providers.

from A Summary of the Final Act of the Uruguay Round

- Rich

by Rich on Mon, 12/15/2003 - 11:12 | reply

Re: Which rule of international trade...?

These contracts – or at least, the bulk of them – are not covered by those treaties, according to the EU trade commissioner.

by David Deutsch on Mon, 12/15/2003 - 16:19 | reply

Customers Have a Right to Choose

It seems to me that customers (in this case the U.S. taxpayers via their representatives) have every right to discriminate among service suppliers. Usually, this means that it costs them in terms of price and/or quality; but they might value other things more than these costs. In this case, the U.S. wants to make it clear that supporting its national security interests has benefits, and obstructing them has costs. Some of these costs will be in terms of pressure from companies losing out, lost tax revenues, and national pride.

Is it unfair to qualified companies that happen to be based in disfavored countries? No. It's unequal, but not unfair. They have no natural right to these contracts. It's up to the customer to choose both the recipients of the contracts, and the criteria.

Gil

by Gil on Mon, 12/15/2003 - 17:59 | reply

Well said Gil, disfavored countries

Fact is Canada and Germany and Israel, to name a few apparently are disfavored countries. Makes one wonder if they are a threat to U.S. national security.

by a reader on Mon, 12/15/2003 - 20:03 | reply

israel not in us disfavour

Israel isn't disfavored, and would have helped us fight, but it was better for both of us that they didn't. we didn't need the Arab world bitching about how the j00000s invaded Iraq.

my best guess at why they don't get contracts is the US is too pansy (ahem) to explain that we do like Israel, and don't like France, and instead wants to say the contracts thing wasn't based on a moral judgment, but rather a mechanical criterion about sending troops to help.

it's also possible the US has good reasons politically not to explain that right now, and knows screwing Israel on contracts isn't the end of the world. but if it was something sufficiently important we would not screw israel.

- Elliot

by a reader on Mon, 12/15/2003 - 20:23 | reply

Israel

Obviously, I wasn't including Israel in my reference to disfavored countries.

I think the main reason for excluding Israel was to avoid offending regional arabs. I think it's a mistake; but nobody ever accused me of being diplomatic, either.

Gil

by Gil on Tue, 12/16/2003 - 00:38 | reply

Also,

The question was raised by a reader what penalizing companies with headquarters on German (etc) soil could properly have to do with payback for not sending troops. It doesn't make sense to him so he calls it silly and "playground politics".

I'll let Elliott deal with the age-ism, I'd like to point out why it makes perfect sense to penalize companies with headquarters in country X for actions of country X we dislike. The reason is that if that company feels sufficient economic harm from the decision, they may be inclined to place pressure on the government which shelters them to change their (the government's) behavior in the future. Or, failing that (and this can be the implicit threat), the company may move their headquarters, or jobs, or whatever, depriving the government of its tax revenues or of its political capital (because people who have lost jobs may become irate at the government).

If we make it less affordable for companies to set themselves up in countries which seriously piss us off, they will communicate this to the governments of those countries one way or another, and that will have an effect on the governments of those countries, one way or another.

The children on the playground have it essentially correct.

Blixa
blixa.blogspot.com

by a reader on Wed, 12/17/2003 - 16:23 | reply

Religion Re-Established

In the bad old days, we were oppressed by religion: if you said or did anything that was offensive to whatever religion was established in your country, you were in trouble. And of course they got to decide what was offensive.

But at least it was only one religion. Today it's all of them.

Mon, 12/15/2003 - 15:54 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Hmm

Well yes, but it's not exactly the same scale of trouble as having your head chopped off, or whatever. And it's not the same scale of having to agree- we don't have to spend one day a week each attending mosque, church, chapel, temple and synagogue and dancing round a totem pole in the nude, or get arrested.

And there are strategies for dealing with and avoiding the kind of situation where one might offend others, such as not working in the public sector (ahem) and learning target ideas-marketing. Also it's quite possible to find ways of strongly criticising religions without getting in trouble at all, just like it's possible to find ways to smoke marijuana without getting prosecuted.

(Or maybe I just missed the joke?)

Alice

by a reader on Mon, 12/15/2003 - 22:11 | reply

nah

That's not true. People offend Jews all the time without getting in trouble.

It's more like: the official religion is now The Religion Of Tolerance. unless you're a white male, or a jew.

- Elliot

by a reader on Mon, 12/15/2003 - 22:40 | reply

Copyright © 2007 Setting The World To Rights

Dishonest Reporting Awards

HonestReporting.com, which monitors anti-Israel bias in the media, has just made its annual awards in "recognition of the most skewed and biased coverage of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict".

The winner was Reuters. Examples of its relentless bias included

- Omitting all mention of Palestinian attacks on Israeli civilians from its list of "Worst Guerilla Attacks since September 11";
- Describing suicide bombers as being among Palestinians "killed by Israeli forces";
- Repeatedly attributing to Hamas the motive of seeking "a state in Gaza and the West Bank" even though the whole point of Hamas is to reject that option and seek the destruction of Israel.

Last year's winner, the BBC, has to content itself with a mere Disonorable Mention, along with tragically many other news organisations. Read it all.

Keep up the good work, HonestReporting. Shame on you, Reuters and the others.

Tue, 12/16/2003 - 20:26 | digg | del.icio.us | permlink

Thinking About Thinking About Thinking

Can animals think? Can they think about thinking? Yes, say scientists.

Here's what actually happened though. Someone had the brilliant idea of adding an additional button to those classic experiments where you train an animal to press buttons in response to stimuli.

In the classic experiment, you call the stimuli "questions", you call the button-pushing behaviour "answers", add a little anthropomorphism, and bingo, the Nobel Prize for Discovering that Animals Can Think is within your grasp. Or at least, a credulous newspaper article to that effect – and, perhaps, more funding for more of the same silliness.

In the new experiment, the extra button doesn't actually do anything. And so sometimes, when the animals' training has not been good enough to get them to pick the right button, they choose randomly and sometimes hit the new button. Even better, if you punish them for pressing the wrong button, but never punish them for picking the new button, then they will pick it whenever a conditioned reflex for one of the other buttons does not kick in first.

OK, so far, so obvious. But here's the master-stroke: as usual, it lies not in the substance of the experiment but in the naming of the outcomes. You call the new button the "Don't-Know" Button.

Actually, you could call it the "I'm sorry, ladies and gentlemen, but I'm afraid I can't work out the answer to your interesting question right now. Leave it with me and ask me again in a few days and perhaps by then I may have understood better what you are getting at" button. But, whatever. The point is, as always, once you have given your new button a human interpretation at the start of the experiment, your jackpot conclusion at the end – that the animal is essentially human – is pretty much guaranteed.

That is what a team from the aptly named 'University of Buffalo' did. And that's how the Science Editor of The Guardian breathlessly came to splash the headline: Animals 'can think about thought':

It means that animals, like humans, may be capable not just of thinking, but of thinking about thinking, of knowing that they don't know. Psychologists call this

"metacognition", evidence of sophisticated cognitive self-awareness.

No, it doesn't mean anything of the sort. It just means that humans displayed their usual ingenuity in naming the new button. But it does demonstrate yet again that when it comes to thinking about thinking, some humans chronically fail to use their inborn potential.

We think electric shocks might be the answer.

Update: We decided to do this experiment ourselves, and have discovered that our computer has evidence of sophisticated cognitive self-awareness too. We launched the program Mathematica and without further ado typed the following question:

Do you understand this?

The immediate reply was:

Syntax::"tsntxi": "this ?" is incomplete; more input is needed.

Do you understand this?

(Emphasis in original!) We are expecting our phone call from Stockholm any time now. Our only worry now is, is it morally justifiable to switch the thing off?

Wed, 12/17/2003 - 17:36 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

:-)

owned!

- Elliot

by a reader on Wed, 12/17/2003 - 23:34 | reply

spot on

Nice post, beautifully cutting. I almost reflexively dodged the flying spit several times.

One day, my friends, there will be a glorious revolution and all those stupid f-ing pigeons will finally get shot and we will be able to feed the (aesthetically more pleasing) ducks in peace.

Alice

by a reader on Thu, 12/18/2003 - 00:42 | reply

down with ducks

ewwww, no, i hate ducks. they are forever tainted by their involvement with induction.

- Elliot

by a reader on Thu, 12/18/2003 - 04:01 | reply

Bold Conjectures

Some animals do think especially when they are doing something useful according to their own minds, and especially when that something is for their own animal benefit rather than for the benefit of humans. However animals lack the language skills to tell us so and write rather poorly too. But animal literacy is largely irrelevant to animals, ho hum. Why should they even care to tell us what they think? Their grammar is rudimentary but not so different from ours if only they could speak and also wanted to debate these bold conjectures. Trouble is a flaw in the design, the animals would scoff in barks and scratches and knowing sniffs and fur fluffing. If the human experiment only consists of three buttons, humans, like us animals, do look kinda stupid and reflexive. The three button scientists continue to scratch their heads and say, "Don't know. Looks like there is something going on in there. Let's do three hundred random trials and test the null hypothesis." Can you imagine an animal even thinking like that? And what would you do with grant money if you only had paws?

by a reader on Thu, 12/18/2003 - 04:24 | reply

"bold conjectures" -- huh?

A reader who says animals think but who's only argument is that animals are bad at communicating and unambitious, asked:

And what would you do with grant money if you only had paws?

i suppose i'd buy bark-recognition software and a computer and DSL and a (dog) house and maybe a maid (dogs aren't free to roam the streets alone, after all).

alternative answer: If you can't think of anything, I'm not surprised you "think" animals are as smart as you ;-p

by a reader on Thu, 12/18/2003 - 06:22 | reply

Seriously

I thought that was funny :) The research in question got $8000 in grant money to say "Don't know, but maybe". Now that would buy alot of dog food with a three button dispenser to boot! Dog laughing all the way to the bank. Oops but the subjects were monkeys and dolphins, both of which are pretty useless to human beings.

by a reader on Thu, 12/18/2003 - 15:10 | reply

Anthromorphism

To set the record straight, anyone who thinks that animals think like humans do and then think about their thinking about it is stretching the point to absurdity. Anthropomorphism is seeing animals from a human point of view and attributing human characteristics to them, mostly a pointless, wrongheaded, and almost frivolous pursuit. If animals could think about this thinking about thinking they would laugh heartily at the absurdity of us looking at them as being somewhat like humans in a don't know response. Well, duh!

However, it is also good to know that brain structures in some animals are not all that different from brain structures in ourselves. Only we as humans have advanced to the point of knowledge acquisition, knowledge growth and knowledge sharing to know that. What is really interesting is why humans have progressed so far, so quickly in consciousness, far beyond any other earthly known capacity to think about thinking among many other cognitive things, and much more than just in our own heads, unshared; and what's more, how human tools and devices (like symbolic thinking, progressive reason, language, writing, invention, productive debate, libraries as public resources open to all, scientific research, shared ideas, bold conjecture, creative wondering shared) and the like have made great leaps in our individual capabilities, each one, to advance not only human knowledge but the furthering of capacities of fruitful idea generation now available to billions of our kind; especially through access to our man made creative tools available to present and future generations to enhance our abilities to think about thinking. Why waste time on anthropomorphism, when we have all this, and us?

by a reader on Thu, 12/18/2003 - 17:53 | reply

Animal Rights

What has been claimed in this article about animals being able to think about thinking etc. is really absurd.

How ever, I do wonder if some highly evolved mamals do have a rudimentary consciousness or even self-consciousness? if so, if they are evolved enough to feel pain and suffering as some kind of conscious beings? And if so wouldn't it entitle them to some basic rights?

by a reader on Fri, 12/19/2003 - 01:57 | reply

got an argument?

conjecturing mebbe some animals are human or partly human, fun as it is, gets a tad dull when not backed up with powerful arguments.

- Elliot

by a reader on Fri, 12/19/2003 - 08:31 | reply

Elliot said: conjecturing ...

Elliot said:

conjecturing mebbe some animals are human or partly human, fun as it is, gets a tad dull when not backed up with powerful arguments.

Would you care to argue that there are no animals that are human? In which case, what are humans? Plants? Fungi? :)

- Rich, who thinks there are many powerful arguments from evolutionary biology that at least some animals are human.

by Rich on Fri, 12/19/2003 - 09:53 | reply

A chimp thinks what?

Rich, who thinks there are many powerful arguments from evolutionary biology that at least some animals are human.

What arguments?

by Alan Forrester on Fri, 12/19/2003 - 13:39 | reply

Probably more than I do without coffee

Alan said:

What arguments?

The evidence from shared morphology that humans and other animals can be fitted into nested sets of clades with common ancestors. The evidence from genes shared by humans and other animals that similarly strongly suggests the existence of common ancestors. The evidence from the fossil record that shows convergence between human and other lineages as we look further and further back in time.

If this doesn't convince you that humans are a subset of animals (and hence logically that some animals are humans) then I don't know what will.

- Rich

by Rich on Fri, 12/19/2003 - 14:56 | reply

This is Getting Silly

Rich,

Obviously, Elliot and Alan were using "human" to mean having human-like mental abilities; not the species. And they were using "animals" to mean non-human animals; which is not an uncommon usage.

And, although "some" can indeed mean one, I think it's misleading to use "some animals" when you're talking about one (species of) animal.

So, are you supporting the position that there are non-human animals that can "think about thinking", or are you playing a semantics game?

Either is ok with me, but I'd like to know.

Gil

by Gil on Fri, 12/19/2003 - 18:22 | reply

Gil said: So, are you supp...

Gil said:

So, are you supporting the position that there are non-human animals that can "think about thinking", or are you playing a semantics game?

I thought that what I was saying was entirely clear from my very first comment in this thread when I said:

Would you care to argue that there are no animals that are human? In which case, what are humans? Plants? Fungi? :)

(Complete with emoticon!)

Although, having said that, I recall reading once about a chimpanzee getting upset with a human when said human was playing quite a subtle trick on another chimpanzee. I don't remember the details though nor do I have a reference so I'm not going to get involved in that argument.

- Rich

by Rich on Fri, 12/19/2003 - 20:23 | reply

i remember a study too

it was about silly people who mutter things under their breath while leaving that they don't want to subject to criticism. it said they are at highly increased risk of cancer or heart attack. i don't remember the source though, so don't criticise me.

by a reader on Sat, 12/20/2003 - 02:00 | reply

Chimps in mirrors

Just thought I'd mention: Scientists did an experiment with Chimps and mirrors and concluded that Chimps are "self-aware". They would experiment making facial gestures and moving their bodies and stuff to see if the "mirror self" would do it also. They're self aware! They're taking over!

Also, the scientific community has expressed interest in awarding Chimps "homo" status, which would make them human.

by a reader on Sat, 12/20/2003 - 07:05 | reply

Somebody anonymous said: i...

Somebody anonymous said: it was about silly people who mutter things under their breath while leaving that they don't want to subject to criticism. Oh, give me a break. I never said that I didn't want people to subject it to criticism. To do so would be pathetically easy, seeing as it's a barely remembered anecdote. I said that I didn't want to take part in the argument (which would require doing quite a lot of research to present a proper case, and I'm afraid I just don't have the time right now). I only added the comment because I thought it was vaguely interesting, that there might be other people here who knew more about that sort of thing and who might make their own interesting comments, and because, if nothing else, it might get people thinking about possible experiments that could further investigate meta-cognition (or it's absence) in other animals.

If you'd like to criticise it, go right ahead.

- Rich, who must admit he strongly discounts the contents of anonymous postings.

by Rich on Sat, 12/20/2003 - 09:56 | reply

oops, didn't mean to be anonymous that was me

- Elliot
<http://www.curi.us/>

by a reader on Sat, 12/20/2003 - 10:19 | reply

Anonymous conjecture

The world is spherical and contains matter.

by a reader on Sun, 12/21/2003 - 00:02 | reply

Is France In Serious Trouble?

Roger L Simon thinks so, for several interrelated reasons. There's also a picture of an "occupied MacDonaldis" (occupied by anti-globalisation loonies, that is),

and quite an interesting comment thread there as well.

Fri, 12/19/2003 - 08:53 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

There is still a little bit of hope for France

Well, after all this bad news about France, let's at least feel good about some good French people out there. I'm going skiing there next week (I've heard they still have some good food, even if there's no service), so I need to believe something good about France!

Henry Sturman

by Henry Sturman on Tue, 12/23/2003 - 23:58 | reply

Have you read the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire?

History repeating itself??

Of course France also has massive amounts of farmland which continues to somehow prop up the socialist French economy. So maybe it's not all doom and gloom.

by a reader on Wed, 12/24/2003 - 20:16 | reply

historicism

history doesn't repeat itself; people act on the same bad ideas.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 12/24/2003 - 23:45 | reply

Environmentalism – The Dismal Religion

Almost a year ago, the Danish Committees on Scientific Dishonesty delivered their infamous ruling that Bjørn Lomborg's book The Skeptical Environmentalist (which we highly recommend) is scientifically dishonest.

We now salute the Danish Ministry of Science, Technology and Innovation, which is responsible for those Committees, for robustly overturning that ruling:

The Ministry finds that the DCSD judgment was not backed up by documentation, and was “completely void of argumentation” for the claims of dishonesty and lack of good scientific practice. The Ministry characterises the DCSD's treatment of the case as “dissatisfactory”, “deserving criticism” and “emotional”

Is it really emotion that has dragged the highest arbiters of Danish scientific integrity down into the depths of unreason and pseudoscience? Whatever it is, they are not the only ones. Scientific American, for instance, treated Lomborg's work in an appalling unscholarly way. And as for the press – well, with a few honourable exceptions such as The Economist, which backed Lomborg from the beginning, they have largely abandoned any pretence at critical examination of conventional wisdom and have fallen comfortably into the role of buying for the punishment and destruction of a heretic. The Guardian, for instance, was unlucky enough to award Lomborg a derisive eco-gong award for disservice to the environment on the very day that the Danish ministry exonerated him.

If this is an emotion, it is a widespread, powerful, destructive and dangerous one. Where does it come from?

Michael Crichton, like many others, argues that Environmentalism is a Religion. Basically, we agree, but Crichton's take on this is inaccurate in some ways. He says:

I think that you cannot eliminate religion from the psyche of mankind. If you suppress it in one form, it merely re-emerges in another form. You can not believe in God, but you still have to believe in something that gives meaning to your life, and shapes your sense of the world. Such a belief is religious.

No, it's not some genetically imprinted Original Sin that makes people irrational. That's letting them off far too easily. And it's letting himself off too easily as well: despair is always available as a cop-out, but there's no justification for abandoning the obligation to set the world to rights. The existence of human error doesn't need any great scientific explanation, any more than it needs a religious one: what it needs is correction. Which comes from creative thought, argument, and persuasion.

Crichton also seems to make the common atheists' error that just because all religions are factually untrue, they are all worthless – and in particular, morally worthless. That is not so. They are neither worthless nor mutually equivalent. Many religions have good moral content as well as bad, while the morality of the environmental movement is fundamentally bad. Thomas Carlyle called economics "The Dismal Science"; that was unfair, but environmentalism is, precisely, the dismal religion.

Sun, 12/21/2003 - 00:38 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

v nice

v nice

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Sun, 12/21/2003 - 03:55 | reply

Leap of faith

It would seem by that definition that all "Isms" are religions. I admit that I'm often confused by the way that dogmatic terms such as Environmentalism are thrown around. Blindly as any other "Ism". I'll tell you why.

Being "for" something like the environment is somewhat like motherhood and apple pie. Being an "anti" like an anti-environmentalist is not likely to be my cup of tea either.

I weigh in on the side of environmentalism, usually, but I am far from religious about it. Being an environmentalist in terms of choices can mean almost anything from not pouring used motor oil down the city sewer to driving spikes in old growth trees. It depends. I don't drive spikes in old growth trees. Neither do I empty used motor oil into the city sewer. Call it a leap of faith that one person's attitude and ideas can make a difference. Environmental choices, for example.

But don't label me.

Thinking rationally however it is not hard for most people to be "for" the environment in specific ways, at least "for" the air you personally breath, "for" the water you drink, and "for" the land that grows the particular food that you eat. It would be foolish to be otherwise.

You would be wrong to call me religious "for" believing that much, that environment matters, generally; but that is not the only question in the equation. I am in there too. For example, between two extremes of environmental choices I would definitely choose the ones that would benefit me. One of those benefits is to see the local rivers and tributaries cleaner and full of river life. Call me a river environmentalist. Given a choice of asphalt or trees in my back yard I would choose trees. Call me a tree hugger for liking leaves.

Greenpeace on the other hand is not on my list of favored charities. PETA certainly is not. Sierra Club has nice calendars. I am not a member, yet. But don't assume I'm a pushover. If you continue to dump your McDonald's garbage out your car window I will not consider that as your attempt at composting.

I guess I'm just not a fan of "Isms" of any kind, Environmentalism, Fundamentalism, Capitalism, Racism, Liberalism, Conservatism, Catholicism, Atheism. Together, Dogmatism. My views tend toward questioning all beliefs, a healthy skeptic-ism but not at all religious. Closer to anti-religious. Chuck the dogma. And my views tend to weigh in on the side of free markets, open societies, rational discussion, individual action, and a cleaner and saner environment to live in.

But I'm still open to being convinced otherwise.

by a reader on Mon, 12/22/2003 - 04:28 | reply

isn't opposing all isms extremism?

what about critical rationalism?

are you sure you oppose both atheism and theism? doesn't one have to be true?

what's wrong with capitalism? i suppose you also oppose socialism? do you favour not having an economic policy, or what?

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 12/22/2003 - 05:55 | reply

Good question

I do not oppose all isms. However, i am not an "Ism" fan. It is all too easy to fall into the mental trap of believing one's own fave ism is the answer for all things. Skeptic-ism and critical rational-ism fortunately are not such an easy pitfall mentally as many other isms because they contain within their own process the seeds of an open mind.

I tend to oppose Socialism. I am a little less negatively inclined towards Capitalism. I favor having a range of economic policies suited to the ways of the real world that deal in real world economic practices that affect individuals and groups within real political contexts, certainly the ones that tend to grow wealth in more than purely monetary terms, especially those policy questions that are written down, thought carefully about, and are regularly debated and examined as to whether they actually work in the way their authors say.

Not all sizes fit all or are the answer for all times. Why use a wonderful hammer and a spike when you need a toolkit of specially crafted awls? Usually we need to think carefully, that is. Hence "Isms" with a capital I are crude, tho fancifully and sometimes beautifully inscribed tools, rather useless for other than straw man arguments in some hazy hallowed hall of theoretical debate. Not that I don't enjoy that too sometimes.

by a reader on Mon, 12/22/2003 - 18:45 | reply

Environmentalism should be true Religion!

I would have to disagree that Environmentalism is a Religion as of this time, however it should be the true Religion. The meaning of life is to live and sustain, and enjoy pleasure, that is it! We live in the "Kingdom of God" for we know nothing about what happens after death. The Sun is the all loving God, all- loving being the giver of life. To enjoy living, experiencing, and enjoying pleasure, we need to take environmentalism seriously. Become vegetarian is a good goal to. Living morally and ethically should be taught at a young age, and the only things we could know for sure is Mathematics, and Scientific laws. Everything is a matter of situation and scenario. Love and Peace should be waged as a war against ignorance and Hate, because the "Kingdom of Heaven" is upon us!!!

by SEEN on Tue, 11/16/2004 - 18:55 | reply

Industrial Society Destroys Mind and Environment

Industrial Society Destroys Mind and Environment

This is about the link between Mind and Social / Environmental-Issues. The fast-paced, consumerist lifestyle of Industrial Society is causing exponential rise in psychological problems besides destroying the environment. All issues are interlinked. Our Minds cannot be peaceful when attention-spans are down to nanoseconds, microseconds and milliseconds. Our Minds cannot be peaceful if we destroy Nature.

To read the complete article please follow either of these links :

Article

Article

sushil_yadav

by sushil_yadav on Sun, 08/20/2006 - 05:46 | reply

Crichton

Since Crichton's books are full of the most appalling misunderstandings about science - Jurassic Park and Sphere are especially dreadful - I would treat anything he says about environmentalism and 'religion' with great scepticism.

by Yoni on Sun, 09/10/2006 - 13:34 | reply

Atheism and theism

"are you sure you oppose both atheism and theism? doesn't one have to be true?"

No.

It depends on what you mean by 'true', and philosophers have disagreed on this since the dawn of history and still do.

I happen to be an atheist, for a variety of mostly rational and a few emotional reasons. That does not mean that I insist that atheism is 'true', because I can't disprove the existence of (a) god(s). But I do think that atheism is rational while theism is not (as well as being responsible for a great deal of human misery).

by Yoni on Sun, 09/10/2006 - 13:37 | reply

Bjorn Lomborg's opinions on the environment are ridiculous

Bjorn Lomborg's opinions on the environment are ridiculous. He's not a biologist, he's a statistician, and his book ignores serious, pressing environmental issues like invasive species, and habitat destruction.

He has a perspective that we shouldn't ignore but he has demonstrated zero knowledge about ecology and the environment.

I posted a critique here.

I'm also guessing that this retraction is political. Lomborg has enjoyed some favor since the new right wing government came to the Danes... he even has a cushy government post.

by Will on Mon, 10/16/2006 - 12:25 | reply

link to Greenpeaces opposition to war could someone explain how being against war is an example of fundamentally bad morals?

by Jay Aziza on Wed, 12/20/2006 - 20:07 | reply

Bad Morals

One is bad if one perpetually allows those who are innocent to be attacked and killed.

Those who oppose war sometimes do that.

by a reader on Thu, 12/21/2006 - 00:19 | reply

Opposing war is an example of Opposing war is an example of fundamentally bad morals because it disarms the moral in the face of the immoral.

Therefore to find a warmonger go to the nearest "peace" demonstration. To find a true peace activist go to the nearest Marine Recruiting Station and sign up. Peace through strength or suffer total war. There is no third choice, cultist.

by a reader on Sat, 01/27/2007 - 05:47 | reply

Our Conspiracy Theory

Why should only the bad, the silly and the misled have the fun of inventing stories of grand conspiracies to explain world events?

By the way, before we begin: you don't really think that Gaddafi had weapons of mass destruction, do you? Of course he didn't. The guy lives in a tent, for goodness' sake. So, what's going on? Well, just look at the timing: just before the invasion of Iraq, Gaddafi makes his first tremulous approaches to the West. Then he strings them along for a few months. And then suddenly, just after Saddam is finally given the cow treatment, he finally capitulates – or seems to. Why? Isn't it obvious? If a fellow-dictator you knew had secretly slipped you a large stash of WMD to hide from the Americans, what would you do? This was a dictator one doesn't say no to. Yet everyone knows that WMD can't be hidden without leaving smoking-gun evidence. Right? Gaddafi's in a dilemma. So he decides to make a virtue out of a necessity. He “admits” privately that he has a massive WMD programme but now wants to turn away from the Dark Side; then he waits until he's absolutely sure that Saddam isn't going to turn up one day to claim his weapons back; and then he brazenly goes public. So at a stroke, Gaddafi joins the select club of dictators who have achieved WMD status (thus making him a hero to the enemies of the West) and gets brownie points from the West itself. And all without ever having to find out what plutonium is made of, risk a single air attack, or spend a single petrodollar.

Damned clever. Maybe Gaddafi is secretly Jewish. After all, why else would he keep saying things like this, which so starkly confirm the fundamental justice of Israel's cause?

Anyway, here's our real conspiracy theory.

Did you really think that the unremitting torrent of defeatist, pro-Saddam propaganda that appeared in all the mainstream media before, during and after the liberation of Iraq was just a matter of reporters saying what they really thought? In defiance of the Government? Don't make us laugh! For those with eyes to see, the real purpose of what was thinly disguised as shallow, seditious stupidity is glaringly obvious.

First of all, consider this: Saddam was an avid consumer of TV news. And what were his favourite channels? CNN, BBC and al-Jazeera. The very channels that are controlled by the US Government, the British Government, and the Qatari government (itself a puppet of the Americans) respectively. So, Saddam watches them, and what does he see? Endless variations on the theme that (1) the Coalition can't and won't fight because the UN and the French will stop them; (2) if it tries to fight, the US and British governments will be brought down by mass action by their own populations, already mobilised and on the streets to keep Saddam in power; (3) if it does manage to invade, it will blunder into a Stalingrad-Vietnam-quagmire, then withdraw after seeing a few casualties, resulting in another glorious victory for Saddam.

He believed it.

Who benefited from that?

Need we say more?

Let this be a lesson to you, folks: don't believe anything you see or hear in the media. Trust only what you have personally made up.

Tue, 12/23/2003 - 10:15 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

they're both funny

bravo

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 12/23/2003 - 20:47 | reply

brilliant

These are brilliant theories! The fact that they cannot be disproven only serves to convince me further of their eery correctness. Make up some more! ;-)

Blixa

blixa.blogspot.com

by a reader on Tue, 12/23/2003 - 22:44 | reply

news propaganda

You write:

Let this be a lesson to you, folks: don't believe anything you see or hear in the media. Trust only what you have personally made up.

Indeed. I'm doing a project and analysing the public TV (taxpayer paid) 8 o'clock news every day the coming weeks. My article about this is to be published in a Dutch weekly magazine. I've got a problem though. After analysing only one episode, I've already found enough anti-Israel, anti-America, anti-Western, pro-leftist, pro-cultural relativist (pardon, multi-cultural), politically correct propaganda to fill a whole article. (I got only 3500 words.) :-(

By the way, I already know their defense to my coming article, cause I already read it in the papers as a response to other critics:

"Yes, it's good you bring that up. It's a very true point about journalism. Yes we are biased, of course we are. There's no way to report news without bias. There's no such thing as unbiased news. Everybody has his own truth. That's inherent in journalism. We can't do more than present our truth best we can, that's the nature of news and we think we do a pretty good job at it, though we always welcome suggestions and try to improve."

Ugh, get out off the TV you dangerous idiotarians, straight from the mysticism hell of Atlas Shrugged :-)

Henry Sturman

by Henry Sturman on Tue, 12/23/2003 - 23:50 | reply

"Trust only what you have personally made up."

I thought that was good advice, until I realized I did not personally make it up. No, I've seen enough Star Trek episodes to know where that leads.

by Kevin on Wed, 12/24/2003 - 00:06 | reply

tinfoil

It may be time to make tinfoil a controlled substance.

by a reader on Sat, 12/27/2003 - 06:35 | reply

Proportional Nonsense

The Liberal Democrats are pushing for Proportional Representation (PR) again.

One of the reasons given in support of this catastrophic move is that PR makes your vote "count" and that people might be staying away from elections because they think their vote does not count.

The irony is that the actual effect of PR is systematically to ensure that your vote, and the voting process as a whole, counts as little as possible. How so? Well, PR involves counting the votes for each party and then picking candidates from a party list in proportion to the votes that each party received. This means there isn't any such thing as a local MP who can be held responsible for his behaviour in Parliament. Furthermore, PR gives grossly disproportionate power to the third-largest party, for they are typically the kingmakers who, by choosing which of the two largest parties to ally with, get to choose the real outcome of a typical election under PR. The fourth-largest and even smaller parties often get lucky too. Thus the outcome is highly insensitive to votes, and highly sensitive to the whims of (literally) third-rate politicians. This, in turn, makes it easier for fringe parties – like Britain's third-largest party, the Liberal Democrats – to get a larger share of the votes, thus making it even more difficult to exclude them from the government. Karl Popper's overarching principle of politics is that the issue of who rules is less important than the issue of how bad rulers and bad policies can be eliminated. Well, PR makes it as hard as possible to choose good rulers in the first place, and well nigh impossible to vote, or campaign, or argue, to keep any party out of government.

This should hardly be surprising, for the notion that you can create good policy by taking the average of everyone's opinions is ridiculous. Should we allow decent people seeking asylum from persecution into the country? Well, the neo-fascist right wants to exclude all asylum seekers, so would it be right to exclude 5% of them? Should we have marched 62% of the way to Baghdad?

As for voter turnout, the difficulty in the last election in Britain was that there was no realistic prospect of removing Labour. Hence the drop from 71.5% turnout in 1997 to 59% in 2001. This can only be fixed by having a worthwhile opposition party – something that our present electoral system is giving the politicians powerful incentives to create – not by sabotaging the electoral system to make sure that no worthwhile party is ever in power again.

Fri, 12/26/2003 - 17:45 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

too bad more ppl don't understand this v good post.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Sat, 12/27/2003 - 10:42 | reply

Proportional Nonsense?

I've lived both in Holland (where they have a proportional system) and in America (with a district system). Therefore, I've been able to make some comparison. Though I am not for democracy, I think the proportional system is a bit better. Contrary to the above criticism, I think it is correct in an important sense that the proportional system makes your vote count more. That is, in a district system your vote doesn't "count" if you vote for a small party. Because of the typically homogeneous country wide distribution of political views, small parties tend not to get a single seat in district systems. Hence, your vote doesn't "count" if you vote for a small party in the UK/US, while it does in a proportional system (where small parties get a part of parliament proportional to their country wide vote proportion). This fact biases district systems to 2 party (US) and 3 party (UK) systems. This in turn means that in a country like Holland the political system is much more sensitive toward new ideas, new parties and has a larger margin of debate. In short, it makes the system more dynamic and self-correcting. Case in point: the Libertarian Party in the US typically get's 0.5% of the vote but no seats in congress. With PR they would get a few seats in Congress and have at least an influence on the debate. (Also, more people would vote for the LP in a system in which their vote would no longer be "wasted".)

Your theory that PR gives grossly disproportionate power to the third-largest party sounds logical at first, but turns out to be untrue in practice, for a variety of reasons. One of which is that there are often several "third parties" that can be used to help create a majority, which counteracts any monopoly power. And a second reason is that it is simply an empirical fact (explainable by both economic bargaining theory and gentlemen's agreement) that coalition agreements tend to favor each party's programme in proportion to their size.

You are right that the notion that you can create good policy by taking the average of everyone's opinions is ridiculous. But that's an argument against democracy in general, not against PR.

An important point to be made (but which is rarely made) is that countries that wish to keep their district system nonetheless must change to the Condorcet voting system, which is a potent cure against the "wasted vote syndrome".

Henry Sturman

by Henry Sturman on Sun, 12/28/2003 - 12:49 | reply

Not Average

'That is, in a district system your vote doesn't "count" if you vote for a small party. Because of the typically homogeneous country wide distribution of political views, small parties tend not to get a single seat in district systems.'

This is as it should be. Or are you suggesting political cranks with unworkable policies, or people who are incapable of arguing convincingly for good policies should have an influence on policy? When socialists are in the minority, as they will be eventually (I hope) do you want their cranky minority opinions to blunt the force of reforms in the direction of capitalism, or do you want to be able to ignore their whining?

'Your theory that PR gives grossly disproportionate power to the third-largest party sounds logical at first, but turns out to be untrue in practice, for a variety of reasons.'

No, in practise it's true. Israel has a problem with religious parties putting in irrational legislation largely because of the disproportionate influence given to them by PR. If they didn't have PR they could ignore the religious parties.

'You are right that the notion that you can create good policy by taking the average of everyone's opinions is ridiculous. But that's an argument against democracy in general, not agains PR.'

Democracy does not take the average of everyone's opinion if you do it in a way that is even mildly sensible, i.e. - if you don't use PR. The policy of Parliament in Britain is not the average of everyone's opinion because the party in power can usually get legislation through on the strength of their own seats in Parliament. This is not the average in any sense of that word. Did the American and British governments half go to war against Saddam and half not? No. Did they compromise with their opponents? No. As such, political debates actually have a large effect on what happens, since they can ensure that one party rather than another gets its policies through. Under PR this is generally impossible to arrange, so every policy is a compromise and nobody has any responsibility for anything and cranks like Charles Kennedy can't be excluded from power.

There are good arguments that anarchocapitalism would be better than democracy, your averaging objection is not one of them.

Lastly, you say 'I am not for democracy'. Do you have any preference between dictatorship and democracy?

by Alan Forrester on Mon, 12/29/2003 - 01:38 | reply

PR Gives power to the third largest party

To those who doubt that PR gives grossly disproportionate power to the third largest party, I have only one word to say: Genscher.

by a reader on Mon, 12/29/2003 - 01:51 | reply

Just noticed this

Two accused war criminals could take Serbia parliament seats after weekend vote

Jailed former Yugoslav President Slobodan Milosevic and another accused war criminal could become members of Serbia's parliament after their extreme nationalist allies swept weekend elections, according to results released Monday.

...

Although the Radicals did not garner a majority that would allow them to form a new Cabinet -- even in coalition with Milosevic's Socialist Party, which won 22 seats -- they will be a tough opposition for any new government.

David Schneider-Joseph

President, Americans for a Society Free from Age Restrictions
Chief, Tewata

by DavidSJ on Mon, 12/29/2003 - 15:26 | reply

Re: Not Average

Or are you suggesting political cranks with unworkable policies, or people who are incapable of arguing convincingly for good policies should have an influence on policy? When socialists are in the minority, as they will be eventually (I hope) do you want their cranky minority opinions to blunt the force of reforms in the direction of capitalism, or do you want to be able to ignore their whining?

I think you're missing the point. Of course it's better that cranks don't have political influence. But if by disposing of that we also dispose of the influence of good small groups it's not a good idea. We don't want to throw away the baby with the bath water. It's like saying let's abolish scientific freedom and keep only the good scientists who say good things. The cure would be worse than the disease, since by keeping bad scientists out you're also keeping new good scientists with good ideas out. In the end truth does better in a free and open debate, even if that means allowing the bad parts in as well. So too in politics. Of course, you're right that in a PR system you'll get idiot communist minorities influencing debate. But by abolishing that you also lose the libertarian minorities who can influence the debate. If I have a choice between only the status quo or status quo plus communist minority plus libertarian minority I think the latter is better.

No, in practise it's true. Israel has a problem with religious parties putting in irrational legislation largely because of the disproportionate influence given to them by PR. If they didn't have PR they could ignore the religious parties.

Of course you can always give examples where this does happen. I guess I should have been more precise and claim that in my experience in most systems (certainly in the Dutch system) this is relatively rare. But even if you are right about this being a problem sometimes or even more often, that doesn't mean we should immediately abolish PR. When choosing between two systems, both of which are less than perfect, we should balance both systems' pros and cons. A possible disproportionate representation by some small party in PR has a counterpart in the disproportionate disrepresentation of minorities in a district system.

Democracy does not take the average of everyone's opinion if you do it in a way that is even mildly sensible, i.e. - if you don't use PR.

Yes it does. And so there's much less difference between PR and district system than you might think. It is no coincidence that both parties in the US are almost equal and in the UK you're seeing more and more of that as well, with Labor adopting formerly Conservative policies. Big parties have an internal dynamic not unlike that of the PR system. In a district system the compromise comes not from the coalition agreements, but rather from the fact that parties have to market their policies toward a compromise gaining most votes. The results are really not very dissimilar. Therefore the main difference between both systems is really that the debate is larger, which I've argued is a good thing as it is in science.

PR and district do both have their advantages and disadvantages. On balance I prefer PR for the reason explained.

Lastly, you say 'I am not for democracy'. Do you have any preference between dictatorship and democracy?

Well democracy is just another form of dictatorship, but I think you mean whether I have a preference between democracy and other forms of dictatorship. My fundamental principle is freedom, so I would favor that system which gives more freedom. I'm an anarcho-capitalist, but given the choice I'd choose democracy over other dictatorships, because I think democracies tend to have more respect for freedom. Though it's interesting to note not everybody agrees. In particular Hans Hoppe argues that the wildly oppressive welfare state originates from democracy and would have been less extensive under absolute monarchism. We're obviously much better off in the West than say the Middle East. Interestingly even in a brutal dictatorship such as Iraq's Baath party, there was more freedom in some things than we have here. One didn't have any freedom of speech, but one did have the right to build say a shed in one's own garden, a freedom which is typically lacking in a Western country such as the Netherlands. They were so busy killing off their political enemies, that they really didn't have time to care about non-political life style choices that are overregulated in the West. (For the casual reader: I'm not defending Saddam's rule. I think the liberation by the Allies is a great improvement for Iraq and for the world.)

Alan, I think you might learn a bit more if you spend slightly more time on looking at issues from your critic's points of view and slightly less time on contemplating how you can attack your critics views.

Henry Sturman

by Henry Sturman on Wed, 12/31/2003 - 00:01 | reply

alan rocks

"Alan, I think you might learn a bit more if you spend slightly more time on looking at issues from your critic's points of view and slightly less time on contemplating how you can attack your critics views."

funny, we could say the same to you. i think it's an unfair line of attack in either case, though.

i'd also like to personally vouch for Alan's integrity and openness to persuasion. you will find few people better.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 12/31/2003 - 01:41 | reply

Suppressing Debate?

I think you're missing the point. Of course it's better that cranks don't have political influence. But if by disposing of that we also dispose of the influence of good small groups it's not a good idea. We don't want to throw away the baby with the bath water. It's like saying let's abolish scientific freedom and keep only the good scientists who say good things. The cure would be worse than the disease, since by keeping bad scientists out you're also keeping new good scientists with good ideas out. In the end truth does better in a free and open debate, even if that means allowing the bad parts in as well. So too in politics. Of course, you're right that in a PR system you'll get idiot communist minorities influencing debate. But by abolishing that you also lose the libertarian minorities who can influence the debate. If I have a choice between only the status quo or status quo plus communist minority plus libertarian minority I think the latter is better.

First of all, it is perfectly within the power of those who do not get elected to publish their views, they just don't get to use other people's money to attempt to implement them.

A second point is that since at present the government monopolises certain services it is very, very important that the people in power be subject to the most severe criticism possible under such a restraint, i.e. - the district system. If this means chopping off parties with low, thinly spread amounts of votes, then so be it.

Well democracy is just another form of dictatorship, but I think you mean whether I have a preference between democracy and other forms of dictatorship.

False, there is a fundamental difference, under democracy people have a chance at elections to get rid of bad or incompetent leaders, also votes of no confidence, impeachment, free press and so on play a similar role. Democracy is properly understood as a means of criticising governments, where in dictatorships criticism is deliberately suppressed. Democracy is very imperfect, but it is an improvement on dictatorship.

by Alan Forrester on Wed, 12/31/2003 - 02:39 | reply

Democracy

I vote for Henry Sturman.

I think his points about the pros and cons of PR are well taken. While small parties may be free to publish their opinions, they are not free to vote on laws. There is no good reason for this. It means that people who support them are not represented in the legislature at all.

It seems to me that people who oppose PR really prefer elitist rule over honoring the people's choices (while paying lip service to democracy). If having members of more parties voting will make it harder to pass new laws, then I say "great". Most new laws suck. If there's an important new law that's worth passing, it should be possible to convince a majority to vote for it.

There's no reason we couldn't have PR in the legislature and a Condorcet-style election for a single chief executive who is not required to form a coalition. The idea of marching 62% of the way to Baghdad is really a silly argument. If the chief executive places his political ambition above principle, then he's unlikely to do the right thing no matter what system is in place.

And I don't think democracy is or isn't dictatorship. Democracy is about how to choose leaders, and dictatorship is about how much power leaders wield. You can have democratically elected dictators, and you can have leaders limited by a constitution chosen by other methods.

Gil

by Gil on Wed, 12/31/2003 - 08:04 | reply

Clarification

I didn't mean to imply that I am in favor of PR. I think I'm against it, but not for the criticisms given above.

My main objection is that I think people should vote for individuals rather than parties. I'm not sure that the law should do much to recognize the existence of parties at all. I'm not against potential candidates organizing into parties, but that shouldn't be the concern of election laws or constitutions (I think).

But, I do like the Condorcet-style voting method. It's very similar to one that I (and probably many others) have suggested in the past. It would allow people to vote for their actual first choice without worrying about wasting their vote. Their preferences would still be represented in the outcome. And, the election results would provide much more information about voter preferences.

Gil

by Gil on Fri, 01/02/2004 - 02:17 | reply

Re: Clarification

Gil wrote

> My main objection is that I think people should vote for individuals > rather than parties.

I think first past the post systems are better than PR mainly because it is better that people vote for parties than individuals.

In an old culture like Britain or the US there exists certain political traditions each containing much evolved knowledge. Each tradition has had many writers and politicians contribute to it's history. Therefore with a little research a person can learn more about the beliefs of a party (embodying one of these traditions) than he could ever learn about an individual. Because of the history it is easier to predict what a party will do in government that what an individual will do.

For similar reasons first past the post is better because it is preferable to be ruled by any one of these evolved traditions than by some amalgamation of several of them.

A parallel is to say, if you are an organism in an environment, it is better to be an elephant or an eagle than some mixture of the two.

by a reader on Sat, 01/03/2004 - 12:17 | reply

A Better Analogy

In any particular, changing, environment: are we likely to see better adaptation from two species of organism, or twenty?

Gil

by Gil on Sun, 01/04/2004 - 21:09 | reply

Not such a good analogy

This analogy only works if each of these organisms is allowed to execute all it's genes independently, as would happen in 20 seperate countries each governed by one political tradition.

If the genes are combined into one organism as in PR it is much worse.

If for example one party gets the Treasury while another gets the home office we are talking about something with the trunk of an elephant and the wings of an eagle. As I'm sure you know, such an organism will survive worse than either an elephant or an eagle.

by a reader on Mon, 01/05/2004 - 13:39 | reply

I have never seen an impeachment in reality.

I think almost all modern western democracies fail to pass the Popper's test. I am not very good at history, I must admit. But it seems to me that it is so-so-so difficult to remove a leader from power that only very few examples are out there.

Even notorious Nixon resigned himself before the impeachment has taken place and only under heavy pressure of an imminent trial court. There had still been no way of de-electing him without a trial court or judge's orders to give out tapes etc.. Even in this case people (americans en masse) didn't have any choice of removing him. USA got rid of him only with a great luck, to my view.

There was no impeachment for Clinton either. Not even a slightest chance of it. Recent re-elections in Israel - the same story. Barak resigned himself and put himself forward for the next election. He wasn't evicted from the government because of bad handling of the intifada problem. People voted for Sharon because they wanted protection - but only after Barak resigned voluntarily.

I don't argue that western democracies are better or worse than middle east life-long "presidentships". But to my point of view none of the modern democracies are closer to Popper's principle of ability to remove a bad leader than, let's say, 100 years ago.

And in his own words, this principle has to be a pre-condition for a proper democracy, not the other way around. I.e., if people have an ability to get rid of an evil president, then they could build up an open society.

by a reader on Mon, 06/28/2004 - 08:52 | reply

elections not impeachment

ummm d00d, the main mechanism for removal is elections. if you look at US history, you'll see lots of former presidents who lost elections, and were thus removed.

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 06/28/2004 - 15:58 | reply

PR vs first past the post

Isn't this a pro free-market website? If so, why do you favor competition in the marketplace but seek to severely limit it in the political arena? Parties that have no chance of being elected to office quickly become laughingstocks and their ideas are ignored. This leads to complacency and lack of imagination in the dominant political culture. They start to see the present arrangements as immutable laws of the universe. There are many different ways to implement PR; the Israeli case with the whole country as one constituency and only a minimal number of votes needed to elect an MP is an extreme example. Some notion of a perfect democracy is not the issue, competition is.

by a reader on Fri, 12/03/2004 - 21:07 | reply

There are a infinite number o

There are a infinite number of ways to adapt the electoral system to a more complicated and diverse society. What would be the argument against say, electing half of parliament via the very simple "approval" system and half via party-list PR in five-member districts? A very simple system that would not give representation to marginal cranks. The only argument against such a change, or something like it, is blind adherence to tradition.

by seelow heights on Fri, 12/03/2004 - 21:31 | reply

an arg

The point of government policies is not to have compromises that partially enact the policy of every political group (or every person!). There must be one, unified policy (at a time). It cannot be a matter of averaging.

Democracy is not about giving everyone a fair share of control over policy, it's just a way to choose a policy, that allows for changes in policy.

Even if my argument is wrong, it is not "blind adherence to tradition".

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Fri, 12/03/2004 - 22:43 | reply

Somehow I thought democratic

Somehow I thought democratic politics was about compromise. The "approval" method is the most objectively pro-majoritarian voting system conceived by the mind of man. The type of PR I referred to would allow at least some degree of input by ideological minorities. In the end, unlike the basically judicial supremacist systems of the USA and EU, an authentic majority would rule.

by seelow heights on Sat, 12/04/2004 - 04:44 | reply

Re: PR vs First Past the Post

A reader wrote:

'Isn't this a pro free-market website? If so, why do you favor competition in the marketplace but seek to severely limit it in the political arena? Parties that have no chance of being elected to office quickly become laughingstocks and their ideas are ignored. This leads to complacency and lack of imagination in the dominant political culture. They start to see the present arrangements as immutable laws of the universe. There are many different ways to implement PR; the Israeli case with the whole country as one constituency and only a minimal number of votes needed to elect an MP is an extreme example. Some notion of a perfect democracy is not the issue, competition is.'

First Past the Post isn't about limiting competition, it is about allowing it. If you are going to have a state then, as a matter of fact, there is going to be one set of laws in place at a time, laws that the state gets to make. (I think we ought to move away from this monopolistic situation but that isn't likely to happen anytime soon.)

Let's contrast this with the case of, say, providing coffee. There are many different brands of coffee and many different coffee shops. Each coffee shop has distinctive policies and products, some only carry 'Fair Trade' coffee, some carry brands that are not so labelled. It's not the case that coffee shops get together and compromise on what they are going to do. they set a policy and if it makes a profit they keep going with it and try to improve it. They don't care if they offend the owners of other coffee shops with their policies, nor should they. They don't give some portion of their shops over to promoting the wares of other coffee shops, nor should they. As a result people can easily see what they're getting and don't have to calculate that maybe this product from Starbucks is actually something that got smuggled in from Pret a Manger.

In order to have competition in politics we must have distinctive parties and they must be able to have a clear legislative agenda. Now, unfortunately, if you're going to have a state you can't have the situation where you have lots of parties all passing laws at the same time in the way you can have lots of different coffee shops selling coffee at the same time. There is one set of policies at any one time and only one. So either one party is clearly in control at a time and clearly accountable for their mistakes, including those that make it impossible to pass particular legislation. Or you have a policy that's a compromise between many different parties so that all and none of them are responsible for the results. As a result the voters can't be sure from whom they are buying this policy, nor can they be sure who ought to get the chop if it turns out to be a failure. PR almost always leads to the coalition and compromise and First Past the Post does not inevitably lead to either. So First Past the Post allows competition and PR does not.

by Alan Forrester on Mon, 12/06/2004 - 02:39 | reply

What's wrong with PR?

I live in Poland. Since 1989, when we are a free country again, we have PR voting system. During those 17 years we had 12 prime ministers. The link between MP's and voters is almost lost. Nobody understand how the votes are translated into seats in parliament and nobody knows who is representing who. We had MP's with less then 500 votes! There is always a need for a coalition to form a government and the resonsabilty is always fuzzy.

There is not ideal voting system but First Past the Post is MUCH better than PR. I know it from my life.

Bartek (37).

by Bartek Michalowski on Fri, 05/04/2007 - 19:35 | reply

Cuban Outrage

The fake “parliament” of the communist dictatorship of Cuba has been criticising conditions under which unlawful combatants are being held at Guantanamo Bay. We are not sure what President Castro hopes to achieve with this drivel. But if he has public-relations consultants, it must surely be against their advice that he has dared to invite comparison between Guantanamo Bay and the rest of Cuba.

A Cuban parliament statement called the leased US facility a “concentration camp”

That's a term usually reserved for places where innocent people or political prisoners are detained. Its misuse in this context is despicable.

It might be an appropriate term, however, for describing a country which is generally a hell hole and where attempted emigration is a criminal offence.

and said inmates were subjected to “indescribable humiliations”.

That's presumably why they didn't deign to describe them, then. Unlike these people.

The comments add to growing concern over the rights of those being held.

What, like this?

[...]

The prisoners are “totally isolated, without the possibility of communicating with their families or access to appropriate legal defence,” the Cuban statement said.

What, like this?

“They commit very serious attacks on human dignity, in an atmosphere of hysteria and fear nurtured by North America's far-right,” it continued.

What, like this?

What, like this?

How long before the Cuban regime disintegrates under the torsional strain of its own twisted cynicism?

Sun, 12/28/2003 - 21:22 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

too linky

i would have liked this post better if it made more sense without reading the links (which i don't intend to). couldn't some short quotes from each have made things clearer?

btw i realise this would be difficult with only one type of block quote. but if you had 2 or more it'd work ok. i just recently made 4 for my blog just by using different colours. i think it works well. if you don't like that, i'm sure you could figure something else out too. (if you're against colour for aesthetic reasons, how about plain black dotted outline vs plain black dashed outline vs plain black solid outline vs no outline).

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 12/29/2003 - 05:03 | reply

Pot calling the kettle black

So your point is that Cuba treats his prisoners as badly as we do? Should we be proud of this as Americans?

I particularly like the implication that Castro is cruel for transferring his prisoners to locations far away from their families, as if this is something that has not been a common practice in the US since the prison system was privatized. There are thousands of people right here in Massachusetts who have been unable to visit their loved ones because they have been sold to the Texas prison industry.

Last One Speaks

by a reader on Mon, 12/29/2003 - 12:48 | reply

Re: Pot calling the kettle black

Last One Speaks asks:

So your point is that Cuba treats his prisoners as badly as we do?

No. That's your point, and it is false as well as irrelevant. We urge you to read the links. You too, Elliot.

by Editor on Mon, 12/29/2003 - 13:08 | reply

Castro is no President

I'm not criticizing your post but I do have to mention that Castro is not the President of Cuba. Presidents are elected democratically, and we all know how democratic the elections in Cuba are.

It's impossible to compare the Guantanamo prisoners to the thousands upon thousands of prisoners held in Castro's jails. For one, I don't think there are any prisoners in Guantanamo jailed for being simply independent journalists trying to enlighten the Cuban people about the world around them. I'm sure the conditions and treatment are completely night and day also.

If anyone, such as the commentor "a reader" above believes these comparisons to have some legitimacy, please visit Cubanet or my site (Babalu) for some schooling on the cruelty of Castro's regime.

by a reader on Mon, 12/29/2003 - 14:07 | reply

Good Post

Excellent. Castro is just hoping to distract from recent E.U. condemnation by trying to shift the focus to U.S. detainees.

And as to the Texas prison industry cited by Last One Speaks...write your congressman and have the law changed. Yes, we're allowed to work for reform here in the U.S. Just look at the recently passed prison rape legislation which was created out of grass-roots efforts. Those same grass-roots efforts would land YOU in jail in Cuba. There's no comparison.

--scott

by a reader on Mon, 12/29/2003 - 17:40 | reply

Read my Links

Editor note:

No. That's your point, and it is false as well as irrelevant. We urge you to read the links. You too, Elliot.

I did read the links, twice to make sure I didn't miss anything and the conditions in our own prisons is completely relevant on the point of human rights and inhumane treatment of prisoners. Read this report on Correctional Corp of America's failure to meet its obligations to US citizens.

Further excerpts from the press release.

"Not only will CCA be unable to fill its beds, but the company has not improved operationally and is still mired by debt and controversy since going virtually bankrupt in the late 1990s."

..."States should think twice before signing any new contracts with CCA," said co-author Mafruza Khan, also from Good Jobs First. "This report shows that CCA has not undergone any significant transformation since being racked by scandals at its prisons in the late 1990s. It is still involved in numerous controversies and lawsuits involving conditions in its facilities."

and this on how they get away with it,

The study also notes hefty campaign contributions by CCA to legislators to drive policies to maintain and grow the prisoner population. The report reviews cases in which CCA appeared to use its contributions and ties with public officials and legislators to help it win new contracts and influence public policy. According to the Institute on Money in State Politics (www.followthemoney.org), 830 candidates in the 2000 election received contributions from the private prison industry for a total of $1.12 million. CCA was the top giver with 600 contributions for a total of $443,300..

Sorry, I'm no supporter of Castro but the Bush regime is no better.

Last One Speaks

by a reader on Mon, 12/29/2003 - 19:35 | reply

erm

when you say "no better" do you really mean they are exactly equally bad? is castro not even a tiny bit worse?

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 12/29/2003 - 21:39 | reply

RE: ERM

Elliot was heard asking:

when you say "no better" do you really mean they are exactly equally bad? is castro not even a tiny bit worse?

-- Elliot Temple

Yes I mean any violation of human or civil rights, by anyone, is exactly equally inhumane. And on that criteria, I find the policies of my own country worse because the violations occur on a wider scale than one aging dictator can acheive within his limited sphere of influence.

The US prison gulag currently holds over 2 million Americans. We have more people in jail than China, and I just don't see that we have any moral ground to stand on in the face of Castro's criticism. Fidel may be hypocritical but he's right about Gitmo. We are denying those prisoners basic rights that they deserve under international conventions. We would expect no less if the situation were reversed.

just my opinion,

Last One Speaks

by a reader on Tue, 12/30/2003 - 01:14 | reply

i can see clearly now

so all abuses are equally inhumane, and the USA is the worst. got it.

PS the singular is criterion

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 12/30/2003 - 03:57 | reply

CASTRO AS PRESIDENT? BAH, HUMBUG!

You've hit it right on the button. He never was and never will be a President. For one thing, he doesn't have the stature to be anything more than a thug, and dictator, kept in office merely by force of arms.

Why is it that every criticism of La Maxima Cucaracha (LMC) in Havana brings these guys out of the woodwork who try to make the U.S. look like the Evil Empire and Castroconcentrationcamp land a Paradise where everyone enjoys free schooling and free medical care, which supposedly are far more valuable than FREEDOM. Cuba, before LMC, always had a top rating for education in the Americas, and the medical care in Cuba today is sub-par by any standard.

His supposed-caring nature in sending Cuban doctors abroad to help in the rural areas of South America is merely a cover-up for these subversive communist infiltrators, the same thing he did in S.A. in his youth.

Look how Capitalism produced the only success in all of Cuba over the past 45 years in the Tourist Zone, and compare that with the abject poverty in the rest of the Island! That thug is a moron who has mesmerized Hollywood. Why, I'll never know.

Keep the pressure on. You're doing a good job.

by Howard e. on Tue, 12/30/2003 - 06:52 | reply

THE BLACK KETTLE

Well, I don't see what the Massachusetts's prisoners situation has to do with Cuban prisoners, unless you have a loved one down there in Texas and must make the comparison. First, I assume that Massachusetts's prisoners are those convicted of felonies, even murder. In Cuba we are speaking about those who differ with The Great Cockroach politically, which can result in execution or a long prison sentence. That's a big difference, amigo. (There have been more than 10,000 executions of political dissidents in Cuba since 1959, not murderers, but those who disagreed with LMC.)

Secondly, we are talking about a legally constituted government in Massachusetts and the U.S. vs a Dictatorship imposed upon Cubans and laws they did not initiate by majority vote.

Third, we are talking about a free people with inalienable rights versus a slave state where The Great Cockroach has ALL the authority, even though he never held an elective office in his life. How would you like to still have old mayor "Curley" still in power in Boston? As corrupt as they were, they don't even come close to what Cubans suffer today. Bah, humbug.

by Howard e. on Tue, 12/30/2003 - 07:09 | reply

Moral Equivalency

Cuba treats its average citizens much worse than the US treats its prisoners. US convicts have far more rights of appeal, just to name one difference. Cuba is one big slave plantation, Guantanamo is a prison camp for enemy combatants. There's a big difference, and if you can't see it then you're wearing moral blinders.

As for the poor "loved ones" who can't visit their beloved convicted felons, that wouldn't be the case if they hadn't committed the crimes they were convicted of in the first place. Being out of touch with their "loved ones" is a penalty they should have considered before committing those crimes.

Tim Starr

by a reader on Wed, 12/31/2003 - 22:46 | reply

What's Castro got to do with our sorry human rights record?

Last One Speak's point was correct, and the last few posters have proven it. WE'RE the nation that prattles on endlessly about civil rights and freedom, but hypocritically fall short of our own standards. I expect Fidel Castro to act like a tinhorn despot and to oppress his people in the name of building some socialist utopia.

What is your (our) excuse? Pointing to Castro or other despots and saying "we're not as bad as him" is pretty laughable as a reason to ignore our own manifest shortcomings.

To the last several posters who go on about U.S. prisoners deserving what they get because of their own supposed choices about disobeying the laws, etc., have you read the incarceration statistics Last One Speaks cited? Exactly what do you make of it that we have more prisoners and a higher incarceration rate (owing to the quite political, racist "War on Drugs") than the all-time badass totalitarian countries, you know, Commie China, Russia, Cuba and all of those "Axis of Evil" countries you all love to hate?

Cuba? Who cares? I'll grant you Castro is a badass if you'll extend to the rest of your fellow citizens that it's morally wrong and a bad thing to send one of Last One Speaks' black or brown

Massachusetts neighbors to prison in Texas for '20 to life' for selling/using cocaine or marijuana.

And yes, I do assume from your hugely self-righteous bleatings that your response might be "Yada Yada, Drugs Bad, they 'chose' to break the law, etc.", but perhaps even someone as cloistered and self-righteous as the last few posters have probably tried dangerous "illegal drugs" like marijuana or cocaine, and unless you're totally partisan and a right-wing Moral Majority ideologue, you'll probably agree that the use or sale of those substances isn't much different than legal, politically-correct drugs like alcohol or tobacco and doesn't rate Draconian prison sentences and the break-up of the "offenders" family to a distant state.

But can we leave Castro out of it? Castro being a jerk doesn't at all condone or justify our own sorry human rights record in this regard.

by a reader on Sun, 01/04/2004 - 00:33 | reply

Is this a trick question?

A reader asked :

Exactly what do you make of it that we have more prisoners and a higher incarceration rate (owing to the quite political, racist "War on Drugs") than the all-time badass totalitarian countries, you know, Commie China, Russia, Cuba and all of those "Axis of Evil" countries you all love to hate?

Well, assuming this is true, I would guess that those countries killed/are killing more prisoners than the US.

How'd I do?

Rowina

by a reader on Mon, 01/05/2004 - 00:45 | reply

Brazilian Outrage

A Brazilian Federal Judge and nincompoop has ordered a measure which, in his own opinion, is "absolutely brutal, threatening human rights, violating human dignity, xenophobic and worthy of the worst horrors committed by the Nazis".

Why would he do such a thing? Well, the United States has announced that from 5 January, all visitors who require visas to enter the US will also have their fingerprints taken on entry.

This includes visitors from Brazil. Federal Judge and nincompoop da Silva objects to this measure.

"I consider the act absolutely brutal, threatening human rights, violating human dignity, xenophobic and worthy of the worst horrors committed by the Nazis," he ruled, in his court order.

So he has ordered all American visitors to Brazil to have their fingerprints taken too.

Just to anticipate the question that was asked about our previous item, on Cuban Outrage: No, we are not arguing that because Judge and nincompoop da Silva is hypocritical, the American measure is justified. We are arguing that because neither Judge and nincompoop da Silva nor anyone else has given any rational justification for his measure, it has not been justified. In addition, we consider his hypocrisy and blind anti-Americanism, like those of the Cuban regime, to be noteworthy features of the current world political scene, and that is why we are pointing them out.

Incidentally, we consider the American measures reasonable and unexceptionable under the circumstances. But that is not our point here. Even if they were misguided or excessive, their motivation is clearly not to humiliate Brazilians but to thwart terrorist attacks and save lives. Judge and nincompoop da Silva's order, by contrast, is designed solely to humiliate Americans, with shrill and ostentatious disregard for the moral context of the measure he is reacting to.

Wed, 12/31/2003 - 10:14 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

question

he's a judge. how come he can just randomly make a new law like that?

and also won't it be overturned by some other judge?

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Thu, 01/01/2004 - 06:56 | reply

A JUDGE WITHOUT GOOD JUDGMENT

Nor a fair knowledge of the Nazis, and history. There is nothing to guarantee that all judges come with common sense either. Then too, he might be a Castro worshipper and anti-US no matter what we do.

by Howard e. on Thu, 01/01/2004 - 09:11 | reply

Clear as Mud

I'm sure you'll be shocked to hear I disagree with your logic in excusing the US policy. Putting the judge's retaliatory act completely aside, with 27 countries exempt from the indignity of being treated like common criminals,(and one presumes these are the countries exporting light skinned tourists)this can hardly be called a content-neutral regulation.

Looks to me like a political handslapping by the Bush administration for the Latin American's failure to play along on the trade concessions at the WTO conference.

How can taking fingerprints and mugshots at the airport possibly prevent terrorism? Do you think we have some databank of every terrorist agent to compare it to? They recruit new agents every day and even your link suggests we don't have the capacity to use the information.

An official from the US Department of Homeland Security said at least two of the 19 hijackers in the 11 September 2001 attacks could have been stopped if this security system had been in place.

You don't think 17 could have carried out 9/11? I wish I didn't.

The reason there's a rise in anti-Americanism is precisely because of these kind of ineffective and insulting programs. You call it a safety measure. I call it a human rights violation.

Worrying about them getting into the country is pointless. They are here. They uncover sleeper cells within our borders all the time. The money would be better spent in fortifying the protections of the most vulnerable targets in our infrastructure, like say the nuclear power plants. Or did you forget about those reporters that wandered around one for fully fifteen minutes before they were arrested?

respectfully,

Last One Speaks

by a reader on Thu, 01/01/2004 - 22:00 | reply

Re: Clear As Mud

!

by Editor on Thu, 01/01/2004 - 22:13 | reply

Clear as Mud

Where exactly in my remarks did see a suggestion of a conspiracy theory? It seems obvious that since you don't have an answer to defend the effectiveness of this program, you resort to the usual tactic of simply dismissing my pragmatic concern about the allocation of my tax dollars to programs that are not contributing to the safety of the country by implying I'm some fringe lunatic.

It's not about 9/11, the point is this program would not have prevented it from happening, nor will it prevent a future attack.

You're insulted that Brazil would give you a taste of our own policy on the grounds it's unjustified. I'm saying you can't just say our policy is justified without offering some explanation as to how this outrageous invasion of the privacy of an innocent traveller without probable cause outweighs the results likely to be obtained by that infringement on personal sovereignty.

Last One Speaks

by a reader on Thu, 01/01/2004 - 23:00 | reply

Re: Clear as Mud

Last One Speaks asked:

Where exactly in my remarks did see a suggestion of a conspiracy theory?

That's an interesting question. According to The World's discussion, the central feature of a conspiracy theory is that it alleges that the conspirators are lying about their motives for behaving in the ways that they do, and that their real motives are malevolent. In this case, you are claiming that the US Administration neither intends nor believes that the measures will help prevent terrorism as they publicly claim, but is intentionally diverting resources away from measures that would be effective, in order to further an utterly unrelated, secret intention of punishing Latin American countries for their trade policies, and additionally (if I understand you correctly) they are motivated by the pleasure they take in humiliating dark-skinned people.

Now, this in itself does not make something a conspiracy theory, for it is indeed common for people to lie about their motives. More is required. And in fact, a more conventional definition of 'conspiracy theory' would start from a different criterion: the irrefutability of such theories. This criterion, too, is met by your remarks, for no conceivable observation would prove them wrong. Contrast that with the straightforward interpretation, namely that the Administration believes what it says about the fingerprinting measure. That interpretation would be utterly exploded by, for instance, a single accidentally recorded remark, when the President thought he was off-camera, of the form "well, that'll show those pesky Brazilians what happens when they cross us at the WTO talks! And can you believe how gullible people are? Security checks at airports deterring terrorists, the very idea, ha ha ha!"

But in my opinion, empirical irrefutability, in itself, is a little overrated as an indicator of irrationality. I would focus on a third feature, also stressed in The World's discussion, which is not so much about what a theory says as what it does not say. This is a matter of 'not taking one's own theory seriously'. Space does not permit a full statement here of what it would mean to take the 'terrorism-indifference-and-trade-policy-punishment' theory seriously as an explanation of the reality of the new fingerprint checks. But for instance, I would expect anyone who did take it seriously to be very preoccupied with questions such as: how is the Brazilian government to be made aware of the fact that they are being punished, given that the true motive has to be kept from the public?, by what mechanism does the Administration hope that the humiliation of Brazilian tourists will be translated into Brazilian government compliance at the next trade talks?, are black members of the Administration privy to the policy of exempting white tourists from humiliation? And so on. Your remarks showed no interest in a single such issue, and they therefore satisfy the third criterion too.

And then, fourthly, there is the matter of dupes. In this matter there certainly are dupes (I can testify that I am one of them) i.e. people who consider it highly plausible that these fingerprint measures will be helpful. Therefore someone who takes seriously the idea that the Administration does not believe this, would want to explain how they know that people with the foul, criminal, concealed motives that you allege, exist at all.

by David Deutsch on Fri, 01/02/2004 - 00:48 | reply

Clear as Mud

Please don't put words in my mouth. I did not address motive at all, perhaps these conspiracy implications you see in my words are your own unacknowledged anxieties speaking.

I'm questioning the fiscal responsibility of this program and the conceivable way to prove its value would be with some credible statistics. It would be a simple matter to produce some empirical evidence proving the humiliation of thousands of innocent tourists will succeed in interdiction of said terrorists, if any such evidence existed.

The only motive I attribute to this waste of my hard earned tax dollars is political. It's a just another PR ploy in this election year to make you feel secure. It's all smoke and mirrors. It does not make you safer and further will only contribute to the anti-Americanism in the targeted countries. I attribute it to incompetence and indifference, not some evil intent.

still just my opinion,

Last One Speaks

by a reader on Fri, 01/02/2004 - 03:10 | reply

fun with invalid arguments

well, if "don't put words in my mouth" is a valid argument (you are omniscient WRT yourself, or something, i guess), then i'm pretty sure so is "2 people overrule 1". so i hereby join my voice with David's and assert he is right. he didn't put words in your mouth; his interpretation was entirely reasonable and i believe more accurate than your own knowledge of your views.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Fri, 01/02/2004 - 11:04 | reply

Clear as Mud

"Last One Speaks",

Your story keeps changing.

In your first comment, you seemed to be suggesting malevolent motives for the policy. You noted that 27 countries were exempt and suggested that it was related to skin-color rather than any kind of rational threat assessment.

Then you suggested that it was retaliation for WTO negotiation activity.

Now you say: "It's a just another PR ploy in this election year to make you feel secure."

I think you should forgive us if we're unclear on what your assertions are and why you're making them.

Also, I think you're wrong that "It would be a simple matter to produce some empirical evidence proving the humiliation of thousands of innocent tourists will succeed in interdiction of said terrorists, if any such evidence existed."

In fact, I think that such empirical evidence would be impossible to produce; even if the policy is worthwhile. And, it's not only about interdiction, but there are other security benefits such deterrence and aid in follow-up investigations.

If your concern is genuinely that the costs of this policy exceed its benefits, then one would expect you to be happy that an analysis has determined that it's wise to exclude visitors from lower risk countries from these "humiliations". Instead, you react in the opposite direction, and perceive it as another problem (and imply irrational prejudice).

I, with you, am not certain that this policy is worthwhile. But, I acknowledge that it has some security benefits, and I deny that everyone has a "human right" to enter the United States without being fingerprinted.

Gil

by Gil on Fri, 01/02/2004 - 18:57 | reply

One More Point

I also think that "mak[ing] you feel secure" is a worthy goal.

It doesn't justify every conceivable policy, but it justifies some; and, perhaps, it helps to justify this one.

Gil

by Gil on Fri, 01/02/2004 - 19:09 | reply

Re: Clear as Mud

Gil said to "Last One Speaks":

Your story keeps changing.

In your first comment, you seemed to be suggesting malevolent motives for the policy. You noted that 27 countries were exempt and suggested that it was related to skin-color rather than any kind of rational threat assessment.

Then you suggested that it was retaliation for WTO negotiation activity.

Now you say: "It's a just another PR ploy in this election year to make you feel secure."

I think you should forgive us if we're unclear on what your assertions are and why you're making them.

Yes. Note also that the title of the thread, "Clear as Mud", chosen by "Last One Speaks", can only be referring to The World's claim that:

Even if they were misguided or excessive, their motivation is clearly not...

Why would someone forget, and indeed vehemently deny, that they had just made four separate references to motivation? Because, as he rightly says, calling them that is putting words in his mouth. Or in other words, it is taking his assertions seriously as statements about reality. It seems perplexing that someone would object to this, but maybe we can understand it like this: in a conspiracy theorist's world view, theory is parable. Thus it makes no more sense to "put words in his mouth" than it would have to demand that Jesus explain why the events in some of his more implausible parables had not been heard of before. The object of the formally factual assertions in a parable is not to achieve correspondence with reality, but to express a sort of transcendent understanding of it, or to feel a certain way about it. That is what the author of a parable is trying to achieve when he says "Then said the king to the servants", or "Bush lied".

by David Deutsch on Sat, 01/03/2004 - 06:05 | reply

A Thought

My little thought is not so much about Brazil or U.S. and motives. I don't think the idea of fingerprint checks and maybe mug shots at ports of entry is all so bad. However, are there not 23 countries for which the U.S. does not require this? List those countries. Can we trust that every citizen of those countries is not a terrorist or at least not hostile to the U.S. with intent to do harm? Are they safer than Brazilians and how does one know that? And why not returning U.S. citizens? Are we sure they are who they say they are, its possible to forge a passport. Maybe I read that wrong about exemptions, but it did sound like there is a gaping hole in the security measure.

Everything else I agree with. The Brazilian judge is a nincompoop. Last One Speaks is likely not a conspiracy theorist, arguments to the contrary.

by a reader on Sat, 01/03/2004 - 16:28 | reply

Gaping Holes

I'm really perplexed by this criticism of the policy.

We don't want security with no holes (in fact, it's impossible). We don't want to live in a prison. We want a balance between security and civil rights. We should want our limited security resources focused on the higher risk threats; and limit impositions on civil rights. This is good discrimination.

Why do the same people who complain that the policy puts a burden on visitors that is not justified by security benefits also complain that some of the visitors are not subjected this burden?

Why assume that both the policy is bad and the inequality is bad, rather than the more plausible theory that authorities are also interested in balancing security and dignity and have just drawn the line in a different place?

Gil

by Gil on Sat, 01/03/2004 - 22:10 | reply

Not a complaint

I would be for a policy of being electronically fingerprinted and digital mug shot, shoot, both upon entering and leaving the country. It would seem to make sense to me and would be less invasive than many other security measures to identify that I am who I say I am and am not a security threat. Please add to that, Have a nice day. Enjoy your travels. Seriously. Let me back in tho please.

by a reader on Sat, 01/03/2004 - 23:03 | reply

Still Clear as Mud

Hello. One of my readers just pointed out that this thread was still going. Forgive my inattention. I'm new to this form of discussion and I just assumed the thread would end more quickly.

In any event, it's an interesting form of communication. I have never had so many people tell me what I'm really thinking, instead of responding to what I actually said. Since you know my meaning so well, perhaps you'd be willing to call my mom. She loves hearing from me.

Otherwise I can't fail to notice that not one of you can offer a practical defense to a fiscally irresponsible and (yes) racist policy that accomplishes practically nothing in the way of homeland security. Excuse me for bitching but I work damn hard for the tax dollars they are squandering on this dunderheaded program and last I looked the Patriot II Act has not quite managed to take away my right to do so.

All I ask is that you think about it.

in peace,

Last One Speaks

by a reader on Sun, 01/04/2004 - 05:49 | reply

Ideas Have Consequences

A wonderful forum, and as Last One Speaks notes, "All I ask is that you think about it." Several interesting ideas here in these comments above. As close or as far from the truth each of them may be, they do present a spectrum of ideas, scattered somewhat, but a spectrum.

The byline is right tho, Ideas Have Consequences. Fingerprinting and mugshots for visa holding foreigners represents one of those ideas. An idea such as that can be enforced by fiat. It may need to be. Do it. Start now.

However, it would seem most of all from the discussion that not all the consequences of such an idea have been explored. No one said that this forum is the place for it or must be, but I appreciate the opportunity to think about it as part of an overarching question. It affects me either way and along the whole spectrum once a decision has been made to put the idea into action. I know that the original post or must assume anyway that the intent was only to rightly call into question the Brazilian judge nincompoop. However the larger question of fingerprinting and mug shots at ports of entry has been raised by the implementation of a specific policy. It started as someone's idea. Ideas do have consequences. Sometimes ideas have consequences that may go far beyond the initial intent.

The judge is an inconsequential nincompoop and the world is little affected by his stupid ranting about Nazis and such.

The larger question is about security and freedom and the ideas as to how to balance the two in a free and democratic country where sometimes ideas are carried into action by fiat. The jury is still out on that one, what are our best ideas about security and freedom in a changing world? Of course its not a jury, just a right to think about it and discuss without throwing things. This is as good a place as any to do that, since after all Setting the World to Rights seems to understand more than than authors of most forums that Ideas do Have Consequences.

by a reader on Sun, 01/04/2004 - 16:16 | reply

Ideas have consequences?

The judge is an inconsequential nincompoop and the world is little affected by his stupid ranting about Nazis and such

How could his idea be dismissed so easily when the original theme is about idea carrying consequences? Is there any possibility that the idea of an important person, A JUDGE, could be used to flame an intensive anti-American of those "asking why they hate us" to say the least, not to mention of those even more fanatical. Perhaps you would say that his idea has less important consequences as compared to our consequences? If it's so, then you must be aware of the 2nd level of ideas having consequences, that is how well one's aware of one's own quality of reasoning, the pros & cons of such consequences, the premises and principles those such idea has built upon, the contradiction between principles that applied to such idea. And with that, I suggest that the quality of reasoning of Gil is superb as followed

...We don't want security with no holes (in fact, it's impossible). We don't want to live in a prison. We want a balance between security and civil rights. We should want our limited security resources focused on the higher risk threats; and limit impositions on civil rights. This is good discrimination...

Maybe, you can start from there to outline your lines of why the jury is still out there. It's your idea that we are listening to, if you think it's more probable than the "jury", since if it has the highest truth, you should be willing to defend it with your life, right? That's one consequence one should think of too.

Words can fool men but nature doesn't give a damn!

by Lan Nguyen on Sun, 01/04/2004 - 19:03 | reply

The Judge

I'll let the words of the Brazilian Judge speak for themselves.

As to the second point, Gil does have a superb quality of reasoning. We both are concerned about the proper balance between security and freedom. The jury is still out because that is an everchanging scenario. I want my security measures adaptable to the times and in balance.

I have no need to defend my short post with my life. Some other time maybe.

I happen tho to think that it is not unreasonable to fingerprint electronically and take digital pictures at points of entry. Everyone. Security is security. Its not a half measure. I have no particular reason to question why our government has required this of citizens of other countries. I don't care what your nationality or race is. This is not Brazil and we have been burned badly.

So do it for everyone if it protects my freedom. If it doesn't, don't. Personally I have nothing to lose other then a minor inconvenience. We have the technology and it is pretty good and getting better, and it is alot less intrusive than luggage or body patdowns and x-rays. So include me electronically and digitally and make sure that I know it. They already have my fingerprints and my mug shot a thousand times over. I'm on every ATM film and a whole lot more.

After all I am a U.S. citizen and this time i'm on the passenger manifest. I like that they know that I am who I am when I return to this country. I just don't know that "they" are who "they" say they are, you know? Exempted country? What does that mean? Wave them on through like a flag is some kind of pass go badge? So do it. If its good enough for them its good enough for me too.

by a reader on Mon, 01/05/2004 - 04:19 | reply

I see your point now. It's no...

I see your point now. It's not against security measure based on "human right" principle as other does but you rather have everyone digitally captured and no exempt. I would yield to that small annoyance with a constant awareness that measure could be used for dark purpose too. For now, I give our government the benefit of the doubt.

Words can fool men but nature doesn't give a damn!

by Lan Nguyen on Mon, 01/05/2004 - 19:18 | reply

So, Brazil is - "Outraged"!!!!

Good for them - add it to "Irrelevant" and "Impotent"...

by a reader on Tue, 01/13/2004 - 04:00 | reply

Copyright © 2007 Setting The World To Rights

Glenn Tells It Like It Is

InstaPundit dares to state the (morally) obvious: that the United States should not be 'neutral' between right and wrong in the Middle East.

As he says himself:

Well, that's why I don't like writing about the Palestinian issue – if you tell the truth, which is that these guys are enemies of civilization, in the grip of a psychotic death cult that will probably lead to their destruction, then you sound shrill.

I also don't write about it much because the Palestinians, fundamentally, are the cannon fodder of other people who don't like the United States, and the real way to resolve this problem is to deal with those other people. And so it's those other people who get the bulk of my attention.

But the amount of pious crap spouted about the Palestinians is so vast that every once in a while I do feel the need to cut through it by pointing out the facts.

Indeed.

And he does so with concise precision. Glenn Reynolds' Instapundit is an effective force for good in the world.

Thu, 01/01/2004 - 19:45 | digg | del.icio.us | permlink

Cannon Fodder...

Agreed. Cannon Fodder. Unfortunately as this so aptly points out, the cannon fodder are not the main problem, because it would be much easier to pinpoint solutions to the problem if they weren't.

Which brings up the point. If they (unnamed because of the obvious) are the cannon fodder, then who, what, where are the cannons? That too is obvious but what is behind it is usually ignored in the news.

1) Usually there is a rich man hidden well behind the cannon paying the bill. Saudi wealth and other such sources ? 2) Usually there is an ideologue with an ax to grind who stands forward to light the taper, and then runs. Osama and the like? 3) Usually there are the bystanders (various ax grinders, or would that be organ grinders with pet monkeys) who root vociferously for the cannon shooters and the cannon fodder so long as the cannon does not appear to point at them. What they forget is that cannon(s) easily swivel to any point on the compass and are not beholden to kind words or the cheering section.

Watch out for the financiers, they are the lowest and sneakiest of the bunch and they like to hide their money trail. They look for leaders of lost causes and angry young men to finance and to do their evil dirty work. Who might they be?

by a reader on Fri, 01/02/2004 - 20:52 | reply

Slightly Martian

Some of the people working on the Mars lander project have switched to Mars time:

Golombek and others on the rover team have adopted a Mars schedule, coordinating their waking and sleeping patterns with Martian days, which are nearly 40 minutes longer than those on Earth. They have blacked out their windows to prevent sunlight from coming in. Some even sport watches that measure Mars time.

"My cats are staying with my husband, so they get to stay on Earth time," quipped mission scientist Wendy Calvin.

Isn't that cool?

Mon, 01/05/2004 - 10:09 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

cool!

How many people do we know who get up progressively later every day, assuming lack of diary constraints? (the correct answer is: 'lots')

This sounds to me like a fantastic correlation of desire-to-live-asynchronously with justifying-one's-desire-to-the-conventionally-timetabled. I just feel sorry for the cat.

Emma

www.rationalparents.blogspot.com/

by a reader on Mon, 01/05/2004 - 13:48 | reply

Slightly Martian Musings

Emma of rationalparents.blogspot.com remarked in a comment on our previous item Slightly Martian (about people working on the Mars lander project who have switched their personal sleep-wake cycles to Mars time):

This sounds to me like a fantastic correlation of desire-to-live-asynchronously with justifying-one's-desire-to-the-conventionally-timetabled.

That's an interesting observation: there are two cultures, the conventionally- and the unconventionally-timetabled.

Is this just a matter of taste, or is one of these two cultures objectively better than the other? Ask yourself this question: suppose you suddenly became very interested in the current Mars exploration, and wanted to follow it in real time – which would entail switching your sleep schedule to Mars time. Would you be able to?

Consider the class of people who would not be able to. We're not referring to people engaged in activities that they value even more: if someone loves their work so much that they would not interrupt it to follow the Mars mission even if all the relevant authorities and physical constraints permitted them to, then they would not count as 'wanting' to follow it in the sense that we mean here. We're asking: which people would not be able to follow the Mars mission even if they became passionately interested in it?

Probably most people who earn a living through one of the patterns called 'jobs' would not be able to, or more precisely, would think of themselves as being unable to. Most children would be literally unable to, because they would be forcibly prevented. Hospital patients scheduled for urgent surgery. Prisoners in jail. People who can't afford an internet connection...

It must be the case – mustn't it? – that such people tend to avoid lines of thought that might lead to an interest in following the Mars mission, or anything else, with anything like that degree of passion.

And then, on the other hand, there are the elect of the Earth: the people who are either currently pursuing an activity that they love, or are free to do so whenever they discover one.

This dichotomy cuts across the differences by which people are usually categorised: nationality, wealth, race, class, status, and even the political regime under which they live. It is obviously correlated with some of those. But far from perfectly, and in itself, it is perhaps more important than any of them.

Wed, 01/07/2004 - 18:42 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

the future is flexible

Yes, it is absolutely amazing how many people consider it immoral to get up at 11am or later, say, even if you've been up till 7am doing perfectly reasonable things. I look forward to when all the world is on 24-hour flexi-time. The internet will move things along- as people make real-time connections with others in different time-zones, conventional timetables become less and less useful, and clever ways of solving apparent time-conflict problems can be evolved.

Alice

<http://www.alicebachini.com/>

by a reader on Wed, 01/07/2004 - 13:46 | reply

A speculation

A speculation: in the European Union, doing this would violate some directive or other about working conditions.

And, whether that is literally true or not, that, or something like it, is the reason the European Mars mission failed and the American one succeeded.

by a reader on Wed, 01/07/2004 - 14:50 | reply

In a Nearby Universe: BBC "Regrets" Anti-Kilroy Outburst

The BBC has backed down from its threat to axe Robert Kilroy-Silk's popular chat show after he wrote a column accurately criticising the Arab states as "barbarous and corrupt".

The BBC had described Mr Kilroy-Silk's column as "racist", but today a BBC spokesman said:

"Our hasty reaction has obviously caused great distress and offence and I can only reiterate that everyone here at the BBC deeply regrets that. It also contains clear factual errors which we also regret."

In response to similar accusations from the so-called Commission for Racial Equality, Mr Kilroy-Silk said:

"My lawyers have considered the Commissions's outburst and, in the light of widespread concern, I considered referring it to the police to consider whether it might constitute an offence under the Public Order Act. But then I decided that I wasn't interested in suppressing their right to free speech, regardless of the odious uses to which they put it, and decided to drop the matter."

The Muslim Council of Britain called upon the Sunday Express, which runs Mr Kilroy-Silk's column, to give him more space, saying that his frankness in describing the evils of Islamofascism was a "much-needed breath of fresh air in a world full of fatuous Islamofascist organisations peddling hatred of the West and promoting the oppression of Muslims under the guise of political correctness".

Update: Meanwhile, there is some good news in this universe. Ibrahim Nawar, of Arab Press Freedom Watch, writes in the Daily Telegraph:

"I fully support Robert Kilroy-Silk and salute him as an advocate of freedom of expression. I would like to voice my solidarity with him and with all those who face the censorship of such a basic human right.

I agree with much of what he says about Arab regimes.

There is a very long history of oppression in the Arab world, particularly in the states he mentions..."

Read the whole thing.

Sat, 01/10/2004 - 10:15 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

KILROY WAS HERE!

Back in 1943 and 1944 when I was taking some delightful cruises across the North Atlantic, and through the Mediterranean, Red Sea, Indian Ocean and into the Persian Gulf, every Head in every port seemed to have that funny little drawing, two eyes looking over a wall and two hands atop it, saying Kilroy was here.

So, the Arabs have known for years that Kilroy was watching them. Now they still can't get rid of the guy! I'm sure a hell of a lot of Arabs agree with his viewpoint, especially those Arab (Muslim) women who are still beaten with switches as they walk down the street because some religious zealot (nut) doesn't think they're dressed right. Every American who was overseas knew Kilroy then! More should know the one today.

by Howard e. on Sun, 01/11/2004 - 05:40 | reply

Re: Kilroy was here!

Howard e. wrote

Back in 1943 and 1944 when I was taking some delightful cruises across the North Atlantic, and through the Mediterranean

However delightful or educational those cruises must have been, that was a dark and dangerous time to be in those places.

We want to thank you from the bottom of our hearts for being there.

by Editor on Sun, 01/11/2004 - 15:03 | reply

Comprehensive Analysis of the Golan Heights Issue

The Golan Heights are a weapon.

They were used to commit mass murder.

They were confiscated and placed under civilised jurisdiction.

End of story.

Tue, 01/13/2004 - 08:42 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

nod

v nice. u put it better than i did

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 01/14/2004 - 14:30 | reply

On Fake Diseases

When children behave in ways that schools or parents dislike, this behaviour is often characterised as an illness. Depending on the nuances of the behaviour concerned, a child might be deemed to have Attention Deficit/Hyperactivity Disorder (ADHD), Oppositional Defiant Disorder (ODD) or any one of a growing range of other illnesses.

However, there is something unusual about these diseases. First of all, they are defined entirely in terms of their symptoms, not in terms of some malfunction of the body. Why is this unusual? After all, before the underlying cause was known, diseases like AIDS and SARS, too, were recognised in terms of their symptoms. But that is different. It is perfectly meaningful to say: "that looks like SARS, but it might just be a bad cold, or the person might be deliberately exaggerating his symptoms". Hence also, with real diseases, it is possible to have an asymptomatic disease, like asymptomatic Hepatitis C. But it is not possible, even in principle, to have asymptomatic ADHD.

There is another unusual feature of diseases like ODD that should give us pause: they are typically treated without the patient's consent; and indeed the "treatments" are often physically identical to what would in a non-medical context be called punishments. This breach of human rights is casually justified as being "for their own good".

ADHD and its ilk really aren't diseases in the same sense as, say, Hepatitis C. They are metaphorical diseases, the names of which denote behaviours that are deemed to be morally unacceptable. In other words, the child has a certain opinion about what he ought to be doing and this opinion is different from his parents' opinion about what he ought to be doing.

Take ODD as an example, the diagnostic criteria are:

A pattern of negativistic, hostile, and defiant behavior lasting at least 6 months, during which four (or more) of the following are present:

1. often loses temper
2. often argues with adults
3. often actively defies or refuses to comply with adults'

requests or rules

4. often deliberately annoys people
5. often blames others for his or her mistakes or misbehavior
6. is often touchy or easily annoyed by others
7. is often angry and resentful
8. is often spiteful or vindictive

Note the many moral judgements that are necessary to make any diagnosis according to this definition: "actively defies", "deliberately annoys" and so on. These are not deemed to be disease symptoms when a child does them to an intending kidnapper, or to the parents' political opponents at a demonstration, for example. These states of the child's brain become diseases only when a certain condition – disapproval – exists in the brain of another person – the parent or other authority. The treatment is also metaphorical and for ODD it consists of conversations and discipline. Again, this is very different from other diseases: bacteria are not great conversationalists, one cannot debate diabetes, but apparently ODD can be disposed of by talking to it.

The entire purpose of these diseases is, in fact, to give these vile "treatments" a gloss of medical and scientific respectability. Then no attention need be paid to whether the child is right to behave defiantly toward his parents in specific cases. No effort needs to be wasted on such fripperies as rational argument or considering that the child might have a point if they repeatedly refuse to obey their parents or say that they are bored in school. How very convenient for the force-users.

There is one last oddity to note. Professor Michael Fitzgerald of Dublin University has recently said that geniuses such as Socrates, Charles Darwin, and Andy Warhol may have had a mental disease called Asperger's syndrome characterised by not wanting to talk to people and having "restricted" interests with "abnormal" intensity. Now, suppose that having Asperger's syndrome for a while would help you to complete a great work on a "restricted" interest since you wouldn't have to spend time on conversations that would distract you from your work and you would be able to focus intensely on it. Might one not prefer to have Asperger's syndrome to being mentally healthy under such circumstances?

What does that make a person who "cures" it by force?

Wed, 01/14/2004 - 08:51 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

i know you weren't really asking for answers but yes one might prefer to "have Asperger's" in those conditions. and it makes someone who "cures" it by force an immoral, controlling bastard.

bravo

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 01/14/2004 - 14:30 | reply

Spot On

It would seem that the self-appointed "curers" of "ODD" are the ones who have contracted the highly contagious delusional disorder, OTD, Oppositional Thinking Disease.

by a reader on Wed, 01/14/2004 - 16:38 | reply

I'm not a relativist, honest

So this is why schools employ the services of educational psychologists. Otherwise, it would be impossible for a teacher to suspect an unruly pupil of being ODD without simultaneously suspecting himself to be ODD. It takes two to argue, etc.

by Tom Robinson on Thu, 01/15/2004 - 21:09 | reply

So are the children here wrong to want something else?

Supposing a child is born to a father who displays characteristics which are typically described by Asperger Syndrome. In other words, the father is persistently unwilling to converse or interact with his children in any way that they would wish. Instead he is unusually occupied with an obscure and particular line of work, he seems unable to read the subtler nuances of conversation and body language, is unusually pedantic and verbose and doesn't realise when he is embarrassing or boring people. Given that the father seems unwilling/unable to turn this behaviour on and off, is the father morally wrong to have had children?

Also given that many people have tried strongly to help the father to learn ways of relating, eg: explaining explicitly what certain types of body language are likely to mean, and that children at times value being listened to and appreciated for their own talents, and all of these apparently humane strategies appear to have failed, what more can be done?

by a reader on Sat, 01/24/2004 - 15:57 | reply

VAPID father

a reader asked:

Supposing a child is born to a father who displays characteristics which are typically described by Asperger Syndrome...

Perhaps medicalising this style of fatherhood by calling it Verbose

Aloof Pedantic Inept Disorder would help. Perhaps it would do some good to subject the father to a regime of drugs, re-education camps or other pseudo-medical punishments. Perhaps the family will win a hundred million on the lottery if only they spend all their money on tickets this week.

Or they could try solving the problem by improving their ideas. For a start, we recommend total immersion in the Taking Children Seriously web site.

by Editor on Sat, 01/24/2004 - 17:17 | reply

mebbe not total

they let ppl besides David write stuff, so....

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Sun, 01/25/2004 - 03:35 | reply

Currently Insoluble Problem?

The editor suggested re family with problem father:

Or they could try solving the problem by improving their ideas. For a start, we recommend total immersion in the Taking Children Seriously web site

Which seems an excellent idea but is likely to be quite problematic on two grounds. First, father is only interested in collecting Cypriot stramps, c1964-66, and hasn't the least interest in improving his ideas about parenting. How could he be persuaded to take the TCS cure? Second, even if he did cast an eye over the TCS website, he may well be able to appreciate the epistemology, its rationale, its logical and explanatory force, etc but talking the talk is not walking the walk.

How could one solve these problems?

Is it inconceivable that part of the brain of this type of man really could be permanently unusable for some reason? Afterall, nurses are quite used to dodging the advances of people who, post frontal lobe stroke, lose all sexual inhibition. How could one be so sure that so-called aspergic people are necessarily exempt from a similar neurological deficit?

by a reader on Mon, 01/26/2004 - 19:38 | reply

all feasible

the first objection goes something like: how do you help someone voluntarily if he's intentionally wicked? the idea is he will reject all offers that would help. but people aren't intentionally wicked, and there is some way to reach him.

it's not about talking or walking, it's about what he thinks. that talking and walking are different simply is no obstacle.

it's not a brain issue. if you doubt me, ask a brain doctor to take a look.

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 01/26/2004 - 22:53 | reply

Which is the more coercive?

Is it not potentially more coercive to assume that everyone has the neurological ability to understand and enact TCS, than to hypothesise that for some neurological reason, certain people are, as the situation stands, incapable?

We happily accept, for example, that people are colour blind. Given a certain shade of grey, they will not be able to tell whether the colour is red or green. Someone else will forever have to tell them. We happily accept that this inability is a result of a genetic mutation that is highly heritable.

There are families out there who cannot experience pain. They have a genetic mutation. Would it be inconceivable to imagine that they risk hurting their adopted child when they pick it up, simply because they do not get the right feedback? OK, so one can attempt to prevent this by using other circuitry, but it is apparent that the deficit will always cause some accidents that would otherwise be avoided in a TCS family.

Given that Asperger Syndrome is much more frequent in monozygotic than fraternal twins, I think many brain doctors would say that it does have a genetic component. It seems perfectly conceivable that there is simply a part of the brain that is not functioning, and that this is likely to be due to genes interacting with environment in ways that render a person unable to will themselves out this situation.

The current lack of a precise neurological explanation for the deficits currently known as Asperger's, such as the inability to read body language, does not mean that there aren't any.

It would seem to me more humane to search for and deal with any genetic and non-familial sources, such as viruses, than to try to help someone understand TCS when they simply cannot do so.

by a reader on Sat, 01/31/2004 - 10:21 | reply

Fake diseases, empty explanations

a reader writes:

Given that Asperger Syndrome is much more frequent in monozygotic than fraternal twins, I think many brain doctors would say that it does have a genetic component.

It's true that they would. It's also true that they invariably become evasive when it is pointed out that by this definition of "have a genetic component", being the victim of racist attacks also "has a genetic component", as does being the beneficiary of favouritism due to one's looks.

It seems perfectly conceivable that there is simply a part of the brain that is not functioning, and that this is likely to be due to genes interacting with environment in ways that render a person unable to will themselves out this situation.

In view of the above, it is perfectly possible for a given behaviour to be 100% caused by "part of the brain not functioning ... due to genes ... [that] ... render a person unable to will themselves out", and yet also to be 100% due to the way other people have behaved towards that person, or 100% due to the person's own choices.

Therefore, even setting aside the philosophical complexities of the terms "conceivable" and "unable", the idea that a behaviour is "due to genes" has essentially no content in the absence of some theory about what sort of "interaction with the environment" is deemed to be the mechanism through which the behaviour in question is "due to genes".

by David Deutsch on Sat, 01/31/2004 - 12:22 | reply

David Deutsch wrote: In vi...

David Deutsch wrote:

In view of the above, it is perfectly possible for a given behaviour to be 100% caused by "part of the brain not functioning ... due to genes ... [that] ... render a person unable to will themselves out", and yet also to be 100% due to the way other people have behaved towards that person, or 100% due to the person's own choices.

Since we have no explanations either way and seeing as we still have the problem of a parent who is completely unable to read body language, despite being given numerous and repeated explanations and despite the fact that he explicitly declares that it would be right to try to solve these sorts of problems, what would one do?

Would one expect the child to change their preferences about being understood non-verbally, or would one just expect to explain oneself repeatedly again and again for all of the foreseeable future, or would one think...well maybe we should seek some other kind of solution. Perhaps the problem lies beyond the current scope of our ability to solve it and so we need new and other and better solutions. Until such time that these come about, we are stuck.

Isn't it more humane to imagine that the father is not intentionally wicked or entrenched in these situations?

I agree wholeheartedly that the problems of the creation and treatment of fake diseases is rampant and awful but at the same time this does not mean that disabilities that relate to the capacity to think do not exist and would not benefit from consensual treatment.

by a reader on Sun, 02/01/2004 - 11:09 | reply

consensual treatment?

Fraud would take the ball and run with this, hopefully not as far as david. Perhaps the answer to any dis-ease IS love.

kindness and understanding are still a lost art, but they do exist, although david may want proof. I/m guessing he is far removed from the fact that ninety-five percent of the world DOES believe in GOD, even if david himself has not yet had an interaction which can be proved or is theory based.

I pray for all the sufferings of this world, and that goes double for ppl like you, david.

by a reader on Thu, 12/09/2004 - 05:51 | reply

ADHD, ODD

I have been immersed in the issues relating to such a child for seven years. He is my sweetheart's son, just 14. She is endlessly patient. I was raised on discipline, and our conflicts over the resulting disparity have been extremely painful. I have very gradually begun to really take responsibility for this, finally internalizing what was first an intellectual recognition that it is not so much the treatment rendered, but the content behind it -- love or anger. Mine has been anger. With determined determination, I am finally beginning to get past it.

by a reader on Mon, 04/04/2005 - 16:37 | reply

Neurological conditions

I find it interesting that you are focussing on mild and controversial diseases such as ADHD and aspergers. Would you say that diseases like depression, bipolar and schizophrenia were also 'fake' diseases? they too are neurological and thus are classified by symptoms, many of which require the diagnosing physician to make subjective judgements. I believe that all human behaviours lie on continuums and it takes a great deal of sensitivity and sensibility to decide where to draw the line between 'normal' and 'diseased' states.

You cannot make comparisons between completely different forms of diseases such as "diabetes" (a polygenetic and environmental disease); "Hepatitis" or "SARS" (both pathogens) and "ADHD" a behavioural dysfunction. MAY I just say that diabetes is also named by its symptoms and only now are the exact molecular mechanisms coming fully into light. Given the sheer lack of solid scientific understanding about the brain, it is not surprising that we have not discovered the physiological underpinnings.

In any case, a diagnoses have many consequences, both positive and negative. 'Treatments', or at very least 'coping strategies', may help the sufferer to better handle day-to-day life. If we are to see all of these programs as a violation of rights, then we must resign to have paranoid schizophrenics wandering the streets, as it would be considered "wrong" to hospitalise them. I am not trying to make parallels between ADHD and schizophrenics, but where on the continuum do you draw the line?

Should badly behaved children be given labels? maybe not. but it is preposterous to assume that they have the right to defy parents and teachers. There is a very careful line to be trodden between love and discipline, and the two are by no means mutually exclusive. Only discipline that is administered with an obvious underlying motivation of love will be effective.

one last comment- about genetics...
the majority of behavioral traits are polygenetic, that is they are not simple inherited mutations like those that cause cystic fibrosis and the like. All of these genetic predispositions are greatly modified by environment and thus, in many cases should be all but ignored. An example- if a person happens to have a pattern of behavioural genes that make him susceptible to excessive anger- he should still try to find ways to minimise this anger, just as someone with a less "angry genome" who finds themselves prone to anger due to the way they were raised.

by a reader on Thu, 05/12/2005 - 13:07 | reply

Love, discipline, and science

Should badly behaved children be given labels? maybe not. but it is preposterous to assume that they have the right to defy parents and teachers. There is a very careful line to be trodden between love and discipline, and the two are by no means mutually exclusive. Only discipline that is administered with an obvious underlying motivation of love will be effective.

Is there scientific evidence for this theory?

by Editor on Thu, 05/12/2005 - 13:53 | reply

Asperger Syndrome is just a w

Asperger Syndrome is just a way for people to blame other people that differ from themselves. They say it is a disorder but it is simply wisdom beyond the comprehension of those who diagnose it. "Asperberger" people simply have more intelligence than "normal" people have but are outnumbered and are simply proclaimed as people with "messed-up" brains. Clearly, I do not believe Asperger Syndrome is real.

by Diagnosed Female on Thu, 05/19/2005 - 04:45 | reply

love

Ok, you are right, i do not know of any scientific evidence for "love" being the only useful motivator for training a child. Thats probably because no one can define love. Lets instead call it "unconditional positive regard" and then, yes, there is a bounty of scientific evidence. In fact, this is one of the paradigms of clinical psychology.

by a reader on Sun, 05/29/2005 - 01:21 | reply

diagnosis = excuse

This society has turned into a bunch of whiny babies looking for any excuse to blame someone or something else for their problems. How did children get through school 50 years ago? It's amazing that all these new psychological disorders just suddenly appeared and everyone's got one.

To me it appears a new way to create a defense before the crime. We've about worn out the excuse of "oh he killed that person because he had a tough childhood" so we need some new excuse.

I can smoke a cigarette and it has a calming effect, but you don't see doctors going around diagnosing some stress disorder and prescribing a pack of cigarettes. In 20 years when all these children taking these medications for ADHD and the related imaginary diseases this country will be in ruin, because we have fried the brains of an entire generation.

by take some responsibility on Fri, 06/24/2005 - 21:02 | reply

On Asperger's and AD(H)D.

First, some background on myself (If you don't care, feel free to skip down to "My Opinion"):

I was reared in the "If the child acts up, it must be ADD" era, otherwise known as the late 1980s. Being diagnosed as "intelligent", yet "socially awkward", as well as a slurry of other things, most of which were a result of my daydreaming, and temper - I was given various drugs for this "disease."

Basically, they put a kid on speed, and wondered why he was up all night, and managing to go from a lower-end (on the right) bell curve, down to "standard", finally ending up in the "why even bother" mindset which manages to affect many children in mid/late highschool.

It was later discussed that I might have Asperger's, but no further testing was done in this vein - being that I dropped out of school and moved to another state. When I moved back to complete my high school diploma, none of this was discussed, or even bothered with due to my current home status being below sub-par.

I'm now nearly 30, and still socially awkward; but mostly because I choose to be - I don't enjoy being surrounded by more than a few people at a time, and due to an abusive childhood tend to steer away from work and social things which may be viewed as 'aggressive'.

My Opinion:

I believe the issue is a combination of changing social trends, the stronger emotional influence of the media, and the advancements in technology.

If you ever have the (dis)pleasure of sitting through an older television show, such as "I Love Lucy", or anything more than twenty years ago, you'll notice that despite working around the same simple plot line that is often used today, the guise of entertainment is less about the drama of the story, and the plot can last the whole (if not several) episodes.

The way things are often presented today are in a "quick-fire" method, where several things are forced upon the viewer at once. These shows often attempt to drastically "tug the heart strings" of the viewer, causing them to become engrossed with a character, and if that doesn't work, they often work in some other factor in an attempt to continue to gain an audience. This is done in several seconds, if not several minutes time. Children reared upon this (raised on television's social pulp) learn that emotions, as well as solutions can often be fast; and not to dwell upon an emotion, or a subject which does not amuse them - after all, it's fairly unimportant.

Rather than being raised with goals or purposes and having a lack of a parental figure during the child's youth, they're often turned to learn their earlier life's lessons this way. Sure, it's a long step from "Barney" to "E.R.", but cartoons often swiftly bridge this gap.

Not to blame this entirely on television, the world has changed within the last few decades than I could even imagine. In the 1980s, if you wanted to amuse yourself with music, you either turned on the radio, listened to a cassette, or (if you were lucky), MTV. Today, we have personal music playing devices which are capable of things which supercomputers were incapable of, then.

The internet slowly turned from an experimental educational system into a commercial product. In the 1980s, to be on the internet, you were (generally) either a scholar, an educator, or building ARPANET. In 1992, I was on the Internet through the local university - It was an amazing tool I could use to communicate with others (almost anywhere in the world), and obtain information on various subjects.

The internet is now a cesspool of commercial ventures, most notably pornography. Being that pornography is (sadly) quite a driving force between technology, it was required that things be faster, moving from a single dial-in BBS with one or two GIF files (which often took hours) to download to an instantaneous cornucopia of amusement.

This has perpetuated itself through (now) our children, as well as ourselves. Think of the last time you were annoyed when stuck at a red light, and you were capable of purchasing an item without expecting to be able to track it's progress immediately.

Anyway, this is entirely speculation, but remember it is entirely my own personal view.

by Shawn on Tue, 08/23/2005 - 09:45 | reply

Asperger syndrome is neither

Asperger syndrome is neither "mild" nor imaginary, and as for the "how did these kids get through school 50 years ago?" the answer is, they didn't. They were carted off to or abandoned in asylums and long stay hospitals and left there to rot, or lobotomised and left there to rot.

by a reader on Tue, 12/06/2005 - 19:24 | reply

It's real - I should know

I'm talking about Aspergers.

DXed at 32 in 1997, it explained a great deal about my previous life. All the problems I had both at school and at work - especially the latter. Before that time, I wondered what the heck was going on. What was I doing to deserve all the abuse and ridicule I was being force fed - and worse still not being protected from? And I was expected to know, from just being told "You're upsetting people - stop it". I had no instinct to be able to respond appropriately to this otherwise reasonable instruction, and I ended up getting blamed for virtually everything that happened.

This is the reality of an Aspie's adult life without being diagnosed. A recent poster said that 50 years ago Aspies and other people with behavioural difficulties were treated as mad and lumped in asylums. Absolutely right. We didn't want to know about anything different in those days. You either fitted in, or you were mad and needed the full treatment to bring you around. Thankfully for the most part we have grown out of that sick attitude.

Then again - to have people speculate that these issues represent "fake" diseases just gets my blood boiling, because it harks back to those days again. Maybe not the act of sending us Aspies into asylums, but the attitude that got us there all those years ago. We are supposed to be progressing through the concept of tolerance for those who are different - the concept that everyone is different. Being an Aspie can, in fact, be a benefit if the positives of being an Aspie are properly utilised. If this is done, then the Aspie can in fact be just as useful as any other person - and in the normal way as well.

Another point - there is also another factor that has changed over the years. 50 years ago, sometimes Aspies could get by. If they had a special interest that fitted a particular work place, they could leave school early and work their way through a job from a young age - with little need for qualifications. Now, you need degrees and diplomas for this that and the other, and to get into university you have to do things that previously you didn't have to. Also, the work place in general consisted of individuals with specific single skills. Now it's full of multiskilling and grey coloured flexibility. The work place for the Aspie of the past has gone so the disability had to be recognised, even though it always existed in the shadow of it's more pronounced brother - Autism.

I don't need to provide sources for my information. I'm talking through personal experience. What I have been through. It's all facts from my own life.

All us Aspies ask is to be understood for what we are. If we get abused, invariably we will respond in kind because that is the logical reaction. We will seek information, and when we are ignored we'll persist, and probably get abusive as well. It's frustration because we are not being understood (as opposed to not being agreed with - which is an all too common complaint) and we desire to be. Everyone wants to be understood and accepted for what they are. Achieving such a feat world wide is the secret to world peace IMHO. And that doesn't just go for disabilities either.

by a reader on Sun, 12/25/2005 - 10:08 | reply

Alright, I'll try not to make

Alright, I'll try not to make this too short for the benefit of being interesting.

Yes, you could say that Asperger's, ADD, and other illnesses are fake, based on the facts that their symptoms deal with relatively lucid things. However I, along with millions of other people, live in America, and there are other mitigating factors to be considered that you, my dear, may not have considered.

We live in a society where mental health is wrought with stigma and looked down upon. I know that for me it was bad enough when I got diagnosed with depression. However Asperger's and/or PDD took the cake for me. It doesn't just deal with the neurotransmitters, as you know, it goes into brain development. And kids like me, 16 year old me, don't want to be labeled that. AT ALL. In fact, I've avoided it like the plague for the past year. With that in mind, I don't think a high percentage of people would be simply fine and dandy with a diagnosis that likens one to being put in the same groups as those who are mentally retarded.

Another issue you brought up: that it could be just natural persuasion and that is wrong to change it. I have thought about this. However I have witnessed in myself (I'm not speaking for others) that it's not exactly the most beneficial to be socially isolated anyway. I'm sure many kids with Asperger's could be the new Einsteins or whatever, but many, many more are alone and perhaps suffering like me.

Keep that in mind.

Psychiatry is an enterprise as well as a field, and it depends on the people. I suppose it'd be up to oneself to decide if you wanted to remain untreated. I've had psychiatrists listen to me as much as I've needed. But my personal suggestion is that, even though your ideas are worth consideration, don't get carried away with the idea that the au natural Upcoming Prodigy With Asperger's is better off as a person. Forgive me, but such a notion even seems a little selfish to me.

by Weirdinthecorn on Wed, 01/04/2006 - 06:07 | reply

emo powa

Note the many moral judgements that are necessary to make any diagnosis according to this definition: "actively defies", "deliberately annoys" and so on. These are not deemed to be disease symptoms when a child does them to an intending kidnapper, or to the parents' political opponents at a demonstration, for example. These states of the child's brain become diseases only when a certain condition – disapproval – exists in the brain of another person – the parent or other authority. The treatment is also metaphorical and for ODD it consists of conversations and discipline. Again, this is very different from other diseases: bacteria are not great conversationalists, one cannot debate diabetes, but apparently ODD can be disposed of by talking to it.

The entire purpose of these diseases is, in fact, to give these vile "treatments" a gloss of medical and scientific respectability. Then no attention need be paid to whether the child is right to behave defiantly toward his parents in specific cases. No effort needs to be wasted on such fripperies as rational argument or considering that the child might have a point if they repeatedly refuse to obey their parents or say that they are bored in school. How very convenient for the force-users.

There is one last oddity to note. Professor Michael Fitzgerald of Dublin University has recently said that geniuses such as Socrates, Charles Darwin, and Andy Warhol may have had a mental disease called Asperger's syndrome characterised by not wanting to talk to people and having "restricted" interests with "abnormal" intensity. Now, suppose that having Asperger's syndrome for a while would help you to complete a great work on a "restricted" interest since you wouldn't have to spend time on conversations that would distract you from your work and you would be able to focus intensely on it. Might one not prefer to have Asperger's syndrome to being mentally healthy under such circumstances?

What does that make a person who "cures" it by force?

Alright, I'll try not to make this too short for the benefit of being interesting.

Yes, you could say that Asperger's, ADD, and other illnesses are fake, based on the facts that their symptoms deal with relatively lucid things. However I, along with millions of other people, live in America, and there are other mitigating factors to be considered that you, my dear, may not have considered.

We live in a society where mental health is wrought with stigma and looked down upon. I know that for me it was bad enough when I got diagnosed with depression. However Asperger's and/or PDD took the cake for me. It doesn't just deal with the neurotransmitters, as you know, it goes into brain development. And kids like me, 16 year old me, don't want to be labeled that. AT ALL. In fact, I've avoided it like the plague for the past year. With that in mind, I don't think a high percentage of people would be simply fine and dandy with a diagnosis that likens one to being put in the same groups as those who are mentally retarded.

Another issue you brought up: that it could be just natural persuasion and that is wrong to change it. I have thought about this. However I have witnessed in myself (I'm not speaking for others) that it's not exactly the most beneficial to be socially isolated anyway. I'm sure many kids with Asperger's could be the new Einsteins or whatever, but many, many more are alone and perhaps suffering like me.

Keep that in mind.

Psychiatry is an enterprise as well as a field, and it depends on the people. I suppose it'd be up to oneself to decide if you wanted to remain untreated. I've had psychiatrists listen to me as much as I've needed. But my personal suggestion is that, even though your ideas are worth consideration, don't get carried away with the idea that the au natural Upcoming Prodigy With Asperger's is better off as a person. Forgive me, but such a notion even seems a little selfish to me.

by a reader on Mon, 02/27/2006 - 21:11 | reply

ADHD

It seems that the label ADHD sounds more 'serious' than hyperactivity. I hear so many bleeding heart stories from parents attempting to excuse the actions of their children, as some lunatic seven year old spits in the face of my newborn baby who is asleep in her pram in the park, and then calls her some nasty expletive. The parent gets all up herself when I say 'umm would you mind removing your child away from my baby' the response is almost automatic 'my son has ADHD he cant help it' ummm, well I cant help it either, so move your child away from my baby before I throttle it! It seems that people with well behaved kids, or mothers with the ability to do the responsible thing and stop their kids terrorising innocents, are the ones being victimised simply because their kids dont have ADHD. So I ask these defensive up themselves parents, Are your children born with a full vocabluary of expletives? Something tells they arent, so try some other excuse for your laziness, other than hiding behind an americanised over diagnosed label which basically translates to ' your child is a little shit, and your parenting skills are tantamount to child abuse'

by Emma Flavell on Mon, 03/20/2006 - 18:13 | reply

Jews Must Have Invented ADHD

Sincerely,

A Posh Jew

by a reader on Mon, 03/20/2006 - 20:05 | reply

Aren't they clever

Gosh! So they invented ADHD aswell as the right to use a 2000 year old book as deeds to their land! Very impressive.

by Emma Flavell on Tue, 03/21/2006 - 00:21 | reply

Jews Psychiatrists and the Mentally Ill

Jews, Psychiatrists, and the Mentally Ill, for interesting reasons, often excite the predatory fantasies of the masses. For interesting reasons, they just have to go away (or be defined as useless, evil, or non-existent).

All have historically challenged our deepest feelings about ourselves.

Bigotry has many interesting forms.

by a reader on Tue, 03/21/2006 - 15:42 | reply

Don't flatter yourself

You may Omit 'Jews' and 'Shrinks' from the 'found to be fascinating' category for a start. Mental illness however, is a worthy subject to be fascinated by, but let's not confuse fascination with bigotry, and let's not be prejudiced against a person simply because they don't fall into any of the three categories you mentioned.

by Emma Flavell on Tue, 03/21/2006 - 17:39 | reply

These mental disorders are so fake...

which proves me going from straight Fs to straight As in school after treatment is simply me changing my opinions to fit those of my parents, right? Um, no. It's my successful treatment.

You claim that these aren't connected to any dysfunction of the body, which is false. Issues with synapses in the brain cause chemical imbalances. You may be tempted to come out and say "there's no such thing as a chemical imbalance". However, if that were true, taking the drug ecstasy wouldn't be harmful because the chemical flushing of serotonin wouldn't occur because that would cause an imbalance.

Also, while your statement of "why wouldn't everyone want Asperger's then?" might seem insightful, all it really does is enshroud the fact that the negative symptoms stunt the positive effects of the extra intelligence.

by Asperger's Patient on Tue, 06/20/2006 - 03:18 | reply

Quite Right

If the attention deficit and obsessiveness associated with Asperger's illness are traits that are mostly learned over many years (like many personality traits are learned), then a chemical change could not rapidly change these characteristics. Chemicals do not encode logical thinking, approaches to problems, and behavior styles. Drugs therefore can not quickly remake deeply learned personality traits.

But chemical changes can in fact dramatically and rapidly decrease obsessiveness and improve attentional capacity. Therefore attention deficits and obsessiveness are not deeply learned personality traits.

They therefore must be, to some extent, chemically created characteristics.

by a reader on Tue, 06/20/2006 - 04:29 | reply

Re: Quite Right

To reach the conclusion in your last paragraph from the preceding one, you seem to be assuming that if a trait can be dramatically and rapidly decreased by chemical changes, it follows logically that it must have been chemically created (as opposed to learned). Are you?

by Editor on Tue, 06/20/2006 - 16:08 | reply

straight Fs to straight As

Thanks for your first-hand account.

As a matter of curiosity, what is your attitude towards other people's first-hand accounts such as the ones here?:

... while researching treatments for my own son's autistic symptoms ... I had been researching since we began our journey to cure our son for a little over a year ... we were willing to try anything to halt the headbanging, stimming, and unsettling behavior my then 18 month old son repeated day after day. We saw almost immediate improvement with the first dose of remedy. In the past year and a half my son has gone from a toddler who did not speak, play, or interact much to a happy, sweet, loving, typical 32 month old who by all means is normal - talks, laughs, plays, and tests out at or above his age on all developmental tests. People meeting him for the first time can not believe he was ever on the spectrum.

by Editor on Tue, 06/20/2006 - 16:30 | reply

Re: Re: Quite Right

I'm an optimist. Learning and thinking will create the knowledge that enables us to change virtually any phenomenon whatsoever, for better or for worse. Knowledge created from learning and thinking may one day prevent stars from collapsing (as stated -- I think -- in David's the Fabric of Reality.)

Since the consequences of learning and thinking can cause virtually anything, learning and thinking can in principle be argued to cause and treat cancer, heart disease, strokes, and virtually any medical/psychiatric condition whatsoever, including attention deficit disorder and obsessiveness. But the causes of these conditions are ultimately so multifactorial, that it is not helpful to say that "learning" causes or treats them, unless one specifies the type of learning that causes or treats them, which can then be evaluated scientifically for accuracy.

Simple (known) chemical changes from medication can precipitate the immediate creation and destruction of attentional capacity and obsessiveness, but not core personality traits and mental retardation. Simple chemical changes can precipitate the immediate creation and destruction of cancer, heart disease, and strokes but not congenital deafness or homosexuality/heterosexuality.

Given our knowledge and the environment we live in, when it is plausibly thought or known that specific chemical changes, but not specific known types of changes in learning, can precipitate a condition and its reversal; the condition is said to be mostly "chemically based". Examples of chemically based conditions include heart disease, cancer, strokes, attention deficits, obsessiveness, and paranoia.

Given our knowledge and the environment we live in, when it is plausibly thought that or known that specific changes in learning, but not changes in chemistry, can precipitate a condition and possibly reverse it; the condition is said to be mostly "learning-based". Relative fear of spiders and certain types of personality characteristic are changed mostly by learning.

Given our knowledge and the environment we live in, if conditions are thought to be created by differences in the overall growth of the organism, which when completed is not changed by learning or changes in medication, the conditions are called "developmentally" based. For these conditions, the overall "structure" of the organism or its brain is thought to be responsible. Developmentally based conditions include many forms of mental retardation, Aspergers, homosexuality/heterosexuality, and congenital deafness.

Chemicals do not contain information about ethical principles, logical thinking, approaches to problems, and empathy. These critically important human attributes are very much learned.

But in some ultimate model of reality, perhaps the behaviors associated with altruism and empathy, according to some reductionists, could be "explained" on a "low" level by chemical reactions. And in some future reality, perhaps the collapse of most stars will be best explained as a consequence of the choices of people.

But in this reality, empathy is a powerful explanatory factor in understanding human relations. And gravity is a powerful factor in explaining why stars collapse.

So the conditions of this environment -- this reality -- matter. The ease with which individuals are capable of thinking their way out of cancer, heart disease, or attention deficits is certainly relevant. For all practical purposes, people have grave difficulty using thought alone to improve these conditions. So we consider these conditions primarily chemically based, and treat them accordingly.

And when someone is afraid of spiders, we don't talk to them about "chemical imbalances" but instead about how he or she can learn to be more comfortable around these organisms.

Ultimately we can say that virtually anything can be caused by "learning" and by "chemicals". But we apportion causality as suits practicality, given the reality that we have. We just don't know what causes any of these conditions; whether heart disease, cancer, or attention deficits. So man is more spirit than substance when this helps him; but the opposite, when needed as well.

by a reader on Wed, 06/21/2006 - 02:51 | reply

Re: Re: Straight F's to Straight A's

Has the method utilized been studied using carefully controlled experiments?

by a reader on Wed, 06/21/2006 - 03:07 | reply

Learned condition

Editor,

Do you think cancer is caused less by learning than attention deficit disorder?

by a reader on Wed, 06/21/2006 - 21:16 | reply

I see different places

Highschool was only one year back for me; and despite being an aspie I highly enjoyed it. I can't say I fit in, but my exceptional abilities lead to respect and acceptance. I didn't focus on fitting in, it wasn't easy, but I just did my own thing and made a place for myself.

From this string of comments I have the impression that aspies are viewed as different or separate from the mainstream. The catch is that there is no mainstream. I see many small streams; and some austrian decided to name one of them aspie.

My roommate has covered himself with body piercings and tatoos. He wants to separate himself from the norm; but in doing so has become part of the group of people covered in Tatoos and body piercings.

I go as far as to say that all people can be labeled and put into groups based on traits. In Highschool there were the socialite girls (and guys) gossiping in tight clothes; The kids who would sit on the sidewalk wearing hoods smoking dope; the athletes; the artists; the academics; the cheerleaders; the "Gangstas"; etc.

I see Asperger's as just another such group. The difference being that this group was cataloged in the 1940's by some Austrian doctor rather than MTV. An aspie is more than just an aspie. Knowing that an individual is homosexual or dresses like a rock star is entirely different from knowing the individual. Having or lacking Asperger's syndrome is one of only many traits that make an individual unique.

Aspie is just a name given to a group of people. No-one should define themselves or others as simply "an aspie" we're all so much more.

by a reader on Tue, 09/12/2006 - 07:24 | reply

Aspies

Hi, a reader,

You seem perfectly sane and lucid, not mentally ill. Perhaps you were misdiagnosed?

I don't really want to question your story. It's just that one of the tactics used by people who defend mental illness is to try to pretend that normal people are never misdiagnosed, or worse, properly diagnosed as ill.

If you could tell us a bit about the methods with which you were diagnosed, that might be informative. For example, were they very scientific?

If this is private, or you're at all uncomfortable, please don't answer. Also, if anyone else has experience with this, please do feel free to answer.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/blog/>

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 09/12/2006 - 07:45 | reply

I see different places

Dear Elliot Temple.

My previous post was not intended to be about me personally; I was stating my opinions about Asperger's syndrome. I opened the topic with a brief and undetailed autobiography because I felt it necessary to put my message into context. You seem to share in my opinion that a piece of writing carries little meaning if the source is not identified (You don't trust the report of my Asperger's without knowing more about who was behind it). You have not provided any information about yourself; and as a result your message lacks depth.

I find your response offensive and close minded. My time in highschool was anything but normal, but it was truthfully enjoyable. You also appear to doubt that an aspie could be (in all humbleness) a skilled writer.

I have no wish to argue the merit of my diagnoses at this time. Tell me more about who you are and why you feel qualified to judge a man's mental state based on a single piece of writing. Please pay more attention to the point I was trying to make in the body of my message.

by a reader on Wed, 09/13/2006 - 03:18 | reply

Re: I see different places

Dear A Reader,

I don't believe personal evidence is required. However, proponents of mental illness make what I believe are false, factual claims. Facts, personal or not, could refute those.

I didn't mean to say that people with Asperger's Syndrome cannot be sane and lucid. I meant it the other way: it's silly to say that sane, lucid people are mentally ill. Any system of diagnosing people that reaches absurd conclusions, is broken.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/blog/>

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 09/13/2006 - 05:50 | reply

I see different places

I was hoping to pass the time by engaging in some sort of debate, but it looks like we are more or less on the same page.

My Diagnosis was based on the results of several hours (spread out over weeks) of mental testing. In the end the doctor (an employee of the school district) showed me a chart indicating that I was above average in most areas but off the charts (literally) in some others. A "normal" human's mental abilities would all lie along the same line.

I don't consider myself mentally ill. I get by in society better than some. There is no treatment for Asperger's syndrome so as I said it's a diagnosis and nothing more. I always get stuck when I try to explain exactly what I am. I'm me, no more and no less.

by a reader on Wed, 09/13/2006 - 07:12 | reply

Not Clear

"I don't really want to question your story. It's just that one of the tactics used by people who defend mental illness is to try to pretend that normal people are never misdiagnosed, or worse, properly diagnosed as ill."

Elliot,
Who is it that defends misdiagnosis?

by a reader on Tue, 09/19/2006 - 02:08 | reply

Confusing

"However, proponents of mental illness make what I believe are false, factual claims. Facts, personal or not, could refute those."

Which claims are factually false? You make many allegations, but provide few examples.

by a reader on Tue, 09/19/2006 - 02:14 | reply

Sane and Lucid

"It's silly to say that sane, lucid people are mentally ill."

Why? If your arthritis is treated and you no longer have pain, does that mean you don't have arthritis? Some insane people can be made sane with medications. Does that mean they no longer have a mental illness?

And why must untreated people with mental illness be insane or lacking in lucidity? Most untreated people with mental illness are quite sane and quite lucid.

by a reader on Tue, 09/19/2006 - 02:22 | reply

Allegations; etc

Re Allegations: An example of a false factual claim I've heard is that psychiatrists are almost always careful and thorough, like good scientists. There may exist some who are, but there certainly exist a lot who are not.

Re: Sane and Lucid: I meant that one can be diagnosed as mentally ill while acting sane and lucid. Let me pose a question: If psychiatry keeps very high standards about how to carefully and scientifically diagnose people, and makes it very clear that any other practices would be utterly irresponsible, then why is it a standard use of the English language to call people "mad", "crazy", "insane", "mental"

(ie, mentally retarded), and similar when we disagree with them strongly or we think they are ignorant? How did this blatant slur on psychiatry creep into our language? Where did it come from?

Re: Misdiagnosis: No one defends misdiagnosis, but some people claim they don't happen (much), or otherwise try to discount/ignore the issue. However a quick Google finds:

<http://mentalhealth.about.com/library/sci/0101/blbddd0101.htm>

[a study suggests] that between 15% and 40% of patients with bipolar disorder are misdiagnosed.

That's a lot of errors. If you can offer an epistemically sound procedure for correcting errors in diagnostic procedures, I'd be interested to hear it. It must pass the test that harshly-raised children often later thank their parents: you can't take someone's word for whether something helped him or not. He could be wrong. And whatever you may come up with, there will remain the issue of whether it is actually in widespread use or not.

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 09/19/2006 - 03:06 | reply

More Allegations

"Re Allegations: An example of a false factual claim I've heard is that psychiatrists are almost always careful and thorough, like good scientists. There may exist some who are, but there certainly exist a lot who are not."

Is there any factual reason to believe that psychiatrists are less careful than other physicians? What factual reasons do you have to believe that psychiatrists are not careful? Why have you singled out psychiatrists, as opposed to cardiologists?

by a reader on Tue, 09/19/2006 - 15:09 | reply

Sane and Lucid

"Re: Sane and Lucid: I meant that one can be diagnosed as mentally ill while acting sane and lucid."

Why should someone not be diagnosed as mentally ill while being sane and lucid?

by a reader on Tue, 09/19/2006 - 15:12 | reply

Slurring Psychiatry

"then why is it a standard use of the English language to call people "mad", "crazy", "insane", "mental" (ie, mentally retarded), and similar when we disagree with them strongly or we think they are ignorant? How did this blatant slur on psychiatry creep into our language? Where did it come from?"

I don't understand the question. Part of it seems to be -- "Why do we 'slur' psychiatry and the mentally ill?"

Because of the nature of their work, psychiatrists, like Jews, often point out to people what they don't want to hear. The mentally ill, in general, understand this. Others, faced with a challenge to the philosophies they hold dear, would rather bury people than ideas.

Why do we 'slur' psychiatry and the mentally ill?

Mostly because we are ignorant. But also because we are affraid, bigoted, and evil.

by a reader on Tue, 09/19/2006 - 16:27 | reply

Allegations; Sane+Lucid

Re: Allegatgions:

<http://www.settingtheworldtorights.com/node/498>

The linked thread is about how you can get psychiatrists to say things, and diagnose people, for political reasons. if this happens frequently with cardiologists diagnosing enemy politicians as "might die at any moment" so no one will vote for them, i'm unaware of it.

Another issue is that (within our culture) a cardiologist needs to know very little about a person's ideas. The patient describes some symptoms and some of their behaviors, answers some simple factual questions, little more.

But psychiatry is much harder. The person's knowledge plays a huge role. Every mental symptom could be explained by ideas, so that must be considered at every step. If the person has some kind of knowledge the psychiatrist doesn't know about, that could easily cause a misdiagnosis. And it must be the case that patients have relevant knowledge that their doctors don't understand very frequently. Psychiatrists can't and don't know everything.

"Why should someone not be diagnosed as mentally ill while being sane"

Because that would be a misdiagnosis. (I assume you mean the words in some special way, but I don't know what way, so you tell me.)

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 09/19/2006 - 16:50 | reply

Careful diagnosis

"Re Allegations: An example of a false factual claim I've heard is that psychiatrists are almost always careful and thorough, like good scientists. There may exist some who are, but there certainly exist a lot who are not."

"The linked thread is about how you can get psychiatrists to say things, and diagnose people, for political reasons. if this happens frequently with cardiologists diagnosing enemy politicians as "might die at any moment" so no one will vote for them, i'm unaware of it."

Do you have any factual data supporting your allegation that psychiatrist are less careful diagnosticians or less thorough in ruling out diagnostic mimics (conditions that look alike) than caridologists?

by a reader on Thu, 09/21/2006 - 01:44 | reply

Sane and Lucid

"Why should someone not be diagnosed as mentally ill while being sane"...

Reader

'Because that would be a misdiagnosis. (I assume you mean the words in some special way, but I don't know what way, so you tell me.)'

Lucid -- easily understood; completely intelligible or comprehensible: a lucid explanation.

Sane has several meanings but usually implies "having or showing reason, sound judgment, or good sense: sane advice."

The overwhelming majority of those with mental illnesses are completely lucid and sane, if one utilizes the standard meaning of these words.

by a reader on Thu, 09/21/2006 - 01:53 | reply

Rationality: Independent of Time

"If you can offer an epistemically sound procedure for correcting errors in diagnostic procedures, I'd be interested to hear it. It must pass the test that harshly-raised children often later thank their parents: you can't take someone's word for whether something helped him or not. He could be wrong. And whatever you may come up with, there will remain the issue of whether it is actually in widespread use or not."

Psychiatrists change diagnoses utilizing the same procedures that others do. We create differential diagnoses (list of possible diagnoses given the symptoms) then rule out every possibility (as best as we can) until only one diagnosis is left. If all diagnoses are ruled out, we have to start over with a new list of possibilities.

I guess you are saying (?) that what one argues later in time is not necessarily more rational than what was argued earlier. That is obviously true.

It doesn't matter if people change their mind. The issue is what is the best rational formulation possible. An original statement or a changed statement could be more plausible.

But what does that have to do with the validity of psychiatric diagnosis or treatment?

by a reader on Thu, 09/21/2006 - 02:12 | reply

Incorrect Diagnosis

"[a study suggests] that between 15% and 40% of patients with bipolar disorder are misdiagnosed."

To properly diagnose bipolar disorder (type 1) requires approximately 5 years. That compares favorably to, for example, multiple sclerosis diagnoses. And a high percentage of people are not diagnosed with heart disease prior to having a heart attack, either.

Although psychiatrists certainly do misdiagnose bipolar illness, the majority of incorrect diagnoses are made by family doctors, who think they are treating depression. Their use of antidepressants (particularly without utilizing anti-bipolar medications) decreases the subsequent effectiveness of treatments for bipolar illness, with subsequent brain damage and worsening course of illness.

So why were you claiming that psychiatrists are misdiagnosing bipolar illness, when the overwhelming majority of incorrect diagnoses are made by family physicians?

by a reader on Thu, 09/21/2006 - 02:28 | reply

Politics

Re: Allegations:

"<http://www.settingtheworldtorights.com/node/498>

The linked thread is about how you can get psychiatrists to say things, and diagnose people, for political reasons."

And you can get non-psychiatrists to say things, as well.

<http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/articles/A48119-2005Mar18.html>

by a reader on Thu, 09/21/2006 - 02:35 | reply

Re: Politics

LOL. You have linked to a politician saying stuff, who used to be a heart surgeon, and now thinks doing this will further his political career. He's making a moral statement to get political support. And no one got him to say this. He's doing it himself.

Note that he's a former heart doctor talking about a brain issue. No one considers this to be expert advice. He hasn't even visited the patient. Why? Because this isn't a serious medical opinion, and it's so obvious that it isn't worth bothering to make it less obvious.

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Thu, 09/21/2006 - 13:10 | reply

Re: Careful diagnosis

I reckon the diagnostic criteria for 'Oppositional Defiant Disorder', as reproduced in the original posting, constitute ample factual evidence of a lack of care in the psychiatric profession generally.

A priest may sincerely believe that he believes the words he utters during his rituals, and pronounce them with great care. But that doesn't mean that religious services are a good source of information about how the universe works, or how to better live one's life.

So it doesn't really matter with how much care and sincerity one tries to apply them, if the diagnostic criteria are vague to begin with.

For example, every criterion begins with the word "often".

How often? Twice a day? Once per fortnight?

Why also "lasting for six months"? Is it just a coincidence that that period equals exactly half the time it takes the earth to orbit the sun?

By contrast, I imagine that diagnosing diseases of the heart involves, in addition to some judgement, the use of tests with simple numerical results.

For example, if the potassium concentration in the blood plasma exceeds [x] mmol/L, or, if ultrasound scanning indicates that branch [y] of the cardiac artery is blocked, or, if the cardiogram cycle contains abnormal component [z] with a weighting exceeding .18

(These are all made up. The intention is to give a flavour of what I think real medical science looks like.)

by Tom Robinson on Thu, 09/21/2006 - 23:18 | reply

5 Years

"To properly diagnose bipolar disorder (type 1) requires approximately 5 years."

So are all patients told (repeatedly) that for the first five years they haven't been properly diagnosed, and may not have bipolar?

I have looked at these links

http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Bipolar_disorder

http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Current_diagnostic_criteria_for_bipolar_disorder

They fail to mention how long it takes to diagnose, and all the criteria listed are vague. This is evidence of a lack of careful thinking, or a lack of careful explaining to the public.

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Fri, 09/22/2006 - 00:34 | reply

Re: Politics

In malpractice cases in hundreds of courtrooms across the nation, one doctor says something for the defense, and another says something very different for the prosecution.

Disagreement, money, and politics are a daily part of medical practice, psychiatric and otherwise.

by a reader on Fri, 09/22/2006 - 01:56 | reply

Exact Diagnosis

Tom Robinson,

You seem to assume that precise differences in numbers (e.g. a cholesterol level of 176 vs. a cholesterol level of 178) means something independent of the predictive value of the number.

Pathological lesions and lab values are not (in general) causes of phenomena. Therefore their only value is to predict things.

Do you have evidence to suggest that psychiatric diagnoses do not predict things of relevance to people or that medical diagnoses predict things better?

by a reader on Fri, 09/22/2006 - 02:19 | reply

Re: 5 years

"They fail to mention how long it takes to diagnose, and all the criteria listed are vague. This is evidence of a lack of careful thinking, or a lack of careful explaining to the public."

David Deutsch says that 90% of physicists do not believe in the multiverse, and the general public (in general) does not understand the concept, at all.

Is this evidence of a lack of careful thinking, or evidence of a lack of careful explaining to fellow physicists (let alone physicists apparent inability to explain this to the general public)?

You seem to be assuming that if the general public does not understand a concept, that means the science is wrong or the explanations are bad. Is this your assumption?

by a reader on Fri, 09/22/2006 - 02:29 | reply

Re: 5 Years

David Deutsch has publicly said things about this issue, including criticizing other physicists. You, on the other hand, haven't taken the stance that 90% of psychiatrists are stupid about important issues, rather you have been defending them. Further, having the wrong view of physics is much less dangerous than having the wrong view of bipolar.

The rate of believing in the multiverse is pretty good among physicists where it matters much to their work, btw.

"You seem to be assuming that if the general public does not understand a concept, that means the science is wrong or the explanations are bad."

Physicists aren't responsible for explaining physics to people (with the exception of physics teachers, authors, TV commentators, etc). And if it was ruining people's lives to not believe in some view of physics which is uncontroversial among experts, then physicists would need to do something about that, or they would be criticized for irresponsibility, by me and others.

Psychiatrists have patients, and they are responsible for talking to these people and correcting them. Given the proportion of people who have seen professional psychiatrists, how can the amount of knowledge of what you say is uncontroversial among psychiatrists, be so tiny? And isn't it irresponsible that they don't do something about this blight on our society? Won't somebody think of the children? :)

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Fri, 09/22/2006 - 02:34 | reply

Psychiatry

"A priest may sincerely believe that he believes the words he utters during his rituals, and pronounce them with great care. But that doesn't mean that religious services are a good source of information about how the universe works, or how to better live one's life."

You seem to be assuming that psychiatrists act as priests. If so, do you have any evidence to suggest that psychiatrists act in more priestly ways than other physicians?

You also seem to be assuming that psychiatrists are not helping people or perhaps that psychiatrists have not demonstrated that they help people, or perhaps that they do not help people as much as other physicians. Do you have any evidence to support this assertion?

by a reader on Fri, 09/22/2006 - 02:38 | reply

Re: Psychiatry

You seem to be assuming that psychiatrists act as priests

...

You also seem to be assuming that psychiatrists are not helping people

I attempted to argue that the ODD diagnostic criteria are careless and vague.

Since they have not apparently been condemned and rejected by the rest of the profession I take this as evidence of intellectual carelessness among psychiatrists generally.

The comparison with priests was meant to make the point that educated people can mean well and yet talk utter gibberish. This wouldn't matter so much if their loose talk didn't harm people and impede progress -- but it does.

I accept that priests and psychiatrists may help some people indirectly. (Their gibberish certainly does not.)

However, in the case of ODD they are not trying to help the children concerned. This means that the children cannot possibly be regarded as patients.

They are assisting teachers and parents in a rotten scheme by attempting to legitimise the harm done to children who wish to have more control over their own lives.

by Tom Robinson on Fri, 09/22/2006 - 12:35 | reply

Re: Exact Diagnosis

You seem to assume that precise differences in numbers (e.g. a cholesterol level of 176 vs. a cholesterol level of 178) means something independent of the predictive value of the number

Yes. It's a minor point, which is illustrated by the ODD diagnostic criteria. I regard the combination of the 6 month period referred to in the preamble (exactly half a year) and the stipulation that at least 4 out of the 8 criteria must be met (exactly half) as being somewhat suspicious.

This is because there's no obvious causal connection between human personality differences and the movements of planets. (Psychiatry and astrology seem to be similar in this respect.)

Also, exact ratios aren't common when it comes to raw data in natural science. The numbers are usually 'messy'. (But not always. e.g. the ratio of toes to legs on a normal human body is exactly 5.)

In brief, the numbers are too parochial. One suspects that they probably haven't been discovered, but rather chosen for operational reasons.

The major advantage, of course, of diagnoses based on numerical data and true/false laboratory tests is that they are more objective and have more empirical content.

They more easily rule out healthy people and they do so with less room for error. They depend far less upon what the diagnostician ate for breakfast.

By contrast, with a little jiggery pokery, any normal person could be diagnosed with ODD.

by Tom Robinson on Fri, 09/22/2006 - 15:25 | reply

Diagnostic Criteria

The argument is not that psychiatric diagnostic criteria don't predict anything relevant to humans, it is that they don't predict what they are purported to.

But before we continue, let's agree on a set of diagnostic criteria to discuss. Are the ones in the original post the correct diagnostic criteria? If not, can you direct us to some that are correct?

One in the original post is "2. often argues with adults". Assuming we are both adults, I think we both have that :)

-- Elliot Temple
curi@curi.us
Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Fri, 09/22/2006 - 15:30 | reply

Speculation

How can the amount of knowledge of what you say is uncontroversial among psychiatrists, be so tiny?

I don't understand what you are saying, but it sounds speculative.

by a reader on Sun, 10/01/2006 - 03:31 | reply

Speculation again

"The argument is not that psychiatric diagnostic criteria don't predict anything relevant to humans, it is that they don't predict what they are purported to."

What is it that is purported and what is it that is inaccurate?

by a reader on Sun, 10/01/2006 - 03:33 | reply

Inconsistency

"This is because there's no obvious causal connection between human personality differences and the movements of planets. (Psychiatry and astrology seem to be similar in this respect.)"

Numbers, for example the length of time that people have had symptoms and the amount of shift of an ST segment on an EKG, predict things. Do numbers have anything to do with the rotation of the planets around the sun? Yes.

So numbers are involved in one field and in another.

Why is that relevant?

by a reader on Sun, 10/01/2006 - 03:37 | reply

Vague = Not Reliably Diagnosed

"But before we continue, let's agree on a set of diagnostic criteria to discuss. Are the ones in the original post the correct diagnostic criteria? If not, can you direct us to some that are correct?"

The issue of what the diagnostic criteria are, is irrelevant to this discussion. Unless you have medical training, your ability to diagnose migraine headaches or bipolar disorder by examination; your ability to use an ophthalmoscope to diagnose Wilson's disease or decide whether a specimen could be a cancer illness, is problematic. A mathematical formula may seem to be uninterpretable by you, but that does not mean it can not be understood by a mathematician (or by you if you are trained)

It is not whether you think the criteria are vague, it is whether people who use them do. And "vagueness" of diagnostic criteria in the medical field is determined scientifically by whether diagnoses are reliably made. In fact, psychiatric diagnoses are reliably made by psychiatrists and others trained to do so (by ruling out mimics). And these diagnoses predict quite a lot about whether people will experience pain in the future, damage to organs, and other problems of relevance.

by a reader on Sun, 10/01/2006 - 04:41 | reply

Diagnostic Criteria

For the terms in the diagnostic criteria which have technical meanings, you could tell them to us, and explain roughly how they are used. I think we'll understand each other better if you share some of your knowledge about this.

Also why are criteria published which happen to have coherent non-technical meanings that could easily confuse and mislead people?

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Sun, 10/01/2006 - 08:12 | reply

Diseases

Given the proportion of people who have seen professional psychiatrists, how can the amount of knowledge of what you say is uncontroversial among psychiatrists, be so tiny? And isn't it irresponsible that they don't do something about this blight on our society? Won't somebody think of the children?

by Scott Brison on Tue, 11/28/2006 - 09:59 | reply

Conspiracy theory

There is a difference between believing that quantum mechanical ideas add to our knowledge and being able to utilize equations derived from quantum mechanics. People ask quantum physicists for help utilizing their knowledge and people ask psychiatrists for help in utilizing their knowledge, as well. So the fact that people ask others for help does not mean that there is no legitimate knowledge created by the person being asked.

People know about and utilize psychiatric/psychological knowledge. The National Institutes of Health, the National Science Foundation and virtually all reputable scientists throughout the world recognize the substantial contribution to global knowledge that neuropsychiatrists, psychiatrists, neurobiologists, and psychologists have made.

The minority is not always wrong. But please be aware that you (Scott Brison), if you are a scientist, are very much in the minority in apparently not understanding that neurobiological damage and dysfunction cause many well-recognized psychiatric conditions.

In fact I know of only one major scientist, in the entire world, who does not understand that major psychiatric illnesses like schizophrenia and bipolar illness are brain diseases.

There may be a few others whom I am not aware of...but please....when the editors posit that conditions like schizophrenia and bipolar illness are "fake" and "superstitions", they are suggesting that virtually every major scientist in the entire world has been the victim of a hoax.

Remarkable.

by a reader on Thu, 12/07/2006 - 00:51 | reply

Re: Conspiracy theory

Could there be no reason why the majority of scientists in a field might come to hold a false explanatory theory, other than that they have been victims of a hoax by conspirators?

And whether it is we who are in error or the majority of psychiatrists - isn't error the natural and unremarkable state of human beings? Isn't it knowledge that is remarkable?

by Editor on Fri, 12/08/2006 - 00:58 | reply

Training and ODD

"a reader" (the most recent one) is suggesting that because there are people who can use a set of rules (which otherwise seem vague) with some "training", their vagueness is irrelevant. This reasoning is flawed, because in the case of ODD it appears that the vagueness is inherent and not because of the lack of training of those who question the rules. The claim is that the trained are in a vague business while insisting they provide a precise service. The fact that they have received a "training" does not provide an answer. (The example of the priests is a good analogy for conveying the point.) If the "training" in question is to be part of the answer, it must be shown that it would technically alter the meaning of some of the rules for diagnosing ODD from their common-sense meaning.

The World's argument does not say that when a child shows the symptoms in the ODD definition, there is no problem. It says that the problem is not one localized in the child, but equally importantly, in its parents. It means that the word "illness" is carelessly used for ODD, with the harmful consequence that it is the child that must be treated. Instead, a rational solution to the problem must include the parents and their relationship with the child, complete with the usual standards we apply to human relationships, including human rights and freedoms, and their ethical implications.

-- Cyrus Ferdowsi, <http://libiran.blogspot.com>

by Liberal Iranian on Fri, 12/08/2006 - 12:29 | reply

Other Than Conspiracy?

The previous claim seemed unclear, but perhaps was saying that because lot's of people ask psychiatrists questions or seek help or something, the fact that people are asking somehow means that there is no knowledge in the field. That claim obviously makes no sense.

It is not that the majority of psychiatrists are incorrect, but rather that virtually every major scientist in the entire world is incorrect. As I stated, I can think of only one who disagrees with the idea that schizophrenia and bipolar illness, for example, are brain diseases.

It certainly is possible that virtually every major scientist is incorrect. In the abstract, all knowledge is provisional, and will ultimately be found to be untrue (or not completely true).

Why do you think that virtually every major scientist in the entire world disagrees with you? How are you able to see the truth so clearly?

by a reader on Fri, 12/08/2006 - 18:26 | reply

ODD

My points were specifically about ODD, not schizophrenia or bipolar personality. I am not sure if the same reasoning can be applied to these, but it is something that can be looked into. Is there a majority opinion about ODD being a brain disease among psychiatrists?

-- Cyrus Ferdowsi, <http://libiran.blogspot.com>

by Liberal Iranian on Sat, 12/09/2006 - 02:35 | reply

ODD

Virtually all psychiatrists would say that ODD is not a brain disease.

But impulsiveness can be a consequence of a brain disease.

Schizophrenia and Bipolar illness are not "personalities".

by a reader on Sat, 12/09/2006 - 03:05 | reply

A disorder is not the same a

A disorder is not the same a disease.

by a reader on Sat, 12/09/2006 - 05:04 | reply

disease and freedom

For me, using a label such as "disease", "illness", "personality", etc. would not so much matter per se as the ethical implications of their use regarding freedom and personal choice. Let me use the word "condition" as one that includes all such labels. I think the most important aspect of our discussion is not so much the theory of which label is the best one to use, but the meta-theory of what should be done with them.

So far as a person diagnosed with a condition (be it one with physical symptoms such as a heart condition or one with mainly behavioral symptoms such as schizophrenia, bipolar or ODD conditions) can still make decisions regarding his life and convey them in an intelligible fashion to the people around him, he must have the freedom to do so. A failing heart is considered by almost everyone to be an "illness" perhaps because its sure outcome is death, but the person whose heart is failing is ultimately the one who must have the choice to decide what to do with it. The same goes for the subject of this thread.

Physicians and psychiatrists are free to label and categorize these conditions, research the ways they can be treated to this or that end, but they cannot claim an authority over someone's life, be it a child or an adult, on the basis that the psychiatrists (or physicians) have labeled his or her condition as a disease. At the root of it, all conditions have a brain component, a genetic component and an environmental component to varying degrees. It is good to examine and determine these components so we know what to do with a particular condition if the person having the condition wishes so.

Those who have conditions that stop them from conveying their wishes to others fall in a different class, and accordingly different ethical principles must be used in such cases. However, a complete shutdown of communication is very rare.

There is another aspect of the labels that is of importance for our meta-theory, and that is the localization of symptoms. If as you say, schizophrenia is a brain disease (there seems to be no direct evidence for this yet), then a symptom such as "Social/occupational dysfunction" (according to wikipedia) is not acceptable, since this symptom is localized in many people at once, not just the person under diagnosis. If and when such symptoms are part or all of the diagnosis, which apparently is the case for ODD, the treatment must also include those others in whom the symptoms are localized.

Do you find this meta-theory opposite to yours? Why? Is there any evidence based on specific details of the labels used for schizophrenia or bipolar behavior (or any other condition for that matter) that would disfavor it?

-- Cyrus Ferdowsi, <http://libiran.blogspot.com>

by Liberal Iranian on Sat, 12/09/2006 - 10:27 | reply

No Disease Without Damage to People

"Those who have conditions that stop them from conveying their wishes to others fall in a different class, and accordingly different ethical principles must be used in such cases. However, a complete shutdown of communication is very rare."

Agreed. And most psychiatric patients, with schizophrenia or otherwise, can, should, and do make their own decisions. Occassionally they and others are not in a position to make decisions consistent with their own rational beliefs, and so need our help.

"There is another aspect of the labels that is of importance for our meta-theory, and that is the localization of symptoms. If as you say, schizophrenia is a brain disease (there seems to be no direct evidence for this yet), then a symptom such as "Social/occupational dysfunction" (according to wikipedia) is not acceptable, since this symptom is localized in many people at once"
What constitutes "direct evidence" of a brain disease? (if your instinct is to say "a pathological lesion", then ask yourself whether pathological lesions are causes or effects of illness? And then ask yourself whether a reliably observed behavior could not be, like a pathological lesion, an effect of an illness?)

Despite any pathological lesion (e.g. neurofibrillary tangles), a person does NOT have Alzheimers disease unless he or she has "clinical symptoms"....i.e. unless experts deem him to have symptoms of Alzheimer's disease like memory loss. So the symptoms of the illness must exist, to some extent, in the mind of someone else....an "expert" in the field.

A person does not have epilepsy (despite any positive EEG finding) if he does not have clinical symptoms of illness (like behavioral movement of limbs). So the symptoms of the illness must exist, to some extent, in the mind of someone else....an "expert" in the field. So are epilepsy and Alzheimer's disease "fake" and "superstitions"?

Indeed, the same is true, but in more subtle ways, of all illnesses and diseases. Their definition depends upon the way in which the manifestations of illness affect the living. For example, a pathological slide of a prostate gland, in a 50 year old, can lead to a diagnosis of a cancer disease, but will not do so in a 90 year old.

Why? Because the pathology will likely hurt the 50 year old, but not the 90 year old. If you will, the cancer pathology will hurt the "social and occupational functioning" of a 50 year old, but not a 90 year old. No objectively defined pathological lesion defines an illness or disease, unless it is correlated with a process that damages the psychology of people.

So "damage to people" is inherently a part of the conception of all diseases and illness, psychiatric and otherwise. So all definitions of disease include "damage to people" or "interference with social and/or occupational functioning." Statistical aberrations ("pathological lesions") are irrelevant unless they hurt people. Your body is covered with them, but you don't have millions of diseases!

Even the Szazian hero Virchow, the great pathologist, recognized that dead people have no disease (because nothing in their dead body will affect their "social and occupational functioning")!

A disease is simply not a disease unless it hurts people!

by a reader on Sat, 12/09/2006 - 19:56 | reply

Who? Whom?

So the symptoms of the illness must exist, to some extent, in the mind of someone else....an "expert" in the field.

This is not what I meant. The expert's mind is using a theory that identifies a certain symptom in the patient. What exists in the expert's mind is a theory, not a symptom. The symptom exists (or is supposed to exist) in the patient. This applies well to the loss of memory in Alzheimer's. But a "social/occupational" dysfunction might or might not be localized in the patient under diagnosis. When someone is fired because he is introvert or less communicative (the case for bipolar people I guess) this "social/occupation" dysfunction is localized in the patient and his boss. It is a problem alright, but its solution must include the boss and the occupation itself. (Another example: think of the people who are fired because of their sexual orientation. Where is the symptom localized? What is the solution?)

The "damage to people" guideline constitutes the problem. But who is to be diagnosed? To whom do we apply our treatment? These solution strategies entirely depend on where the symptoms are localized.

-- Cyrus Ferdowsi, <http://libiran.blogspot.com>

by Liberal Iranian on Sat, 12/09/2006 - 22:13 | reply

Damage to People

Cyrus Ferdowsi,

One can strike the "social and occupational" dysfunction piece from schizophrenia, but then one would have to strike this conception from all conceptions of illness.

But first, try to think of any way that you can understand illness or disease that does not involve psychological damage to people or its variants (pain and suffering). Can you come up with a definition of disease that does not involve psychological damage to people? I certainly haven't been able to. Let me know what you come up with.

By the way, it is almost always the individual who determines that a given condition is causing him "social and occupational dysfunction" or "pain" or "psychological damage".

Homosexuality and Congenital Deafness are developmental conditions, not diseases. There is no progressive damage to the brain. So though there may be social and occupational dysfunction with homosexuality, there is no progressive deterioration of the brain, unless others discriminate against homosexuals (hit them in the head, for example!) Indeed, there may be many cultures in which these conditions are advantageous.

Asperger's and many forms of attention deficit disorder are also not diseases, because they also do not involve progressive damage to the brain (unless people treat these individuals badly as well).

Like homosexuality and congenital deafness, Asperger's and many forms of attention deficit are developmental conditions, but whether, for example, attention deficit is a "developmental DISORDER" is tricky.

In certain cultures, there may be certain advantages to attention deficits (actually there is no deficit...just rapid shifting of attention).

In this culture, those with the condition usually want help. We can help them with medications and other interventions, so we do. They say they want to function better in this culture.

If there were medicine that could convert someone from homosexuality to heterosexuality (or vice versa) and the individual wanted it, do you think it should be prescribed? Like plastic surgery, I think most doctors would do it. We treat attention deficits for the same reason. The person's performance increases, in this culture.

It is harder, but perhaps not impossible, to think of a culture in which those with Asperger's would do better than the rest of us. So Asperger's is pretty clearly a "disorder", albeit a developmental disorder.

In terms of Alzheimers, I'm glad that you see that a diagnosis can be made with a theory and ones eyes and ears. You apparently see that this method can be a better diagnostic tool than a lab specimen! You are one of the first who has responded (on this site) who recognizes that. And so we diagnose epilepsy, Alzheimer's, schizophrenia, bipolar illness, and migraine headaches, in the same way.

Yes, "damage to people" is subjective, but all definitions of illness depend upon this, unless you can come up with an alternative. But, your definition should allow you to figure out why the millions of pathological abnormalities in your body, are not illnesses.

by a reader on Sun, 12/10/2006 - 00:13 | reply

Living Beings

"When someone is fired because he is introvert or less communicative (the case for bipolar people I guess) this "social/occupation" dysfunction is localized in the patient and his boss. It is a problem alright, but its solution must include the boss and the occupation itself."

Note that the definition of the mental illness, Alzheimer's dementia, includes the definition, http://www.medterms.com/script/main/art.asp?\(articlekey=2940\)).

"Significant loss of intellectual abilities such as memory capacity, severe enough to INTERFERE WITH SOCIAL AND OCCUPATIONAL FUNCTIONING."

All illnesses include this type of subjective component in their definition. Usually the sufferer himself says that he is experiencing pain, social problems, etc.

But your point is well taken. Social and occupational dysfunction is usually more of a consequence of an illness, not a symptom, per se. But if the illness were not in some way subjectively hurting the person, even if not socially and occupationally, then I don't think most doctors would consider it an illness.

Doctors in general include psychological consequences to people in the definition of illnesses (e.g. pain and suffering) as a way of recognizing that illnesses happen to living people, but not to stones.

by a reader on Sun, 12/10/2006 - 01:31 | reply

Definition of Disease

Can you come up with a definition of disease that does not involve psychological damage to people?

I may or may not, depending on what I want to do with the proposed definition. I have no problem with including "pain and suffering" in a definition of "disease" and excluding that from "developmental condition" and/or "disorder." As I said, I am more concerned with the way these definitions are used for taking action with respect to the individuals, and the ethical consequences of those actions. If an individual is seeking help for a "disease" or a "disorder" it is of course no one's business to tell him he is not allowed to receive it if it is being offered based on mutual agreement. But you see, in this statement, I have not mentioned the disease's or disorder's definition. It is based on the meta-theory of what to do with any such definition. If some people try to use a particular definition to argue against this statement or for a different statement, their definition must have included a new meta-theory in it already.

I don't think identifying the source of the "damage to people" is necessarily subjective. I think The World's original post is actually arguing that in the case of ODD, the source is objectively localized in the parents as well as the child. As such, the diagnosis that excludes the parents is false.

-- Cyrus Ferdowsi, <http://libiran.blogspot.com>

by Liberal Iranian on Sun, 12/10/2006 - 03:57 | reply

Your Point?

Cyrus Ferdowsi,

We have no disagreement that the overwhelming majority of exchanges between people should be voluntary.

Is there an additional point that you are making?

by a reader on Sun, 12/10/2006 - 04:10 | reply

More than that...

"I don't think identifying the source of the "damage to people" is necessarily subjective."

Agreed. But I did not claim it was "necessarily subjective." I said pain and suffering, a component of all illness, is to some extent subjective.

"I think The World's original post is actually arguing that in the case of ODD, the source is objectively localized in the parents as well as the child. As such, the diagnosis that excludes the parents is false."

The editor's of "The World" claim that all mental illness is "false", "fake", and a "superstition". They do not just refer to oppositional defiant disorder. And they attack a charity that specifically helps the mentally ill.

Regardless of whether some people could misapply a diagnosis of "oppositional defiant disorder" to a child, when the parents are in fact behaving badly: The editor's have engaged in name-calling, attacks against charities that are helping people, and have refused to use a scientific approach to understanding brain diseases like schizophrenia that destroy people's lives.

Schizophrenia is no "superstition" and virtually every eminent scientist (except one that I know of) understands this.

I therefore think the editor's approach is morally and scientifically wrong.

by a reader on Sun, 12/10/2006 - 04:42 | reply

Asymptomatic Illnesses

The editor's suggest that latent Hep. C is an "asymptomatic disease". But they suggest that mental illnesses like Schizophrenia and presumably Alzheimers can't be "asymptomatic", so Hepatitis C is a real illness and mental illness is "metaphorical". Real illnesses can be asymptomatic, but not pretend illnesses.

But latent Hep. C, in a fully informed and rational person, is not asymptomatic, either.

People worry about latent Hep. C and treat it with interferon, because there is a distinct probability that it will injure the physical body and the psychology of the victim later in life (Hep C will cause pain and suffering and death). So informed and rational people worry (right now!) about damage to their body and mind that may yet occur, because of processes in their liver that may be beginning now.

Worry is a psychological symptom existing in the present. So Hep. C is not asymptomatic. A rational and informed person should be worried about it in most cases.

Alzheimer's, Schizophrenia, and latent Hep. C., can be "asymptomatic" if the person does not subjectively worry about the behaviors and states of mind he is exhibiting (memory loss, paranoia, etc.), and if he does not worry about the state of his liver. But in most cases, a rational and informed person should worry about these behaviors and the state of his liver.

If it is known that exposure to Hepatitis C is not going to injure someone, because the body responded adequately to it in the past, then the person is asymptomatic, but he also doesn't have a disease!

So there is no philosophical distinction between Schizophrenia, Alzheimers and latent hepatitis C. None of these diseases are truly asymptomatic in fully informed, rational people.

Doctors do use the term "asymptomatic disease", but as a way of trying to convince people to worry more (be more symptomatic!) and therefore act aggressively to take care of their health, when they may not be aware that something is damaging them.

But strictly speaking, it is a contradiction in terms to speak of a disease that is truly asymptomatic over the long-term.

by a reader on Sun, 12/10/2006 - 15:32 | reply

Huh?

Worry is a psychological symptom existing in the present. So Hep. C is not asymptomatic. A rational and informed person should be worried about it in most cases.

Are you suggesting that a doctor should or does factor in the "worry" as a symptom of Hepatitis C? Can you explain how this should be or is done in a real-world scenario? For instance, should or could two patients, one with and the other without worry (for whatever reason), be diagnosed differently everything else being equal?

Doctors do use the term "asymptomatic disease", but as a way of trying to convince people to worry more (be more symptomatic!) ...

So, by your reasoning, are doctors making people ill?

-- Cyrus Ferdowsi, <http://libiran.blogspot.com>

by Liberal Iranian on Mon, 12/11/2006 - 08:26 | reply

Asymptomatic Disease

Worry/Concern is a rational way of bringing the expectation of future pain and suffering into our current consciousness, so we can act appropriately.

If latent Hep. C did not cause the rational person to expect future pain and suffering, it would not be an illness.

So yes, physicians do need to take into account whether a rational person would expect a given condition to cause pain and suffering, in their consideration of whether that condition is an illness.

I'm afraid that one can not logically take subjective considerations out of conceptions of illness, otherwise rocks and dead people would be considered "ill".

Again. Try to come up with a conception of illness that does not include subjective elements like "loss of needed functioning" or "pain and suffering."

If you try to argue that just the presence of a "lesion" defines an illness, your conception must take into account that you have millions of statistically aberrant structures (lesions) in your body, right now, yet you do not have millions of diseases.

by a reader on Mon, 12/11/2006 - 18:40 | reply

Objective Conception of Illness

I think it is possible to have an objective conception of illness. Before I lay that out, let me try to point out a few difficulties with your type of subjective conception of illness:

1. You say, "If latent Hep. C did not cause the rational person to expect future pain and suffering, it would not be an illness." But clearly, even in this statement, you are separating the "future pain and suffering" from "latent Hepatitis C" itself. Objectively the two are related as cause and effect. Including the effect in the cause is logically untenable.
2. But let's take this approach seriously for a moment. You say, "physicians do need to take into account whether a rational person would expect a given condition to cause pain and suffering, in their consideration of whether that condition is an illness." How does this apply to ODD? What is the condition there that is causing pain and suffering? It seems, even though you proclaim a subjective conception of illness, you still need to objectively identify the causing condition. How do you do that for ODD, where all we have are subjective symptoms?
3. Furthermore, if we are to include consequent "pain and suffering" which seems to be your defining element of an illness, what is to stop us just there? Why not include other consequences of the causing condition, say, consequent economical or political effects, etc.?

Now to my suggestion: I think that you are mistaking the "problem situation" for the "illness." As I wrote earlier, the pain and suffering constitutes a problem. But when we use the word "illness" or "disease" in their common usage, we are referring to the causes of the problem. Our conception of these causes must be objective and especially if they are being attributed to a person (e.g., claimed to be the child in case of ODD), the attribution must be objective in the sense that the cause must be localized in that person. The solution is then in finding a way to resolve the problem at the level it can be acted on. This last step is also subject to ethical rules.

-- Cyrus Ferdowsi, <http://libiran.blogspot.com>

by Liberal Iranian on Mon, 12/11/2006 - 23:05 | reply

A Further Element of Objective Conception of Illness?

I do not mean to deny that "pain and suffering" or other consequences of a condition might be relevant to the notion of illness. But I do think that they must be taken into account with caution. On the other side of the discussion here, the approach defended by "a reader" can lead to ~~problems~~ difficulties s/he might not wish to cause.

Suppose person A comes down with cancer X, which would eventually kill him. I think we would agree that this would include "pain and suffering." However, if person A does not find it a problem (he might wish to die for personal reasons, etc.) "a reader" would seem to think that he does not have an illness. I regard this conclusion useless, and potentially problematic. Why? Suppose further that this is the first case of cancer X, a new type of cancer previously unknown. Should we not categorize it as an illness, make it part of the cancer research efforts, etc.? I prefer to answer, "we should" for reasons contained in our common-sense notion of illness: The reason is that we may conclude, objectively, that there are people who would find the "pain and suffering" or the ensuing death a problem, were they found to have cancer X.

So, if "pain and suffering" is to play a part in our conception of illness, it still needs to be in an objective way. There may be other constraints I have not thought of.

-- Cyrus Ferdowsi, <http://libiran.blogspot.com>

by Liberal Iranian on Mon, 12/11/2006 - 23:52 | reply

ODD is Not an Illness

"But let's take this approach seriously for a moment. You say, "physicians do need to take into account whether a rational person would expect a given condition to cause pain and suffering, in their consideration of whether that condition is an illness." How does this apply to ODD? What is the condition there that is causing pain and suffering?"

I don't consider ODD an illness.

by a reader on Tue, 12/12/2006 - 01:39 | reply

Not Clear to Me

"You say, "If latent Hep. C did not cause the rational person to expect future pain and suffering, it would not be an illness." But clearly, even in this statement, you are separating the "future pain and suffering" from "latent Hepatitis C" itself. Objectively the two are related as cause and effect. Including the effect in the cause is logically untenable."

Latent Hep C is an infection, but not an illness unless it ultimately causes a rational and informed person to expect pain and suffering. For example, if someone had 3 months to live because of a cancer illness, if he then contracts a Hep C infection from a blood transfusion which becomes latent, he does not have a latent Hep C illness, though he has an infection, because the infection will not cause him pain and suffering, early death, or any other problematic complication.

An infection may or may not cause an illness, depending upon whether it does or does not damage the person. You claim this statements is somehow logically untenable. In what sense?

by a reader on Tue, 12/12/2006 - 01:58 | reply

Doctors Focus on the Patient

"Furthermore, if we are to include consequent "pain and suffering" which seems to be your defining element of an illness"

No it is not the defining element of an illness. It is part of the definition of an illness.

"Why not include other consequences of the causing condition, say, consequent economical or political effects, etc.?"

That would go under social and occupational dysfunction!

Why not consider political effects of abnormal biological processes in the doctor's office?

Because in general people want their doctor to focus on the abnormal biological processes in their own body that are causing their own pain and suffering, not the suffering of other people.

by a reader on Tue, 12/12/2006 - 02:15 | reply

Not Going to Argue with Myself!

"Suppose person A comes down with cancer X, which would eventually kill him. I think we would agree that this would include "pain and suffering." However, if person A does not find it a problem (he might wish to die for personal reasons, etc.) "a reader" would seem to think that he does not have an illness."

Ahh. Forgive me, but I am just not following your argument. You are specifying that there is an abnormal biological process (the cancer cells). You are also telling me that a rational and informed person would likely think that this biological abnormality is going to cause pain and suffering. So by the criteria I have given, he has an illness.

Why would I disagree with that? Why is it relevant that he also wants to kill himself?

by a reader on Tue, 12/12/2006 - 02:39 | reply

Pain and Subjectivity

"The reason is that we may conclude, objectively, that there are people who would find the "pain and suffering" or the ensuing death a problem, were they found to have cancer X."

Notice something very interesting about what you said. I think you have just determined that a person has an illness, not just by looking at an abnormal physical part in a person's body, but also by noting the effect of that abnormal part, on a person's mind!

You say (?for a biological abnormality to be an illness?)that there are "people" (not necessarily the person with the illness) "who would find the pain or suffering....a problem."

So you seem to be agreeing that the person is not ill unless other rational people believe that the person with the biological abnormality should or will perceive pain and suffering from the abnormality?

Hmm. If this is your belief, you sound suspiciously like a psychiatrist, actually like most MD's. (Sorry to insult you, if you think that I am).

But would not one person's conception of what should cause pain and suffering vary from culture to culture? Indeed, would it not vary from person to person?

Don't you think different, equally rational people, could think that the same biological abnormality causes different amounts of pain and suffering?

So is there not any subjectivity involved in determining what is painful?

I'm still waiting for your objective criteria that defines what an illness is.

by a reader on Tue, 12/12/2006 - 03:51 | reply

Clarification

Ok, so let me ask a clarifying question: when you say, a rational person would expect illness to cause pain and suffering, do you take this expectation to be subjective or objective? If it is objective, how can it be found out without reference to a particular person? If it is subjective, why do you not follow the step in my argument that person A could rationally but subjectively not worry about having cancer X?

-- Cyrus Ferdowsi, <http://libiran.blogspot.com>

by Liberal Iranian on Tue, 12/12/2006 - 03:56 | reply

RE: Pain and Subjectivity

I said, "objectively, there are people who would find the 'pain and suffering' or the ensuing death a problem..." (added emphasis). The emphasis here was on there being a problem and the process is expressly objective. It does not refer to a particular person, especially the one under diagnosis.

It is also important to note that all our discussions have been with the assumption that there exists some underlying cause, given different labels in different comments, e.g. a "lesion" or an "abnormal biological process", etc. I am arguing that the objective existence of such an underlying cause is the substantial part of the notion of illness and the problems it creates. Without them, there are only problems, no illness or disease. Especially, the sole existence of "pain and suffering" or other subjective symptoms, even in principle, does not constitute a disease, but only a problem situation.

-- Cyrus Ferdowsi, <http://libiran.blogspot.com>

by Liberal Iranian on Tue, 12/12/2006 - 04:14 | reply

So Dead People Have Illnesses?

"But when we use the word "illness" or "disease" in their common usage, we are referring to the causes of the problem."

This is not correct. We do not know the cause of virtually any illness.

But I think it is illogical, as well.

So if a person has a staph. aureus infection, the illness is the staph aureus and the problem is the pain and suffering?

So if the person then dies of the infection, the staph is still on the person. If the staph. is the illness, then why isn't the dead person still ill?

If you say, "Because he doesn't have a problem", then you are agreeing that a person is only ill if he has a cause of a problem AND a problem.

So illness, by your own reasoning, must imply cause and problem, not just cause. Right?

And what one rational person determines is a "problem" is not necessarily what another rational person determines is a problem. Therefore illnesses have objective and subjective components.

by a reader on Tue, 12/12/2006 - 04:27 | reply

Dead People, Illnesses and Problems

So if the person then dies of the infection, the staph is still on the person. If the staph. is the illness, then why isn't the dead person still ill?

He is not ill for all practical purposes simply because he is dead. We could still consider him ill, but that usually wouldn't be useful or solve any relevant problem.

I think I should state again that I am not so much after fixing a definition for disease or illness. What I think is important is how we use the notion of illness to solve our problems and its ethical consequences. Here is my description of the situation: People, symptoms (including pains) and illnesses are all parts of a problem situation. It seems to me that when we say a person has a certain disease, what we mean is that in order to solve the corresponding problem, the best solution would be to treat the disease, in great part because of the implied causal relationship. Since the disease is normally attributed to a single person, we are arguing that the best solution to the problem (having pain or any inconvenience, for instance) is for the said person to undergo treatment. This argument has ethical consequences. For it to be a good argument, the disease must be identified and attributed to the said person objectively. If instead there are only subjective symptoms spread over a number of people, I do not see why the best way to resolve the problem situation would be to pick and choose some of the symptoms in one person and treat them with no regard to others. In such cases, I prefer not to use the label "disease" and its implied treatment because I find it leads to inferior solutions, or even non-solutions, and also to ethically unacceptable actions.

-- Cyrus Ferdowsi, <http://libiran.blogspot.com>

by Liberal Iranian on Tue, 12/12/2006 - 05:01 | reply

Dead People. No Illness

"He is not ill (a dead person with staph aureus in his body)for all practical purposes simply because he is dead. We could still consider him ill, but that usually wouldn't be useful or solve any relevant problem"

But you apparently say that the staph infection is the illness! If you don't say this, what is the illness? So if a live person then dies of a staph. infection, the staph is still on the person. If the staph. is the illness, then I ask again, why isn't the dead person still ill?

If you say "for all practical purposes" a dead person is not ill because "it's not useful" or because "it wouldn't solve any relevant problem", then you are agreeing that a person is only ill if he has the infection and a problem from the infection.

Also, if the staph. aureus infection is the illness, then why isn't every other infection in your and my body an illness? If we are healthy, we are currently infested with millions of infections, therefore millions of illnesses?

If you say that these infections are not illnesses because thinking of them as "illnesses" does not help us "to solve a relevant problem", then an infection is not an illness if it does not solve a problem. So an infection must solve a problem to be an illness. So an infection plus a problem creates an illness, by your own reasoning!

So again, your own reasoning would seem to indicate that an illness has at least two parts, a biological cause or abnormality, and a problem created by the cause.

Why is it relevant that illnesses have at least these two conceptual parts?

You say,

"(S)hould we not categorize it (cancer) as an illness" because,

"The reason (that cancer is an illness in a person who wants to die) is that we may conclude, objectively, that there are people who would find the "pain and suffering" or the ensuing death a problem, were they found to have cancer X."

I think your argument is very insightful. Just like above, you seem to be saying that cancer is an illness because of two factors.

1. There is an abnormality and

2. The abnormality causes an objective person to think that the cancer would cause a problem, for example "pain and suffering" and "an early death". (Psychiatrist's use "social and occupational dysfunction", rather than "pain and suffering", because they tend to think that social and occupational dysfunction can be more objectively defined than "pain and suffering".) But perhaps you are correct that "pain and suffering" is better.

But the second factor you mention in defining an illness, ("People...would find the "pain and suffering" or the ensuing death [to be] a problem, were they found to have cancer"), requires an observer to be very careful and insightful.

To imagine whether a given physical abnormality would cause pain and suffering in someone, or to "objectively" see in a patient that he is in pain and suffering, requires the observer to be able to accurately form a theory of mind of someone else, especially if the observer has never had the illness.

So to summarize what logically follows from your own arguments.

A person has an illness because doctors (or others) have a theory that a patient has a biological/physical abnormality.

In addition, the doctor has a theory that the mind of the victim, or a similarly situated person, should experience the abnormality as something that causes a problem, for example pain and suffering.

So if you follow your own logic, Mr. Ferdowski, you are saying (even if you don't wish to admit it), that someone has an illness, if and only if the illness, by objective standards, is an abnormality of the body that causes a problem for the mind.

I basically agree with that except that I think that rational people can reasonably disagree, to some extent, about whether a given biological abnormality causes a problem for a person. So the determination of what is a relevant problem for a given person is partly "objective" but also partly "subjective".

by a reader on Wed, 12/13/2006 - 00:31 | reply

Knowledge and Definitions

I hope you see that we are not just debating a definition of illness, but an entire approach to knowledge. I have repeated many times that I am not after fixing a definition for illness. Definitions must come after we have solved the problem, as a nice way of summing up the ideas used in our solution, but never we begin with them in order to gain knowledge. I think you are debating a definition of illness, as a word, and its meaning. This is the trap of essentialism, which is a false theory of knowledge.

To make my point clear, I may ask you this: Can dead people be rich?

-- Cyrus Ferdowsi, <http://libiran.blogspot.com>

by Liberal Iranian on Thu, 12/14/2006 - 17:48 | reply

Can Dead People be Rich

No!

by a reader on Mon, 12/18/2006 - 22:10 | reply

The "Pots and Kettles" error in logic

What is it called:

When the editors of the World call the concept of mental illness "fictional", "fake", a "worthless" superstition, and an "abrogation of intellectual and moral standards?"

What is it called when someone then says:

"Well then, what do you mean by 'mental illness'?"

And what error in logic occurs when ones apparent inability to answer this obvious relevant question becomes justified by calling the answer "a false theory of knowledge" and "essentialist" thinking?

by a reader on Tue, 12/19/2006 - 02:26 | reply

More Pots and Kettles

"It is also important to note that all our discussions have been with the assumption that there exists some underlying cause, given different labels in different comments, e.g. a "lesion"...."

This comment is very much in error. Virtually no known lesion is a "cause" of an illness. In fact, virtually all lesions are effects of illnesses, not causes. We know the cause of very few illnesses.

If lesions are effects of illnesses, then why are they important? Because they are biological abnormalities that are reliably identified and predict future pain and suffering to the individual, in virtually any cultural context, in the absence of appropriate treatment. So the specific definition of "lesion" is irrelevant. What is important is that there are reliably identified biological entities that are a consequence of a biological process. And these entities can be identified and predict future pain and suffering in virtually any cultural context.

That is why many mental illnesses are as real as any other illnesses. Alzheimers is a real (mental) illness, because memory loss of a certain variety is a reliably identified consequence of a biological process. The presence of the memory loss (and other findings) predicts future pain and suffering, to a large extent independent of cultural context.

Similarly, schizophrenia is a real illness, because a certain type of hallucination is a reliably identified consequence of a biological process. The presence of the hallucination (and other findings) predicts future pain and suffering, to a large extent independent of cultural context.

Diabetes is also a real illness because a certain type of lab finding (elevated fasting blood sugar) is reliably identified in the blood and is a consequence of a biological process. The presence of the elevated sugar (and other findings) predicts future pain and suffering, to a large extent independent of cultural context.

So the issue is not that there are entities defined as "lesions" present, so an illness is now present because of the lesions. The issue is what do the lesions mean?

Insisting on the presence of a "lesion" for something to be defined as an illness, is in fact the "essentialist" error that you suggest that I make. It fails to take into account the meaning of a "lesion".

Once one understands the meaning of the concept of a lesion, then entities other than lesions (e.g. EKG findings, X-ray findings, shaking behavior in seizures, memory loss in Alzheimers, hallucinations in schizophrenia), become equally diagnostic of abnormal biological processes. And therefore the presence of these findings (some lesions, some not) can be used to diagnose illness, mental or otherwise.

by a reader on Tue, 12/19/2006 - 03:48 | reply

What is important

... is that there are reliably identified biological entities that are a consequence of a biological process. And these entities can be identified and predict future pain and suffering in virtually any cultural context.

This is very much the right answer and what I have been trying to defend as an "objective theory of illness." If you subscribe to this objective methodology, we should not have much to disagree with. That we may not "know" in a positivist sense the cause of a certain illness, does not mean that when we call it an illness we are assuming such causes exist, objectively. What I said before about objectivity and the localization of the symptoms as a measure of the presence of the "biological processes" in the above quote, directly follow from such a view.

My understanding is that "mental illnesses" attacked by The World do not satisfy these criteria of objectivity and localizations. They are not illnesses in the sense that their treatment will solve the problems they are purported to have caused. This clearly applies to ODD and ADHD, the subjects of the original post in this thread, and the claimed "mental illness" of Mr. Jose Sequeira, the subject of another thread.

Do you disagree?

Also, your negative answer to the question "could dead people be rich?" would beg the question "why?" if you were to insist to define "rich" independently of the problems or the situations in which the notion arises. For instance, if "rich" refers to the material wealth, it would still be there after the death of the person, etc. The point is that, the concept of "rich" as part of a solution to any problem only arises in situations where the person is alive. From your answer, I expect that you agree with the same reasoning when we replace "rich" with "ill."

-- Cyrus Ferdowsi, <http://libiran.blogspot.com>

by Liberal Iranian on Tue, 12/19/2006 - 07:52 | reply

Rich States, Value Laden Processes

Being rich is for the most part, a value-neutral state.

Being ill, on the other hand, is a value-laden process.

In my opinion, a person being ill is not analogous to a businessman being poor (or rich).

A better analogy to a person having an illness, is a homeowner witnessing the construction of his mostly uninhabitable house.

A homeowner, like a doctor with incomplete knowledge of material science, might measure (reliably) the rate at which the walls being constructed are cracking, and perhaps the rate at which the door is warping, and these measurements may indeed help to determine when the house will be fully uninhabitable. The growing cracks are analogous to the consequences of an abnormal biological process (for example, "lesions"), but the cracks are not the cause of the problem. Rather they are consequences.

The degree to which the house is "uninhabitable" is to some extent objective, but is to some extent subjective. The consequences of the faulty design and the materials used (for example, the rate of growth of the cracks and the warping of the door) are objective to the extent they can be accurately measured.

Note that the rate of growth of the cracks in the walls, the rate of warping of the door, the amount of heat loss from the house, etc.

could all be time-sensitive "signs" of impending inhospitability of the house, though of course it would be better if the observer had a full knowledge of material science so would not have to make measurements at various points in time.

Unfortunately, doctors don't have a full knowledge of biological processes at this time, so we use time-sensitive measures and a number of different measures to determine the relative condition of the metaphorical "house".

Tom Robinson says:

"regard the combination of the 6 month period referred to in the preamble (exactly half a year) and the stipulation that at least 4 out of the 8 criteria must be met (exactly half) as being somewhat suspicious.

This is because there's no obvious causal connection between human personality differences and the movements of planets. (Psychiatry and astrology seem to be similar in this respect.)"

What Mr. Robinson fails to understand is that time-sensitive measurements and a number of different types of measurements, can help one to predict the evolution of conditions like the future uninhabitability of the house. Mr. Robinson apparently does not understand that "time" and "number" are used in many discussions, not just amongst those who believe in astrology.

Only when the physics of a given state is completely understood, will evolution from that state be completely understood. In the absence of this, we measure conditions over time to help us make predictions. This is a very imperfect process, but necessary at this point.

by a reader on Thu, 12/21/2006 - 02:41 | reply

Clarification

"My understanding is that "mental illnesses" attacked by The World do not satisfy these criteria of objectivity and localizations."

You slipped the word "localization" in your wording and that confuses me.

Seizures occur in brains, like the processes causing the mental illness Alzheimers, the mental illness schizophrenia, the mental illness bipolar disease, and the mental illness depression.

We do not diagnose seizures by an EEG, however, which seems to localize certain types of abnormal neural activity to various parts of the brain. The reason we don't do that, however, is that if someone has well-documented behavioral signs of seizures, even if there is no EEG abnormality, the behavioral signs are more predictive of future brain damage and pain and suffering, than the EEG is. Similarly, if a person has an EEG seeming to demonstrate "seizures", yet there is no behavioral abnormality, the patient does not have seizures, again because the seizure behavior is more predictive of future problems.

Similarly, I don't know whether you consider Alzheimer's patients to have "localized lesions". Certainly there is a problem with the brain. We know that because we have ruled out other causes of memory loss and we see visible damage to the cortex in many patients.

But the damage to the cortex, however widespread, does not diagnose Alzheimers disease. The memory loss, in the absence of other better explanations for the memory loss, does diagnose the illness. So if a patient has all the signs and symptoms of Alzheimers disease and no better explanation for the memory loss, and at autopsy there is no brain pathology found, the person is still considered to have been correctly diagnosed with Alzheimers disease. The "localized" brain pathology does not diagnose the illness, the particular type of memory loss does.

The reason is simple. The memory loss is a better predictor of future pain and suffering (e.g. further decline in memory) than the brain pathology that "localizes" a lesion.

Similarly, when we look at the brains of those with schizophrenia, in those who have never been on medication, and also by serial sequential brain scanning at disease onset, we note a devastating apoptotic process. Indeed, the damage to the cortex occurs faster than in Alzheimers disease (but not for as many years). But we do not use exaggerated apoptotic processes as diagnostic tools.

The reason is simple. Noticing the hallucinations and noticing the particular production of certain speech patterns is more predictive of future brain damage and future pain and suffering.

The same is true for depression, in which the brain damage appears more localized than in Alzheimers (the first probable corrective surgeries on the subgenual cingulate are currently being performed). Surgery will probably be a reasonable procedure to treat depression, long before it is a reasonable procedure to treat Alzheimers, for example.

Bipolar illness and many other mental illnesses progressively damage the brain, as well, but are diagnosed, like seizures, Alzheimers and schizophrenia, by the behavioral effects of the malfunctioning brain.

ADHD is certainly a neurologically based condition. It can be induced (by damaging specific parts of the right frontal lobe of the brain). And the effects of that damage on the right frontal lobe of the brain can be corrected by using medication altering neural functioning in this part of the brain (the same medication used to treat the standard variety of attention deficit disorder.)

The reason standard ADHD is not an illness is that it is a state, like being "rich" or "poor". The condition does not seem to evolve from a neurological perspective. So in most people, ADHD is not a process, like an illness, because there is not progressive damage to the brain. This is unlike the mental illnesses I mentioned above (Alzheimers, schizophrenia, depression, etc. in which the untreated brain is progressively damaged. Actually, we have evidence that treating schizophrenia and depression with certain types of drugs protects the brain from the evolving neurological damage, but such evidence is lacking in Alzheimer's disease.

Having ADHD is like having a long nose or being gay. But most consider ADHD a disorder, but not homosexuality or a long nose, because in most cultural contexts, having ADHD is disadvantageous.

But some of us can think of cultural contexts in which those with ADHD have certain advantages, so it is debatable whether it is a disorder. But please be aware, people can be made ADHD by manipulating the brain, and this condition can be mostly corrected by chemically manipulating the same part of the brain.

In terms of the editors of Setting the World to Rights, read their post "Science and Superstition", before saying they are not referring to illnesses like schizophrenia (if you are saying that). They have completely misrepresented the views of the charity "Rethink" which supports those with serious mental illness, including those with schizophrenia.

Any fair minded reader would find that post to either be immoral or to reflect very poorly on the knowledge of the editor's or the research they did prior to writing the post.

And they have never retracted anything of what they said. Indeed, they have defended it.

by a reader on Thu, 12/21/2006 - 04:53 | reply

I am infuriated.

As someone who DOES have ADHD and Asperger's, I must say that this article enrages me. They're not "fake"; they are very real problems, but it's obvious that you don't give a damn, instead focusing on those who pretend they have them but are just using it to get sympathy and/or get away with being assholes. While it is true that some fake it, many people truly do suffer from these disorders. As far as I can tell, you're just saying that we're ALL liars and jackasses, and I find that absolutely reprehensible.

by Shippinator Mandy on Sat, 01/27/2007 - 04:05 | reply

Fake

Hi Shippinator,

When the article says the diseases are fake, it does not mean to deny that people have real and problematic conditions. It only means to deny that the conditions are the diseases they are purported to be.

The debate is about whether the problem is bad ideas, or a physical or physiological malady. You aren't a liar.

-- Elliot Temple
curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Sat, 01/27/2007 - 21:23 | reply

Please read an abnormal psych

Please read an abnormal psych textbook before arguing things like this. Your ignorance is astounding.

The DSM is not meant to be used by laymen. Used by laymen, anyone could have any disorder. There is more to a diagnosis than knowing the DSM criteria.

The DSM requires that these behavior occur more frequently in those diagnosed than the typical amount for children of a comprable age and level of development. ODD is also often a precursor to Conduct Disorder. And they do not deny that ODD is caused by bad parenting, but that does not make it any less of a disorder.

Furthermore, the editor fails to realize that many mental health professionals have issues with the DSM, which is why it is constantly being reworked.

by a reader on Mon, 02/26/2007 - 22:40 | reply

Astounding ignorance

Please read an abnormal psych textbook before arguing things like this. Your ignorance is astounding.

Quite possibly. But ignorance of what? Do you think it possible that we differ about a philosophical issue, not primarily about any matter of physiological fact?

Do you believe that there are any issues about how human behaviour may be explained in terms of physiology, that philosophers consider controversial?

One philosopher who thinks so is Sahotra Sarkar, whose book Genetics and Reductionism we recommend to you. (It is about the logic of explaining human behavioural traits as being partly genetically caused - an issue that overlaps with the one we are discussing here.)

Could you, in turn, recommend an 'abnormal psych' textbook that makes what you consider to be a good case in favour of the ways in which mental helath professionals currently attribute aberrant human behaviour to physiological causes?

by Editor on Tue, 02/27/2007 - 19:39 | reply

re: Please read an abnormal psych

The DSM is not meant to be used by laymen. Used by laymen, anyone could have any disorder. There is more to a diagnosis than knowing the DSM criteria.

OK.

The DSM requires that these behavior occur more frequently in those diagnosed than the typical amount for children of a comparable age and level of development.

I see. That makes sense. Now can I use the DSM myself, since I know the special extra information needed?

ODD is also often a precursor to Conduct Disorder. And they do not deny that ODD is caused by bad parenting, but that does not make it any less of a disorder.

Of course that does not make it any less of a disorder. Just like being caused by parenting doesn't make being anti-war any less of a disorder. But the cause is relevant to the treatment. The only reasonable treatment for being anti-war is persuasion. But persuasion is not a reasonable treatment for, say, AIDs.

Furthermore, the editor fails to realize that many mental health professionals have issues with the DSM, which is why it is constantly being reworked.

Hmm. It's not perfect, and it's being constantly changed and improved.

Doesn't that suggest you should welcome criticism and incorporate it into the next batch of changes?

-- Elliot Temple
curi@curi.us
Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 02/28/2007 - 01:47 | reply

Use of DSM

"I see. That makes sense. Now can I use the DSM myself, since I know the special extra information needed?"

When you are able to distinguish hyperventillation in panic disorder, from the hyperventillation in a heart attack, and the hyperventillation in pneumonia, hypoglycemia, or with a pulmonary embolus; then you can use the DSM. If you can do that now, then you can use the DSM now.

Doesn't that suggest you should welcome criticism and incorporate it into the next batch of changes?

Of course. What makes you think the reader does not welcome intelligent criticism?

by a reader on Thu, 03/01/2007 - 22:53 | reply

Hyperventilation

So if you tell me about hyperventilation for ... 15-60min? ... then I will be qualified to use the DSM regarding asperger's?

Why don't they just include a hyperventilation explanation at the start of the DSM so everyone could read that before using the DSM?

BTW I read about hyperventilation for some time but failed to find different types.

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Thu, 03/01/2007 - 23:19 | reply

Yes

If someone is hyperventillating you need to be able to tell whether it is from hypoglycemia or a heart attack, rather than a panic attack, since all of them cause increases in the sympathetic nervous system.

But yes, if you were capable of distinguishing a clinical situation in which someone was having a panic attack from someone having a heart attack, then you could use the DSM, because your ability to do that would require enormous other knowledge...knowledge needed to understand psychiatric diagnoses.

by a reader on Sat, 03/03/2007 - 19:38 | reply

Doctors

Aren't you just appealing to authority? I'm not a doctor. OK. So what? Normal people are considered competent to decide when to call a doctor. If there's something like hyperventilation and I'm not sure about it, I'll know we need an expert.

But there are other symptoms I can make perfectly good judgments about, with no special expertise, aren't there? And some disorders in the DSM have only symptoms like that, don't they?

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Fri, 03/09/2007 - 00:43 | reply

DSM

No. The DSM explicitly states that all other medical conditions that mimic a symptom complex must be ruled out before a psychiatric condition is considered. Just makes sense. Physicians and many others can understand medical conditions.

by a reader on Fri, 03/16/2007 - 00:57 | reply

Damn Straight

That is the truth man. I was told I have "aspergers syndrome" when I was about 10, and it's a bunch of bullshit designed to sell pills. But fuck them, I claim it as a disability and get free public transport for whoever gets my card. Sweet ;)

by Boy on Mon, 03/26/2007 - 08:13 | reply

Being medically qualified can

Being medically qualified can hopefully enable someone to tell the difference between mental illnesses and physical illnesses like heart attacks. But what on earth has that got to do with the subject of this post, which is the difference between mental illness and no illness at all?

How could a knowledge of physical diseases like heart attacks EVER be helpful in deciding the difference between Oppositional Defiant Disorder and plain opposition and defiance?

And (another issue) how could ANY scientific qualification be helpful in deciding between morally justified defiance and morally unjustified defiance?

by a reader of this very long thread on Mon, 03/26/2007 - 08:43 | reply

Rule Out more than Rule In

"But what on earth has that (knowing the difference between mental and physical illness) got to do with the subject of this post, which is the difference between mental illness and no illness at all?"

To make a diagnosis, first we create a list of possible conditions that would seem to fit the symptoms that we see.

Diagnoses are made by ruling out other conditions with similar symptoms. We rarely say that a person definitively has a condition by virtue of the results of a particular test, but rather we figure out what conditions a person likely DOES NOT have. One of the diagnoses that we must exclude, in explaining a given symptom complex, is normalcy. So we do need to exclude the condition "normalcy" in arriving at a diagnosis of a mental or physical condition. So telling the difference between an illness of the brain that affects the mind vs an illness of the heart that affects exercise capacity, is not conceptually much different from telling the difference between normalcy and a specific type of illness.

This process (excluding incorrect potential diagnoses) allows us to arrive at a single remaining diagnosis or a range of possible diagnoses that have survived the inquiry. And sometimes, we end up treating all remaining possible diagnoses (for example when someone has an unidentified infection we use broad spectrum antibiotics.)

"And (another issue) how could ANY scientific qualification be helpful in deciding between morally justified defiance and morally unjustified defiance?"

I agree with you that a particular qualification, as opposed to specific types of knowledge, does not enable someone to accurately make diagnoses. I also agree with you that "defiance", as a name of a diagnosis, should not be used.

But certainly the degree, frequency, and intensity of anger, potentially leading to inappropriate defiance, is appropriately studied and treated by physicians. For example, individuals with certain head injuries are more prone to having difficulties with controlling their anger.

by a reader on Mon, 03/26/2007 - 17:18 | reply

Normalcy

So, can you give examples of how you exclude normalcy as a diagnosis?

And do you think this part of a diagnosis (excluding normalcy, or not, nothing else) could be done by a non-doctor?

-- Elliot Temple
curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 03/26/2007 - 20:01 | reply

Normal vs. Abnormal

Who can exclude a normal mental state, in order to diagnose an abnormal state?

I think the ability to rule-out any diagnosis or lack of diagnosis can be done by just about anybody. It is possessing the relevant knowledge, not whether someone is a doctor, that is obviously relevant.

If a person's blood urea nitrogen is 30 times normal and his creatinine 20 times normal, and he has edema in his feet, a few rales at the base of his lungs, a point of maximum intensity of his heart that is in the normal place, only slightly elevated liver function studies, a normal abdominal exam, and a slightly elevated white count with no left shift; and if this patient has poor focus and concentration, a negative toxicology screen, a reversed sleep cycle, a slowed EEG, non-focality on physical exam, a normal brain MRI and Lumbar puncture, and he reports seeing visual hallucinations of Mother Teresa dancing in front of his bed; and if he is screaming in a drunk sounding voice at the nurse while being OPPOSITIONAL; I think I would have a good idea what I would need to do to get rid of the hallucinations and the oppositional behavior. And no, he would not have "Oppositional Defiant Disorder", despite being oppositional. But I would certainly say that he has an illness causing oppositional behavior.

Elliot, or anyone with a bit of knowledge, might also be able to figure out how to get rid of the hallucinations and the oppositional behavior (and the edema) and begin figuring out the underlying cause of the problem.

But no rational doctor would say that he is "normal", mentally or physically. That simply would not likely be in the set of diagnoses considered given the description above. In more subtle cases, it would take training to determine whether he was psychiatrically or medically non-normal.

Yes, many people think that we are Turing machines. If that is true, then any given change of the mind (including converting a hallucinating, oppositional state into a calm and rational state) can be created by appropriate programming, for example by utilizing conversation. But no, it would not be appropriate to repeatedly try to talk this patient out of his hallucinations and his oppositional behavior after a few verbal efforts fail. We simply don't have the technology to efficiently reprogram a mind with this type of abnormality by utilizing conversation and reasoning. For all we know, conversation by itself might take one million years to change his brain/mind state into a non-hallucinating, calm state, and at that point we'd all be dead....And the patient would be dead sooner than all of us. Indeed most conversation, particularly reasoning with a patient like this, would make the hallucinations worse.

So just because a type of mental reprogramming can theoretically be said to change any mental state into a more rational one (if we really are just Turing machines), does not mean that conversation, argument, criticism, and discussion, are the appropriate means of changing someones mind, if he is in the state described above or similar states.

But a simple medical intervention would likely do the trick to get this unfortunate patient to be rational again. When reprogramming of the brain is best accomplished by organic interventions (drugs and procedures), we consider the state to be caused by the brain. This is so even if (unlike in this case) it was software (life experience and thinking) that damaged the brain (hardware) to begin with.

In the particular case described above, the hallucinating/oppositional patient has an abnormal physiological brain state causing these conditions. This abnormal brain state uncovered the inability of his current mental "programming" to compensate for the aberrant neuro-physiology. At some point, abnormal pathophysiology would prevent any of us from thinking correctly. So any of us can have our rational programming overridden by an appropriately severe neurological insult.

In the case of the patient described above, his neuro-pathophysiology is likely caused by failing kidneys.

Dialysis, but not conversation, would likely quickly eliminate the oppositional behavior and the hallucinations. A psychiatrist would diagnose this man with delirium due to uremia, and recommend treatment of his delirium with dialysis and investigation into the cause of the failing kidneys.

But note that no lab test diagnoses delirium caused by uremia. The diagnosis is made by clinical observation in the context of abnormal labs. The abnormal labs by themselves in no way allow one to make this diagnosis. But the psychiatrist's clinical observations do allow the psychiatrist to say that conversation is likely not the most effective intervention to stop this man's oppositional behavior.

by a reader on Mon, 03/26/2007 - 23:03 | reply

Aspergers

Some of you have overlooked that Aspergers is not a diagnosis based on mental attributes, but rather a form of autism. It is also not diagnosed due to being "anti social and having obsessions." There are symptoms it causes that are not purely psychological. For instance:

- Nervous Tics and stemming
- Sensory Overload
- Has emotion only towards objects and animals, not people
- Uncontrollable urge to inspect food and utensils for blemishes before eating
- Poor motor skills

Eye contact, social anxiety, obsessions.. those are qualities anyone may possess, but the others generally are autism related. Aspergers is in no way fake, but there are millions of self diagnosed lunatics out there running about claiming they have it.. THEY are fake.

by Dave on Fri, 05/25/2007 - 07:28 | reply

Autism

I suspect (but am not sure) that the editor thinks that Autism is "fake", "false", and a "superstition", as well.

by a reader on Mon, 05/28/2007 - 22:36 | reply

If only it were that easy

It would be so much easier if Asperger's included only psychological symptoms. Unfortunately, it does not. It is not being able to stand anything touching your skin. It is walking later than everyone your age and never managing to do it gracefully. Asperger's is trying desperately not to rock back and forth in public.

It is tempting to dismiss it as a false disorder, since so many people try to use it as an excuse for their own awkwardness. Someday, a physical cause will be found, just as the physical component of other disorders are being found. The brain is complex, and research is slow. Until then, accept that people with AS are wired a little differently from everyone else. There's nothing wrong with that.

by an observer on Thu, 06/07/2007 - 01:12 | reply

It would be so much easier if

It would be so much easier if Asperger's included only psychological symptoms. Unfortunately, it does not. It is not being able to stand anything touching your skin.

That could very easily be a psychological symptom. You just mentally interpret the properly functioning nerve impulses from your skin as very unpleasant.

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Thu, 06/07/2007 - 21:11 | reply

It would be so much easier

Why on earth would it be easier if it were a purely psychological disorder like, for example, socialism?

In fact, when are purely psychological disorders ever easy to cure?

by a reader on Thu, 06/07/2007 - 22:35 | reply

Pain is Only Psychological?

"That could very easily be a psychological symptom. You just mentally interpret the properly functioning nerve impulses from your skin as very unpleasant."

Is pain purely a "psychological symptom", since individuals with pain could be said to "interpret the properly functioning nerve impulses" in a way that is distressing to them? And since interpretation of neural impulses is, by this reasoning, a purely psychological phenomenon, should not someone simply be able to choose not to be bothered by pain?

by a reader on Mon, 06/11/2007 - 18:10 | reply

pain is not all in your head.

pain is not all in your head. but an irrational reaction to pain would be. or an irrational fear of pain. you mentioned what a person can stand, which is referring to their mental states and preferences.

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 06/11/2007 - 21:12 | reply

Pain

So what makes you think that "pain is not all in your head"?

by a reader on Mon, 06/11/2007 - 21:35 | reply

the word pain is referring to the word pain is referring to not just your mental state but also the external stimulus (which could be virtual reality or whatever). but if you prefer a different definition we can use that, it's no matter.

whereas earlier we were talking about what a person can stand, which could be just about their personality.

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 06/12/2007 - 09:42 | reply

Pain

"Pain is referring to an external state."

I'm not sure what that means. Are you saying that something objective causes it?

by a reader on Tue, 06/12/2007 - 19:02 | reply

Pain and Depression: Philisophical Difference?

You say that "pain is not all in your head"

Is major depression also "not all in your head"?

by a reader on Mon, 06/18/2007 - 14:33 | reply

Pain v Depression

I think standard terminology is to say depression is all in your head. Sure your wife left you, and that's quite relevant, but plenty of people lose their wives without becoming depressed, so we generally don't count that: the part where you have an unusual, extreme reaction to relatively normal external factors is all in your head.

That's one theoretically possible sort of depression. Another is something goes physically wrong with your brain and its chemical environment and this throws you off in your life a lot. In this case, standard terminology is that it is NOT all in your head, b/c the major issue here is the physical problem not your own irrationality.

Note that, knowing little about neurochemisty, I would initially consider it quite possible that both types of depression could go away with drug treatment. But the first person would still have life/idea problems and only feel better (still probably a good thing), while the second person would actually be fully recovered.

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 06/18/2007 - 20:32 | reply

Best Theories

Concerning theories of causation of depression, Elliot said, "Another is something goes physically wrong with your brain and its chemical environment and this throws you off in your life a lot... the major issue here is the physical problem not your own irrationality."

Many scientists believe that our best theories tell us that some forms of depression are in fact caused by a situation in which "something goes physically wrong with your brain and its chemical environment."

Do you think that this current theory (that some forms of depression are caused by chemical abnormalities) is in fact the best theory currently available?

by a reader on Mon, 06/18/2007 - 23:49 | reply

Depression

I'm not up on the scientific research. My guess is that both types happen, and the more common type is personality-based depression.

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 06/18/2007 - 23:57 | reply

Are Some Types of Depression Real?

In the case in which depression is caused by chemical abnormalities in the brain (and not irrationality), do you consider that a real illness?

by a reader on Tue, 06/19/2007 - 01:52 | reply

Yes

Yes.

But not a "mental" illness since it's physical. Like brain cancer.

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 06/19/2007 - 04:12 | reply

Editor's Opinion

Does the editor agree with Elliot that the previously discussed theory (that some forms of depression are caused by chemical abnormalities) is in fact the best theory currently available?

If the editor does agree with the above then:

In the case in which depression is caused by chemical abnormalities in the brain (and not irrationality), do you also consider it a real illness?

by a reader on Tue, 06/19/2007 - 22:28 | reply

Lol wut

Why don't you get a fucking degree in psychology before you call this shit fake, dumbass.

by Dr. Spock on Sat, 06/23/2007 - 04:48 | reply

replies

A Reader:

since the editor doesn't seem to be responding, want to continue with your point anyway? (presumably these questions are leading somewhere)

Dr. Spock:

Are we meant to infer from your elegant rhetorical style that you possess the requisite degree?

-- Elliot Temple
curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Sat, 06/23/2007 - 06:08 | reply

Neurons Don't Read Their Opinions

The word "mental illness" is a category that includes major depression. When we are referring to an individual with major depression, we mean that there are chemical problems with the person's brain causing psychological problems. You might not like psychiatric nomenclature, but it is the meaning of the words (not your definition of the words) that is important. The key point is that most professionals understand what the words mean.

By the way, I agree with you that we should not use the words "mental illness" to describe brain diseases like Alzheimers, Bipolar Illness, Major Depression, and Schizophrenia, because though professionals understand what these words mean, others do not.

I am surprised (but happy) that you recognize that chemical abnormalities in the brain can predispose someone to sad feelings, sleep problems, irritability, concentration problems, and a host of other major depressive symptoms. What caused you to change your mind, if indeed you have?

You asked for my line of reasoning (that I was going to go through had the editors wished to answer my question listed above)

1. Unlike you, the editors have expressed their profound disbelief in the idea that chemical abnormalities in the brain cause depression, schizophrenia, bipolar disorder, etc. They have asked psychiatrist's to point to "lesions" that "cause" the illness and suggested that in the absence of these and/or other characteristics, an illness is "fake" and a "superstition".

2. The topic of pain was introduced in this discussion of mental illness. I asked the editors and others who dismiss mental illness whether they believe that pain is "fake" and a "superstition", just like depression. I asked this question because it seems to me that one cannot make a philisophical distinction between "pain" and "depression".

My point is that if the editor's believe in the existence of pain, then I would ask them what characteristics of pain make it "real"? Whatever relevant characteristics the editors come up with to claim that "pain" is real, will also be characteristics of clinical depression. The editors will not be able to make a philisophical distinction between mental pain (for example, depression) and physical pain (e.g. back pain) because both are simply types of pain.

3. For example, there is no way (at present) of making a diagnosis of "pain" by looking for a "lesion". One could look at firing frequency of certain nerves in the brain, but the same can be said for depression, and firing frequency of nerves is neither diagnostic of pain nor depression.

Depending on many circumstances, a given injury to the body may or may not be reported as pain by the injured person, so the visible injury cannot be said to be diagnostic of the

- a. pain reported
 - b. pain not reported
- or
- c. pain not felt.

So if a diagnostic lesion is needed for "pain" to count as something other than a superstition, then pain is a superstition, exactly in the same way that the editors say that mental illness is.

4. The editors say that mental illness is not real because there cannot be "asymptomatic" mental illness. I have previously demonstrated that this idea is illogical since an illness would not be an illness if it didn't hurt people! (Rocks are not ill). So no illness can be truly asymptomatic.

But I think the editors were trying to say that one might not feel that something is a problem in one's body, but it still might cause problems later (Latent Hepatitis C does not initially cause a patient to report symptoms, until it has substantially damaged the liver). So Hep C is a "real" illness because there is something objective about it (the infection in the liver), even if the patient notices nothing wrong. Depression, on the other hand -- according to this spurious line of reasoning -- is a "fake" illness because it seems to depend exclusively upon the report of the person suffering from it, not on an objectively defined physical parameter.

5. But of course, the same argument makes "chronic pain" a "fake" illness, as well. Hepatitis C is a "real illness" because there is something objective about it (the infection), but pain is not real since it also seems to depend upon the report of the person suffering from it, not on an objectively defined physical parameter.

6. So pain and depression seem to share the characteristic that subjective reports define them both. So (according to this incorrect argument) both must be considered "fake".

7. But those who think pain is real but depression is not, often counter this argument (number 6) as follows though I believe this argument is mistaken, as well:

There are effective anesthetics that enable someone to feel the sensations that would have been "pain", but not be bothered by them. So pain has a real existence independent of the subjective discomfort reported by a patient. In the same way that a Hepatitis C infection can be asymptomatic but a person can still have a real infection of the liver; on certain anesthetics, a person can experience the "real" sensations of pain -- induced by objective neural firing -- but not be bothered by them.

On the other hand, the existence of the clinical entity "depression" supposedly depends on it being mentally uncomfortable (according to those who make this dubious argument), so depression is purely subjective. But pain is real.

But this distinction is spurious as well. It is true that depressed people often feel that they are experiencing abundant pressures (even when they are not) and feel unrealistically pessimistic. And it is true that this irrational thinking often is associated with sensations of mental anguish and reports of mental anguish.

But patients can experience the same symptoms, but without feeling the mental anguish

Indeed when a patient uses antidepressants, the psychiatrist does NOT have to teach someone to think more rationally for him to improve. And treated individuals do not have to --

a. perceive that they are experiencing fewer pressures in their life, or

b. perceive that bad things will not occur

-- in order to no longer feel mental anguish.

It is simply the case that when depression is treated by chemical means (antidepressants), the patient is no longer bothered by his irrational thinking, does not become distressed when faced with identical pressures, and does not become upset because of pessimistic predictions.

Just as one can feel sensations that would otherwise have been thought to be painful -- but are not now bothersome when on certain anesthetics -- so too one can still have innumerable pressures, pessimistic thought, and irrational thinking, but also not be bothered by them because of antidepressant use.

But there is more to this story. Those who try to argue that depression is subjective but pain objective must surely see this irony. Many drug classes do cause an indifference to pain but a continued ability to perceive it. But those who argue that this observation makes pain a real entity but depression not real; must come to grips with the fact that many of the anesthetics that do precisely this are in fact ANTIDEPRESSANTS.

Not surprisingly, most antidepressants are anesthetics. Indeed, they are precisely the type of anesthetic that enable a person to feel sensations, just not be bothered by them. Emotionally, antidepressants do the same thing. They enable individuals to experience their (often negative) thoughts, just not be bothered by them.

Although philosophers and editors of blogs like this like to make artificial distinctions between pain and depression, we can all be grateful that neurons don't read their opinions. Otherwise we would not have discovered the wonderful way that antidepressants help those with pain and its sister entity, depression.

by a reader on Mon, 07/02/2007 - 22:20 | reply

I am surprised (but happy) th

I am surprised (but happy) that you recognize that chemical abnormalities in the brain can predispose someone to sad feelings, sleep problems, irritability, concentration problems, and a host of other major depressive symptoms. What caused you to change your mind, if indeed you have?

I haven't changed my mind. One's environment is relevant to one's mental state. If your dog dies that can be sad. If your food comes out burned, that can be frustrating. If terrorists blow up the WTC one might feel righteous anger. If you are injected with ecstasy you might feel ecstatic. One's environment includes the chemical environment of his brain. And even defects in the brain can be part of the environment of the mind.

(the "might be", "can be" is because people can interpret situations in strange ways. someone could be happy their food is burned for some reason. some people were happy about 9/11. etc)

PS other replies to come later

by Elliot on Wed, 07/04/2007 - 00:37 | reply

Diagnosis

When we are referring to an individual with major depression, we mean that there are chemical problems with the person's brain causing psychological problems.

How do you diagnose someone of having this?

The problem is if you notice he's sad or has other behavioral and emotional symptoms, for example, that is not any evidence at all that he has major depression (defined above) because it could be that he has psychological/personality problems only (not chemical).

And if you do lab tests, they can't tell you cause and effect. Did the chemical abnormalities cause psychological problems or vice versa?

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 07/11/2007 - 22:18 | reply

Depression and Biology

The problem is if you notice he's sad or has other behavioral and emotional symptoms, for example, that is not any evidence at all that he has major depression (defined above) because it could be that he has psychological/personality problems only (not chemical).

You are right that biological or behavioral markers of psychiatric problems could be effects of a problem not the cause. For example, a problem with personality may in some individuals be an ultimate cause of feeling sad.

But the same is true for virtually any illness whatsoever. Any biological, chemical, or behavioral marker of virtually any illness whatsoever is (just like depression) virtually always an effect of an illness, not its cause. For example, the biological marker called "elevated fasting blood sugar" is used to define the diagnosis "diabetes". But this marker is an effect of a complex metabolic problem, not the cause of diabetes. Again, biological markers are effects of illnesses, not causes.

If we had to know the ultimate cause of illnesses before we could treat them, there would be virtually nothing that we could do for anyone. For example, the stellate ganglia is a nerve-junction connector between the brain and the heart that activates the fight or flight response. If you cut the stellate ganglia in animals at birth, no matter what you feed them or how you treat them, they will not develop clogs in blood vessels supplying blood to the heart, so they will not develop coronary artery disease. The same is undoubtedly true in humans. Furthermore, when one feels relaxed because of one's peaceful thoughts, this ganglia is hardly activated, at all.

Therefore one's thoughts leading to anxiety activate the stellate ganglia from birth, and are therefore ultimate causative agents in creating coronary artery disease; just as one's thoughts are ultimate causative agents in creating certain types of depression. But to treat a 60 year old with heart disease, we don't have to say that nothing can be done because we needed to first change his thinking when he was 5 years old.

The ultimate cause of illnesses, depression or heart disease, is not usually relevant. What is relevant is that there is a biological process that will progress and that its presence and progression will cause pain and suffering to people. In the case of major depression, it is not just that people feel sad. If they only felt sad, they would not have major depression. A diagnosis of major depression implies that there is a biological entity that will likely progress and damage organs. Many types of major depression, for example, decreases a person's sleep, his nutritional status, and increase his autonomic reactivity (blood pressure responses to stress, pain, and cold, for example).

These measurable and biologically real phenomena are known to cause brain damage and heart damage over time and permanent worsening of memory, for example, regardless of whether the ultimate cause of this depression was bad thinking, weird genetics, or something else. In major depression (as in other illnesses), whatever the initial cause, physical things have gone awry, and a chemical intervention such as a serotonin reuptake inhibitor can reverse the biological and psychological consequences of depression, prevent brain damage and (likely) heart damage, and prevent memory loss.

So the ultimate cause of something is interesting and will one day help us understand illness. But whether heart disease or depression were caused by bad thinking when one was 5 years old, or by something else, is irrelevant. They both end up with a set of biological abnormalities. Regardless of the ultimate cause of these abnormalities, they nonetheless progress and measurably damage organs. Chemical or surgical treatments decrease or reverse damage to these organs. In the case of both depression and coronary artery disease, brains can be damaged so there are psychological consequences of these illnesses as well.

by a reader on Mon, 07/16/2007 - 23:53 | reply

Get with the times

As I have Aspergers (diagnosed), many times I have come across people, either in day to day life or online who seem to think the growth of disorders are down to people wanting to have an 'excuse' as to why they can't cope. Isn't their an irony in telling people they are making an excuse for themselves when they are at the same time making an excuse for the growth?

We need to accept that people are different; people do have different tolerance levels. The world is not staying the same and so we as humans will not stay the same. Technology changes; we change or at least try to change.

That has had a knock on effect on loads of things, on medicine, food, entertainment, work and transportation, in fact I can't think of an area where it hasn't had a knock on effect, so why wouldn't it not have one when it comes to people? Let me give you an example.

Asperger Syndrome was universally recognised in around 1994, but years ago, some of the problems we have wouldn't have existed. Aspies dislike change, it makes us pretty depressed (in varying degrees - because no two people are the same {!}) if it's at short notice, why would it be easy to recognise now? Modern society has more change than it did years ago, people travel more frequently, whereas before if you went away you were seen as privileged. Technology and better communication systems means things don't need to be planned so far in advance and it is easier to just go out and do something, 5 minutes after you've thought about it. You can't say we're just eccentric people either, technology also means we know more about the brain than we did 30 years ago, even though its still only a tiny proportion of what is out there to learn.

Then there are tolerance levels, it's a very arrogant perception to think, I experienced loads of bad things, I'm fine, so everyone else should be (and so these disorders are excuses). People's immune systems are weaker than others, some collapse due to things, that other experience 0 problems with, so why shouldn't our brains and our tolerance to every day or bad problems be different? That's not humans being namby-pamby that is a fact of life. I know of two rodents that were neglected and given to someone who had a snake, which were put in a freezer (they were alive and fully grown) for over 12 hours, when they were taken out to be defrosted so they could feed them to their snakes, one eventually moved and survived, the other one died. One clearly was more adapted to cooler temperatures than the other; we clearly have people who are adapted to modern society better than others.

Then there is the increase in depression and similar problems, if someone is sad for no reason, then why is it assumed it is because they can't face their problems and get on with it? To me it contradicts the first part. People can be sad for no reason, just like you can be happy for no reason, or feel like something wrong is about to happen for no reason. Don't we even show signs of pregnancy for no reason? All mainly because of hormones. Then there is the other commonplace thought that depression is feeling "sorry for yourself" which is a massive incorrect generalisation. Self pity and depression are two very different things. For instance, when you are depressed you can feel a massive amount of self hatred, I know I did and I know I still get lows nowadays, sometimes people can help and sometimes they can't. Just like what you dream at night, you can't really control, you can't really control your mood. Some people have triggers that make them depressed, and that can be almost anything, could be people telling them to just get on with it too.

I do get on with my life to the best of my ability, I work with my family and friends, those that care for me, to try and adapt the best way I can to the challenges I face, sometimes I fail, sometimes I succeed. I have a label, one that hasn't been around very long, but many fail to realise, some people go in search for many years like I did to find out what's wrong, just so they can try and work out where they can go from there, not to sit back and say, "I've got x, I can't do that, I won't do that, you have to accept that." But to say, "I know now I've got x, which means I have problems with y, and v can help me to try and improve in areas where I so far have failed, can you help me too?"

by a reader on Tue, 07/17/2007 - 11:50 | reply

> I don't need to provide sou

> I don't need to provide sources for my information.

Of course not. Fact would be tough to square with your statements.

by a reader on Tue, 07/17/2007 - 17:09 | reply

Re: Get with the times

- > Isn't their an irony in telling people they are making
- > an excuse for themselves when they are at the same
- > time making an excuse for the growth?

Since that's not what is being done, no. Not irony.

- > Asperger Syndrome was universally recognised in
- > around 1994

Isn't there irony in stating categorically something is "universally recognized" in the middle of a pitched discussion about the fact that said thing is not, in fact, universally recognized?

by a reader on Tue, 07/17/2007 - 17:19 | reply

Re: Get with the times

"diagnosis = excuse" I guess you missed that comment.

There is a difference between being finally added to the classification of disorders and your average Joe Bloggs having a full understanding of the disorder. A disorder can be recognised and diagnosed without being accepted by everyone.

by a reader on Wed, 07/18/2007 - 23:01 | reply

Ironic?

I think you are saying that those who do not believe in mental illness are making simplistic sociological "diagnos(es)" of the reasons for the increasing number of mental health diagnoses currently in existence and the increasing numbers of individuals who are thought to suffer from them.

One simplistic sociological theory might be the following,

"Those with so-called developmental disorders like Asperger's syndrome are just lazy and psychiatrists just want money. So both collude to create diagnoses in order to divert government funds. That's why there are more and more diagnoses like Asperger's."

But you are pointing out that those with Asperger's have a strongly genetically based condition that is very real. You are pointing out that those criticizing the diagnosis are simplistically ignoring what is now scientifically well-established.

So at the same time those denying the existence of developmental disorders like Asperger's are using bad thinking to rationalize false and simplistic sociological theories; these same critics are falsely criticizing those with Asperger's of using bad thinking and false diagnosis to rationalize their own bad behavior.

And you find that ironic. So do I.

by a reader on Thu, 07/19/2007 - 23:13 | reply

Ultimate Causes

The critical issue is not the ultimate causes of things, it is the reasonable explanations available.

With cancer no one is proposing that there is an explanation of how it is a personality problem and should be cured by conversation and learning. There is no rival theory of that sort. If you think there should be then feel free to argue along those lines. If you do so successfully you may create some dilemmas for medical science which require thinking, arguments, etc to surpass, and perhaps even changes in standard opinion and practice.

With Asperger's, there is a reasonable rival theory, and therefore it is very important to pay close attention to what is evidence of what. Anything compatible with the mainstream theory of Asperger's, and also compatible with the rival theory, is not evidence* in favor of the mainstream theory over the rival theory. It confirms the rival theory equally well. The rival theory can only be beaten with either a scientific test for some observable for which it makes a different prediction than the mainstream theory, or by philosophical argument.

Your implied stance seems to be that I have said: we don't know everything, theoretically the evidence is compatible with many things, therefore you must abandon your theory. And this is silly, and your comparison with other fields rightly illustrates that point. But my actual stance is not that, in theory, it could be multiple things. My stance is that today we have a serious rival theory which states that all the symptoms of Asperger's and various other "mental illnesses", can perfectly well be explained by the patient having bad ideas (and we can give specific details of the bad ideas that we propose may be involved for a given list of symptoms). This rival theory is compatible with the existence of drug-aided recoveries.

Is this clear and do you now see where I am coming from?

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Fri, 07/20/2007 - 02:08 | reply

Pots and Kettles (part 3)

"With cancer no one is proposing that there is an explanation of how it is a personality problem and should be cured by conversation and learning.

If you think there should be then feel free to argue along those lines. If you do so successfully you may create some dilemmas for medical science which require thinking, arguments, etc to surpass, and perhaps even changes in standard opinion and practice."
Elliot

The causes of cancer require a different discussion than the causes of heart disease, the topic I brought up. As you recall, I said that depressive thinking is a cause of heart disease and its worsening. With heart disease, it is now well established that depression increases the risk of developing heart disease, enables coronary damage to progress more rapidly, and leads to increasing mortality from heart disease. (Frasure-Smith et al., 1995, JAMA 1993) There are literally hundreds of studies showing this and related phenomena. Psychiatric Times summarized the data as follows

"The risk (of death from coronary heart disease) is directly related to the severity of mood symptoms: a one-to twofold increase in coronary heart disease (CHD) for minor depression and a three- to fivefold increase for major depression (Bunker et al., 2003)".

By the way, the risk from major depression increases mortality by approximately the same amount as the risk from smoking or having diabetes! And there are excellent theoretical reasons to explain how depression damages the heart (increased cardiovascular reactivity in depression, endothelial [vessel lining] damage from vessel-reactivity, increased platelet aggregation in depression, etc.) Indeed the effect of depression on mortality from heart disease has become a well-accepted theory in the medical profession over the last 15 years. Forms of depression are major causes of physical deterioration in many organs, including the heart!

Now let's compare the support for your theory that Asperger's (a form of Autism) is created by "thinking" vs. support for the medical profession's theory that depression causes heart disease.

First of all, the idea that thought causes Autism is theoretically true, but not a useful idea. If we are fully functional conscious Turing machines, then given enough time, we should be able to create virtually any neural configuration in our brains. Therefore, given 1 million years of thinking, for example, we should be able to configure our brain exactly as we want it to be, in order to use the nerves leaving the brain as tools to fix, repair, and prevent, any disease or disorder of the body, including autism, cancer, heart disease, and everything else.

So saying that thought causes a medical disorder is like saying that all relevant problems are soluble by thought. Although in my opinion these statements are true, they are also vacuous because they explain too much without telling you how to proceed to solve a given problem. If autism is caused by thought, then so is everything else! In order to usefully proceed with this line of thought, one needs to specify what type of thought is said to cause a given medical condition.

So what does the evidence say about actual causes of autism and Asperger's, given that your theory is that a particular type of thinking causes the illness.

Ronald, Happe, and Bolton (American Academy of Child and Adolescent Psychiatry, 2006) found in their study:

High heritability was found for extreme autistic-like traits (.64-.92 for various cutoffs) and autistic-like traits as measured on a continuum (.78-.81) with no significant shared environmental effect.

Many studies have found very high heritability for autism and related traits, with no shared environmental effect.

What does "no shared environmental effect" mean for autistic traits? The easiest way to explain the concept is to imagine that a mother and father adopt two children. Imagine that Mom, Dad, and the two adopted children share no genetic relatedness at all. If the "shared environmental effect" is found to be zero in a well-done study of families like this, this means that two unrelated adopted children in the same family are as likely to share autistic traits in common as two complete strangers randomly chosen from the street. In other words different family cultures are irrelevant in causing differences in whether someone develops autistic traits or not.

When hereditary effects are high (monozygotic twins share the trait and dizygotic twins virtually do not) and the shared environmental effect is zero, as is the case with most studies of those with autism, the studied condition occurs in genetically related individuals. With zero shared environmental effect, the family culture does not influence rates of autism, so genes must be causally responsible. Since the family culture is irrelevant, the willful thinking of the individual --surely influenced by family culture -- does not cause the disorder, either. So the evidence strongly argues against the proposition that a particular type of thinking causes autism.

But how do those critical of genetic studies answer this seemingly airtight case? They use an argument that some have pejoratively called "X-factor" theory. They say there may be some cultural factor (the "X" factor), invariably not studied, that is ubiquitous and homogenous across cultures. This factor interacts with genes that make one vulnerable to a condition, for example autism, but this "X-factor" is the real cause of the problem. Since all families are exposed to this ubiquitous "X-factor", then regardless of which family a child is raised in, he is exposed to this factor. And if he has the predisposing genes, this factor interacts with the genes to cause the condition. So the family that raises a child is irrelevant, which explains why the "shared environmental effect" is found to be zero in studies. All families are equally exposed to this common cultural factor which is the ultimate cause of the problem, not the genes.

What is the mysterious "factor X"? Here you may fill in the blank, usually depending upon one's political perspective. Those writing for this blog usually argue that factor X is the "coercion" of children. Coercion happens worldwide in every culture and in virtually every family and to every child (but is dramatically minimized in families supporting the "Taking Children Seriously" [TCS] movement.)

So the coercion of children interacts with the products of certain genes which make children vulnerable to the deleterious effects of coercion, and this interaction then causes all mental illness, and presumably also autism. So the absence of TCS parenting is the cause of mental illness and autism.

Now, if you ask proponents of this viewpoint if there has been even a single (even) descriptive study of a group of families following TCS principles, to see if anybody has mental illness, the answer is a resounding "NO".

Indeed if you ask whether there has been any data, any evidence, any descriptions of families cured of mental illness, or even any theoretical work done explaining why TCS should prevent autism or other mental illnesses, the answer is another resounding "NO".

So there is a tremendous irony in Elliot's post. Those advocating TCS as a cure for mental illness have done no investigations to support their speculations. Yet when I claim that much work has been done showing that depressive thinking dramatically affects whether someone develops worsening coronary artery disease, this is considered speculative, though hundreds of empirical studies support the theoretical ideas. Indeed I am asked to create a whole new field (that already exists across the world!) to lend credence to these ideas.

Yet the idea that coercion of children causes autism and other psychiatric problems is not supported by any studies at all (none). If Elliot even could show that rates of mental illness were lower in families practicing TCS, that at least would be a good start. But there is no evidence, naturally, only the speculation that the mysterious "X-factor" called coercion is somehow to blame for all chemical, genetic, and psychobiological disorders. And TCS-parenting would prevent them all.

Now, who is speculating about a brand new field in medicine?

by a reader on Mon, 07/23/2007 - 23:47 | reply

X Factor

Parents speak of their babies having "personalities" at the age of a few weeks. Some cry more. Some smile more. Some they interpret as a happy baby, others angry, others cute, other sad, others fun-loving, others curious, etc... Although there are no meaningful traits being observed, the parents think they are meaningful. This way of looking at infants is, I believe, dominant in our culture (including also people who hardly pay attention to infants consciously, but still do notice some things and have inexplicit reactions). Parents would take it as a point of pride that they treat their children appropriately: they react to their children's personality and characteristics and treat them in the way they imagine someone with that personality would prefer. So, there are complex differences in the treatment of infants, based on parental reactions to trivial traits which could easily be genetic and heritable. If one of these traits corresponds to an imagined "infant personality" that receives autism-causing treatment then autism is (at least sometimes) due to bad ideas and traditions in our culture, and is triggered by certain genes that have no functional role in autism.

It doesn't have to be quite that direct either: an infant personality could receive parental treatment that causes certain personality traits at a later age, which then receive more treatment to cause others at a later age, and so on, until finally the autism is caused. Autism also might require a few such traits combine in one person.

That's the X-factor: bad ideas and traditions, especially about how to treat children. Coercion does play a major role: it is part of the process by which parents entrench irrational ideas in their children.

While I can't fill in the exact details of which infant personality traits are treated in exactly which way, it is well known that this X-factor exists: some attitudes to parenting, including memes, are ubiquitous. And it is well known that parenting can cause complex and unwanted consequences and parents often don't even know why they do things (even complex things), and sometimes don't even notice they have done them. I think you already agree this happens in general, but if not I can give examples.

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 07/24/2007 - 06:23 | reply

bullshit

Continental drift was laughed at by all good scientists. Hand washing was ridiculed by all serious physicians in the mid nineteenth century.

Yes, all scientists have all believed wrong theories, countless times.

So you're talking right out of your smug ass, really.

by a reader on Sat, 07/28/2007 - 11:28 | reply

They're not fake...

...so much as they are created by the parents to excuse bad parenting.

by Crudblud on Sun, 08/05/2007 - 16:08 | reply

Child's Genes Determine Parents!

Elliot,

You are assuming that some parents are not less likely to have behaviors that cause autism in their children than others. If some parents were less likely, there would be a positive shared environmental effect found in the data, but studies find none.

So your first assumption is that within statistical limits, there have been no parents with good parenting strategies (that prevent autism) who have been studied.

Wouldn't you think that even a few parents would raise children somewhat the way you want (and I'll heroically assume that your parenting strategies are good), so that children with the predisposing genes would not develop autism?

If there were strategies already practiced by parents that did not cause autism, these would show up as a "positive shared environmental effect" in the data and they do not. So you must be claiming that you know of a parenting strategy that no one else does and that naturally has never been studied. And you must be claiming that your miracle strategy (but not the strategies used by everyone else), prevents genes that predispose to autism from causing autism.

But there is even more irony. Instead of saying that genes in the child determine that there will be autistic traits in a child, and the child can't help it; you are claiming that genes in the child cause autism-predisposing-traits in the parent, and the parent can't help it! And the child's choices still are irrelevant. Because the autism-predisposing-traits of the parent determine the child's autism!

So you are still a genetic determinist. It's just that children's genes don't determine children's behavior. They determine parent's behavior and this determines children's behavior!

by a reader on Mon, 08/06/2007 - 19:06 | reply

Environmental Factors

If there were strategies already practiced by parents that did not cause autism, these would show up as a "positive shared environmental effect" in the data and they do not.

If you record the amount of (say) lead paint in the house of subjects in a study, I see you could rule out that out as a relevant environmental factor. And if you record which parents are democrats or republicans, you could rule that out too. But what do you do in order to rule out the infant personality theory? It's hard to record how much people have that, even if you try, because people don't know how much they have it.

I also see that you could do a twins-raised-apart study, or something like that, as another way of attacking, for example, the lead paint issue: if only one person in the house gets autism (the foreign twin) then how could it be the lead paint causing it? If this happens reliably then the only way lead paint would be relevant is if they have a gene causing lead paint susceptibility. But again this doesn't work with the infant personality theory which states that part of the causal mechanism of autism is that the parents treat different children differently, so it predicts that the control child won't be affected.

So I'm not sure in what way you can guarantee that there is no environmental effect and thus rule out the infant personality theory.

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Sat, 08/11/2007 - 20:48 | reply

Please Clarify

Let's examine the model that the editors use to question genetic studies.

Their argument was that lynching of black people could be wrongly interpreted as being caused by genes (by ignorant population geneticists) because genes cause black skin. And black skin incites murderous anger in bigots, so genes coding for black skin could be (falsely) interpreted as being the relevant cause of lynching.

Is the same logic behind your "infant personality" theory of autism?

by a reader on Mon, 08/13/2007 - 14:24 | reply

clarification

it's kind of like that in general logic terms, but more realistic: you'd have to imagine that 99.9999% of the population is a racist and that no one has ever heard of racism. so in that situation you can see how people might miss it as a factor.

I also have anecdotal evidence that people have the infant personality theory, reason to expect others do, comparisons to known and similar effects (like gender discrimination towards infants), and evidence that interpretations of children can have large, measurable effects (not that one really needs evidence on this last point. of course they can).

-- Elliot Temple

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 08/13/2007 - 17:48 | reply

OK

"it's kind of like that in general logic terms..."

Ok. So you must be assuming that parents are reacting (consciously or unconsciously) to a unique trait of a child that is caused by genes, and the reaction of parents to this trait causes the autism.

Which parental factors are causing autism and which ones are preventing it?

by a reader on Mon, 08/13/2007 - 18:51 | reply

Implausible?

The "shared environmental effect" is found to be zero (as stated previously) when for example two genetically unrelated adopted children growing up with the same two parents share a trait (say having autism) as frequently as two random strangers who have random parents. With autism, the shared environmental effect has been found to be zero.

So in studies, a child with autism was as likely to have developed autism no matter what family he was raised in, no matter what parenting style he was exposed to. And rates of autism were found to skyrocket when children were more closely genetically related to others with autism, no matter who raises any of them.

Given your theory that autism is nonetheless caused by parenting (not genes) and knowing that most children do not develop autism, does this not imply that parents, on some level, know very well how not to cause autism?

If your theory is correct, you should be able:

A. To specify a particular visible characteristic of children that is directly controlled by genes -- a characteristic to which parents react. You need to specify this characteristic in order to explain why identical twins share autism far more than fraternal twins who share the disorder far more than those less related, etc. The genetic theory, by contrast, explains this perfectly well.

And you should be able

B. To specify why this genetic characteristic of children causes (not some) but all parents, within statistical limitations, to be immediately unable to utilize any of the non-autism-causing parenting skills they utilize every day to raise all their other children.

Don't your assumptions seem just a little bit implausible to you?

by a reader on Mon, 08/13/2007 - 23:14 | reply

Illnesses; Science; Behavior vs Genetics

Hi :)

Let's try to step back and see the conversation as a whole before I answer your questions about local details. It has gotten quite long, and that leaves a lot of room for us to diverge in what we think has been said.

I believe that you said that bipolar, depression and other conditions are illnesses and that this is backed by scientific evidence, especially studies which purport to show these conditions are caused by genes. They do this by showing "heritability" of conditions. But this does not actually imply they are caused by genes; the studies are consistent with the conditions being caused by behaviors. I gave an example of how this might work based on parental interpretations of infant personalities.

You now challenge the infant personality theory and ask for a defense of its plausibility, and also for details of its mechanisms. When addressing this issue we should remember my point about behavior-based theories of bipolar/etc causation has been that they are consistent with the studies; therefore, the studies can't inform us about whether the cause is genes or behavior. So in this particular part of the debate, that evidence is not relevant.

That said, we can address plausibility as a philosophical issue, and it can have some bearing on the science: if we can rule out behavioral theories philosophically, and other rivals using the scientific studies, we'll have a good case for genetic theories. The likely method of attack I see for delving into the issue is epistemological because we're interested in different ways of constructing a person with given knowledge (bipolar, depression, etc) in their mind. So let me know if we're on the same page, and then we can each give arguments about the plausibility of the behavior and genetic theories.

BTW, what should be called an illness or not is itself an interesting question. One reason to call something an illness is to imply people with it are broken and should be fixed: to dehumanize them. This seems especially relevant when some people with an "illness" prefer to be that way, and compulsory treatment is on the table. Another reason is because something has gone wrong with normal functioning that the patient prefers to be fixed, like cancer. Or if a gene injects harmful knowledge into a brain without (unconscious) choice by bypassing normal methods of thinking, and that person wants it gone, then that'd be reasonable to call that an illness. On the other hand, if an "illness" consists of knowledge created in the usual way -- conjecture and criticism -- then it isn't philosophically different than idiotarianism, or pacifism, or mysticism.

- Elliot

by Elliot Temple on Sat, 08/25/2007 - 01:19 | reply

Disorders are real, but not clearly enough defined

I wouldn't say the disorders themselves are created by the parents. I think it's more that once a disorder gains some media attention, while a few people genuinely have the disorder, a lot of hypochondriacs and bad parents will recognize a few features of it in themselves or their children and jump to conclusions about it (particularly if they do it themselves without any psychiatric training).

Not only that, a lot of them are "spectrum" disorders; it's like the difference between Boolean and fuzzy logic. For example, there's a very long list of features of Asperger's Syndrome, and not every Aspie has all the features. I have AS myself (formally diagnosed by a consultant psychiatrist and a psychiatric nurse) and have met a few other Aspies, some of whom are more neurotypical (normal) than I am and others who have it more severely than I do. I've also met a lot of neurotypicals who have had a few mild features of AS, but not enough for them to be officially diagnosed as Aspies. The same is true of learning disorders such as dyslexia - a lot of people have trouble with literacy or are plain stupid/lazy, but far fewer people are officially dyslexic.

The obvious problem that this creates is: where do you draw the line between neurotypicality and dyslexia/AS/ADHD/ODD/etc.? At the moment, it isn't exactly clear, and because of this, a lot of people with only a few features of a certain disorder are misdiagnosed.

Unfortunately this does also mean that, sometimes, the disorder itself is dismissed as nonsense.

by EJWeir on Sun, 09/09/2007 - 17:12 | reply

Tautology

As I have said before, the idea that thought (or parenting or culture) causes autism is theoretically true, but given the evidence, it is not a useful idea. If we are fully functional conscious Turing machines, then given enough time, we should be able to create virtually any neural configuration in our brains. Therefore, given 1 million years of thinking and parenting, for example, we should be able to configure our brain exactly as we want it to be, in order to use the nerves leaving the brain as tools to fix, repair, and prevent any disease or disorder of the body, including autism, cancer, heart disease, and everything else.

So saying that thought causes a medical disorder (like autism) is like saying that all relevant problems are soluble by thought. Although in my opinion these statements are true, they are also vacuous because they explain too much without telling you how to proceed to solve the problem of autism or any other problem. Yes, autism is caused by thought, because thought can theoretically cause anything to happen that is consistent with the laws of physics.

In order to usefully proceed with your line of reasoning, you should specify what type of thought causes a given medical condition (like autism). Then you should make some testable predictions based on your theory.

Even if direct chemical pathways are shown between genes, chemicals produced from genes, neural arrangements, and patterns of behavior (or between genes, chemicals, abnormal myocyte arrangements, and cardiac behavior), one could still claim that appropriate parenting could reverse these abnormal configurations, by having our own nerves reprogram our bodies and brains so that our brains and hearts are healthy.

Given the way you have stated your theory, I am not sure it can be shown to be false (even in principle), unless I am missing something. Can you specify for the readers an experiment, the results of which could conceivably show that autism is not caused by the absence of appropriate parenting, but is in fact caused by genetic derangements?

An inability to do this would show that your ideas are tautological and possibly solipsistic.

by a reader on Mon, 09/24/2007 - 02:09 | reply

Useful

If mental illnesses are based on thought this is useful to know. It would mean, for example, that people attempting to change their ways of thinking about the world should be optimistic that this can have far-reaching effects including, for example, curing their depression. It would mean they don't need drugs or surgery if they don't want those, and they can still get better.

It means that prevention strategies should focus on parenting instead of testing for high risk genes in babies. it would mean that genetic screenings are a total waste, for this particular issue.

you keep asking for a detailed rival theory from me. there are two problems with this. the first is that i don't need one to offer criticism of the mainstream theory. the mainstream theory claims certain things as evidence that are equally well evidence of alternatives. therefore they aren't evidence. one doesn't have to prove the alternatives are true to make the logical point that the evidence was no good. and second, the mainstream theory itself doesn't pass the simple test of offering an explanation of what's going on. it says there is some gene/chemical/physical-thing that uses some mechanism to cause depression. saying, for example, that there is some behavior that transfers memes into children which somehow cause depression isn't any more vague.

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 10/03/2007 - 06:24 | reply

Can it Be Shown to be False?

Economists claim that everyone acts in their "self-interest" This is very much the same kind of argument that says, "Thought Causes Autism (and everything else!)"

But I can prove that everyone is an altruist.

Altruist: Everyone, including John, is an altruist

Dubious: Then why did John kill Harry?

Altruist: Obviously Harry was very unhappy.

Dubious: But Harry screamed and begged John not to kill him

Altruist: Obviously Harry was trying to save John the effort.

Philosopher: I can prove that thought causes Autism (or cancer or anything else consistent with the laws of physics)

Scientist: ` But stars collapse and humans are no where near the collapse. Surely gravity is the explanation.

Philosopher: If parents had used my parenting strategy (FPS) children would have the knowledge to stop the collapse of stars and children could control whether stars collapse or not. So bad parenting causes stars to collapse!

Scientist: Yes but some children are mentally retarded. They have known chromosomal abnormalities, known brain structural abnormalities. In autism, Identical twins, reared together or apart have the same problem. With "no shared environmental effect", children who are genetically unrelated, but are raised together, do not share the characteristic more than random strangers on the street. Yet if they are genetically related, whether raised together or apart, they share the characteristic. And known changes in chemicals can experimentally induce given psychiatric states (like depression) and reverse it (make the person happy.) Doesn't that show that chemicals from genes and chemicals from brains are relevant causes of a psychiatric condition. Maybe some profoundly retarded autistic children are not smart enough to learn how to stop stars from collapsing.

Philosopher: Yes but some type of correct parenting would correct everything.

Scientist: So is there any experiment that could show that thought is not the best explanation of autism?

Philosopher: I don't need to come up with one. Human thought explains all the evidence. It can do nothing else.

by a reader on Thu, 10/04/2007 - 00:51 | reply

The Obvious Difference

The obvious difference between my theories and yours is that my theories can easily be proven false. So our arguments are not symmetrical.

Is there any experiment, even in principle, that could show that your theory is false?

by a reader on Thu, 10/04/2007 - 00:56 | reply

Is it Falsifiable?

"In so far as a scientific statement speaks about reality, it must be falsifiable; and in so far as it is not falsifiable, it does not speak about reality."

Karl Popper

Concerning your theory that thought causes autism.

Which is it?

1. Is your theory not scientific?
2. Is your theory not about reality?
3. Perhaps you have not had time to formulate an experiment that could show that thought does not cause autism or perhaps you would prefer not to?

by a reader on Fri, 10/05/2007 - 00:04 | reply

testable

the theory that some type of thought causes some mental illnesses by some chain of effects is not testable. it's a possible structure a scientific theory might have.

the more specific story about parents who interpret trivial actions in terms of infant personalities is still too vague to be tested -- which actions are interpreted in precisely what way, which causes parent to do precisely what, which causes...? but it is much closer than the generic outline. and it could be developed further into a testable theory.

but so what? you haven't offered a testable explanation either. if you claim X drug will cure Y disease, that's testable, sure, but it isn't explaining what's going on or why. to illustrate another testable claim w/ no explanation: if i said sacrificing a goat will cure depression, that is testable (try it, and see if it works or not), but more importantly i don't give any reason why it would work; there's no explanation.

i haven't claimed to know exactly what happens, i've simply criticized some flaws in the mainstream view, as a matter of logic. and also pointed out that in the absence of a compelling reason to take one view over the other, its irrational to choose one now.

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Fri, 10/05/2007 - 02:01 | reply

Can it Be Shown to be False?

There are many theories in which psychological processes can be reasonably thought to be caused by a variety of specific brain chemicals and bodily structures producing chemicals. And all of these theories, though currently thought to be true by most neurobiologists/psychiatrists/geneticists, can certainly be shown to be false.

For example,

1. We can study a large group of identical twins raised separately. We can rule out differences in genetic factors as a relevant cause of differences in a particular psychological characteristic, if this psychological characteristic is not shared (in a statistical sense) by twin pairs.

2. If identical twins do share the characteristic, but unrelated adopted children raised together also share the characteristic (more than unrelated children raised separately), we can rule out differences in genes as the sole relevant factor explaining differences in the characteristic.

3. If we deplete a neurotransmitter like serotonin in humans and animals and we get behavioral signs of depression in humans and animals, and depressive statements from a person so depleted; and if serotonin repletion reverses the condition, we have evidence that serotonin depletion is a cause of depression. In other words, we have a chemical theory of depression. But this theory could certainly be shown to be false if for example differences in behavior and symptom reports are better explained by efficiency (not quantity) of serotonin neurotransmission.

4. If a particular parenting strategy consistently prevents the appearance of autism, autism is not best explained by genetics.

In fact there are no legitimate psychiatric theories that could not be shown to be false by the hypothetical results of future experiments. Yet you criticize specific psychiatric theories with what you call your "structure of a scientific theory"?

No, a "structure of a scientific theory" does not criticize ideas. Ideas are criticized with other ideas. It is a category error to compare a "structure of a scientific theory" with a psychiatric theory. Your explicitly stated idea is that parenting equally well accounts for all the evidence that is also consistent with psychiatric ideas about causation. So you are comparing your theories about causation with psychiatric theories about causation. But there is a difference between the two. Your theory, unlike psychiatric theories, cannot be shown to be false by any evidence whatsoever and you now admit that.

Yes, ideas and parenting can cause and cure schizophrenia and autism, because as previously argued, they can cause and prevent everything consistent with the laws of physics! You are essentially saying,

1. I think I am correct that parenting causes schizophrenia and autism.

2. My theory is as good an alternative as psychiatric theories because both theories equally well account for all the evidence.

3. There is no evidence that could be presented under any circumstances that could show that I am wrong.

4. Therefore the idea that parenting causes schizophrenia/autism is as good a theory as psychiatric theories.

So if someone presents to you a gravitational theory of star collapse, you certainly can "criticize" the theory by saying that all the evidence of differences in how stars collapse could equally well be accounted for by differences in parenting, because if parents transmit the correct ideas and knowledge to children, they (and not gravity) will determine differences in how stars collapse. And you can say that if you are correct, we don't have to waste resources studying physics (gravity and all that stuff). Instead, we should study parenting.

But you are not likely to be taken too seriously unless you are a bit more specific. In particular, your ideas should lead to demarkable (specifically defined) theories that can (at least theoretically) be shown to be incorrect. This is the case in all legitimate scientific fields including physics, genetics, psychiatry, psychology, neurobiology, etc.

By the way, the study of the way in which particular ideas affect minds and brains has a name. No new research program needs to be invented. This field is called.....PSYCHOLOGY. And yes, the study of infant characteristics and their relationship to parenting styles is a burgeoning field in psychology. It is fascinating!

But please do model how memes (possibly defined as ideas that reproduce between people and are disseminated by brains) influence people. It is an interesting subject. But your ideas about memes will need to be more specific than what you have stated to have meaning to scientists.

by a reader on Mon, 10/08/2007 - 14:26 | reply

I love how you refer to Aspergers as a "mental Disease" moron

I love how you refer to Aspergers as a mental disease! what about your mental disease (Nuerotypical Mental Disease) or NMD. just because you suffer from your devastating condition which doesn't allow you to feel real emotions and truly live your life to the fullest, doesn't mean you can hate on people who can.

by a reader on Tue, 11/20/2007 - 21:58 | reply

ass burgers is bullshit!

Asperger's Syndrome is bullshit. I was diagnosed with it. I am miserable, everone hates me, but that is because i'm just a retarded freak!!!! I'm not giving a mental desease as an esxuse for that!!!!

by fuck off crap assess! on Sun, 01/13/2008 - 19:03 | reply

So wrong

To view any mental illness as fake is the most narrow minded view you could have. ADD, Bipolar and the like are over-diagnosed but there are many out there with these real diseases. Bipolar for instance is recognised as a physical disorder not a mental disease. They have real implications much like more recognised diseases.

It strikes me that all of your researched is terribly skewed and more to the point what qualifies you to make these judgements? I would question anything you ever wrote since none of what you have posted is based on fact.

Why do people insist on sharing their narrow views with the rest of the world.

Perhaps you should be happy that you are not afflicted by one of these so called "fake illnesses". Either do decent research and present an unbiased, factual viewpoint or keep it to yourself.

by Reaper on Mon, 01/14/2008 - 11:05 | reply

Re: Can it Be Shown to be False?

So, I had a similar argument with someone else. And towards the end he said two strange things, which revealed most of the previous discussion missed the real point of disagreement.

First, he isn't sure if apes are intelligent.

Second, he said that, like genes, mountains control human personalities and cultures.

To elaborate on the mountain claim, he meant that human cultures turn out differently in the presence of mountains. Mountains cause different culture than flatlands.

The importance of this claim was that our disagreement was all about the word cause, and not about genes vs memes. He thought that mountains and genes both did the same kind of thing. That'd have been much easier to discuss if we'd stuck to mountains, which are simpler.

So, in case it will help: do you think either of his statements is correct?

If we deplete a neurotransmitter like serotonin in humans and animals and we get behavioral signs of depression in humans and animals, and depressive statements from a person so depleted; and if serotonin repletion reverses the condition, we have evidence that serotonin depletion is a cause of depression. In other words, we have a chemical theory of depression.

How is this more than finding a correlation?

-- Elliot Temple
curi@curi.us
Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 01/29/2008 - 06:37 | reply

The Opposite Theory

How is this more than finding a correlation?

Yes and it may even be less than that!

The observations are consistent with serotonin depletion being a cause of happiness.

In this theory the brain enters a state of depression in an attempt to restore equilibrium levels of serotonin following the intervention.

(Rather like a car driver applying the brakes to try to prevent an accident. The accident is not caused by braking.)

by Tom Robinson on Wed, 01/30/2008 - 13:20 | reply

Science vs. Superstition

Let's be clear. I have stated psychiatric theories (which may be correct or not) that can theoretically be shown to be false. Your theory (that parenting causes schizophrenia) by your own admission can not be shown to be false.

The way you've stated your theory (which states that schizophrenia is caused by parenting) is therefore not a scientific theory. Your theory is like the "theory" that creation "science" is real. It could be the case that G-d created the world in 7 days and faked all evidence to test our faith, but it is not something that scientists address. Like your theory, these theories "explain all the evidence" but can not be shown to be false.

Psychiatric theories are in their infancy, and could use a lot of work. But they are scientific theories, and can be refuted. Therefore, progress can be made.

Psychiatric theories try to identify many causes of psychological phenomena, including chemical causes, parental causes, and cultural causes.

The theory that deficits in serotonin transmission are a cause of depression are interesting but surely very incomplete. The fact that those with low levels of serotonin (actually its 5-HIAA metabolite) in the cerebrospinal fluid tend to commit suicide is interesting. The fact that depletion of serotonin in the brain causes normal people (with no history of depression) to become depressed is interesting. Repletion of that same chemical in those previously depleted then causes a return to happiness. This suggests that deficiencies in serotonergic transmission are a cause of depression/suicide. I don't understand the argument that it is a correlation, not a cause.

Tom Robinson's argument is no doubt interesting. I just don't understand it. If serotonin depletion caused happiness, then when we experimentally deplete it in those with no depression, the depleted patients should tend to become happier. But they don't, so I'm not exactly sure how his theory works.

by a reader on Mon, 02/04/2008 - 22:09 | reply

Serotonin Depletion

Correction: Depletion of serotonin in those with no history of depression and who are currently not depressed does not lead to depression.

But depletion of serotonin in those with a history of depression but no current depression does lead to depression.

Thanks.

by a reader on Tue, 02/05/2008 - 18:32 | reply

Mountains

If a particular theory about the effect of mountains on a culture is testable and refutable, I would consider that the perception of mountains, like the perception of our parents, can cause us and our culture to change.

Saying that the presence or absence of certain memes in people causes all mental illness, however, is like saying that the presence or absence of certain memes in people causes stars to collapse. Both are true statements. Both are meaningless. Neither advances our knowledge.

by a reader on Tue, 02/05/2008 - 23:00 | reply

correlation does not imply causation

This suggests that deficiencies in serotonergic transmission are a cause of depression/suicide. I don't understand the argument that it is a correlation, not a cause.

In Tom's example, breaking is correlated with dangerous driving, but breaking does not cause dangerous driving. This is one way a correlation may not indicate a cause.

Besides mistakes regarding which causes which, in general correlation does not imply causation because something else might cause both.

For example imagine a correlation between wearing coats and car accidents. One might say that it looks like coats are causing accidents. It even makes sense: coats could hinder movement, thus slowing reaction times, or making people less inclined to turn to see things.

Now imagine someone figures out that rain was causing both coats and accidents. The correlation between coats and accidents did not indicate a cause, after all.

With the serotonin issue, you have not ruled out rain. There may be a non-obvious cause.

I will continue, but I want to check if you understand and agree, first. If you do not, let's discuss that before going on.

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Blog

by a reader on Sat, 02/09/2008 - 21:25 | reply

Correlation Does Not Imply Causation (Right)

You are right. Correlation does not imply causation. But I think you may be confusing the two.

Let us define a few terms. When it comes to the social sciences and medicine, when we say that event (A) causes event (B), we do NOT mean that (A) is a necessary precondition for B to occur. And when we say that event A causes event (B), we also do NOT mean that (A) is a necessary and sufficient precondition for event (B) to occur. We do not use this language because virtually no event in medicine or the social sciences is an absolutely necessary precondition or an absolutely necessary and sufficient precondition for some other event to occur.

Instead when we say that event A causes event B, we mean that event A increases the likelihood that event B will occur.

If a third hypothetical factor (say cancer) caused the body to lower brain serotonin and if the cancer also made people depressed, then cancer would be causing depression and lowering serotonin. Low serotonin levels would CORRELATE with depression, not cause it.

But placebo controlled experiments show that in subpopulations of subjects, lowering serotonin is in fact followed subsequently by depression, relative to subjects taking an active placebo. The only statistical difference between the group that gets the placebo and the group that experiences the active intervention is that the active intervention group has serotonin lowered. Therefore a third factor (like cancer) should not be relevant because large enough groups have been chosen to make sure that both groups do not statistically vary, except that one group has serotonin depleted and the other takes an active placebo.

In these conditions, serotonin depletion has been found to make depression statistically more likely (in non-depressed patients with a history of depression) and serotonin repletion has been found to make happiness more likely. That is, serotonin depletion is a cause of depression and serotonin repletion is a cause of happiness, given the way I have defined the word "cause".

I don't understand what Tom Robinson is saying. But those who talk about drivers of cars using their brakes in order to prevent automobile accidents, while discussing mental illness, are usually using the arguments of a famous antipsychiatrist.

His claim was that serotonin deficiency has not been found to cause depression just because low levels of cerebrospinal fluid serotonin (actually metabolites) have been found to correlated with reports of depression. He argued, for example, that depression could cause low levels of serotonin, not that low serotonin necessarily causes depression.

He apparently was not yet aware that creative, blinded, and placebo-controlled experiments were being performed in which serotonin was effectively removed from the brains of individuals with a history of depression, but with no current depression. These individuals rapidly became depressed. When serotonin was replenished, the previously depleted individuals were restored to happiness. Therefore serotonin depletion increased the probability of a subgroup of individuals becoming depressed. That is, serotonin depletion caused depression and serotonin repletion caused happiness. The arrow of causation was demonstrated.

A second argument that the famous antipsychiatrist used against the serotonin-depletion argument went like this (although we now know that it was mostly wrong):

1. Serotonin may have nothing to do with regulating mood. Perhaps it actually regulates heart rate, for example.
2. If something occurs that causes serotonin levels to fall, the body has compensatory mechanisms to raise serotonin levels, in order to protect the body from the effects of low serotonin. The body "wants" to protect itself against the low levels of serotonin because in the hypothetical example, normal serotonin levels are needed to have a normal heart beat.
3. According to this (incorrect) theory, depression is a compensatory mechanism to raise serotonin levels.
4. This theory does correctly predict that experimentors will find low levels of serotonin in people who are depressed. According to the discredited theory, low levels of serotonin cause the body to respond with a clinical depression in order to raise serotonin levels.

So when scientists take needed serotonin away from the brains of people using experimental interventions, this theory by the antipsychiatrist says that the experimentors are causing something bad to happen to the person, analogous to someone creating a situation in which a car accident is about to happen. The body's creation of depression in response to the serotonin deprivation is like a person using the brakes of a car to prevent a accident. So depression (like braking in an automobile) is a good thing because depression raises serotonin levels (just as hitting the breaks prevents the car accident). Depression in brains/minds (like brakes in a car) can be seen as something that protects people. Neuroscientists have taken the above argument seriously and most aspects of it have been shown to be wrong (and one aspect might be sort-of true). At some point, I will explain the evidence showing you why it is wrong. But even if the theory were TRUE, how Tom Robinson manages to get from the above stated theory to the idea that serotonin depletion causes happiness is beyond me. His arguments don't make sense (to me) and seem illogical. Serotonin depletion is not causing happiness, any more than car accidents in his analogy are helping to protect people.

But for the sake of argument, let's assume the theory by the antipsychiatrist is TRUE. That is, let's assume that the body creates depression in order to raise serotonin levels depleted by experimentors or depleted by other causes of serotonin deficiency. This would explain why low levels of metabolites of serotonin are found in the cerebrospinal fluid of subjects who say they are depressed.

Do you think serotonin depletion by experimentors then causes or is correlated with depression (if we assume that my recounting of the serotonin depletion experiments is accurate). Do you think that serotonin repletion then causes or is correlated with restoration to happiness?

by a reader on Mon, 02/11/2008 - 20:14 | reply

Mean Relatives

There are those with Asperger's who are nice, there are those with Asperger's who are mean, and there are those who do not have Asperger's who are mean.

I don't know which your relative is.

But please don't give up on the mentally ill and those with developmental disabilities because you know someone who has been diagnosed with Asperger's and is unpleasant.

The reality of Asperger's disorder as a legitimate condition does not hinge on the behavior of your relative. Right?

I know of no psychiatrist who thinks that people are just chemical reactions. The issue is that the structure of the brain and its chemistry is a relevant consideration when discussing behavior.

by a reader on Mon, 02/18/2008 - 20:57 | reply

re: Correlation Does Not Imply Causation (Right)

when we say that event A causes event B, we mean that event A increases the likelihood that event B will occur.

That is a bad definition, because it's too vague. It's sort of like saying playing good moves increases the likelihood of winning chess games, and that this is the same thing as causing chess victories.

OK, it superficially sounds true, but you can easily play good moves and lose, and various strategies for playing good moves will in fact cause chronic losing (like spending too much time on them too early in the game, then running out of time).

It also reminds me of the approaches to epistemology which try to support or justify theories and then say they are "more likely" to be true. All (existing) approaches to epistemology which speak in terms of theories being likely to be true, are bad. And imprecise. When they say something is likely, they don't bother to work out when it will happen, and when it won't.

And that's what matters. Not what is "likely". How likely? What are the exceptions? Why? Will this apply in a different situation? All other instances of it are different situations in some sense. Different time, usually different place, usually different people, lots of subtle differences. Which ones matter? If you have an explanation of what's going on, then you can evaluate which types of differences should matter, and which similarities will allow the explanation to still apply. If all you have is "more likely", then you have no clue.

Therefore a third factor (like cancer) should not be relevant because large enough groups have been chosen to make sure that both groups do not statistically vary

That's not entirely accurate because you can't check whether there is statistical variance between two groups, or not, for a factor you haven't thought of. However, I am not claiming that the active and control groups in any studies were chosen badly and have a bias of any kind, so it's ok.

In these conditions, serotonin depletion has been found to make depression statistically more likely

What I am suggesting is possible is that many people (but not all, which is why the depletion makes depression more likely but not guaranteed) have a certain "vulnerability". It consists of bad ideas about how to react to certain environments. And keep in mind I'm not saying we know this is the case, but rather that the evidence for the mainstream position is consistent with this alternative possibility. And if we are to consider which theory is true between two rivals, we cannot use any evidence that is consistent with both of them.

So for example, imagine people who yell and scream wildly, when put on a roller coaster. The analogy of your position is to say that roller coasters increase the likelihood of yelling and screaming, and thus (statistically) cause yelling and screaming.

And the analogy of my position is to say that, perhaps, roller coasters don't cause yelling and screaming in all people. Perhaps, they don't cause it at all, in any people. Perhaps what's going on is that some people, with certain ideas, choose to yell and scream when put in certain situations. The situation is not the cause, their ideas are. This is fairly clear in the roller coaster case, because any "screamer" could easily resist and remain quiet throughout the ride, if they wanted to -- if it was important for some reason.

Back to mental illnesses, could we agree that if it's the case that some people decide to get depressed in low serotonin situations, based on their ideas, and they could do otherwise if they A) wanted to and B) knew how then it's inaccurate to say serotonin causes depression?

*Do you think serotonin depletion by experimentors then causes or is correlated with depression*

I think the experiment only shows a correlation, which is perfectly consistent with scenarios in which it does not really cause depression. The experiments are thus inconclusive.

- Elliot Temple
www.curi.us

by a reader on Tue, 02/19/2008 - 04:41 | reply

Cause Again

"when we say that event A causes event B, we mean that event A increases the likelihood that event B will occur."

A Reader

That is a bad definition, because it's too vague. It's sort of like saying playing good moves increases the likelihood of winning chess games, and that this is the same thing as causing chess victories. OK, it superficially sounds true, but you can easily play good moves and lose, and various strategies for playing good moves will in fact cause chronic losing (like spending too much time on them too early in the game, then running out of time).

Elliot Temple

If a patient has high blood pressure and I recommend that he take a beta-blocker because "placebo controlled studies show that beta-blockers cause individuals with similar conditions to live longer", do you think I have misled the patient because I have used the word "cause"?

If the beta-blocker is not causing the average patient in a given situation to live longer, based on the results of placebo controlled studies, why should he take the medicine?

by a reader on Tue, 02/19/2008 - 19:36 | reply

Lynching

During slave times in America, some of those with black skin were lynched. Do you think black skin is correlated with or causes lynching?

by a reader on Tue, 02/19/2008 - 20:55 | reply

If a patient has high blood p

If a patient has high blood pressure and I recommend that he take a beta-blocker because "placebo controlled studies show that beta-blockers cause individuals with similar conditions to live longer", do you think I have misled the patient because I have used the word "cause"?

Yes, you are misleading him a bit. (Disregarding the issue of how precise doctors should be in explaining stuff to their patients.)

The studies didn't show that beta blockers cause increased longevity for those groups. The studies are consistent with that being false.

Check out wikipedia on beta blockers. It has paragraphs of explanation about how they work. This explanation was not created by the studies it was created by the creative thought of scientists. This kind of explanation is the actual basis for suggesting the medicine to the patient. Explanation can reference studies and they can be helpful to it, but the studies alone don't get us anywhere.

Of course being black doesn't cause rope to constrict around your neck. Those lynchings were caused by irrational (and immoral) culture. If you want to know who will get lynched, what you need to investigate is not the innate consequences of being black, but rather the set of people the culture hates. Being black has only a very superficial role in the proceedings.

- Elliot
www.curi.us

by a reader on Wed, 02/20/2008 - 05:22 | reply

"Yes, you are misleading him

"Yes, you are misleading him a bit. (Disregarding the issue of how precise doctors should be in explaining stuff to their patients.)

The studies didn't show that beta blockers cause increased longevity for those groups. The studies are consistent with that being false."

Elliot Temple

You're mistaken. According to well designed studies, in many subgroups of patients who have had a heart attack, beta blockers do decrease average mortality rates.

"This explanation (for how beta blockers work) was not created by the studies it was created by the creative thought of scientists. This kind of explanation is the actual basis for suggesting the medicine to the patient."

You're correct that people who are able to think create theories. The results of studies do not create theories. But the results of studies often do help people to create theories.

For example, it used to be thought that any medicines which lowered blood pressure approximately the same amount had approximately equivalent efficacy. Distinctions were made about which medicine to prescribe based upon side-effect profiles.

Obviously, one can't observe something without the brain/mind having at least some theory about what to look for. But that doesn't mean that we have good explanations for that which we see!

Doctors observed that blood pressure medications that acted primarily within the brain did not seem to work as well as blood pressure medications that worked primarily on the heart and blood vessels, though both could lower blood pressure the same amount. Studies were conducted showing that medicines that worked in the brain (centrally acting) were in fact not as effective in preventing bad outcomes as other medicines that acted in the periphery of the body.

When these studies came out, we changed our behavior before we really could explain why the medications primarily acting in the brain did not do as well as medications primarily acting in the body. We prescribed according to what the study indicated was better, before we knew why it was better.

We do now have reasonable explanations, but it was the study results that changed our prescribing practices, not the explanation. And our patients were happy about being healthier without knowing why. And it was the study results which prompted us to start looking for reasons why the two types of medicines led to different outcomes.

Nowadays we use duloxetine, for example, to treat certain types of pain, yet we really don't know most of the details about how it works. But doctors are willing to prescribe it and patients are more than willing to take it, because the studies say it decreases certain types of pain with relatively minimal side-effects. And patients feel the difference!

In a world of imperfect knowledge, medical practitioners often have made many improvements, not by being able to explain everything, but rather by being able to observe differences between things (using studies). Observed differences can often mean the difference between life and death or just being in pain or not being in pain, long before explanations are provided.

Yes we would like the explanations for medical phenomena. But often the observed differences precede our ability to explain the differences.

Contrary to what you have said, I think most patients would be willing to take a beta-blocker if they knew it increased their chances of living longer, without bad side-effects, even if they did not know exactly why it did so. Perhaps you would, too.

by a reader on Mon, 02/25/2008 - 18:39 | reply

Confusion of Cause and Correlation

Unfortunately Elliot, I think you are still confusing the concepts of "non-explanatory cause" and "correlation". The two are not the same.

Black skin tones (and the genes that created them) were a cause of lynching, but these factors are not accurate explanations of why lynching occurred. Racism, not genes, is an accurate explanation of lynching. Historians and scientists are interested in explanation much more than cause, but confusing cause and correlation makes your arguments unclear.

Let me quote a conversation that occurred on the World concerning the subject of whether genes for black skin cause lynching.

Gil tried to argue that genes for black skin are not a cause of racism, but rather are correlated with it, using an argument similar to yours.

"I think we are comfortable about denying the role of the victims' genes in lynchings or the Holocaust as causes because we have better explanations that account for the observed genetic correlations as being non-causal factors in the explanations."

Gil

I wish to point out that an editor of the World did not agree with Gil's argument that genes for black skin were merely correlated with lynching behavior. I quote him exactly, except for the capitalization which I add for emphasis.

"But in the examples I gave, the genes are NOT JUST NON-CAUSAL factors and the observed effects are NOT MERELY CORRELATIONS. The genes in question are perfectly genuine, OVERWHELMINGLY SIGNIFICANT, CAUSES of the given effects. But ONLY IN ONE SENSE, not in another."

An Editor

I think the editor is saying that genes are causes of lynching, but they do not explain why lynching occurred. Genes are causes, but they are not accurately thought of as explanatory causes of lynching.

When you say that serotonin depletion in vulnerable populations, relative to placebo interventions, is correlated with depression, but does not cause it, you are making the same logical error that Gil made, which prompted obvious disagreement from the editor.

I think what you mean to say is that you think that serotonin depletion is not an explanatory cause of depression. Ultimately the important question is whether serotonin depletion, in addition to being a cause of depression in certain populations, is also a relevant explanation of depression. I will address that point in my next post.

by a reader on Mon, 02/25/2008 - 23:32 | reply

i have AS and i don't appreci

i have AS and i don't appreciate it being called a mental illness.

Development vs. Illness

J

What is the difference between a developmental disability and a mental illness, in your view?

by a reader on Tue, 02/26/2008 - 21:35 | reply

Your 'explanatory cause' term

Your 'explanatory cause' terminology is fine with me. That is, roughly, what I mean by "cause". Using the more literal sense of cause does not accord with common sense usage which uses 'cause' to mean something like "important or relevant cause".

I did not object at all to patients taking beta blockers, I only thought your endorsement of them was somewhat misleading. The studies don't show the conclusion that you said. Our best guess of how to explain the studies is that conclusion (medical benefit). And I think we also have pretty good explanations. But if it was only the studies, then you should tell the patient we don't know, but our best guess is he should take it. (And if there was a major rival theory, which I think there isn't, then you should say that also.)

*When these studies came out, we changed our behavior before we really could explain why the medications primarily acting in the brain did not do as well as medications primarily acting in the body. We prescribed according to what the study indicated was better, before we knew why it was better.*

That's fine if no one has a better idea. Essentially there is an explanatory theory which states, "This medicine somehow reduces blood pressure which somehow has the following medical benefits..." That's not a very good explanation due to the omitted details, but it does accord with the facts of the studies, and if there is no rival theory, then it's the best explanation available. If there is a rival theory with equal or better quality of explanation, then it's insufficient.

- Elliot
www.curi.us

by a reader on Wed, 02/27/2008 - 05:03 | reply

OK

"I did not object at all to patients taking beta blockers, I only thought your endorsement of them was somewhat misleading. The studies don't show the conclusion that you said."

They don't? How so? Which studies are you referring to?

"Your 'explanatory cause' terminology is fine with me. That is, roughly, what I mean by "cause". Using the more literal sense of cause does not accord with common sense usage which uses 'cause' to mean something like 'important or relevant cause' "

When you confuse placebo controlled studies (which can show causation) with correlational studies (which don't), it is difficult to know what to say. But I am glad we can agree on terminology, for now.

I will respond later to the question of whether serotonin depletion is an explanatory cause of depression. Or rather, whether the structure of your argument enables any reasoning or data (whatsoever) to demonstrate that it is.

by a reader on Thu, 02/28/2008 - 00:50 | reply

I haven't confused studies (i

I haven't confused studies (in my opinion) and don't believe correlation studies show causation (in any sense) because there could be a non-obvious factor which is causing both things. Those studies don't rule out that possibility, therefore they don't prove a causation.

That applies to placebo controlled studies about beta blockers, depression, or anything else.

- Elliot

by a reader on Thu, 02/28/2008 - 01:29 | reply

sorry that was worded a bit c sorry that was worded a bit confusingly and i can't edit it...

the reason i haven't clearly differentiated placebo controlled studies and correlation studies is that they are the same thing. using no placebo gets you nothing. using a control group gets you a correlation.

- Elliot

by a reader on Thu, 02/28/2008 - 01:39 | reply

Clarification

Assume a theory exists explaining (to some extent) why taking a particular pill ought to help people with a particular condition (on average) to live longer than any other intervention. If a well done placebo-controlled study evaluating the theory finds to a highly statistically significant degree that those taking the active intervention live longer without side-effects, and if a doctor and patient cannot see any reason to believe that the given patient is different from average, should the study make the rational patient more likely to take the medicine?

Should rational people be more willing to take the pill, everything else equal, before any study was done, or after? Why?

by a reader on Thu, 02/28/2008 - 14:13 | reply

Correlation Again

"using a control group gets you a correlation."

Why do carefully designed, placebo controlled studies evaluating well-defined a-priori hypotheses allow us to make statements about correlation, but not causation.

I am using causation in the non-explanatory sense.

by a reader on Thu, 02/28/2008 - 15:26 | reply

Why do carefully designed, pl

Why do carefully designed, placebo controlled studies evaluating well-defined a-priori hypotheses allow us to make statements about correlation, but not causation.

I am using causation in the non-explanatory sense.

They don't rule out the possibility that something else you hadn't thought of is the cause.

re pill - yes, take it, if no one has thought of a rival theory suggesting you shouldn't. and the study in this case definitely provides useful information to rational people. for example, the people in the study didn't get any nasty, obvious side effects.

- Elliot

by a reader on Thu, 02/28/2008 - 19:34 | reply

They don't rule out the possi

They don't rule out the possibility that something else you hadn't thought of is the cause.

Elliot

I don't understand. Are you commenting on randomization procedures? The groups differ (on average) in that one group is prospectively randomized to placebo and one group to the active intervention. This also can be checked (not perfectly, but checked) after the study. Since the groups differ (on average) by one getting placebo and the other getting the active intervention, it would seem that if the placebo group ends up differing to a statistically different degree from the group that gets the intervention, the intervention caused the difference.

And if the intervention did not cause the difference, then why do you think we can conclude that a correlation was established between the intervention and an effect?

by a reader on Fri, 02/29/2008 - 01:36 | reply

if there is a hidden cause, c

if there is a hidden cause, causing both things, then it's still a correlation because both things are being caused together in this way.

so for example, if aliens used mind-rays to cause depression, only in patients given serotonin-depleting drugs, the study would conclude that serotonin-depleting drugs cause depression, but this would be false, because actually mind-rays do. however, the drugs would still be correlated with depression, and that link would hold up as long as the aliens kept up the same policy.

the way to rule out alien mind rays is not placebos, and it's not randomization. it's only philosophical argument.

once that's established, you have to consider what you can rule out by argument, and what you can't. we can reasonably rule out the mind rays as a bad explanation. but in some cases there is a theory, consistent with the study data, but different than the conclusion presented by the researchers, that we can't reasonably rule out by argument (or that maybe we can, but it's controversial and non-obvious). in that case, the study can't tell us the answer, and hasn't proven anything.

by a reader on Fri, 02/29/2008 - 02:20 | reply

You're correct that it is dif

You're correct that it is difficult to measure what an intervention (material object) in an experiment is. But this argument can be applied to all material objects utilized in explanations as well. A material object whose function you think you are explaining may in fact not be that object, but instead could be another object, that merely looks like it and is correlated with it.

For example, alien mind rays can make atoms appear in experiments every time you look for them and every time you try to explain why they exist, and search for them. So then atoms don't really cause or explain anything, either. Their "pretend appearance" in physics merely correlates with an attempt to explain atoms. We can hypothesize that the aliens only fabricate their existence when you try to explain atoms. The appearance of atoms, as an explanatory factor, is merely an illusion created by mind rays.

So not only do experiments not show cause, explanations do not provide real explanations, either.

We do need to be careful to identify that we analyze carefully our interventions in experiments (is serotonin depletion really serotonin depletion, or is it instead alien mind rays?) and explanations (is evolution caused by selection or by alien mind rays when we look at anthropological evidence.)

But saying that we cannot establish causality using carefully constructed a-priori hypotheses (with experimental tests of the hypothesis) is equivalent to saying that we cannot come up with reasonable explanations, either, because what we think we are explaining is actually just correlated with something else that is the real cause.

By the way, your argument also makes correlation impossible. Why? The aliens mind rays do not have to be turned on only when serotonin is depleted. So serotonin depletion is not actually correlated with depression, either.

If careful theorizing, with subsequent comparisons of placebo and active intervention, does not establish our best understanding of cause in medicine, then comparisons of explanations do not establish our best understanding of explanations, either. Your argument, taken to its logical conclusion, is that explanation, cause, and correlation are all impossible because whatever material object we are describing (for example serotonin depletion) is actually something else (alien mind rays), merely correlated with the apparent object.

But if nothing that we theorize has any reality, because it could be correlated with something else, then we live in a world where our minds can discern nothing real. That is, we live in a solipsistic world.

by a reader on Sat, 03/01/2008 - 21:05 | reply

Cause and Correlation

Elliot,
"for example, if aliens used mind-rays to cause depression, only in patients given serotonin-depleting drugs, the study would conclude that serotonin-depleting drugs cause depression, but this would be false, because actually mind-rays do."

So would you say that serotonin depletion, in this study with the aliens, causes or is correlated with depression? (I am using cause in the non-explanatory sense).

by a reader on Sat, 03/01/2008 - 22:54 | reply

1 2 | next page | last page

“Human Beings Are Headed Into The Cosmos”

Hurray! Human explorers are going to Mars! Humans are going to live on the moon! Human beings are headed into the cosmos!

Yes, yes, in a better world, government would have no role in these developments. The private sector would be doing it, and doing it better and more efficiently, and of course without coercing the taxpayer or anyone else. But the idea that, in this imperfect world in which we live, it would be preferable for the human race not to embark on this adventure, or to delay it for decades, just because of an aversion to government projects, is breathtakingly narrow. Glenn Reynolds, advocate of space exploration though he is, can't work up any enthusiasm: he says a lot of money will be wasted. Of course it will! This is a government agency we're talking about here. But it's the only game in town, Glenn. Andrew Sullivan calls it “fiscal recklessness” and speaks on behalf of the future generations who will have to pay for it. He too is absolutely right – and heartbreakingly wrong.

Future generations will not look back on this moment with condemnation. They will not say “there was the beginning of our poverty and our bankruptcy”, for, in fact, they will be rich and solvent despite this. And they will be colonising the cosmos. That such a wonderful thing was initially achieved through such inefficient and morally questionable means will be a mere footnote in their history, as ironic, and also as irrelevant, from their point of view, as the fact that it was achieved by people who still spanked their children.

Update: Lileks gets it right.

Thu, 01/15/2004 - 12:51 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Proponents of private sector ...

Proponents of private sector development should welcome this as an opportunity to have NASA relieved of the 'distraction' of commercial satellite launches.

by Kevin on Thu, 01/15/2004 - 19:45 | reply

Public monopoly

But it's the only game in town, Glenn

Well, yes, but won't Nasa's going to Mars help to keep Nasa the only game in town? Private initiatives like the Xprize will lose out on publicity because of Nasa. Without publicity and sponsorship they will find it harder (literally) to get off the ground. When space tourism or whatever gets going it will do so profitably and therefore there'll be far more launches per year. There will be no hiatus, like after Apollo. That will mean less hard-won knowledge will be lost. Plus there'll be many different companies involved which means more creativity and fewer blind alleys. Progress from tourism to interplanetary mining could actually turn out to be quite rapid.

So let's hope we're not inadvertently delaying the colonisation of the cosmos. Of course, if we do get to Mars, whoever pays the bill, I'll be glued to the telly just like everybody else!

by Tom Robinson on Thu, 01/15/2004 - 20:51 | reply

Make money on Mars!

Bookies are giving out very good odds for those of you who are only slightly optimistic about our chances of reaching the moon or mars. Great way to save for your pension!

Henry Sturman

by Henry Sturman on Fri, 01/16/2004 - 19:03 | reply

Re: Make Money on Mars!

Here's an even better way:

Space Bonds!

by David Deutsch on Fri, 01/16/2004 - 21:49 | reply

Wrong

It's not "morally questionable". It's morally wrong. That's something that The World is usually unafraid to recognize and take seriously.

I'm enthusiastic about human beings exploring and colonizing the cosmos, but not so much as to violate important principles.

Our commitment to free speech isn't tested by having to defend speech that we agree with, but speech that we find horribly wrong. Likewise, our commitment to limited government is tested by having to oppose government projects whose consequences we expect to like. The World has failed this test.

It's ironic that this post comes immediately after one in which The World correctly denounces enforced treatment of spurious diseases by saying: 'This breach of human rights is casually justified as being "for their own good".' It seems to me that The World is guilty of the same thing here against those who would prefer to pursue their own goals rather than ours.

Also, I think Tom Robinson is right that a government space program could inhibit progress rather than accelerate it, and that there are already good private alternatives to government-run space programs.

The government has a role. It can clarify property-rights and liability issues. It can remove obstructive regulations that make it difficult for willing people to pursue dangerous projects. It should pursue space-based projects with justified security-related benefits. Otherwise, it should stay out of the way.

Gil

by Gil on Sun, 01/18/2004 - 22:27 | reply

i declare gil an anti-gubmit fanatic version 1: the war on terror is an increase in gubmint. QED version 2:

but we aren't committed to smaller government in the sense of opposing all expansions of government of any sort for any reason. for example we liked the war in Iraq. we like this too.

on the road to smaller government, we know sometimes it will wind, not slowly decline with no increases ever. that's how it should be (sometimes it needs to wind, and this should be supported, b/c certain things need to get done, and the government is sometimes in best position to do them). blindly opposing everything good or bad is not our policy, just yours.

PS i don't get how gubmint program is supposed to stop private one. is it that ppl will say "nah, we don't need you fools, we got NASA"? if so, won't that only happen if NASA is doing a r0xx0r job ... ie if the private guys are being out-competed? (by a government agency no less! oh the same and humiliation!) if not that, is it that NASA spends part of budget on assassins? or what?

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 01/19/2004 - 09:20 | reply

why not NASA?

Because something funded by taxation requires 257 layers of bureacracy; $100 of investment in a project gives a return of $2.50, whereas in a privately-funded initiative, $100 of investment gives a return of $30 (hey, I checked these figures, they're absolutely accurate ;))

Because people spending their own money on what they want are more likely to demand and receive good service than people spending other people's money on something that yet another set of people want.

Because government-funded projects get all muddled up with appearances and the necessity of being re-elected rather than with solving the actual problems.

Emma

<http://rationalparents.blogspot.com/>

by a reader on Mon, 01/19/2004 - 12:13 | reply

Re: Wrong

Gil says:

It's ironic that this post comes immediately after one in which The World correctly denounces enforced treatment of spurious diseases by saying: 'This breach of human rights is casually justified as being "for their own good".' It seems to me that The World is guilty of the same thing here against those who would prefer to pursue their own goals rather than ours.

It seems to me that that analogy only holds on the basis of some assumptions which I, for one, doubt are true.

One is that the overall burden of taxation (including inflation and other economic effects of government) on the American people will be higher as a result of this project than it would have been otherwise. But I would expect that the total level of taxation is, and will be for the foreseeable future, determined almost independently of the final destination of the diverted resources. In short, the government takes whatever it can get away with, and it spends it on whatever it judges best. Though the totals are linked by the inexorable laws of arithmetic, and though popular forms of expenditure do have a slight tendency to make taxation in general more politically acceptable than unpopular ones, there is no mechanism within government that links particular spending with particular taxation. Indeed, there can't be: money is fungible. Comparing, as you do, the Mars project with the invention of a new metaphorical disease and the consequent violations of children's rights, it might likewise be argued that children who behave defiantly were going to be punished anyway, so the invention of the new disease and new forms of punishment has caused no net harm. Well, I doubt that that is factually true, but if it were true then surely it would indeed diminish the force of The World's objection to such practices. But either way, my point here is that your "guilty" verdict against The World depends on your making a certain (counter)factual assumption about what would otherwise have happened to the resources now destined for the Mars project. If you accept that that assumption is in any way questionable, you must accept that it is at least as questionable that the Mars project is immoral.

A second assumption is, in effect, that the Mars project is not economically viable: that it will not in the long run make a sufficient return on the investment. I am sure it will, and I think you are too, Gil. But implicitly you are assuming it will not, by characterising the government's action as being "against those who would prefer to pursue their own goals rather than ours". For though, admittedly, any scheme funded by taxation will in some vague (because of fungibility) sense force opponents of the project to contribute to it, one could equally well say that a refusal to go to Mars would be forcing Mars-oriented taxpayers to divert their precious Mars funds to the purchase of canes for schools, or whatever other function of government strikes you as the most foul. And if the Mars project is, in fact, profitable while the canes project is, in fact, destructive of resources, then the latter interpretation is more accurate.

I also don't accept that the Mars project will tend to divert private funds away from space by being more exciting. There are plenty of exciting things to do in space, and if anything, each of them draws more attention to the others by making us into a more spaceward-looking culture.

So in summary, I think that "morally questionable" was a fair way of characterising the means by which the human race will now begin its historic move outwards into the cosmos. The move itself, and President Bush's decision to initiate it under government auspices, is not wrong, but right.

This is not a case of 'the end justifying the means'. Government is not the means by which we are going to Mars. The means is human creativity. Government is the obstacle. But under existing political circumstances, the choice facing the President was whether it was to become a relatively minor obstacle, causing inefficiency (and being morally questionable), or an obstacle that would remain insuperable for decades or perhaps centuries. Which would be very wrong.

by David Deutsch on Mon, 01/19/2004 - 12:15 | reply

It seems to me that we have g...

It seems to me that we have governments to do those things that markets don't do well but which some large subset of us can agree are good and which we'd like to see happen. I think that opening up space is one of those things, for reasons that I've outlined in my article "The Economics of Interface Transportation". For those who don't want to follow the link, my argument is essentially that because the launch vehicle market is highly inelastic, evolutionary developments of current vehicles won't take us into an elastic region, and getting to such a region will require more investment that private companies can raise, we're dependent on governments if we want to develop space using our current technological approaches.

(Actually, the purpose of that article wasn't to support government space programmes but rather to set up an argument for alternative private approaches to space development in a third article in the series which I haven't yet found time to write.)

- Rich

by Rich on Mon, 01/19/2004 - 19:49 | reply

Belated hurrah

This argument of David's

In short, the government takes whatever it can get away with, and it spends it on whatever it judges best.

together with this one

There are plenty of exciting things to do in space, and if anything, each of them draws more attention to the others

..have persuaded me to join in the 'hurrahs' for Mars.

So, hurrah!

Setting NASA the Mars goal will probably (and crucially) help to dissolve the regulatory opposition (that Gil rightly mentions) to private individuals wanting to do space stuff. I still think that, initially, private sponsorship will be reduced as the general public's gaze is fixed on NASA. But the eventual net effect of the first will be to encourage a space-faring culture. It will establish a moral imprimatur in the eyes of some politicians and offer a proof of principle to everybody else.

Perhaps Congress might consider funding some prizes to encourage the private individuals to join the race. How about $1 billion to the first private team to live on the moon for a month, and $3 billion for the team that makes it to Mars and back? These are tiny sums next to NASA's budget. We might even end up with a repeat of the Human Genome Project, where Craig Venter pipped at the post the government-funded academic teams. (Congress should place the funds in independent trusts. This would avoid a repeat of some shameful history when the (English) Board of Longitude quibbled for a decade over rewarding John Harrison for his marine clock.)

Encouraging a space-faring culture might be an antidote to socialism, for two reasons. Firstly, if NASA succeeds, it will raise the psychological stakes for anti-Americanists around the world. Secondly, inhabiting distant reaches of the solar system is a great way to evade taxes. Perhaps it is a universal law that the only way to avert cultural stagnation is to start new colonies in distant places. We did this in New England and Hong Kong, and may perhaps do so in cyberspace. Such considerations should be set against the the morally-questionable funding of NASA.

Of course, as The World conceded straight away, the morally-questionable funding is going to be dreadfully inefficient. (By curious coincidence, the colonists of New England and Botany Bay were themselves morally-questionable in the eyes of those who stayed behind. Need only risk-takers and eccentrics apply?)

For the colonization of the cosmos to gather real momentum, apart from eccentric heroic participants, we'll need some superb innovations. History has shown that these always come from individual inventors and entrepreneurs. First off, we'll need launch systems that keep most of the power generation on the earth's surface. Then there's the hazard of sudden blasts of ionising radiation from sun activity. Then there's an awful lot of biotech to be done to (a) combat space fatigue, and (b) recycle food and atmosphere. The list goes on. We'll need to do a lot of GM (especially if we want to create some of Freeman Dyson's warm-blooded plants or similar such exotic delights). And we may even find that Mars isn't the best place to start and that the Kuiper Belt would be preferable...

by Tom Robinson on Mon, 01/19/2004 - 20:26 | reply

Still Wrong

David,

I don't think your arguments salvage the moral ambiguity you seek. The fact is that the missions will be financed by money taken from people who have earned it, often without consent. That this theft is a small part of a larger regime of theft making it difficult to trace a particular project to particular victimizations does not change its character. It's still wrong to steal the funding for these projects. Yes, canceling one mission will probably not force a tax reduction; but it's a start. And cancelling many such projects will result in less of a tax burden (as you seem to recognize with "almost independently", and "the inexorable laws of arithmetic"). Moral people should be calling for such cancellations.

And it's not true that my point depends on what would otherwise be done with the resources. I'm not responsible for what other harms the government does with the loot, and the threat of such harms does not justify this harm. If the question is "Would you prefer that the money be spent on space missions to being spent on school canes?" then my answer is "Yes, I do." But if the question is: "Should the government use taxes to fund non-security-related space missions?" then my answer is "No, it shouldn't." These are different questions, with different answers.

It's also wrong to propose that my point depends on the second assumption that the Mars mission is not economically viable. It would be wrong for me to invest your money (even with a greater monetary return than you would have) against your will, wouldn't it? The person who should control your resources and your life is you. Not me. And not your neighbors.

And while it's impossible to be sure how this will affect private contributions and investments in private space development, it seems very plausible to me that many will conclude that they're already paying for such development with their taxes and be less inclined to contribute any more to similar and, perhaps, redundant projects.

Gil

by Gil on Tue, 01/20/2004 - 03:22 | reply

thanks for listening

gil continues on with his unstated, unargued premise that lowering taxes is always good. ho hum.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 01/20/2004 - 03:41 | reply

Listening To What?

Elliot,

I'm reluctant to claim that anything is "always" good, but it seems to me that lowering taxes is as likely to be good as Taking Children Seriously, and for similar reasons. It's respecting the autonomy of other people that their status as human beings demands. Even if we're confident that we know better than they do what's good for them. If we cannot convince other people that our project is worthy and that it is a common preference for them to go along with us, then it's probably wrong for us to override their preferences and coerce them into complying.

I think the burden should be on those who think that a government program (whether it's space development, art promotion, schooling, health care, etc.) justifies the taking of people's property to, well, justify it.

Can you?

Gil

by Gil on Tue, 01/20/2004 - 05:01 | reply

listening to me! duh

ok lets say u had the option for this to happen:

1,000 best things US govt does disbanded.

half of freed money returned as tax cuts

other half wasted

would that be good or bad, do you think?

if your only compunction is losing security related programs, you can try the same question except 1,000 best programs not related to security.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 01/20/2004 - 15:48 | reply

Returning Taxes

Elliot,

If "security" is understood to cover all of the law creation and enforcement functions that I think are proper for the government to do, then yes, your second scenario would be good.

I think that every single one of the 1,000 "best" things that the government does that are abuses of force is bad. I think that every dollar returned to those who earned it is good. Dollars mean choices. I prefer the sphere of choices of individuals be large and that of leaders speaking for the collective be constrained to those areas where force is appropriate.

I don't understand the point of your stipulation that half of the funding for those programs be wasted, but it might be less than the current proportion of waste.

Gil

by Gil on Tue, 01/20/2004 - 16:55 | reply

Clarification

After all of these comments I just wanted to put my position in perspective.

I don't think the space program is anywhere close to the worst thing the government does and I'm not going to lose sleep over these new missions. I think of it as being in a similar category as first-class mail delivery. I think it's a good and useful thing, but I think it would be better handled by the private sector.

I agree with the sentiments of this post and am also very enthusiastic about the continued exploration and development of space. My only reason for commenting was that I think that the funding is not merely "morally questionable" but is actually morally wrong. It's far from the worst thing that could happen, but that doesn't make its moral status ambiguous. I think it's important to be clear about this if we want things to evolve in a direction of improvement (as I am optimistic they will).

I strongly disagree with Rich's opinion that "we have governments to do those things that markets don't do well but which some large subset of us can agree are good and which we'd like to see happen." I think this is the point of view that I'd like to see challenged whenever it's brought up as an uncontroversial truth. If a large enough subset of us think something is worthy, then we should have no problem doing it voluntarily. The only advantage of using the government is to coerce those who disagree with the majority to pay for things anyway. This is almost always wrong, and I'm confident it's wrong with respect to the space program.

Gil

Security

So, then, why don't people voluntarily organise national security?

Actually, I think that true space development is one of the few things that a government might be better at than the market, at least until we have launch vehicles that are several orders of magnitude cheaper than Ariane. Furthermore, I see no evidence whatsoever that corporations would invest the tens of billions required in such a high-risk and long-term project when there are much less risky ways to make money in the space industry (such as, for example, winning a larger share of a static or slowly expanding market by having a better success rate as measured using various metrics).

(For those who will doubtless cite the various contenders for the X Prize, I can only say that even winning the prize is incredibly far short of producing a cheap method of accessing space. Instead, it's rather like producing a privately developed version of the X-15.)

- Rich, who wonders if he now has to hand in his Anarchocapitalism membership card...

by Rich on Tue, 01/20/2004 - 18:04 | reply

RE: Security

Rich,

I'm fairly confident that enough people recognize the value of national security that they would adequately fund it voluntarily even understanding the free-rider problem. However, the risks of my being wrong about this are so great, that I support a gradual, rather than immediate, movement in this direction to avoid any gap in security.

The space program is just not that kind of thing.

You are clearly passionate about space development. I am too. Some people are passionate about opera, others about renewable energy research, etc. Being a goal worthy of passion, even by a sizable majority, is just not sufficient IMNSHO to justify stealing the funds. If it takes longer than we'd like to see the progress we hope for, that's too bad.

Gil

by Gil on Tue, 01/20/2004 - 19:06 | reply

Mars tax

Gil,

A person's salary is mostly the creation of his productive labour. But the government also had a hand in its creation, since without a government there'd be no peace and people wouldn't be able to do their jobs. This means that tax isn't exactly like theft. If enough people could be persuaded that taxes should be cut drastically then politicians would probably do so. But, however desirable, cutting taxes might be like cutting the noise level in a restaurant. You need 95% co-operation, otherwise people will soon resume shouting in order to be heard. Logically then, over time, as David said, governments will grab all the taxes they can.

If that's true then the President is very limited in what cuts he could make. If, having read Elliot's comment, he decided to cancel 1000 projects and perhaps merge a few departments then very likely the total budget of other departments would quickly rise to restore the burden.

His primary budgetary choices, then, concern which departments should get more money. He thinks NASA should get more money so we can go to Mars.

The World also thinks it's a good thing to go to Mars. We all agree. Probably, the technical developments needed to start actually colonizing the cosmos will come from private individuals. However the precedents and the general interest in space which NASA's missions will bring about are likely to inspire more individuals to join that creative effort. (BTW, Rich, I think the Xprize will act in this direction too, regardless of the vital need for cheaper launch technology you rightly mention). Also, the missions may help prevent powerful bureaucrats from hampering progress in space with environmental regulation or whatever. Hey, the new politics would be a refreshing change from inward-looking ritual discussions about healthcare and unemployment.

I think we've exonerated Bush. Should government employees, tax collectors, or NASA workers choose differently, like quitting their jobs? I don't think morality over the source of funding comes into this issue directly.

But what about indirectly? There are the two consequentialist arguments I gave above. Encouraging a move out into the solar system might well have tax implications that favour liberty within the not-so-distant future. (One minor point I omitted is that we may see spin-offs for the missile defense shield.)

by Tom Robinson on Tue, 01/20/2004 - 22:12 | reply

Human Beings Are Headed Into The Cosmos

Hurray! Human explorers are going to Mars! Humans are going to live on the moon! Human beings are headed into the cosmos!

I doodled around reading posts and responses on this blog (not gonna respond as "a reader," not gonna happen), and immediately signed up!

Timothy Lang

by Timothy Lang on Sun, 02/01/2004 - 00:32 | reply immediately signed up!

Welcome!

by Editor on Sun, 02/01/2004 - 01:22 | reply

Commercial Satellites

Proponents of private sector development should welcome this as an opportunity to have NASA relieved of the 'distraction' of commercial satellite launches.

I think you are behind the times. Commercial enterprises have taken this on long ago. Lots of folks are lighting the fuses under rockets these days.

Timothy Lang

by Timothy Lang on Sun, 02/01/2004 - 01:50 | reply

Socialism Without The Middle Man

Socialism has traditionally been justified as a process of taking from the undeserving rich to give to the deserving poor. But the process (known as "planning") of deciding how deserving or undeserving each citizen or project is, required a large, powerful and unproductive bureaucracy which was one of several reasons why socialist societies have a strong tendency to slide into economic ruin as well as political tyranny.

Now the socialist masters of Venezuela have come up with a brilliant idea: cut out the middle man – legalise theft:

Supreme Court Judge Alejandro Angulo Fontiveros told Reuters on Wednesday that the so-called "famine theft" clause should be part of a broad penal code reform measure for humanitarian reasons.

"This is a guide for judges to avoid injustice," said Fontiveros, who is in charge of drafting the reforms. "They lock up for years a poor person who lives in atrocious misery and what they need is medicine."

And why not? Who has not at some time been standing in a long queue at the checkout with only a loaf of bread and a rumbling stomach behind somebody buying enough food to supply Michael Moore for an entire day? Wouldn't it be much more convenient to be allowed just to take the bread and leave?

How much more impatient must the people of Venezuela feel? They have been saddled with a bloated, corrupt, shakily democratic welfare state that has been flushing their country down the economic drain for the past 40 years. Their current President, Hugo Chavez, has done everything he could to worsen their economic situation and is refusing to hold an election despite his obligation to do so.

Just to spell it out: The problem is that if Venezuela legalises theft then it will become much harder for anyone to do business since they won't know whether somebody's going to bother to pay or not. As a result, shops will have less incentive to stock goods, there'll be even less of anything for people to steal and sooner or later the entire economy will crash and burn with terrible consequences. The only way to deal with Venezuela's current problems is not to release citizens from the rule of law, but to subject the government to it by holding an election and reforming toward a free market.

Sat, 01/17/2004 - 18:13 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

that's silly

what they really need are theft monitors. they will go around and watch all the stealing, to make sure only the needy steal. if a rich man steals they'll confiscate all his stuff and ~~keep it~~ spread it around. "rich" will be defined as having enough stuff for it to be worth the bother to take it.

monitors won't need to be paid; they will volunteer. ~~to get free stuff~~ out of the goodness of their hearts.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Sun, 01/18/2004 - 16:29 | reply

When they start building a wa...

When they start building a wall around the country is when I'll be concerned. As long as the borders remain open Venezuelans can always escape.

Alan

It's usually the obvious that gets you by surprise

by mythusmage on Tue, 01/20/2004 - 11:14 | reply

Mocking Rachel Corrie

Rachel Corrie was the International Solidarity Movement member who was accidentally killed by an Israeli bulldozer as it was attempting to seal tunnels used to smuggle weapons for use in terrorist murders. E.Nough provides a superb analysis of the morality of various reactions to her death – reactions ranging from crude mockery to indifference to near-worship as a saint.

But for the sake of clarity of exposition, E. Nough has analysed a situation that differs in small but significant respects from the real one, and in doing so, he has let Corrie off too lightly. He says:

Corrie wasn't out to fill mass graves; she was ultimately just a severely misguided fool who let the heat of the moment get the best of her, and paid for it with her life.

[...]

she really was: a dumb, pitiful klutz without enough sense to not stand between a bulldozer and a terrorist tunnel

But in fact, she did not blunder into that situation: it was a calculated risk. That it ended up killing her is no evidence that she was either stupid or incompetent. Warfare involves risk, and even intelligent, competent soldiers sometimes get killed. Moreover, every volunteer in even the most unjust and atrocious of wars is in some sense driven by misguided benevolence, and a vision of a world in which such atrocities will no longer be 'necessary'. So that is not an exculpatory circumstance either. That Corrie was also filled with boiling and sharply focused rage against innocent people is an inculpatory one though.

Those tunnels were (like the Golan Heights) weapons, just as a gun is a weapon even though it never touches the victim and only the bullets that pass through it ever hurt anyone. And a person who knowingly or recklessly sets out to protect weapons, currently in use, is a combatant. And if they are currently in use for murder, she is an unlawful combatant and an accessory to murder.

We should not, in general, make a mockery of the deaths even of unlawful combatants in an unjust and murderous war. For why we should in this case, see E. Nough's article.

Copyright © 2008 Setting The World To Rights

Conspiracy Theories In The Mainstream

Conspiracy theories are an almost ubiquitous feature of irrational political beliefs. (If you haven't been reading our analysis of conspiracy theories we urge you to do so now.) The degree of detachment from reality of some individuals and some entire cultures can be very scary. But what's even more scary is when such theories begin to seep into mainstream political thinking in our own culture. Some recent examples are:

- The theory that Princess Diana was murdered by the British Secret Service – believed by 27% of British people;
- The theory that Dr David Kelly was murdered – taken shamefully seriously by the BBC (see the last paragraph of that article);
- The “It's all about oil” explanation of the liberation of Iraq, including...
- “the dumbest bit of oil-based conspiracy-theory yet”: explaining the recent Mars policy announcement in terms of President Bush's being under the control of mineral-exploration companies (see also this follow-up); and...
- The theory (with heavy antisemitic overtones) of a conspiracy of “neocons” having “taken control” of the President: check out its various versions on Google if you have the stomach for it.

Are you afraid yet?

Wed, 01/21/2004 - 17:43 | digg | del.icio.us | permlink

Nothing new

This is nothing new in American culture. From the myriad JFK theories, to the FDR-Pearl Harbor stuff, to stories going back all the way to the Founding Fathers about their involvement in a secret world-dominating society of Freemasons, conspiracy theories are a part and parcel of American political culture. The real danger here is not the apparent sudden rise, but allowing ourselves to be so deluded as to think this is something new. Its obvious to me that these theories aren't accepted because they're so compelling, but because the mind of the American electorate is such fertile soil for these kinds of theories to grow. And that is the real problem.

-GJM

by a reader on Wed, 01/21/2004 - 18:39 | reply

neocons control bush

i blogged that one. see here

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 01/21/2004 - 18:43 | reply

Link to Curiosity

Elliot Temple wrote

I blogged that one

Linked now.

by Editor on Wed, 01/21/2004 - 21:08 | reply

a reader@18:39 makes a very g...

a reader@18:39 makes a very good point about conspiracy theories not being new in our society. It's probably a little much to imply that they are uniquely or primarily the province of, or spring from the nature of, "American culture"/"American electorate". If you ask me, there are certain other cultures one could name which are more plagued by conspiracy theories, more by at least an order of magnitude. (For starters you might want to look at any society in which "the Protocols" are taken seriously by anything close to a majority....)

-Blix
blix.blogspot.com

by a reader on Thu, 01/22/2004 - 01:47 | reply

Evil In The Mainstream

Dr Jenny Tonge, a Liberal Democrat Member of Parliament and former spokesperson for international development, has caused widespread consternation (though, shockingly, not within her party) by saying that she would consider becoming a suicide bomber if she were a Palestinian.

Please read Oliver Kamm's characteristically trenchant analysis of why

Dr Tonge's remarks are incompatible with any reasonable conception of public service in a constitutional democracy [and] why the empirical claims and the political principles underlying her views are inflammatory nonsense.

We'll wait here while you do that.

We want to make a different point, though: Suppose, for the sake of argument, that you were a Palestinian. (Or, if you are a Palestinian, please read on.) Suppose also, for the sake of argument, that the conditions under which you live have made you so desperately unhappy that you are contemplating suicide, and also so angry that you wish to take some of your oppressors to oblivion with you.

And suppose, finally, that you do not also happen to be a degenerate, evil, sub-human monster.

Then you might indeed attack your oppressors, the authors of your misfortune, such as Yasser Arafat and the other leaders of the Palestinian Authority. You would not attack children whose only connection with your situation is that their parents are trying to prevent them from being murdered by others among your people.

When Dr Tonge and other exponents of the "understandable reaction to oppression" argument take for granted that the understandable target for such a reaction is the nearest Jew and not the actual perpetrator, they are doing more than spouting inflammatory nonsense. They are more than apologists for evil. They are participants.

cause it's so important, and cause it makes u feel kinda dirty to miss it. thanks for posting.

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Fri, 01/23/2004 - 17:58 | reply

Conditions

It would be a fallacious argument that conditions you have been living under have made you so desperately unhappy that you are considering committing suicide. Unhappiness makes you unhappy, not conditions. But nonetheless, for the sake of argument, suicide is a personal act of misguided despair about an internal fugue. Murder is blaming someone else for your own anger. Neither suicide or murder is a viable response to changing conditions in a meaningful way. No one person no matter how vile their opinions are is the essence of the problem. Murder the idea with critical reason. P.S. Dr. Tonge certainly misunderstands human nature and the real reasons why people do or don't do things. Send her to Israel and see what she does, probably nothing better than spout some relativist rhetoric for the drivel media to ham hash.

by a reader on Fri, 01/23/2004 - 18:00 | reply

If they are to attack their oppressors...

why not the religion or say, if a woman, to attack any (most likely) males who have the most effect upon her life? Isn't religion and culture what is keeping people down?

by a reader on Mon, 01/26/2004 - 02:09 | reply

Murder/Suicide as Reaction to Treatment

Thing is, suicide is not a rational action. The suicidal are not reasoning beings. It is an emotional act, and while it makes sense to the suicidal, it cannot be considered rational by any rational definition of the term.

Killing yourself and others with you is an act of desperation. An act of vengeance on a world that has treated you so badly. It's a way of striking out against those you have convinced yourself must die. Reason has nothing to do with it.

Suicide in any form remains unfathomable only so long as we assume the suicidal are rational, reasoning beings. When we accept that suicide bombers etc. are acting emotionally and using irrational reasoning is when we'll start making real progress against the practice.

Alan Kellogg

It's usually the obvious that gets you by surprise

by mythusmage on Tue, 01/27/2004 - 00:00 | reply

erm

Do you have an argument that suicide is not right in any situation?

Do you even have an argument that suicide is not right in any situation where life and death aren't already at stake for other reasons?

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 01/27/2004 - 01:38 | reply

The BBC Is Tacky

The BBC takes seriously the tale of a telepathic parrot which also understands English, tenses and all, and has a sense of humour.

And the tale of an Indian holy man who has not eaten or drunk anything for several decades. (He definitely has a sense of humour.)

And some policemen who are earnestly chasing a lead given to them by a psychic.

And no, they are not merely reporting how irrational some people are: they do not say "psychic", or purported psychic, they say psychic. They do not speak of the alleged finding of a parrot with an almost unparalleled power to communicate, they report the finding as fact. Their tone is indistinguishable from that which they adopt when reporting a Mars landing or a new vaccine. They are taking this nonsense seriously. They are affording it more legitimacy than they do, say, President Bush, to say nothing of the State of Israel. This is not villeepinism. This is not idiotarianism. This is just tacky.

Mon, 01/26/2004 - 20:41 | digg | del.icio.us | permlink

Tacky?

I'm not sure tacky covers it.

It's not exactly villeepinism or idiotarianism; but I think it is related to the desire to appear open-minded and uncritical of anything that goes against traditional, western, philosophy.

It's deference to whatever doesn't make sense to people who are committed to objective reality and reason.

It's not the exact same impulse as the one that makes them side with terrorists against victims, but I think it's related.

Gil

by Gil on Wed, 01/28/2004 - 05:49 | reply

Or, perhaps

I think that a reasonable term (or at least one I've grown fond of) is Generalized Tardedness.

by Anticipatory Retaliation on Fri, 01/30/2004 - 16:51 | reply

I think you're onto something

Gil writes:

I'm not sure tacky covers it.

It's not exactly villepinism or idiotarianism; but I think it is related to the desire to appear open-minded and uncritical of anything that goes against traditional, western, philosophy.

It's deference to whatever doesn't make sense to people who are committed to objective reality and reason.

It's called Political Correctness.

It's not the exact same impulse as the one that makes them side with terrorists against victims, but I think it's related.

The proverbial "silver lining" of the September 11 atrocity is the anti-PC backlash that it has quietly engendered.

by Alan Furman on Sat, 01/31/2004 - 07:31 | reply

Not Tacky

The BBC isn't "tacky" (unless I mis-understand the use here) so much as "wacky."

Think one shot Ananova's Quirkies 3 quick dashes of Weekly World News plus a big shake of New York Times arrogance. Make that two shakes. Okay, three. Add toff accent and serve.

Timothy Lang

by Timothy Lang on Sun, 02/01/2004 - 01:11 | reply

Not Fit To Govern

We criticised the former Leader of the Conservative Party for engaging in pointless, opportunistic sniping [...] without bringing to bear any coherent criticism...

Since then, the Conservative Party has elected a new leader, Michael Howard, but the pointless, opportunistic sniping has continued. If anything, it has become worse, with Howard returning to the issue of whether the Prime Minister or the government "sexed up" the dossier on Iraqi weapons, or behaved dishonourably in their treatment of Dr David Kelly.

Now Lord Hutton, after conducting an enquiry of exemplary thoroughness and fairness into these allegations, has delivered a report that absolutely exonerates Mr Blair, and contains devastating criticisms of the BBC for initiating the whole affair by making "unfounded" allegations against him.

Mr Blair, in accepting the report in Parliament, gave possibly the finest speech of his career.

Mr Howard then had the opportunity to demonstrate leadership, political judgement, and common decency. He failed on all counts. He had previously made numerous allegations of dishonesty against Mr Blair which have now been categorically refuted. A measured apology would not have been out of place, yet far from making one, he actually persevered with similar innuendo. Furthermore, though claiming to accept the conclusions of the Hutton Report, Howard cherry-picked a few incidental remarks in it, and ludicrously took them out of context in order to misinterpret them as supporting this innuendo. To give just one example (¶1396 of the report): Lord Hutton said that if various policy decisions by the Ministry of Defence are looked at in isolation from the surrounding circumstances it would be possible to infer, as some commentators have done, that there was an underhand strategy by the Government to leak Dr Kelly's name to the press in a covert way. For a time at the start of the Inquiry it appeared to me that a case of some strength could be made that there was such a strategy [...]

However as the Inquiry proceeded and I heard more evidence about the surrounding circumstances and the considerations which influenced those in Government I came to the conclusion that the reality was that there was no such underhand strategy.

Howard quoted from the first part of that passage with considerable relish, made no reference to the second, and behaved as though the whole thing constituted a devastating criticism of Mr Blair's integrity.

Michael Howard is not fit to lead a major party; his party is not fit to govern.

Wed, 01/28/2004 - 16:06 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

What He Said

Go and read what Oliver Kamm says about the aftermath of the Hutton Report.

Sample:

The resignations of the two most senior figures in the BBC's management are welcome and honourable. The accompanying verbiage is not. Greg Dyke's pre-recorded assertion yesterday that the BBC acknowledged errors and had taken remedial action bore the hallmarks of one who had no conception of the venality of the BBC's conduct. These were not faults of administrative torpor or inefficiency: they were instances of professional misconduct compounded by an institutional abdication of responsibility to investigate grave and unfounded allegations. The moral evasion of the BBC management in insinuating that, while they resign, they do so having been more sinned against than sinning is an indication in itself of the unfitness of the BBC to be self-regulating or even to be taken seriously as a public-service broadcaster.

Kamm, the Thunderer.

Thu, 01/29/2004 - 22:47 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Three Lettered Air

What is it about three letters of air-time? BBC, CBS, FOX, ABC, CCN, CNN, ETC.

How can they in all seriousness, be taken seriously? Yet some do. BBC, CNN, etc.. Are we so bold to believe that there is such a noble thing as the manufactured news? And, executives(?) who are capable of managing such?

Once I might have been naive to trust all things British. Even Air Time. But I think not.

Now I trust that which is not broadcast, or is broadcast, but only what is clearly thought, and better yet reasonably, rationally spoken, with no authority other than one's own, and other's own, incisive questioning at the end of each sentence. Air time, or not.

by a reader on Fri, 01/30/2004 - 20:04 | reply

Copyright © 2007 Setting The World To Rights

Thuggery Defeats Science

Cambridge University has cancelled the construction of a research laboratory that would have used monkeys for neurological testing because they couldn't afford the security cost of keeping out anti-vivisectionist groups.

One of the animal rights protesters offered the following excuse for thuggery:

"We are absolutely delighted," said a spokeswoman for Animal Aid. In a joint statement with the National Anti-Vivisection Society, the group said the decision signalled that the university failed to show the proposed experiments would be of any use to people. [Our italics]

That is false. Here is what the lab was going to be used for:

The university and the publicly funded Medical Research Council (MRC), said the decision was a great disappointment as the laboratory would have attracted scientists from around the world to work on diseases such as Alzheimer's and Parkinson's.

These terrible diseases are blighting and destroying hundreds of millions of lives at this moment. Making progress in understanding them is the very epitome of what is "of use to people", and Animal Aid's excuse that animal testing doesn't help with curing human diseases is just a sham. They oppose it on principle and most of their factual arguments are pseudo-scientific claptrap. Yes, animals are not perfect models of human biology, but they are better than anything else short of experimenting on living human beings.

It is a shameful indication of the state of our society that this bunch of thugs is empowered to stamp on scientific innovation to the detriment of the entire human race.

Fri, 01/30/2004 - 23:37 | digg | del.icio.us | permlink

Isn't Animal Aid's position a conspiracy theory?

At the risk of seeming to see conspiracy theories everywhere...

When Animal Aid says that the normal processes of scientific peer review and financial oversight are systematically delivering the wrong answer to a factual question ("are animal experiments useful to medical science?") – isn't that a conspiracy theory?

I mean, what are they alleging? That all the scientists in the Establishment get such a huge kick out of cutting up animals that they have agreed to falsify their research reports and reviews, impede their own research, and defraud the public just so they can carry on doing it? Could anything less explain the difference between the MRC's stated opinion and Animal Aid's FAQ?

by David Deutsch on Sat, 01/31/2004 - 00:46 | reply

A Modest Proposal

If the protesters really want to save the monkeys, as well as to address the issue of the animals not modelling human biology perfectly, then I think they should each volunteer to replace a monkey in the experiments.

Their brains are like new (rarely used).

Gil

by Gil on Sat, 01/31/2004 - 00:52 | reply

i bet they're commie vegan ludites too

gil: rofl

dd: i didn't think so from what's quoted here. but i went to their site and OMG. not only do i agree but i have to point out they say:

Animals as 'models' to predict human reactions to drugs or chemicals are worse than useless, with a prediction rate (for harmful side-effects) of only 5-25% - and this is according to a former Director of Huntingdon Life Sciences, the notorious animal testing company! We would actually be better off tossing a coin than relying on animals in risk assessments which is just interminably stupid

and

Animal experiments are in the industry's interests because they can be used to market their products more quickly one wonders how useless animals tests speed up development times as opposed to skipping them.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Sat, 01/31/2004 - 01:12 | reply

re A Modest proposal

I think they should each volunteer to replace a monkey in the experiments. Their brains are like new (rarely used).

Is there any reason to believe that animal-rights protestors' brains would provide a good analog for human biology?

by a reader on Sat, 01/31/2004 - 01:19 | reply

Who says monkeys are like humans?

Surely the animal rights protestors are dealing in flawed arguments and hollow victories. However, the essence of the question is an entirely different one. What is good science?

Part of the answer is found in robust replicability, the speed at which experiments can yield results. This points to why white rats are ubiquitous in human/science studies. Their brains are similar to human brains and their life cycles are short; and they breed really easily; and they live well in crowded conditions of laboratories with few side effects.

Whereas, on the other hand, monkeys appear to be a lot like humans in more ways than brain tissue studies might at first confer. They freak in lab conditions. Catatonia, dystonia, melancholia, feces throwing, screeching, bar chewing. Perfect for studying prison conditions perhaps, but Alzheimers?

There is the essence of the lab study question, what are the best laboratory mediums for particular studies? And, are they crude or finely crafted? Humans are in many cases the best subjects to study humans. It all depends. Ask the right questions, first.

by a reader on Sat, 01/31/2004 - 21:38 | reply

Straws In The Wind

The great structural changes that are currently under way in the world are beginning to have a beneficial effect on the Middle East problem.

This latest analysis by Steven Den Beste is laboured in parts but basically accurate. He examines the subtle yet momentous ways in which side effects of the Iraq campaign are shifting the Arab/Israel dynamic.

The EU is opposing the intervention of the World Court in the issue of Israel's security fence. The EU nucs are even beginning tentatively to audit their large aid grants to Saddam's number one fan Yasser Arafat.

And with Saddam being out of goodies to dispense, presumably many destructive favours that used to be done are no longer going to be. Perhaps the slogan will finally come true: henceforth "No (Israeli) blood for oil."

Sun, 02/01/2004 - 13:55 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Gas Chambers in North Korean Camps?

The Observer reports eyewitness testimony alleging that terrible atrocities are taking place in North Korean prison camps:

Over the past year harrowing first-hand testimonies from North Korean defectors have detailed execution and torture, and now chilling evidence has emerged that the walls of Camp 22 hide an even more evil secret: gas chambers where horrific chemical experiments are conducted on human beings.

Witnesses have described watching entire families being put in glass chambers and gassed. They are left to an agonising death while scientists take notes.

If this is true, why is the world permitting it to happen?

Mon, 02/02/2004 - 02:36 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

China. As long as Beijing sta...

China. As long as Beijing stands ready to intervene on Pyongyang's behalf should Seoul and Washington act, North Korea remains inviolate.

To save North Korea we must be ready for a war with the People's Republic of China. As long as our leadership thinks of the American people as something to be protected from the big, bad world we will not be getting ready.

I'll write more on the subject at my own place

Alan

It's usually the obvious that gets you by surprise

by mythusmage on Mon, 02/02/2004 - 04:49 | reply

Update

Here's the essay I mentioned above. Archiving isn't working for me, so the link will send you to the blog's mainpage.

Alan

It's usually the obvious that gets you by surprise

by mythusmage on Mon, 02/02/2004 - 05:54 | reply

picky point

actually, it's variants on obvious things that might get you by surprise, not actually obvious things.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 02/02/2004 - 10:45 | reply

re: China

China. As long as Beijing stands ready to intervene on Pyongyang's behalf should Seoul and Washington act, North Korea remains inviolate.

To save North Korea we must be ready for a war with the People's Republic of China.

But that doesn't really answer the question because the world is not taking the stance you indicate. If it were, Mr Bush would be announcing in his next address to the American people, and Mr Blair would be declaring in Parliament: "The Government of China is, to its eternal shame, continuing to subject the North Korean people to these appalling atrocities by threatening us with nuclear attack if we should dare to save them, which, otherwise, we would be doing right now."

by a reader on Mon, 02/02/2004 - 13:13 | reply

Re: Atrocities

Some acts are blatantly atrocious. Why "the world isn't taking action" might boil down to essentially two reasons:

1) The "world" is world government authorities, who either a) know this, and aren't willing to act in any form, or b) don't know this, the latter, less likely; or c) some degree of a) or b) above.

And/Or:

2) The "world" is ultimately people like you and me who up to now, did not know this, and a) now speak out about it until something is done to put pressure to bear on our own government authorities to act to change it, b) live under various degrees of citizen restriction where we have a blunted and ineffectual voice, or c) simply do not care.

The "world" I would hope is ultimately us, who know and take action within our means to do so. Information is a start.

by a reader on Mon, 02/02/2004 - 19:40 | reply

The Reason...

America is occupied with Iraq and the rest of the world neither care or are capable of doing anything but talk about how humanitarian they are and how evil America is.

by a reader on Tue, 02/17/2004 - 00:50 | reply

Copyright © 2007 Setting The World To Rights

Still Too Lenient With The BBC

On further reflection, we no longer entirely agree with Oliver Kamm's take on the BBC in the light of the Hutton Report.

Kamm himself noted that his previous broadsides against the BBC had "still erred on the side of the BBC". We think it's still so.

Kamm wrote:

These were not faults of administrative torpor or inefficiency: they were instances of professional misconduct compounded by an institutional abdication of responsibility to investigate grave and unfounded allegations.

Yes, but those are themselves only symptoms, and minor symptoms at that, of what has fundamentally gone wrong with the BBC: they have become a political faction – and not a nice one. At the heart of their politics is a certain world view, far left of the political centre and dominated by 'political correctness', but there is more to it than that. It is a fantasy-ideology, a way of thinking and being in which certain ritual behaviours, certain formal utterances, become the entire purpose of existence, replacing what an unaffected person would think of as ordinary morality and displacing all connection with facts. That is why Andrew Gilligan still thinks of himself as having suffered a punishment out of all proportion to his offence: in terms of ritual behaviours and utterances, he did indeed make only a minor slip-up when he said, for instance, that the government knew that the 45-minute claim was false before they inserted it into the dossier. To Gilligan, who was painting with a very broad brush, that utterance meant no more than "Saddam's government is legitimate, the war is unjustified, America is the source of all evil and the Blair government is illegitimate for siding with America", which was also the implicit content of practically every other report that he or any of his BBC colleagues had made on the issue. It is only if the truth – in the sense of correspondence the facts – plays some significant role in your psychology that you would see this particular statement as differing greatly from those others. Considered as a ritual utterance whose purpose was to express Gilligan's virtue and help draw the audience into his state of mind in regard to the Iraq crisis, it did not differ from them at all.

To interpret all this as a failure by Gilligan and by his editors and their bosses to check their facts is to miss most of what has been happening. This was not merely an error of incompetence, or an institutional failure to achieve a standard of excellence to which they aspired. It was case of aspiring to something else entirely: to express, to promote, to embody, a certain moral take on the world. Fundamentally, it is because reporting facts or even opinions was subordinated to that aspiration that Gilligan thought nothing of casually making up stories as he went along, and his colleagues and bosses thought – and continue to think – nothing of his doing so.

By the way, Kamm also wrote:

The resignations of the two most senior figures in the BBC's management are welcome and honourable.

But since then it has emerged that Greg Dyke did not resign, but had to be pushed out kicking and screaming. And the BBC staff, backed by the National Union of Journalists, continue to kick and scream for his reinstatement. And so does much of the rest of their profession. Kamm admits to "revering" Martin Bell and expresses admiration for other veteran journalists. But those very journalists are blind to the nature of Gilligan's wrongdoing: not just Martin Bell but for instance John Tusa, Max Hastings ("Hutton's assault upon the whole culture of the BBC and journalism is out of all proportion to their offences"), and many others:

The growing mood of discontent within the BBC was highlighted at the weekend with some of the most distinguished of its staff signing a newspaper advertisement protesting at the departure of Mr Dyke. Among those who signed the advertisement were John Simpson, the world affairs editor, Gavin Esler, the News 24 presenter, Joan Bakewell, the broadcaster, Jeremy Vine, the Radio 2 presenter, and Ben Brown, the BBC's special correspondent

That blindness is closer to the heart of the disaster than any specific reporting failures.

To a frightening extent, this pathological, manipulative, dishonest approach to news reporting has taken over the whole profession of journalism in Britain. But the BBC has the worst and most dangerous manifestation because of its unique status which shields it from criticism, not only in the narrow sense that its massive unconditional subsidy tends to immunise it from market forces, but also because its official role, like that of the monarchy, gives it a sort of automatic, unearned moral authority – even (dare we say it) with the likes of ourselves and Oliver Kamm – which, in a better world, no rational consumer would grant any news provider.

Tue, 02/03/2004 - 15:19 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Beware

The Free and Independent Media. Nothing in the public sector is more vital than a free and independent media. The case of the BBC makes this more obvious. No free nation or body of citizens can or should depend on one outlet for news and journalism. It is all too easy to be led down the path to falsity. Humans have bias, and flagrant biases, and even blindnesses to truth. It is not inherent to being human, but is an all too easy perceptual flaw.

Free your mind. Free the BBC. Free the sources of public opinion and discourse. Free the media. Hand in hand, free your mind.

Open the media to many rational and considered views. Free one's own mind to be rational and critical of not only others' opinions and biases but especially one's own. Seek truth. Do not expect to easily find it. Write, speak, discuss, critique. Be not only a rational consumer. Be also a rational provider of content.

If this bothers you to read this, you are definitely on the right track, which is only the first step to thinking. Which of course, you already know.

This has been an unpaid political advertisement for a free and independent and critically rational media, often found lacking in a free world, and nonexistent in an oppressed one. Beware its loss.

by a reader on Tue, 02/03/2004 - 16:20 | reply

v nice

good work

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 02/04/2004 - 00:11 | reply

In A Nearby Universe: Saddam Turns Other Cheek To Iranian Nukes

