Given the World's previous comments, I interpreted the previous article on the rebuilding of New Orleans to mean that government should be somewhat involved, but not that public money should be thrown away, as appears to be happening.

The existence of the City of New Orleans as a whole, benefits most Americans, given its unique cultural and historical significance. Probably most of us would be willing to donate money to its reconstruction, and likely have. But one person's donation benefits, to a small extent, another person because the non-donor gets the pleasure of seeing the city restored without having to pay for it. These "positive externalities" from charitable giving will tend to lead to inappropriately small voluntary contributions towards reconstruction of a site of national importance, after a natural disaster.

Spending a little government money is therefore appropriate, even if the money is obtained by taxation. Not all government programs are equally awful. But the rebuilding effort does seem to be headed in the wrong direction, whether one is a libertarian or not.

And public officials in New Orleans and Louisiana are not known for being frugal.

by Michael Golding on Thu, 09/29/2005 - 01:19 | reply

Purity

I guess my problem is with what seems to be an attempt to dismiss a criticism of what is completely unlibertarian by characterizing it as a complaint of a lack of libertarian purity.

It has nothing to do with purity. Endorsing a massive federal program to rebuild the area is not even a little libertarian. There isn't even an emanation of a penumbra of libertarianism in that position.

Fortunately, The World seems to recognize what a disaster such a project would be.

Gil

by Gil on Thu, 09/29/2005 - 02:57 | reply

Therefore Appropriate

Michael Golding,

I'll grant that there are cases where there are "underfunded" public goods such that economic efficiency would be enhanced with respect to those projects by government funding.

However, I do not grant that it's clear that rebuilding New Orleans in any particular way constitutes such a case, nor that even when we find such a case it's obvious that government funding is "therefore appropriate."

When you take people's money you take away some of their choices and autonomy. These projects, collectively, will prevent some people from buying a house, or a business, or training for a new career, or investing in their health, or saving better for their future, or taking a dream vacation, etc. Our models may say that these things have less economic value, but I think we should be very careful about ignoring the moral component when we decide what's best for everyone.

And, in addition to the inevitable waste and fraud of government projects, there are the many unintended, often unseen, negative consequences of interfering with people's private choices. For example, the expectation of free federal disaster insurance will encourage people to behave less responsibly, and it will discourage others from helping them with private resources.

In general, I think that it's better to rely on our ability to persuade others that projects are worthwhile, and on their ability to recognize and act on these truths, than on political decisions (with their perverse incentives) to decide how our life's work should be spent. I think that this disaster is a fine example that these private contributions often greatly exceed the predictions of our economic models.

There may be some theoretically worthy projects that will go undone, but I prefer that greatly over proceeding in a cycle of escalating, suffocating, collectivism.

Gil

by Gil on Thu, 09/29/2005 - 04:28 | reply

My view is: The World's *act

My view is: The World's actual position is (an interpretation of) libertarian(ism). This does not surprise me at all. You seem too eager to declare them unlibertarian, when I think you ought to know them better than that.

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Thu, 09/29/2005 - 05:05 | reply

Private Contributions Not Enough

"I'll grant that there are cases where there are underfunded public goods such that economic efficiency would be enhanced with respect to those projects by government funding."

"I think this disaster is a fine example that these private contributions often greatly exceed the predictions of our economic models."

Gil

Private contributions alone, without some government expenditure on infrastructure, would be woefully inadequate, and New Orleans would not be rebuilt. That would be a shame.

Polls suggest that most Americans do want the non-flood-prone areas to be rebuilt, probably suggesting that most people would be willing to vote to contribute if they knew that their neighbor was contributing as well, provided that the government exercised a modicum of fiscal responsibility. Given that there is political support for government intervention and given that there is theoretical justification for some government investment, particularly in infrastructure; some areas of New Orleans should be rebuilt. But the primary source of funding should be individual private investors.

I truly doubt, however, that most Americans would support spending 250 billion (!) dollars on rebuilding, including 8 million for alligator farms.

That is a shame.

Michael Golding

by a reader on Fri, 09/30/2005 - 01:56 | reply

That Is A Shame

Well, that is exactly the nature of government projects. They always waste some people's money and buy the political/financial support of others. Either you think it's "appropriate" or you think it's "a shame". I don't see how you can view it as both. You can pretend that if only the right people were involved, then everything would be rosy; but pretending is all you'd be doing.

And, I strongly disagree with the implication that political support, and a plausible argument that a state interest exists, automatically justifies state action.

Democracy is the least-bad way to organize limited, coercive political power. It's not a magic ingredient that turns moral crimes into civic virtue.

In many areas of the U.S. there would be political support for outlawing homosexual activity. There are also arguments that can be made that there is a state interest in enforcing such restrictions (public health, local standards of decency, etc.) This only goes to show that there are many areas of life that should be beyond the reach of political institutions (with or without public support).

Gang rape isn't justified because the majority of participants favor it. Likewise for grand theft.

Gil

by Gil on Fri, 09/30/2005 - 05:57 | reply

Who is More Coercive?

"Either you think it's appropriate (to spend public money on rebuilding New Orleans) or you think it's a shame"

Gil

This perspective is a little too "black and white" for me, Gil. It is possible to favor some government spending without favoring spending $250 billion. And the government has occasionally implemented a few projects that cost less than 250 billion dollars, so government spending less than this amount is certainly possible (Right?).

"Democracy is the least bad way to organize limited coercive power"

Gil

Perhaps I did not make myself clear. When a majority votes for government provision of a public good, if one prohibits the majority from realizing its wishes, this is coercive, as well.

For example, virtually all of us vote for defense spending because the cost of excluding someone who won't pay for the benefits of defense is prohibitively expensive. It would be quite costly to design defensive systems that direct incoming attacking missiles only to the homes of those who did not voluntarily support the military!

The point is not that "democracy rule" is ideal (it isn't, as many as 49% can be coerced in a vote), but rather that economic efficiency, supported by a vote of the majority decreases coercion, as well. Though some are coerced by taxation into paying for defense when they presumably never believe we will be attacked; failure to tax, coerces the majority into accepting an inadequately prepared military.

It is not logical to say that the majority should simply voluntarily contribute. What marginal benefit, in protecting myself, do I receive by voluntarily contributing an extra dollar to the military? Essentially none. The military is equally powerful whether I contribute an extra dollar or not. Unfortunately the situation is symmetrical for everyone in society, so the military will be inefficiently underfunded without government intervention to coordinate collections. Therefore, taxation to improve the military of a free nation, decreases coercion for the majority who favor it, just as it increases coercion for the minority who don't. This is a classic economic problem when transaction costs are high in the production, measurement, and distribution of a good.

Similarly with New Orleans, we can not exclude those who fail to pay for its reconstruction, from enjoying the benefits of the city. And despite its problems, on display for the whole world after the hurricane; its history, unique charm, wonderful Jazz, extraordinary cuisine and even Bourbon street, are valuable assets to most preferences given polling data.

Americans; as would likely be expressed in their democratic

But what marginal benefit does an individual citizen receive in contributing an extra dollar to the reconstruction of New Orleans? Essentially none. New Orleans will have the same infrastructure whether I contribute an extra dollar or not, and the situation is symmetrical for all Americans, so infrastructure in New Orleans will not be adequately funded given the incentives of individuals, even if many are quite generous.

But the majority of Americans may very well be interested in contributing 100 dollars to rebuild New Orleans, in the form of new taxes, because they know that the combined total of everyone's contribution, coordinated by taxation, will begin to rebuild the city. This commitment to progress then encourages private investment, which often follows infrastructure reconstruction. Failure to allow citizens in the majority to coordinate their economic efforts via a government action for which they are willing to pay, is coercive (and wrong) as well.

But there is surely a difference between government spending 250 billion dollars and 25 billion dollars. And yes, it would be better if most of the work were contracted out by government agencies to private firms using fair bidding practices. And yes, there is bound to be waste and fraud, in any government project.

But reconstructing New Orleans, sends a signal to ourselves and to the world, that we will not back down in the face of natural disaster. In not succumbing to nature's wrath, we also force ourselves to learn from tragedy, yet still overcome it, and this is ennobling for our country.

Michael Golding

by a reader on Fri, 09/30/2005 - 23:37 | reply

Reality TV

Evolution. Donald Trump and Martha Stewart jointly recruit apprentices to rebuild New Orleans. What a combination! What a concept! Everybody wins.

Too bad we have to wait until next season.

by a reader on Sat, 10/01/2005 - 02:20 | reply

Coercion

Michael Golding wrote:

Failure to allow citizens in the majority to coordinate their economic efforts via a government action for which they are willing to pay, is coercive (and wrong) as well.

This is nonsense.

No coercion is necessary for willing contributors to coordinate their economic activities, and nobody is interested in coercing them out of such activities. They can even set up a fund such that the activity is only triggered (and their contributions committed) when enough money has been contributed to pursue the project. If they insist on doing this extremely inefficiently, I suspect that the government would be willing to perform this voluntarily-supported project.

No, these people you speak of don't want the government to perform this because the government is so good at this work. They want the government to do it so that they can coerce unwilling people to contribute.

To accuse those who merely want to avoid this coercion of the crime they are threatened with is a gross moral inversion.

Gil

by Gil on Sat, 10/01/2005 - 18:53 | reply

No coercion is necessary for willing contributors to coordinate

This is to assume that so-called 'public good problems' (or problems of externalities, or free rider problems), or at least versions of them that can apparently be solved by government but not by contracts and other voluntary cooperation, are an artefact of idealised ways of describing an economy and never arise in real life. That is what I happen to believe too, but it is surely not obvious.

by David Deutsch on Sat, 10/01/2005 - 19:41 | reply

Failure to allow citizens in

Failure to allow citizens in the majority to coordinate their economic efforts via a government action for which they are willing to pay, is coercive (and wrong) as well.

Not nonsense! But I think mistaken. Let me point out two things:

In what sense are the citizens in question "willing to pay" for the government action they favor? They don't take on a higher tax rate for it. Those unwilling to pay, pay just as much (per person)!

What, precisely, do you believe a government is? Why do they need a government to coordinate their aid? Us libertarians think the difference between a government and a private organisation is the government takes taxes, effectively at gunpoint, even from those who don't want to pay for something. We don't see how that is a necessary part of coordinating aid.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Sat, 10/01/2005 - 21:49 | reply

Theory L

"an artefact of idealised ways of describing an economy..."

How interesting. Unless I misunderstood, that quote fits very well what i would describe as the concept of Libertarianism. As a conceptual artefact it does not exist in real life. As a philosophical theory (Theory L) it does certainly exist but only in the minds of its theoretical practitioners.

Useful theory, yes; practical in direct action to effect hurricane repairs and revitalization of a city, no.

Government in public good, imperfect yes; practical in a messy way, yes, but it depends on the actual world responsiveness and involvement of people in the polis (market place of debate) as to whether the public good is actually served. Without some government, we are all members of some crazy economic tribe dealing in the mediums of yams, wild pigs, and real estate (otherwise known as the totally free market). Yelp loudly if you are bitten by the wild pigs. Catch as many as you can. Buy beachfront property with the proceeds.

I would rather that your wild pigs don't mess with mine. Debate your reasons in the polis as to how your wealth accumulation will also serve the public good, trade a few pigs feet to maintain your access to the common wealth that feeds us all. Call it Liberalism or Democratic Socialism if you wish but carry no illusions about either. Wild pigs exist and feed on the same land that drives markets. Call the land New Orleans, or Pittypat Parish. It makes no difference what you call it, but make sure it stays above water for all our sakes, and I will too. Wild pigs, and yams for that matter, don't do well at sea.

Debate your theories and share the wealth that serves the public good, willingly if you believe, or dragging your feet if you don't. That's practical government in a practical free market and you'll never do away with either in a free world. Theory L, or C or M never fed anyone. Neither did it starve us either. Well debated in the polis, however it might help us organize some ideas and dreams into reality. That's where the public good comes in. For the good of us all, keep your government (and mine) on a short leash, but keep it.

Long Live New Orleans, may it Rise.

by a reader on Sun, 10/02/2005 - 18:37 | reply

Market Economics

Market Economics assumes, at a minimum that everyone knows who owns what, and transaction costs are low (actually assumes much much more...but these assumptions will do for the point of this example). If everyone knows who owns what, then everyone trades for mutual benefit. This is "unanimous rule", an ideal situation, according to libertarians and most with a conservative economic bent. I will, for the sake of argument, agree that unanimous rule (pure market economics) is ideal (for now) since this is really the libertarian assumption. As doctors say, "Above all else, do no harm." Or, as the the philosophers say, "the principle of non-maleficence takes precedence over the principle of beneficence." And the Economists (used to say) Pareto Optimality.

Economists are a bit smarter than the philosophers and doctors, because they have actually tried to model these situations...lot's of messy details.

If people in the majority wish to gang-rape a woman, they can't, according to market economics, because the woman owns her own body (has a property right to her body) and she did not come up with an amount of money that she would like to receive in order to permit the gang rape to proceed(it likely would be close to infinite, if there were a chance of death.)

Note that the principle of unanimous rule would be violated if she were not paid what she wanted and the rape proceeded without her receiving anything. So raping violates libertarian (unanimous rule) principles, as well as a host of other principles!

In the real world, however, we do not know who owns many or even most goods. That's often (but not always) why we fight with each other and have governments! Property rights have not yet been defined.

We often don't know who owns what. But, if transaction costs are low or zero; we still can make progress in our thinking using unanimous rule (libertarian) principles.

Let's take the case of our national defense. We really don't know whether the country as a whole has or does not have, a right to "national defense". Property rights have not been assigned to this entity.

Assume transaction costs are zero. So, we can take an open vote, and we assume that everyone HONESTLY casts their ballot for or against national defense. I emphasize honestly, because there is a real world actual cost associated with the search for peoples honest position.

So we take an open and honest vote and 40% vote against national defense and 60% vote for it. The majority certainly could ask all the people who voted against it, how much would it cost to get you to change your vote? In other words, we could say, "How much does it really bother you to be taxed 'X' amount, and get national defense in return" (remember, we're going for unanimous rule).

The problem is that those in the minority have a strong incentive to lie (a transaction cost) so they would get much too much money in a vote bribing scheme, because they wouldn't reveal how much it actually bothers them to pay the tax. They would exaggerate. But remember, transaction costs are zero so in this hypothetical situation, people won't lie. Surely the most we would have to pay any of those opposed to being taxed for national defense, would be the cost of the proposed individual tax increase on everyone. But for some, who somewhat oppose substantially increased defense spending, we could get them to change their vote for less. They are unwilling to pay the full amount of the tax, but they want some national defense. So if we pay them a portion of what their increase in taxes is, they will change their vote. So, a free market could handle national defense issues, if transaction costs were zero. In a frictionless world, we could create a unanimous rule, libertarian solution.

But wait! Why is it that the majority has to pay the minority to get them to change their vote? Isn't it just as logical to ask the minority to pay the majority to change their vote, to maintain unanimous (libertarian) rule. Perhaps societies OWN the right to national defense, so if the minority wants to compromise that, this minority should pay off the majority. As long as either side is completely bought off, unanimous rule is preserved, but libertarian unanimous rule principles don't tell us which side is correct. And as long as transaction cost is zero, libertarian principles are neutral in regards to who should pay whom.

Is this surprising? After all, we started with the assumption that we did not know who owns what. This is why libertarians always favor a "strong judiciary," so they can have determined for them "who owns what". But libertarian (market) principles are neutral with respect to the initial division of property rights, including a possible right to a national defense.

But how should judges (government) decide when groups of people disagree. Should the majority pay the minority, or should the minority pay the majority. Actually, quite a lot of work by free market, transaction cost economists, has gone into thinking about this issue.

Some say the questions involve morality. But others, for example the "Law and Economics people" answer the question based on efficiency.

Should we pay polluters not to pollute, or should polluters pay us for using the air? Well, it depends on who owns the air. In the real world, there are transaction costs associated with organizing markets to pay polluters not to pollute, and there are transaction costs associated with organizing markets for polluters to pay citizens for their pollution. And there are huge transaction costs associated with getting people to be honest and setting up markets...so huge in fact, that we use government taxation or regulation to deal with pollution, and not the free market, and we also produce ideology (for example, religion and culture to try to increase honesty)

The Law and Economics people (for example circuit Judge Posner and I think Nobel Laureate Douglas North) say that judges should make decisions about who owns disputed property based on who can utilize and exchange the property with the least transaction costs. Actually they believe that societies will naturally evolve in time to assign property rights to individuals who can transact with the property the most cheaply. So societies will evolve toward more and more free exchange of goods and ideas (decreased friction in the economic system). According to Posner, it is a judges job, and the governments job in general, to help along the natural course of history. As far as I can tell, arranging initial ownership of property rights to goods to minimize cost of exchange, is as far as one can take free market economic ideas without also talking about "demand" curves and peoples "preferences".

Now, back to New Orleans. The majority of Americans (according to polls) favor its reconstruction. A minority do not. Who owns the joy of New Orleans, the wonderful Jazz that comes together in the city, the varied dining from a hundred different restaurants, the walk down Bourbon street with all of its sights and sounds (at least before I get married)...etc? Who owns the rights to all this conglomeration of different competing businesses, creating the unique ambience of the city?

Yes, it is one of those real world situations to which we don't know the answer. In other words, market economics is neutral about the question of who owns the ambience of the city (unless we invoke a transaction cost perspective). If the government were not involved, I would be willing to give say 100 dollars, but not for infrastructure, rather to help the needy. If, however, I know that the overwhelming majority of Americans are willing to give, say 300 dollars to rebuild the city, and that others in fact will actually give that money (say because they are taxed), I am now willing to give 300 dollars myself via taxation. Why am I willing to give more, now (just because others are taxed as I am taxed.)? Because if the vast majority of EVERYONE gives towards rebuilding New Orleans, the basic infrastructure of New Orleans will reappear, and millions of Americans, including me, may enjoy the city again. Giving to New Orleans is a "public good" because most Americans want it there as a whole(well, not quite there, but rebuilt somewhat away from the lowest parts of the area.)

The majority of us want to get together and are willing to pay for its partial reconstruction, provided we can guarantee that others (who also favor it) will pay, also.

How should a libertarian think about this? Let's assume transaction costs are zero, and let's assume 2/3rd's of Americans want to spend 300 dollars to reconstruct the city. Let's further assume a completed New Orleans has absolutely no value at all, to the other 1/3rd who vote against its reconstruction. If everyone is honest about his preferences (cost of ascertaining a persons true belief is zero) and the cost of market transactions are zero, then each of us in the majority, can use our government to combine our money (300 dollars a piece) confident that all others who actually favor this will pay this amount, too. So Gil and others like him pay nothing (and they are permanently excluded from New Orleans for life), but they pay no taxes. Unanimous rule.

But we can't do this, because the cost of people lying about their preferences is too high. The majority, who actually believes that the city should be constructed, should from a self-interested perspective, vote against the city, confident that each ones marginal contribution will do nothing to change the total amount given. So most in the majority will defect to the minority, no money will be generated, and the city will not be built, despite the willingness of the majority to pool money and build the city. So noone votes for New Orleans. So the city does not get rebuilt.

Why can't people organize their own money? Because the transaction cost associated with 200 million people each contributing 300 dollars is too high. Why? Because of the cost of contracting, but primarily because each person would have an incentive to lie about whether he wants to give, just as each has an incentive to lie about how much he favors national defense in a purely voluntary system. Each contribution of his neighbor benefits the individual, without the individual having to pay for it. So no one pays for it, and we will get no New Orleans and no National Defense.

So sometimes we settle things by majority vote with enforced taxes on everyone, when it is too expensive to create markets for certain types of goods. If Gil wants to stop the majority from organizing its money this way via the government, he must admit that he is being coercive, because I am fully willing to admit that my position coerces him.

And it is still a different discussion whether Gil and his friends in the minority should be willing to pay the majority to stop building New Orleans (if such markets for this type of exchange could exist). Again, Libertarian (free-market) principles are neutral on this disagreement, as well, unless one adopts the Judge Posner point of view.

Like many "real-world" problems, libertarian unanimous rule principles are helpful in deciding what should be done in New Orleans, or at least understanding who the winners and losers are. But when markets break down, as I have illustrated with the problem of the reconstruction of New Orleans, it is likely that someone will be coerced and we can only hope that this coercion can be kept to a minimum. We are very far from an ideal world.

And Gil and I would certainly agree that the current use of government funds is egregious, but this certainly does not imply that government should not be involved in the reconstruction of New Orleans, at all.

Michael Golding

by Michael Golding on Mon, 10/03/2005 - 01:46 | reply

Re: Failure to allow citizens in

"What, precisely, do you believe a government is?"

If it's a good government it's an organization that takes as much resources as it needs from its citizens to help its citizens in ways that volunteerism currently won't help with well enough.

"Why do they need a government to coordinate their aid?"

See above.

"Us libertarians think the difference between a government and a private organisation is the government takes taxes, effectively at gunpoint, even from those who don't want to pay for something. We don't see how that is a necessary part of coordinating aid."

As people shouldn't want to murder, they should want to pay taxes, therefore taxes are only coercive for people who are in the wrong, because taxes are the best system so far to cover the shortfalls of volunteerism.

I'm all for a completely voluntary system as soon as someone thinks of one that will prevent too many people from starving, etc.

Bob

by a reader on Mon, 10/03/2005 - 04:56 | reply

Bob, If it's a good govern

Bob,

If it's a good government it's an organization that takes as much resources as it needs from its citizens to help its citizens in ways that volunteerism currently won't help with well enough.

So a good government takes as much as it judges that it needs, even when some citizens say that's too much. Correct?

And it does this when it judges that if it doesn't force something to happen, the thing won't happen. Correct?

And it will do this when it judges that the thing should happen, and is worth taking taxes for, even when some citizens say it isn't and don't want it. Correct?

And it will do all this even if it is unable to win arguments for its position against the best rival views (for example, mine. It never has to argue its position with me, or even try to, before taking my money). Correct?

In short, your position seems to be it's a good government if it's right. If it isn't mistaken. That position is a bit pointless. Everyone thinks they are correct.

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 10/04/2005 - 02:37 | reply

Public Goods

If I produce automobiles and pollute the air, and the citizens own the air, but I don't have to pay them even though I am polluting, then I will tend to inefficiently OVERPRODUCE cars, because I won't take into account the spillover cost of polluting the air. So we have an argument for government coercion of polluters (for example taxing them) to prevent them from stealing property (the air).

On the other hand, if I administer a live vaccine that jumps from person to person and causes immunity in many, not just the patient who received the vaccine from me; in administering the live vaccine, people other than the recipient benefit, but don't have to pay. So I don't capture the full benefits of what I produce when I vaccinate. So I will tend to inefficiently UNDERPRODUCE vaccine because I don't take into account the spillover benefit of administering live vaccines to those who don't get the shot, but nonetheless become infected by a live virus vaccine, and so get immunity.

(By this argument, the descendants of Albert Einstein, and possibly David Deutsch and his friends, should be far more wealthy, according to free market principles, than Bill Gates. But the free rider argument [we all benefit from brilliant people but don't pay them] does possibly explain why we are willing to fund public universities. But it also explains why people don't think and learn as much as would be socially optimal)

I'm not paid by those who benefit from my work (giving live-vaccine shots) -- so I won't work hard enough, if I am a purely self-interested individual. Voluntary cooperation won't solve the problem because there is too much incentive for a given individual to "shirk". After all, if everyone gets vaccinated, it is likely the "free rider" will catch the vaccine virus, from everyone else. But this is everyone's reasoning! So few people get the shot. Voluntary cooperation won't work.

So there is an argument for citizens to (voluntarily) vote to have everyone "coerced" by the government to pay taxes, and then use the tax money to subsidize live vaccine administration to get me to work harder, to get the efficient amount of vaccine administered.

We voluntarily coerce ourselves by mandating that if one person pays, so must the other! And theoretically, in certain situations, it is logical for 100% of the population to (voluntarily) vote to be coerced! And the government which gets 100% of the vote (unanimous rule) to force everyone to be taxed, should be considered to be operating perfectly!

Unanimous rule is unanimous rule...a perfect libertarian situation. A voluntary group of rational but selfish individuals, simply cannot create this optimum outcome without government assistance, because by many definitions, only the government has a monopoly on the use of force.

And those who would stop them (maybe like Gil?), would be willing on principle, to coerce 100% of the population, to force these individuals not to cooperate through their government. Now that is hatred of taxation! And reflects a complete misunderstanding of the free market principles that libertarians supposedly hold so dear.

Which is more important, hatred of taxation (ideology) or unanimous rule (principle and morality)?

Now, libertarians would properly say (as Gil did) that not only does one have to show that the market has not worked, leading to public goods and externalities, but rather that government intervention will efficiently solve these market "spill-over" effects, often a dubious proposition.

But, in both of the above cases, arguments can be made for government intervention to (financially) support administering innocuous vaccines which benefit whole sections of the population, and arguments can be made for government intervention to tax and therefore inhibit the production of cars, if this production pollutes the air.

Now, back to New Orleans. Let's say my neighbor gives a dollar to reconstruct New Orleans. Since I like New Orleans, too, my neighbor has benefited me by his contribution, but I have had to pay nothing. So I am getting something for free, a partially reconstructed New Orleans, and I have had to pay nothing.

Just like the person who gets free vaccine because he "catches it" from the person who paid the doctor, I get New Orleans reconstructed for free, without having to pay the donor. I am a "free rider", though I would have been willing to purchase an improved New Orleans, if my neighbor hadn't bought it for me and if we both had to contribute, together. I get something from the labor of someone else, and don't have to pay him. So he (the donor) won't work as hard (just like me, he will now become a "free-rider") In other words the donor will not donate as much and neither will I, though we both would VOTE to give more than we would give if no taxation were involved. We both would vote to give more, if we knew all our neighbors would have to give that amount, too. So voluntary cooperation won't work as well, we need to work through our government to cooperate, so we take a vote, or at least a poll.

So without government intervention, an inefficiently low amount of aid will flow into New Orleans, given the preferences of the citizenry, without government assistance in coordinating dollars, because of the "free rider" problem. We can't exclude those who don't contribute from enjoying New Orleans. So, just like with the live vaccines and with defense spending, you can't exclude people from enjoying the benefits of New Orleans, you can't exclude people from enjoying the benefits of a powerful defense, and you can't exclude people from enjoying the benefits of a live vaccine administration. In these cases, there is an argument for citizens to vote to impose taxes on themselves. Defense, live vaccinations, and possibly the reconstruction of a wonderful city after a hurricane, are examples of public goods in which, arguably, the government should be involved.

Unfortunately, when we voted (or sort of did through polls), there was not 100% agreement to coerce ourselves through taxation to help New Orleans. But the majority still would like to be coerced through taxation. And those who stop us, are coercing us, since we want to use our government to solve our "free-rider" problem, a classic argument for the use of the government. And that brings me back to the discussion in my previous post.(Please see that)

So what is the appropriate role of government? I think this is too complicated a question. But three major roles are:

1. Define and enforce property rights to goods (which includes developing defense and police forces since otherwise other countries and fellow citizens can take stuff from us)
2. Help solve "public good" problems, for example, possibly the reconstruction of infrastructure in New Orleans and
3. Help solve "externality" problems, like pollution.

Actually, if you think about it, roles 2 and 3 are subsets of role 1.

I would also add that Governments should decrease transaction costs....but that opens up a big can of worms!

Have a nice day.

Michael Golding

by Michael Golding on Tue, 10/04/2005 - 02:43 | reply

Coercion, Again

Michael Golding,

If two people are each willing to pay 1/3 the cost of a pony to share, but a third person is unwilling to pay that amount, then you might say that the two (who voted, or were polled, etc.), who want the pony on the condition that all three are forced to pay, should hire a thug to use force to extract the 1/3 cost from all three. After all, then they'd have a pony, and ponies are good, and the majority is willing to tax themselves to have the pony, and we're not sure who owns the joy of having a shared pony...

You might say that one could view it (as I do) as the two people coercing the third, or one could view objecting to this mechanism (as you seem to) as the third person coercing the first two.

I'm really surprised that someone who is obviously as bright as you are cannot see that these two instances of "coercion" are incredibly different. And, that the second instance of "coercion" is not considered as such at all by those who believe that people should have self-ownership.

I don't think the morality changes if we multiply the numbers by hundreds of millions.

Gil

by Gil on Thu, 10/06/2005 - 05:35 | reply

Not Correct Analogy

I apologize Gil. I obviously have not been clear. I may have been using technobabble.

With your permission, perhaps I can try again.

I will get back to the pony in a minute.

Imagine that each of 100 people has 100 dollars that he can anonymously place in an envelope and place in a container. Everyone pools their money together and no one knows who gives what to the total, but each can give 100 dollars or any portion of 100 dollars.

The rules of the game are as follows. 10% of the TOTAL contribution of all 100 people is added to the total by an anonymous source. So if all 100 people give 100 dollars, that would make $10000.00 and the anonymous source then adds 10% of the total or 1000 dollars. So if everyone gives 100 dollars, there is now $11,000 in the container, once the 10% is added.

Now, the total is divided by all 100 people, so $11,000 divided by 100 people is $110 dollars per person. Everyone is happy and makes 10 dollars, since each has $110 dollars, and started with $100.

But let's allow some people to be selfish. So if no one knows who contributes what, one person might think, "Hmm, if I don't donate my 100 dollars then the total of everyone else will be $9,900 plus 10% equals $10,890. If that is divided by 100 people, everyone will receive ($10,890 divided by 100 which is) $108.90, not quite as much as 110 dollars, but close. But since I never donated the 100 dollars, I will have 100 dollars plus $108.90 which is $208.90, and that total is greater than 110 dollars, the amount I would have received had I contributed. I think I won't contribute and more than double my money."

Clearly if someone is selfish, he gets the benefit of everyone pooling their money (the extra 10% plus a portion of everyone else's contribution), but none of the cost (the contribution of 100 dollars). But of course the situation is symmetrical for everyone, so if everyone is selfish, no one contributes $100 dollars and the benefit (the extra 10% added to the total) is lost to EVERYONE.

So in this "game", the voluntary cooperation of people (if all are self-interested), will not lead to the optimal outcome. No one will contribute much of anything (or less will be contributed), and so the benefit of the extra 10% is lost to everyone. Voluntary cooperation will not lead to the optimal outcome. By the way, in economics, the people who don't contribute but expect the benefits anyway, are called "free riders".

But let's say there is a smart person in the group who says, "You know, we could get an extra 10% if we had some way of guaranteeing that everyone will pay, or excluding the people who don't contribute from enjoying the benefit."

But let's say there is no way of "excluding" the people who don't contribute from the benefit.

A smart person might continue, "if we hire a 'police-man', say for 10 dollars and he makes sure (able to use coercion) that everyone pays their 100 dollars, then at the end of the night we will have $10,000 plus 10% is $11,000, minus 10 dollars for the policeman, leaves $10,990 dollars. This, divided by 100 leaves $109.90, not quite the $110 dollars and 10 dollar profit, but still a profit of $9.90.

So the smart person asks everyone whether he would like to take a vote to decide what to do. Should everyone voluntarily cooperate without the policeman, and pool his contributions, or should the group hire a policeman and pool the money that way?

One can see that if this were a real world scenario, it is very likely that 100% of people in the group would agree TO VOTE TO BE COERCED. That is, 100% would vote to hire a policeman, provided the policeman did his job.

Of course the problem is always the "who polices the policeman?" situation. Could not the policeman abscond with everyone's money? Obviously we need "checks and balances", to try to hold policemen accountable, too, and these checks and balances will never be perfect.

By the way, the outcome of hiring a policeman could be considered an entirely libertarian outcome. (Why?) Because 100% of everyone votes for the outcome. Everyone agrees to be coerced, provided that his neighbor is equally coerced, to create an outcome that 100% of everyone favors. It is using coercion to allow free citizens the option of unanimous rule, the essence of libertarianism. So paradoxically, in this hypothetical example, libertarians NEED A COERCIVE force (like the government) to realize their highest ideals.

Back to the Pony. Let's imagine that it is a "pony of defense" that enables our 100 villagers to protect their farmlands from theft, when ridden by a police officer. After much debate, all 100% of the villagers agree that it would be worth 100 dollars for each to pool their money and buy the needed one pony of defense, ridden by a policeman, per year. They come to this rational conclusion, because after arguing back and forth for a while, they all believe that their best theory (they all read "The Fabric...!") argues that more than 110 dollars is stolen from each farm every year, so it is worth pooling their money to buy the Pony.

Gil, do you see the analogy to the situation previously described when people were pooling their money? If everyone decides "voluntarily" to pool their money, the fact that there is a policeman on a Pony, protects everyone's farm from attack by marauding evil-doers. So should a selfish individual contribute? If one person does not contribute, and if everyone else does, everyone still has a pony and a policeman protecting everyone's farm, but a given individual who does not contribute, has the pony and the policeman and gets to keep his 100 dollars. (Well, because one 100 dollars contribution is missing, perhaps the policeman and pony take a day or two off per year). Since the situation is symmetrical for everyone, selfinterested individuals do not contribute and "free ride" on everyone else's contributions. So everyone loses. But if the group hires the policeman not only to protect their property, but also to collect taxes (err...collect the contributions), if everyone shares the theory that more than 110 dollars will be stolen per farm unless each contributes 100 dollars, there will be a vote in which 100% of everyone (unanimous rule) prevails. A perfect libertarian solution (unanimous rule) requires the coercion of a government (err...voluntarily hired policeman).

Now, enter the real world. a. Policemen steal, too, and they have guns! Obviously, in deciding to vote for the policeman, the townspeople will need to take into account their best theories about the amount that a policeman might steal.

But another problem is: What if there is 1 person in the group who does not agree with the "best theory" of the other 99. In fact his theory is that "defense ponies" attract "evil-doers" and that if a pony and policeman are hired, the town will surely lose $1,000,000, the entirety of the town.

So when the vote is taken, 99 say hire the "defense pony and policeman" and 1 says don't hire the defense pony and policeman.

So what's a good unanimous rule libertarian to do? There are several options. The 99 could agree to hire the defense-pony by themselves, and ignore the 1 person who disagrees, and at least don't ask him to pay 100 dollars, even if he thinks he's going to lose his entire $10,000 farm if the others get the pony.

But if the 99 know before-hand that someone who votes against the defense-pony, won't have to pay for it, (even if this hypothetical selfish person secretly wants a defense pony), an actual selfish person amongst the 99 could say, "I ought to pretend to not want the defense-pony."

Then when the vote is taken, 98 will vote for the defense pony, and the person who does not want the defense pony will vote against, as will the selfish man who wants the defense pony but would like others to pay for it for him.

But the situation is symmetrical for everyone, so if you can opt out of paying by voting against, all selfish people will vote against, and pretend to have the same viewpoint as the person who actually believes the "defense-pony" will be bad for the village. So if the majority in a vote does not have the ability to coerce the minority in a vote to also pay, all selfish people will lie, to get their neighbor who votes for something to pay instead. (Their neighbor being the one who "foolishly" is honest, votes for what he actually thinks and ends up being the only one contributing to the global good of the community by contributing to the "defense pony.") So, people wisely agree that in the case of "defense-ponys", they will not allow the minority to prevent them from increasing their efficiency.

Note that in my first example, where 100 people pool their $100 to get an extra 10% on the total collected, if a person can "opt out" of contributing by voting against, yet he still gets 1/100th of the total, a selfish person will "opt out" and vote against pooling money. But this is true for all selfish people in the group. So virtually everyone will vote against pooling their money, and the group forfeits its extra 10%! If a minority can prevent the majority from pooling its money, the minority is coercing the majority into forfeiting its extra 10%, and this is wrong.

So one of the reasons that there is no "opt-out" clauses in votes on defense, for example, is that it would prevent the majority from coercing itself into a contribution that each and every person in the majority wants.

Yes the majority coerces the minority in a democratic vote. But if there is a "good" that is produced (like defense or the reconstruction of New Orleans) in which, regardless of someones contribution, everyone gets to enjoy the benefits: If the minority can "opt out" of paying taxes, then a group of individuals pursuing their "rational self-interest," who actually want Defense or New Orleans reconstructed, will also "opt-out" and vote against it, even if they want it. Why? Because if everyone else votes for it, they won't have to pay taxes because they "opted-out" and they still get New Orleans reconstructed or proper defense, with no contribution. Since this situation is symmetrical for everyone, allowing the minority to "opt-out" of paying taxes, coerces the majority into not being able to coerce itself, into an outcome that each one in the majority wants.

This is why we do not allow a minority to "opt-out" of paying taxes when they disagree with the majority. Obviously, part of the reason is because (as Gil suggests), the majority wants to take money from the minority, but part of the reason is to allow efficient collective action of the majority, in the production of a good from which others cannot be easily excluded (like national defense or the reconstruction of New Orleans.)

by Michael Golding on Fri, 10/07/2005 - 03:52 | reply

Re: Therefore Appropriate

Way up above, Gil wrote, "Our models may say that these things have less economic value..." But aren't most innovations the result of letting people play with resources? Beyond completely original ideas, money can buy time to think about relationships, for example, which may in turn reduce the cost of violence in society. Don't we generally want people to have control of their resources so they can make use of their local knowledge including their knowledge of what is needed to help themselves learn? Doesn't knowledge have a large economic effect?

Without coercion some valuable projects would not get done. However, in Michael's scheme 49 percent may not think the goal in question has as much value as other possibilities. Of those who wish to contribute, some will find themselves voting to spend more than they would want because only one amount can be chosen for everyone. For them, the excess is money they would otherwise have better uses for but need to contribute to get the project to go through.

In Gil's scheme, if no one pays unless everyone puts up their money, nobody may lose resources they can see a better use for. Can we know for any ordinary project how the sums would work out?

by romr on Fri, 10/07/2005 - 12:53 | reply

The Point

Michael,

You say:

If a minority can prevent a majority from pooling its money, the minority is coercing the majority into forfeiting its extra 10%, and this is wrong.

This is where we are in complete disagreement.

If you have a scheme (e.g. a plantation system) that will produce a profit, but only if some people (e.g. slaves) involuntarily contribute to it then you do not have a right to that project, even if you sincerely believe that the project makes the unwilling better off. I think that people have a right to their own lives and to the fruits of their labor.

If a minority prevents the majority from imposing that scheme on them or on others, they are not coercing the majority, they are protecting individual rights. And, that is not wrong.

Now, given our current state, I agree that national defense and law enforcement may be areas that are so vital for the exercise of other liberties, and the consequences of inadequate funding are so great, that they may justify involuntary collection. But, this is a rare exception, and I hope that we can be creative enough to finance these services voluntarily soon.

Other projects, worthy as they may seem, just don't rise to the level of such justification.

And, I will even agree that there may be non-defense projects such that they would provide every single person with more value (in his own opinion) than he could get by using the funds himself; and that creative supporters of these projects would not be able to raise funds voluntarily.

However, I think that a rule that forbids involuntary financing of non-defense projects is better (more moral and more efficient) than one that permits it. In the real world, this power will not be limited to cases where efficiency is increased. The power will be abused by politicians and special interests who see opportunities to use other people's money to further their own interest. Then there will be a race to see who can get more loot for themselves. See this great article.

By the way, a tremendous amount of money was raised voluntarily to help the victims of Hurricane Katrina. Even though rationally-self-interested people could have kept their money and have seen almost as much good done. No, people (like me) decided that the right thing to do with their money was to contribute it to a cause that they judged to be more valuable than any other plans that they had for the money (even though they could get away with refraining). If it is your theory that, unless forced, people will not contribute much money to causes that they can be convinced are worthy (and the benefits are not limited to contributors), then your theory is obviously false.

So, I think that the vast majority of worthy projects would get done without involuntary funding. This will often require creativity (educational/promotional campaigns, telethons, sponsorships, matching contributions, contributions uncommitted until the funding goal is reached, etc.)

Again, some "worthy" projects might go undone, but I'm confident that the moral (and economic) consequences of my rule are better those of yours.

Gil

by Gil on Fri, 10/07/2005 - 16:12 | reply

Re: Therefore Appropriate

romr,

I agree that the value of private use (with local knowledge) of funds is likely to greatly exceed estimates of central planners. I just don't think that anybody can make good estimates of these uses for particular cases, and that's a good reason to be cautious before we decide to socialize costs.

But, though the economic arguments against this socialization are strong, I think the moral ones are even stronger.

Gil

by Gil on Fri, 10/07/2005 - 16:31 | reply

Laws are Public Goods

Gil,

I respect your desire to protect the minority in many instances. I share that desire with you. By the way, I liked the article you referenced. But I still think there is a subtle point that we are not communicating clearly on.

Let us define a public good as a good that many people want, but that everyone can enjoy, regardless of who pays for it (A national defense and a reconstructed New Orleans, are two examples). This definition will have to do for now, but more precise definitions involve relative divisibility of goods and transaction costs.

But please consider that your position could be considered to be even stronger than wanting to just protect the minority. Your position also prevents the potentially unanimous ability of people to voluntarily contract with each other to produce a public good, if the contracts (in everyone's interest) have to be enforced by a police officer to make everyone feel comfortable and wish to voluntarily contribute. Your position is really against collective action, if there is even a possibility that someone might oppose the community arrangements, even if no one actually does. Let me explain.

Think of the decision described in my previous post with the community buying the "defense pony". Or think of everyone wanting to pool their money so that 10% is added to the total contributed, and then redistributed to everyone, whether an individual contributes or not. Everyone's individual (self-interested) incentive is not to contribute since everyone will get his share of the divided pooled money, without having to contribute to begin with. So without enforcement, this collective pooling arrangement won't take place and the community loses the extra 10% it could have had. Little money is pooled. 10% of a small amount is a small amount. Notice, however, that every single person in this group would want to contribute, provided that a police officer enforced everyone else's giving. But, if anyone had the option of "opting-out" of the payment scheme, and just getting the rewards when the sum is divided, the arrangement would not occur, because few would voluntarily give to begin with, since their money would have to be divided amongst those who did not give.

So your position, Gil, is not only that the minority should always be protected, but also what follows if a policeman can not be hired to enforce agreements. Even if there is a possibility that someone might disagree with a group, you logically favor not allowing an actual unanimous group of people to form, if the formation requires a policeman to guarantee each person's honest contribution. And so an interesting "counterfactual" situation is created. The fact that someone might not have to contribute because there is no police enforcement (and everyone becomes aware of it), means that everyone else will not contribute (much.) And so this violates the rights of even a unanimous group to organize and pursue collective projects in the construction of public goods. This atomistic perspective about how to benefit humanity may be morally justifiable in certain situations, but sacrificing every single person's actual beliefs on the altar of protecting a hypothetical minority individual's beliefs, is morally problematic at times.

Furthermore, allowing a minority to "opt-out" of paying for the provision of a "public good" encourages lying. If the group cannot hire a policeman (utilize a government) to enforce its own agreed upon laws, this encourages everyone to disobey the law, when it suits them, and even to lie about whether they support a law. Consider a situation where some people favor spending a certain amount of money on a good that they cannot prohibit others from enjoying as well (a public good), even if the others don't pay. And suppose that a few do not favor spending money on this public good, because even though they cannot be excluded from using it, they simply have no interest in using it.

If the minority, who actually does not favor the production of the "public good" can always "opt out" of paying, then virtually everyone in the majority will pretend to agree with the minority, even if they actually don't: And so everyone will "opt-out" In other words, the majority will lie about how much money they wish to spend to support a public good, in order to put the costs on others, when there is no enforcement. Think again about the situation where everyone wants to pool their money so that 10% is added to the total contributed, and then redistributed to everyone, whether an individual contributes or not. Everyone's individual (self-interested) incentive is not to contribute since everyone will get his share of the divided pooled money, without having to contribute to begin with. If a vote is taken that is not enforceable by a policeman, everyone will pretend to not be in favor, and vote against the measure, even though everyone (or a majority) actually wants the measure to pass. So not allowing individuals to utilize policemen (a government) to enforce rules on everyone, encourages everyone to lie to each other about their actual views, and so desperately hurts knowledge creation about the opinions of people, needed for the evolution of society.

But Gil your position has even worse implications than preventing unanimous groups of individuals from reaching their highest ideals and encouraging people to lie. I have acknowledged that minorities are injured when a majority takes something from them. This is undoubtedly true. But you really should acknowledge that the majority is also injured if they are not allowed to utilize their government (hire a policeman), to coordinate their activities.

Because one of the fundamental "public goods" in a society is its laws! Should the minority in a 100-person community be able to "opt-out" of laws stopping stealing? Just like in the situation where everyone who pools their money gets 10% extra divided amongst everyone else, laws against stealing may add more than 10% to the bottom line of every single business. Should someone in the minority be able to opt-out of this law? Should he be able to say, "I don't have very much. I would like the right to steal just 1/100th of the property of everyone else? It is morally wrong to stop me from taking 1/100th of everyone's property. A minority of us simply want to steal. Stop forcing us to abide by your crazy ideas about not stealing. Read the arguments of Gil."

How is this person in the minority, stealing say 1% from everyone else, different than a previously discussed hypothetical person in the minority? In that case everyone wanted to pool their money and then a guaranteed 10% is immediately added to the total, contributed from an outside source, and then redistributed to everyone. So everyone gains 10% only if everyone gives, just like everyone gains hypothetically 10% if everyone gives their consent to laws against everyone stealing 1% (or more) of others' property. That is, everyone gains 10% if all the laws are enforced by a policeman (a government). But the group who wants to pool their money needed a policeman to coordinate their activities and prevent "free-riders," too, just as many communities need a policeman to stop stealing.

Gil was opposed to the policeman in the case of the people who want to pool their money. He felt that someone in the minority should feel free to opt-out of the arrangements and should not be "coerced" by the majority into participating and pooling money. But I have argued that if one person can opt-out, with no consequence, then every self-interested person will opt-out. And the whole community loses the 10%. The same is true for stealing. If any person in the "minority" can decide to opt-out, of an arrangement to stop stealing, so there is no consequence to those who steal, then virtually every purely self-interested person will steal (just as virtually everyone will not contribute to the collective pooled money, if there is no policeman enforcing a "law" guaranteeing the pooling of money).

So I say to you Gil. Why is it OK for a community to sometimes pass a law against stealing, even if its enforcement hurts a minority of individuals who do not favor it; but not OK to sometimes pass a law supporting a public good, even if it also hurts a minority of individuals who do not favor it?

Gil, what is the difference between the community that wants to pool its money for profit, and the community that wants to prevent the loss of money, for profit?

Democratic rule, in deciding what should be produced, causes individuals to call too many things "public goods," because as Gil suggests, it allows one group of individuals to force another group of individuals to subsidize its production. If we all eat out and are not friends, and we agree to divide up the check according to the average cost per individual, selfish people will all order too much, because such individuals put the cost of their eating on their neighbor. But the situation is symmetrical for everyone, so if we are selfish, we all order too much. Although sometimes difficult to tell, one needs to look carefully at the good itself, to decide whether it really is the case that others cannot be excluded from using it, if they do not pay. Is it really a "public good" so that my contribution to it benefits my neighbor, but I cannot collect from my neighbor. In addition, one also has to decide that the inevitable governmental waist associated with coordinating production of the public good (the cost of the policeman) justifies the benefits from its production.

But the absence of democratic rule causes too few things to be funded as "public goods," because it prevents majorities from coordinating their activities in the provision of goods that may be economically or morally important to produce, but from which those who do not contribute can not be excluded.

Both arguments are morally and economically correct. To acknowledge one without the other makes little rational sense.

by Michael Golding on Sat, 10/08/2005 - 22:22 | reply

Your position also prevents t

Your position also prevents the potentially unanimous ability of people to voluntarily contract with each other to produce a public good, if the contracts (in everyone's interest) have to be enforced by a police officer to make everyone feel comfortable and wish to voluntarily contribute.

Policy A: something everyone wants, but some people only want if Policy B also happens to make them feel comfortable

Policy B: a police man that some people strongly oppose you call this unanimous support. i call it anything but. with no policy B, many people don't want it. but many people don't want policy B.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Sun, 10/09/2005 - 00:16 | reply

To Gil and Elliot

Gil,

You confuse two very different kinds of economic goods, despite my (apparently unsuccessful) attempts to explain the difference. There are goods in which people can be excluded from benefiting (standard economic goods), and goods in which people cannot be excluded from benefiting (or in which the cost is very high to create exclusivity). Goods in which people cannot be excluded from the benefits, I have (simplistically) defined as "public goods", as more precise definitions require discussions of transaction costs and divisibility of goods.

I can easily exclude someone from using my horse by not inviting the person over to my pasture. We cannot exclude people, for example, from visiting the city of New Orleans, or enjoying the benefits of citizens who do not steal. Both of the latter could arguably be considered "Public Goods". I am certainly not saying that the majority should be able to vote to make someone else pay for my horse, because horses are not "public goods." Citizens can restrict the access of others to their horses! I also don't think most sane people would vote to make someone work for someone else for free (slavery). I don't know how you could construe anything I have said to favor these propositions. A person's labor is a standard economic good. Labor can be given to one person (for a price) or excluded from that person and given to someone else (for a price). So where a person works or how much he makes or whether he chooses to contribute to my horse, are in general not subject to a vote of the majority! Or at least they shouldn't be. A person has a right to his own decisions about these subjects. Yes, I completely agree with you Gil. Such a vote to make someone work for someone else for free or to make someone buy someone else a horse would almost always be wrong. We have been in agreement about this from the very beginning.

We are (or at least I have) been trying to discuss the production of PUBLIC GOODS: Goods in which people cannot be excluded from enjoying the benefits. These goods pose many more interesting ethical and economic challenges.

Elliot,

Actually my initial example was an example of complete unanimous rule, in a given group, where everybody favored both "A" and "B", in your terms. Someone from outside of the group, not subject to the policeman, not asked to contribute money, and not involved in any voting might try to coerce the group as follows,

"I say this group is not allowed to hire a policeman (use the government) to pool money to produce their "public good", because it would require a vote and a policeman to enforce the vote, and we can't have policemen enforcing what might not be unanimous voting (even if the vote later turns out to be unanimous and even if people voluntarily decide to live in the community). Your group can't have the policeman because it is theoretically possible for someone in your group to vote against the proposition, and then majority rule would hurt that minority member. We ought to protect that potential minority member, even if the 'public good' is therefore not produced." And if the speaker forces what ultimately would have turned out to be a unanimous group of people, to give up their money-collecting policeman then, as argued repeatedly in other posts, this group of unanimous individuals will not be able to fully cooperate in pooling their money. Their "public good" will not be produced despite unanimous support.

I then added a second part of the argument, which I acknowledged no longer involved unanimous rule. I allowed someone who will be subject to the arrangements to object to the policy and the policeman. For example, people could object to a law against stealing, promulgated by the group: And if the majority forces the minority in this group to not steal, the people who want to steal are then penalized for their minority viewpoint, namely they are penalized because they no longer are permitted to steal.

And I asked, why is it OK for a community to pass a law against stealing, even if its enforcement hurts a minority of individuals who do not favor it, but not OK to pass a law supporting a public good, even if it also hurts a minority of individuals who do not favor it?

And what is the difference between the community that wants to pool its money for profit, and the community that wants to prevent the loss of money (by for example stopping stealing) for profit?

Indeed, the LAW itself is the quintessential public good, if it is JUST LAW! One can (almost) define a "just law" as one that inexpensively promotes the production of a "public good". Laws against stealing, for example, promote the public good "efficient trade." And the implications of the law, "don't steal or you go to jail" will likely be supported by a majority of individuals in society. The enforcement of this law is a "public" good, as I have defined the term, because one cannot exclude anyone from benefiting from the absence of stealing, unless you exclude everyone from benefiting from the law. Universal application of a law is the hallmark of a law, even if the minority objects.

If there is a law against stealing, everyone (no exclusions) has the right to set up a business without fear of people stealing, even though some (in the minority) might not want to set up a business and would prefer instead to make their living by stealing.

Why can't one exclude someone in the minority from the benefits and costs of the law banning stealing, and so allow him to steal and be stolen from? Why does the law have to be universal and affect the minority who do not favor the law? Because if anyone in the minority is allowed to "opt-out" of a majority vote in which stealing is determined to be against the law, and if such a person is permitted to steal, then every selfish person in the majority also has an incentive to "opt-out", as well. Why should I vote to restrict myself from stealing when others will be permitted to steal from me? So everyone opts out, and there are no enforced laws.

If one cannot enforce a just law (the consequence of which is, almost by definition, the production of a public good!), even if a minority of individuals do not favor it, then one might as well have no laws and simply allow people to choose to do whatever they want (anarchy).

This is as close to a "reductio ad absurdum" as can be done, in showing that the majority ought to be able to support the production of universally taxed "public goods"; because if we cannot produce public goods (in which an objecting minority cannot "opt out"), we cannot have law. And if we cannot have law, we cannot have society. Three cheers for public goods.

Thanks.

by Michael Golding on Sun, 10/09/2005 - 18:03 | reply

...if we cannot produce public goods

Michael:

You have commented on this thread. The comments benefit some readers. You have no way of preventing anyone from enjoying those benefits. (We could charge to view the site, but even then, we could not prevent the subscribers from passing on the benefit to their friends who had not subscribed.) So those comments satisfy your criterion for being public goods. Correct?

by David Deutsch on Sun, 10/09/2005 - 18:35 | reply

Public Goods

Michael,

I didn't misunderstand you. I just disagree with you.

Everything I argued applies to public goods (sorry if the plantation/slave examples threw you). You want to finance public goods by forcing unwilling people to contribute.

I reject the idea that if you have a scheme such that you don't know how to exclude me from benefitting, then you automatically have a moral claim against me to contribute to your scheme.

I agree that if people do not contribute to such schemes in proportion to their benefits, then these goods will be "under produced". I say "too bad". I choose liberty over economic efficiency in such cases.

I am not at all against allowing any group to collectively finance a project, and to enforce contractual commitments. I merely insist that participation in such "agreements" be voluntary. Don't you think it's reasonable that everyone in the agreement actually agrees?

A law against stealing is an invalid example because it's merely the protection of rights. Violating such a law would entail the kind of coercion that I object to.

Gil

by Gil on Sun, 10/09/2005 - 20:05 | reply

FWIW, unlike Gil, I make no c

FWIW, unlike Gil, I make no choice for liberty over economic efficiency; I don't think they are in conflict.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Sun, 10/09/2005 - 21:05 | reply

Possibly yes, Possibly no

I do think knowledge creation is a public good.

But I like exchanging ideas with you, and you like exchanging ideas with me (I think -- otherwise you wouldn't), so we are more likely doing this because we are having some fun, and not particularly because we are benefitting other people. But I guess it's possible that we could benefit somebody.

But for our exchange to be a public GOOD, our exchange would have to benefit somebody else, who would benefit from our wisdom and possibly (if we are very lucky), benefit from our knowledge creation, without paying us.

Indeed, such an individual should have to pay us, in a perfect world with perfect markets, except in the real world, the costs of measurement of the quality of our good and the costs of collection of our money, are likely very much higher than the value of the knowledge we create in this exchange!

No Professor Deutsch. I don't think we're gonna get any money.

The costs of measurement of the quality of our good (our ideas) and the costs of capturing the benefit we produce are obviously very much higher than any benefit our mutual exchange brings to anyone else, especially if the government were to become involved!

You, on the other hand, are pretty smart. And if you bring us viable quantum computers or a new conception of quantum gravity, one can be sure that you will not capture the economic benefit of the knowledge you create for the world. And neither did Einstein or his descendants. (If you wanted to make money, you should have gone into business: You could have captured the economic value of the goods you create. Knowledge is not a cleanly packaged good like breakfast cereal)

As I've said, if the market worked properly, the descendants of Einstein should be far more wealthy than Bill Gates.

Yes, knowledge is a public good, and capitalist economies will certainly tend to underproduce it, as will all other economies. Other economies will usually do even worse. Have you looked around at all the people who don't do a lot of thinking, even though they live in Oxford? Have you ever wondered why?

I do favor public subsidies of (particularly) higher education.

by M Golding on Sun, 10/09/2005 - 22:49 | reply

Re: Possibly yes, Possibly no

Do you think anyone is reading this exchange other than you and I?

by David Deutsch on Sun, 10/09/2005 - 22:57 | reply

Just Law = Rights

"A law against stealing is an invalid example because it's merely the protection of rights. Violating such a law would entail the kind of coercion that I object to."

Gil all just laws (rights, if you will) are public goods. If you do not favor applying them to the minority who disagree with your conception of "rights", then you are in favor of no law and no rights. To be in favor of "rights" is to be in favor of forcing the minority (or majority) to support your conception of rights, even if the minority (or majority) disagrees. To be in favor of universal rights is to be in favor of universal laws defending those rights. These universal rights are otherwise known as public goods; since no one can be excluded from having them and they are a good or just plain good for everyone.

So you want to call public goods, "rights"? Economists used to say (before conceptions of transaction costs) that a public good is a good in which everyone has a non-exclusive "property right". So yes the language of "rights" and the language of "public goods" are often used interchangeably.

So you are (of course) in favor of coercion, you just want to call it universally applying "rights", even if someone, (a minority, a majority, but someone) disagrees with your conceptions of rights. I happen to agree that there are "public goods" (rights), but I recognize that sometimes we need to use coercion to defend them...sometimes taxes and sometimes the police and sometimes the military. You do as well, you just want to call it something different.

by M Golding on Sun, 10/09/2005 - 23:57 | reply

Don't Know

In between checking out the football scores, perhaps a few.

So you are motivated by altruism?

by M Golding on Mon, 10/10/2005 - 00:56 | reply

I can testify that I read Dav

I can testify that I read David's posts, and enjoyed them, and did not pay for them. I similarly benefitted from MG's posts.

This doesn't mean David was motivated by altruism. I think the point is more that he wasn't motivated by altruism, did not use force, and created a public good anyway.

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 10/10/2005 - 02:48 | reply

Death and Taxes

Economists are very good at explaining why people don't cooperate in altruistic ways, but not why they do.

I long for a society governed by cooperation and morality, too.

But until then....we still need taxes, at least to help with the infrastructure of New Orleans!

I like Davids (and Gils and your) posts, too.

But why don't you think any of David's motivation is altruism?

by M Golding on Mon, 10/10/2005 - 06:46 | reply

Economics, Cooperation and other problems

Michael Golding wrote:

"A law against stealing is an invalid example because it's merely the protection of rights. Violating such a law would entail the kind of coercion that I object to."

Gil all just laws (rights, if you will) are public goods. If you do not favor applying them to the minority who disagree with your conception of "rights", then you are in favor of no law and no rights. To be in favor of "rights" is to be in favor of forcing the minority (or majority) to support your conception of rights, even if the minority (or majority) disagrees.

People need access to the things we term property in order to pursue their own ideas. I think what Gil might want is something like this: we should have a legal system under which when Jim is the legal owner of a commodity Jack cannot take it away from him unless Jim has voluntarily made some agreement that stipulates he should allow Jack to take it away. For example, if Jim defaults on a mortgage he has agreed to pay to Jim in a contract, then Jack may take the house away.

Now suppose Jim doesn't leave and tries to stay. Then he is violating an agreement he made voluntarily with Jack. Their situations are in fact asymmetric, Jim is in fact violating his contract; Jack is, in fact, not violating that contract. Both of them made the contract voluntarily. A law stipulating that people should respect contracts they make voluntarily at the time even if they later regret those contracts doesn't imply that people have unequal rights. Rather people have equal rights and end up with different outcomes because they take different actions.

Economists are very good at explaining why people don't cooperate in altruistic ways, but not why they do.

I think you probably haven't been reading the right economists. Or maybe not the right philosophers. Some people support altruistic policies because they like to think they are being generous and doing good by backing such policies. None of this is incompatible with economics, which does not comment on motives but just assumes that people have motives for what they do. See economists like Hayek and Ludwig von Mises for instance.

As for needing taxes to reconstruct New Orleans. Every year charities get lots of voluntary donations to give African villages waterpumps or whatever. These charities work in places a lot worse than New Orleans and some do a good job. I am not suggesting that charities should reconstruct New Orleans. For one thing there is a profit to be made by reconstructing New Orleans so I don't imagine much charity will be needed. But I am suggesting that there is no particular reason why it can't be done voluntarily.

by Alan Forrester on Tue, 10/11/2005 - 02:08 | reply

Who Owns What

Obviously Alan, if everyone agrees on who owns what, there is not a problem. We all trade for mutual benefit. If we all agree about the same universal rights, there is very little to discuss. I would think that goes without saying, but thank you for clarifying that.

But issues in the real world sometimes involve the following: One person thinks someone is stealing, and another person thinks he owns the very thing he is accused of stealing.

Some people are claiming that everyone in society "owns" a part of a debt that they must pay to society for providing a package of goods to everyone. Others claim that they own no such debt and asking them to pay amounts to stealing!

Those who believe that defense is a "public good" (like me) would argue that in choosing to live in this country, we are choosing to have delivered to us a basket of goods, but also choosing to pay for them (taxes). We are choosing to have a basket of goods produced for us by this country, including, for example, national defense, police protection, and I would add (but Gil apparently would not), infrastructure in cities.

So if we are choosing to live in a country, we are choosing a basket of goods. We choose the country that, to the best of our knowledge, provides the best basket of goods for the least money. We know we can't get those goods for free. We have to pay for them. And the currency is taxes -- the price of citizenship. Gil (apparently) thinks, however, that when he decided to live here, he didn't know he would have to pay for infrastructure in cities, or at least not for infrastructure in cities destroyed by hurricanes. So asking him to pay now (he feels) is stealing. But I thought it was made pretty clear to me that if hurricanes destroyed our cities, the government (via taxes) would help reconstruct the infrastructure. It seemed clear to me when I decided to live here that that was part of every citizens contract, even though Gil wants to weazle out of it now. Even if Gil didn't know, he should have. If he looks back at virtually all the historical precedents, the US government always seems to help out in building infrastructure. The majority won't let Gil get out of his citizenship contract with the country just because the going gets tough.

So who is right? Gil or me.

I would say that countries which tend to provide "infrastructure in cities" in exchange for tax revenue will be more powerful and secure than countries that do not. I think Gil would disagree with me on this point, although I am not sure. Those who do not believe that providing infrastructure in cities is a public good, and also believe that the provision of such services via taxation ruins the entire country, are (of course) in this country free to move to another country that does not supply city-infrastructure, as part of its basket of "public goods" in exchange for taxes.

Or Gil could argue with the majority that thinks that "city infrastructure" should be part of the basket of public goods for citizens, as he is effectively doing. He could try to convince us that government often makes a mess of things in providing infrastructure and he could ask us to look at all the waist that is happening in New Orleans, right now.

He could say that if we considered changing our minds, and made it such that city infrastructure is not part of the public good package offered to American citizens in exchange for tax revenue, America would be even greater.

And he might even be right, but I don't think so. But he can try to change our (the majorities) minds. And who knows, if he does, then more people will consider his position accurate. And then perhaps the majority will believe that paying taxes for city infrastructure is stealing. And at that point perhaps it will be. But not now.

Anyway, what Gil considers an act of stealing, I think of as the provision of a public good. So Alan, as you can see, Gil and I don't agree about who owns what. Gil thinks I'm violating the contract I "signed" when I agreed to be an American citizen and pay taxes for a basket of goods, because Gil doesn't think "city-infrastructure" was one of the items. But I think it was. Some Americans agree with me and some Americans agree with him. I think the polls suggest more agree with me.

One way of solving Gil's and my disagreement is by seeing what a vote of the people conclude (I think I would win).

But another way to solve the problem would be to leave it up to "Law and Economics" Judges (like Posner). Does it lower transaction cost more for "infrastructure in cities" to be owned by the city, or by individuals? I think I know the answer to that question, that's why I want tax revenues to support city infrastructure development. But I certainly could be persuaded otherwise if someone could show me some corporate models of city ownership (or other private models) which still protect freedoms and are cheaper, and still provide credible city infrastructure. I hope there could be evidence that could convince Gil, too.

The majority could certainly be wrong.

But with all due respect, Alan, there has not been carefully constructed mathematical/evolutionary models of how true altruism comes into being (like the anonymous donation of blood vs. say repeat dealings helping to define property rights, which has been well modeled). Such a model of true altruism would require fully incorporating the evolution of "preferences" as endogenous variables in the economic model (so supply and demand curves could not be derived independently).

Some of us have been working on such models, because we believe that ultimately they would go a long way in explaining the evolution of such seemingly disparate phenomena as "common preferences", certain types of mental illness, bipolar illness, brain waves, business cycles, and ultimately "culture" and "institutions", the holy grails in property right theory economics.

Think about the concept of businesses trying to avoid too much variance in money flows (potentially destructive to a business) vs. someone with coronary heart disease trying to avoid too much variance in blood pressure (potentially destructive to a heart vessel).

Now imagine the evolution of memes causing complementary preferences in interacting people, and how that might decrease such variance, in both circumstances. Such complementary preferences promote altruism, and smooth (and healthy) human exchange, without a government having to coordinate it. And we know that some of the memes we share can sometimes overrule our "selfish" genes.

Under what circumstances would such (complementary) memes evolve? Have they evolved in humans? When would it be optimal for there to be increased variance in money flows....would such conditions promote "search" for increasingly optimal outcomes?

I'm afraid there is much to learn about the evolution of altruism and its place in economic models. And reasonable mathematical models for these phenomena have not been fully developed yet, although people are trying.

Thanks!

by M Golding on Tue, 10/11/2005 - 06:20 | reply

Public Goods And Government

At issue is whether public good problems justify government. We are faced with the following issue: There are many possible public goods to produce. Which ones should be produced, and which not?

I suggest the proper way to approach this question is exactly the same way we approach the question: which goods should be produced, and which not? The critical thing is not to create the perfect plan for what to produce and then implement it exactly as written; it is that errors (there will be errors) in what is produced be corrected. The best way to achieve this is for every individual to use his own knowledge of his own situation to produce what he thinks he ought to, and to change what he produces when he is confronted with a problem. This overall approach accesses vast knowledge that would not be available to a group of planners deciding what goods should be produced in the entire US.

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 10/12/2005 - 00:10 | reply

OK

I think I agree with that, if I understand you correctly. Even if something is a "public good" there is no reason for "planners" (at a distance) to organize most projects. Local contractors may be more familiar with the lay of the land and one can organize competitive bidding so that (hopefully) there is a chance that the most efficient (best) economic ideas are used, if corruption can be kept to a minimum. And only those who want to be involved in a project will bid.

Elliot, given your ideas, should there be any tax collection? Should tax dollars ever be used to produce something, like a national defense or infrastructure in a city? Should taxes ever support roads or a police force, to the extent that these goods are produced by individuals using the "deductive" procedures you outline above?

Thanks.

Michael

by M Golding on Wed, 10/12/2005 - 01:12 | reply

Presently, taxes are the only

Presently, taxes are the only way certain things happen at all. So, for valuable things that we are unable to have otherwise, I support taxes. A good example of that is our military. Private armies present numerous problems that have nothing to do with a military being a public good. The problems include not wanting our best weapons to fall into the wrong hands, and avoiding rival armies fighting over what should happen. I don't consider these problems insurmountable, but so far no one has created an effective, valuable, private, modern army.

Building cities (also a public good) is nothing like this. We know how to build cities (within our borders) without government funding. OK, not every last part of a city -- I'll be happy to let the government help with the laws and police. But we don't need government to build houses, malls, grocery stores ... in fact, most stuff lost in New Orleans was created by private enterprise in the first place.

I was in a bookstore today (Borders). I read their books for two and a half hours, then left, without paying a dime. They had nice chairs for me to sit in. We do not need government funding to have a new (public-good-producing) Borders in New Orleans.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 10/12/2005 - 02:54 | reply

Ideas

Here is an interview: <http://www.reason.com/0112/fe.rb.post.shtml>

Romer claims that the careful allocation of resources is essential to promote the development of knowledge and that this is a very important economic goal.

If this is the case, a system that constantly pools resources against the better judgement of large numbers of people will sacrifice many large and small opportunities. The size of this cost cannot be estimated very well (I suppose) but the importance of the lost value apparently will be cumulatively great.

I don't see, therefore, how we can estimate that a given (ordinary) project will actually yield economic advantage for those who support it or for anyone else. The advantage may be modeled but the disadvantage cannot be, so it is impossible to know whether it is a public good or a shared mistake. If the relative values can't be argued one way or the other, then why sacrifice a methodological rule that is normally so successful?

This reasoning seems especially relevant to a project like rebuilding New Orleans, which is not being promoted for economic reasons but for the social value of the gesture and for aesthetic reasons.

By the way, with these sorts of arguments I become fuzzy about what should be considered a moral issue and what should be considered an economic one. Anyone, please feel free to help me.

by romr on Wed, 10/12/2005 - 03:07 | reply

moral issue vs economic issue

Moral issues are about how to live, or what choices to make, or what is a good life strategy, or what are good ways to treat people.

Economic issues are about money, trade, business, wealth, the economy.

Sometimes these overlap. But is it particularly important to decide which label is best?

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 10/12/2005 - 03:33 | reply

moral vs economic

Some of the comments here have opposed moral and economic considerations and others have come close to equating them, so I was curious about what I was missing. I don't think everyone is using these words the same way.

by romr on Wed, 10/12/2005 - 04:25 | reply

Re: moral vs economic

Surely for present purposes, "the social value of the gesture" and "moral reasons" and "aesthetic reasons" are all special cases of economic reasons. The situation is that many people would like various building projects to take place, and are willing to forgo a certain class of other goods in return. Whether this takes the form of a religious person wanting a church to be rebuilt, or a jazz lover wanting to see culture revived, or some blogger wanting to 'defy nature', or a hotelier wanting to accommodate tourists at the waterfront because they will pay more in rent than the hotel costs to build, these are all preferences and they are all part of the economics of the situation. For one class of possible building projects, what people are willing to forgo to have them happen is worth less than what it would cost. To meet those preferences is to destroy net wealth, cause net harm. Where the balance is the other way round, the project would create wealth and do net good. It is up to various sorts of entrepreneur to guess which is which, and to create ways of exploiting these preferences in such a way as to prevent the first kind of project from happening and to cause the second kind to happen.

by David Deutsch on Wed, 10/12/2005 - 04:58 | reply

Borders and Taxes

Although executives and owners at Barnes and Nobles and Borders are more than capable of being altruistic, it is likely that their set-up ultimately encourages people to buy, even though not every person does every time he goes into the store. Barnes and Nobles and Borders make probabilistic estimates, implicitly or explicitly, about the likelihood of somebody buying given comfortable surroundings in which people can browse. In short, from an economic perspective, I don't think your browsing or reading without purchasing something is really an example of the store producing a public good. Their behavior in allowing you to browse is calculated to optimize profit. But if you become happy, and treat your friends more nicely after visiting the store, which gets passed on, that could arguably be an example of a public good being created by the store's ambience, the profit from which the bookstore or you will likely not be collecting.

David and Elliot: Do you favor using tax money to fund anything other than a police force in New Orleans? Should tax money be used to finance new roads destroyed by flooding or get rid of water, for example.

Michael

by M Golding on Wed, 10/12/2005 - 18:40 | reply

Let us define a public good a

Let us define a public good as a good that many people want, but that everyone can enjoy, regardless of who pays for it

Borders provides a public good. The Borders-armchair-policy is something many people want, and everyone can enjoy, regardless of who pays for the cost of the policy.

I'm sure providing a public good in this way is profitable for Borders (overall). It is for grocery stores too. And countless other cases.

Other public goods are provided for other reasons, such as someone feels strongly about an issue and enjoys providing it.

My point is public goods are provided all the time, without government. What makes something hard to provide isn't being a public good. There must be some other quality that makes the hard cases (like having a military) unlike the Borders case.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 10/12/2005 - 22:20 | reply

Re: Borders and Taxes

Barnes and Nobles and Borders make probabilistic estimates of somebody buying given comfortable surroundings in which people can browse ... I don't think your browsing or reading without purchasing something is really an example of the store producing a public good.

You might as well say that governments don't really maintain public goods because they're only concerned with winning votes.

In addition to benefiting the public, what's wrong with making a profit? Is my job bogus because the salary exceeds my mortgage and other expenses? What if I like my job exceedingly, or work for a good charity?

Consider friendship, which involves a kind of emotional balance sheet. If I feel good about my friend and he does about me does that mean we're both wrong and it's not really a friendship?

The 'profit motive' is condemned everywhere but in reality profit is only one of a hierarchy of motives for the individual starting an enterprise.

This is recognised by consumers who rave about companies that innovate, care about their services and try to improve the world.

by Tom Robinson on Thu, 10/13/2005 - 00:39 | reply

Re: moral vs economic

David Deutsch wrote:

It is up to various sorts of entrepreneur to guess which is which, and to create ways of exploiting these preferences in such a way as to prevent the first kind of project from happening and to cause the second kind to happen.

These guesses involve capital which may be lost so they are risky.

This shouldn't be surprising: as well as accessing more knowledge, private reconstruction involves creating new knowledge, which entails risk.

Angry economist explained recently why bureaucrats are bad at taking risks.

Realistically I think that rebuilding New Orleans must intimately involve the federal and state governments, if only to bypass much existing regulation.

by Tom Robinson on Thu, 10/13/2005 - 01:01 | reply

Yes, my thinking was a mess.

Yes, my thinking was a mess. Thanks for your criticism. It was, at least, a private good.

by romr on Fri, 10/14/2005 - 21:27 | reply

Public Goods

Elliot,

If I trade an apple for an orange with you, I think most people familiar with the term would not say we were creating public goods, except if we added a number of other details.

If you trade your time at Borders for a comfortable seat and some reading material, public goods are also not being created by that transaction. A customer's time in the store is valuable, and Borders is competing for it by providing comfortable chairs. Perhaps if you learn something at Borders and benefit someone else when you go home or create other 3rd party uncompensated effects, one could then argue that Borders is creating public goods! Trading your time for a comfortable chair should make everyone happy, that is the nature of trade for mutual benefit.

A nice ambience within a store is not a public good because people are more likely to spend time there, but a beautiful storefront might be, because then everyone is effected, whether they go into the store or not. A store's external appearance is (of course) often subjected to "zoning" regulations, precisely because of the public good implications of attractive or unattractive store fronts.

For an interesting non-technical discussion of what a public good is, consider reading the below. It's a fun article because he shows how several goods, like the famous lighthouse of Samuelson, is not necessarily a classic "public good", but in fact can be considered a "private good", in many cases.

For lighthouses to become "private" not "public goods" required a good bit of ingenuity and creativity, but apparently shipping companies and lighthouse owners have risen to the challenge!

The author also talks about how local initiatives (like zoning regulations that are coercively applied to 100% of those who CHOOSE to live in such communities), can privatize goods thought to have public good implications (like quality neighborhood public schools), without the need for federal or even state government intervention.

<http://66.102.7.104/search?q=cache:Gx5qDmFwfu4J:www.dartmouth.edu/~wfischel/Papers>

Thanks.

Michael

by M Golding on Sun, 10/16/2005 - 05:49 | reply

Re: Re: Borders and Taxes

Tom,

"...what's wrong with making a profit....?"

Did I say there was something wrong with that?

Michael

by M Golding on Sun, 10/16/2005 - 05:53 | reply

Re: Ideas

ROMR,

The article you cite is indeed written by a well-respected and thoughtful economist. Let's quote the article.

"There are some kinds of ideas where, once those ideas are uncovered, you'd like to make them as broadly available as possible, so everybody in the world can put them to good use. There we find it efficient to give those ideas away for free and encourage everybody to use them. IF YOU'RE GOING TO BE GIVING THINGS AWAY FOR FREE, YOU'RE GOING TO HAVE TO FIND SOME SYSTEM TO FINANCE THEM, AND THAT'S WHERE GOVERNMENT SUPPORT TYPICALLY COMES IN. (caps mine, MG)

In the next century we're going to be moving back and forth, experimenting with where to draw the line between institutions of science and institutions of the market. People used to assign different types of problems to each institution. "Basic research" got government support; for "applied product development," we'd rely on the market. Over time, people have recognized that that's a pretty artificial distinction. What's becoming more clear is that it's actually the combined energies of those two sets of institutions, often working on the same problem, that lead to the best outcomes."

ROMR, the economist is explicitly advocating using government imposed taxation, something inherently coercive to those who don't want to pay, to pool the collective resources of citizens to support the research of scientists, in collaboration with private industry.

In other words, he favors government support of the production of the public good called "knowledge", something I have also advocated in this blog on this very topic.

So from a libertarian perspective, in advocating government coercion in pooling resources (taxing certain citizens who don't want to pay scientists), how is he not advocating "pool(ing) resource(s)" to produce the public good called "knowledge"?

by M Golding on Sun, 10/16/2005 - 15:38 | reply

Michael, I was using your

Michael,

I was using your (old) definition of a public good. Would you please provide your new one?

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Sun, 10/16/2005 - 16:48 | reply

Same Definition

Just need to think about probabilities.

by M Golding on Sun, 10/16/2005 - 17:28 | reply

I don't follow

Let us define a public good as a good that many people want, but that everyone can enjoy, regardless of who pays for it

As I understand this, it doesn't say something can't be a public good if it is a mutually beneficial trade. It only says a public good is a good that many people want and benefits everyone regardless of which people pay for it.

Many people, including me, want Borders. The benefits of Borders are available to me regardless of which people pay for them. So as far as I can tell it qualifies.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Sun, 10/16/2005 - 18:33 | reply

RE Borders and Taxes

"The benefits of Borders are available to me regardless of which people pay for them....."

The fact that businesses exist, in general, is arguably a public good. But your sitting in Borders store is likely not a public good, even if you buy nothing.

If I invest 50 dollars (for example, give to person John, $50) and I have a 50% chance of getting $110 back from John, and I do not get my money back, I have not necessarily created a public good by investing, though John got 50 dollars, and I got nothing.

Borders is investing in YOU Elliot, when you walk into the store. The store may or may not get a return on their investment in you on any given visit. They are allowing you to "test drive" their materials. You are providing for them, however, the EXPECTATION that on average, for example over time, they will make more money than they spend in providing a chair and reading materials to you and others in the public.

A chance of customers spending money, is in fact money to a business with a large enough volume of customers. A 50% chance of getting 100 dollars is worth something to most businesses so they will spend some money to get that money. And I bet it's worth something to you, too, Elliot. You can prove this to yourself.

Ask yourself whether you would be willing to pay a certain amount of money to have a 50% chance of getting 100 dollars. Most people would be willing to spend something (usually less than 50 dollars) to buy that deal. Again, most people would be willing to pay SOMETHING to buy a "chance", even if it is not a guarantee of money, but a "chance" for money.

Because people will spend money to buy a "chance", a chance at winning money is worth something to the people who will spend for it. I bet Elliot, that you would be willing to spend 30 dollars for a 50% chance of winning $100, if the money were paid to you immediately and with no other risks and if the transaction were legal. So then YOU would buy a "chance", too and think it had value. If this is true, then I have convinced you that "chances" have monetary value, even if you don't get money every single time.

Borders is paying you money, Elliot, by giving you a comfortable chair and reading materials. And yes, you ARE paying for it, because you are offering them a "chance" that you will buy something. And remember, chances are valuable, so the owners of Borders are willing to spend money (provide seating) to buy the valuable "chance" that you are giving them when you walk into the store.

If you think this is "fishy": Remember, (I surmised that) you were willing to say that a "chance" is worth money. So perhaps the owners of Borders, if they are as smart as you, are willing to think that "chances" are worth something, too. Perhaps "chances" are even worth more than the cost of providing comfortable armchairs and reading materials!

But in being paid with nice seating and reading materials, you are not providing them with a guarantee that their investment will pay off. Just because Border's owners do not get a payoff on every visit, does not mean that they are providing a public good for you, any more than I am providing public goods by investing 50 dollars with John, which is the metaphorical equivalent of giving him a chair and reading materials.

Borders invests in you, because of their expectation that on average they will make more money from you and people like you, by keeping you in the store and causing you to spend your relaxation time in the store. After all, even though you didn't buy last time, you might just get the itch to buy next time, because of your good feelings and because of the time that you are spending with them. Have you ever bought something from Borders?

If Borders were to know that you would never buy anything at any of their stores, and furthermore if they knew that excluding you would not cost them (much) of the spending of others who could be upset because you were excluded, and furthermore if Borders still allowed you and others like you to come into the store and sit down comfortably and read; then yes, Borders would be providing a public good.

"The benefits of Borders are available to me regardless of which people pays for them..."

Not quite. Virtually all customers pay Borders for their comfortable seating with the valuable "chances" that they sell to Borders when they enter the store, and which Borders redeems when some of the "chances" actually generate money.

Now, is it possible for "free riders" to exist at Borders? Are there people who always fool the owners? The owners would exclude them if they could, but they hang out at Borders and never pay? Perhaps they also don't bathe so other customers are discouraged from going into the store, or at the least these "free riders" always take up the most comfortable armchair, even though customers with a higher chance of buying would like to use it. Sure. These are "free-riders".

But likely there are very few of them, because bookselling is a competitive business and Borders would not provide the comfortable arrangements they do, unless most customers have a reasonable "chance" of buying during the many visits in which they go into these lovely stores. (I go, as well, Elliot. I buy things, but not every time. They get me with their "two-cheese" sandwich...very good.)

Why do markets sometimes provide public goods, without government intervention?

Two usual reasons are given.

1. Altruism/the rewards of spreading "truth"/self-replicating memes that "fight" against self-interested behavior. In short, cultural factors can make (more likely) the provision of public goods, without need of government intervention.

2. Some goods are provided by individuals who have natural monopolies over the production of the good. If I own the only practical source of water for irrigation to 10 farms owned by others, yet there is some runoff that benefits a public forest, I doubt that I can expect the government to pay me for the runoff!

If I make continuing profit (economic not accountants profit, Tom) because of my monopoly position, without expectation of future competition because of unique geographical factors and known technology, then losses from my uncompensated water "run-off" may not make my profitability negative.

I will provide the public good even when I can't capture the full benefit of what I produce because I am not challenged by competitors -- who theoretically would lower my profit to near zero -- which could then make the water "run-off" a devastating uncompensated business expense, if my competitors did not also have to pay for run-off. So I provide water to the forest for no compensation (a public good) because I can make an economic profit because of my monopoly position vis-a-vis the water supply. So I make more money than I spend to provide the water, so I can lose money to "runoff" and still be profitable.

So cultural effects (e.g. altruism) and forms of monopoly (including zoning requirements) allow the private production of "public goods".

Indeed, this is (sort of) the argument made by the (unfortunately) often overlooked economist Joseph Schumpeter. Schumpeter believed that monopolies or monopolistic competition was optimal, rather than pure "no economic profit" solutions being optimal, because he believed that the public good "innovation" would be more likely to occur in companies making economic profit.

Michael

by M Golding on Sun, 10/16/2005 - 21:46 | reply

Unlike

You don't have to write so much, I already know these things in detail.

As I understand it, you think some cases, such as the rebuilding of New Orleans, are unlike the Borders case. Profitability is not what makes them unlike because New Orleans is potentially profitable (if built well enough). Please outline what the relevant differences are.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Sun, 10/16/2005 - 23:09 | reply

Public Goods

At Borders, you are giving the owners a "chance" that you will buy something and in exchange they are giving you a comfortable chair. Simple trade. No "third party" effects. No public goods produced. No externalities. Your action in "sitting down" benefits no one else in the store.

With New Orleans, when you give a dollar to New Orleans, I too am happier. You created a third-party effect. You traded with an organization in New Orleans, and as a consequence of your generosity, you benefitted me, because I also don't like to see people suffer. But I didn't pay you for the happiness you created for me because you are giving away happiness to everyone in society for free. If I am selfish and I can get something for free, why should I pay (as much) for it? So my natural rate of altruistic giving will decrease, because you already gave money.

This is true for everyone, so noone gives the optimal amount of altruistic donation (given their preferences). Donations to New Orleans create third party benefits. Going to Borders does not.

Giving for defense spending creates 3rd party effects like giving to New Orleans. When you give money (voluntarily) to the defense department, you make me happy because I don't have to pay (as much) for the airplanes that protect me. Your donation to the defense department creates benefits to everyone in society. But why should I pay (as much) for something that you are willing to give me, for free? But this is true for everyone. So even if we all have the same desire for defense spending, we all voluntarily give too little, unless we can all levy taxes on each other -- which we in fact do -- to pay for defense and yes, now for New Orleans.

Third party spillover effects -- Defense and New Orleans.
Direct bilateral trade -- Sitting at Borders

Defense and New Orleans reconstruction -- potential public goods.
Sitting at Borders -- private good.

Michael

by M Golding on Mon, 10/17/2005 - 01:29 | reply

Third Party Effects

Buying books from Borders increases the chance that Borders will still be open next year. This benefits people who want to visit that Borders next year. Therefore, buying from Borders has third party benefits. Therefore, "has third party effects or benefits" is not a difference between funding New Orleans and buying from Borders.

What say you?

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 10/17/2005 - 02:59 | reply

Providing Public Goods + Democracy != Good Government Coercion

Michael,

Perhaps you already know this, but just to be clear, my disagreement is with your apparent theory that providing any public good justifies financing via coercive taxation. Or, maybe you think that this somehow, magically, becomes true in cases where a majority agrees. I think that these theories are false.

Economic efficiency doesn't trump morality.

I think drug prohibition is immoral. Even if I accepted the premise that it improved the overall public welfare (which I don't), and was faced with the fact that a majority approves of it. I think it violates the proper sphere of autonomy of individuals.

Likewise with taxing people to fund (most) public goods.

I happen to think that, given political realities, adopting my rules regarding funding public goods would actually lead to greater overall public welfare than adopting yours. But, that's not my primary concern.

My primary concern is treating individual people morally. And that, for the most part, does not permit coercing them for the good of the majority (or even their own).

Gil

by Gil on Mon, 10/17/2005 - 06:16 | reply

Borders and Taxes and Stealing (again)

Elliot,

What do economists mean when they say that a good is produced in a "competitive market"?

Gil,

I understand (and actually share) your beliefs more than the average citizen, I think. In most arguments, I am the one having to defend "the market" against those supporting far greater government involvement.

However, I do recognize that as a citizen of this country, I owe (and believe you owe) money to my fellow Americans for the benefits of citizenship. The issue of the morality of "stealing" therefore depends upon who owns what. If you don't pay taxes to support goods that Americans have lawfully (and hopefully reasonably) determined to be "public goods" best supplied by the government, I think you are stealing from me and your fellow Americans. (I am assuming of course that you are an American, but the argument would apply if you held a different citizenship).

You, on the other hand, believe that Americans have no right to the provision of certain "public goods" by the government, even if this is the most efficient way of providing them. Therefore if money is collected from you in the form of taxation to support Public Goods, Americans are stealing from you and you believe this is wrong.

So the issue is not the morality of stealing. We both agree that it is wrong to steal. The issue is how do you reasonably decide what to do when 2 different people disagree about who owns what. That is a much more subtle and interesting question, and is truly what we have been arguing about. And yes, the argument involves questions of morality.

by M Golding on Mon, 10/17/2005 - 14:28 | reply

Accuracy in Media

"My difficulty is with your apparent theory that provides any public good justifies financing via coercive taxation."

Gil

I don't think I've ever said that. But I've certainly pointed out situations in which that statement is not true.

Michael

by M Golding on Mon, 10/17/2005 - 14:46 | reply

benefits of citizenship

However, I do recognize that as a citizen of this country, I owe (and believe you owe) money to my fellow Americans for the benefits of citizenship.

Michael,

I put it to you that the average free benefits a person gets for being part of American society are exactly the same size as the average benefits he gives away to others without being paid. My reason is there is no force creating free benefit but us humans, so the total amounts created and received should be the same. So I don't see why I should owe anything.

What do economists mean when they say that a good is produced in a "competitive market"?

Do you mean a perfectly competitive market? I wasn't aware "competitive market" had an exact meaning.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 10/17/2005 - 18:14 | reply

Competitive market

Ok.

You are right, "competitive market" does not have an exact meaning. But economists routinely say that a market for a good is relatively "competitive." What does that mean (approximately) even if there is no exact definition?

Michael

by M Golding on Tue, 10/18/2005 - 03:33 | reply

Who Owns What

Michael,

So, is it your theory that I don't own what I have earned via voluntary trade; but rather my fellow citizens own whatever portion of it they choose to take (if they can gang up on me via elections and use it to provide public goods)? And is it your further theory that I have agreed to this by accepting my citizenship?

I suppose I have, in the same sense that a child who chooses to go to school has agreed to risk being beaten up by bullies. It's a fact of life. In that sense, he doesn't really have a right to control his bodily integrity because he's agreed that being somewhere that people regularly abuse him is better than his alternatives.

Do you recognize any rights at all that our current system violates, or do you think that rights are defined by the current system, or that they just happen to coincide perfectly?

Gil

by Gil on Tue, 10/18/2005 - 03:52 | reply

competitive market

It means, roughly that there is, in one area, a variety of people/groups either producing and selling the good, or with the means to begin if they wanted, that way there is competition by sellers and potential sellers over the price. We also need a variety of buyers -- who either do buy the good or would consider it.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 10/18/2005 - 04:08 | reply

Well Stated

Well stated, given the imprecision of the question!

So if the bookselling industry is relatively competitive, there are a lot of substitutes for given booksellers and buyers. So this industry would not seem to create too many "public good" problems.

When there is monopolistic or oligopolistic buying and selling patterns in an industry and this pattern is expected to persist over time, these economic circumstances may create "public good" problems.

Michael

by M Golding on Tue, 10/18/2005 - 17:33 | reply

So if rebuilding New Orleans

So if rebuilding New Orleans was sufficiently competitive -- for instance, there were plenty of different construction companies that wanted to build the buildings -- would government intervention be unnecessary?

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 10/18/2005 - 19:28 | reply

Public Goods, Again

There are two issues.

1. The fact that one person gives to New Orleans likely diminishes the amount that another person gives. As stated before, my preferences for charitable giving to New Orleans are satisfied by those who give, and so I give less. If I can get something for free, why should I have to pay for it? This situation is symmetrical for everyone, so everyone gives less.

How is this situation similar to a monopoly creating a public good problem? There is a relationship, but people don't usually phrase things as you do, Elliot, so your interesting question requires a different type of response.

Let's say 1000 hurricanes hit our 1000 most important cities simultaneously (G-d forbid), only one of which is New Orleans. Let us further suppose that the tragedy in each city is comparable in the minds of the citizens of the country. Each tragedy is a "substitute" for the other. In other words, no one city is considered any more important than the another (just like there are many substitutes for bookstores). Let us further suppose that the country is composed of 100,000 people only, so that no group of people's contribution substantially increases the happiness of someone else who also gives, because the tragedy in each city is so enormous overall. So no amount of charitable giving is ever completely adequate (preferences for charitable giving, like preferences for goods, are infinite and no group's contribution changes the value of giving, like no one group's purchase of a particular book changes the overall price of other books)

In other words, let us suppose that the "market" for hurricane relief is "competitive". So there is no New Orleans style "monopoly on tragedy". Then charitable giving for hurricane relief would not be a "public good", as buying and selling books is not a public good.

In the absence of these assumptions, charitable giving for hurricane relief is arguably a "public good".

2. Other "public goods" in New Orleans include things like roads. It is inefficient to have 1000 roads in the same town, constructed by 1000 different firms, connecting the same two buildings. So certain roads are often most efficiently built by monopolies, whether government or private. But monopolies (government and private) can then have a degree of control of prices (taxes and tolls). Therefore long-term monopolies maintain economic (not accountants) profit...i.e. charge a price greater than the average total cost of production and maintenance of the road.

Though users of the single road would like to share ownership of the road, the cost of them organizing is too high. So a "road-owner" can jump in the void and buy the space connecting two important buildings in a city, and perhaps can buy a column of land dividing an entire city in two. (And someone with views like Gil would, I think, stop -- coerce -- the citizens group that wants to share ownership of the road from hiring their government as their agent. He would stop the group from hiring their government to purchase the road so that all own a part of it.)

A pure libertarian would say that buying a stretch of land dividing a city in two is OK, because this is simply a profit maximizing solution for the entrepreneur even if he gains the ability to charge monopoly rents to everyone who wishes to cross. That is, to the pure libertarian, it's completely OK even if the road owner is able to charge 10 times more than the full cost of production of the road and his time. If you give the road owner $10.00 for access to the road and he gives you $1.00 worth of road crossing time (in terms of the cost of maintenance of the road), this is somehow not stealing $9.00 from the public, according to a pure libertarian.

Indeed someone like Gil might even say that taxing the road owner even $1.00 is, remarkably enough, stealing from him! Gil would say that it is stealing because the road was created with the "owners" hands. I, on the other hand, would say that the road owner owns the road up to the Average Total Cost of the roads construction (including the opportunity cost of the owners time), but not more.

The paradox of a purely libertarian perspective is that if one owns the ability to coerce someone else, for example, if one owns a single road dividing a city in two and you charge everyone to cross, and if citizens use their government to fight back, then (and only then) does power, in the interests of self-defense, become wrong.

by M Golding on Thu, 10/20/2005 - 00:42 | reply

Right to Profit

Thanks for clarifying your position, Michael.

You think that profit is stolen.

You think that if someone is creative enough to supply goods and services at a lower cost (to himself) than the value to his customers (an amount greater than or equal to the price that they willingly pay), then he is stealing that profit from his customers; that they have a right to the entire benefit of his creativity, and he only has a right to recoup his costs (including his time).

I suspect you're willing to let people keep some of the profit (because you must realize how little wealth would be created otherwise), but you think that, rightfully, we are practically slaves of the collective and have no individual right to the fruits of our creativity that others willingly offer us.

No wonder you have no problem with taxation. You don't think people actually own anything they've accumulated, because rightfully they would only break even in all of their endeavors.

Very...um...interesting.

Gil

by Gil on Thu, 10/20/2005 - 06:16 | reply

Not Quite!

Gil,

You're not reading carefully. I described the ability of a public citizen to purchase not a private good, but a "public good" (like a line cutting a city in half). Such purchases, though very profitable for the individual, do not lead to wealth creation, but rather the opposite.

The ability of an individual private citizen to permanently make profit because of institutional arrangements, not innovation, is the ability of a private individual to purchase a "public good." Such an individual is not really purchasing a good (imagine purchasing an inch-big line cutting a city in half) but rather is purchasing the law itself!

If someone holds a gun to your head, and therefore makes profit, this is not creating wealth because it is decreasing peoples choices.

If someone owns a public good, like a square border around every single persons house in a city, and charges whatever rent he wishes for each person to cross the line, that person is powerful indeed. For he could charge any given person in the city for the ability to cross the line even to purchase food. And if the governments only role were to enforce the owners rights to the square borders; that is to enforce property rights to the inch thick lines surrounding each house like a grid, then when a private citizen owns a public good, he is metaphorically and often literally demarcating private property itself. Purchasing public goods is therefore equivalent to buying the ability to define law itself, because it is law that demarkates the extent of private property.

(Why shouldn't a person have to offer 50 years of service to the kind man who owns an inch-wide piece of property surrounding his house. Yes the grid owner is permanently making profit on his property, but what's wrong with that!) After all, the owner of the house himself is just wanting to trade for mutual benefit. He wants food so has to pay the full cost of that food, including the cost of crossing other peoples property, as determined by the property "owner". The cost of crossing the line could be 3 million dollars (and remember, the government should have no say in prices for goods, public or otherwise. And perhaps 3 million dollars is 50 years of work for most people to pay off.) A private citizen who owns "public goods," for example a line around each persons house, effectively owns the law and then is ultimately able to effectively enslave an entire city. And all this, apparently OK to the libertarian, because the government only acts as a police officer, enforcing private "property rights" to the grid (the public good) around everyones house. Please.

I beg to differ, if the government does not own many "public goods", it is selling the law to private citizens, and the ability to therefore coerce everyone. When private citizens own public goods, yes they make profit, but in the same way that gun slingers make profit: By "holding-up" people, they decrease peoples choices. This does not lead to wealth creation (though it creates profit) but rather leads to wealth destruction.

Owning public goods is owning the law. (Gil, please distinguish between buying public goods and private goods.) When private citizens own the law, it is neither fair nor equitable nor efficient.

Such arrangements lead to (long-term) profit for a few, with no need to innovate, and at the expense of everyone else.

Gil if you don't think something is a public good, like a road for example, because there are helicopter substitutes, argue that. But I think you can see that allowing private citizens to own all public goods is counterproductive. And no, before you respond (!), I have not said that making profit is bad or that the government should own all public goods!)

Take care.

Michael

by M Golding on Thu, 10/20/2005 - 11:45 | reply

Public Goods without Government

M Golding said:

The fact that businesses exist, in general, is arguably a public good.

Since businesses, in general, were not created by the government (through taxation), this proves Elliot Temple's statment that:

...public goods are provided all the time, without government.

If this point is already agreed upon, excuse me; I skipped some of the lengthier comments by M Golding.

by Bob on Fri, 10/21/2005 - 08:07 | reply

Public Goods

Individuals do produce public goods.

"Businesses", however, would not function well at all without government provision of the defense of property, and equally importantly, government facilitation of exchange, both public goods.

Michael

by M Golding on Fri, 10/21/2005 - 14:51 | reply

Re: Public goods

defense of property, and equally importantly, government facilitation of exchange, both public goods.

In fact they are not public goods by your definition, because it is very easy for governments to refuse to defend a particular person's property or enforce a particular person's contracts. In fact governments worldwide do this all the time.

by a reader on Fri, 10/21/2005 - 15:00 | reply

And....

Governments, like private enterprises that metaphorically or physically own the public spaces around peoples property, are capable of strangulating business transaction and therefore hurting the public good.

The interaction (transaction) between people is in fact the primary public good, easily interfered with by governments and businessmen with power over public spaces and extreme libertarian philosophies!

Michael

by M Golding on Wed, 10/26/2005 - 18:00 | reply

If I own a strip of land thro

If I own a strip of land through the middle of New York, and put into place a crazy policy of charging millions of dollars as a toll to cross ... yes it will be a disaster. However, I will destroy the value of my own land in the process. I won't want to charge absurd tolls; I'd rather charge moderate ones that people want to pay.

Further, the people who built on opposite sides of my land knew they were taking a risk. Or, alternatively, the people who cheaply sold me the various parts of the strip of land ... well apparently they are idiots, and the people who built on opposite sides of a strip of idiots were taking a risk...

If government owns a strip of land through the middle of New York, and puts into place some kind of crazy policy, it will also be a disaster.

Government is known for making crazy policy mistakes more than private individuals are, because government is less accountable, and various other reasons.

We both want reliable, sane policy for the strip of land through the middle of New York. I think keeping government far away will best achieve this.

You may say you only want government to intervene in an emergency ... after the idiots sell me the strip and I put into place a stupid policy. But how is government to judge this is taking place? Maybe I've just set up a toll road that is ... well pretty much ideal ... but people are complaining anyway. How is government supposed to decide who's right? Economists disagree all the time. And what will the law say, exactly? It needs to be clear to me, in advance, which purchases and policies will break it.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Fri, 10/28/2005 - 11:16 | reply

Libertarianism and Slavery

A line across New York produces nothing and only increases transaction costs. The cost for crossing an arbitrary line across New York City should be zero. The line is a "public good."

If the governments only role is to protect property (what some libertarians seem to say), and not to protect transaction, the consequences are interesting, to say the least.

Elliot, let's say someone owns an inch thick piece of property extending arbitrarily high into the air that completely surrounds your house or neighborhood. Further, assume that the governments only role is to protect property, not promote transaction.

Since someone owns the inch thick property around your house, he can charge an arbitrary sum of money to have you permitted to cross it, perhaps far more money than you have. And he can ask the police to prevent you from crossing because the government must defend property.

So the owner of the property can have you starve to death by not permitting you to leave or food to enter. Your choices are then to commit suicide or to (voluntarily?) sign a contract specifying that in exchange for being able to cross the boundary, all of the products of your labor and the number of hours you work, and everything that you consume, for the rest of your life, will be determined by the owner of the property surrounding your house. Then and only then, will he permit you to cross the line and eat what he determines you should eat, as defined in the contract. This is otherwise known as slavery.

So if Libertarianism means that a government must defend property, but not human interaction/transaction and efficiency, then that Libertarianism supports slavery. So when Gil says, on moral grounds, that he supports the defense of property over efficiency, if one takes him too seriously, Gil would support slavery. A simple property line around a neighborhood enslaves everyone within. (I'm quite sure Gil doesn't support slavery, but it is interesting to think through the steps about how we got here).

So the government and private citizens must support public goods, the most important of which is transaction and interaction between people. In different arguments, when "natural" monopolies are discussed, if the monopoly is expected to last indefinitely, many argue for government intervention, precisely to prevent this limitation on transaction (Note that a natural monopoly is precisely an entity that reduces transaction between people, just like the owner of the "monopoly" line surrounding someones house!)

Gil apparently argues that it is morally wrong to interfere with property rights, even at the expense of efficiency. So the government presumably should not prevent someone from purchasing a line around a house. Worse, from the perspective of a purist Libertarian, interfering with a contract between the owner of the line and the occupants of the house amounts to stealing from the monopolist who owns the line. I, in contrast, argue that it is stealing from the owner of the house, for a monopolist to own a "public good" like a line around a house!

It is possible to defend the free market, if one relaxes ones libertarian assumptions and agrees that it is the governments and private citizens role to own and defend public goods so that everyone can use them. The most important of these public goods are public spaces promoting transaction and interaction between people.

And yes, these arguments can be very precisely formulated. In a simple way, the law and economics people have mathematically and philisophically argued that judges and governments should favor those laws and definitions of property that maximally promote free human interaction and exchange (i.e. decrease transaction cost). Lines across New York City or around your house do not qualify!

I personally am not a "law and economics" type because I do not accept that the "preferences" modeled by economists or the "arguments" discussed by Popperians should be treated as exogenous variables in models.

Nonetheless, law and economics professors have created a very "rational" approach to economic models that some at the "World" might be interested in learning about. And unlike the simplistic libetarian arguments (just defending property over efficiency), the law and economics people can show that their models increase human freedom.

So unlike Libertarians, who start out defending property to promote freedom but ultimately must logically defend slavery, an approach that emphasizes minimizing transaction costs as a primary economic goal; promotes property, efficiency, and freedom.

To understand this perspective better, The Nobel Economist Douglas North is fun to read (e.g. "Structure and Change in Economic History"). Judge Posner also has written some interesting books, using this type of philosophy. The "Law and Economics" worldview is remarkably consistent with Popperian epistemology and so (one would think) would be referenced frequently when economic issues are discussed in this forum.

Libertarian epistimology is not really consistent with a Popperian world-view, because of its emphasis on property, even at the expense of human interaction and exchange. Indeed, Popper was certainly not in favor of slavery, and libertarians logically are, but don't admit it.

by M Golding on Sun, 10/30/2005 - 02:17 | reply

My understanding is in the wo

My understanding is in the world today, people are careful about buying property that isn't connected to a reliable system of roads/airports/seas/whatever for transportation. In other words, people won't buy land with a circle around it without also buying or having rights to pass through the circle.

Do you think people shouldn't have to pay anything for the right to egress over someone else's property? even if that other property owner doesn't want to give it up?

ok i can imagine a law about having right-of-way, for free, in some situations being reasonable. that need not involve taking away anyone's property though!

basically, i don't see that the nightmare scenario would ever happen, and I do see you attacking property rights needlessly.

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 10/31/2005 - 02:33 | reply

The "Right of Way"

"Ok. I can imagine a law about having a right-of-way for free."
Elliot

Congrats. You've just discovered what a public good is. It is a "right-of-way" to exchange goods and ideas. Facilitation of exchange does not destroy property. Indeed there would be no property without it!

Do not sell across all margins the rights to the roads around our houses or the free speech that emanates from our mouths. The control of exchange is the control of our lives. If you sell the public good, you traffic in slavery.

Would not Popper wish that you exchange so that you find what you know best? Property without knowledge is like science without theory. So it is our ideas, forged in exchange, that tells us what we have and own.

So if you'd like to find a rational economic policy, reduce the costs of exchange -- free the costs of exchange if you can -- and not only will we all be more wealthy, but we will all be a bit more free.

And if you must be of a practical mindset, REDUCE TRANSACTION COSTS.

by M Golding on Mon, 10/31/2005 - 04:40 | reply

The "Right of Way" "Ok. I

The "Right of Way"

*"Ok. I can imagine a law about having a right-of-way for free."
Elliot*

Congrats. You've just discovered what a public good is.

Are you saying if I have right-of-way to walk across a trail on someone's property to get from my house to the highway that is a public good...?

I don't see how this fits with your earlier definition either.

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 10/31/2005 - 07:15 | reply

Transaction Cost

"I don't see how this fits with your earlier definition, either" (of a public good)

Let's say Joe has been carefully buying from different people, tracts of land that are adjacent to a neighborhood in the shape of a cul-de-sac, with one road leading out (the "mouth" of the cul-de-sac).

The final transaction occurs when Joe buys from Harry the road at the mouth of the cul-de-sac. If this were a pure libertarian world, Joe now essentially owns everyone within, and can turn them into his property as described above, by preventing them from leaving and starving them.

Let's say one of the new slave's relatives (say Ellen, on the outside of this cul-de-sac), attempts to buy the mouth of the cul-de-sac (from Joe) to free her relative. If the transaction goes through, then Joe and the relative have made a transaction, but the benefits of the transaction are then distributed across all the residents of the cul-de-sac. But the costs of the transaction are concentrated on Ellen. (So Ellen would have to be very altruistic to purchase back the road at the cul-de-sac mouth...which is the public good)

Seen in reverse, when Joe buys the mouth of the cul-de-sac, he imposes costs from this transaction on every single person in the cul-de-sac, by denying them food and thus forcing them into slavery. When this transaction is reversed, everyone benefits, but does not have to pay, for their freedom. The reverse of a Pigouvian externality, is a Pigouvian public good.

"Are you saying that if I have right-of-way to walk across a trail on someones property to get from my house to the highway that is a public good..?"

Elliot

Not at all. How would a "law and economics" Judge answer the question of whether you should be able to cross someones property to get to a highway?

First of all, he would acknowledge that a law allowing people to cross each others property does in fact decrease certain transaction costs. In fact individuals will be able to get to the highway faster and these savings should be counted.

But, the law and economics judge would also ask what effect arbitrary crossing of property has on the land-owners ability to transact with his property. Indeed, property that can be crossed by anyone will not have the same value in trade. This expected decrease in value across everyones property would be calculated. In most situations, the decrease in transaction costs associated with getting to the highway more quickly, will be easily offset by the decrease in value of property in which trespass is permitted, so the law and economics judge should decide against your ability to cross peoples property. Since the same property is there, but the overall value of property falls with a law allowing arbitrary trespass, laws allowing trespass usually increase net transaction costs. So arbitrary crossing of property should not be allowed, according to this model.

Now, what about the mouth of the cul-de-sac described above? How would a law and economics judge approach that problem?

1. A single monopolist could be permitted to own the mouth of the cul-de-sac. In other words, we could allow a private company to own the "public good" called the "mouth of the cul-de-sac." But to prevent the owner from starving the residents within and making them slaves, or at least charging more than the cost of maintaining the road, this monopolist could be regulated. So if a monopolist owns a public good and it is expected that his monopoly will last indefinitely, he should expect regulation. Perhaps individuals could be charged tolls equal to the expected fair market cost of maintaining the cul-de-sac mouth.

2. Or, the community covenant could say that 200 dollars per month is owed to the community managers by anyone who decides to build a house or live there. Community managers could be elected by the community. Decisions about "public goods", like who should maintain road access out of the community, could then be resolved by majority vote. Each person voluntarily agrees to be coerced when he is in the majority, in exchange for the ability to coerce the minority when he is in the majority. A vote could be taken and money could be allocated to pay a local child or worker to maintain road access out of the community.

In model 1, a private firm owns the "public good", and the people pay the regulated monopolist to administer the property. In model 2, the people own the public good and appoint their own representatives to administer it.

A law and economics judge, looking at both scenarios would need to decide whether it is cheaper to socialize ownership of the cul-de-sac mouth leading out of the community through a community covenant, or is it cheaper to allow a monopolist to control the public good (access out of the community), regulate him, but allow him to charge each resident as he passes through.

Which scenario is cheaper and better can be subject to empirical inquiry, however imperfect econometricians tools are. Which alternative keeps transaction cost the lowest? Both alternatives are frequently used.

Michael

by a reader on Tue, 11/01/2005 - 01:24 | reply

Big Difference

Michael,

I'm afraid you've been mischaracterizing my position.

I don't hold property rights as absolute. I approve of allowing violations of property rights in emergency situations provided reasonable compensation is made (e.g. starving hikers breaking into an empty cabin for food and to call for help).

But there's a huge difference between making this concession and supporting the regular, institutionalized, violation of property rights as a matter of course, because the representatives of a majority think a particular public good is worthy of coerced payment. For example, I don't approve of preventing a young couple in Montana from allocating their assets in pursuit of their own values, because Michael Golding and many others like jazz and the nostalgia of what New Orleans was like.

See the difference?

By the way, if roads were privatized, every piece of property would surely be sold with an easement so that nobody could be prevented from having access to and from his property. And if it happened without such an easement, the law would recognize the right anyway (and possibly force reasonable compensation).

Also, anybody who tried to profit in this way would surely fail. People profit (in free markets) by providing customers with things that they want and are happy to pay for (considering their alternatives, etc.). They depend on reputation for future success. If they took advantage of unfortunate people in a way similar to what you describe, then the general public would be sure to punish them economically (boycotts, bad publicity, etc.)

These nightmare scenarios go nowhere toward justifying the policies you seem to support.

It's a bit like arguing that nobody should be allowed to be rich because an evil rich person might offer poor people $1 million to cut their feet off.

It's just not a real problem. And the possibility certainly doesn't justify the "cure".

And even if one doesn't recognize the morality of property rights and is only interested in economic efficiency, I think that a proper analysis would conclude that our present political institutions are not likely to limit their actions to funding those projects that actually increased efficiency, and that allowing them to try makes us worse off overall.

Gil

by Gil on Tue, 11/01/2005 - 06:16 | reply

I think that a proper analysis

I think that a proper analysis would conclude that our present political institutions are not likely to limit their actions to funding those projects that actually increased efficiency, and that allowing them to try makes us worse off overall.

I think we can do even better. We don't need a proper analysis. Government can't decide to limit its actions only to efficient ones -- even if it wanted to -- because it cannot know for sure which actions are efficient. No one knows that. That's why there is risk involved in investing in companies.

When I make a risky investment and it's bad, I suffer. When government does, I suffer, you suffer ... all the tax payers suffer. Government shouldn't be in the business of trying to decide what actions are economically efficient. Period.

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 11/01/2005 - 06:45 | reply

The Whole Discussion is about "Easements"!

Gil,

The issue is not Michael Golding's nostalgia. You and I would have had no discussion if we were talking about a persons desire to take someone elses property and use it for his own purposes. But some Libertarians fundamentally misunderstand economics. Property has no value without interaction and transaction (the fundamental public goods). Governments and all of our roles should be to promote voluntary interaction and transaction. Promoting voluntary interaction is virtually the only way to promotes property. For example, property is worthless without the fundamental public good called knowledge (something that exists between people otherwise noone would know what he is trading). Elliot calls public goods "rights of way" and you call public goods "easements." I don't care about the words. Knowledge quite literally gives someone "a right of way" and an "easement" to other knowledge. It is a "public good".

I have been trying to talk about the fundamentally complex way in which "easements" affect society and in particular, what are the barriers to functioning "easements" in societies? Who owns them? Who cares for them? And in particular, what should be done when someone (especially a libertarian talking about "freedom") erects a barrier on an "easement".

You blithely (and simplistically) say that of course there are "easements," but without even a smile on your face! The problem in the real world is that "easements" can be very expensive to maintain and people actually have to decide how to maintain them for use, so that libertarians don't build on them and (in my view) steal from people.

It is nonsense to say that people only make profit by satisfying the needs and wants of others. They also make profit by owning "easements" or "rights of way" or "public goods" (all the same thing) and erecting barriers which they charge people to cross.

Owning a line around peoples house is a metaphor that shows that profit can be made by erecting barriers to trade, and it is the governments primary (perhaps only) responsibility to facilitate trade, to facilitate exchange.

Libertarians want defense of property. But property is worthless without exchange (as the example of the line around the house shows).

Shall I provide an example of erecting a barrier over an easement (a partial line around a house)?

Gil, do you think that a neighborhood under construction should be able to ask citizens who wish to move there to contribute a certain amount each month to a community fund? The pooled money would then be used for "community projects" (like taking care of the easement/roads that connect the community to those outside the community).

Should individuals be allowed to decide that the community should decide, say by majority vote, certain issues that affect the community? Such individuals in the community would agree to be coerced when in the minority, and agree to coerce others on certain issues when in the majority.

For example, the color of peoples houses is arguably an "easement," to use your words. If someone paints his house "pink" (an eyesore to most), this color inhibits the ability of other homeowners to "connect" with someone who may wish to buy their property, because others may not wish to move into a neighborhood with a bright pink house. So the pink color erects a barrier to transaction for others in the neighborhood. So the person painting his house pink is effectively building on what you would call an "easement" (do you see that?). A good that connects people to their trading partners is an "easement" (or "public good" or "right of way") But to the person painting his house pink, he may think it adds to the value of the house or at least his enjoyment of it.

Worse, he could hate the color pink but he could say to others, "If you would like me to paint over it a different color, that hurts me profoundly. I would like 1000 dollars from all of you in the neighborhood" (up to the value of their property lost because of the pink house.)

And so he could charge (make profit by) threatening to ruin the property value of everyone elses house. Such an individual is absolutely NOT making profit by producing what people want. Indeed he is making profit by producing specifically what people DO NOT WANT. So Gil, do you see how people can make profit other than by satisfying other peoples needs and wants?

Should a majority vote of the community be able to decide whether someone should be able to build on their collective "easement", especially if majority rule on these types of issues was agreed upon before someone lived in the community? Would the majority be stealing from the minority by preventing pink houses? If the person violated the covenant and painted his house pink, would he be stealing from the community? What do you honestly think?

Such discussions happen all the time in real neighborhoods, in real cities, and in real nations. (In our neighborhood, the fight every year is over spending community money to place religious crosses on the "easement" identifying my community during Christmas. Some of us want them there and some of us don't. How do we decide using Libertarian principles?

Michael

by M Golding on Tue, 11/01/2005 - 18:14 | reply

Government Analysis

"Governments shouldn't be in the business of trying to decide what is economically efficient."

Elliot

Interesting.

Bob and Harry move next door to each other at about the same time. Bob opens a restaurant. Harry opens a mail-order business. Bob takes Harry to court saying that the length of his grass keeps customers away. His business is an eyesore to customers.

Harry counters that his grass is not that tall and it is not good business to mow the grass all the time because it wastes time (it's not efficient).

Who should win? How do you decide?

Michael

by M Golding on Tue, 11/01/2005 - 23:15 | reply

Contracts

Michael,

I do approve of voluntary (in which all participants have given prior, informed, consent) agreements being honored.

However, I strongly deny that I have entered into such a voluntary "Social Contract" in which I have agreed to go along with anything the government chooses to do to me (or others).

You may wish to pretend otherwise, but pretending is all it is.

If you support forcing unwilling people to help fund lots of public goods, you are not merely enforcing voluntary agreements. You're doing something very different.

You may think it's worth it, but I think you're mistaken.

Gil

by Gil on Wed, 11/02/2005 - 08:11 | reply

But What About the Specifics?

Gil,

I share your opinion that government is often overintrusive.

But Gil, what do you think about the below situations.

1. Should a community be able to have people sign an agreement when they move in, saying that on issues of landscaping, color of houses, additions to houses, and/or possibly defense of the neighborhood, and other issues in which one person's decision affects the property value of others in the neighborhood; then the majority can decide whether it is OK, as long as the decisions are constitutional and do not violate state or federal law?

Money for defense of the neighborhood (e.g. a nightly police car making rounds) would come from community dues...as we had in my neighborhood when I was growing up, though there were people who voted against paying for the extra police presence!

2. So should the community described in my post yesterday be able to stop someone from painting his house pink? Is the person stealing from the community if his house gets painted pink anyway? Or is the community stealing from him by not letting him paint his house pink? What do you honestly think?

3. Should I be able to legally not pay my taxes in support of defense because others (who want defense) should be able to pool their money? Why can't people voluntarily pool their money and give to the military? Only those who want to give should give (right?) Otherwise it's stealing from those who don't want to give. If defense is not important then people won't give and if it is they will. Right?

(Maybe a young family wants to realize its dreams in Oregon. If this family doesn't give, it doesn't destroy our national defense. How can we possibly justify coercing them. And people are very generous. I have no doubt that billions would be raised VOLUNTARILY, if people were asked to defend their country with their donations.)

Thanks,
Michael

by M Golding on Wed, 11/02/2005 - 15:56 | reply

Specifics

1. Yes, such an agreement seems valid and 2) I think a party to the agreement can be held to its terms.

3. I personally would like to move to voluntary funding of defense as quickly as possible because the same principles apply as to other public goods and I think our culture will be able to raise such funds voluntarily with some creativity.

However, I recognize funding defense to be an exception at the present time (because the risks to all other liberties are so high) that I accept coercive funding temporarily until we can evolve towards voluntary funding in a safe manner.

I don't see any other public goods (e.g. rebuilding New Orleans, space programs, research funding, public "education", etc.) rising to a level that justifies this type of exception.

Gil

by Gil on Wed, 11/02/2005 - 18:20 | reply

Fair Enough

You're certainly mostly consistent!

So we've established that at times it is reasonable for a majority to coerce a minority to defend a public good (like hiring a police car to defend property) if all have (non-coercively) signed on to a set of community rules allowing that to take place.

The next logical question would be,

1. Under what set of circumstances is it "rational" for a majority (or anyone in the community) to vote for hiring a patrolling police car and how much should the community be willing to spend? Let's assume that all crimes in the neighborhood are property crimes (e.g. theft) and no one is injured or frightened by intruders. (Assume this for simplicity)

2. "Because the risks to all other liberties are so high", the majority should be able to coerce the minority and make them pay for defense, too. (Gil, is this your argument for why everyone should have to pay for defense of the country?)

If so, why should the majority be able to coerce the minority (even right now)? If the majority wants defense, because it believes "the risks to all other liberties are so high", why can't the majority still contribute and just reduce the size of the military a little bit? Or perhaps everyone in the majority can contribute a little more to make up the difference lost because the minority does not contribute. After all, the cause is so important, surely those who recognize the value of defense would be willing to give a little more to defend their principles.

3. "Because the risks to all other liberties are so high"
Defending which liberties justifies coercing people?

Thanks,
Michael

by M Golding on Thu, 11/03/2005 - 01:30 | reply

Justifying Coercing People

Michael,

1) I suppose it would be rational to choose to increase spending on protection so long as the expected benefit of the marginal increase exceeds the marginal costs by more than the rate of return of alternative available investments. This is not always an easy call (lots of secondary costs and benefits), but I would think that a single patrol car would be a good investment.

2 and 3) I'm not saying that high risks/benefits justify entrenched, institutionalized coercion. I do think that extreme emergency situations where there isn't time or opportunity to get agreement can make it reasonable to coerce people if you're willing to offer compensating benefits (enough that a reasonable person would be indifferent between the offense + compensation vs. no offense).

I don't favor permanent coerced defense funding. But, I'm afraid that turning off current funding immediately and hoping for sufficient contributions might be irresponsibly dangerous (leading to mass innocent deaths).

Here's an interesting article with some ideas for funding public goods (like defense). I think that these and other ideas would be sufficient to voluntarily raise enough to fund a reasonable defensive force (and I do think that much of current defense spending is wasted).

Gil

by Gil on Thu, 11/03/2005 - 04:04 | reply

Taking Children Seriously (TCS)

Off Topic:

Just to try to avoid confusion (for lurkers as much as anyone), the use of the word "coercion" and "non-coercion" in this thread has nothing to do with the TCS use of the word. I bring this up because TCS and The World are by the same people, and because TCS is sometimes (misleadingly) called "non-coercive parenting", and also because I know some TCSers must be reading this thread (like myself) and initially think "hey wait, that is coercion" before realising the use of 'coercion' here is completely different.

BTW, back on topic, as far as libertarian-coercion (ie, the libertarian meaning, as in this thread), it looks to me a bit like a euphemism for saying force. I think it'd be clearer to write "we've all agreed to force a minority, if they agreed (non-forcefully) to do the thing". also this is silly. you can't force people who consent.

BTW if everyone truly consented to all the laws of a community, you wouldn't need police roaming the streets.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Thu, 11/03/2005 - 15:52 | reply

OK

Gil

I. Concerning the community that has a move-in requirement of

- an amount of money/month for a few public goods (like easements) and
- the community that has the police car, and
- in this same community you personally notice that the majority (and often close to everyone) is making rational calculations about such things as police cars by trying to make sure that the
- "expected benefit of the marginal increase exceeds the marginal cost by more than the expected rate of return of other investments" when they vote

Concerning such a community described above, you say it should be legal for individuals to run such a community but

A. would you seriously consider living in such a community if members are continuing to use the "rational" calculations you specify? If you would not wish to live in this community, what changes would you want made to handle issues like bright pink houses and the need for police vehicles?

II. I still don't understand why the IRS cannot print out a summary of defense needs, what the individual and others (approximately) gave last year, and ask for voluntary contributions to defense.

B. Specifically, why do you think there would be any decrease at all in the net amount of money given to the military, given the stakes you mention, even if voluntary contributions for defense were initiated this very next tax season?

Thanks.

Michael

by M Golding on Thu, 11/03/2005 - 17:24 | reply

Considerations

1) Yes, I would consider living in such a community (in fact, I do). The considerations include understanding the extent of the possible restrictions and fees, and deciding whether I think that it adds more value than it costs in my choices. Also, it helps to have the option of leaving to a less restrictive community. This type of competition will tend to help the evolution of good rules.

2) I have never denied that there are factors which will tend to reduce voluntary contributions to public goods.

While I'm personally confident that enough funds can be raised voluntarily in the U.S. for an effective defensive force, there is still a degree of uncertainty about how long it will take to evolve the proper norms and mechanisms for such funding.

It's this uncertainty that leads me to accept a gradual, rather than immediate, transition towards voluntary funding of defense.

An adequate defense is something that we, literally, cannot live without. There's a huge difference between victory and defeat. This is not so for other public goods. Those that are perceived as most valuable will receive substantial contributions, of course.

Gil

by Gil on Thu, 11/03/2005 - 17:54 | reply

Defense

At this point reading through 100 posts I am willing to concede Gil his own country, water and air rights and easements, and his own government to go with it. The jury is out as to whether this government will be needed. I would like to see the plans for the Defense budget and the building which it rents tho before I immigrate.

by a reader on Fri, 11/04/2005 - 00:05 | reply

Specific Factors

1. We have agreed that we should be able to have, and you (and I) might in fact live in, a community that has individuals sign an agreement when they move in specifying

a. that on issues of landscaping, colors of houses, additions to houses, defense of the neighborhood and other issues in which one person's decision affects the property value of others in the neighborhood, then the majority can decide whether it is OK, provided that

b. we have free choice to leave the community and given that our decision to stay or leave would partially depend on the extent to which most of our fellow citizens utilize marginal cost and revenue estimates when they vote.

c. As our successful community grows, it becomes complicated, as you have pointed out, to make marginal cost and revenue estimates on every issue discussed. Would it be OK, if the majority then starts to consider that information matters. Specifically, the relative presence or lack of INFORMATION that some people have ABOUT marginal cost and marginal revenue issues, in fact affects the way people vote. So information itself becomes a "public good," because peoples intelligent or unintelligent voting itself affects the overall property values of the community.

So appropriate voting procedures could themselves become subject to a vote, given the original wording of the covenant allowing the community to decide to vote on issues affecting communal values of property. Improving voting rules improves the value of community property.

And so lets say the people overwhelmingly vote to pay "experts," out of their community dues, to study certain issues, because each person does not have time to learn all the information needed to make an informed choice (because they are doing other jobs and not doing econometric analyses.)

And the people also vote to divide the community into 60 equal square parts (like a grid superimposed on the community), and each subcommunity in each little block gets to vote for a number of representative experts, proportional to the population, so that each persons vote from each subcommunity continues to count the same as every other persons vote from other subcommunities.

The "experts" job (say an average of 3 per subcommunity) is then to calculate as best they can, the effect on property values in the subcommunity (using marginal cost and revenue decisions), of any decision by a homeowner which affects property values of other homeowners in the subcommunity. If there is not unanimity of the 3 experts, then they vote.

A. Gil, should it be OK for a community to try to organize itself this way? Then every single person does not have to be an expert on every single issue that affects the appearance or property of the community as a whole. And as long as the "experts" can be voted out of their job as experts, if they are not optimizing the property values of the subcommunity, would that be OK? The experts might be considered "portfolio" managers for the appearance of the community.

The community is then effectively divided, so that most property problems are handled on a local level by the experts who do econometric analysis, unless the decisions of individual subcommunity homeowners affect the community as a whole. If a decision of one homeowner is thought to affect the property values of those outside the subcommunity, as well, then the experts from all the subcommunities gather, and vote on the issue. In addition, the community is giving itself the opportunity to adjust to the different collective preferences of subgroups and learn what types of decisions in each subcommunity in fact maximize the value of property and individual happiness (people will leave one subcommunity and join another if it is better for them and their property).

Should this arrangement be legal?

2. Back to the real world.

B. In your view, which specific "factors" prevent individuals from adequately coordinating their economic activity to voluntarily support the US military, say by utilizing a voluntary checkoff on their IRS tax form? Which factors prevent this from being done this very next tax season?

by M Golding on Fri, 11/04/2005 - 03:48 | reply

Factors

Michael,

A. Such an agreement should be legal provided that the imposed rules and fees do not go beyond the original mandate that was unanimously agreed upon (without unanimous approval).

The limits of the agreement should be clear and understood. It shouldn't be a "living" document. It shouldn't begin to allow restrictions on what drugs people may consume, whether or not they may own guns, how much they may/must pay neighbor kids to mow their lawns, or force them to pay for projects unlike those originally agreed to (no matter how large a non-unanimous majority would like to fund them with forced fees), etc.

B. I accept the problems that you describe with respect to funding public goods (free-riders, etc.). I'm sure that many people would contribute less for collective defense than they would if their own defense depended on their own payment.

The major factor that I think is needed is time for social norms to change so that defense is considered a worthy cause to contribute to, and such contributions are expected, rather than an entitlement "paid by the government".

I'm confident that given the time and opportunity, this will happen and people will recognize a responsibility to support collective defense and will act accordingly. Also, time will help more creative funding solutions to be applied and to be discovered.

Gil

by Gil on Fri, 11/04/2005 - 06:41 | reply

So Were You Overstating the Case?

Gil,

Neither you nor I believe the government should finance many public goods, although I'm virtually certain you favor government intervention less frequently than I do.

For example, you don't believe that the government should help with hurricane relief in New Orleans, other than to provide police protection for property. But in the short-term you have acknowledged that "I accept the problems you describe with respect to funding public goods (free riders, etc.)"

So when someone describes a public good problem to you, is the best response really, "No coercion is necessary for willing contributors to coordinate their economic activities"?

Indeed if you acknowledge the possibility of "free riders" in the short term preventing efficient pooling of money to buy a public good like collective defense, then the "no coercion is necessary...." comment is overstating things a bit, isn't it?

Michael

by M Golding on Sun, 11/06/2005 - 19:13 | reply

Overstating

Well, the quotation is true. It might not always be the case that the degree of coordination is to your satisfaction, and it may be less than if all externalities were internalized; but it is non-zero. Public goods do get voluntary funding (even despite inhibition by government policies); all the time.

I'm sure you agree that it's a good thing that we (usually) protect people from having their lives and efforts commandeered by others for the purposes of those others. The narrow project of running a plantation efficiently might have been enhanced by slave labor, but the wider project of advancing human flourishing was not.

The real question is: When, if ever, is using force rather than reason morally (or, if you prefer, economically) justified by the situation?

My argument that the answer is "Extremely rarely, if ever", and that it's a huge mistake to institutionalize this power to make it relatively easy for bureaucracies to employ. History (and public choice theory) show us that this policy leads to problems that often outweigh the intended benefits.

If not in each case, then certainly in the aggregate.

Gil

by Gil on Sun, 11/06/2005 - 21:33 | reply

Efficient Coordination?

I see!

So when you discuss public goods that you would like financed through the government (like defense), and you say "No coercion is necessary for willing contributors to coordinate.....,"

what you really meant to say is that when it comes to financing public goods, "No coercion is necessary for willing contributors to INEFFICIENTLY coordinate their economic activities."(!)

I'm glad we both agree that when it comes to public goods, willing contributors do not necessarily coordinate their economic activities efficiently. If saying that (in certain circumstances) "willing contributors cannot efficiently coordinate their economic activities" means the same as "willing contributors coordinate their economic activities....", well OK then!

By the way, independent of the immorality of slavery, your example of plantations being economically efficient, is laughable. If slavery had been economically efficient, slaves would have been used in just about the same way as free individuals (with maybe a few more hours of work per day). Slaves would have been congressmen, presidents, business owners, etc.

A slave would make far more money for the slave-owner as a business man than as a slave (if he were willing to be a slave and a businessman -- a big if). So a perspective that only analyzes transaction cost to decide who should own what, clearly comes down on the side of people owning themselves, because when they own themselves, their intellectual and physical resources can be used in many very productive ways. When people own themselves, they use themselves more efficiently.

Slaveowners have to waste enormous resources trying to keep slaves stupid and in chains so that they can't escape. In addition, they have to wastefully damage their bodies and minds to keep them from organizing against the tyranny that oppresses them.

A law and economics judge, independent of ethical considerations, would easily come down on the side of people owning themselves, because when they do, their bodies and minds produce more. So the "Law and Economics" perspective does give you a surprising number of "correct" answers to ethical questions, while just employing seemingly empirically-based analysis.

Obviously, even if a person's resources were more efficiently utilized as a slave, and not a free person, it still would be very wrong to enslave him. But it is nonetheless surprising how ethically "on target" decisions are, when legal decisionmakers try to find those definitions of property that minimize transaction costs. There is a bizarre near-confluence of ethical and economic decision making when this occurs. The "positive" and the "normative" inch closer together.

Michael

by M Golding on Mon, 11/07/2005 - 01:56 | reply

Inefficiency

Inefficiently coordinating resources to support public goods is the only way it can be done. If you think it's done efficiently through government (or would be if we could only get the right people into the right positions), then you're delusional (I'll leave it to you to contemplate whether such delusions arise from disease or not).

I suspect that in the vast majority of cases using government force and bureaucracy as the coordination mechanism is much more inefficient than through the creative efforts of private people voluntarily contributing their own time and resources.

Government force is a very poor attempt at a solution to public goods funding; both morally and practically. As you say, it is interesting how often these things align.

Gil

by Gil on Mon, 11/07/2005 - 04:27 | reply

Slavery

By the way, my intuition about the economics of slavery matches

yours. However, I've seen reports of serious studies that have come to the opposite conclusion.

In any case, my point was merely that the perception of an efficiency gain for a narrow project by those with political power via violating individual rights (and we must both agree that slavery had that) is not a sufficient condition to go ahead and do it.

Often the judgments will be wrong, and even when they're right...they'll still be wrong. :-)

Gil

by Gil on Mon, 11/07/2005 - 04:52 | reply

Michael, You're absolutely

Michael,

You're absolutely right about the inefficiency of slavery, and the point that if it wasn't they'd have been businessmen is great.

As to public goods ... I agree there are situations where coordinating efficiently is difficult. it takes knowledge to identify these cases. and it takes more knowledge to come up with an efficient solution. where i differ from you is that I deny government has any advantages in identifying these cases, or in solving them efficiently. I noticed your post didn't mention this issue.

also, following your take on slavery ... i am highly suspicious of any claims that government forcing people is particularly efficient. more inefficient than slavery? of course. the only way something will get done? sometimes. but the most efficient way to do something? no way. when government solutions seem to work well, it's probably b/c government used it's large scale organisational talent (which while flawed certainly exists), or something else it has knowledge about how to do.

i'd also like to acknowledge that I believe your position in the argument makes more sense than Gil's. I think if one concedes the things that Gil concedes, then you'd be (mostly) right.

however, I don't think Gil's extraordinary commitment to freedom should be seen as a flaw. he could easily make this argument to you, that i'd agree with: you (Michael) are too quick to accept unfree solutions to problems, and ought to be more skeptical of such methods.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 11/07/2005 - 10:01 | reply

Freedom

I think many of us want to find the most efficient ways for certain public goods to be produced, as long as benefits actually exceed costs in the production of the good.

If it is the government that is producing the good, its activities are often remarkably inefficient and wasteful, due to governments lack of accountability.

But if citizens pay the least when, for example, road ownership is socialized and supported by taxes, then so be it. But if it is on average cheaper for roads to be owned by a monopoly that charges tolls and is regulated by the government, I am fine with that, as well. And if it is still cheaper to set up creative rules for companies to compete for contracts and routes, while roads are supported by tolls and with little government regulation, that would be even better. Regardless, we should perform cost-benefit analysis on as many government projects as possible to project what we think will happen and then carefully document our errors.

As stated in a different thread, Murray Weidenbaum, as head of the presidents council on economic advisors under Reagan, tried to get this type of analysis performed routinely on proposed government projects. He proposed using the office of management and budget for these efforts. As one can imagine, his endeavors may not have been too well received by many government bureaucrats, whether of the liberal or conservative persuasion. Projects often cost more than those proposing them are willing to admit! Professor Weidenbaum did not stay too long in Washington.

Defending arbitrary definitions of property (like someone owning a line around someone elses house and multiple variations) does not necessarily promote freedom and often hinders freedom and efficiency. As I have shown, defense of property arrangements that in the long term inhibit transaction, in fact decrease peoples freedom. Indeed in extreme cases, defense of such property arrangements actually promotes slavery.

Policies that in the long term lower transaction cost, on the other hand, are more likely to promote rational definitions of property in the future. More importantly, decreased transaction cost allows increases in rational exchange between people. And it is this facilitated free exchange that ultimately generates wealth, knowledge, and most importantly, freedom.

by M Golding on Wed, 11/09/2005 - 01:06 | reply

While government is presently

While government is presently the most efficient way to do some things ... and in some cases the only known way I see no in-principle reason to expect this to remain so forever. The special feature of government, that differentiates it from just a private company providing something, is that it uses force against its subjects. I don't mean to declare government illegitimate, but this fact remains. I believe this fact gives government no theoretical advantages in economic matters, where the critical thing is knowledge. Thus, I believe one day we won't need "government"

(force initiation) to provide our services. in other words, i see no qualities of government to be necessary parts of solving economic problems.

Also, and I'm sure you'll agree with this, if people wish to pay more for a less-efficient non-government option, that is perfectly OK. what people value matters, and it's legitimate to value things other than efficiency.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 11/09/2005 - 02:34 | reply

Novel Idea!

1. Some of us appreciate government because it combats the forcefulness of others. When noone is violent (uses guns or builds fences on easements), then government will not be needed. This might take a while!

2. It's not less efficient, per se. If people want something (call it good A) and place a premium on something else (i.e. goods not produced by the government...good B), then when people purchase A + B, they are purchasing more than good A alone, and therefore may be willing to pay more.

3. But your point is still very interesting to me and #2 is a quibble. I have never thought of the situation where people might be willing to pay more for something, to not have the government produce it!

So I'll use your assumptions. Let's say it is, in general, more "efficient" (in your sense) to socialize ownership of the roads and have them financed through taxation rather than through private ownership and tolls.

So just socializing the whole road building activity and collecting taxes is financially cheaper than having the government have to deal with the "barriers" that private road owners could place on "easements", by privately owning roads. I don't know that this assumption is true, but let's say it is.

Elliot, should a majority be able to ...well...coerce(?!)..... the minority into paying more for the roads, because the majority does not want the (coercive!) government involved?

by M Golding on Wed, 11/09/2005 - 03:31 | reply

I say if you can't persuade p

I say if you can't persuade people your project is a good idea, they shouldn't bear the cost of it. However, I don't advocate making taxes optional today; I know that system would be horribly abused. What I do advocate is moving (gradually) towards the first thing, so that people prosper, or not, on their own merits and choices, and not on other people's decisions. It's bad if I lose money over someone else's foolish road project; your analysis seems to leave out that we don't know, in advance, if a project is actually efficient or not. Which is the primary reason paying for it should be voluntary.

About government preventing forcefulness ... I like being safe as much as the next guy, but I don't know how much this is government's doing. In many countries, one is not safe from the government or the military (if they are separate). What makes us safe from our military can't be laws that the military isn't allowed to take over. And it isn't private gun ownership. And it's not checks and balances in government decision making -- those can't do much about bullets. It must be traditions of peaceful society, and knowledge of how to live peacefully. I know government is presently an integral part of that tradition, but I don't think it deserves all the credit.

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 11/09/2005 - 04:33 | reply

A wise anarcho-capitalist kno

A wise anarcho-capitalist knows that anarcho-capitalism is a more sophisticated way of life than our present one, not a simpler one. It will emerge from it only by evolution and piecemeal conjectures and refutations. Not by abolishing taxes at a stroke. The latter would simply revert us to an earlier state, and would not constitute progress at all. How can one expect improvement without thought?

by a different reader on Wed, 11/09/2005 - 04:34 | reply

Not sure I understand

Elliot,

If it's cheaper to socialize ownership of roads and collect taxes, but a majority of the people would rather pay more and have them privately provided and pay tolls, should the majority rule?

Michael

by M Golding on Wed, 11/09/2005 - 04:42 | reply

There are multiple questions

There are multiple questions there.

Today, we use a system of voting for government projects, and a system of voluntary trade for private projects. So if a government road gets voted for, it should be built. (It's not quite that simple.) If we're talking about a voluntary road, it should only be built by people who voluntarily build it.

In general, I would prefer that only people who believe the road is a good idea, and wish to build it, pay for it.

None of my analysis depends on whether the road is, in fact, efficient. We have to have policies that can be implemented without being sure about who's right or what policies are right. If we knew what was best, we wouldn't need ways of making decisions.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 11/09/2005 - 06:08 | reply

I Still Do Not Understand

So (right now) if it happens to be cheaper to socialize ownership of roads and collect taxes, but a majority wants to begin the process of moving toward less government involvement in a few spheres of our lives, and if the majority votes to pay more and have roads privately financed by tolls:

Should the majority rule?

Michael

by M Golding on Wed, 11/09/2005 - 11:59 | reply

Why Rule?

Why is it a question of ruling?

If some people (majority, minority, or individual) want to build private roads and finance them voluntarily (tolls, advertising, etc.) why is it a question of them ruling? Why is it anyone else's business, and by what right should they stop them?

They don't need to rule. They just need to be unmolested.

Gil

by Gil on Wed, 11/09/2005 - 17:50 | reply

The problem with your questio

The problem with your question is it still seems to involve some central authority making decisions (us). I don't want to rule. I don't want to decide who should rule. Popper said "Who should rule?" is a bad question, and should be replaced with, "how can we remove bad rulers and bad policies?"

anyway, here is what I think should happen:

If the majority (in congress, or in state government, or wherever that controls a government budget) vote to cut funding for government roads, then government road funding should be cut. meanwhile, building private toll roads should be legal. (already is, as far as I know)

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 11/09/2005 - 18:11 | reply

OK

"If the majority....vote to cut funding for government roads, then government road funding should be cut."

Elliot

Thanks.

If the majority wants, can the government that represents it vote to sell the government roads to willing private entrepreneurs?

Michael

by M Golding on Wed, 11/09/2005 - 20:01 | reply

yes, government selling its r yes, government selling its roads is OK with me. while they're at it, i hope they sell the postal service ;-)

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 11/09/2005 - 20:48 | reply

Majority Sells the Roads!

Elliot,

The minority complains and says it was coerced by the majority. The minority says that road use is now more expensive, just as the majority and minority both predicted.

Because on average everyone in the minority (and majority) has less money, the minority says its opportunities are relatively decreased, a little of their freedom has been taken from them by the ruthless majority decision.

Elliot, do you think the majority coerced the minority by forcing them to pay more for traveling the roads?

Michael

by M Golding on Wed, 11/09/2005 - 21:07 | reply

I don't know exactly what you

I don't know exactly what you mean by "coerced", could you rephrase with a different word?

Doesn't your objection apply equally well to all voting? A policy of [something] is put in place, then the minority that opposed this policy complains that the [something] hurts them.

Also, traveling on a given road is optional! You may say I'm splitting hairs because roads are so useful. But I generally take the view that great things to buy from other people are a bonus, not my natural right. Thus if, for example, a grocery store raises its prices, I don't say they are "taking my freedom", because I don't think they owed me anything. They were giving me extra freedom, now they aren't, that's all.

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 11/09/2005 - 22:37 | reply

Freedom vs. Coercion

If someone owns something, or a right to do or not do something, and then that something is involuntarily taken away from them, then that is coercion because it is using power, rather than voluntary exchange, to effect change.

You said,
"Yes, government selling roads is OK with me", though the minority did not want the roads sold.

By "OK", I assumed you thought it was reasonable (perhaps right) for the majority to authorize the government to sell the roads. You have told this blog in many different ways that you value freedom and voluntary exchange, so I was wondering why you thought it was OK to coerce the minority into giving up their public roads?

Michael

by M Golding on Wed, 11/09/2005 - 23:32 | reply

I don't own government roads.

I don't own government roads. I have a right to use them. I am perfectly aware that their are processes by which my access to the roads may be changed even if I vote against the change. I know the government could impose a curfew, and not let me use the roads at certain times. I know the government could impose a holiday and a parade, and again take away my road use. I know the government could, if it got the votes, tear down a road and replace it with a post office.

so while i have some right to the road, I know that right is limited, and I don't consider a government policy of selling the roads to violate it anymore than a parade does. as long as the profits for the sale go into the government budget, it's like getting a refund (since taxes built the road)

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 11/09/2005 - 23:48 | reply

OK

So do you believe that the minority was not coerced when the majority voted to authorize the government to sell the roads to private citizens?

Michael

by M Golding on Thu, 11/10/2005 - 02:38 | reply

not coerced by your definitio not coerced by your definition. yeah.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Thu, 11/10/2005 - 09:18 | reply

Coercion

Was the minority coerced by your definition and if so what it it?

Michael

by M Golding on Thu, 11/10/2005 - 15:29 | reply

My definition isn't relevant

My definition isn't relevant (It's the www.takingchildrenseriously.com one if you're interested), i was just emphasizing that I was answering according to the way you defined coercion above, not according to some definition of my own.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Thu, 11/10/2005 - 18:29 | reply

Coercion

Do you think the minority was coerced according to the taking children seriously definition? (I want to know whether YOU think the policy that you said was OK is coercive, not whether I should think it is coercive by my own definition)

Michael

by M Golding on Thu, 11/10/2005 - 20:13 | reply

why do you want to know that?

why do you want to know that? couldn't you just ask me questions that don't use the word coercive?

-- Elliot Temple

The Logic

I am very curious about how you reconcile a few things that you have said and I need a little more information about how you view things to accurately ask you the correct questions.

"Coercion" has several very precise meanings in mathematical models of economic theory and in game theory. I gave a vague "English" description of one of those meanings. The TCS-type definition has also been mathematically modeled (in a way...if you want more details, ask if you are not familiar).

But since you previously gave responses to posts that used the word, you must have had your own understanding of what that word means. I'm asking you to use THAT understanding (your understanding) of the way the word was used to now respond to a question about whether the minority was coerced.

Was the minority coerced by the majority when the majority voted to authorize their government to sell the roads to private entrepreneurs?

The logic of my questioning would have become apparent in the very next post if you were willing to answer the question.

The word "coercion" has been used repeatedly in this thread and you have commented on multiple posts that have specifically used the word "coercion."

Obviously, not using a word that was key to multiple of your previous responses, changes the present discussion to something else, and therefore does not allow examination of the consistency of the relevant arguments that you have previously made in these threads. Others (especially me) previously have used the word "coercion", and you responded to the threads. So there is an entire line of relevant past discussion that is eliminated when you negate the logic of our previous interaction, by refusing to use a key word that was part of the interaction...Is that your intent?

You participated in a discussion that used the word. Now you don't want to use the word. I guess that means you don't want the discussion, either?

I was enjoying this discussion with you. If you must use a different word for "coercion" then use the less precise "freedom decreased by the actions of another or others," every time you see the word "coercion" in our previous discussion. But please make sure that your previous responses to my posts, now with the relevant substitution made, still are accurate, because I don't want to have to re-argue over 100 posts to get back to this point (and I'm not sure that I would be willing).

I will assume that if you elect to continue this discussion that your previous responses would not change if the relevant substitution were made.

If the above paragraph is true, then the new question would be, "Were the freedoms of the minority decreased across relevant margins when the majority authorized their government to sell the roads to private entrepreneurs?"

by M Golding on Fri, 11/11/2005 - 03:06 | reply

According to my understanding

According to my understanding of how people usually use the word "coercion", and the way I thought they did in the discussion above ... the minority who didn't want the roads sold was not coerced.

I also deny its freedom was decreased.

Sorry about all this. I didn't mean it to be a big deal. I just wanted to express my lack of familiarity with standard use of "coercion".

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Fri, 11/11/2005 - 06:15 | reply

No Problem

No problem at all. Sorry I overreacted.

Will respond a little later!!

Michael

by M Golding on Fri, 11/11/2005 - 18:18 | reply

Ok

So the roads in this community are quickly sold off (but unfortunately without a lot of planning) and those who wanted a tax-refund from those purchasing the roads and those who wanted to intermittently use the roads, but pay taxes, can no longer use the roads unless they pay a toll. And the absence of planning for this decision shows.

Road owners quickly try to "encircle" each other, to nearly monopolize transit in and out of the city. No one can achieve a complete monopoly because of air travel, however. But road-owners quickly encircle the airport, as well (in order to maximize profit, a critical part of capitalism) Furthermore new construction begins taking place in order to try to create a new "beltline," outside the current outer beltline encircling the city in order to be the one who controls transit in and out of the city. This new construction owner sues in court the owner of the previous outer beltline to guarantee that appropriate "easements" are put in place to ensure access to his road from inside the city.

The previous owner of the beltline counter-sues claiming that he offered one easement (because he is "generous") but there can not be other easements leading across the 25 miles of his encircling road because of the tremendous cost of construction, but if the new owner wants to pay him for the construction plus a "fee" to take into account his industriousness and cleverness for owning the existing beltline around the city (with one door in and out of the city), that would be fine. He claims that "making profit" is simply part of the American way and the extra 150 million per month is what his insightfulness is worth.

Besides, this owner opines, it is very costly to have to build around an existing loop too many access points out to other roads because it slows traffic and "my customers" demand a fast road. He says, "your easement to your property is my cost to most of my customers". The one building the outer beltline, outside the previous outer-beltline, retorts that the previous owner of the outermost beltline is simply trying to prevent competition for routes around the city, and into and out of it, and it is only "right and proper" to allow competition by allowing him to build roads over and through the other owners property.

Lawsuits break out all over the place. (Incidentally, this is one of the common criticisms of a libertarian model). If other branches of government are not involved in helping to define property, particularly the "easements" which are so difficult to correctly define, the courts will become flooded with cases.

Libertarians like to speak about decreasing government power, but the many who disagree with libertarians believe that decreasing the input of, for example the Senate and the House, and the Executive in the American form of government (because these bodies quintessentially are involved with defining property), throws all the weight of the government behind an even more unrepresentative group: The police, military, and unelected judiciary. Libertarians (inadvertantly) therefore could be argued to support INCREASES in government monopolization of power.

At any rate, it turns out that privatizing the roads, increases the cost of using the roads far more than either the minority or the majority, on average, predicted. Instead of 60% in favor of privatizing the roads, a year after implementation, now 80% are opposed. Even 70% of the "road owners" are now in favor of a government buy-back plus interest, because the cost of litigation over easements, and the chronic litigation of citizens groups has become prohibitive.

A. Should the majority (one year later) now be able to buy back (all) the roads that were previously sold?

The lone "hold-outs" amongst the road-owners, who still like privatization, seem to be the property owners who have better encircled parts of the city and seem to profit because they own what others consider "easements", though the property owners deny they own "easements" and claim they have provided "fair access-- just at a profit."

B. If the government buys back the roads, is it coercing (decreasing the freedom of) the 20% of the overall population that still wants the roads private?

The 20%, however, argue that the population has not given the situation enough time and the very existence of such profit (for some) creates markets for new alternatives and new problem solving. They point to the newly emerging portable helicopter-market, and the long-range battery powered "jump-vehicles" being pioneered to escape the gridlock of the encircling roads.

They believe even in situations where private property owners control easements, this still encourages the development of brand new markets to bypass the problems of "barriers" on easements, even if such barriers seem permanent.

Elliot, what is the correct answer to questions A and B, given your analysis of the situation described?

by M Golding on Mon, 11/14/2005 - 18:32 | reply

The society you describe has

The society you describe has less knowledge than our present one. Thus has nothing to do with progressing beyond government.

Why did the people want to sell the roads before there was an understanding of how to make such a sale not be a disaster?

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 11/14/2005 - 20:38 | reply

Yes, Less Knowledge

Yes, they may very well have less knowledge. And they certainly made a mistake. They completely miscalculated.

But in a situation like the above, in which it is reasonably known that the decision of this majority was disastrous, and a new majority wants to undo the problems, does the majority coerce the minority if the government wants to buy back the roads?

Michael

by M Golding on Mon, 11/14/2005 - 21:32 | reply

My question to you: Massiv

My question to you:

Massive things go wrong. How should we fix it?

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 11/15/2005 - 03:20 | reply

The Above Question

I would have no trouble with the above question,

Yes, the majority should vote to undo the damage and try to learn from the mistake.

Do you think the majority should do that and do you think their action decreases the freedom of the minority (there really is a specific reason why I keep asking these questions, Elliot!)

Sorry to be a pain.

Michael

by M Golding on Tue, 11/15/2005 - 11:08 | reply

There is no criterion for whe

There is no criterion for when it's OK for the government to take property from peaceful citizens. (It needs to be argued case by case.)

What to do depends on a million details of the society (including the arguments put forward on both sides). The solution requires creativity. By people who live there and know what needs to be done.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 11/15/2005 - 20:18 | reply

Unfortunately, Life Involves Coercion

"There is no criterion for when it is OK for the government to take property from peaceful citizens"

Elliot

A margin of property is nothing other than a restricted right to use something in a particular way. There may be infinite uses for that margin of property, but its use is nonetheless always somewhat restricted.

Therefore,

1. In saying that it is OK for the government to sell off public roads, you are saying that it is OK for the government to usurp a peaceful private citizens limited right to use public roads; a property right that a peaceful private citizen shares with others who use the road. This taking of the rights to use roads is coercive. If you don't think that rights to public roads is a type of property right shared by citizens (right now), imagine trying to get to work today, without being able to gain access to a road. If the government prevented you from accessing the roads, you'd angrily say your (property) rights to use the roads were restricted!

2. If you say that the majority should not be able to take back public ownership of roads after a disaster occurs in which private ownership of roads leads to multiple impediments built on easements, then you are implicitly saying that it is OK for private citizens to involuntarily take property from others. (Building on an easement, almost by definition, takes property from someone else by restricting them from using their property the way they want.) So preventing majority rule from taking back private ownership of roads is also coercive.

3. If you say that after the roads are sold off by the government and private citizens build multiple impediments on easements, the majority should be able to coercively buy back the roads from the private citizens in the minority, then you are sanctioning a different form of coercion.

Moving towards libertarianism (even using majority rule to do so) is coercive, because it takes from the minority their current property right to shared property, without their consent. It forces the minority to adopt a system that they may correctly believe deprives everyone of property, because of the cost of obtaining and maintaining libertarian (unanimous rule) politico/economic systems.

But failing to move toward libertarianism coerces those in the minority, who do not want to contribute to the shared costs of a good like a road. And maintaining a libertarian status quo, may allow private citizens to (inefficiently) take property from others by, for example, building private roads on easements (as described above), when the cost of legal squabbling amongst private owners for key parts of the roads (the easements) is greater than the benefits.

"There is no criterion for when it is OK for the government to take property from peaceful citizens."
Elliot

This statement is illogical Elliot, because in many situations the status quo is coercive, and changing the status quo, even in favor of a libertarian idea, is also coercive and leads to coercion. No matter what is done, property is "taken".

In general, moving towards libertarianism is coercive because most people will not vote for it. They will not vote for it for many reasons; but a main reason is the prohibitive transaction costs of arriving at and maintaining unanimous-rule systems (libertarian systems).

A coerced unanimous rule system could be defined as a libertarian society that a person must live in (or perhaps a system in which all societies are based on unanimous rule systems, so a given person, or even a majority of people, have no choice but to live in such a society.) A coerced unanimous rule libertarian society would be a society in which all decisions are made by unanimous rule, except the decision to make all decisions by unanimous rule.

In forced (coerced) libertarian unanimous-rule systems, the inefficiency of needing unanimous rule for decision making takes property from everyone (and is therefore coercive), especially if the overwhelming majority can think of a (coercive, majority rule) way to not lose as much property to unanimous-rule inefficiency. We would then have a perfectly unanimous-rule libertarian society, but not wanted by virtually anyone, because it inefficiently takes property from everyone, because of the cost of obtaining unanimous rule on all decisions.

So if even unanimous rule societies are quite coercive to virtually everyone (probably more so than majority rule systems), then can government or citizens do anything to improve things?

The point is that in the real world, people will win and lose, property will be taken and given, and a simplistic model of mutual exchange for mutual benefit (unanimous-rule-libertarianism) is so expensive to try to implement, that virtually no one will ever vote for it! So people vote for coercion. They vote for majority rule systems, not unanimous rule systems. Unanimous rule systems (libertarianisms) are so expensive to implement because of the transaction cost of obtaining honest unanimous consent.

So trying to force people to vote against their desire for a form of majority-rule-coercion and towards the more expensive unanimous-rule-libertarianism, is itself coercive. But forcing unanimous rule libertarianism on people is, however, in some ways even more coercive than majority-rule decision making, because forcing libertarian unanimous-rule decisions on virtually everyone (who is not a libertarian), coerces virtually everyone to behave as they don't want, not just the minority.

Note. I am not a pessimist. But I do recognize that even though we attempt to limit coercion, we cannot completely eliminate it, if we are to move forward. So we should consider moving forward, even if it involves (a little) coercion if we use our "best theories" to guide progress towards less coercion.

So I do favor limited experiments in privatizing road systems, for example, to see which ideas work best. But I have no illusions that this course of action is anything other than coercive to the minority, who may not agree with the majority's plans. And helping to pay for New Orleans is coercive to the minority. But, I think that the government failing to act in a national disaster with such huge public good implications as New Orleans, is even more coercive.

Michael (Happily the realist, but with idealistic hopes).

by M Golding on Mon, 12/12/2005 - 19:48 | reply

Therefore, 1. In saying th

Therefore,

1. In saying that it is OK for the government to sell off public roads, you are saying that it is OK for the government to usurp a peaceful private citizens limited right to use public roads;

One of the ways the right to the road is limited is that citizens are aware the road may not be available in the future. For example, it could be replaced with a post office. Or sold. There is nothing unpeaceful about either of those.

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 12/21/2005 - 17:29 | reply

Too strong a claim!

Hi... just stumbled across this post. I don't think you can make this claim without some phenomenally strong evidence. A less "so not obvious that it's wrong" argument might be that public good scenarios necessitate governance more rarely than presumed.

One strong example: an epidemic is going to kill 1% of the population, give or take. A huge investment in R+D, say 2% of society's effort/GDP in the next year, will be required to develop an effective vaccine in time. Members of society can expect to be much better off paying for the vaccine (on average; count also the harm from losing friends and relatives). Also, the antibodies in the vaccine can be easily copied by many biologists, once it is in use (ie it is non-excludable).

In practice, the odds of getting that much from voluntary contributions, even with very organised campaigns, are extremely low. Rational self interest models, including those with fancy contracts (such as pledges to pay for the vaccine, if it's developed), don't get above a small fraction of the optimal amount. Of course rational self interest models are pessimistic, but the task is gargantuan.

To depend on getting the vaccine, you'll either need patents (which are a drastic governmental intervention, and don't even dream about markets pricing vaccines well) or public research or some in-between hybrid.

Governments often fail in these situations too but libertarian organisational scenarios are starting from a long way behind.

by Peter Eckersley on Thu, 01/05/2006 - 06:20 | reply

Re: Too strong a claim!

The reason we would use government intervention for the vaccine case is not that it's a public good, it's just that our government is the only organisation we have that's big enough to organise and execute such a large project. If the vaccine was impossible to duplicate and thus easily excludable, we'd still want the government to make it, and private companies would still have a HUGE task raising 2% of GDP in capital.

To claim public good problems are silly, we do not need evidence. No number of examples or observations will ever prove we're right about all cases. What we need is to argue that governments have no special knowledge that makes them better at solving problems. By special I mean knowledge that only governments are capable of having. Either that or we need to argue that using force doesn't solve problems. Which is true because you have to have knowledge of which solution to force on everyone, so the critical thing, whether using force or not, is knowledge.

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Thu, 01/05/2006 - 13:27 | reply

Government Forcing Libertarianism--Coercive When Citizens Object

One of the ways the right to the road is limited is that citizens are aware the road might not be available in the future, for example it could be replaced by a post-office...

Elliot

Saying that a person has shared rights to roads in a majority rule system is not saying he has complete rights. Voting for government provision of roads is not telling the government exactly where the location of all roads should be.

Yes, a given road could be replaced by a post-office. But if the government were to eliminate ALL roads when a majority of citizens had voted for at least some roads, citizens certainly would feel coerced by the government! So if the government is a democratic one, it can't completely fail to provide roads, if the majority votes for the provision of roads for most people.

So if the government privatizes roads, despite some private citizens voting against this, these private citizens in the minority are being coerced -- especially if they lose nearly all, or all of their access to roads (say because of private owners of roads who build barriers on easements). Even if barriers on easements could be ultimately eliminated by lawsuits, the cost of trying to force unanimous rule conditions (via judicial rulings) in the private market for roads, could be quite expensive and therefore coercive to those who have to pay for going to court (such citizens involuntarily lose money by the decision to privatize, because they have to pay their lawyers). Before the government privatized roads, they did not have to pay lawyers. Now they do, so they feel coerced into losing their money.

Indeed, those voting against privatizing roads may precisely believe that privatization is a bad idea because of the cost of going to court to fight the inevitable self-interest of entrepreneurs who have incentives to build on easements. The cost of fighting against barriers on easements, could be argued to be greater than the cost savings from competition by companies providing road service.

If people do not favor a libertarian free market solution to the provision of roads or other public goods, and the government forces one on them, people will legitimately feel coerced.

People do not vote for unanimous rule libertarian systems in the provision of certain goods, because the cost of obtaining unanimous rule in many situations is too great. So they vote for democracy. Citizens vote to allow the decisions of the majority to control the provision of certain goods (like roads). They, in effect, decide to allow themselves to be coerced (democratically) when they are in the minority, so they do not have to experience even greater coercion. What is the greater coercion? Citizens feel coerced when they lose too much of their money to the costs of arriving at a unanimous rule (market or Libertarian) solution.

Elliot, when a minority objects to honoring a majority ruling that favors exclusively libertarian unanimous rulings, it is coercive to go against the minority. And therefore, the majority contradicts its own anti-coercive principles by honoring its own decision! So it is coercive to impose Libertarianism on any group of people who do not want it. It is coercive to not honor the will of the minority -- which is that the roads should not be privatized.

So yes Elliot, you have favored coercion in what you said, and you should admit that. You simply can't avoid it in the real world!

Michael

by Michael Golding on Sun, 01/15/2006 - 06:55 | reply

"especially if they lose near

"especially if they lose nearly all, or all of their access to roads"

Why would people vote to sell off many govt roads before someone works out a proposal so that it won't be a complete and utter disaster?

If people do vote for a disastrous policy, you may as well make it the policy of burning down everyone's house, or making taxes 150% of income.

-- Elliot Temple

Now Blogging Again

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 01/16/2006 - 02:34 | reply

Bad Decisions

Communities make bad decisions democratically all the time.

1. The question remains, is it coercive for a majority to impose a libertarian (unanimous rule) solution on a minority group who do not want it? The minority favors, for example, democratically electing a group of people and having them oversee the construction of a few goods, like roads in a neighborhood.

One might want to answer making two separate sets of assumptions....

a. The minority predicts correctly that the unanimous rule (market) solution is in net, more expensive to implement because the cost of arriving at unanimous rule conditions is so high. For example, court costs end up being very high. So before implementing the project, the minority tries and fails to convince the majority. If the majority imposes a libertarian unanimous rule solution on the minority, so the roads are privatized, was the minority coerced? Note that most, in net, lose money.

b. The minority is wrong that the unanimous rule (market) solution costs too much to implement. For example, the few examples of individual entrepreneurs constructing barriers on easements are easily and quickly taken care of by courts, and the new private road system in net decreases the costs of roads and generates better roads.

I am curious about your opinion.

FYI I would answer like this.

In both cases, the minority is coerced. But sometimes in a democracy, those voting for something are actually trying to get other people to pay for something they want. If it happens to be the case that the market solution in net costs less, then it may very well be the case that the minority is advocating taking money from others to build roads and trying to use their vote to accomplish this (so the minority does not have to spend the money itself on the roads). Then the minority is trying to coerce the majority to pay for what it wants. So in this case, net coercion is decreased if the libertarian solution is implemented. One should impose the libertarian solution on a minority of individuals who don't want it, because the reason they don't want the libertarian solution is that it prevents them from coercing (and stealing from) others.

On the other hand, if the minority is right, and if the court costs and restrictions on trade become onerous in a libertarian system, with roads becoming private, so that virtually everyone (involuntarily) loses money, I would say that the minority was certainly coerced by the imposition of a libertarian solution. The majority did not guess properly, so arguably it coerced itself.

2. Elliot, if the majority favors implementation of a libertarian, market oriented solution that increases efficiency, do you think the majority has the moral right to force implementation of its policies?

3. Elliot, if the majority favors implementation of a libertarian, market oriented solution that decreases efficiency (and so involuntarily causes the minority to lose property), do you think the majority has the moral right to force implementation of its policies?

by Michael Golding on Mon, 01/16/2006 - 15:34 | reply

Re: Bad Decisions

You have proposed that what is coercive depends on which answer was, in fact, best. In other words, mistakes are coercive. We can never be sure which is best (not even after the fact, and certainly not before, and certainly not in cases where there is a serious debate on), so it follows that mistakes will be made, and people will be coerced. As long as you equate mistakes with coercion, its unavoidable.

(This is glossing over the issue that sometimes the right choice -- the best one we could make at the time -- is not ideal, but can't be rightly called a mistake, but would still qualify as coercion by your use.)

If you want to know if selling public roads is forceful: no more than taxes, or building public roads. None of those things are inevitable.

In asking about what the majority has a moral right to do, I believe you are asking about who should rule and whether they are justified in forcing people to go along with it and hurting people. The answers are that rule is bad and we have traditions and laws about what our rulers can do. Rule being bad doesn't mean it should be disposed of tomorrow, but it does mean we have valid criticisms of it and know the future will be different. Given rule is bad, asking about ideal rights of rulers seems nonsensical.

FYI I am unaware of a connection between libertarianism and unanimous rule. Libertarians generally want to be left alone, not engage in complex joint decision making processes.

-- Elliot Temple
Now Blogging Again

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 01/16/2006 - 19:40 | reply

I See Now

FYI I am unaware of a connection between libertarianism and unanimous rule.....
Elliot

No wonder my questions have not made sense to you. Classically, pure market/libertarian economics is a unanimous rule system(!), where mutual trading is permitted for mutual benefit as long as everyone knows who owns what. All winners are charged and all losers are compensated. For example, if all losers are not compensated from a market interaction, there is a breakdown of unanimous rule and this is called an "externality".

No wonder you don't see the irony in asking whether a majority can impose a libertarian (unanimous rule) solution on a minority!

Virtually the entire 140 post discussion has been a discussion of the relative merits of unanimous rule ("free-market"/libertarian economics) vs. democracy rule, but phrased using the language of "public goods" and externalities -- which can now be thought of as coercive violations of unanimous rule.

The question has been, is it ever rational for someone to agree to voluntarily be coerced (e.g. live in a democracy)? My answer has been "yes". When it is too expensive to produce a good using unanimous rule (libertarian/market principles), sometimes people will prefer a democratic solution, even though the minority is nonetheless coerced in the decision. So sometimes people will prefer a democratic solution when the market (unanimous rule) is too expensive to implement.

The example good which I utilized for illustration was a "road". Many have argued (correctly or incorrectly) that the costs of generating approximate unanimous rule in the production of this good is so high that democratic bodies should control its production, instead. So people vote for the government to own the road, not individuals.

On the other hand, most people allow an approximately unanimous rule solution to prevail in the production and sale of lettuce, for example, because it is believed that unanimous rule is not too expensive in this market (when everyone know who owns what).

So now do you see why the question, "Is it moral for a majority to impose a libertarian unanimous rule solution" is relevant? If people believe libertarianism (unanimous rule) takes too much of their time and therefore income, do you see that forcing unanimous rule (libertarianism) is wrong, if people correctly believe that rule by democracy in certain situations is more efficient?

So there is a deep underlying reason why democratic rule, in certain situations, can be preferable to unanimous rule.

That is the point. Democracy can work at least partially, even when the production of a good is too expensive utilizing a unanimous rule (libertarian) framework. So unanimous rule libertarianism can be coercive because people lose money arriving at approximate unanimity, and democracy can be coercive because the minority lose. So most of the time people prefer the market (approximate unanimous rule), but sometimes they prefer democratic decision-making.

Saying that "rule is bad" says nothing. If "rule", even "unanimous rule" is "bad", then what alternative do we have?

By the way, you are correct that people can make decisions that are quite correct, but lead to bad outcomes. But why is that relevant to the point about..."should the majority be able to impose a unanimous rule (market) decision making process on a minority who do not wish to participate (because the minority rationally knows that unanimous rule production of roads, for example, is inefficient?)

by Michael Golding on Tue, 01/17/2006 - 01:36 | reply

libertarianism

libertarians only want all actors in a transaction to agree to it, not everyone. thus a road owner can sell it, and the only people who get to say anything are the seller and buyer. if a road owner wants to destroy his road, he can do that all by himself, and everyone else can go to hell. Note: libertarians are generally pretty rigid about what can be property. For example not people or the right to send radio waves across a property.

Using courts for all disagreements would be stupid. That system has far less knowledge than our current one. Making changes is perfectly reasonable, but throwing out almost everything at once isn't.

-- Elliot Temple
Now Blogging Again

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 01/17/2006 - 02:35 | reply

All Actors in a Transaction

All actors whose property is being impacted by a transaction...yes..... If anyones property rights to something is (particularly negatively) impacted, then he or she must be compensated, for the transaction to be OK. So if we assume that we know who owns what, then this is the equivalent of a unanimous rule market-based decision. And the point is that there are some transactions, for example the transactions associated with integrating virtually everyone's property with roads, that are so expensive that people will not want to pay the perceived costs of a free market solution. People may believe that too many barriers will be placed on easements necessitating court involvement. So they vote against libertarian unanimous rule solutions and for democratic solutions (the government builds many roads).

And the question remains, is it wrong to impose an inefficient unanimous rule libertarian solution on those who favor using the democratic process to build roads? The point is that democratic rule may have a logical place in the production of certain type of goods given our current state of knowledge.

It is all well and good to say "rule is bad", but this is meaningless absent alternative means of solving the problems that will come up at a city council meeting tomorrow morning. How should a city councilman reading this pay for the construction of roads, if (hypothetically) he knows that privatizing road construction will cost more than government production of roads? Should he vote to privatize, nonetheless? These are practical questions that are addressed everyday by people in government. Needless to say, saying "rule is bad", does not help.

And yes Elliot, if somebody steals somebodies property, we do use courts. These can not be eliminated right now even if "rule is bad". If we can anticipate that tremendous litigation will arise because of the incentives that people have, for example to build barriers on easements, then yes we can anticipate that courts will be consulted. And the cost of enforcing unanimous rule libertarianism will be expensive. (high transaction costs)

If you haven't noticed, we do not have a system (yet) in which we can eliminate courts. When you say that "rule is bad", do you want to eliminate courts or courts and governments? If rule is bad, even unanimous rule in a libertarian sense, what alternative is there?

Perhaps you mean that all "rule" is bad, but we have no alternative and some types of "rule" are "less bad" than others?

In which case, is it less bad to produce a good through the private market than through a democratically elected government, even if people prefer the government to produce it because they rationally believe its cheaper?

And where did I say we should "throw everything out" at once?

by Michael Golding on Tue, 01/17/2006 - 04:00 | reply

libertarianism

If the cost of enforcing our rules goes up, I see two primary possibilities:

1) the rules are more intrusive. for example one child in ten becomes the king's slave. that's hard to enforce because it gives people such strong incentives to cheat.

2) the society in question has less knowledge about how to live peacefully, so more disputes come up

The problem with libertarianism certainly isn't the first of those. You seem to be imagining that people will more often try to cheat each other and go to court if more things are privately owned.

This is strange prima facie because it would be illegal to do that in both cases.

But more importantly the primary force stopping people cheating each other right now is that people don't want to. Why, in a libertarian society, would people want more to adopt a life of crime? This is what I mean about you were throwing things out in your hypothetical libertarian society. Today we have certain knowledge of how to interact peacefully, but your examples of problems for libertarianism are about a society without that knowledge we have now.

-- Elliot Temple

Now Blogging Again

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 01/18/2006 - 11:07 | reply

Not All Goods.

The point is that in the production, not of most goods, but of certain goods, the transaction cost associated with a free market (unanimous rule) solution may be very high. If so, court costs often go up to settle these problems. The production of a country's military is one such good, the production of roads is arguably another.

Obviously common decency is the prime force decreasing transaction cost in society. Although a good point that courts are by no means the most important deterrent to stealing, we are talking about relative increases and decreases in transaction costs with different forms of organization.

Why will virtually noone vote for a libertarian (unanimous rule/market) solution in the production of all goods? Answer: Possibly ignorance or vested interests. But also, because in the production of certain goods (e.g. roads and the military), people would rather lose some property to the coercion of a democracy, rather than lose even more property to the greater coercion of unanimous rule/market production of goods. The transaction costs are simply too high to privately produce a national military and arguably a road system.

In both cases, some people easily benefit at other peoples expense (a transaction cost), violating unanimous rule market assumptions. So the transaction costs of settling these problems by negotiation or through the courts is deemed too high by citizens. So citizens choose a somewhat coercive democratic solution over an even more coercive libertarian solution.

That's one of the reasons free people still utilize democracies!

by Michael Golding on Wed, 01/18/2006 - 14:40 | reply

military

FYI if military is an issue, we're talking about a no-government anarcho-capitalist society. About half of libertarians believe in a minimalist government that does military and a few other things.

Here's my theory: if something is good, there's a possible way to get it without forcing anyone that works better than using force.

Here's my theory of how to change our society:

A) figure out good ways to get things without government

B) suggest them, argue for them, people see it works better, vote for it (or for leaders who advocate it), and government power gets reduced a bit and replaced with something better

-- Elliot Temple

Now Blogging Again

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 01/18/2006 - 20:57 | reply

Stop Being Forceful!

Here's my theory of how to change our society:

B) suggest them (good ways to get things without government), argue for them, vote for it (or for leaders who advocate it).....

Elliot

So let's say you think the government is taking your money and property involuntarily and you suggest and have a vote on your idea that you believe will lead to less coercion (force in taking property). But what if a substantial minority (as it turns out) correctly believes that the government's forceful collection of money to fund something is actually good, because it believes the free market solution (for example production of roads or the military) is inefficient and so takes even more of everyone's property than governmental production.

Although you are not aware of it, the minority, in this case, actually has more knowledge than you. (Believe it or not, you could be wrong!) The majority would change its mind if it truly understood the minority position, but the majority is simply mistaken when the vote is taken.

If you honor the majority opinion, you are certainly utilizing force against the minority, because your solution takes their property. (Remember, you and the majority hypothetically have less knowledge than the minority which understands that the government is in net more efficient in producing a hypothetical good)

You are fallible, Elliot, and you simply may not understand the reasoning of the minority. So sometimes you will be wrong about an improvement you suggest and the majority may agree with you. If we follow your suggestion, you Elliot, will then use force on the minority by taking their property.

If we don't follow your suggestion to take away government production of a good, then we are left with the coercive elements of the government producing a good (majority coercing minority.) Either way Elliot, you are advocating the use of force. The private market can be forceful if inefficient, and the government can be forceful if inefficient. Inefficiency takes people's property either way.

Wouldn't your argument be more logical if you were looking for the solution that did not take away as much of people's money, whether or not the government or the private market produces a hypothetical good. As has been pointed out repeatedly, government production of the military (and arguably roads) increases, not decreases our freedom, by protecting our property. Unless your hatred is really of the government, why must the government not be involved given our state of knowledge, if the government increases our freedom?

So by advocating eliminating government in the production of a good, you may be effectively advocating the increased use of force against people's property. The issue is not whether we must find solutions that eliminate government, but rather whether it is more efficient (or at least whether people would prefer) to have the government or the private market produce a good. If less of people's property is involuntarily taken when the government produces the good, why must you be such a tyrant, and impose the free market on everyone, though people prefer democratic production? Wouldn't your argument make more sense if you said the following

"Here's my theory of how to change society:

A. Figure out good ways to get things without government (and I would add 'or with government')

B. Suggest them, argue for them, people see it (sic) works better, vote for it, or for leaders who advocate it, and government power gets reduced (and I would add 'or government production strengthens economic well-being and therefore frees citizens from loss of property), and (the old system) is replace with something better.

Isn't my formulation more complete, unless you simply have an ideological hatred of government, independent of whether it helps or hinders the freedom of its citizens?

by a reader on Thu, 01/19/2006 - 02:01 | reply

Not Vietnam

In 1968, the Viet Cong and the North Vietnamese army attacked various cities in South Vietnam during the religious holiday of Tet. The Americans did not just repel the offensive, they completely destroyed the Viet Cong. However, for various reasons the Press reported the Tet Offensive as a defeat for America. This was a significant factor in destroying public support for America's defence of South Vietnam.

In Iraq, the Americans are doing a very good job of defeating terrorists and training the Iraqis to do likewise. The Press are once again distorting the news to give the impression that the terrorists are winning in Iraq. They prominently report suicide bombers killing Iraqis. But most reporters have not reported counterterrorist operations, preferring to peddle sensationalised, anti-war doomsaying instead. A recent poll has indicated that more than half of Americans think the Bush administration is losing the battle against the terrorists in Iraq. If America snatches defeat from the jaws of victory in Iraq, the Press will bear some of the blame. Responsible reporters and bloggers must do all they can to counter this tide of pessimism or the Iraqis might pay a terrible price.

Mon, 10/03/2005 - 22:08 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Gen. William E. Odom referred to Iraq

as a "strategic disaster". Is he also "distorting the news"? Or is the press "distorting the news" by reporting on the views of a general?

by a reader on Tue, 10/04/2005 - 02:11 | reply

Ex-General Odom's Opinion, and the Press's

Do you believe that there is any position on any issue that is not held by some officer, or retired officer, somewhere?

Hardly. And yet not all such opinions are given equal prominence, or endorsement, by the press.

We'll see your retired Lt. General who believes America is being defeated in Iraq and raise you a serving Ambassador who believed in November 1940 that the Nazis had already won the Second World War, and that democracy was finished in England and maybe in America too. And a retired king who agreed with him. And for that matter an ex-Defence Minister who believes the Earth has been visited by extraterrestrials and that governments, including his own, have been concealing this.

By singling out Odom as if this proved something, you make our point.

by Editor on Tue, 10/04/2005 - 03:14 | reply

It is a market force and nothing else. I hope you are not promoting an idea of global mass-media conspiracy against american forces in Iraq? We can see similar phenomena just about everywhere. Press is always eager to report bad news and doesn't care about general overview of the readers. No, actually, I am wrong about this. The press does care about our overview in the way "the worse the better". The more things people fear the better. Bad news better sell and only free market economy is responsible for that because you cannot simply force journalists to write what you want. I am not in favor of introducing censorship or nationalising mass-media. I just think that some sort of mechanism has to be invented in order to promote people awareness about positive progress around the world. What we have now is that people en mass are not used to good news, they are not into scientific discoveries, solving political problems etc.. All they want to hear is that there is a problem, but they never follow up developments until the issue is resolved (neither do journalists). People would follow up an investigation of a murder, rape or terrorist attack - this is where it all ends. We prefer to hear statistics on how many women die from breast cancer but any survivor or a successful treatment don't make good news. That's why people are scared of anything hapenning to them and when it suddenly happens just don't to deal with it. They rather turn into hipohondriac, pacifists and so on. This is a very serious social issue.

by Yuryr on Tue, 10/04/2005 - 09:26 | reply

The Soviets could have won in Afghanistan. I guess their press was "distorting the news" and that is why they lost.

by a reader on Tue, 10/04/2005 - 13:07 | reply

Re: it is a market force

Yuryr: Rest assured that we are not promoting an idea of global mass-media conspiracy against American forces in Iraq. We have spoken out against that conspiracy theory as well as conspiracy theories in general.

However, the 'mainstream media' are campaigning energetically against the war. We agree with you that this is a spontaneous, not a coordinated, phenomenon. It does not require a conspiracy for an error to be serious, widespread and persistent, especially in certain subcultures, of which the 'mainstream media' unfortunately constitute an example.

by Editor on Tue, 10/04/2005 - 14:10 | reply

Re: The Soviets could have won

No, it is very unusual for bias in the losing party's media to contribute significantly to the loss of a war. Clearly the Vietnam War is unusual in this regard.

by Editor on Tue, 10/04/2005 - 14:17 | reply

Fit to Print, Fit to be Tied

We the people want our wars won now. Give us what we want, right now, or else give us what we want later, don't want to hear. Good to Bad to Worse.(Law of Inverse Positive Journalism)

Responsible reporting?

People, this is the "news" business. Are our "news" memories that short?

Yesteryear's Front Page Headlines Spoofed:

War Won in Record Time (Washington Post) Iraq Free At Last (New York Times) Unprecedented Arab Unity - Jubilation in the Streets (Baltimore Sun) Saddam Toppled, Hung in Effigy (New York Daily News) Soldiers Throw Candy and Go Home (L.A. Times)

That was before reality set in. The printer's ink dried, the headlines cried, and the presses slowly ossified as "the war news" dragged on.

by a reader on Wed, 10/05/2005 - 05:01 | reply

Iraq And Vietnam

Editor said " . . it is very unusual for bias in the losing party's media to contribute significantly to the loss of a war. Clearly the Vietnam War is unusual in this regard."

I disagree. In many important ways, Vietnam and Iraq are far from analogous -- particularly from the crucial military standpoint (e.g. there was very real and continuing support for Vietnam from China and the Soviet Union constituting a deep rear area; and popular support (while not as strong as those opposing the Vietnam war supposed, still formidable, coming as it did at the tail end of decades of opposition to the French colonialists)). Iraq isn't another Vietnam, and that's why, in my view, there is a far superior chance of being successful in Iraq. If the US puts the same level of effort and resources (and sacrifices) into Iraq as it did into Vietnam for over a decade, we stand a good chance of leaving with a stable, relatively democratic government in perhaps the most strategically important region in the world. Did the media play a role in Vietnam, undoubtedly, but it was for the reasons stated above (and for other similar fundamental military, political and historical reasons) that Vietnam ended as it did. Would the outcome have been different if the US had continued (for how long?) to prosecute the war with greater vigor -- who knows -- I certainly don't. While the question can be debated without end, the use of the Vietnam analogy is, in my view, neither correct, nor helpful in the case of Iraq.

by Michael Bacon on Wed, 10/05/2005 - 16:13 | reply

Spooferd?

Spooferd means you made them up, right?

by Editor on Thu, 10/06/2005 - 00:20 | reply

Correct

Spooferd as a fairly accurate approximation of the headlines of the times. Now they would read differently.

by a reader on Thu, 10/06/2005 - 04:31 | reply

Re: Correct

Here is the archive of the New York Times. It is searchable by date. Presumably the period that you consider to be 'before reality set in' is the period immediately after the fall of the Saddam regime? (Coalition forces invaded Iraq on 20 March 2003. Baghdad was captured on 9 April, which was also the day that Saddam's statue was pulled down live on television. President Bush declared major military operations to be complete on 1 May.)

To illustrate your point, could you please link us to a few New York Times headlines at about that time that have the same triumphalist tone as the ones you have made up?

by Editor on Thu, 10/06/2005 - 11:29 | reply

Certainly

Give me a moment. Remember the New York Times is not representative of the "mainstream media" but just one of many news sources. Remember also that people who write the stories do not write the headlines for the stories. Remember also that separate from that there are editorial boards. Please note that the press is in the business of selling newspapers. Good news gets one day of coverage. Bad or worse news can be covered again and again. People read bad news stories and dwell on them, the press gives us what we "want". The press headlines tend to start with Good/or Bad, but the stories, especially the stories about war tend to go from triumphant to mediocre to not good at all, time inverse to positive journalism. Give 'em what they want. A line from a 10,000 Maniacs song.

Vietnam and Iraq are totally different wars. Human nature is not different and neither is the news process as to what sells papers. Both Vietnam and Iraq as war stories, separate from any on the ground reality, are subject to the phenomenon of time inverse positive journalism.

Responsible reporting is done by individual reporters. What gets published, what makes the front page generally has little to do with responsible in depth reporting, but rather with what is "news", the new, and the corresponding knee jerk human response to it.

by a reader on Thu, 10/06/2005 - 17:58 | reply

April 10, 2003 NYT

The first 5 of 120 Results

A NATION AT WAR: ARAB-AMERICANS; Iraqis in the U.S. Celebrate Hussein's Seeming Downfall ... make a new Iraq." In a ... enthusiastic about the war to topple Mr. Hussein. ... for them the war is personal. All seemed ...

April 10, 2003 - By DANNY HAKIM (NYT) - A NATION AT WAR: THE PLAN; Speed and Flexibility

... southern cities of Iraq that had never been anticipated ... , that the war is not over yet. ... officials are concerned Iraq may try to destroy...

April 10, 2003 - By MICHAEL R. GORDON (NYT) - International - An Analysis - A NATION AT WAR: COMBAT; U.S. FORCES TAKE CONTROL IN BAGHDAD; BUSH ELATED; SOME RESISTANCE REMAINS

April 10, 2003 - By PATRICK E. TYLER (NYT) - International - A NATION AT WAR: TUMULT; Cheers, Tears and Looting in Capital's Streets

... advocates of a war to topple Mr. Hussein had ... the headquarters of Iraq's National Olympic Committee, ... feared places in Iraq. "Touch me ...

April 10, 2003 - By JOHN F. BURNS (NYT) - International - A NATION AT WAR: NEWS ANALYSIS; A High Point in 2 Decades of U.S. Might

... . The Iraqi war itself, American alliances with Triumph in Iraq, if the whole nation ... the first gulf war, was incomplete; the

...

It is appropriate to stop there and not clutter space.

by a reader on Thu, 10/06/2005 - 18:36 | reply

Nothing Less Than Complete Victory

President Bush addressed the National Endowment for Democracy yesterday. The White House called it a 'historic' speech, which is an exaggeration. But it was an important speech, taking the argument forwards (for instance by referring for the first time explicitly to the enemy's ideology), defining the nature of the war and current US policy. As often happens, it was under-reported and the summaries in the media were not very good. It's worth reading the speech itself.

Fri, 10/07/2005 - 20:30 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Even if it means nothing less than genocide.

by a reader on Sat, 10/08/2005 - 20:27 | reply

Genocide?

By whom?

by M Golding on Mon, 10/10/2005 - 16:01 | reply

Last Chance To Avoid Nuclear War?

The Sunday Telegraph's editorial today summarises the situation: Iran is in the process of building an arsenal of nuclear weapons. With the assistance of North Korea and Russia, it has just acquired long-range missiles capable of striking Europe (to complement those it already has, which are capable of striking any of its neighbours, and Israel). The Telegraph says that the last chance of avoiding war is for the Security Council to impose 'a more aggressive inspections regime'. But experience with the Security Council before, during and since the liberation of Iraq suggests that it will take no such action. In other words, it will squander the Telegraph's 'last chance' – which, in any case, would be unlikely to work against a totalitarian regime determined, and adept, at concealment.

What sort of war will we get? It is unlikely that the mullahs are planning a first strike, even against Israel (though, since both their ideology and some of their own public statements rationalise and purport to justify a Second Holocaust, it would be criminally irresponsible to discount that possibility). Nor are they likely to be planning any invasions under cover of their nuclear umbrella: all their neighbours are now US allies, and any such invasion would fail humiliatingly. They see these weapons as both a symbol and a deterrent. A symbol of something that isn't true (that their state and its ideology are thriving), and a deterrent against something that could never happen except possibly under the provocation of this very policy.

So they are living in cloud-cuckoo land. The war is most likely to come at the moment when reality finally encroaches on this fantasy world. Perhaps when the Iranian people finally rise up to free themselves. At that point, the mullahs and their Revolutionary Guards and all the incumbents of the present evil regime will have nothing left to lose and are likely to try any desperate kill-or-cure gamble. Or rather, what they will see as a gamble: in fact, like the 'gamble' of Argentina's President Galtieri in invading the Falkland Islands, it will certainly fail, and seal their own fate. But Galtieri's fantasy, like the mullahs', blinded him to that inevitability. How much death and destruction will they wreak before that inevitable outcome?

As to war in general there is also positive news. According to this report the number of armed conflicts in the world has declined by more than 40% since the early 90s.

Henry Sturman

by Henry Sturman on Tue, 10/18/2005 - 13:33 | reply

So What Should We Do?

Seems like a tough problem. Should we go after their nukes?
Should we (secretly) ask Israel to do it?

(I'm serious about the question. Your premises seem reasonable, but when reality encroaches on fantasy, as it invariably will, perhaps a second holocaust is possible. I have not heard any good answers to the Iranian problem)

by a reader on Wed, 10/19/2005 - 21:31 | reply

The Problem

Nuclear capability across a number of countries appears inevitable. I would think its more a question of a race of democratic principles and cultural/political evolution versus fundamentalism/fanaticism. Countries which have evolved citizen participation and a broad base of rights and education would appear less likely to engage in nuclear brinkmanship and foolishness. The history of technology has shown that technology is neutral and sooner or later available to all. The primary alternative to foolishness and fanatical despotism is reason, so is it a race to reason?

by a reader on Thu, 10/20/2005 - 15:05 | reply

Preemptive Strike

Does anyone have a reasonable theory for or against attempting to bomb nuclear weapon sites in Iran?

by a reader on Thu, 10/20/2005 - 15:22 | reply

Re: So What Should We Do?

If Iran doesn't back down it seems quite likely Israel will bomb their nuclear facilities. I don't think Israel is likely to fall for the argument given here that Iran is already a democracy and that their having nuclear bombs is justified as a defense against Israel and other countries. And as after the 1981 Osirak strike, it will probably take an ungrateful Europe at least 10 years to thank Israel for taking away the threat.

Henry Sturman

by Henry Sturman on Fri, 10/21/2005 - 00:10 | reply

MAD

MAD (mutually assured destruction) has so far rendered nuclear weapons entirely unuseable whenever both conflicting parties were nuclear capable.

Suicidal religious extremism trumps the MAD deterrent though, that's the scary thing about countries like Iran having nukes. Strike them first, ask questions later, I say.

by Bob W on Sat, 10/22/2005 - 06:56 | reply

Don't make more ladens

Striking will only encourage more youngsters to become Ladens.

by a reader on Sun, 10/23/2005 - 21:10 | reply

Politics and Principles – 1: Politics Without Principles

Moral principles and theories play an important part in politics. As an example, consider the antitrust case in which the US government recently forced Samsung to cough up $330 million for 'price fixing'.

How did Samsung come to owe Uncle Sam a third of a billion dollars?

Samsung's top competitor, Seoul-based Hynix, agreed earlier this year to plead guilty to price fixing and pay a $185 million fine. Last September, rival Infineon Technologies AG of Germany agreed to a $160 million fine. Another competitor, Micron Technology Inc. of Boise, Idaho, has been cooperating with prosecutors and was not expected to face charges.

The government accused the companies of conspiring in e-mails, telephone calls and face-to-face meetings to fix prices of memory chips between April 1999 and June 2002.

So employees of Samsung and other companies met to discuss similar decisions they all faced about the prices of commodities that they sell. There is a name for this sort of behaviour: it is called "business". Antitrust law prohibits people from making decisions that might (according to someone's gut feeling) lead to them have a large share of the market in a commodity. It also prohibits companies from raising or dropping their prices too much. The government's thugs in suits said that Samsung and the others were raising prices "unfairly" because of their combined large market share.

However, every company in the world can raise prices unfairly by this definition, since every company offers some good or services that other companies do not. No one in the world sells Macintosh computers except Apple, and so they often cost a little more than other computers. Therefore, under this theory, Apple Computer owes the difference to the Government. In the Samsung case some memory chip companies got together to make a deal with one another about prices. The government has a gut feeling that consumers suffered, compared with what would have happened if there had been no such deal. But in the real world the government doesn't know what would have happened. Samsung might have put money into research for a new and better generation of memory chips as a result of their increased funds, to the benefit of all humankind. No computer company was forced to buy these memory chips, they could have made their own – and sold them, for that matter. They chose instead to buy the chips because they preferred doing so to that and to every other option.

Antitrust law is little more than an excuse to shake down rich companies. In reality, no employee of a company can tell whether any given action he might take will lead to his company having “too large a share” of the market. Nor can he tell in advance whether the government will deem him to be guilty of “price fixing” for making a particular business deal. So antitrust law violates the principle of the rule of law.

Antitrust law also prohibits businessmen from speaking and associating to coordinate certain peaceful activities and so it curtails freedom of speech and association. Since the government uses antitrust law to punish businessmen for trading under certain terms it also violates the principle of freedom of trade.

Political principles can help politicians to select or reject policies. Principles can suggest analogies, which make particular policies tenable or untenable. In accordance with the principles we've referred to, we conclude that antitrust law unjustly criminalises people for innocuous business activities.

This might also suggest an analogy between drug laws and antitrust laws, since they violate all of the same principles. Anyone who favours antitrust laws but not drug laws, or vice versa, ought to consider this.

Mon, 10/24/2005 - 11:43 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

What government knows

But in the real world the government doesn't know what would have happened.

That's right. If they did know, why bother with antitrust laws? Why shouldn't the government just buy shares in those companies that benefit from the price fixing, and distribute the profits to those consumers who were harmed?

Because they don't know, is the answer. All they know is how to take.

by a reader on Mon, 10/24/2005 - 12:06 | reply

Anti-trust Law

The writer seems to forget the entire history of antitrust legislation in the United States. Robber baron is not a term lightly used, now company as 'person' as shield from free market dealing to subvert free market principles. Remember law does not not mean conviction, that takes a court case with evidence supporting violation of the law.

As to drug companies, it is true that the FDA has stymied competition, but that is a whole other subject. More than that the FDA has ruined as well as favored companies that have developed pharmaceuticals. That works against a free market.

I say abide by antitrust law and an honest competitive company has nothing to fear. There are names for the sort of illegal behavior which brought Samsung to court. Price fixing is not an example of a free market principle.

by a reader on Mon, 10/24/2005 - 15:28 | reply

be careful offtopic, but ...

All the principles we have mentioned lead us to conclude that

I object to this sentence fragment. It isn't the case that principles lead people to conclusions. Principles don't lead to conclusions innately either. It should say that you interpret the principles as support for your conclusion.

Also, how often do all the principles someone chooses to mention not support his conclusion? This is a fairly silly thing to say.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

Editor's reply: Thanks for the comment. The text has been changed.

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 10/24/2005 - 18:25 | reply

Excellent

Great Post.

Here's an excerpt from a nice little poem:

"Now, let me state the present rules,"
The lawyer then went on,
"These very simple guidelines
You can rely upon"

"You're gouging on your prices if You charge more than the rest.
But it's unfair competition
If you think you can charge less."

"A second point that we would make
To help avoid confusion:

Don't try to charge the same amount:

That would be collusion!"

Gil

by Gil on Mon, 10/24/2005 - 18:39 | reply

Re: Anti-trust Law

The writer seems to forget the entire history of antitrust legislation in the United States.

No, we haven't forgotten it. We're objecting to it.

Robber baron is not a term lightly used

That's true. Since there were already laws against robbery, and since the rich people in question enjoyed no aristocratic privileges in law, the term may well have been carefully chosen to bring the opprobrium due to robbers and aristocrats down upon people who were neither. That socialist economic theory justifies this is not a good argument.

by Editor on Mon, 10/24/2005 - 18:50 | reply

Good Robber Barons

As part of a balanced argument I will note that Andrew Carnegie, the Vanderbilts, the Rockefellers were all painted with the broad brush of "robber baron". No matter how ruthless they were portrayed in the business sense they also are vindicated by history. They gave back to the communities that served them and which helped make them wealthy men. One could argue that we can thank our lucky stars for such robber barons. Not all robber barons would seem to deserve the same posthumous praise, but certainly Carnegie and a few others do.

Can the same be said for Samsung? Does Samsung give back to the world by cornering the market and how might a vertical monopoly or limited chip competition serve this purpose? Only time will tell, but the public good is not likely to be served by the gentlemen's agreement which limits competition, practice of price-fixing, call it what you will. This is not a social argument. It is a practical one. When should the free market be limited by corporate collusion?

Three corporate "persons-as-entity" decide together to fix the price of the key components of their products, disregarding the illegality of the practice. In a market where the competition is already limited by scale of production to a very few competitors, how will this "here's my price, what's yours?" serve the public good? Does Samsung make this argument, fixing prices across key competitors will serve the principles of free market economies and free trade?

Until we have a better answer, I'll take Mr. Andrew Carnegie, noble robber baron, self made man, philanthropist extraordinaire any day over corporate "person-as-entity" Sam Sung and his world-wide chip buddies.

by a reader on Mon, 10/24/2005 - 20:23 | reply

Which robber-barons are "good"?

I gather from the previous comment that the "good" robber barons are those not guilty of the heinous crime of making a profit while Jewish Japanese.

by a reader on Mon, 10/24/2005 - 21:13 | reply

Ethnic Robber Barons?

Is Sam Sung or Hy Nix or Infi Neon or Mike Chron Jewish or Japanese? Or North American, perhaps by place of business? No. Last I checked companies do not have ethnicity, tho they do choose their business markets and who they hire and who would object to that, nor does ethnicity have anything to do with the argument as far as I know. (Personally I prefer Son Ni (sony) and Ap Pul (apple), but that's another story.)

Price-fixing, company as legal 'person' and how price collusion serves the free market, free trade is the subject.

by a reader on Tue, 10/25/2005 - 15:14 | reply

In a free society, people don

In a free society, people don't have to answer to you how their action serves you, or serves society, or whatever, before they can do it.

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 10/25/2005 - 15:26 | reply

True

Before they can do it, is the operative phrase.

Let me give an example however of the effect of after. Let's say there is an island. There are three builders on the island, all capable builders. I want to choose a builder in this free island society to build my house. Its a free society so I can choose.

However, the three builders own all the trees on the island and the rest of the island is sand. The three builders converse among themselves and agree that the price of lumber is a pesky variable. The agree that the price of lumber should be 40 conch shells per square foot.

The conversation has just changed the free market choice for building my house. The three builders are no longer in competition for my business. No matter that on other islands lumber is between 2 and 6 conch shells per foot, if I have no wooden boat to row there.

Price-fixing limits the free market. Here it is only a much larger scale, more conch shells apparently.

by a reader on Tue, 10/25/2005 - 17:07 | reply

Anti trust is pro competition

When powerful companies seek to stifle competition by means not related to improving the value of their product or service, they are being anti-capitalistic and this is bad isn't it? It diminishes other companies' ability to provide better products or services to consumers with the effect being detrimental to society.

In a free society, people do have to answer to you how their action hurts you or hurts society.

by Bob W on Tue, 10/25/2005 - 17:25 | reply

If I must answer to you to li

If I must answer to you to live my life, associating freely with those I wish, then I'm clearly not free.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 10/25/2005 - 19:19 | reply

Of course you are not free to

Of course you are not free to violate my rights, to hurt me in certain ways and to hurt society in certain ways, without the involved party's consent. You think it should be different?

by Bob W on Wed, 10/26/2005 - 02:08 | reply

Offering to sell things at a

Offering to sell things at a price you don't want to buy them at, is not doing something to you, anymore than not selling anything at all is.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 10/26/2005 - 04:35 | reply

Conspiring to control a marke

Conspiring to control a market at the expense of free competition is doing something to me. It's hindering the most important engine of my society: The competition of ideas. You don't think this hurts me?

by Bob W on Wed, 10/26/2005 - 05:16 | reply

What about if I'm a preacher,

What about if I'm a preacher, and preach high prices for patio furniture? And i'm successful, and convince all patio furniture companies to raise their prices. do you see any critical difference between that and me being a business man who persuades other businesses to raise prices?

i won't say this isn't unfortunate for you. i will say i should be free to do it.

one problem with a law against raising prices, is it can't tell which price raisings are good or bad ideas. there is no mechanical rule for this. and we can't just leave it up to someone's judgement either. a law against price raising that Elliot deems bad ... would be a horrible law.

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 10/26/2005 - 05:42 | reply

Persuading companies to raise

Persuading companies to raise their prices isn't necessarily anti-competitive. Conspiring with companies to fix prices for the purpose of driving companies with better products out of business is anti-competitive. The World says there should be no such thing as anti-trust laws. It sure seems this would often hurt competition and the promotion of better ideas rather than help it. We can't think of a perfect way to stop this so we shouldn't do it at all?

by Bob W on Wed, 10/26/2005 - 06:00 | reply

How is "conspiring with" othe

How is "conspiring with" other companies different from persuading those companies to follow a certain strategy? What kind of magical rites do the heads of companies engage in when they gather to "conspire with each other"?

by AIS on Wed, 10/26/2005 - 07:47 | reply

A Comment

When workers get together to form a voluntary organisation in an attempt to raise the price they can charge for their services on the free market, leftists call this organisation a trade union and they praise it.

When employers get together to form a voluntary organisation in an attempt to raise the price they can charge for their services on the free market, leftists call this a cartel and they condemn it.

Banning trade unions and cartels would simply be the same as banning a certain sort of idea, namely that people sometimes can and should act together to secure higher prices for the services they provide. And of course, nobody is safe from antitrust law in principle, including trades unions.

by Alan Forrester on Wed, 10/26/2005 - 15:15 | reply

oversimplification

Alan, your comparison of cartels (and I'm assuming trusts as well, from the context) to unions misses the point. We leftists don't criticize trusts or cartels because they are working together. We criticize them for doing so at the expense of the public good. It is, on one level, a matter of power. A single worker has essentially zero leverage in the marketplace; corporations, in comparison, have practically unlimited resources and influence. Unions are fighting on a very basic level for a decent wage. Corporations are fighting for their survival as well, sure, but though people may be unemployed, if the economy is healthy, the death of a corporation is not a problem --in fact it is a natural part of the why we embrace market economy: efficiency and survival of the fittest.

You will likely be quick to counter that unions are also pro-inefficiency, and you would be correct. You might even go out on a limb (or at least, it's a limb to me, it might not be a limb to you) and say that unions hurt society as a whole. I don't deny that a union might (and probably has in the past) try and secure their welfare at the expense of others. BUT. The difference between unions and cartels is that unions secure basic rights for human beings. Without unions (or any form of power based in organization) among workers, the working class would be screwed beyond your wildest dreams. (...and often is, make no mistake about it.) Without 'unions' among businesses, on the other hand, the marketplace functions smoothly, which tends to be in the best interest of society.

Let me take a shot at oversimplifying things instead: If group (A) has five people out of a hundred that have all the power, and group (B) has a hundred people who share power equally, the latter group with is probably going to have a higher survival rate. It may get less done, but you're not going to end up with 95% of the group in abject poverty.

by leftist on Thu, 10/27/2005 - 00:36 | reply

there is a difference between there is a difference between A) what is good to do (both unions and cartels can be crappy decisions) B) what should be illegal (there is no way to make a law against only crappy decisions, and a law against all agreements of any kind regarding prices of goods would be absurd. having courts decide who made bad decisions is a horrible idea. people need to be able to know if something is legal or not, without knowing if it's the ideal action which they can't be expected to always know)

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Thu, 10/27/2005 - 01:35 | reply

the other thing is we need to the other thing is we need to acknowledge our view of which cartels are good may change in time, and we shouldn't just make laws to enforce the current fad. error correction is critical.

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Thu, 10/27/2005 - 01:37 | reply

It's not conspiring we should

It's not conspiring we should oppose, it's conspiring or any other action that is anti-competitive and significantly hampers the competition of ideas and prevents economic access to the best ideas. These actions are the enemies of a free society. They should be illegal. If the laws punishing such actions are bad they can be changed.

by Bob W on Thu, 10/27/2005 - 14:41 | reply

What should the law be change

What should the law be changed to say, precisely?

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Thu, 10/27/2005 - 19:04 | reply

It Depends

If it is likely that the markets for the goods produced by the companies will, in the reasonable long-term, become competitive, then it doesn't make too much sense to use the law to regulate these markets.

When collusion occurs that raises prices, other companies will see the elevated prices and be even more likely to enter the market to get a piece of the action. In short, collusion creates the incentives that destroy it. This ultimately may benefit the public.

On the other hand, in a market not prone to long-term competition, such collusion amounts to restricting trade and should probably be regulated. The law should prevent price-fixing just as we regulate the prices of goods produced by "natural" monopolies.

Obviously, the difference between a "long-term" effect and a "short-term" effect is somewhat subjective.

Michael

by M Golding on Thu, 10/27/2005 - 23:35 | reply

"somewhat subjective" laws ma

"somewhat subjective" laws make a mess, because people won't know if an action breaks them or not.

so what law do you recommend?

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Fri, 10/28/2005 - 00:09 | reply

You're Right

I think in general I would not regulate prices for most goods, even if collusion could be demonstrated. The market usually takes care of this kind of thing, especially if it is a market where technology is being produced and research changes things rapidly. So although I do not know the case discussed well, I could agree with the conclusions of the editors.

Firms should be presumed innocent unless a particular good, like a road, has a priori been determined to have substantial public good implications and then the law should reflect that.

If a good is later determined to have substantial public good implications (by courts and the political process), then the firms should not be penalized for previously colluding, but then should not be allowed to do so and should be potentially subjected to regulation.

For example if there are two firms producing the only particular type of an antibiotic and they are colluding in determining prices, one would expect strong incentives for other firms to create competing antibiotics and thus break the cartel within a year or two. If the government became involved, its own inefficiency and the cost of regulation may very well be greater than the public good benefit of breaking the cartel.

On the other hand, if an epidemic then grips a nation before other antibiotics are developed, the antibiotic then becomes much more of a "public good." In such cases colluding firms should not be punished, but should be subject to regulation if they do not voluntarily take into account the public good implications of their production of antibiotics. Yes the government will predictably cause waste in regulating these firms. But monopoly pricing for antibiotics may harm the public good more than the inevitable waste associated with government spending on needed regulation. During an epidemic, one cannot wait a year for competing firms to produce alternative antibiotics.

I do think price fixing restricts trade and is in general bad, but in most cases, government intervention is worse unless there are substantial public good implications associated with the production of a good. The production of certain goods are properly regulated by the government (for example, the production of roads and other paths connecting businesses and homes.)

by M Golding on Fri, 10/28/2005 - 01:17 | reply

Competitors will join a field

Competitors will join a field/industry if they believe there is profit to be had, for example because the present companies are all charging more than necessary, or have angered the public by how they set prices. Sometimes the competitors will be wrong, and will discover the profit margins were not huge and bloated and it's difficult to do better. In such cases, the new competitor may fail, or may just do OK. Basically, if a private person judges there is a problem with the price, he can do something about it; but if he's wrong, he pays the consequences.

Government also has to make a judgment about when price fixing exists, when profit margins are too high for the risk involved, etc.. It is no better able to do this than a private individual. So, either a private individual will intervene (so government need not), or if none do, then if the government does intervene, we must say the government is disagreeing with a wide variety of experts. Further, if the government is wrong the cost of the mistake is paid by the tax payers; the lack of incentives and consequences in the right places hurts error correction.

We'll never know if the government was wrong, because we can't compare to what would have happened if it did nothing; when a private individual creates a rival company, we do find out if he was right or not, by his success or failure; so government intervention precludes learning who was right, and thus the government policy, even if it's frequently wrong, will never be corrected.

Another point is if a rival company intervenes by creating lower price goods, society benefits because now there are low priced goods available. If government intervenes it has options like:

- 1) destroy some companies; now nothing is available
- 2) start deciding what prices companies should charge, despite having no better knowledge of proper prices than anyone else has
- 3) tell companies to lower their prices an amount the government guesses might make sense, then don't let them raise them again until they have some excuse, like the cost of a natural resource goes up
- 4) stick the CEO in jail and put in a new one whom the government believes will play nice

None of these options are very impressive.

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Fri, 10/28/2005 - 11:02 | reply

Other than the U.N. Oil for Food Program, can you name some examples in Antitrust legislation where the four government options described above have been impractically applied?

(Given that the Oil for Food Program was not Antitrust or U.S. applied but rather a practical example of codified worldwide pro business/pro dictator collusion for political and personal gain.)

by a reader on Fri, 10/28/2005 - 15:36 | reply

I meant to illustrate it isn'

I meant to illustrate it isn't simple to think of a useful way for government to interfere. I could find an example, but we'd both agree government makes mistakes sometimes, so there is no point. How about you think of one alternative (has been done, or not) way for government to intervene that doesn't suck?

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Fri, 10/28/2005 - 15:49 | reply

The government breaking up th

The government breaking up the telephone monopoly of ATT seems to have caused an explosion of telephone company options for Americans across the board.

by a reader on Fri, 10/28/2005 - 19:17 | reply

You misunderstand. I want yo

You misunderstand. I want you to tell me a reasonable law we could have. It must say in what circumstances it takes effect, and the specific consequences that will happen. It cannot say "if there is a (telephone) company that seems too big, break it up in some manner, so options seem better" because laws cannot be vague in that way. You must detail how a company should be broken up, how we know it's too big, etc

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Fri, 10/28/2005 - 21:03 | reply

Antitrust

My main problem with antitrust law is the claim that a monopoly can exist where there is no legal barrier to entering a market. A good example of this was the recent Microsoft case, where the government ignored the legal right of others to enter the market and compete with Microsoft, and virtually ignored the realities of the fluid technology market and its history, to reach the dubious conclusion that anyone other than Microsoft's less effective competitors were injured. Perhaps it is somewhat easier to develop a rationale for a degree of regulation where the situation (often first created by government action -- but not always), has resulted in a genuine (natural or unnatural) monopoly. For example, where there is only one set of railroad tracks and no more can or will be constructed anytime soon (or ever) for a variety of other reasons. Perhaps regulation could take the form of bidding out the use of the tracks from time to time, or perhaps something else even more or less desirable. In any event, it seems to me that these types situations are few and far between. The history of antitrust law shows that these laws almost always draw the government into a role of supervising markets and prescribing outcomes through consent decrees, rather than protecting free markets, free competition, and individual rights.

by Michael Bacon on Fri, 10/28/2005 - 21:22 | reply

The law that broke up the tel

The law that broke up the telephone monopoly was the reasonable law. It takes effect in similar circumstances for similar reasons, and is arbitrated in similar ways.

by a reader on Fri, 10/28/2005 - 22:50 | reply

Ahem - Bell was in effect a state-enforced monopoly.

The law that "broke up the telephone monopoly" was simply the law that loosened the Federal regulatory framework which had, in effect, excluded competitors from the telephone market.

http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Kingsbury_Commitment

by a reader on Fri, 10/28/2005 - 23:08 | reply

Re: Ahem...

According the link you provided, the Kingsbury Commitment was a law to regulate AT&T, which was considered a natural monopoly.

The government initiated an antitrust lawsuit against AT&T in 1974. The settlement of this lawsuit broke AT&T up in 1984. This quickly lead to increased long-distance service competition, which caused a drop in long distance rates which continues to this day.

by a reader on Sat, 10/29/2005 - 04:24 | reply

AT&T;

Here is some history of how regulation hindered AT&T's competition.

Gil

by Gil on Sat, 10/29/2005 - 05:40 | reply

Is it possible?

Is it possible that regulation is bad for competition whereas antitrust law is by default a safeguard against overregulation? Does regulation tend to institutionalize controls and tend to become its own monopoly, albeit a government one, whereas law is simply law, where the court decides the merit of charges? Regulation is not needed where companies operate freely within the general rule of law where corporate innocence is presumed until proven otherwise.

Court requires an extensive body of evidence presented by plaintiffs to show that a law has been violated. Regulation is ongoing, precludes free market compliance, and requires only a regulatory body outside the role of court, usually but not always governmental. Regulation is intrusive and assumes universal noncompliance. Courts on the other hand require a search for the truth.

by a reader on Sun, 10/30/2005 - 18:49 | reply

Re: Competitors Will Join a Field

One policy option is to force government to do a cost-benefit analysis prior to intervening, say in an antitrust case. This could be accomplished out of an Office of Management and Budget, and supervised by the head of a Presidents Council of Economic Advisors.

Obviously there is much room for bias but econometricians do this kind of analysis regularly. But forcing some type of numerical accountability would be a good first step in providing information to the public, even though many would argue about the numbers.

By the way, there were attempts to implement this policy during the Reagan administration when Murray Weidenbaum was the head of the Presidents Council on Economic Advisors, but suffice to say Dr. Weidenbaum did not last too long in that post.

An honest broker/academic economist would likely experience enormous pressure.

Michael

by M Golding on Mon, 10/31/2005 - 00:59 | reply

Robbers, Barons, Billionaires & Politics

The following paper is amusing and loosely related to the argument.
http://econ161.berkeley.edu/Econ_Articles/carnegie/DeLong_Moscow_paper2.html

by a reader on Tue, 11/01/2005 - 01:48 | reply

Patents

"No computer company was forced to buy these memory chips, they could have made their own – and sold them, for that matter."

This is probably not true, although I suppose it might be in this case. Generally speaking, intellectual property legislation (particularly patents) raises barriers which prevent most people from entering any high-tech market with the same efficiency as the incumbents, who literally act as monopolists.

I have heard it argued that in these matters, governments are simply ensuring that the monopolies they have granted (for the greater good, of course...) do not get abused.

What is The World's position on patents and other intellectual property legislation?

by a reader on Wed, 12/27/2006 - 00:50 | reply

Vive Canada Libre!

There are signs that Québec may be prepared to release Canada from its long and cruel servitude. We look forward to the day when those hateful signs of occupation (we mean the bilingual ones, of course) are consigned to the dustbin of history. Then, as Québec pursues its natural destiny elsewhere, Canada too will be able to resume its rightful place among nations.

Fri, 11/04/2005 - 14:10 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Rationale?

Apart from the nationalistic sentiments, and vague reasonings such as the English-ness of the progress in the 21st century, what else do you have to back up your cheerful tone?

By the way, I think the 20th century started off with proclamations that "because of the industrious nature of German spirit and their superiority in organizing economic activity it's Germans who are going to lead the way in the 20th century." Is there some reason to believe the "nationlaistic" similarity in language with your linked book is only superficial?

by Bob S on Fri, 11/04/2005 - 17:55 | reply

Rightful place?

I'm wondering what 'rightful place' means. If you mean a nation with a single language, I'm not sure that's the qualifier for a rightful place. If you mean a nation that has no disputes between factions, other than political ones, I still don't know if that fits as 'rightful'.

Borders are odd things, that mix of geography, history, and culture. As language is just one attribute of culture, that alone does not create a border. Perhaps the answer is the myth of the great big melting pot that absorbs all identifiers and creates a new myth of one national identity. An alternative vision of national identity is where the histories and cultures become unified under a form of government which values all this and yet does not stagnate into some sentimental hash. That unification catalyst would seem to be dynamic democracy.

With Canada we'll see. Not all that appears as conflict is separation.

It may or may not change borders, but the in the halls of debate we'll find what 'rightful place' will be.

by a reader on Sat, 11/05/2005 - 15:38 | reply

Rationale

If it were true that progress is best made by industriousness and regimentation, the prophecy about Germany would have been accurate. But it was wide of the mark because, in fact, progress is best made by "traits common to America and other English-speaking nations—a particularly strong and independent civil society; openness and receptivity to the world, its people, and ideas; and a dynamic economy", and so on.

There is nothing nationalistic in our post or in the Anglosphere book. Any other societies that incorporate those attributes can make the same progress.

by Editor on Sun, 11/06/2005 - 05:04 | reply

Addition

Apparently that would include India? Jamaica? Liberia?

by a reader on Mon, 11/07/2005 - 02:03 | reply

Re: Addition

Is it apparent that their societies incorporate the attributes in question?

by Editor on Mon, 11/07/2005 - 02:16 | reply

Re: Addition

Not to me it isn't, or not fully. India might, Jamaica might to some degree, Liberia has a noble but spotty history.

I think if we take language out of it, or consider language as a co-related but not necessarily key indicator of the traits, it is more likely that we are on the right track. Karl Popper was certainly on the right track with "The Open Society and its Enemies", and language was never considered one of the key factors to an open society. A familiarity with so-called "classical civilization" values, brought up to date and constantly examined within the society would seem to be an overarching theme, but to always remember, societies do change when there are catalysts to openness. I think of Vaclav Havel and those around him as one example of this. Vibrant challenges, clear thinking, and willingness to question authoritarian regimes and structures with an intent of positive change and courage to do so are much higher on my list than some notion of an "Anglosphere".

by a reader on Mon, 11/07/2005 - 14:58 | reply

Language

The main problem with not speaking English is there's no one to talk to.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 11/07/2005 - 22:03 | reply

Copyright © 2007 Setting The World To Rights

Political Role Of Psychiatry

The Daily Telegraph reports allegations that the European Commission has discovered a new mental illness which, to its relief, is rare among its employees: honesty. Portuguese diplomat Jose Sequeira says that when the European Commission mistakenly suspected that he was about to blow the whistle on a fraud scandal they got psychiatrists to declare him mentally ill:

He was put on permanent sick leave after tests found he suffered "verbal hyper-productivity" and a "lack of conceptual content" in his speech.

From this description we wonder how it could have been possible to tell the difference between Mr Sequeira and the rest of the European Commission's staff. Nevertheless, the psychiatrists managed to do so, and duly delivered the verdict that would destroy Mr Sequeira and protect the Commission from his verbal hyper-productivity. Unfortunately for them, four independent psychiatrists disagreed:

To prove that he was of sound mind Mr Sequeira underwent psychiatric tests at four different hospitals, seen by the Sunday Telegraph, all of which found nothing wrong with him. Their findings were declared inadmissible by the commission as it would accept testimony from only its own accredited medical list.

If one group of psychiatrists can interpret diagnostic criteria for mental illness to fit Mr Sequeira and oblige their employer, and if another group of psychiatrists can form the diametrically opposite opinion and deny that he is mentally ill at all, what are the implications for their profession's even more powerful, and much less scrutinised, everyday role? There, the clients might, for instance, be troubled parents, and the victim their troublesome offspring. And there may well be no major newspaper and expensive lawyers willing to spring to the victim's defence.

If the allegations of Mr Sequeira and other Commission employees in similar positions are borne out, what lessons will the psychiatric profession draw? Will they make scapegoats of the psychiatrists concerned? Or will they realise that those psychiatrists were performing nothing other than their normal social function, and that the fault is systemic? Will they conclude that their subjective, purely behavioural, criteria for making diagnoses against the will of patients and at the behest of interested parties who dislike the patients' behaviour are not only an invitation to abuse, but unscientific too?

Mon, 11/14/2005 - 13:15 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Nailed this one

Unfortunately the pseudoscience of psychiatric diagnosis is used all the time to justify the reasons why someone does or says something that doesn't go along with the zeitgeist. The most deviant example of this was in Stalin's Russia, but it has other political uses as well across the world.

Psychiatry may have its place, but if so it is only in medicine, not in politics or the social sphere.

by a reader on Mon, 11/14/2005 - 15:00 | reply

Silly World

In virtually any malpractice trial, one physician gets up and says that one diagnosis was correct and one course of action was correct, and another physician often gets up and says the opposite. When politics and money are involved, its pretty easy to find one or two docs ready to testify to anything.

But I guess that means there is no science in medicine, at all?

Oh but wait. Climatologist totally disagree about the implications of "global warming". And politics is involved. No science in climatology, either?

And those physicists, believing in billions of universes and disagreeing with others who believe Copenhagen interpretations...my goodness, no science in physics, either? Imagine if each physicist testified in court, he would disagree. And if in such an important situation as a courtroom, physicists would disagree about something as major as whether there are billions of "parallel" universes or not, physics should not be taught at all? Stop all funding for universities that support physics research? Don't we need to get back to the "facts" for a change?

We can all agree on those.

by M Golding on Mon, 11/14/2005 - 15:17 | reply

Michael, The post didn't s

Michael,

The post didn't say there's no such thing as psychiatric science. It said political psychiatry is very bad. You ought to support that.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 11/15/2005 - 10:05 | reply

OK

"Subjective, purely behavioral criteria"?

Michael

The editors could no more make an accurate diagnosis of schizophrenia using standardized video recordings of patients than they could look in a microscope at spun urine and make a diagnosis of glomerulonephritis. One needs criteria plus standardized observational skills and a general knowledge of medicine.

With those, a diagnosis can be made and quite accurate predictions can be made about future illnesses, death, etc. Obviously, psychiatrists or any professional, whether climatologist or physicist, should not allow his skills to be abused to promote political ends, independant of the due diligence, scientific expertise, and humility of his profession.

Michael

by M Golding on Tue, 11/15/2005 - 11:22 | reply

Re: Nailed this one

A reader wrote:

Psychiatry may have its place, but if so it is only in medicine, not in politics or the social sphere.

Agreeing with psychiatrist Thomas Szasz I would say psychiatry has no place in medicine either. Since medicine deals with biological disorders, which can typically be seen under the microscope, and psychiatry deals with people's problems in living, these are two wholly different things. A psychiatrist is simply someone who tries to help people by talking to them about their problems, and is thus comparable to a friend, priest, parent, etc. Only when people's behaviour can be linked to a brain disease visible under the microscope, i.e. Alzheimer's, can we speak of a medical issue. There are no such things as mental diseases except in the metaphorical sense, just as we are talking metaphorically when we speak of a sick economy or a sick organisation. I have never come across a definition of "mental disease" which is scientifically meaningful.

Henry Sturman

by Henry Sturman on Tue, 11/15/2005 - 12:30 | reply

Interesting

Mr. Sturman

1. What causes type 2 diabetes? Can the cause be seen under a microscope or by any other known test?

2. When does someone have coronary artery disease?

3. When does someone have elevated cholesterol?

Since I do not believe you will be able to come up with "objective" criteria for any of this, does that mean that cardiology and endocrinology are unscientific and meaningless, just reflective of problems in living (eating badly and not exercising?)

Michael Golding

by M Golding on Tue, 11/15/2005 - 15:58 | reply

"Subjective, purely behavioral criteria"

"Subjective, purely behavioral criteria"

that's not science. that is what most of them do. that doesn't deny there can be science in the field.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 11/16/2005 - 03:29 | reply

Come Now

As even Virchow understood, when a person dies, he is no longer diseased. Rocks do not have disease. People do. Physicians Use diagnostic criteria in the context of a live person to make a diagnosis. A particular behavior, or even sequence of behaviors, says virtually nothing about psychiatric diagnosis, since diagnoses are made in context of the overall symptoms of the person, physical and mental. Similarly, a blood sugar measurement, or even a series of blood sugar measurements, tells you nothing about whether a person has diabetes, outside of the overall context of what is going on with the person (what if he is on a steroid, for example...then the blood sugar may well be elevated, with no underlying diabetes, and the behaviors may be paranoid and bizarre, with no underlying psychiatric illness. Unless you understand steroids, you can't make diagnoses based on definitions of diabetes or definitions of mental illness. One needs the whole picture of the person to reliably make diagnoses and accurately predict things of importance to people.)

That's why it's a little anti-scientific for the World editors to keep pointing to diagnostic criteria that are meaningless without medical context.

On what basis do you think that major psychiatric diagnoses, made by average psychiatrists in America, are any less predictive of physical damage to bodies and psychological pain and suffering than a diagnosis of type II diabetes made by an average endocrinologist?

On what basis do you think that a particular diagnosis of elevated cholesterol is any more predictive of adverse life-events than a major psychiatric diagnosis?

Do you just assume this? Isn't it important to get the science accurate, even when making a political point?

Michael

by M Golding on Wed, 11/16/2005 - 05:36 | reply

Michael, How do you (even

Michael,

How do you (even in theory) tell the difference between someone who is mentally ill and someone who is, in your view, wrong about how to live a lot?

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 11/16/2005 - 06:13 | reply

The difference between color and cats?

Most of my psychiatric patients are usually much braver and stronger than the average person. Usually (but not always) they have endured circumstances that would have crushed most others (or me) but the human spirit is remarkable. Their courage and humor makes them stronger people than most.

Your question is like asking, "How do you tell the difference between someone who has been a military leader during wartime, seen battle, and someone who is wrong about how to live a lot?"

It's an odd question. For most, being a military leader during battle steels them against future circumstances, and makes them better people. Others can lose their human spirit.

People who suffer adversity (like those with major mental illness, those with cancer, or those enduring war) can decide to retreat, learn to hate, or they can learn to live with their mental illness or adversity (as most do), and use these difficulties to be more generous and wonderful people. Most of the mentally ill, like individuals surviving cancer, grow from their experience.

What is the difference between someone with an illness who retreats and becomes bitter, and someone who uses their illness to experience spiritual, intellectual, and emotional growth?

I don't think anyone really knows the complete answer to why adversity causes some people with illness to use their experience to become better people, yet for others illness ruins their lives. I think it is "character". I know that very few of us could (literally) survive what many of my mentally ill patients endure, let alone survive their illness and still be friendly and generous and kind.

Try to imagine, Elliot, being forced awake and not being permitted to sleep (at all) for 3 days (let alone the 15 days my patients regularly endure). You might want to actually try it, just for 3 days. I have. Most of us get remarkably irritable even after 1 night of no sleep. Now imagine training yourself to be kind under those circumstances (it is usually much worse for the mentally ill because a variety of other circumstances are happening).

How to explain good character? I don't know, but I know it when I see it. It is present more frequently in my patient population than the general population, but perhaps that's just because my patients have on average experienced more adversity, in which noble human traits can develop.

Michael

by M Golding on Wed, 11/16/2005 - 12:14 | reply

The Psychiatric Role of Politics

Politics and psychiatry make very strange bedfellows. There is little doubt in my mind that some politicians are very crazy in the head, just not in the ways that fit easily with psychiatric diagnoses, or any standard medical diagnoses for that matter.

The problem in a nutshell seems to be that for some, politics and political rhetoric and political dogma of numerous flavors substitute for reality, and even for the testing of what the ideas of reality and truth actually might be.

Politics, and the political realm, both, unfortunately often inadvertently reward crazy, or crazed crackpot ideas. The "patient", political officeholder, representative ideologue gets blessed by more of what is sought, reflected and played back to them in the political arena, to elevate their personal perception of importance.

Some people relish a delusion or bedlam asylum, with adrenalin rushes and depressive cycles portrayed as somehow "feeling ideologically more alive". Political pundits in such worlds can be like medium psychiatrists, offering analyses A, B, C and so on upon what are essentially grand flights of fancy.

Maybe we need better indices of political health rather than more application of diagnostic mental health labels. Maybe we are better off with psychiatry out of politics.

by a reader on Wed, 11/16/2005 - 17:18 | reply

Michael, You seem to only

Michael,

You seem to only be imagining people who are, in fact, ill.

Imagine a dyslexic person, a person who believes in reading the letters of words out of order, a person who hears voices, a person who hears God's voice, a schizophrenic, a person who believes he should pretend to be schizophrenic, an obsessive/compulsive person who hates messes, a person who just really really hates messes, a person who loves messes and thinks God hates cleanliness, 500 different varieties of "anti-social" children (200 of whom oppose school on principle), 500 children who believe school is good (200 of whom believe it's right to be a teacher's pet), someone who believes so strongly in sympathy he feels physically pained when he sees children at school who don't want to be there, 500 mothers so concerned for their children they go to war with Canada (500 of whom don't listen to their children who'd prefer not to have a war), 500 varieties of terrorist (200 of whom follow Islam), and 500 varieties of Creationist (200 of whom think they are pirates).

How can you tell which people are ill?

What precisely does being ill, or not, mean? What is the difference for Terrorist #47 if you declare him ill or not?

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 11/16/2005 - 18:26 | reply

OK

I will answer you Elliot, but please help me prepare my answer by thinking through this question. I do have my own version of an answer to the "what is an illness" question.

What makes a cholesterol level "high"? Is it a problem with living?

Whatever criteria you use to answer that question is (philosophically speaking) the exact answer to the question, when is someone mentally ill?

The question is, what makes a medical condition abnormal? Those studying and trying to define elevated cholesterol levels have the same philosophical problems as those studying schizophrenia.

There are many definitions of illness. But I bet that if you were to come up with a set of (philosophical) criteria that would enable you to say that a cholesterol level should be considered "high," whatever criteria that is, it is very likely that I could see that perspective and believe that is also a reasonable criteria to define when someone is mentally ill.

Thanks.
Michael

by M Golding on Wed, 11/16/2005 - 21:13 | reply

re: ok

I may have been unclear. I mostly want to know how you tell which people are which, not what an illness is.

Diagnosing cholesterol levels involves ... well i imagine a bloodtest or something. The psychiatric diagnoses i'm skeptical of don't use a physical test like that, so they are different.

the other issue about cholesterol is: how much is too much? the answer is roughly: more than the patient wants to have.

As a secondary question, certain supposed mental illnesses have criteria like "argues with adults often". People then note the patient meets 5 criteria, and declare he has an illness, with consequences beyond the criteria themselves. So for illnesses like that, I want to know precisely what being ill means, and what that has to do with the behavioral diagnostic criteria. If you don't want to defend any illnesses like that, that's fine.

PS Please continue to ask questions about my questions, if at all unsure what I want to know. No point writing a long explanation only to be asked a slightly different question.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 11/16/2005 - 23:21 | reply

Illness

An illness is

A. A condition leading to damage of the body (especially if untreated).

AND

B. Associated with pain and/or suffering. Some would say associated with pain and/or suffering or loss of reproductive function. (The "reproductive functioning" aspect is usually added when people want to include animals and plants in the conception.)

AND

C. Not sustained by circumstances external to the person. Some would say an illness is not solely sustained by circumstances external to the person.

So as you can see by the above conception, all illnesses are both mental and physical. So when you ask me to identify what is a mental illness, I give you the above definition. But if you would like an exhaustive list that may be over-inclusive, please read the unabridged version of Harrison's Principles of Internal Medicine.

If you wish to know whether I believe a particular named condition is an illness, please ask and I will give you my best guess.

All of the major psychiatric illnesses, elevated cholesterol in many circumstances, and most of the illnesses recognized in medicine, meet the above criteria. Most political and economic hardships and prejudices do not. There have been multiple other attempts to formulate conceptions of "illness".

Elliot, you might try to formulate a conception of illness yourself.

It's harder than you might think, especially if you are trying to exclude the major psychiatric illnesses. Because when you try to exclude major psychiatric illnesses using philosophical principles, your conception then excludes a whole lot of other illnesses, as well!

Michael

by M Golding on Wed, 11/16/2005 - 23:27 | reply

Application of the criteria A, B and C

Do the following conditions meet the criteria A, B and C?:

- An intention to become a professional boxer.
- An intention to donate a kidney to save the life of a loved one.
- An intention to rescue a wounded fellow-soldier under fire.
- An intention to cross Antarctica on foot.
- An intention to become a suicide bomber.

by David Deutsch on Wed, 11/16/2005 - 23:59 | reply

illness

I don't want to formulate "what an illness is", I want to discuss certain conditions, and what should be done about them, and also how to diagnose them. To help me understand where you're coming from, can you tell me if you approve of ODD in the way it's presented at this link?

ODD

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Thu, 11/17/2005 - 00:34 | reply

Long-Hair Illness

Concerning Cholesterol:

"How much is too much? The answer is roughly, more than the person wants to have."

Elliot

Ahh Elliot, so if a person thinks his hair is too long, "hair-longness is an illness?" Don't you think your conception is too broad?

"Diagnosing cholesterol levels involves...well I imagine a blood test or something.

The psychiatric diagnoses I am skeptical about don't use a physical test like that. So they are different."

Elliot

Really. Why? The information people tell us and what they do is usually far more predictive than a lab test or a physical exam finding. (Information gathered from what people say and how they say it, as well as what they look like and do, is usually far more reliable) This is something that we have to teach medical students and interns repeatedly, because they keep their head in the laboratory values and under their stethoscope. A person with minor laboratory abnormalities but who looks grossly "toxic", IS TOXIC. If you treat the lab values, the patient often dies. Someone with much more significant laboratory abnormalities but who does not look "toxic", usually IS FINE.

As a scientific matter, you simply are mostly incorrect. What people tell us and what we see is usually a far more reliable indicator of what is wrong with people than lab values. Virtually any physician trying to help a patient (if given a choice), would much rather speak to him than examine him or draw labs. This assertion is both a considered opinion from informal discussion with colleagues, but has also been studied in terms of the relative ability of discussion and observation (say vs. biopsy and laboratory test), to determine what is wrong with someone. More information is almost always gathered from speaking and observation than from lab tests and biopsies. Curiously, how did you learn otherwise?

Physicians gather information, whether it is what people look like, what they say, what a lab value is, or what a physical exam finding is. We judge each component on its reliability and whether it helps us predict things we want to know (also whether it helps us understand the condition).

On what basis do you believe that psychiatric diagnoses, made by psychiatrists, are not reliable or do not predict things well? Have you seen the data?

Do you think "5 criteria", or a cholesterol level above 300, or a blood sugar greater than 190 make psychiatric diagnoses, a diagnosis of elevated cholesterol, or a diagnosis of diabetes? If criteria do not meet the conceptions in my post given above, or similar criteria, most physicians will not consider someone "ill".

If you wish to know my opinion about specific diagnoses, please feel free to ask.

You are also asking me how I make psychiatric diagnoses. How do I distinguish normal from not normal? The question is the same to me as asking me how I determine that someone is sick vs. well, since in my view all illnesses are both mental and physical. I truly don't mean to be flip, but you would need to read Harrisons Principles of Internal medicine while working in a clinic with physicians or nurse practitioners or PA's who would teach you how to distinguish illnesses from health and would also teach you about the shades of gray.

In philisophical terms, I have given my conception of illness (above). Health (normalcy) is the opposite of that.

Michael

I don't think so

No
No
No
and
No!

All fail on criteria C. However, the conditions that are sustained by circumstances not emanating from the environment...the physiology of having only one kidney, for example, could be an illness (although usually is not provided that the one kidney stays very healthy)

Boxing and giving kidneys are not sustaining the illness. Once the punch is delivered, if the nose instantaneously healed, there would be no illness! It is the body that is maintaining the injury, therefore the condition that is sustained is the echymosis (from the bodies inflammatory response), not the punch. Therefore the echymosis is the illness, not the punch.

Prof. Deutsch, do you have a conception of "illness" that you would like to offer?

Michael

by M Golding on Thu, 11/17/2005 - 01:11 | reply

ODD

ODD, to my taste, is too "specific" to meet the criteria above.

Impulsiveness, in certain environmental contexts, however may meet the criteria above that I have listed for illnesses. And it is the impulsiveness which is usually evaluated when such diagnoses are given.

As the standard story goes, those heterozygous for genes causing sickle cell anemia may have certain reproductive advantages in Africa where individuals are exposed to the parasite that causes malaria. However in America, where the malaria parasite is quite rare indeed, the same genetic configuration could predispose to slight (particularly reproductive) disadvantages. So the conditions of ones environment affects whether an individual with a given condition will have an illness (meet the criteria I list above.)

So impulsiveness could lead to organ damage (the internal physiology of this may not be relevant unless someone wants to know) when individuals live in a modern, relatively non-violent environment. So aspects of extreme impulsiveness could in fact be an illness, in modern day America, but may have been an evolutionary advantage when our ancestors evolved in Africa (and they lived just into their teens in an environment that was harsh and brutal).

The same is true with diabetes. Genes which promote fat deposition were likely, in certain environments, to be selected for. Currently, with plenty of food, such derangements (and they are now derangements) damage our organs and make us unhappy. The derangements are mostly sustained by our bodies, so excess impulsiveness and excess abdominal fat deposition, possibly contributing to type 2 diabetes, are now illnesses.

Michael

by M Golding on Thu, 11/17/2005 - 01:47 | reply

an intention to be a boxer is an intention to be a boxer is a condition that will cause bodily harm if it continues

it is also a condition associated with pain and/or suffering it is also something that can be based on internal, not external, factors (internal motivation). one could maintain such an intention on the moon, alone, and practice with a punching bag, or even without one.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Thu, 11/17/2005 - 02:16 | reply

Re: I don't think so

Nothing substantive can hang on a definition. Definitions can make it easy or hard to express certain ideas, or, at worst, cause confusion. So I do not favour any particular definition of "illness", and am willing to use any consistent terminology, provided that it really is only a definition, and not a means of smuggling in a substantive theory in the guise of a definition. For instance, I would be suspicious if someone insisted on defining a trade deficit as an 'illness' of the economy. For they would really be saying that the existence of a trade deficit justified some action by someone, such as the government, to 'cure' it. And if that were true, I would expect that to be arguable with or without that terminology.

In regard to criteria B and C, is it the condition, or the damage, or both that are required to be 'associated with pain and/or suffering' and 'not sustained by circumstances external to the person', in order to meet the respective criteria?

by David Deutsch on Thu, 11/17/2005 - 02:25 | reply

Sequeira Syndrome

"He was put on permanent sick leave after tests found he suffered "verbal hyper-productivity" and a "lack of conceptual content" in his speech."

A definition becomes a diagnosis of (mental) illness.

(Sequeira Syndrome, characterized by verbal hyper-productivity and a lack of conceptual content in speech.)

Treatment, remove the patient from all spheres of political influence.

A panel of psychiatrists will decide when and if the patient has regained the necessary capacity to resume speaking and conceptual thinking. (If ever, since Sequeira Syndrome once diagnosed is apparently a 'permanent' condition.)

See the problem?

We should all become very afraid. (Or am I just Paranoid?)

by a reader on Thu, 11/17/2005 - 03:42 | reply

hair length

Here is a blood test for cholesterol. i wasn't recommending a test to determine how much is too much, just how much is there.

if he thinks his hair is too long, then his hair length is a problem. i'm not sure what you hope to gain by deciding if it's an "illness" or not.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Thu, 11/17/2005 - 04:25 | reply

Blood Draws?

Elliot

1. How much is too much cholesterol? You said, "more than the person wants to have"

So is "too much" cholesterol an illness, by your standards? How is it a more real illness (if you think it is an illness) than the psychiatric illness bipolar illness?

2. How does showing me a site about collecting blood for cholesterol measurements say anything about the reliability of cholesterol measurements (they are reliable but...). What is the point of showing me the site? I can measure hair length with a ruler but what does that mean?

You said, "Diagnosing cholesterol levels involves well i imagine a blood test or something. The psychiatric diagnoses I'm skeptical of don't use a physical test like that, so they are different."

Blue is a different color than red. But what is the relevance of the difference to this discussion? We are talking about whether or not speaking to someone and observing him is somehow a less valid way of making diagnosis than measuring blood tests. I think (?) you are saying that you are "skeptical" of psychiatric diagnosis, as opposed to diagnoses made by blood tests (is that true, otherwise what does "skeptical" mean in this context?).

How does it help your argument to point me to a site that tells about drawing blood? If speaking to someone and observing him allows a physician to make more accurate predictions than drawing blood, why is that knowledge any less powerful? What does that have to do with how to draw blood?

You began the discussion by saying you are "skeptical" of psychiatric diagnosis. Presumably you are skeptical for a reason. Why do you think blood tests help doctors more than talking to patients and observing them, in making diagnoses? Both blood tests and observing people and talking with them make diagnoses. If you don't think that blood tests are more valid than speaking to someone or observing them in many situations, then what was the point of saying that you are "skeptical" of psychiatric diagnoses? Forgive me, but again, how does it help in the slightest to point to a site about drawing blood? Noone is disputing that blood can be drawn, Elliot!

3.

a. An intention to be a boxer is a condition that will cause bodily harm if it continues (OK)

b. It is also a condition associated with pain and suffering (Don't quite agree. An intention to be a boxer is overall not associated with pain and suffering. Overall, I think the boxer is usually happy to be a boxer and chooses it, given that he fully understands the risks involved)

c. It is also something that can be based on internal, not external factors...

[No, I don't agree with this at all. Damage to the body (from the intention to box) is sustained by internal factors. I should have been more clear in specifically saying in part 3 of a working definition of illness that "damage is sustained" by factors internal to the person.

It is the damage to the body that is sustained by internal factors Witness Muhammed Ali. He is no longer boxing. Yet he is still injured. The injury is sustained in the body, independant of the environment. So the environment (the boxing) is not the illness, the damage to brains and bones is.]

So no, boxing does not meet the criteria given above for illnesses.

But a profound susceptibility to the measles virus would be an illness because

1. It is a condition that predictably causes harm to the body
2. It predictably causes pain and suffering
3. The damage caused by the susceptibility interacting with the virus, is sustained by the body, at least for a relevant period of time if not indefinitely, by the bodies own (patho)physiological properties.

Intention to Box -- not an illness

Susceptibility to Measles -- an illness

Michael

by M Golding on Thu, 11/17/2005 - 06:12 | reply

Not paranoid, just confused

To the "Sequeira Syndrome Reader"

Many (?most) diagnoses in medicine are definitions. How do we define elevated cholesterol or type 2 diabetes? (Hint..definitions)

What damage to organs does Sequeira syndrome cause?

What is the genetic transmission of this illness?

What parts of the brain are damaged by this illness?

Are descriptions of the new "illness" better accounted for by other concepts?

What other illnesses are co-morbid with it?

Don't think these questions have been answered? Don't worry.

Michael

by M Golding on Thu, 11/17/2005 - 06:22 | reply

I still don't see what you ho

I still don't see what you hope to gain by classifying things as illnesses or not.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Thu, 11/17/2005 - 08:00 | reply

If you don't wish to know....

"How can you tell which people are ill?"

Elliot

by M Golding on Thu, 11/17/2005 - 12:14 | reply

Hokey-dokey then,

Will somebody, fellow sequestered sequeirians, please tell me which ones of the European Union political management suffer from the dreaded scourge of (mental)illness and to what degree?

Hint. Answering the above is probably irrelevant.

For none, all, or a only a fewm, partially, it apparently makes little difference for the price of euros.

Mental health diagnosis debates in the political realm are obviously just so much political maneuvering. The World provides an excellent example.

If it was a real illness diagnosis process it wouldn't make the news, oh perhaps the popular science page, small column. After all, little is duller or more ill advised than the practice of public psychiatry. Political theater on the other hand, that makes the news all the time.

by a reader on Thu, 11/17/2005 - 22:44 | reply

Confusing!

Michael,

It seems to me you shift your way of reasoning when it comes to Susceptibility to Measles. I can replace Susceptibility to Measles with Intention to Box in your reasoning and I don't see a change in the truth value of the statements. What is wrong with:

"But a strong intention to box would be an illness because

1. It is a condition that predictably causes harm to the body
2. It predictably causes pain and suffering
3. The damage caused by the intention to box leading to interaction with punches, is sustained by the body, at least for a relevant period of time if not indefinitely, by the bodies own (patho)physiological properties"?

Having thus challenged your definition, I have to say I think what we would wish to do with our definition, or better to say theory, of illness is far more important than the definition/theory itself. It seems to me that is the most important aspect of the story told by The World. That is, what do we want to do if we accept that Intention to Box, or Susceptibility to Measles, is or is not an illness.

by Babak on Sun, 11/20/2005 - 04:41 | reply

I see your point

I see your point and will respond more fully later. But I still don't agree that intention to box meets the criteria.

Briefly I would agree that a remarkably strong propensity to risk taking behavior could be an illness, but a propensity to box is not. Subtle but important difference.

For strong propensity to risk taking behavior to be an illness, one would have to demonstrate, for example, a strong genetic propensity to develop this condition.

Intention to box is not an internally based condition like propensity to develop measles, since "intention to box" is so culturally dependant, whereas propensity to develop measles is not.

Marked propensity to risk taking behavior could be an illness if appropriate and detailed studies demonstrated its important contribution, obviously given cultural context, to organ damage and if this damage causing ability is developed because of internal factors (like genetic propensity to extreme risk-taking behavior)

Similarly an elevated cholesterol level could be considered "elevated" or not elevated because it would predict different outcomes given cultural context (like how much exercise people do on average).

Or a propensity to develop measles could be considered an illness depending on the prevalence of the measles virus.

by M Golding on Mon, 11/21/2005 - 20:21 | reply

When a psychiatric diagnosis

When a psychiatric diagnosis is mistaken, how is this mistake typically discovered?

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 11/21/2005 - 21:33 | reply

Genetics and the Mind

Michael,

What kind of studies are there that could determine a "genetic propensity to extreme risk taking behavior"?

In case of say eye color, or measles there is a theory that explains how the features could be derived from the genes. A theory that can be tested with evidence including statistical results.

But in the case of behavior do we have such a theory in the first place? I doubt it if mere statistical results prove anything in this respect. maybe a high risk-taking tendency, or any other "abnormal" tendency, in an individual has arisen from a very personal experience in the person's life that would seem trivial in another person's view, given his background and experiences. How can you tell?

by AIS on Fri, 11/25/2005 - 06:47 | reply

Same Way

One determines genetic propensity for psychiatric illnesses the same way one determines a genetic tendency for type 2 diabetes, hypertension, or other illnesses defined by people, for which we do not know the cause.

We use identical twin studies, studies of fraternal twins, observational studies, accidents of nature and the environment, etc. (e.g. fraternal twins thought to be identical twins raised together and apart, etc.) to determine genetic and environmental contributions. From this information we can determine the approximate genetic propensity for type 2 diabetes, idiopathic hypertension, and bipolar illness.

Michael

By the way, I have grouped in my definition of "illness" (for simplicity) two slightly different concepts.

The distinction does not change the substance of the argument, but the repeated (interesting) questions you are asking require that I be a little more specific.

Tendency to develop an illness such that the "average environment" would make things more difficult for the person and more likely cause organ damage and pain and suffering is technically called a "developmental disability" (Propensity to illness, caused internally, is really criterion 1 above) .

Examples of developmental disabilities would be Aspergers syndrome. We all would have "Aspergers" if we were living in an alien culture on a different planet where we had not naturally evolved the ability to interpret an alien's social cues. But the state Asperger's itself is not considered an illness because there is no necessary organ damage if the environment perfectly cooperates with the person with Aspergers.

The development of the brain is different in those with Asperger's, but the brain does not deteriorate absent adverse interaction with the environment. Asperger's is comorbid with genuine "illnesses" because the environment rarely cooperates so well, so those with Aspergers often do develop illnesses.

For congenital deafness, some would consider it a developmental disability (but not an illness), and most would consider deafness neither an illness nor a developmental disability. It's not an illness because most people would consider the "damage" to the brain/ear to not be "damage" at all, since the organs for hearing are not needed.

In some peoples view, the ability to hear denies the so-called "normally hearing" individuals, natural access to a deaf culture that is richer than their own hearing culture!

In other words most (particularly in the deaf community) do not consider anything "wrong" at all when someone has congenital deafness. The deaf community often thinks its culture is as rich or richer than anyone elses, so 1. there is no pain and suffering 2. no damage to a "needed" organ, and 3. with the appropriate community, no increased risk of damage to needed organs of the body. Hence, no illness or disability is associated with congenital deafness, from this perspective.

To the extent that a congenitally deaf person had to live in an "average" community that hears (without peers and without accomodations), then deafness would probably become a "developmental disability" but not an "illness" until an organ is damaged and the damage is maintained from within the body and is associated with pain and suffering. Then the organ damage (itself) would be the illness.

Propensity to measles, propensity to bipolar illness, most congenitally low IQ's , propensity to diabetes, etc., are technically considered "developmental disabilities" since the organs are not damaged (particularly in childhood) until the "average" environment interacts with the disability. In a developmental disability, physiological development is considered different in a way that can potentially damage organs, but the condition itself does not damage organs, absent environmental reaction.

Most people don't use "developmental disability" language much any more and lump everything together as illnesses, but I thought it might be helpful to make these distinctions given the discussion.

If someone lost an arm, after it healed, it technically would not be considered an "illness", either. It would not be a developmental disability either, but rather (if it interfered with functioning), it would be considered just a plain "disability". The damage to the arm did not come from an internal source.

Propensity to "box", is a cultural phenomenon, but propensity to extreme risk taking behavior could have a strong genetic propensity, although it is not a recognized developmental disability at this time. Notice that in some environments, a given genetic propensity may be a developmental disability, but not in other environments, where the same genetic state may confer advantages.

The propensity to develop diabetes may be a disadvantage in this culture, but an advantage in cultures in which food is scarce. People argue whether attention deficit is an illness or a developmental disability. It seems to have properties of both. And in some environments (e.g. where intense activity and exploration are useful) less frontal lobe mediated "attention" (i.e. "attention deficit") may be beneficial.

Like attention deficit disorder, sickle cell trait could (arguably) have both characteristics. It could confer very modest disadvantages in terms of oxygen carrying capacity, so possibly could cause a propensity to ischemic organ damage, especially in a culture of marathon runners. But in certain environments (e.g. where there is endemic malaria) it could be an advantage because of protection against the parasite causing malaria. So sickle cell trait could be a developmental disability and possibly cause an (ischemic) illness in a culture of marathon runners, but an advantage in an environment filled with endemic malaria-causing parasites.

Attention deficit disorder (relative, particularly right-sided, frontal lobe deficits) could similarly lead to damage to the brain from stress when such children must sit in class for prolonged periods of time. (Our educational systems are notoriously unsympathetic to those with attention deficit disorder!)

On the other hand, in environments where intense activity and exploration are needed, a relative "attention deficit" could be an advantage. So both attention deficit and sickle-cell trait are potentially developmental disabilities, can lead to organ damage that is sustained from within, or can be potentially beneficial.

Thanks

by M Golding on Mon, 11/28/2005 - 18:26 | reply

Real Illness

"Nothing substantive can hang on a definition so I do not favor any particular definition of illness."

David Deutsch

This comment is quite confusing to me, and perhaps you would be willing to help clear up the confusion!

You have said that mental illnesses are "superstitions". You have attacked a charity that is trying to help those stricken with these illness (Rethink) by saying that the charity promotes "worthless superstitions."

(Why are you trying to hurt charities? I don't think that if this became more public, you would be helping Rethink's fundraising!)

You have said that mental illnesses are "fictional" and "nonsense" and that this mental illness "nonsense" is an "abrogation of intellectual and moral standards."

After using the word "illness" repeatedly in your condemnations of mental "illness", now you say that you do not "favor any particular definition of 'illness'!"(sic). So what does the word "illness" mean when you use it, since you certainly use it frequently? And why are you unwilling to give us your definition of how you are using the term? This is confusing.

Since you specifically call mental illness "fictional" and "fake", must you not have a conception of what a "real" illness is?

by M Golding on Mon, 11/28/2005 - 19:53 | reply

Twin Studies

How do twin studies, or any of the other studies, control for environmental factors? Even all subjects being raised by the same parents in the same house wouldn't come very close.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 11/28/2005 - 20:25 | reply

As I've Said Before

"In the absence of specific known mechanisms connecting gene products to particular outputs from the brain, how would genetically based mental illnesses exhibit their polygenetic characteristics to investigators?

Obsessive Compulsive Disorder, Schizophrenia, and Bipolar Illness all have 1. High monozygotic:dizygotic ratios. 2. Low Sibling risk 3. High first-degree relative risk 4. Predictable but non-specific pathophysiology of a relevant organ (e.g. brain) 5. Cause pain and suffering

A. These results are exactly the results that are mathematically predicted for illnesses with polygenetic origins in which the specific pathophysiology has not been discovered.

B. These are exactly the results found in polygenetic illnesses of multiple organs in the body, in which more exact genetic mechanisms have been ascertained.

C. There are no cases that have been discovered in which illnesses which were consistently found to have the above 5 characteristics were found not to be genetic in origin.

D. Obsessive Compulsive Disorder, Schizophrenia, Bipolar Disorder, and Major Depression all have the above 5 characteristics.

E. Would it not be odd if these illnesses were the only illnesses of thousands (with the above characteristics) that turn out not to be genetically based?"

The mathematics of polygenetic diseases leaves no reasonable doubt that these illnesses are genetically based.

Michael

by M Golding on Mon, 11/28/2005 - 22:36 | reply

Michael, If the math fits

Michael,

If the math fits perfectly with the theory genes are involved, that in no way differentiates between the following two possibilities:

A) genes cause mental illness

B) genes cause other things that aren't mental illnesses. for example, one might cause an infant to smile less, which causes the parents to treat him differently, etc etc I am not advocating the infant smiling explanation. That is just one example of an infinity of explanations in this class. I'm simply pointing out the math in no way indicates A over B.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 11/29/2005 - 03:39 | reply

Math Fits

Elliot,

I don't see the difference between A) and B). I take it that "etc etc" is simply a more attenuated explanatory string that results in, for example, obsessive compulsive disorder? Or, did the failure to smile result in a completely different outcome?

by Michael Bacon on Mon, 12/05/2005 - 02:12 | reply

Difference

The difference between (A) and (B) is what the genes code for. In one case, they code for a mental illness. In another, they code for not-smiling, and culture does the rest.

The etc etc resulted in whatever the mental illness in question is, thus giving us an alternative explanation for that particular mental illness.

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 12/05/2005 - 02:26 | reply

Definition of illness

After using the word "illness" repeatedly in your condemnations of mental "illness", now you say that you do not "favor any particular definition of 'illness'"!(sic). So what does the word "illness" mean when you use it, since you certainly use it frequently? And why are you unwilling to give us your definition of how you are using the term? This is confusing.

Since you specifically call mental illness "fictional" and "fake", must you not have a conception of what a "real" illness is

I am not objecting to the prevailing use of the term illness because I think I have a better definition. I am objecting to a prevailing argument that justifies certain behaviour (e.g. forcibly drugging children for disobedience) via an insistence on calling certain mental states illnesses. If the behaviour really were justified, this could be argued without insisting on that terminology. Symmetrically, I would have no objection whatever to calling mental illnesses (or trade deficits) illnesses, if this were not used as a fallacious justification for behaviour that would otherwise be considered wrong.

by David Deutsch on Mon, 12/05/2005 - 03:03 | reply

Difference

Elliot,

Then, in our hypothetical, can we agree that if a statistically significant sample of people with a specified gene disorder develop obsessive compulsive disorder, it could, in theory, be caused more directly by the gene, with fewer steps, than the "infant smile explanation," which requires other environmental and perhaps even biological processes? I agree that either explanation, and other explanations of similar classes, could be more or less true. Nevertheless, it is a good research approach to target human illnesses and try to locate genes that have a major impact; it should be encouraged. This is a far cry from the very real abuses David emphasizes, which should never be tolerated.

by Michael Bacon on Mon, 12/05/2005 - 03:26 | reply

Difference

Michael,

Just looking at the math, it could in theory be completely, directly, genetic, or only in the most indirect way. The math doesn't tell us.

I agree that research looking into genes is worthwhile. I was just arguing with the proposition that it must be genetic because of the math.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 12/05/2005 - 08:10 | reply

Illness

I think what David means (I mean to clarify it) is that an "illness" is something to be cured (by drugs, etc). So if you label something an illness, it sounds like you're justifying drugs by using that label instead of by a real argument. Other than that, he doesn't particularly care about definitions.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 12/05/2005 - 08:11 | reply

Illness

David,

So is type 2 diabetes not an illness if children are forcibly drugged to treat it?

Since children are forcibly treated for diabetes, does that mean that diabetes is "fictional", "fake", and a "superstition" and that you should attack charities helping individuals with diabetes?

David,

Since children are forcibly treated for diabetes, is belief in the existence of diabetes "nonsense" and an "abrogation of intellectual and moral standards"?

The words in quotes are your exact words in describing mental illness. If the absence of force is what defines something as an illness, then diabetes (and strep throat) are not illnesses, because children are forcibly treated for these on a daily basis.

By the way David, if you think that type 2 diabetes is different from say, bipolar illness or schizophrenia in philosophically relevant ways, I think it is time for you to share your reasoning.

A response to Elliotts argument about genes is forthcoming.

Michael

by M Golding on Tue, 12/06/2005 - 17:31 | reply

Name Calling But No Definitions

"...If the behavior really were justified, this (forcing medical procedures) could be argued without insisting on that terminology (that mental illnesses are illnesses)"

David Deutsch

Of course that is true, David. We are 100% agreed on that.

But we still have a problem.

Somehow you think it is a legitimate intellectual tactic to use hate-words to describe a phrase ("mental illness") that has meaning to a larger audience. To refresh your memory, you call mental illness a "worthless superstition". You say that mental illness is a "fiction" and "nonsense" and the concept of mental illness is an "abrogation of intellectual and moral standards." Then you refuse to define the word illness?!

Any fair-minded reader recognizes that it is wrong to hurl epithets at something and then refuse to define what you are attacking.

Michael Golding

by M Golding on Tue, 12/06/2005 - 23:16 | reply

Re: Illness

So is type 2 diabetes not an illness if children are forcibly drugged to treat it?

[...]

"...If the behavior really were justified, this (forcing medical procedures) could be argued without insisting on that terminology (that mental illnesses are illnesses)"

David Deutsch

Of course that is true, David. We are 100% agreed on that.

Let me, therefore, guess what the above question, formally about terminology, is substantively about. I guess it means "should children with type 2 diabetes be forcibly drugged to treat it?"

Is that correct?

by David Deutsch on Wed, 12/07/2005 - 02:02 | reply

Not in the Slightest Correct

No.

You are the one attempting to link the concept of illness to force in treating illnesses.

To my mind, they are completely separate discussions. Comparing a belief in creation "science" to a belief in mental illness and saying that both are fictional, false, moral abrogations etc. says nothing obvious about when it is reasonable to restrict freedoms. Childrens freedoms are restricted all the time, rightly or wrongly, by doctors and parents when children are, for example, given shots for diabetes or strep throat against their will. But we don't write long articles repeatedly calling strep throat a fake and fictional illness, and we don't say that the concept of strep throat is a moral and intellectual abrogation!

Instead (if you are a TCS person), you say it is wrong to coerce children. But you don't attack bacteriology. That makes no sense.

There is a difference between the concept of coercion and and the concept of illness.

Concept A. Strep Throat. Diabetes.

Concept B. Putting someone in jail. Forcing a child to take a shot for strep throat or diabetes.

These are obviously different ideas and I think most reasonable people can see the difference.

For all I know, I agree with you about when coercion is reasonable but mostly unreasonable. I would be happy to have a separate discussion with you about when coercion is justified, and I am happy to never use the word illness in that discussion.

I do, however, object to name calling, especially with no intellectual rigor to support your vituperation. Others on "The World" have tried to show why "mental illnesses" like bipolar disorder are somehow not in the same category as say type 2 diabetes. In my view, they have been unsuccessful, but at least they have tried.

You, David, on the other hand, continue to hurl epithets, and refuse to distance yourself from the comments that you have made (that the concept of mental illness is a "superstition" and "fake" and "false" and a "moral and intelluctual abrogation"!) And you have supported your assertions with absolutely no evidence whatsoever.

And it is even more wrong to continue to hurl epithets at the concept of mental illness while refusing to define your terms! That makes what you say impossible to falsify. So even from your own Popperian perspective, your comments are not in the slightest scientific. They are therefore expressions of pure ideologically-based hatred. They are anti-scientific.

"Intellectual and moral abrogation" Indeed.

Michael Golding

by M Golding on Wed, 12/07/2005 - 16:34 | reply

Two Separate Issues

Manufacturing guns can be good. For example, during World War II the Allies manufactured guns in order to use them to defeat the Nazis. However, people may also use guns badly. So if somebody manufactures guns to ship them to the Iranian gov't this is bad.

People may use ideas in good and bad ways too. Whatever you or I may think of the ordinary use of mental illness, this particular use of the idea of mental illness is wrong and motivated solely by a stupid political ideology. This is a separate matter from the criticism of the idea of mental illness. If people were to use the Turing Principle to try to justify communist terror famines on the grounds that the world is can be simulated by a universal computer and so the communists thought they could simulate exactly who they should kill to produce a perfect society that would be a political misuse of a scientific idea. Do you think that the EU used the idea of mental illness appropriately?

I do not think psychiatrists have experimentally tested theories other than their own and so that their claims to scientific status are wrong. I also think that the idea of mental illness is philosophically untenable. You disagree with me. My claim is that people behave badly because they have bad moral ideas or false factual ideas. These ideas do not necessarily reflect discredit on a person who holds them anymore than they reflect discredit on a Palestinian schoolchild who has never been taught anything other than hatred of Israel and chants anti-Semitic slogans. I define illness as an objective chemical or structural abnormality of the human body that is deemed undesirable. Abnormal bodily conditions may be caused by behaviour without causing such behaviour, e.g. - adrenaline does not cause running but people who run will have high adrenaline right after they have stopped (of course, this is not an illness, but it is different from how the person's body is normally), or people who drink a lot may have bad livers without their livers making them drink. Now suppose that in a double blind trial doctors could look at a chemical test or a scan of a person's body or could see a physical defect in an organ at autopsy and that from this they could diagnose a mental illness, then my position would be refuted. Note that this cannot be a test for damage to the body caused by the behaviour of the person with the purported mental illness that is deemed to be a symptom of that illness, e.g. - slashed wrists are not evidence of schizophrenia, as it could also be explained if the person was so sad he wanted to die because his girlfriend dumped him or he was going to be put in prison for theft or whatever. Such a test has not been conducted. My position is testable but has not been tested.

by Alan Forrester on Sun, 12/18/2005 - 16:10 | reply

Objective Measure

I define illness as an objective chemical or structural abnormality of the body that is deemed undesirable.

Alan Forrester

Alan,

How do physicians/scientists define "objective chemical" or "objective structural" abnormality?

How do physicians and other medical scientists measure degree of objectivity of a measurement? Do you know?

What makes something deemed "undesirable". Is brown hair an illness in someone who does not want brown hair, just because the color brown can be (relatively) reliably measured?

Michael Golding

by M Golding on Wed, 12/21/2005 - 21:28 | reply

OK

You say that psychiatric diagnoses are "subjective" in the above post. What do you mean by that? What do you mean by "objective" medical results, when you call psychiatric tests "subjective"? How do physicians determine the relative objectivity of a diagnosis or measurement?

On what basis do you think that a psychiatric diagnosis in a person is not falsifiable? How odd (if you believe that).

If I check 10,000 lab tests on you, an average of 500 will be flagged as outside the range of normal. In medicine, what makes something "abnormal"? If you "deem undesirable" any or all of the strange lab values, do you have 500 illnesses?

If someone complains of visual scotomas, horrible one-sided headaches with extreme pain, then complains he can barely see (out of one eye) for 5 minutes, says the back of his head hurts horribly (on one side), does he have an illness, though this pattern happens frequently and all medical tests and exams are completely normal, except what the patient reports?

If a patient presents with what appears to be bizarre posturing and a physician tells you the persons behavior and history is that of someone with torticollis, and all lab tests are normal, does he have an illness?

No. The EU did not use the idea of mental illness correctly.

Why is a fasting blood sugar above a certain value an illness, but a behavioral pattern with known (but not specific) organ damage, not an illness?

Michael Golding

by M Golding on Wed, 12/21/2005 - 23:21 | reply

Objective and Subjective

An objective structural or chemical abnormality is an structural or chemical abnormality that exists in the real world as opposed to in a person's imagination only. It is an abnormality that a doctor of pathologist could find in principle by looking at the results of tests like X-rays, blood sugar and perhaps some information about the person's physical features like height, weight and so on. In practise this may be difficult and I'm sure doctors have ways of doing it of which I am not aware.

People deem abnormalities to be undesirable if those abnormalities have properties that people don't like, such as if they cause death. Of course, deeming something undesirable is non-objective. However, that doesn't stop a particular sign that indicates an illness from being objective, just as data about a large lump of rock heading for Earth that will destroy human civilisation could be entirely objective although particular interpretations of that fact would not be, such as people saying that the end of civilisation is good or bad.

By contrast psychiatric diagnoses in the DSM are phrased entirely in terms of the behaviour of patients and not at all in terms of objective chemical or structural abnormalities. People may fake behaviour deemed typical of a mental illness and there is no way to tell whether the illness is "genuine" by the DSM's own criteria, so it can hardly be deemed objective. I recall reading a paper on an experiment concerning psychiatric diagnoses.

I will not answer vague hypotheticals, especially when you have left out a lot of the relevant information (false positive rates and so on).

by Alan Forrester on Sun, 12/25/2005 - 14:47 | reply

Medical and Psychiatric Diagnoses -- The Same Entity

1. The DSM assumes complete knowledge of medical history, physical exam history and careful laboratory examination before any diagnosis can be made. To assume otherwise is simply factually false.

2. People fake all kinds of illnesses. I have personally provided psychiatric consultation to a team of other physicians who discovered too late that they were treating someone for cancer with chemotherapy. But the person did not have cancer. And the person died of the effects of the chemotherapy. Knowledgeable patients easily scrape and otherwise alter the physiology of tissue samples to create false positive results. Doctors then fail to analyze correctly the samples. Blood chemistries are easily altered by behavioral means; for example exercise raises white counts and platelet levels. Responses to stress easily change blood sugar and sodium levels.

I have treated a person who was diagnosed as deaf for 20 years, and who had multiple medical diagnoses of a faulty immune system, all created by her own actions (for example injecting of stool into her blood). And she was not deaf, as it turned out. There are no doubt hundreds of patients diagnosed with all variety of illnesses that are entirely faked.

The migraine headache that I was describing in my previous post is a very dangerous type of migraine. The diagnosis is made purely by patient reporting of symptoms and careful observation by physician. A person could attempt to fake this illness, as some do psychiatric illness, but these arguments apply to psychiatric illness as well as other illnesses. Failure to properly evaluate and treat this type of migraine headache can lead to blindness or death.

The diagnosis of steroid-induced psychosis (as well as multiple drug-induced psychoses) are made completely by history and by behavioral observations, and failure to diagnose this can lead to multiple physiological and behavioral dangers as well as death.

Tardive dyskinesia is caused by exposure to older neuroleptics. The diagnosis is made entirely by history and behavior but it is known to be caused by exposure to certain medications. People can die of tardive dyskinesia, for example, if their airway becomes affected.

3. What some readers may not be aware of is that all diagnoses, whether psychiatric illness or other illness, are made by what someone says or by their behavior, in addition to known specific or non-specific damage to organs. Pain and suffering is a necessary component of all illnesses, or they would not be considered illnesses. Dead people, like stones, are not considered to be diseased.

4. People develop a "fatty-streak" in their arteries (the very beginning of heart disease) when they are 10 years old. The "angina syndrome", due to partial blockage of a coronary artery in addition to patient reports of pain during exercise or during psychologically stressful experience is diagnosed and treated to some extent based on the report of pain itself (Why?) Because reports of pain help to predict outcomes and because we want to relieve suffering. This is true in both psychiatric and other types of illness.

Alan, the paper cited in the paper you cite studied a population of 12 and was done in the 1950s, decades before the era of modern diagnostic psychiatry. In contrast, modern reliability studies have looked at thousands of patients and controls.

Major psychiatric syndromes are as falsifiable and reliably made as other illnesses in medicine. Their cause is as known or unknown as most other complex syndromes for example heart disease and cancer. Indeed there are multiple causes of all of these illnesses.

Copyright © 2007 Setting The World To Rights

Denazification Today

One of the wisest decisions taken by the victorious Allies in 1945 was to occupy Germany and Japan for long enough to destroy by force those aspects of their culture that had made those countries dangerous. In Europe the process was known as denazification. Among the measures taken were some that would have been immoral and unconstitutional if they had been enforced in any of the countries in the Anglo-Saxon tradition. These included:

- Infringements of freedom of speech, expression and peaceful assembly, such as forbidding political parties espousing Nazi ideology, the uttering of Nazi slogans, and the display of Nazi symbols.
- Retrospective jurisdiction (as in the Nuremberg trials, where people were punished, and even executed, for actions such as crimes against humanity, that were perfectly lawful at the time when they were committed).
- The imposition of new constitutions.
- The reform of the Shinto religion, including the suppression of certain interpretations of it.
- What would today be called 'collective punishments' – for instance, forcing entire populations to visit concentration camps in order to witness what had been done in their names, and forcing groups of people against whom no crime had been proven to undergo education in human rights and democratic values.

The justification of these measures was the same as the justification for fighting the war: self-defence. The justification for inflicting them unequally on different nations was that different nations posed different threats. As the political cultures of those countries improved, the measures were gradually relaxed. Japan was granted sovereignty in 1952 and Germany in 1954/5. However, even after sovereignty, some of the measures remained in place, and a few are still in place today. For instance, Germany and Austria have laws against Holocaust denial and other 'hate speech'. This is a good thing, for the political cultures of those countries still contain significant traces of the features that, within living memory, came close to destroying civilisation. Suppressing those features by force is still right and still necessary.

Therefore we rejoice that David Irving in Austria and Ernest Zuendel in Germany face jail for Holocaust denial. Denying the Holocaust is, in those countries, inseparable from their violently dangerous political traditions. In advanced countries such as Britain, the United States, or Canada, there are no comparable traditions. So in such countries, we oppose 'hate speech' laws other than for speech that threatens or incites violence.

Wed, 11/23/2005 - 05:26 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

David Irving

Davis Irving is British, but is being tried for things he said in Austria. What if he had said the same things in Britain and they had been taped and transported to Austria? Surely they could have the same effect, but would have to be legal, right?

by GS on Wed, 11/23/2005 - 16:56 | reply

Holocaust denial=promotion of violence?

A society which accepts that human beings are fallible does not jail people for believing the wrong facts.

I would be willing to debate the World whether it is justified to outlaw hate speech, anti-semitism, nazi-parties, approval of the holocaust, etc. in Germany. The World has a point there, though I'd probably still disagree for various reasons.

But to equate holocaust denial with anti-semitism, hate speech or some other such vice per se is, I submit, a grave mistake. Though statistically many holocaust deniers are anti-semites, there is no logical link between the two. It is perfectly possible for a decent non-anti-semetic none-hateful non-violent civilized person to believe the gas chambers did not exist. Indeed, there are many such people, though they probably form a minority among holocaust deniers. I think they are wrong, but those who disbelieve the holocaust in good faith are not bad.

The question of whether or not the holocaust happened is a historical and scientific question and it is paramount that these issues be debated freely. Closing debate only promotes holocaust denial, because when debate is closed there are no opportunities for criticizing holocaust denial. And any mechanism which does away with open debate and criticism of bad theories will severely slow down the growth of human knowledge.

There is no difference in principle between outlawing creationist theory, pseudo-science, paranormal theories and holocaust denial. Holocaust denial should be allowed for the same reason all those other views should be allowed: criticizing established theories is a sine qua non for progress, science and civilisation. Can you imagine what would happen if it were a general rule that criticism of theories everybody knows to be true were outlawed? Scientific progress would come to a grinding halt. The earth would still be the center of the universe.

I would also like to repeat here what I commented before:

I agree with the World that it's not helpful that the Belmont Club links to a Holocaust-denying website. However, I disagree with the last reader that it's bad to sympathize with people who are mistaken. Any person in favor of scientific freedom and a free and open exchange of ideas should sympathize with Holocaust deniers, especially those who are persecuted and jailed in countries such as Germany and Austria, and the fact that Amnesty International does not defend those people is a scandal. Remember Voltaire's dictum: "I disapprove of what you say, but I will defend to the death your right to say it." Also remember that criticism and open debate of mainstream ideas is vital for the progress of science, even if that also means you'll see bad quality criticism from time to time. So although I do not believe the Holocaust deniers are right, I do sympathize with those of them who are well meaning and not motivated by anti-semitism.

See also my other comments on that page. Sending people to jail because they approve of the holocaust is something I would not approve of but I don't think it's outrageous to do so. But I do think it is outrageous that people are sent to jail because they hold incorrect historical views. If that were right then all of us should go to jail, because all of us are sure to have been mistaken at some point about some historical or scientific fact.

Henry Sturman

by Henry Sturman on Wed, 11/23/2005 - 17:36 | reply

Good post. The sausage-eat

Good post.

The sausage-eating Hun always needs a bit of censorship.
Thank God we're so much better than them!

by a reader on Wed, 11/23/2005 - 17:44 | reply

holocaust denial

Henry,

In your mind, is there a "logical link" between believing the protocols of the elders of zion and anti-semitism? Could one be purely factually mistaken about those?

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 11/23/2005 - 20:34 | reply

Eugene Volokh has a thoughtfu

Eugene Volokh has a thoughtful post on this subject. I tend to agree with him.

http://volokh.com/archives/archive_2005_11_13-2005_11_19.shtml#1132249807

by a reader on Wed, 11/23/2005 - 21:45 | reply

Re: Eugene Volokh has a thoughtful post

Eugene Volokh does not address the issue addressed here. Instead, he addresses the issue of whether "the government" should or should not "ban advocacy of a historical position". By assuming that there is a single yes/no answer to this, right for all governments at all times, he unwittingly falls into extreme utopianism. None of his arguments that such banning "does more harm than good" even apply in the real-life situation, where Holocaust denial is legal in the United States but not in certain European countries. And conversely, if his line of reasoning were valid, it would have ruled out the original denazification project as well.

by Editor on Wed, 11/23/2005 - 22:20 | reply

Surprises

I am often surprised by the World, reading a topic and then finding it is not really about what I thought it was about.

While the scourge of Holocaust deniers is a worthy subject at any time, I am much more interested in why and how post WW II Germany and Japan were changed by Allied occupation. They were positively changed, and drastically so, by occupation, and both countries have much to be proud of today. Certainly occupation was accepted by most citizens as a worthy consequence of formerly barbaric regimes, and a necessary moral imperative was strictly applied. Drastic measures were used, but for the citizens of both countries they were a welcome alternative to the death, dire deprivations and destruction of their former imperial administrations.

The point is what did we learn from these long and successful occupations. What are the lessons about post war occupations, are there any? I think so, and the most important one is to be a worthy conquerer, leave the conquered in a position to move forward to a better autonomous destiny. That, for lack of a better word, is the true "denazification". That is the true moral course.

by a reader on Thu, 11/24/2005 - 02:46 | reply

Re: holocaust denial

In your mind, is there a "logical link" between believing the protocols of the elders of zion and anti-semitism? Could one be purely factually mistaken about those?

I can't answer this question, because I don't know anything about the protocols of the elders of zion. But I would argue that the World is wrong in the following way. The world basically believes as I do that there should be freedom of speech for historical debates. Only they wish to make exceptions in very special circumstances, because we don't live in a utopian world. In the case of Germany they suggest making holocaust denial legal would do more harm than good.

First, I would challenge whether this type of utilitarianism is a good thing. I think, for various reasons I won't go into now, often principles are more important than a utilitarian balance of good versus bad consequences. That said there are extreme situations where I would agree to forgo libertarian principles for utilitarian reasons, but this is not extreme enough for me.

Second, I would challenge the theory that making holocaust denial legal in Germany does more harm than good. The theory is that making holocaust denial illegal is part of an important denazification process. There are two things wrong with this argument. First, Germany is no longer more nazi than any other country, including the US. So if holocaust denial should be illegal in Germany it should be in the US and the UK as well. Second, since as I've explained holocaust denial is not inherently anti-semitic, making it illegal in no way helps to denazify. Therefore making it illegal does absolutely no good in this regard.

A major irony is that if denazification is the goal then making holocaust denial illegal is actually a move in the opposite direction. Making the belief in certain facts illegal is in itself a nazi-method and by its own example teaches and promotes a certain aspect of nazi-ideology (i.e. the aspect of nazi-ideology which is opposed to free scientific inquiry).

Henry Sturman

by Henry Sturman on Thu, 11/24/2005 - 10:46 | reply

Is anti-zionism or hatred of

Is anti-zionism or hatred of Israel inherently anti-semitic?

Is anything inherently anti-semitic?

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Thu, 11/24/2005 - 20:06 | reply

Re: Is anti-zionism or hatred of

Is anti-zionism or hatred of Israel inherently anti-semitic?

*Is anything inherently anti-semitic?*

First, let me note for clarity that I think these questions have nothing to do with the issue being discussed here. However, that said, I'd be happy to reply.

First anti-zionism. That's easy. Anti-zionism is not anti-semitic if we define zionism with its original meaning: the proposal, starting in the 19th century, that Jews move to Palestine to remake a Jewish homeland there. There have been many people and many Jews who were or are against this idea. Mostly their argument was that it would create too much conflict with the Arabs. Many Jews have therefore argued that either Jews give up on the idea of Jewish homeland (well, they will typically support Israel now that it's there but claim it would have been better not to create it) or that they find another place (such as somewhere in Africa).

Personally I am neither for nor against zionism. I respect both those Jews who want to live in Palestine and those who do not. And I find it particularly ironic that many of the Arabs who've benefited so much from the progress and wealth the Jews developed and who've suffered so much from their own corrupt leaders, would be so opposed to Israel.

On the other hand today anti-zionisms is often taken to mean being against the right of Jews living in Palestine and for their expulsion or at least for the idea they should live under an Arab run state (where no doubt they'd be vigorously oppressed). I do think that view usually goes close together with anti-semitism: it's hard to imagine someone wanting all Jews to leave Palestine who is not an anti-semite.

Next: is hatred of Israel inherently anti-semitic? Well, that's more difficult. I don't think its inherently anti-semitic but it does come close. For the only way it can be non-anti-semitic is for someone to have nothing against the Jews but only hate the Jewish state. And that seems unlikely. Except for an anarchist who simply hates the Israeli state because he hates all states. But there is no rational cause to hate the Israeli state in particular, because the Israeli state is a Western style rule of law state, more civilized than most other states in the world. So then that leaves only two options. Either such a person is not anti-semitic but simply mistakenly hates Israel because he has an incorrect view of the Israeli-Arab conflict (Murray Rothbard is a good example of such a person; he actually believed all Arab-Israeli wars were wars of aggression by Israel). Or, what is more likely, the person is anti-semitic. In any case I do think the link between hating Israel and anti-semitism is much stronger than that between holocaust denial and anti-semitism.

P.S. I am an anarchist and therefore hate all states, but Israel and Switzerland are the two states in the world I hate least because from the way they historically arose they come closest to the ideal of a state as a voluntary organisation.

Henry Sturman

by Henry Sturman on Thu, 11/24/2005 - 23:49 | reply

Huh?

I just wanted to add my support for Henry Sturman's position (as expressed thusfar) and my bewilderment at The World's position.

Perhaps The World would like to catalog which other basic liberties (in the US and Britain) they would rejoice in seeing denied to people who happen to find themselves in places with different political traditions.

Gil

by Gil on Fri, 11/25/2005 - 00:58 | reply

Was denazification an injustice?

Gil: for example, under present circumstances, no one other than a few governments should be allowed to possess the element plutonium.

Gil and Henry: was the denazification programme of 1945-55 an injustice? Should the Allies have refrained from any of the actions listed above?

by Editor on Fri, 11/25/2005 - 01:43 | reply

What do you think is a good r

What do you think is a good reason to believe someone is anti-semitic?

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Fri, 11/25/2005 - 04:10 | reply

I agree that immidiately afte

I agree that immidiately after the WWII, government action in enforcing denazification was the correct policy in order to neutrilize the widescale Nazi brainwashing among those who had personally lived under that system and were its main propaganda target, as well as some of the root ideas that manfisted themselves in teh form of Nazims.

But extending it to our days doesn't seem to be a wise course.

It is a bit analogous to the great depression. The need also arose then for government action during the time of crisis to overcome the depression and it was the right thing to do as long as it was temporary and directed specifically towards overcoming that particular problem, but since it has continued to be applied as the right thing to do to prevent similar catastrophies for all times it has generated all the usual negative effects of government interference where it is not needed. To be sure another depression as prevented but this has created huge inflations instead. It might be streching the analogy too far but perhaps something similar can be detected in this case, where Nazism has been reduced to a cartoonish evil in the popular culture and would hardly re-emerge while antisemitism has grown in new and superficially "opposite" fronts among the leftist, the so-called anti-colonialist and pro-Palestinian sections of the society. The continuation of governmental meddling in denazification has perhaps proven to be "too effective" once Israel and the Jews are now branded as the new Nazis in the new fashion of antisemitism.

Just as in its economic counterpart, lack of trust in the power of free market—in this case the free market of ideas—has led a well-intentioned move to produce opposite results because of government interference.

It might surprise you to know how effective such Holocaust denial legal convictions have been in the hands of anti-Zionist and antisemites these days presenting them as evidence for their looney conspiracy theories.

by AIS on Fri, 11/25/2005 - 06:34 | reply

Denazification

I don't know the details of all of the denazification program well enough to say whether each of the measures was justified.

But, I'm willing to agree that in the immediate aftermath of WWII the cultures (and many of the people) of Germany and Japan were so screwed up and violent that it justified harsh treatment to allow better cultures to take hold.

However, to permanently entrench a prohibition on the expression of certain ideas seems unjustified, and counter-productive.

As AIS indicated, to prohibit the criticism of official doctrine leads many to question whether the doctrine is true and capable of being defended against criticism in open debate. It invites all sorts of underground, un rebutted, theories to spread.

And, while I agree that Germany had severe cultural problems before the war (and still has many), I think that there has been dramatic progress. There are now overwhelmingly different people there who deeply regret what happened. To suggest that expressing Holocaust-denying theories to Germans is in the same category as handing plutonium to Iranian leaders seems to make a similar mistake as the anti-semitic theories that we deplore.

Gil

by Gil on Fri, 11/25/2005 - 08:04 | reply

Gil, What gave you the idea

Gil,

What gave you the idea we wish to have permanent denazification laws?

-- Elliot Temple

Re: Was denazification an injustice?

Gil and Henry: was the denazification programme of 1945-55 an injustice? Should the Allies have refrained from any of the actions listed above?

First let me note that the denazification programme was very different from making holocaust denial illegal for two reasons: (1) the denazification programme was right after the war when there still was an important nazi culture and (2) the denazification programme was aimed at denazification while I've argued that whether or not the holocaust happened is a historical question which by itself has nothing to do with nazism. Therefore I have much more sympathy for the World's position in favour of the denazification programme than for their position on holocaust denial.

I can understand that denazification is important to prevent future wars and that sometimes it's better to use a relatively small amount of aggression to combat a greater aggression. Just as in wars we accept (or should accept) some innocent civilian casualties to fight a greater evil, so too maybe sometimes freedom of speech should be restricted to prevent a greater evil. Maybe that was the case after the second world war for the denazification programme, but I have my doubts.

I would think having lost the war and with new democratic regimes put into place, Germans and Japanese would have had enough reason to denazify and I would doubt that the denazification programme made any significant difference. Futhermore I would doubt whether one can really change people's ideas by forbidding certain parties, symbols or ideas or by forcible reeducating them by touring them around concentration camps. As far as I know the reeducation in communist China and Cambodia wasn't all that effective either.

And I think doing things such as infringing on freedom of speech sends the wrong message. It sends the message that initiation of force is good. So I'd tend to be against those kinds of things, though I do understand a case can be made for them.

As for the imposition of new constitutions, there's nothing wrong with that per se. I would judge a constitution on how much pro-liberty it is, and it makes sense that the Allies would replace a Nazi political system with a more civilized constitution.

As for the retrospective jurisdiction of Nuremberg, I can't argue with that either because as a libertarian I don't care much for legalities of state. I care about justice and if Nuremberg provided justice then I'm for it.

As an aside I do not accept there are such things as 'war crimes' or

'crimes against humanity'. I think all crimes are crimes against individuals. And we don't need any fancy confusing wording like that because war criminals can be tried for normal crimes based on normal laws such as laws against (multiple) murder, etc.

In particular I have a problem with the concept of a 'war crime' because that concept reduces rather than improves options to prosecute crimes during a war. Basically the whole idea of 'war crimes' is that things which are normally crimes are not crimes during war.

Normally, for example, murdering innocent people is murder, but after a war soldiers fighting a war of conquest and aggression are typically not prosecuted. So in war soldiers are free to commit crimes, except if those crimes happen to fall under the category of 'war crimes'. So the whole purpose of the word 'war crimes' is to limit responsibility for crimes committed during war. If all crimes were just as illegal during war as during peace, then we would have no need for the concept of 'war crimes' because we would simply prosecute criminal warriors for normal crimes.

So in practice that means that I think all Germans who fought voluntarily in the criminal organization called the Nazi army should have been prosecuted for, among other things, the civilians and allied soldiers they killed. As for the Germans who were drafted, that's another story. And of course I do not mean that Allied soldiers should be prosecuted for murder because they may have killed German soldiers or accidentally killed innocent people. They were fighting on the right side, on the side against oppression and mass murder, and so they were doing the right thing.

Henry Sturman

by Henry Sturman on Fri, 11/25/2005 - 17:22 | reply

Permanent?

Elliot,

What gave me the idea of the wish for "permanent" denazification laws was the rejoicing at their enforcement sixty years after the end of the war.

Obviously, I don't know (or even think) that The World wants them to literally be permanent, but this much time seems much closer to permanence than makes sense to me.

It seems that The World thinks it's still right because of the existence of "significant traces" of bad features. I wonder how anyone will know when those traces are no longer significant if their expression is forced out-of-sight.

Gil

by Gil on Fri, 11/25/2005 - 21:50 | reply

Is There A Threat Today?

Joerg Haider, an Austrian politician, Nazi sympathiser and anti-semite of today says:

When asked to comment on his parents' wartime activities, Haider remarked: "In retrospect one is always wiser. As a descendant, one should not be so arrogant as to say, 'I would have known better.'"

The wartime activities in question are their membership in and work for Nazi organisations.

In other words, Joerg hasn't learned better. He hasn't adopted new and different values. He would be a Nazi if circumstances permitted.

He is just one person. But people voted for him. To say the threat is gone, one must believe the people voting for this man are cured. Why is that a reasonable position?

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Sat, 11/26/2005 - 04:20 | reply

Threats

There will always be a threat, in every democracy, that people will elect bad politicians with bad ideas.

The more power politicians have to interfere with our lives, the more damage this can cause. So, I favor removing a great deal of that power.

But, which will make us safer: insulating ourselves from bad ideas via criminalization of their expression, or publicly combatting them with better ideas?

In America, many people have elected David Duke to office, and tried to elect Pat Buchanan (whose expressed positions and sentiments seem to me to be more similar to Haider's than Duke's do) President. Is this an argument for outlawing disfavored historical theories here?

Gil

by Gil on Sat, 11/26/2005 - 08:16 | reply

Henry Sturman said: Though

Henry Sturman said:

Though statistically many holocaust deniers are anti-semites, there is no logical link between the two. It is perfectly possible for a decent non-anti-semitic non-hateful non-violent civilized person to believe the gas chambers did not exist.

There is a logical relationship between denying the holocaust and anti-semitism: the former is a necessary condition of the latter. Additionally, a necessary condition usually serves as an indication of a causal relationship too: If someone believes that holocaust did happen (by which it is also implied it was a bad thing), there is good reason to conclude he cannot be an anti-semite (or at least consistently so). It may not be the only cause but it can be a contributing one.

Thinking about the question, "How does someone become an anti-semite?" can clarify my point.

by Babak on Mon, 11/28/2005 - 08:44 | reply

Why do you need to deny the H

Why do you need to deny the Holocaust to be an anti-Semite? Surely you might think it was a good thing and that it didn't go far enough.

by a reader on Wed, 11/30/2005 - 13:23 | reply

Yes, you are right. I was usi

Yes, you are right. I was using a stronger condition than simply "denying the existence of gas chambers": that the gas chambers did not exist, or if they factually did they were bad. This would exclude certain anti-semites (e.g. Nazis and neo-Nazis), but leaves the major portion of them, who are deemed to be ordinary people and are the subject of the debate here, who I believe would deny holocaust only in this stronger sense.

by Babak on Thu, 12/01/2005 - 02:50 | reply

Nazi support was not created by Nazi propaganda

I would think having lost the war and with new democratic regimes put into place, Germans and Japanese would have had enough reason to denazify and I would doubt that the denazification programme made any significant difference.

Don't you remember they tried that in 1918 in Germany? They lost the war, they had a democratic regime, but they did not denazify as you would think. They über-nazified.

by a reader on Thu, 12/01/2005 - 13:56 | reply

What can societies change into?

Denazification may appear to be only stale history, but it helps us better understand how Iran, one of the few remaining countries of any heft that still publicly calls for the destruction of Israel and for the acquisition of nuclear weapons, may change.

Denazification was carried out specifically by removing those involved from positions of influence and by disbanding or rendering impotent the associated organizations. Although legions of Allied forces initially jump-started reform, in a remarkably short period of time, historically speaking, German citizens were back in control. Although our Middle Eastern nation-building experience is still limited, it appears so far that the pace and nature of reform such as occurred in Germany will be difficult to achieve without politically untenable decisions to spend a far larger share of national blood and treasure. There doesn't appear to be much chance of a shooting war with Iran, so the West's political will won't be tested. Nevertheless, comparing the experience of Germany with our limited results, highlights the key role played by local characteristics.

China is an interesting case, broadly similar in age to Iran. Perhaps Iran can develop an Islamic society with "modern" characteristics, or some other such transitional form. What can Iran change into? The obstacles to modernity may well be less than we see in Afghanistan and Iraq, but it seems implausible that they will be as easily swept away as in Germany and elsewhere in Europe. There will be no cadre of modern Europeans to take over. This should be kept in mind as we implement our basic strategy of maximizing military, economic, political and social pressure on Iran to fundamentally change.

by Michael Bacon on Fri, 12/02/2005 - 02:09 | reply

Holocaust Denial is Fraudulent

I find the argument that Holocaust Denial ought to only be illegal in some countries and not others problematic; as someone else said, Holocaust Denial today can easily cross national boundaries. Should it be illegal to order copies of Mein Kampf from Amazon.com in Germany? Should it be illegal for Austrians to browse neo-Nazi web sites that are hosted in countries where Holocaust Denial is not illegal?

De-Nazification is justified because Nazism is a criminal conspiracy to commit mass-murder. Germany had no "tradition" of genocide against Jews before Hitler, even though it did have a tradition of anti-Semitism (what country didn't?); nevertheless, it would have been justified to ban the Nazi Party in the Weimar Republic, just as it would have been justified to ban the Communist Party. All that is needed to prove conspiracy is evidence of agreement to commit a crime and a concrete act in furtherance of that agreement.

Similarly, Holocaust Denial is a form of fraud, and fraud is not included within the scope of freedom of speech. The necessary elements of fraud include intent, misrepresentation, reliance upon that misrepresentation by others, etc., and not all of these elements are included in every instance in which someone questions whether the Holocaust happened or criticizes some aspect of it. But with the likes of David Irving, a pathological liar who lies about things other than just the Holocaust (like in his book about the bombing of Dresden), all of the elements are present.

Irving fits the classic definition of a Holocaust Denier: One who denies that the Nazis tried to exterminate all the Jews, but wishes they had.

by Tim Starr on Thu, 12/08/2005 - 20:39 | reply

Dangerous German Tradition?

Tim,

Could the Holocaust have happened in Britain, with appropriate evil leader and co-conspirators?

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Thu, 12/08/2005 - 21:57 | reply

A British Holocaust?

Elliot asks whether the Holocaust could have happened in Britain. My reply would be to ask: which Holocaust, and when? Could the Jews have been exterminated in Britain at the same time they were exterminated in German-occupied Europe? I don't think so, both because private gun ownership was still legal in Britain at that time (Hence Orwell's line about making sure that the rifle on the wall of the workingman's cottage stays there), and because British democracy was fairly well-established by that time.

However, if you ask the Afrikaners about the 30K or so Boers who died in British concentration camps during the Boer War, or the Irish about the Famine, I think you'll get a somewhat different answer. These incidents can be distinguished from the Holocaust insofar as they were not the result of policies that were explicitly intended to kill off all of the Boers or Irish, as the Holocaust was expressly intended to kill off all the Jews under Nazi control. Also, their death toll was lower, at least for the Boer War. (I'm not up on the figures for the Irish Famine.)

Still, although it is to Britain's credit that its political system allowed for the abolition of the Corn Laws to relieve the Irish Famine and for the freedom of protest that allowed for the improvement of conditions in the Kitchener's concentration camps in South Africa, Britain also deserves the blame for the policies which let those horrors occur in the first place.

There are earlier incidents of ethnic cleansing in British history, such as the expulsion of the Acadians from Canada, the Highland Clearances, etc., but they took place before Britain was a democracy. The suppression of the Mau-Mau took place after Britain was a democracy, but I'm not convinced of the democidal nature of that counter-insurgency (I haven't read the two recent books about it making the case that it was democidal).

Some might argue that the British perpetrated a literal Holocaust in the aerial bombing of Germany during WWII, but I reject that argument. I believe that the aerial bombing of Germany was justified (including Dresden), although it was far too indiscriminate for technological reasons.

Tim Starr
Fight For Liberty!
<http://groups.yahoo.com/group/fightforliberty/>

by Tim Starr on Mon, 12/19/2005 - 23:19 | reply

traditions

Germany did not have a tradition of genocide of Jews in particular, but it did have different traditions than Britain -- and it still does -- and they make genocide of Jews possible in Germany but not Britain.

-- Elliot Temple
<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 12/20/2005 - 08:25 | reply

Genocidal Traditions

What British traditions make genocide of Jews impossible there today? There are three necessary elements for genocide: government, racial hatred, and the disarmament of the intended victims. Britain has at least two of those elements, government and victim disarmament. Does it truly lack the third? Perhaps when it comes to hatred of the Jewish "race," the answer is yes, but it's not difficult for me to imagine "racial" hatred against other groups being acted upon in genocidal fashion in Britain - perhaps against the Protestants or Catholics in Northern Ireland, perhaps against British Muslims as a backlash after an Islamo-Fascist terrorist attack in London, etc.

However, is racial hatred any less prevalent in Britain today than Austria or Germany? I don't know how to answer that, as I don't know how to measure racial hatred.

Tim Starr
Fight For Liberty!
<http://groups.yahoo.com/group/fightforliberty/>

by Tim Starr on Fri, 12/30/2005 - 01:49 | reply

Temporary curtailment

Would such laws be better if they included a sunset clause of say 50 years?

by a reader on Sat, 05/19/2007 - 17:03 | reply

Re: Temporary curtailment

A reader asked:

Would such laws be better if they included a sunset clause of say 50 years?

That sounds like a good idea. Not so much because governments can't be trusted, but because it would make clear what the purpose of the measure was. Which might make it work better.

by Editor on Sat, 05/19/2007 - 18:05 | reply

Data Never Tell A Story

A widespread conceit in the fields known as 'social sciences' is that if one can attach a number to something, one has understood it. In fact, understanding has to come first, for numbers can hide facts as well as reveal them. For example, as David Henderson recently commented on Tech Central Station, a press release from the Commonwealth Fund makes the following claim:

"One-third of patients with health problems in the U.S. report experiencing medical, medication, or test errors, the highest rate of any nation in a new Commonwealth Fund international survey."

Presumably the Commonwealth Fund wants its readers to conclude that Americans get a worse deal from their health care system than do Canadians and Britons. And that this is because the US government is less interventionist in the health care market. And the natural moral of the story is that only the state can deliver good healthcare.

The American medical system may or may not make more mistakes: what the data really show depends on how alert the patients in the various countries are to this issue, and how inclined they are to regard something as a "medical error". But in any case, the mistakes reported in America are on average less severe than the ones in Canada and Britain. So if anything the Commonwealth Fund should have concluded the opposite.

Numbers themselves do not mandate any particular conclusion. We may count as similar things that are not at all similar, such as small mistakes and large mistakes. We can only draw reasonable conclusions from measured numbers when we classify and interpret them in the light of explanations that have been tested against rival explanations. The scientific approach entails trying to understand the facts through both one's own favoured explanation and the rival explanations. Trying to pigeonhole and control people by measuring vaguely defined numbers and interpreting them as justifications for political policy is not science but scientism and it is irrational. Political opinions disguised as scientific studies are dangerous. They do not deserve to be afforded the respect due to science.

Does the American medical system make more mistakes? What would be a reasonable view to take on that matter?

Is government intervention in medicine good? Why or why not?

by a reader on Fri, 12/02/2005 - 03:40 | reply

Rival explanation

A quick search reveals that "one in every six (U.S.) doctors has a claim brought against him or her annually".

By contrast, one in every fifty Canadian doctors face a malpractice claim per year.

Perhaps Americans are more litigious than their counterparts in the Commonwealth Fund survey. That would account for the inflated claims of medical error.

Sources:

<http://www.thedoctors.com/newsroom/issues/medmalcrisis.asp>

<http://www.medlit.info/guests/mmpcanadian/medlit.htm>

by a reader on Sun, 12/04/2005 - 17:32 | reply

Ratios

How many medical malpractice lawyers are there in the U.S. in relation to Canada, adusted for population?

Data in the form or ratios, certainly, but perhaps a co-related factor.

I remember reading once that the ratio of lawyers in the U.S. to those in Japan was some staggering difference. The Japanese public is therefore likely not litigious in much of anything. There could be a number of reasons for this. An ironic anime' would be the story of an ambulance chaser trying to make a living in Tokyo.

by a reader on Sun, 12/04/2005 - 19:38 | reply

Ratios

There are more lawyers in any of a half dozen major American metropolitan areas than in all of Japan. Here laws have developed much more fully that allow individuals to seek legal redress on a wide range of issues. This undoubtedly has a large impact on the number of claims. I also think it's safe to say that there are more medical procedures per patient than in most similarly situated countries.

by Michael Bacon on Mon, 12/05/2005 - 01:48 | reply

Socialized medicine's better at hiding errors

The explanation I prefer for this sort of discrepancy between American medicine and that of more socialized medical systems is that socialized medicine is structurally better at hiding error than the American medicine. For one thing, the costs are externalized onto the taxpayers, rather than onto either the patients themselves or their private insurance companies.

Also, when malpractice occurs under socialized medicine, suing means suing the government.

A better metric to use would be the success rates for various types of medical treatments or procedures. That would tell you whether a better quality of medicine is available under which system.

Whenever I've seen that sort of data compared, American medicine has come out on top.

by Tim Starr on Thu, 12/08/2005 - 19:45 | reply

Impending Holocaust Watch – Ahmadinejad, The Genocidal Realist

Mark Steyn is in fine form, summarising the present situation: Iran is simultaneously acquiring nuclear weapons and pushing the envelope of how far genocidal antisemitism may be publicly advocated before any consequences set in. They are succeeding in both efforts: both the rhetoric of genocide and the physical preparations for it are becoming accepted in civilised circles as a routine and inevitable part of the international landscape.

[President Ahmadinejad] figures that half the world likes his Jew proposals and the rest isn't prepared to do more than offer a few objections phrased in the usual thin diplo-pabulum.

We assume, as Neville Chamberlain, Lord Halifax and other civilized men did 70 years ago, that these chaps may be a little excitable, but come on, old boy, they can't possibly mean it, can they? Wrong. They mean it but they can't quite do it yet. Like Hitler, when they can do it, they will – or at the very least the weedy diplo-speak tells them they can force the world into big concessions on the fear that they can.

The ultimate target of this international blackmail, the United States, which is also the nation that is, as usual, going to have to bear the cost of setting the world to rights again after that catastrophe, is for various reasons unable to act in advance to prevent it. Hence Israel is being forced into its well-accustomed stance of unilateral self-defence. Of course it would be perfectly justified in using military force to disarm Iran, as it did Iraq in 1981. Unfortunately, this seems to be impractical, since Iran has learned from Saddam's failure, and has had decades to disperse, conceal and protect its nuclear technology. An editorial by Saul Singer in the Jerusalem Post muses on the problem. He points out that the current international consensus of appeasement, led by the Europeans, is, as usual, bringing about precisely the events that it is intended to prevent.

He also points out that international pre-emptive action is not only permitted but mandated by the UN Charter:

If Europe, through the UN and in partnership with the US, simply followed the UN Charter, we would be living in a very different world today. That Charter (Ch. 1, Art. 1, Para. 1, first sentence) states the UN's purpose: "To maintain international peace and security, and to that end: to take effective collective measures for the prevention and removal of threats to the peace, and for the suppression of acts of aggression or other breaches of the peace...". [Our emphasis.]

Does this ring any bells? Is there a state that is a greater threat to international peace than Iran? How much terrorism does a state have to sponsor, how many member states does it have to threaten with destruction, and how far does it have to get in obtaining the ultimate means to carry out such threats before the collective obligations of free nations under the Charter are remembered?

And he concludes with an appeal to the world, and to Europe in particular:

Join us and defend yourselves. We are not your hired hitmen; don't depend on us to save you. Take your beloved international law seriously and throw the book at Iran.

It may not be too late, with common will, to force Iran to back down without firing a shot. And if it is too late for peaceful means, that shot should be fired together, legally, in the name of international peace and security.

Indeed a united world – even just the civilised world, united – would probably be able to end the Iranian threat peacefully. But we also know, as Singer undoubtedly knows too, that the civilised world is not sufficiently civilised to do this.

Absent that fantasy solution, there is still some hope. It lies in the creative thought of three groups of people. One is the military planners of the IDF. The second is the US Administration and their strategic advisers. And the third – neglected in many analyses of this crisis – is the Iranian people. They have more to lose by failing, and more to gain by liberating themselves – now – than anyone else.

Mon, 12/12/2005 - 13:08 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Indeed

I completely agree, and as an Iranian appreciate the stance you take in this post. Indeed if such public displays of evil, as those of Mr. Ahmadinejad's recent and repeated ones, pass without due international action (not words) we should all be fearful of the status of our future well-being.

by Babak on Mon, 12/12/2005 - 20:27 | reply

Iran threats

It's such a tendency for us to search for solutions based on surface appearances. The Holy Spirit on The Christian Prophet blog advocates a more spiritual solution.

by A Christian Prophet on Tue, 12/13/2005 - 02:07 | reply

Do not underestimate him

Ahmadinejad's diatribes against Israel seem stupid, but they are also very subtle, as an Iranian dissident-analyst Farhad Ja'fari has pointed out:

He is winning a lot of Muslim support for himself and the regime, this way directing the Islamic world's public opinion to perceive any possible Western retaliation against Iranian nuclear sites as solely a defence of Israel. This way they are effectively raising the costs of a possible Western action.

At the same time they are shifting the main issue from the Nuclear weapons to anti-semitism in the world public opinion which is unfortunately very prone to disregarding anti-semitism in action (despite all the rhetoric) in contrast to the nuclear issue.

Finally they also play with the Christian anti-semitism and the preponderant conspiracy theories about the influence of Israel in American and Western policy decisions in the West itself.

Of course, just like the Nazis, they are shrewd but also mad and stupid in their own fashion. After all the real smart policy would be that of adopting free liberal society, the one thing they completely shun. This is ultimately their ruin, sooner or later. The main question is, as you mentioned, what would be the cost?

by AIS on Thu, 12/15/2005 - 05:44 | reply

Re: Do Not Underestimate Him

Those are very good points. Thank you.

by Editor on Thu, 12/15/2005 - 05:57 | reply

...An Important Petition

Also please take the time to read this:

PETITION

Any effort to isolate the regime is a step in the right direction.

by AIS on Thu, 12/15/2005 - 08:19 | reply

BBC Claims That Its Role Is To Indoctrinate Children With Political Propaganda

No, we're not exaggerating. The BBC, which is funded almost entirely by an annual grant of over £3 billion from the British taxpayer, and whose Charter requires it to remain strictly impartial on political issues, has proudly announced that it is putting political propaganda into its flagship children's adventure series Doctor Who.

A Christmas Day special of sci-fi series Doctor Who contains an anti-war message, as new Doctor David Tennant tackles an alien invasion of Earth.

"It's Christmas Day, a day of peace," said chief writer Russell T Davies. "There is absolutely an anti-war message because that's what I think."

...[In the show, the British Prime Minister] says of the US president: "He is not my boss and he is certainly not turning this into a war."

A later scene echoes former Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher's decision to sink the General Belgrano during the Falklands conflict in 1982. ... [The] Prime Minister orders the destruction of a retreating alien spaceship, a decision condemned by the Doctor.

Shameful.

Wed, 12/14/2005 - 00:21 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Shameful

"[The] Prime Minister orders the destruction of a retreating alien spaceship, a decision condemned by the Doctor."

I'm curious whether the retreating aliens correspond to any group of terrorists. Perhaps, but is that kind of wider progress really being made? The destruction of a retreating alien spaceship is of course an unusual occurrence and seems clearly warranted.

by Michael Bacon on Tue, 12/20/2005 - 03:10 | reply

Re: Shameful

As I understand it the BBC equates the retreating aliens with the sinking of the Argentinian warship the General Belgrano in 1983. I haven't seen the programme so I don't know why the fictional PM decides to destroy the alien ship. The circumstances surrounding the sinking of the Belgrano are complicated but I shall explain the factors that seem salient to me. The fascist Argentinian government had invaded the Falkland Islands, which were ruled by the British government and inhabited by British citizens. The British government sent aircraft carriers with planes and guns and soldiers to liberate the islands. The Belgrano was part of a group of warships sent by the Argentinians to help support their blatant act of aggression and the British Navy sank it. IMO, the sinking was right and mocking it is stupid and a sign of the BBC's moral decay.

by Alan Forrester on Sun, 12/25/2005 - 14:08 | reply

Israeli Arabs To Vote Zionist At The Next Election

An opinion poll in Israel indicates that 51% of Israeli Arabs who intend to vote at the forthcoming Israeli election will vote for Zionist parties. This figure should be compared with 30% at the last election.

This welcome development seems to be more due to factionalism among the Arab parties than to their voters becoming convinced of the justice of the Zionist cause. But still, it does suggest that if the Arabs in the rest of the Arab world thought like Israeli Arabs, there would be no Middle-East problem.

No, wait – yes there would. Unfortunately, in the Middle East outside Israel and Iraq, Arabs aren't allowed to vote.

By the way, only about 5% of those Israeli Arab voters say they will vote for Ariel Sharon's new party Kadima, but Druze Knesset member and Deputy Education Minister Majalli Whbee, formerly of Likud, who is now in charge of Kadima's Arab HQ, hopes to raise this to 25%.

Thu, 12/15/2005 - 00:46 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Ritual Torture

It is Christmas, a time at which many people celebrate the birth of Jesus, a man who was ritually tortured to death for uttering forbidden speech.

It is unclear how much of the Jesus story is true, but undoubtedly, ritual torturing to death was a horrible and widespread reality at the time. It was one of the mechanisms by which the Roman empire affirmed and entrenched the values by which it lived, namely order, deference, and obedience to authority. Such a practice is alien and incomprehensible to us. In addition to having better values, our society has utterly different, infinitely more wholesome, ways of affirming its values, does it not?

Committing suicide is a fundamental human right: if we do not own our own bodies, what do we own? Like all other rights, it is legitimate to exercise it only when this does not violate the rights of others. So the pilot of an aircraft in flight does not have the right to shoot himself if by doing so he murders his passengers. Correspondingly, they have the right forcibly to keep him alive – even if he is undergoing great suffering and is desperate to end it. Indeed, they have the right to force him, by torture if necessary, to perform his contractual obligation to land the aircraft. But the instant they have landed safely (or if they find an alternative pilot on board, or any other non-violent way of saving themselves), their right to keep him alive, or to torture him in any other way, abruptly ends.

Logically, aiding and abetting such torture – or the exercise of any other right – is also a right, since forbidding such help is tantamount to forbidding the helpless to exercise the right itself.

Whether the existing state of the law respects the right to torture in self-defence, or to aid and abet such torture, is unclear. But in most jurisdictions today it certainly does not respect the right to commit suicide, nor the right to assist in one. The justification for this position, though it has widespread popular support (just as crucifixion did in Roman times), is morally empty. It is a sort of formal obeisance to the rule that murder is wrong, in a way that contradicts the substantive purpose of that rule (which is to prevent a person's body from being used as a means to someone else's ends and contrary to his own). Nevertheless, it is supported as a symbol of our society's 'respect for life'. It is a mechanism by which our society seeks to affirm and entrench the values by which it lives.

As part of this symbolic posturing, many people who at this moment are terminally ill and undergoing such suffering that they are desperate to die, are being forcibly prevented from doing so. That is to say, they are being ritually tortured to death.

One small further consequence of that injustice is that Dr Jack Kevorkian is still in jail in Michigan for trying to prevent a patient from being tortured – i.e. for assisting that patient to commit suicide. It is grimly appropriate that the Governor of Michigan has just refused to grant Kevorkian a compassionate parole. Despite the fact that he has harmed no one and is a danger to no one, and despite the fact that he himself is now gravely ill but wants to live, she considers it more important to leave him in the conditions that may end his life prematurely, just to set an example to other doctors whose humanity and integrity may tempt them to help their patients. She is, one might say with very little hyperbole, ritually torturing him to death.

Furthermore, note that in reality, assisted suicide is a very widespread practice. But other doctors do it discreetly and deniably. So what really landed Kevorkian in his current predicament was not so much the crime of which he was convicted, but his forbidden speech. He recklessly uttered the justifications that the others ritually deny.

May he survive his ordeal, and may he live to see the repeal of the obscene laws that he has defied.

Merry Christmas.

Sun, 12/25/2005 - 11:13 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

super awesome

super awesome

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Sun, 12/25/2005 - 18:55 | reply

Well said!

That was fantastic post!

by AIS on Sun, 12/25/2005 - 21:35 | reply

Tortuous logic,

but otherwise well written and thought provoking. Sounds like that hypothetical pilot was having a rather bad day. Maybe Dr.

Kevorkian is not having such a bad day as all that, although prison food is unpalatable; except perhaps on special holidays.

by a reader on Mon, 12/26/2005 - 23:05 | reply

Seems that the primary proble

Seems that the primary problem as even you state it is the pain of dying, not the manner of death. I don't believe you have spent much time with the dying; for if you had you would likely have found that most opt to live as long as they can if they are not in pain. Most people will hang on to the water glass even if it's almost empty. There is always that last drink.

Better pain treatment, better end of life care, better education of stupid fucking doctors on the fact that everyone dies and it is just not the losers who go, would all help many people die in peace and dignity. Health care that actually accepted that dying is not some kind of insurance scam would also help.

If a few want to opt out earlier, that's cool. Fact is most don't and never will. So your rant is aimed at the 5-10 percent who would and you miss the problems of the 90-95 percent of the population who would never take early retirement plan seriously.

The fear is yours. You are so afraid of death and dying that you are already screaming for a back door. You want it, take it. But in the end the odds are heavy that if you can lay there relatively free from pain, you will do so, and be very anxious to do so. There is always that one more visit from a loved one, that one more chance to see your grand child. That's life. And like it or not we humans cling to it.

by kalapu on Tue, 12/27/2005 - 11:05 | reply

Szasz on Kevorkian

Good article, I agree with you that a person has a right to end his life and thereby has the right to obtain assistance of others. However, as to Kevorkian, there may be some question as to whether he acted appropriately. For example, this article suggests it's unclear whether Kevorkian checked well enough that Youk really wanted to die, or might have changed his mind, before he gave the lethal injection. And Thomas Szasz also has some interesting critique of Kevorkian.

Henry Sturman

by Henry Sturman on Fri, 12/30/2005 - 00:37 | reply

Kavorkian liked to see people dead

The stoics argued that a man had the right to end his life when it became unlivable...

However, if you look at societies where such ideas reigned, you see one where the less powerful have their lives ended for them...

Doesn't matter if it is ancient Rome, Ancient Greece, the Netherlands, Samurai Japan or what...

The dirty little secret is that euthanasia is about getting rid of inconvenient people...and give Europe ten or twenty years, and you will see them euthanizing people for economic reasons...unless, of course, sharia law takes over...

As for Kavorkian, he got his name years before he started killing people...as a pathologist, he used to visit dying people so that when he did their autopsy it would be more "interesting"...so the nurses called him Dr. Death...

by boinkie on Fri, 01/06/2006 - 23:41 | reply

re Kavorkian liked to see people dead

So what?

When Alan Turing was convicted of homosexuality, he worried that people would use the syllogism:

Turing thinks that machines can think.
Turing sleeps with men.
Therefore machines cannot think

You are using the identical logic:

Kavorkian thinks that people have the right not to be tortured.
Kavorkian liked to see people dead.
Therefore I have the right to torture people.

You have the right to use your deep insights into history and psychology to run your own life, but not other people's.

by a reader on Sat, 01/07/2006 - 02:12 | reply

Cameron For Slavery

The civilisation of the West, led by Great Britain, was the first in history to outlaw chattel slavery. We should be proud of this achievement, but not complacent. Any institution that allows one person to use violence or the threat of violence to cause an innocent person to work, is slavery, and all slavery is evil. Some forms of slavery survived long after its formal abolition. For example, military conscription is slavery. So is compulsory schooling.

Now David Cameron, the new leader of the Conservative Party in Britain, has decided that he wants to make community service for school leavers compulsory. He wants to extend the period for which the government enslaves schoolchildren. And he has descended from 'for their own good' or even 'national emergency' as the ostensible justification, to 'servicing others'. In other words, from convincing oneself that the institution is something other than slavery to the insolent self-righteousness of the pre-Enlightenment slave owner who has never for an instant thought to doubt his ownership of the lives and persons of other human beings.

The Liberal party (then known as the Whigs) were at the forefront of the anti-slavery movement in the late 18th and early 19th century. Today their nominal heirs, the Liberal Democrats, have abandoned all trace of liberalism (in the original sense of advocacy of liberty). They make no exception in regard to slavery. Their leader Charles Kennedy responded to the plan by saying the Liberal Democrat Youth Taskforce was already exploring a similar scheme.

"David Cameron wants to portray himself as a liberal but needs to be careful to attribute his 'ideas' to those who are genuinely doing the fresh thinking," he said.

Young people were forced into National Service in Britain from 1939 to 1960, so this idea is about as fresh as a fifty-year-old barrel of fish. Moreover, it is grotesque that politicians are now fighting over who is more 'liberal' by claiming ownership of the abomination.

Mr Cameron said that this scheme stemmed from the Party's belief in "trust and responsibility". Obviously Mr Cameron does not trust young people with responsibility for their own lives. And we do not trust him to use power responsibly.

Fri, 01/06/2006 - 11:39 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

The government enslaves school

The government enslaves schoolchildren? What exactly is your definition of slavery? I thought school was optional.

by a reader on Sat, 01/07/2006 - 06:34 | reply

In My Words

Forcing children to do school, among other things, "for their own good", is, at least explicitly, about helping them (to overcome their innate wickedness).

Forcing children to help others is about, at least explicitly, exploiting them for labor.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/>

by Elliot Temple on Sat, 01/07/2006 - 09:04 | reply

Children

While I generally agree, I wonder about the importance of any correlation between significant intrusive parenting and the long adolescence characteristic of our species. Perhaps there is some advantage at work.

by Michael Bacon on Sun, 01/08/2006 - 00:34 | reply advantage?

I am hard pressed to imagine an advantage to keeping people from fulfilling their potential by societal habits. Isn't adolescence a construct of society? Once a person develops the ability to reproduce, aren't they really an adult? We have created ways for people to not reproduce- that is societal- so that people can spend more time learning and growing before taking on the responsibilities of parenthood, but it is possible to have babies and continue to learn and grow, with support which is better if it respects autonomy and is not of the 'significant intrusive parenting' variety, babies or no.

by a reader on Wed, 01/25/2006 - 17:16 | reply

Adult?

Once a person develops the ability to reproduce, aren't they really an adult?

So a sterile person can never 'really' be an adult?

It is fallacious to try to extract moral information from biological categories in that way.

by Editor on Wed, 01/25/2006 - 17:32 | reply

Adult?

Isn't biology destiny, to some extent? Isn't morality inescapably intertwined with this destiny?

How to define "adult"? We can do so biologically- where "sterile" is an aberration from normal biological development- and we can do so through societal construct.

I suppose the societal way is by law, to decree when one is adolescent (and thus justifiably subject to significantly intrusive parenting, including the nanny state schools) and then the transformative moment when one becomes an adult.

I don't want to dismiss the possibility out-of-hand, but I am wondering about the possible advantage that Michael Bacon speculates exists, to the extension of the intrusion of authority into adolescent lives.

by a reader on Sun, 02/05/2006 - 15:05 | reply

Deterrence

President Chirac of France, under pressure to justify the expense of the French nuclear deterrent, today revealed that French strategic missiles have been reconfigured to allow less-than-devastating retaliatory strikes. He also declared that the use of these weapons will be among France's options if "regional powers" should sponsor terrorist attacks against France.

On the face of it, this is a robust announcement and a sensible increase in France's military flexibility. But its underlying philosophy nevertheless dates back to the Cold War, and may be completely useless against the "regional power" against which it is primarily directed: Iran. Solomania recently invited us to consider the 500,000 plastic keys that Iran imported from Taiwan in the 1980s, and what they were used for. Thus it may be that all Chirac has done is inform the criminally insane leadership of Iran that (1) no action will be taken until after any devastating terrorist attack; (2) 'deniable' attacks will provoke no response; and (3) any response will be strictly limited and therefore ultimately survivable (by the regime).

With Iran, there is no substitute for prevention. However, France is unlikely to suffer any consequences for this logical defect in their defence posture, because of the strategic ace of trumps that Chirac did not mention because he did not need to: France will not be the first target of any mega-attack, nuclear or otherwise. By consistently distancing itself from the United States' and its allies' war on terror, and from Israel's self defence, France hides behind those countries.

Thu, 01/19/2006 - 13:35 | digg | del.icio.us | permlink

Explain Please

France is making a mistake by being unwilling to join Britain, the US, Israel, and other countries in advocating military action to preempt nuclear attack.

But how does making weapons with "less than devastating" effects, in addition to having weapons with "devastating effects", prevent France from being willing to preempt nuclear attack?

Isn't the issue that French leaders seem not to have the moral fiber to aggressively attack terrorism. Flexible military responses are good. Perhaps the US and Britain, if we do not have such capability, should get this ability, as well.

I honestly don't understand how a flexible military prevents preemptive attacks. How are these concepts related?

by a reader on Fri, 01/20/2006 - 15:45 | reply

Re: Explain please

As we said, having a more flexible military is a sensible thing. Unfortunately, for the reasons we gave, the measure is unlikely to have any effect, particularly when combined with France's established policy of always waiting to be attacked first ('deterrence') and always opposing the United States and its allies.

The US and Britain do have such capabilities – as does France: this was a relatively minor adjustment.

by Editor on Fri, 01/20/2006 - 16:34 | reply

So your point is that France

So your point is that France is pretending to help by making announcements about deterrence, but these announcements serve as a smokescreen that obscures their actual inaction.

by a reader on Fri, 01/20/2006 - 20:44 | reply

France

It is precisely the point that France understands that it hides behind the front line countries. It mistakenly hopes that by appeasing Iran it will forestall attacks. It hopes to make more likely an outcome where "France will not be the first target." This tactic is primarily short term -- an attempt to buy time for the social dislocation associated with the recent riots to subside. In all likelihood events are going to pass them by and force another difficult choice sooner rather than later.

by Michael Bacon on Tue, 01/24/2006 - 03:45 | reply

hiding

i was looking through the CIA world factbook today and noticed south korea has a 20bil military budget while north korea has 5bil. so why does south korea need our help, exactly? sigh

-- Elliot Temple

Now Blogging Again

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 01/24/2006 - 06:56 | reply

Off-topic reply to Elliot.

Counterintuitively, a simple numbers to numbers comparison of military budgets is not a valid comparison of the two Koreas relative expenditures and efforts. NK has a GDP of 40 billion. Therefore, if the 5 billion number is to be believed, 1/8 of all NK expenditures are defense related. In comparison, South Korea has a GDP of close to one trillion. 20 Billion is only 2.5% of their GDP. Further, North Korea has a standing army of close to 1 million, in a nation of less than 25 million. Keep in mind also that, as North Korea is a Communist nation, their expenditures are necessarily going to be lower than South Korea's for similar items. Trade unions do not exist, nor does competitive bidding or rapacious defense contractors. South Korea doesn't have a vast army of enslaved people upon which to draw for "free" labor.

Those things being said, I think that it would be a good idea for every country where the US still has a military presence, Korea, Japan, Germany etc. to shoulder a larger share of their own defense burden instead of shifting it onto the back of the US taxpayer

by dpatten on Tue, 01/24/2006 - 15:34 | reply

Leftist Bias Of Right-Wing Bloggers

Elliot Temple has detected some crude anti-capitalist assumptions, normally associated with the left, in much of the recent right-wing criticism of Google's deference to the Chinese government.

Sat, 01/28/2006 - 11:53 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Ah, yes, the evil talk. Isn't

Ah, yes, the evil talk. Isn't it just so clear who the evil is in this saga? Is it any wonder that when a corporation is trying to do business under the rules of the Big Brother, who the evil really is? It is the Party, not Google. Google is playing the game. That may be a mistake, but not evil. Google's mott is "do not be evil" not "fight the evil". We must fight the evil, but not with Google, the corporate; but with Google, the search engine.

by Babak on Sat, 01/28/2006 - 19:56 | reply

Who is Big Brother?

So Google isn't evil, they're just following the rules of Big Brother. And Google doesn't have to fight evil, only 'we' have to fight evil. But who is Big Brother, and who is 'we'?

That Chinese official who told Google what to do, is he Big Brother? No. He's just someone following the rules of Big Brother. So is his boss. And his boss. So you say it's not their job to fight. And his boss, and so on up to the President. There is no Hitler or Stalin at the top in China, there's no one who can give the order to stop, and no one whose job is to fight.

On the other hand, who is 'we', who you say do have to fight? Readers of this blog? All good people? Wouldn't that include Google executives? And Chinese officials?

By the way, I agree with the post they linked to. I'm asking these questions seriously, not rhetorically.

by a reader on Sat, 01/28/2006 - 22:31 | reply

Re: Who is Big Brother?

FWIW I think your questions are good, and that questioning whether Google did something wrong is perfectly legitimate.

I don't have a full answer, but I have some pieces:

It is OK for Google to trade with China in general. This is not like selling them weapons. They could even use Google already if they wanted.

What is worrisome to me is that Google is doing some of the enforcement of censorship for China. Note: I'm not sure how much work Google is really doing for China in this way, because they must already have code to censor results (they do it for rare things in other countries I've read). If the code is already there, turning it on may have been trivial. Still, lending the Chinese access to some of the power of Google's code matters (China is worse at writing code. Free people make better creative products.)

If Google wanted to fight China, I'd cheer for them, but I don't see any requirement that they do. They are making the world better just by providing search. In fact, they help enable the lives of other people who do want to fight against China. (To clarify what I mean, grocery stores also count as helping enable our China-fighters.)

Something we don't know is how committed Google is to working with China, or how ready to pull out if China starts demanding more things. When I try to imagine myself in charge of Google, I would not be very scared to work with China as long as stopping was a good option (if China demands more, or the original stuff turns out more problematic than expected). By trying it, Google can learn more about whether this is good to do. On the other hand, if it was hard to stop, or I feared I'd lose control of the company to people who Don't Get It soon (including if I happened to die and the next people in line were dumb), I'd be much more inclined to stay away.

-- Elliot Temple

Now Blogging Again

by Elliot Temple on Sun, 01/29/2006 - 01:43 | reply

Impending Holocaust Watch

Mere Rhetoric comments on the alliance between the genocidal terrorists of Hamas and the genocidal government of Iran:

The nightmare scenario has now become a reality that could happen in half a year: Iran will get a nuke, and they will give it Hamas. Hamas will smuggle it into Gaza, then into the West Bank, and then into Tel Aviv.

Of course, that is only one of several modes of attack open to Iran. Defences exist, but none is even remotely reliable enough to risk millions of lives on. A determined nuclear attack will succeed.

Millions of people will die. No doubt, the State Department and European diplomats will express their "concern" and "shock" about the "unacceptability" of this act. Who knows – maybe they'll even threaten to impose sanctions on Iran.

Actually, they won't, because at that point, two things will have changed from the present situation. One is that Iran will both possess nuclear weapons and have demonstrated a propensity to use them in a way that neither the best defences nor the most resolute deterrence could prevent. Hence half-measures will no longer seem plausible. Only the most abject appeasement or all-out war will have any supporters. The other is that the world will no longer be able to hide behind Israel. Jews – the world's perennial canary in the coal mine – will have duly died in vast numbers in order to deliver a final warning to civilisation. Civilisation will heed it, or not. Either way, the estimate of 'millions' dead in the aftermath is absurdly optimistic.

Today, before all that happens, there are still some other options left. Unfortunately, none of them can be guaranteed to be entirely peaceful. Unfortunately, too, the pathetic British Foreign Minister has ruled them all out in a single sweeping remark: Straw rules out threat of military action against Iran. Fortunately, the people and government of the United States are not that stupid.

Sun, 01/29/2006 - 16:37 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Stephen M. Walt

In my opinion we are being played, and rather effectively at this point. The Iranian president is skilfully prodding the U.S. with the nuclear power stick, using Israel as an unwilling shill and winking at other countries that would like to see us as fools exposed. The U.S.A. is the big bad Goliath of nuclear power who holds all the weapons and all the peaceful means of uranium production according to this scenario. Taunts and goads and sniggers, wink wink.

Effectively done to the peril of the entire world, Iran is playing its cards as would David with the deadly slingshot.

For a perceptive view of our stumbling response, playing Goliath all too well, and to add some deft ideas of nimbleness for big feet, you might read "Taming American Power: The Global Response to U.S. Primacy". It helps to see our scripts through the eyes and agile danger play of the little guys.

by a reader on Sun, 01/29/2006 - 21:31 | reply

We are being played rather effectively

So, the Iranian leaders are just pretending to be genocidal lunatics even though they are not, in order to provoke a stumbling response and expose 'us' (not including you, presumably) as fools. Is that correct?

by Editor on Sun, 01/29/2006 - 22:56 | reply

We are being played

Genocidal lunatic or not, and I think not, the president of Iran is playing this card rather effectively. All of us, including me, are fools if we do not study in some depth what this man is trying to do with his rhetoric and his actions. He has managed to capture a world audience on our media dime and the english speaking world among us is only some of his audience. Remember too this might be one of the student captors of the U.S. hostages during the 1979 fiasco that suddenly resolved itself after the presidential election.

Fool me once. I do take the political maneuvers of these language games seriously. The point is to read carefully all the public statements and the internal histories to see the strategies which are definitely diplomatic ones, crazy and dangerous as they may be. Watch the players, including Russia, China, as well as the muslim world. Remember that David was the little guy, not unlike the role this guy would scheme to play.

by a reader on Mon, 01/30/2006 - 02:11 | reply

Re: We are being played

Genocidal lunatic or not ...

So you say he has fooled us (possibly including you) into believing X about him, whereas in reality, X is not true of him and Y is. Could you clarify? What are X and Y?

You misunderstand?

It is not about him but rather the questions of where he seeks, gleans and gains his rising power from. I do not know what you believe about him or if that is directly relevant to this discussion, though genocidal lunatic sounds like too easy a label to me. Nor is it that we are fools. You may have misunderstood my point.

This is about hearing fully the intents of the rhetoric which obviously have several different audiences and how to deftly blunt and parry those effects. There is a long history to this and especially various turns of power, religion, and secular influence over the last 35 years within Iran, not the least of these the devastating war with Iraq. Iraq is no longer a threat to Iran, and the current Iranian regime sees an opportunity to gain regional power and influence, perhaps be the leader of the Shia Muslim world and a broadened Arab power base.

If we are to better understand these shifts and factions and influence them to our own best interests we must not let the current regime, as represented by this so-called genocidal lunatic, play their best hands. David unto David, or several Davids with Israel among them will need to take skilful action.

We all need to take a new and careful look at strategies, military action and diplomatic alliances among them. The U.S. and in this case Israel must not stand alone or appear to act alone. Read the book for at least one different perspective, and definitely study the events and influences of the last 35 years within the region and Iran. As to rhetoric, read it at face value but also look for the layers of power broking and multiple intents within.

This is not about fools, it is about perceiving unified strategies and evolving skilful actions which are directly suited to these rapidly changing and therefore dangerous and opportune times.

by a reader on Mon, 01/30/2006 - 17:09 | reply

Re: We are being played

You have said that we are being 'played'. Does that not entail our being deceived by the player?

by Editor on Mon, 01/30/2006 - 19:26 | reply

Still a Threat

The Iranian leader is likely trying to strut about on the world stage in order to enhance his credibility. Yes, when the US takes his bellicosity seriously, it enhances his credibility amongst fanatics.

But this motive of the Iranian leader does not preclude Iranian production of a nuclear weapon which can be smuggled into Tel Aviv. Whether fanatics are more drawn to Iranian leaders or not because of US condemnation, the United States, Israel, and all free peoples must prevent the explosion of a nuclear weapon in Tel Aviv, at virtually any cost.

Western Europe and the United States are next.

by a reader on Mon, 01/30/2006 - 23:14 | reply

Straw's an ass

What he should have said is, "We are trying to negotiate a peaceful end to this dilemma so that the Americans don't settle it for us." I have no problem with my country being used as the stick to get someone to accept the carrot. We call it "negotiating from strength" and it's been successful in the past. To bad one idiot took it upon himself to piss it away.

by a reader on Fri, 02/10/2006 - 14:42 | reply

Iran's Last Chance

Iran has been given its last chance to comply, Britain's Foreign Minister Jack Straw sternly warned today:

Mr Straw said an agreement between Britain and the other five permanent members of the United Nations security council that any action against Iran should be delayed until March gave Tehran the opportunity to come back into compliance with western demands.

It will also give them the opportunity to continue their nuclear weapons programme. Which will they choose, and why?

By coincidence – or perhaps it was some sort of clerical error, Iran was also given its last chance in November 2005: EI Baradei: Give Iran 'One Last Chance' Before Sanctions:

The decision to refer Iran to the UN Security Council could come on Thanksgiving Day, when the IAEA Board of Governors has its next scheduled meeting to discuss "new information" discovered by inspectors in Iran, the officials said.

EI Baradei discussed a potential "face-saving" deal European negotiators could offer Tehran during meetings with U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice in Washington

Iran's previous last chance had come in October 2004: Iran Given Final Nuke Chance:

Giving Iran one last chance to avoid the threat of U.N. sanctions, Britain, France and Germany will offer nuclear fuel and economic incentives at a meeting Thursday in return for assurances the Tehran regime will suspend uranium enrichment.

This followed their earlier last chance in September, 2003: Europe and US united in tackling nuclear Iran:

the US ambassador to the UN in Vienna, told the board: "The facts already established would fully justify an immediate finding of non-compliance by Iran.

"We have taken note, however, of the desire of other member states to give Iran a last chance to stop its evasions."

How will Iran respond to the world's consistent and united stand?
And how will it respond to the next last chance it will receive, in March 2006?

Wed, 02/01/2006 - 14:31 | permalink

Copyright © 2006 Setting The World To Rights

Britain Fails The Town Square Test

Islamists have been displaying their customary rage, this time ostensibly over the publication of cartoons in a Danish newspaper, Jyllands-Posten, that depicted the prophet Mohammed. The cartoons were mildly satirical; one of them implied that Mohammed would be a suicide bomber, or at least approve of them, if he were alive, and another depicted a cartoonist being terrified to draw Mohammed. It should be noted that:

- No comparable Islamic rage has ever been expressed when Islamic media worldwide publish the same allegations with approval. Nor when Islamic political leaders do the same – for instance the Hamas government of the Palestinian Authority, or the leaders of Iran.
- None of the cartoons in any way incited violence or hatred. You can see them here, and if you do, you should compare them with the incitement documented here.
- Adherents of Muslim religions are of course free to adhere to their religious prohibition against making images of Mohammed. But they have no right to require this of adherents of any other faith or atheists. Making and displaying such images is a fundamental human right. Nor is it in any way immoral, or even insensitive, to exercise this right.
- According to some commentators (we are not experts on the theory and practice of Islamic law), this prohibition is not always enforced with great zeal in Muslim countries, even fanatical ones. It is worth looking at this collection of images of Mohammed through the ages, none of which has caused riots or threats of murder.

When asked about the cartoons, the foreign minister of one country praised his own press for not re-publishing the cartoons, and bitterly attacked the media in other countries for doing so:

"Re-publication of the cartoons has been unnecessary, it has been insensitive, it has been disrespectful and it has been wrong."

In that same country, Islamists protested outside the Danish embassy. Many of them carried signs making death threats all those who "insult the Prophet". Two counter-demonstrators, protesting in favour of freedom of speech, carried cartoons of Mohammed. The police arrested those two. None of the people carrying signs inciting violence were arrested.

The country in question was Britain. This is bad news. The demonstrators were, as the Conservatives have said, unequivocally and perfectly seriously committing incitement to murder. The victims are quite rightly terrified and in hiding. Failure to prevent or punish the crime of incitement to murder, especially when committed in a political context, is poison to a democracy. Britain is already failing Sharansky's town square test.

Sun, 02/05/2006 - 12:53 | digg | del.icio.us | permlink

I imagine this lot are the Da

I imagine this lot are the Daily Mail readers of the Muslim world. They just love to be pissed off at something. Further, I think the bother would have gone away if not for media naval gazing. If someone is complaining about a use of free speech, don't film or write a report on them.

I feel sorry for the cartoonist(s). All this attention, and they were pretty crap. To have your life threatened over satire is one thing. To have it threatened over such piss poor satire is quite another.

But that's religions for you. I understand Christians were joined by a few Muslims protesting Jerry Springer: The Opera. Praps that's who issued the death threats there, too.

On the other hand, a moment's reflection would tell those who reprinted the pictures that it would only mean more trouble. Free speech, yes, but I can make plenty of arguments for it (and defending it) without wearing a 'Moses/Jesus/Mohammed/Buddha Is A Cunt' t-shirt.

by Kid eh on Mon, 02/06/2006 - 01:33 | reply

Brave Men

Here is a link to an interview with 3 very brave Muslem men, former terrorists, one of whom says that it is too dangerous for him to live in Britain because he believes he would be attacked by fellow Muslims for daring to condemn terrorism (he now lives in the United States).

by a reader on Mon, 02/06/2006 - 23:49 | reply

Re: Brave Men

Indeed, they are brave and decent men, bearing witness to something important. Readers should watch the video. This eyewitness report by IsraPundit of another event attended by the same three men (who are apparently no longer Muslims) is also interesting.

by Editor on Tue, 02/07/2006 - 00:40 | reply

When will the free world finally wake up?

I completely agree. It is a shame that the appeasement continues in the face of such blatant and shameful fascism.

Here is another good article written by a muslim Iranian woman.

Your links about the former terrorists was amazing. It is awesome to see people stand up and return to humanity from the edge of darkness.

Thanks.

by AIS on Tue, 02/07/2006 - 06:46 | reply

Download Video

If you want to save the interview linked above to disk, the file is located at: shoebat.com/media/cn8_2006_01.wmv

-- Elliot Temple

Now Blogging Again

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 02/07/2006 - 16:35 | reply

Some relevant linx

<http://forum.newspaperindex.com>

<http://www.filibustercartoons.com/archive.php?id=20060204>

http://www.zombietime.com/mohammed_image_archive/

http://www.dailystar.com.lb/article.asp?

edition_id=10&categ_id=5&article_id=21654

<http://www.muslimrefusenik.com>

<http://www.iranian.com/Azizi/2006/February/Cartoons/index.html>

<http://tinyurl.com/dl2dm>

<http://suralikeit.com>

<http://www.apostatesofislam.com/>

<http://www.faithfreedom.org/>

<http://www.secularislam.org>

<http://www.infidels.org/library/modern/theism/islam/>

<http://islamreview.org/>

<http://www.geocities.com/freethoughtmecca/islam.html>

by Solan on Tue, 02/14/2006 - 11:24 | reply

Norway

The Norwegian government's lack of spine has had one interesting consequence: The people themselves are growing spines! Norway has had a law against blasphemy since before the 1814 constitution, and now people are suddenly starting to realize what such a law protecting religious intolerance means. So ... it seems it will go away. Wahoo!

So the net result of this whole incident may indeed prove to be positive, because most people realize how silly it is to burn embassies over drawings as innocent as these.

I tried to send you a bunch of good URLs on this some days ago, but your "spam filter" must have eaten them. Please check the spam bin.

by Solan on Fri, 02/17/2006 - 08:31 | reply

Copyright © 2007 Setting The World To Rights

A Coincidence

According to a poll, one in five Americans believe in alien abductions.

The National Institute of Mental Health estimates that one in five Americans experience mental disorders during any one year.

We are sure this is a coincidence.

Wed, 02/15/2006 - 03:21 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Coincidence?

It is presumably not purely a coincidence: both groups rounded their numbers using the same convention of what numbers to round to.

-- Elliot Temple
Now Blogging Again

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 02/15/2006 - 11:19 | reply

Aliens being abducted

Well, I believe aliens are being abducted in Iraq. Or do you mean aliens as in from other planets? Oh well, what should we care if those aliens are abducting each other, as long as we humans are left alone. It's only time to get worried when we start hearing reports of human abductions.

BTW, the existence of alien beings has been proved beyond reasonable doubt. You see, the distinguishing characteristic about aliens is that they are very good at hiding and hence completely undetectable to us primitive humanoids. Now has someone ever really seen an alien? Absolutely not. From the very fact that we have not been able to detect aliens, by way of induction it is confirmed that there are indeed undetectable aliens out there. For had they not been undetectable, surely we would have seen them. So their invisibility exactly proves the fact that invisible beings exist.

Henry Sturman

by Henry Sturman on Wed, 02/15/2006 - 14:16 | reply

Either, or

One in five experience mental disorders in any one year.

Either it's the same one in five, in which case the science of psychiatry is ineffective, or nearly ineffective.

Or it's a random one in five, in which case most of us are mentally ill for about a fifth of our lives.

Or some combination of those.

The results of the other study suggest it's always the same one in five. Therefore psychiatry is ineffective.

by a reader on Wed, 02/15/2006 - 15:45 | reply

Damnable Aliens

One in five Britons believe in alien obstruction.

The other 80% have no problem with the prospect of protological exam.

God save the Queen.

by a reader on Sat, 02/18/2006 - 23:35 | reply

Velostat instead of aluminum foil.

Stop alien abduction.

by EW1 on Mon, 03/06/2006 - 03:29 | reply

Isn't it about 1 in 5 who bel

Isn't it about 1 in 5 who believe in Creationism and who want to outlaw abortion as well?

by Solan on Wed, 03/15/2006 - 08:44 | reply

Physicists?

Probably about 1 in 5 physicists believe that there are billions of David Deutsch's in parallel universes!

by a reader on Mon, 03/20/2006 - 22:31 | reply

Re: Physicists?

Fewer than one in ten, would be my estimate.

Of course, the other nine also believe in alien abductions, so draw your own conclusions ;)

by David Deutsch on Mon, 03/20/2006 - 22:57 | reply

Irony or just more dumb Americans

The statistics read that more than one in five Americans believe in God, So I'm presuming that a good many of these Christians claim to be abducted by Aliens? I guess anytime ever wouldnt be a great time to tell them that their faith is now so questionable, that it would be more logical to worship the Almighty ET, than God.

by Emma Flavell on Tue, 03/21/2006 - 00:39 | reply

Physicists Abducted in Multiverse

Single Universe physicists believe aliens abduct (shadow) photons, but not physicists.

But multiverse physicist believe aliens abduct human physicists (in certain universes) but not photons!

by M. Golding on Thu, 03/23/2006 - 19:40 | reply

Who Tortured The Host? Who Are The Enemies Of Islam?

To modern perceptions (though certainly not to those of people at the time) one of the most bizarre forms of antisemitic blood libel popular in the middle ages was that of torturing the Host. According to this, Jews would break into churches at night and torture the consecrated communion wafers (known as the Host) which, according to the Catholic doctrine of transubstantiation, are literally the body of Christ. As the Jews hammered nails into them, the wafers would scream and bleed. The Jews would be delighted that they were crucifying Jesus yet again, and would use his blood, which had magical properties, for nefarious purposes. Many Jews were themselves tortured and executed for this crime. None ever committed it.

Since this myth was an exclusively Christian manifestation of antisemitism, what does it have to do with the idea of the 'enemies of Islam'? On the face of it, nothing.

Yet the underlying logic is similar. In order to believe that Jews torture the Host, one must first believe that Jews know that the Host is literally the body of the living Jesus. But that is tantamount to their knowing that the Catholic religion is true. And indeed, the idea that The Jews know that Christianity is true but wilfully reject it was itself a staple of Christian antisemitism. It is a conspiracy theory that would require Jews to be lying about their own religious beliefs, in a way which, as we have discussed here, would have made it impossible for those beliefs to be propagated to the next generation. The Host-torturing libel was even more incoherent because it implied that Jews were materially relying upon, and risking their very lives in order to witness, a miracle predicted only by a rival religion and contradicting their own. Unfortunately, philosophical incoherence has seldom been much of a handicap when it comes to religious doctrines.

Today, the Islamists' narrative in regard to the 'enemies of Islam' is as follows. First of all, of course, Islam is the true religion. It is also destined to spread to every nation on Earth. Why? Because that is what God in His omnipotence has willed. On a level playing field, this spread would happen rapidly and peacefully. Unfortunately, the leaders of other religions, and the demonic leaders of the West, know this and are afraid. They seize upon (or invent) every possible excuse to kill Muslims, weaken and subjugate Muslim nations, and sow mindless hatred of Muslims among the ignorant masses of their own countries. That makes those leaders 'enemies of Islam', and Muslims are obliged by their religion to respond violently to them. In this holy war, Islam is destined to prevail.

To Western apologists for Islamist violence, some of that narrative is familiar and congenial. The inherent violence of the West, the baseness of its motives, its guilt and responsibility for the evils of the world, the explanation of history as being driven by a grand conspiracy among its 'rulers', and the fraudulent nature of its apparent success, are all themes of the basic left-wing narrative too. However, the leftist apologia for Islamist violence is that it is caused by Western oppression, and that the Islamists' specific beliefs are a mere rationalisation for their desperate lashing out: a different indigenous culture would have resorted to similar violence but attached different words to it. But to the Islamists themselves, their religion is not an 'indigenous culture' but the unique, universal truth. Their violence is a focused and moral response to a coordinated attack on their religion which was caused by their enemies' knowledge that that religion would otherwise sweep the earth.

But in reality their 'enemies' have no such knowledge. No one, other than Muslims, has believed anything of the sort for several centuries now. After all, the Islamic religion, which at its height managed to overtake Christianity in terms of numbers of believers, nowadays stands at closer to half, with the majority living in jurisdictions where the mildest criticism of it is savagely punished and converting to a different religion carries the death penalty. To a believing Muslim, it is not relevant that the Islamic empire passed its peak over five centuries ago, nor that Islamic nations are decades or centuries behind Western ones in terms of wealth, military power, scientific progress, cultural creativity, and every other measure that is conceivably relevant to which of them is likely to become the global civilisation. In modern times it simply does not occur to anyone without faith in Islam, that Islam will peacefully sweep the world unless it is violently stopped. But Islamists pathologically assume that it is a fact known to everyone, but opposed by the wicked, just as believers in the host-torturing myth thought that some of the supernatural attributes of Jesus were known to, but opposed by, Jews.

In reality, medieval Jews cared nothing about the doctrine of transubstantiation, and therefore did not, in reality, lie awake at night obsessing about the Host – until, presumably, it began to be used as a pretext for murdering them. Likewise, President Bush and Mr Blair do not lie awake worrying about who is going to convert to Islam next. Indeed, they were entirely unconcerned with Islam – until September 11, 2001. Just as it was sheer fantasy that medieval Jewish religious practice centred around the truth of Christian doctrines and a desire to hurt Jesus, so it is sheer fantasy that fear of the peaceful spread of Islam, and a grand historic plan to hurt Muslims, are at the heart of Western leaders' political philosophy. But unfortunately, as incoherent fantasies go, both of these are exceptionally nasty and dangerous ones.

There are, no doubt, some enemies of Islam who wish to spread some other religion – perhaps because it, too, contains a supernatural promise that it must inevitably triumph – or who are simply bigots. But they are of no significance in world events. Who tortured the Host? No one. And the 'enemies of Islam' in the sense envisaged in the Islamists' narrative simply do not exist either. There are only people who fear the Islamists' unjustified, conspiracy-theory-driven violence.

Note: For further thoughts on the relevance of the Host-desecration myth to present-day political issues, see this interesting article.

Sat, 02/25/2006 - 15:08 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

"Since this myth was an exclu

"Since this myth was an exclusively Christian manifestation of antisemitism[...]"

How do you infer that this is a consequence of antisemitism? Is burning a witch a sign of antisemitism? Or killing a hairy man, supposed to be a werewolf, a sign of antisemitism? And how come you have such an "exclusive" point of view? Tell me the truth, do you like to label things more than anything in your life? Or is it one of your greatest pleasures in life? You know, we have so many doctors who treat us when we are sick, maybe we should have some doctors who can tell us how to use our on capacities, both physical and mental, in a normal. It's just that the school does not suffice these most miserable days.

Go out, see the sun, watch the birds, find some friends and enjoy life (ask your grandparents how to do this, if you have no idea). You need it!

by a reader on Tue, 02/28/2006 - 17:41 | reply

Carnival of the Vanities

Thanks for submitting your post, it's listed at this week's Carnival of the Vanities

by M on Wed, 03/01/2006 - 06:20 | reply

a consequence of antisemitism?

It's not clear what point you are making, but it is certainly true that, as Bernard Lewis recently remarked:

[I]t is perfectly possible to hate and even to persecute Jews without necessarily being anti-Semitic

On the other hand, if someone in good faith doubts that, for instance, the Normandy landings were part of the Second World War, or that Michelangelo's David was sculpted as part of the Renaissance, then the most efficient thing from everyone's point of view is for that person simply to learn more about the war or the Renaissance. No amount of explanation about the specific event could suffice.

So in this case too, there is a large-scale historical phenomenon called antisemitism, of which the host-torturing myth is a part. The way to understand that is to learn more about antisemitism as a whole. One might begin by looking here.

by Editor on Wed, 03/01/2006 - 10:01 | reply

Nice work

I'm usually harshly critical of the opinions expressed in 'The World', but this one makes an excellent and too-readily-overlooked point: That the Muslim outlook on (we could say 'theory about') the world is not 'just like ours but with different names for things' but that they take the entire content of their religion with the utmost seriousness. Even moderate Muslims believe their holy book to be the absolute truth. They perceive criticism of or 'slights' to their religion to be appalling and grossly immoral, not because they take place against a political background of widespread injustices against Muslims, but intrinsically evil in themselves.

So what should be done? Well there's only so much that 'we' can do, but we're not doing it. For instance, it seems to me that in treating enemy 'combatants' (even the lowliest 'foot soldiers') so incredibly badly - throwing them into tiny, bare cells; mistreating/torturing them; denying them legal representation etc. with only a Qu'ran for comfort (!), this can only reinforce the impressions Islamists have that (a) the West is evil and (b) the West secretly knows that Islam is true.

by a reader on Sun, 03/05/2006 - 10:29 | reply

How do you infer that this is a consequence of antisemitism?

Well, let's see. Since that's the single most intelligible sentence of your post, suppose we deal with that one first. There is this little thing that reality based people call the historical record. It's recorded that Jews were subject to persecution by Christians for 'renouncing' the Messiah.

That Jews were persecuted for this supposed slight against G-d, while others who didn't believe in the Christian miracle weren't, is called "antisemitism."

Ergo, it's a rather short path from observing that Jews were persecuted for a supposed crime against G-d (that would never occur to them to commit in the first place) to recognizing that the motivation was antisemitism.

As to the rest of your post, you really, really need to cut back on the pharceuticals.

by EW1 on Mon, 03/06/2006 - 02:49 | reply

Copyright © 2008 Setting The World To Rights

Trying Tyrants

Slobodan Milosevic, former strongman of Serbia, has died in a prison cell in The Hague, four years into his trial for war crimes and crimes against humanity.

He died of a heart attack after the Court denied him permission to travel to Russia for medical treatment. By putting up a spirited and intelligent defence, he had had considerable success in manoeuvring himself into the role of victim, and international justice into the role of oppressor. To his supporters and sympathisers, his death under these circumstances will lock that psychological victory in place.

For comparison (procedurally only, there being no comparison between the defendants) the trial of Adolf Eichmann lasted only four months. It is hard to see why it was necessary for Milosevic's to take twelve times as long with no end in sight. In any case, there can seldom, if ever, be a justification for putting people on trial whose guilt takes over four years to prove beyond reasonable doubt – for a policy of doing so will necessarily waste over four years of the lives of defendants who are eventually acquitted, which is surely oppressive.

In 1923, the Nazis under Adolf Hitler tried to overthrow the German government by force. They failed and he was tried for treason. But the judges allowed him to use his trial as a political soapbox and so turned it into not only a mockery of justice but a potent means of building support for the next attempt, which succeeded without a shot being fired.

Saddam is less smart than Milosevic and guilty of far worse crimes. He and his defence team have been trying silly tactics to gain political advantage from his trial. For instance, his lawyers walk out and then claim that the court is depriving Saddam of the right to lawyers of his choice. Or Saddam stands up and starts making speeches. The new presiding judge has been refusing to allow these tactics, and he is quite right. In this trial, the defendants' political theories are totally irrelevant. They could not possibly supply any excuse for the defendants' alleged actions or evidence that they did not commit them. So the judge should not tolerate such tactics even when the defendants are in the witness box.

Update: See Mark Steyn's take on the conduct of the Milosevic trial and its relevance to Saddam's.

Sat, 03/11/2006 - 12:50 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

>>In any case, there can seld

>>In any case, there can seldom, if ever, be a justification for putting people on trial whose guilt takes over four years to prove beyond reasonable doubt – for a policy of doing so will necessarily waste over four years of the lives of defendants who are eventually acquitted, which is surely oppressive.

You have previously argued that it is acceptable to lock people up indefinitely without any trial at all if the crime they are accused of involves "Organised political violence using lethal force". Now you say a far lesser action, simply taking four years over an actual trial, is oppressive. Surely a contradiction?

by a reader on Thu, 03/16/2006 - 12:19 | reply

link please

where did the world argue that exactly?

-- Elliot Temple

Now Blogging Again

by Elliot Temple on Fri, 03/17/2006 - 00:10 | reply

Re: Organised political violence using lethal force

That was our working definition of war here. Not crime, war.

by Editor on Fri, 03/17/2006 - 00:28 | reply

Surely Milosovich's actions c

Surely Milosovich's actions count as acts of war. So is it oppressive to lock people up indefinitely or not? And if not how are the actions taken against Milosovich oppressive?

by a reader on Fri, 03/17/2006 - 13:52 | reply

Milosevic

Yes indeed, it is beyond reasonable doubt that Milosevic waged war. Had he been captured during that war, and were there a serious danger that he would wage war again if he were released, it would have been justified to hold him indefinitely, without trial, as a prisoner of war. Once the war, and that danger, can reasonably be deemed to be over, then all that could be justified would be to give him a prompt and not excessively long trial, and then imprison him only if he is found guilty beyond reasonable doubt of a criminal offence. Waging war is not criminal, so the mere fact that he did that would not be reason enough to imprison him, but waging it in certain ways is.

by Editor on Fri, 03/17/2006 - 14:13 | reply

The war is still going on, in

The war is still going on, in the sense that there is still plenty of politically motivated lethal violence in the Balkans between Serbs and other ethnicities. Had Milosovich been released he would certainly have rejoined that war at least in a political or propaganda roll. So do you accept that he could have been held as a prisoner of war?

It seems to me your formulation above is appropriate only to conventional wars, not to inter-ethnic wars like those in the Balkans or global political wars like that between Islamists and the west. These wars may go on for generations, and are unlikely to last less than decades, so someone suspected of involvement can be imprisoned for the rest of their life without trial. A policy which will necessarily waste the lives of those wrongly suspected of involvement, which is oppressive.

by a reader on Fri, 03/17/2006 - 15:51 | reply

Chris Tame

Just FYI, and not connected to this post at all:

<http://mutualist.blogspot.com/2006/03/chris-r-tame-rip.html>

Sad news. But you probably know already.

by Solan on Tue, 03/21/2006 - 13:53 | reply

Freed, Any The Wiser?

This is a point that is bound to be made all over (the sane parts of) the blogosphere today, but it deserves to be made again.

Three so-called 'peace activists' who had been kidnapped by the very terrorists in Iraq for whose cause they had gone there to campaign, were freed today by British and Canadian special forces whom they vilify as criminals.

They have been given their freedom, no doubt at some slight risk to their own lives (though, in the event, their captors had fled by the time of the rescue), and potentially at great risk to the lives of their rescuers. They pronounce themselves "delighted" to have been granted exactly what they have devoted their lives to denying the Iraqi people.

Thu, 03/23/2006 - 15:00 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

How had they "devoted their lives" to denying the Iraqi people freedom?

Are you still seriously contending that the Iraqi people are any freer now than under Saddam?

by a reader on Fri, 03/24/2006 - 02:07 | reply

What?

The locusts stripping Iraq bare are insulted. General Sir Michael Jackson, a Bloody Sunday criminal, a Kosovo war criminal and now a loyal goon in the mobbing of Baghdad, told ITN that he was "saddened that there does not seem to have been a note of gratitude for the soldiers who risked their lives to save those lives". ITN arranged a phone-in programme about the release of Norman Kember and the Christian peacekeepers who were with him. The question: "Do you believe Norman Kember was right to put his life in danger for the sake of the Iraqi people? Or, do you believe he's been irresponsible?" Such a question has its own pre-written answers. It calls upon ingrained cultural prejudices, sullen racism, resentment against do-gooders, those who have the temerity, the audacity, to actually consider the lives of Iraqis worth protecting and respecting. The answers: "What did he hope to achieve by going to Iraq? Our troops are already there to keep the peace!" "He put the lives of our troops in more danger." "How much has his rescue cost the taxpayer?"

Asked to comment on the rescue of Briton Norman Kember, readers of Britain's Daily Telegraph generally excoriated Kember and the two Canadians as "irresponsible." A typical email read:

"No civilian has a 'right' to enter a war zone to protest that war or dig up stories of abuse against the soldiers who are fighting it. These same soldiers must then go in and rescue these ridiculous people from certain death at the hands of their captors and risk their own lives doing it."

Terry Waite, whose own saintliness is matchless, has been called upon to question the tactics of the Christian peacemakers. And the Telegraph reports, Released hostages 'refuse to help their rescuers'. For The Times, the release of the hostages underlines "the warning against naive attempts by well-intentioned Western peace activists to ignore Iraq's brutal politics and risk their lives."

Forget, if you like, that these peacemakers and pacifists specifically request that no military action is undertaken to release them in the event of a kidnap. The phoney excuses for this campaign of vilification are an affront to human intelligence. Heroism played no part in their release, unless you consider the folding of the mercenary group that held them an act of heroism. No risk - none at all - befell the troops who went in to the place of captivity and found the three hostages sitting alone and unguarded. If the activities of a group intent on protecting the human rights of Iraqis invites greater risk for the troops there, what does this say about the conduct of the troops? The crime, for these snivelling wretches, these utterly pathetic whiners, is to locate evidence of and draw attention to the crimes of the imperialists, to be insufficiently grateful to the warmongers, to refuse to be pliant and play the role of saps, media darlings who will testify to the brutality of Iraq, shower praise on the hired thugs, and tell tales of woe and regret. Surely, what General Jackson should ask for is an apology, not thanks. An apology from the irresponsible elements, the unruly pacifist dreamers, who dared to interfere with so delicate and responsible an operation as the pillaging of Iraq. The only Christian do-gooders welcome in Iraq are Franklin Graham's proselytisers, the Islam-is-evil cult that fulfils the historical mandate of the civilising mission. Christians for Bush, in short. Billy Graham led Bush to Christianity, Franklin delivered the invocation at his inauguration, and the missionaries they have dispatched to Iraq sanctify the holy war against evil, testify to its virtuosity, salute the brave boys and girls who bring death to the Lord's enemies, and fervently await the glorious rapture that is sure to come now that Israel has been established for almost sixty years into the age of television. Only they, with their masturbatory fantasies of Divine Genocide, are meritorious, they who will either convert the untermenschen or say amen and bow their heads respectfully as the Lord's conduits crush them. Christians for peace? Christians for human rights? Christians against racist war? Christians against the apocalypse? Don't you know how irresponsible that is?

<http://leninology.blogspot.com/>

by a reader on Sat, 03/25/2006 - 11:05 | reply

Serious?

Yes, we seriously believe Iraq is now more free than under Saddam. Why do you think we'd post things we don't seriously believe?

-- Elliot Temple

Now Blogging Again

by Elliot Temple on Sun, 03/26/2006 - 09:41 | reply

Belief

You believed Saddam had WMD. It had remarkably little effect on the facts.

And, of course, those who are factually wrong are usually morally wrong.

You can put your head back in the sand now.

by a reader on Sun, 03/26/2006 - 10:49 | reply

Re: Belief

You believed Saddam had WMD.

Good point. So presumably you believed he didn't. You managed to see through his deception better than all the governments of the world (including his). What was your method?

by Editor on Sun, 03/26/2006 - 12:42 | reply

Re: Method

A good start is this rule of thumb: Q.How can you tell if a political leader is probably lying to you? A. His lips are moving. That being said, are you any the wiser for your mistakes? I don't see a lot of soul searching going on here, more of a retreat into your own fantasies.

by a reader on Sun, 03/26/2006 - 13:21 | reply

Piece of piss

1) I checked to see if the US were planning on invading. They were. I compared the situation to the handling of North Korea.

2) I listened to Ritter and Blix. Then I looked at the US and UK try to scrape together (and fake) evidence.

3) Then there's Saddam's "Oh, I have no WMD, nudge nudge, wink wink" bluffing when the US army is on his doorstep.

Pretty obvious, really.

It's amazing (if a little disheartening) to see libertarians such as yourselves swallowing (and so eagerly!) so much government cock.

by a reader on Sun, 03/26/2006 - 13:32 | reply

Re: Method

Your method of seeing through Saddam's deception, namely to assume that all other politicians were probably lying, depends on their knowing the truth before you do. Are you claiming that most of the politicians in the world knew that there were no WMD stocks in Iraq but lied about it? Or were some of them fooled by the others?

by Editor on Sun, 03/26/2006 - 13:54 | reply

Neither

Sadly, my psychic powers aren't as sharp as they once were. What goes on in the minds of politicians, we can only wonder. Not for too long, or it starts to get a bit worrying.

by a reader on Sun, 03/26/2006 - 14:30 | reply

Oh, and

"Your method of seeing through Saddam's deception, namely to assume that all other politicians were probably lying, depends on their knowing the truth before you do."

No it doesn't.

BTW, I do like your way of blogging/thinking. Arguments can be argued with, whereas a statement of opinion expressed firmly enough - and with absolutely no argument - can often be taken in as solid fact. Interesting, in a chin-stroking/pipe filling sort of way.

So, make yourself comfortable and tell me about your mother. Did she perhaps have an unpleasant experience with nuance whilst carrying you?

by a reader on Sun, 03/26/2006 - 14:37 | reply

WMDs

Why is it everybody is assuming Bush etc. were wrong about the WMDs? Just because they haven't been found in Iraq? There are reports (e.g. here and here) SH simply moved them to Syria just before the invasion.

Henry Sturman

by Henry Sturman on Tue, 03/28/2006 - 09:40 | reply

Think

IF Bush and co actually thought the WMD were there, and had done a disappearing act, don't you think they'd be just a little bit jumpy right now? Getting (then) 12 year old info off of t'net, removing caveats and not noticing when a number of papers scream 45 MINUTES UNTIL WMD ARMAGEDDON! to point out you were talking about normal armaments.

My, the government just loves you.

'Just before the invasion'

He has the World's Largest Army [tm] on his doorstep and in his duckpond. Spyplanes are (and have been for years) everywhere. 'Simply'? SIMPLY?

by anon on Fri, 04/07/2006 - 19:59 | reply

They did risk their lives

The rescuers did in fact risk their lives.

by a reader on Sun, 04/16/2006 - 00:18 | reply

Global Warming Warning

Something sinister is happening in the field of climate science. No, this time we do not mean their discovery that the Planet is Doomed (again) unless the governments of the world embark on an emergency orgy of concerted spending and regulation on a scale that dwarfs all precedent.

Some of the so-called climate-change 'sceptics' – not political stooges or cranks, but bona fide, competent scientists who, as is commonplace in science, disagree with the consensus in their fields – have been sounding an alarm. In a recent disturbing article Prof. Richard Lindzen (who is the Alfred P. Sloan Professor of Atmospheric Science at MIT) says that

Global-warming alarmists intimidate dissenting scientists into silence

Similarly, Prof. Bob Carter, a geologist engaged in paleoclimate research at James Cook University, Queensland wrote recently:

There are other reasons, too, why the public hears so little in detail from those scientists who approach climate change issues rationally, the so-called climate sceptics. Most are to do with intimidation against speaking out, which operates intensely on several parallel fronts.

The intimidation is presumably not perfectly effective, since Lindzen and Carter are speaking out. Indeed, recently sixty "leading scientists" wrote an open letter to Canada's new Prime Minister urging withdrawal from the Kyoto Treaty. Nevertheless these claims of intimidation from scientists are extremely bad news. Discovering the truth is hard. This institutions of science forbid intimidation and other forms of irrationality not merely for the comfort of scientists. It is because even small amounts of certain pathologies in the scientific process can completely halt progress, or worse, create the semblance of authority for illusory discoveries.

The issue of climate change, its causes and effects, is a highly technical one about which we at The World do not have the relevant expertise to be capable of passing judgement. The trouble is that the climate-science community, by casually or deliberately politicising its field, is increasingly destroying its own standing to advise the rest of us. And if the truth emerges from such a process, we shall be very lucky.

Wed, 04/12/2006 - 23:24 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Centigradients

Your point is that the whole area of climate change science is fraught with politicization? No surprise there. Is the world getting warmer relative to measurements of previous decades? Yes it is. Fascinating! I have only one political/economic question. What parts of the world are getting drier and windier and wetter, and does this mean I should be more careful in my choice of where to live? I hear the British Isles may be getting much colder if the Gulf Stream shifts. Until the science gets better or at least more agreeable, I think I'll hedge my bets and stay in a warm lush place on slightly higher ground. I won't worry then about the politics of global warming or climate change.

by a reader on Sun, 04/16/2006 - 17:34 | reply

politicisation of research

It isn't just the obvious candidates (climate change, heritability of IQ, evolution) that have become highly politicised within academia. Egalitarian ideology is creeping into every subject area. What is 'fair' or 'just' is taking precedence over what is true. Ends are taken to justify means. Hence, whatever the truth behind global warming (and it may well be much worse than even the scaremongers are saying) there seems little reason to trust official pronouncements. If things are unclear enough to require academic guidance, there will always be room for biased interpretation of the data. Who is there now who still stands up for principles such as objectivity (supposedly a bourgeois illusion, according to post-structuralists) or free speech?

by culturesceptic on Thu, 05/18/2006 - 09:24 | reply

More About The Ungentlemanly Act

We once criticised the attitude of the present-day Argentinean government and people towards the Falklands war of 1982.

We have now replied to a recent comment on that thread.

Sat, 04/22/2006 - 11:34 | permalink

More Optimism Needed

Recently a student found plans for a nuclear powered interplanetary space vehicle developed by British Rail in 1970-73. This vehicle would have used nuclear fusion initiated by lasers as its power source.

Cynical 21st-century folk rubbished the idea:

"I thought it must be a joke at first," the student who found the plans said yesterday. "It is amazing that British Rail actually developed these plans. They obviously believed people would be transported around space to different planets in the future..."

We, on the other hand, are astonished that there exist scientifically literate people who believe that they won't.

Michel van Baal, from the European Space Agency, based in Holland, said: "I have had a look at the plans, and they don't look very serious to me at all. It is based on a fusion process that doesn't exist yet and if it would, would need an unbelievable amount of energy..."

And this objection does not look serious to us. Does a spokesman for the European Space Agency really think that because the vehicle would be powered by a fusion process that does not yet exist, the designs for it are worthless?

Mr van Baal has ruled out in advance a possible means of reducing the cost of space travel not because of evidence but because of pessimism.

It so happens that physicists at Berkeley are working on producing nuclear fusion using lasers and making this technology commercially viable. Suppose that Mr van Baal is right and this technology can't be used for space travel. Then by investigating its viability we shall rule out one possible means of interstellar travel and focus our resources elsewhere. And if he is wrong then this investigation will lead to improved space travel. If humankind does not spread out into the universe then sooner or later we will be destroyed by an asteroid or some other catastrophe. Optimism will not guarantee survival but it is the only possible route. Pessimism will certainly destroy us.

If only the mainstream institutions of today had the optimism – and the gumption – displayed by British Rail in 1970.

Tue, 05/02/2006 - 20:30 | permalink

Why don't we have the same op

Why don't we have the same optimism and gumption today? What happened?

-- Elliot Temple
My Blog

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 05/09/2006 - 20:59 | reply

British vision for space travel powered by fusion

We have become mentally lazy, is what. Not only is this sad, it spells doom for us as a species. Perhaps the controversy about nuclear power in the eighties is what derailed further development of this technology as well. Too many people tend to dismiss technologies out of hand, when problems with them develop.

by P Smith on Sat, 05/20/2006 - 15:04 | reply

Why do you think people have

Why do you think people have become mentally lazy? (not saying i disagree, just asking what you think the cause is)

-- Elliot Temple
My Blog

by Elliot Temple on Sat, 05/20/2006 - 17:42 | reply

Optimism

Optimism is a wonderful thing but vigilance is to.

by Richard Hernon Jr. on Sat, 05/27/2006 - 01:54 | reply

Mixing Incompatible Scare Stories

A charity called Buglife has apparently warned that

Rare insects that are vital for pollinating crops and feeding birds are threatened with extinction because of the Government's determination to build on brownfield sites.

An insect species can be rare, or it can be vital for pollinating crops and feeding birds. It cannot be both.

One wonders whether journalists even read their own scare stories. Or is it just a case of: if it's scary it must be true; if it's technology it must be bad.

Fri, 05/12/2006 - 12:44 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Glad to see The World back...

...it was missing for a couple of days there.

by Solomon on Sat, 05/13/2006 - 01:04 | reply

Re: Glad to see The World back...

Thanks!

Hardware problems ☹

by Editor on Sat, 05/13/2006 - 01:27 | reply

Bottom of the barrel

The government has severely curtailed the development of greenfield sites in response to environmental concerns and now the protestors want to limit the redevelopment of polluted ex-industrial sites as well? On a scale of conservation value, as far as such value exists at all, brownfield industrial sites are the bottom of the barrel. Even as an environmental scare-story this one is beyond lame. That they feel inclined to clutch at such straws probably says more about how good the world is getting rather than how bad it is.

Leigh

by a reader on Mon, 05/15/2006 - 14:46 | reply

Maybe they mean this

An insect species can be rare, or it can be vital for pollinating crops and feeding birds. It cannot be both.

Maybe these very particular birds they're speaking of need only minute amounts of this insect to survive. Just like we humans need a few micrograms a day of certain minerals to survive. In that case a population of say 1000 insects might be enough to keep say 20 million of these birds alive.

: -)

Henry Sturman

by Henry Sturman on Mon, 05/15/2006 - 14:56 | reply

Iranian Noose Tightens

No, not the non-existent 'Western pressure on Iran' to abandon its headlong rush to commit genocide. We are referring to the new national uniform for men that has just been provisionally approved by the Iranian Parliament. Iranian women are, of course, already subject to a draconian dress code. Among other things, the new dress code for men would prohibit Western clothing such as suits.

Neckties are already illegal under Iran's existing dress code. Nooses, ironically, are not. Even for teenage girls.

We invite comments making the usual facile comparisons between Iran's national uniform and some European countries' ban on headscarves in state schools. Or between the United States' death penalty for aggravated murder, and Iran's death penalty for sassy teenagers.

Mon, 05/15/2006 - 17:12 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

It's true that teenage sass i

It's true that teenage sass isn't as bad as aggravated murder, however it's a much more widespread problem, so that justifies harsh measures to get it under control. I propose the US follow Iran's progressive lead on this issue.

-- Elliot Temple

My Blog

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 05/15/2006 - 20:05 | reply

Nooses, ironically, are not.

Nooses, ironically, are not. Even for teenage girls.

Are you implying (by using the word even) that hanging an innocent teenage girl is worse than hanging, say, an innocent thirty year old man? If so, why would children's rights be more important than those of adults?

Henry Sturman

by Henry Sturman on Mon, 05/15/2006 - 21:42 | reply

Re: Nooses, ironically, are not.

Are you implying (by using the word even) that hanging an innocent teenage girl is worse than hanging, say, an innocent thirty year old man?

No, the word 'even' was part of the jocular irony comparing neckties with nooses: usually the dress code would be most severe for young women, but in regard to wearing nooses they are equal-opportunity executioners.

However, hanging a child for trifling reasons is morally even worse than doing that to an adult. Both are equally murderous. But the former, in addition, violated the greater duty of care that the perpetrators (the legal system as well as everyone concerned in the execution) had towards a child defendant/victim.

by Editor on Mon, 05/15/2006 - 22:25 | reply

Nazi Dress Code

It appears that the dress code is not merely for Muslims:

See <http://www.canada.com/components/print.aspx?id=11fbf4a8-282a-4d18-954f-546709b1240f&k=32073>

Perhaps this will cause more of an outcry because it is designed to affect Christians as well as Jews.

by Michael Bacon on Fri, 05/19/2006 - 14:10 | reply

Or praps not. <http://www.c>

Or praps not.

<http://www.canada.com/nationalpost/news/story.html?id=6626a0fa-99de-4f1e-aebe-bb91af82abb3>

<http://www.940news.com/locale.php?news=2511>

http://www.heraldsun.news.com.au/common/story_page/0,5478,19196947^1702,00.html

I love you guys.

by Jamie's Magic Torch on Sat, 05/20/2006 - 14:33 | reply

Love?

Because of my earlier comment, I assume I'm included in "you guys." If you mean you love me because ideological "blindness" incline me to assume the worst regarding the theocratic Iranian regime, and that this leads me (as it may have done in the dress code case) to condemn Iran based on incorrect specific evidence (although by all initial appearances the story was legitimate), then I think in general you are right. This is certainly my bias. On the other hand, if you somehow mean this as an ironic defense of the Iranian regime, whose crimes and behavior toward its own citizens and threats against others is well documented, unchallenged and often trumpeted by the Iranians themselves, then I think you've clearly lost the magic touch.

by Michael Bacon on Sun, 05/21/2006 - 15:18 | reply

Lurve

I love you because if I don't, who will?

I have no magic touch, not now or ever. The magic was in Jamie all along. But he believed I was a Magic Torch, and hey presto!

I'd very much like to bring some light to your lives, but I've found it to be pointless until those blinders are gone.

You've got to keep digging until you're not standing on anything. And then you need the strength of mind to realise you're not falling, but floating.

by Jamie's Magic Torch on Tue, 05/23/2006 - 20:01 | reply

Mixing Incompatible Atrocity Stories

The logic of the farce that we commented on recently under the heading Mixing Incompatible Scare Stories has now repeated itself in the form of tragedy.

US Representative John Murtha has made a series of allegations about a reported atrocity by US Marines that is currently being investigated by the Marine Corps:

"There was no firefight. There was no IED that killed these innocent people. Our troops overreacted because of the pressure on them, and they killed innocent civilians in cold blood," Murtha said.

[...]

"They actually went into the houses and killed women and children,"

A Marines spokesman said: "Any comment at this time would be inappropriate and could undermine the investigatory and possible legal process." Yes indeed, and Murtha's decision to prejudge the outcome in public is reprehensible for that reason alone. It is an abuse of his position for him to purport to know, at this stage, not only that a crime was committed and who was guilty, but the underlying causes of the crime too – especially as they happen to fit his agenda that the war is an unwinnable quagmire. But our point here is different.

Did the troops "overreact because of the pressure on them", or did they "kill innocent civilians in cold blood"? It cannot be both. Murtha did not say (in the CNN video clip linked by that article) what the nature of the pressure was that he says turned these men into mass murderers. But whatever he meant, if that was the explanation it would reflect badly, perhaps criminally, on everyone in the chain of command that ordered them into the situation. It would also mean that the murders were not in cold blood. That Murtha should make both allegations in the same breath shows that, like the environmental journalist we quoted before, he is not interested in what the facts are. But unlike the journalist, he has done this over an issue of life and death.

If by "cold-blooded" he meant intentionally cruel, then you're right. But "cold-blooded" can also mean without feeling or emotion. If one accepts that mental pressure brought on by war can desensitize your emotions, then there is no inherent contradiction in his statement.

I have no idea how he thinks the pressure in this war differs from any other war. If his point is that if this war wasn't unjustified and such an unwinnable quagmire, then these soldiers would never have felt the pressure that caused them to kill innocent civilians in cold blood... well, that would be a tough allegation to back up.

by a reader on Thu, 05/25/2006 - 16:15 | reply

An Uncanny Resemblance?

The case of the house broken into by armed police officers in London on Friday, resulting in the shooting of one of the occupants, is beginning to bear an uncanny resemblance to that of the invasion of Iraq:

Intelligence behind raid was wrong, officials say

Senior counter-terrorism officials now believe that the intelligence that led to the raid on a family house last Friday in a search for a chemical device about to be used to attack Britain was wrong, the Guardian has learned.

[...]

"There is no viable device at that house. There is no device being constructed, or chemicals. There does not appear to be anything there or anywhere else."

Soon we'll be hearing from our holy men that the raid was illegal, immoral and unwise, from the legal profession that it was a war crime, from the press that Blair lied, and so on. They'll make up stuff as needed – you know the sort of thing.

No doubt they'll all be very very angry with the Government for having raided a house that contained no weapons of mass destruction. Would they have been any less angry, we wonder, if the men arrested had nevertheless been mass murderers with 300,000 bodies buried in their cellar? And an entire nation held hostage in the attic? Presumably not.

Tue, 06/06/2006 - 01:25 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Would bodies be listed on the

Would bodies be listed on the warrant?

by a reader on Tue, 06/06/2006 - 08:56 | reply

Re: Would bodies be listed

Would bodies be listed on the warrant?

No.

Are you referring, by analogy, to the failure of Blair and the Bush Administration, prior to the invasion, to cite Saddam's murders as justifications for it?

by Editor on Tue, 06/06/2006 - 17:52 | reply

Uncanny Resemblance?

I think the police acted prudently in the circumstances and should not be faulted. It appears that the decision to raid the house was taken not only because there was intelligence regarding a bomb device and the like, but also because the intelligence indicated an immediate threat.

As the linked article stated: "It is understood that attempts to corroborate the information were not made because of the perceived need to act quickly. '[i]f there was an immediate risk to public safety, there would not have been time to bug the house,' an intelligence source said. A counter-terrorism official said: "If the intelligence was right there was a serious risk to the public. We did not know if it was right or not until we went in."

Iraq, on the other hand, while looking similar on the surface, is a different case. In the house raid situation, there should never be any disagreement that it's always proper to carry out such a raid if intelligence indicates an immediate threat to the public safety. The same holds true for situations like Iraq. However, even the most ardent supporters of the Iraq action did not really try and make the strong case that Saddam's WMDs were an immediate threat. And, in any event, little would have been lost if a bit more "bugging" had been carried out.

As I have stated in previous posts, I think the war on terror would have been better served by focusing on the near far-east, including in particular Afghanistan, to consolidate influence in the region, to provide a base for the projection of force, and to put pressure directly on the Iranian regime from a more easily defended (militarily and politically) base of operations. Nevertheless, we are where we are and I recognize the need to try and achieve the most favorable possible outcome.

In any event, I don't necessarily think that there is an uncanny resemblance between the two situations. Rather, there is a superficial resemblance.

by Michael Bacon on Wed, 06/07/2006 - 14:47 | reply

Iraq

However, even the most ardent supporters of the Iraq action did not really try and make the strong case that Saddam's WMDs were an immediate threat. And, in any event, little would have been lost if a bit more "bugging" had been carried out.

Can you think of any people on earth that Saddam was an immediate threat to? (nvm whether he was threatening them with WMD or another way). I believe there was something important to be lost by waiting. And besides, we had already waited a long time, and that wasn't improving matters.

-- Elliot Temple

My Blog

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 06/07/2006 - 20:58 | reply

Saddam was a Terror Sponsor

Saddam worked with terrorist groups, including Al Qaeda (Bush knew of links before the war BTW) and Palestinian suicide bombers. So Bush removed a major terror sponsor by removing Saddam. Nor is it likely that effective resistance to Saddam could have been fomented in a Stalinist state like Iraq. Iraq was certainly a valid target and it was very unlikely that anything but an invasion would have got rid of the threat.

by Alan Forrester on Wed, 06/07/2006 - 21:08 | reply

Time Lost?

Elliot,

He was an immediate threat to his own people of course, and to a lesser extent the region. However, assuming one can not always do multiple things at once (particularly where war is concerned), I still do not think that the Iraq action was the best strategic move for the United States to make in the circumstances. I have posted about this before and nothing has occurred that would lead me to change my mind. Moreover, everything else being equal, I don't think the situation that we now face in Iraq would have been materially different if we had waited -- the initial military action, I believe, would not have been materially more difficult, and the insurgency that we now face would not have been materially more deadly. Of course, this is only my opinion, and I can understand how reasonable people could reach a different conclusion from the set of same facts. In any event, I don't think there is an uncanny resemblance between the two situations, and I don't think the police should be faulted for the raid.

by Michael Bacon on Wed, 06/07/2006 - 21:24 | reply

waiting

i agree that as far as i know delaying wouldn't have had huge effects on the difficulty of invading. i don't see that it would have had any good benefits though. i agree this constitutes a flaw in the parallelism btwn the war and the raid.

-- Elliot Temple

My Blog

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 06/07/2006 - 22:28 | reply

Yes, I was making that analog

Yes, I was making that analogy.

I'm guessing that you think the war itself is a Good Thing (positive virtue or utility, or good for liberty, or whatever).

My question is: is starting wars with no sufficient justification not a bad thing, or at least a bad policy, even if the outcome in this particular case be positive?

Also, I mentioned a while ago that your site won't let my browser select the text for cutting and pasting. You (Editor) went all snooty, listing the many browsers you've tested it on. This list did not include Microsoft Internet Explorer, which I'm using, which I'm sure is the most popular, and which you probably knew I was using. I really enjoy your site, so maybe you could have a look at the problem?

by a reader on Thu, 06/08/2006 - 19:23 | reply

Re: Yes I was making that analogy

We wrote:

Are you referring, by analogy, to the failure of Blair and the Bush Administration, prior to the invasion, to cite Saddam's murders as justifications for it?

a reader replied:

Yes, I was making that analogy.

Thanks. Just so we're on the same page, could you provide a link to a speech by Blair or Bush, attempting to justify the proposed invasion, in which they failed to cite Saddam's murders?

by Editor on Thu, 06/08/2006 - 21:34 | reply

Nope. You win!, now go and

Nope.

You win!, now go and fix your website.

by a reader on Thu, 06/08/2006 - 21:41 | reply

(please)

(please)

by a reader on Thu, 06/08/2006 - 21:45 | reply

Analogy

Reader,

I too can not cut and paste on this blog. Don't know why, and it would be much more convenient if I could, but don't take it personally.

Whether the war has been a "Good Thing" depends on how you define the term. As Alan pointed out, Saddam was certainly more than worthy of removal: countless murders, mayhem and more are attributable to him. If he could have developed WMDs he would have. Removing him from power has certainly been a good thing in a very real, concrete sense.

I, however, simply make the utilitarian argument that there were better things to do, and that since you can't do everything, it makes sense to do the things that help to more directly achieve strategic objectives. I don't believe that the Iraq action served this purpose nearly as well as others things we could have done.

This is an argument that reasonable people can disagree with -- but it seems right to me. However, in no event should we downplay the seriousness of the threat we face -- nor pretend that military force is some abstract "last resort" in our battle to combat these threats.

by Michael Bacon on Fri, 06/09/2006 - 01:07 | reply

Copying

The site uses only standard HTML and CSS, and we don't do anything to prevent copying. Unfortunately, we have no idea what triggers Internet Explorer's behaviour; if anyone can tell us, we will try to work around it.

by Editor on Fri, 06/09/2006 - 01:36 | reply

I've checked, and it appears

I've checked, and it appears to be this bug:

<http://lists.xml.org/archives/dita-fa-edboard/200602/msg00053.html>

IE will let you select if you put after the base tag at the top of the page.

The discussion there mentions using selective commenting so that only IE looks at the closing tag. This would preserve XHTML well-formedness, but I don't know if it really matters to you.

by a reader on Fri, 06/09/2006 - 08:02 | reply

Thank you, reader

Thank you, reader; we have applied the suggested workaround, and assume Internet Explorer users will now be able to copy text.

by Editor on Sat, 06/10/2006 - 00:48 | reply

Workaround

It works fine now. Thanks much.

by Michael Bacon on Sat, 06/10/2006 - 14:08 | reply

Copyright © 2007 Setting The World To Rights

A Black And White Issue

Via Solomonias:

Why would a movement for black racial purity, in France, which seeks to unite all people with 'pure' black skin and resents lighter-hued people, nevertheless have a soft spot for Islamists (most of whom do not have black skin and some of whom are currently committing genocide against people who do), but pathologically hate Jews, some of whom do have 'pure' black skin?

Fri, 06/09/2006 - 01:02 | permalink

I think you've answered this

I think you've answered this type of question before.

<http://www.settingtheworldtorights.com/node/449>

What doesn't seem logical on the surface, makes perfect sense when examined a little deeper. I think the skin color issue is far from their bottom line, which is a paranoid, conspiracy based world view which tends to find more in common with radical Islam than with similarly hued people that have a very different mindset.

by a reader on Sat, 06/10/2006 - 19:09 | reply

answer

it's because they are bad

-- Elliot Temple

My Blog

by Elliot Temple on Sat, 06/10/2006 - 23:02 | reply

ID Cards And Security

Retired New York City policeman Bruce DeCell gained entry to the headquarters of the US Homeland Security Agency, using an ID card which:

- was forged;
- would not entitle him to entry even if it was real;
- cost him $20 in a California street.

Mr De Cell's experiment illustrated that a security system is only as strong as its weakest link. The British government should take note. If just one criminal finds a way of faking ID cards – through some combination of forgery, hacking of government computers, suborning of one of the tens of thousands of new employees who will be running the system, and so on – then the ID card system will fail. If British police, borders and security services fail to institute systems of checking the cards that are both secure and workable, or if some of them are too lazy to follow those systems scrupulously, then the ID card system will fail.

In fact, the only things that ID cards are guaranteed to do is damage civil liberties by branding all British citizens as suspects and allowing for many new forms of petty bureaucratic oppression, divert the effort and attention of the security services towards ordinary citizens and away from terrorists, cause massive inconvenience, and cost a very large fortune.

Tue, 06/13/2006 - 21:41 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

What Would You Recommend?

Portable iris scanners?

by a reader on Thu, 06/15/2006 - 21:42 | reply

Recommendation

I would recommend looking for people who act like terrorists.

by Alan Forrester on Thu, 09/21/2006 - 21:38 | reply

Iran Would Use The Weapons It Isn't Making

The Jerusalem Post is first with an AP story quoting the Iranian defence minister letting slip the fact that his country's nuclear programme is military, and intended for use:

Iran's defense minister on Thursday vowed that his country would "use nuclear defense as a potential" if "threatened by any power."

But the idea that Iran is merely responding to a threat is a cynical, transparent excuse and is the reverse of the truth. Now surrounded by US allies, Iran is not faced by any military threat from any power, except that caused by the fear that it itself has created, and continues to exacerbate, as a matter of policy. In reality, Iran could dismantle not only its nuclear weapons programme but its entire armed forces tomorrow and not a single harmful consequence would result. On the contrary, there would be prodigious benefits to all Iranians and the whole of mankind.

Teheran has denied accusations by the US and its allies that Iran was seeking uranium enrichment technologies in order to develop nuclear weapons, saying its program was only meant to generate electricity.

These standard denials will no doubt be repeated shortly. Perhaps the minister mis-spoke. Perhaps the AP misheard or misinterpreted. Perhaps he let slip the truth or perhaps he isn't even privy to the relevant information. But the weapons programme is real. And the threat is real, whether spoken or not.

Israel and the Jewish people do not want another Holocaust. America does not want another Pearl Harbour or 9-11 many times over. The world does not want a catastrophic war. What do Iranians (not counting the evil regime and its supporters) want? Is it possible that they, too, are miscalculating? Are they halfway OK with this escalating tension because they reckon that, at worst, they will be liberated by external force without making more sacrifices than they already are? That line of thinking would certainly be understandable but it would be a mistake. People of Iran: for everyone's sake, deny that the tyrants act in your name, and deny them the means to do so. Time is short, and the only alternatives are very bad.

Iran

I have some first hand experience of working with the Iranian state and the one thing I would say is it is difficult for us to comprehend just how paranoid they are. It's the legacy of decades of isolation but also hundreds of years of history and Shia persecution. They have the imagination to see conspiracy and ulterior motives in almost everything. Fundamentally they don't trust anybody.

This is really worrying because you can see why they keep their nuclear ambitions ticking along. It's actually a position very similar to the post Gulf War standoff with Iraq. As far as the Iranians see it they have two choices. (1) Dismantle their programs and allow in inspectors or (2) press on for the bomb and hope they can get there before sanctions cripple them. From a paranoid Iran's perspective all recent precedents say that their best choice is (2). After all the only country to opt for (1) was Iraq while North Korea, Pakistan and India both went for option (2) and they've received little punishment. I know this is a gross simplification of recent events but I fear Iran thinks that everything will be ok once they have the bomb.

Would they use the bomb on Israel?

I don't think they would, at least not in a pre-emptive strike. I hope that even an Iranian theocracy will realise that if they used a nuclear bomb on an enemy it would invite a retaliatory strike of devastating force. It's the principle of mutually assured destruction that kept the cold war cold, kept the skuds CBRN free during the first Gulf war and stopped Nazi Germany using their nerve agents against the allies.

by A new reader on Fri, 06/16/2006 - 12:41 | reply

Re: Iran

Thanks for the illuminating comment.

However:

After all the only country to opt for (1) was Iraq while North Korea, Pakistan and India both went for option (2) and they've received little punishment.

Is is not true that Libya has taken option (1) with great success? And South Africa? And Ukraine, Kazakhstan and Belarus? And all the countries that have not even embarked on a nuclear weapons programme?

by Editor on Fri, 06/16/2006 - 13:50 | reply

Fair point

You're certainly right about Libya I was forgetting about that. It's a good example to remember because the two countries share a few similarities in their circumstances. There certainly wasn't a lot of trust there but Ghadaffi took the leap of faith and it's been rewarded. Maybe we should draft Libya into the negotiating team!

The others are a slightly different type and I'm not sure if you can draw any lessons from them. In each of those there was a regime change (end of apartheid and collapse of the Soviet Union) that predated the decision to disarm. Ukraine, Kazakhstan and Belarus were all left with Soviet sites they couldn't afford to maintain or even secure and the decision to be paid to disarm was an obvious one. I don't mean to belittle the achievement of getting these countries to agree but the problem was made much easier by the regime changes. Also none of the countries thought they were at any military risk. The ex USSR countries were all still in the CIS and protected by Russia (although I wonder if Ukraine wishes it had hung on to a couple of nukes now) and South Africa is economically so far ahead of it's neighbours that it isn't worried.

by a reader on Fri, 06/16/2006 - 14:46 | reply

Unrealistic hope

I think the important point to realize about Iran today is that a fundamental change in the political system from within would be more than the counterparts in Eastern Europe etc. It would be a combination of Greek Golden age revolution, the Renaissance, the enlightenment and the modern political democratic revolutions all wrapped in one because Iran has never really undergone the other periods of growth in the Western sense. If this is true, it should be clear that the hope for such an accomplishment from the people in such short time is unrealistic to say the least.

The intellectuals and the students have gone a long way towards the right ideas and demands but it takes much more time than you realize for this to be absorbed by the mass population. As I said a couple of years before, as far as the majority of people are concerned they are fed up with this system, perhaps for the first time with the over arching traditional and revolutionary interpretations of Islam (and in urban parts perhaps of Islam altogether) but the gap from this to rational systematic movements and demands is still very huge.

The West has no choice but to interfere with Iran to prevent the imminent danger, but that must be clear to all that a regime change is the absolute necessity here. Anything short of that would mean a definite defeat and a huge catastrophe in the long term. However there exists alternatives between internal revolution and outside war. The West can actively engage in forming unrest and guiding it to a outright regime change. Even limited military action can be used to weaken the regime and embolden the population enough to take risks (like in Serbia for example).

But unfortunately I have to say that if you are hoping for an all Iranian solution to this crisis you will be disappointed.

I also agree with the reader above about paranoia in Iranian mindset. It is just one instance of the need for an over all cultural renaissance to really get out of this historical backwardness. I think the point is that that could only come after gradually and after a regime change and not before it given the very little time left to avoid a catastrophe.

As for the Libyan example it won't work in Iran. Iran is ruled by a mafia like ideological oligarchy not a personal tyrant as in Libya. There is constant struggle between the different fraction inside the regime just like between different mafia families. The real power base is the hardliner fanatic bassiji and islamist core (something like 5% of the population though the figure it is basically a guess) who are in it really for the revolutionary zeal. Any kind of deal from any fraction inside the regime will alienate the power base from that fraction to the rivals (as the defeat of Rafsanjani showed once more to the surprise of us all). It would be a great risk for them to go soft now I think, especially after the way this last election went.

by AIS on Sat, 06/24/2006 - 23:23 | reply

The Mid East in general

To trust the Mid East and Muslims in particular has proven to be a major mistake for the west. These backward dumpster dwellers have proven time and time again especially with Israel that they are natural born thieves and liars. I think that they need to have a hurting put on them the likes of which they have never experienced before. It's the only thing they understand.

by Spanky on Fri, 07/28/2006 - 16:35 | reply

Re: The Mid East

natural born thieves and liars

There is no evidence for that racist characterisation of Middle Easterners or "Muslims in particular". On the contrary, the current violence and viciousness of various Islamic movements is clearly an entirely cultural problem, made much worse by tyrannical governments and by the cynicism and often complicity of Western governments.

Also, "thieves" is a misleading characterisation of them, for thieves seek benefit for themselves at the expense of harming others, while Islamists and their sympathisers seek to harm Jews and Americans and the West even when they themselves are harmed much more by clinging to that position.

Consequently, there is no reason to believe that being hurt "is the only thing they understand", or that they would understand it at all, in the relevant sense.

They need to be defeated.

by Editor on Fri, 07/28/2006 - 17:13 | reply

Copyright © 2007 Setting The World To Rights

Those North Korean Missiles

In an amusing reversal of their stereotyped positions, some Democrats, including Jimmy Carter's Vice President Walter Mondale, have called for pre-emptive strikes to destroy North Korea's new missiles. (By the way, do they imagine that the UN would approve these? Would the policy be subjected to that 'test'?) Meanwhile the current Vice President Dick Cheney seems to be dismissing the idea. He even doubts that the weapons exist in the advertised form...

Of course Cheney doesn't want a war with North Korea. It may be groaning under an evil bloodthirsty communist regime, but it has no oil. Right?

Wrong, actually.

Tue, 06/27/2006 - 14:58 | permalink

Shh. You'll give him ideas.

Shh. You'll give him ideas.

by a reader on Fri, 06/30/2006 - 12:24 | login or register to post comments

Doesn't Want To Know

Via Vital Perspective (which, by the way, is doing a good job collating news about the current Israeli hostage-rescue operation in Gaza):

Bear in mind that not too long ago, Annan wasn't even aware that there were rocket attacks against Israel from Gaza.

In the aftermath of the Gaza incident, Prime Minister Olmert spoke by phone with U.N. Secretary General Kofi Annan. Annan demanded an explanation for the Gaza deaths. When Olmert asked why Annan had not shown similar concern about the scores of missiles hitting Israel, Annan was nonplussed. "What missiles?" he asked.

Can it really be true that the Secretary General of the United Nations, the man at the pinnacle and focus of international relations, whose primary role is to promote and maintain international peace and security, was unaware of the hundreds of missiles that have been pouring into Israel from Gaza ever since the Israelis ended their occupation of the territory? Or is it just that he doesn't see anything wrong with that situation?

Wed, 06/28/2006 - 19:40 | digg | del.icio.us | permlink

Perhaps he doesn't think they Perhaps he doesn't think they qualify as "missiles", not being very sophisticated? Just a thought.

by a reader on Fri, 06/30/2006 - 12:22 | reply

Re: Perhaps he doesn't think they qualify

Whether he does or not, that seems an unlikely interpretation of his reported response, because Olmert's question was obviously not about the technology of the weapons. Olmert was comparing Annan's instant, passionate and sarcastic condemnation of Israel following the alleged accidental killings by Israeli artillery, with his lack of any similar response to the murders committed with Qassams, as well as the hundreds of attempted murders of which there are now about a dozen a day. The dead so far have included several children.

by Editor on Fri, 06/30/2006 - 13:02 | reply

Annan's condemnation of Israe

Annan's condemnation of Israel on this matter stems from the blatant one-sidedness of the conflict. It is well to remember that Israel's actions, however you choose to assess them, are conducted with virtual impunity. As Washington's leading client state, Israel inherits the right to do as it chooses. A dramatic illustration of this right, quite relevant to Lebanon, was offered in the USA in 1996. On April 19, there was much anguished commentary on the car bombing at Oklahoma City a year earlier, when middle America "looked like Beirut", headlines lamented.

Beirut, of course, had looked like Beirut long before; for example just 10 years before, when the worst terrorist attack of the period was perpetrated in Beirut, a car bombing timed to cause maximum civilian casualties, virtually duplicated at Oklahoma city. The facts are well known, but unmentionable. That act of terror was carried out by the CIA, a fact that suffices to remove the incident from history along with much else that suffers the same defect.

by a reader on Thu, 07/13/2006 - 14:15 | reply

'Rescue Mission'

"The dead so far have included several children"

Today it was reported in the mass media that Israel's air strikes on parts of Lebanon, which are billed as being part of a 'rescue mission', but which are in fact intended to take a toll on the civilian population so as to force Hezbollah into submission to Israel's demands, have resulted in the deaths of 35 civilians so far, including at least 10 children.

Editor: do you have children? Can you imagine them being destroyed by explosives or falling rubble? I think you should, because having done so you might think twice about taking sides in such an obscene conflict. Here on Setting the World to Rights it seems that one can find all sorts of justifications for acts of war, as long as they are perpetrated by those with whom you agree ideologically.

Just picture this: YOUR children lying broken and bloody in the heap of rubble that was your home. Picture yourself holding one of them to you and screaming at the sky in anguish. Then come back at me with your justifications for acts of obscene and horrific violence.

by another reader on Thu, 07/13/2006 - 14:37 | reply

Re 'Rescue Mission'

It's fairly clear what you are arguing against here, but not what you are arguing for. Is it pacifism (the immorality of all warfare)? If not, could you give an example of warfare that you are in favour of?

billed as being part of a 'rescue mission', but which are in fact intended to take a toll on the civilian population

Who else knows the real intention, apart from you? For instance, are the pilots who launch the missiles aware of it?

so as to force Hezbollah into submission to Israel's demands

And these demands are what?

by Editor on Fri, 07/14/2006 - 09:23 | reply

Demands?

I think Israel's "demands" are well known, and fairly straightforward: recognition of its right to exist and an end to terrorist attacks. Neither Hezbollah nor Hamas are willing to accept either of these reasonable "demands." Neither are their sponsors in Iran and Syria. Anyone who thinks that there is any solution to the killing in the Middle East without recognizing Israel and ending terrorist attacks is sadly mistaken.

by Michael Bacon on Fri, 07/14/2006 - 18:33 | reply

'Who else knows the re

'Who else knows the real intention, apart from you?'

I certainly don't claim to 'know' the real intention. But it is no great mental stretch to infer that blowing up an airport and killing dozens of innocents was not an act that was intended to contribute to any kind of rescue mission. How could that act possibly result in the release of the kidnapped servicemen, except as a demonstration that as long as Hezbollah hold the hostages, Israel will use its superior military might to kill innocent Lebanese. If the Editor can positively demonstrate to me in what other way the tactics of the Israeli army in this 'mission' have contributed to the goal of securing release for the hostages, I will be extremely impressed.

'And these demands are what?'

The release of the hostages, of course.

I would also ask the Editor to explain why he thinks that, in the context of a 'rescue mission', such tactics as have been followed by the Israeli military are in any way excusable, given the civilian death-toll up to this point.

by a reader on Mon, 07/17/2006 - 10:29 | reply

Re: who else knows

I certainly don't claim to 'know' the real intention.

Then you now withdraw this claim?:

Israel's air strikes on parts of Lebanon, which are billed as being part of a 'rescue mission', but which are in fact intended to take a toll on the civilian population...

by Editor on Mon, 07/17/2006 - 10:46 | reply

Israeli tactics

If the Editor can positively demonstrate to me in what other way the tactics of the Israeli army in this 'mission' have contributed to the goal of securing release for the hostages, I will be extremely impressed.

Thank you, but it is not a feat deserving of such plaudits, for how the Israeli tactics are related to that goal is public knowledge.

The problems facing the Israeli armed forces are primarily as follows: the terrorist organisation Hezbollah, which is heavily armed, trained and financed by Iran and Syria, dominates southern Lebanon and from that base has been murdering and kidnapping Israelis. The murder, currently being committed by means of salvoes of missiles aimed at population centres, is done mainly for its own sake, and the kidnapping has the additional intention of forcing Israel to release other murderers, foremost among whom is Samir Kuntar [please read that link if you have not already done so], whom it would be a crime to release.

A severe constraint on Israel's options is that it would be immoral to obtain the release of the current hostages by means that strengthen Hezbollah both materially and in its ideology, and hence cause more hostage-taking and other crimes in the future. In order to have the best chance of rescuing the hostages while at the same time reducing the ability of Hezbollah to commit crimes, Israel is taking military action against Hezbollah. Tactically, the most urgent thing to do is to make it as difficult as possible for Hezbollah to take the following measures: (1) move freely between South Lebanon and safe havens such as Syria and other areas in Lebanon. (2) Obtain replacement supplies of heavy equipment from their sponsors. (3) Move the hostages, especially to Iran but also from place to place in Lebanon. (4) Fire their missiles. (5) Take more hostages. To achieve this, Israel has set up a blockade of Southern Lebanon, and to some extent of Lebanon as a whole. They have bombed the road to Syria, placed warships off the Lebanese coast, and disabled Beirut airport. Within the blockaded area, and also within the Hezbollah-controlled area of Beirut, they have also attacked missile launching sites, missile storage sites, Hezbollah headquarters, and Hezbollah leaders. They have not attacked civilians at all.

Civilian casualties have occurred almost entirely because Hezbollah, like all Israel's enemies, exploits the matchless moral scrupulousness of the Israelis by systematically using civilian human shields. Israel has warned Lebanese civilians to evacuate certain areas temporarily, and is giving them time to leave, precisely in order to minimise casualties among them.

by Editor on Mon, 07/17/2006 - 11:31 | reply

"...the matchless moral scrup

"...the matchless moral scrupulousness of the Israelis"

So the Israelis are an intrinsically morally scrupulous people? Unlike Arabs?

The current Israeli offensive in Lebanon, much like those of earlier years, has the intent of punishing the civilian population so that the government of Lebanon will be compelled to accept U.S. - Israeli demands. It is this "rational prospect, ultimately fulfilled, that affected populations would exert pressure for the cessation of hostilities" that has always motivated Israel's attacks on civilian populations, Israeli diplomat Abba Eban explained years ago.

What moral creed worth a gobbet of spit allows the killing of children as a regrettable effect of the enemy's locating himself amongst innocents?

by a reader on Mon, 07/17/2006 - 12:31 | reply

Accept U.S. - Israeli Demands?

Reader,

What are these terrible demands that Arabs in the region would be forced to accept? Recognition of Israel and an end to terrorist attacks? Aren't these prerequisites for any substantive negotiations aimed at achieving an overall settlement? Perhaps you believe that these are phony demands. If not, can't we agree that, short of Israel's surrender, the fighting won't end until these "demands" are met?

by Michael Bacon on Mon, 07/17/2006 - 13:45 | reply

Matchless moral scrupulousness

The "rational prospect, ultimately fulfilled, that affected populations would exert pressure for the cessation of hostilities" [...] has always motivated Israel's attacks on civilian populations, Israeli diplomat Abba Eban explained years ago.

That is a lie propagated by Chomsky.

"What moral creed [...] allows the killing of children as a regrettable effect of the enemy's locating himself amongst innocents?" The answer is, of course, all of them, depending on circumstances – with one exception: pacifism. And pacifism is immoral because it is an abdication of the responsibility to defend oneself and others.

(The circumstances include, for example, some of those where all options have the killing of children as regrettable consequences.)

Moreover, the worse the evil being faced, the more immoral pacifism is.

by Editor on Mon, 07/17/2006 - 15:21 | reply

Err, that's Syria, not Israel

The Golan Heights, like much of Israel, are occupied territories. Given the number of UN resolutions calling on Israel to return to it's 1967 borders, I'm sure Mr Annan, no matter how senile he appears at times, is aware of what's going on.

Given the frequent illegal incursions of Israeli soldiers onto sovereign Lebanese soil, I think that the use of the word hostage is incorrect - try Prisoner of War. Or perhaps you would prefer illegal combatant?

by El Bizarro on Tue, 07/18/2006 - 09:08 | reply

Re: Err, that's Syria, not Israel

One of the essential features of the rule of law is that one can't just make up laws on the spur of the moment and require others to obey them - or pretend that they have been enacted. And that holds even in the nebulous and ambiguous field of international law.

In reality, the UN Security Council has never passed a resolution such as you describe. References to the 1967 border have always been qualified with phrases such as 'based on' and 'secure and recognised'. Israel is a sovereign state, and Hezbollah's and Hamas's cross-border bombardment and hostage-taking across internationally recognised borders are naked aggression under any conception of international law. Israel is defending itself against that. Syria has been at war with Israel ever since it and the other Arab states rejected the UN partition of Palestine in 1948. Israel has been defending itself against that aggression, which is openly in defiance of the UN Charter - but which you seem to endorse by referring to 'much of Israel' as 'occupied territory' - and which has frequently been openly genocidal in intent. Preventing genocide, as Israel was forced to do in previous wars, is compulsory under international law. Occupying territory during a defensive war is not contrary to international law. For these and many other reasons the IDF are lawful combatants and Hezbollah and Hamas are not. You can argue otherwise, redefine self defence as itself being genocide, redefine hostages as legitimate prisoners of war, redefine any warfare by Israel as being aggression, only by means of special pleading that would suffice to define anything as anything. Hamas and Hezbollah redefine Jews as being murderous sons of pigs and apes engaged in a massive sinister conspiracy to rule the world, but that doesn't make it so.

by Editor on Wed, 07/19/2006 - 11:42 | reply

Re: matchless moral scrupulousness

The Israelis constantly boast of their 'surgical' or 'pin-point' precision in air attacks. If this is true, then there are far too many civilians being killed in the Lebanese bloodbath to make every one of them an accident.

True, Hizbollah are killing civilians in Israel, but their missiles are innacurate and the West, which has done no more than mildly disapprove of Israel's retaliatory onslaught, must surely expect higher standards of the Israeli armed forces than of the terrorists.

Why, for example, did the Israelis attack and destroy the headquarters of the Liban-Lait company in the Bekaa Valley, the largest milk factory in Lebanon? Why did they bomb out the factory of the main importer for Proctor and Gamble products in Lebanon, based in Bchmoun? Why did they destroy a paper box factory outside Beirut? And why did Israeli planes attack a convoy of new ambulances being brought into Lebanon from Syria yesterday, ambulances which were clearly marked as a releif aid convoy? Were all these 'terrorist' targets? What of the convoy of villagers from Marwaheen in Southern Lebanon, ordered to flee their village by Israeli troops, and subsequently attacked by an Israeli F-16 fighter-bomber, killing at least 20 people, many of them women and children, one of whom, a girl of about eight, was photographed lying dead in a pile of rubble (a picture which has been published in British newspapers today)? Were all these 'terrorist targets'?

How can you continue to defend these war crimes?

by a reader on Thu, 07/20/2006 - 12:30 | reply

How can we defend war crimes?

We can't and we aren't.

You ask many questions. Please state the answer that you believe to be true, to just one of them.

by Editor on Thu, 07/20/2006 - 17:20 | reply

Nasty Bastards

You seem to be implying with your question that Israelis are nasty bastards who want to hurt people.

If that is so, can you explain why they haven't done a hell of a lot more? Nothing is stopping them militarily. And you have said they already do bad things and the West hardly complains.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/blog/>

by Elliot Temple on Thu, 07/20/2006 - 19:52 | reply

Questions answered, and nasty bastards

Editor - a rather cowardly way to avoid answering difficult questions.

Oh well, here's what I think:

"Why, for example, did the Israelis attack and destroy the headquarters of the Liban-Lait company in the Bekaa Valley, the largest milk factory in Lebanon?"

Because they are targeting Lebanon in the most inexcusably indiscriminate way. Why? Because that's exactly what Hizbollah are doing, and Israel is punishing the people of Lebanon for that crime.

"Why did they bomb out the factory of the main importer for Proctor and Gamble products in Lebanon, based in Bchmoun?"

See above.

"Why did they destroy a paper box factory outside Beirut?"

See above.

"And why did Israeli planes attack a convoy of new ambulances being brought into Lebanon from Syria yesterday, ambulances which were clearly marked as a relief aid convoy?"

See above.

"Were all these 'terrorist' targets?"

No.

"What of the convoy of villagers from Marwaheen in Southern Lebanon, ordered to flee their village by Israeli troops, and subsequently attacked by an Israeli F-16 fighter-bomber, killing at least 20 people, many of them women and children, one of whom, a girl of about eight, was photographed lying dead in a pile of rubble (a picture which has been published in British newspapers today)? Were all these 'terrorist targets'?"

No, they were not terrorist targets, and their being targeted demonstrates a deplorably lack of conscience and care on the part of the Israeli military.

Now give me your answers.

As to the 'nasty bastards' comment: why is it that when one criticises Israel's actions in any way one is instantly accused of hating the Israelis, and of tarring all Israelis with the same crude brush? I am doing no such thing. Just because Israel is Israel does not exempt it from criticism when its military causes the indiscriminate killing of hundreds of innocent people.

If you do not answer my questions and comments fully, I will assume that you have no answers.

by a reader on Fri, 07/21/2006 - 08:48 | reply

Answers

Oh well, here's what I think:

Thank you.

"Why, for example, did the Israelis attack and destroy the headquarters of the Liban-Lait company in the Bekaa Valley, the largest milk factory in Lebanon?"

Because they are targeting Lebanon in the most inexcusably indiscriminate way. Why? Because that's exactly what Hizbollah are doing, and Israel is punishing the people of Lebanon for that crime.

That does not actually answer your own question, because it does not say what the purpose of the punishment is. To relieve the Israelis' feelings through revenge? (Inflicted on a third party?) To coerce the Lebanese government, through sympathy with its people's suffering, to cease to harbour Hezbollah? To coerce Hezbollah, through its sympathy with other Lebanese, to cease trying to kill Israelis? All of these things? Or what? But anyway, we shall respond to your answer as far as it went.

You copied your list of questions verbatim from yesterday's article by Robert Fisk in The Independent. Incidentally, it may be helpful to you to know that Robert Fisk, by his disregard for facts, his tendentious reinterpretations of history, his relentless agenda of demonising the actions of the US, Israel, and the West generally, and his anti-Western racism, has become a byword for systematic factual unreliability caused by pathological ideological bias. So he is not someone whose utterances are worth laboriously typing into a computer, and certainly not citing as a factual reference when trying to persuade someone who does not share his agenda. However, it so happens that that is not directly relevant to our discussion here, because it is undoubtedly true that factories have been hit by Israeli air strikes during the current war. So let us assume, for the sake of argument, that one of them was the Liban-Lait company in the Bekaa Valley, and that it was targeted rather than hit accidentally.

The obvious way in which this could come about would be if Hezbollah fighters, or leaders, were using the factory as a base, or for storing or launching their missiles. That is not an implausible thing for them to be doing, since it is their systematic policy. Only yesterday, Israeli forces discovered a Hezbollah arsenal in a mosque, so it is inconceivable that Hezbollah would hesitate to use a milk factory in the same way.

One therefore has to ask oneself this: if the motives for the current Israeli air raids were exactly as the Israeli government is publicly claiming, would one expect any factories to be hit? The answer is clearly yes. And so one should consider further: would one then expect Fisk to interpret those raids as evidence of immoral intentions on the part of the Israelis? Again, clearly, yes. Would they in fact be evidence of that? Clearly not in themselves, because they are, on the face of it, also consistent with other intentions, including those that the Israelis claim to have.

However, to make a fair judgement, one must consider whether your alternative explanation is plausible too, namely that this was part of an inexcusably indiscriminate, collective punishment of the Lebanese people, "exactly what Hizbollah are doing" [to the Israeli people].

One problem with that explanation is that, as Elliot said, the Israelis would be going about this punishment in a very illogical and self-defeating way. They keep insisting that that is not what it is. And they are taking extraordinary measures to, for example, allow the flow of humanitarian aid, and to reveal in advance where they are going to strike so that civilians can leave the area. Moreover, they are limiting themselves to using only a tiny proportion of their military power. Whatever you may think of the morality of their choice of targets, they are manifestly not, as Hezbollah is, choosing them according to population density. Now, you may think that all such apparently perverse measures are camouflage, intended to disguise what you know to be the true intentions of the Israelis. If so, then you are at least claiming that those intentions are being systematically disguised. In other words, the alleged Israeli intentions we are discussing, and the military planning and actions which you say they are causing, are part of a conspiracy.

There is also the fact that this alleged punishment mission is costing the lives of Israeli soldiers. The Israelis claim to care deeply about the loss of individual lives, and to be deeply averse to risking them other than in self-defence. They must be lying about that too, if the real intention of these actions is revenge. Perhaps you are not saying that it is; there are forms of punishment that are not vengeful - though rarely against third parties. That is why we hoped you would be explicit as to what motive you are actually alleging.

But in any case, there would have to be a conspiracy, and all this leads us to consider its nature, and how plausible it could be that it exists. We refer you to our series on the subject. but in brief, if the real intention of the current Israeli actions (such as the bombing of any particular building) differs as you say from the reasons that they publicly defend, then they are faced with what seems to us an impossible problem of dupe-management. In this regard, bear in mind that the Israeli Air Force in particular contains officers with a vast range of political opinions. Regularly, some of them resign, or refuse to participate in certain actions, because they disagree with them politically. It is therefore beyond the bounds of credibility that, in the briefing for a mission to bomb a milk factory, the pilots would be given a justification such as "this will pay back those Lebanese for Hezbollah's murders of our children", and for the conspirators in the government to expect those pilots to go out and attack, including risking their own lives, in pursuit of such an intention.

The pilots are not raw conscripts. They are world-class professionals, highly skilled and knowledgeable about the enemy and the military situation. Is it plausible that they could be fobbed off again and again with a rationale for their missions that was such a gigantic lie? Would they not be constantly encountering situations where the purported national aims would be best served by one mission, yet they were being ordered to fly a completely different mission inconsistent with those aims?

And therefore finally, we are led to consider whether, if what was really happening was that all of the missions really are in conformity with Israel's purported aims, Robert Fisk would be saying so. And whether you would be.

by Editor on Fri, 07/21/2006 - 14:35 | reply

home | archives | polls | search

Copyright © 2008 Setting The World To Rights

Setting The World To Rights

Ideas have consequences.

Various Missiles, Condi, And The Danger Of Moral Prevarication

One of the standard lines of argument of the campaign for unilateral nuclear disarmament during the late twentieth century was that weapons stockpiles cause wars. "Never in history," they would say "was a new generation of powerful, expensive weapons stockpiled, without then being used."

They may have been right about previous history, but since then there have been a handful of counter-examples. The most important was in regard to the very stockpiles they wanted us to extrapolate that history to, namely those of the United States' and the Soviet Union's thermonuclear weapons. Not just one but two or three successive generations of leading-edge weapons systems were designed, paid for, manufactured, integrated into doctrine and training, deployed, decommissioned, and sold for scrap, without being used once. The same is true of Israel's nuclear weapons capabilities, despite not being offset by any corresponding deterrent.

But evil regimes refrain from violence only when they are under intense pressure (Saddam in the first Gulf War, for instance, as well as the Soviet Union in its final years, both refrained from using their weapons of mass destruction) – the very situation that pacifists and other advocates of unilateral disarmament, appeasement and the like believe is the least likely to have a happy ending.

Over the last few years, the world looked on without applying any pressure at all as Iran and Syria poured sophisticated and massively destructive weapons into Hezbollah's stockpile. The world looked on as if there was some doubt as to what those thousands of missiles were for, or whether they would eventually be used if Hezbollah remained in a position to use them.

When they finally did what they were longing to do, and started to rain death and destruction on Israel's population centres, the world was slightly less enraged than usual with Israel for daring to defend itself (with the exception of President Chirac, who seems to have gone stark mad). President Bush, especially, let it be known that if Hezbollah "stopped doing that shit", everything would be fine.

But, unfortunately, that is not enough to halt or even slow the juggernaut – Iranian nuclear weapons – that is currently heading both for Israel and the United States. Hypocrisy and paralysis are still the norm against which actions are judged. Condoleezza Rice issued a strong statement in support of Israel:

First of all, Israel has a right to defend itself. No country would sit and continue to receive rocket fire against civilian populations and not try to do something about it.

Indeed. But unfortunately, she felt obliged to continue as follows:

What we have asked of the Israelis is that they act in a way to avoid innocent civilian casualties, to avoid the destruction of civilian infrastructure, because there does need to be another day. Israel will need to have those moderate allies in Lebanon and in the Palestinian territories in order to create a stable peace.

That is to say, "OK, for once, you're justified in using violence, but even so, please take care to restrain yourselves from indulging your natural tendency to slaughter civilians and drink their blood. We know you are deaf to moral arguments in general, but you are good at understanding material advantage, so please note that on this occasion, mitigating the slaughter will be of material advantage to you in the future."

That is how friends of Israel among the world's politicians and diplomats feel obliged to talk. This is especially irksome because, in fact, Israel has the most morally advanced defence and foreign policy in the world, so all these condescending strictures come from people, and polities, that are markedly inferior to Israel in that very respect. But also, if we may respond to Secretary Rice in kind: this moral prevarication is not only wantonly unfriendly and immoral. It is a serious material danger to the United States.

Wed, 07/19/2006 - 12:17 | permalink

Pressure On Israel

Editor,

" . . . please take care to restrain yourselves from indulging your natural tendency to slaughter civilians and drink their blood. . ."

I have a hard time extrapolating from her quote to paraphrase as you did above. Fortunately, so far at least, the US administration has not pressured Israel nearly as much as one might have feared. We can hope that there continues to be no substantial pressure and that Israel is able to achieve its main objectives -- but that is, I know, a lot to hope for.

If the US isn't clear about what is morally right, does pressure Israel, and as a result Israel stops too far short, it would certainly be a very " . . . serious material danger to the United States."

As for " . . . you are good at understanding material advantage, so please note that on this occasion, mitigating the slaughter will be of material advantage to you in the future," apart from determining the meaning of the word "mitigating," and your use of the pejorative term "slaughter", I suspect that Israel views the situation in a not dissimilar vein, and such considerations go into their strategic thinking.

by Michael Bacon on Wed, 07/19/2006 - 20:43 | login or register to post comments

Too Clever

Editor,

You're obviously too clever for me. I guess all I can do in the circumstances is to continue to try and persuade folks to support Israel. . . .

For those who may be interested, the following is the link to the White House for comments. If you support Israel, it may some help to let the administration know:

comments@whitehouse.gov

by Michael Bacon on Wed, 07/19/2006 - 22:49 | login or register to post comments

Rice

I would agree with The World that the statement by Secretary Rice would be offensive if spoken privately to Israeli leaders.

But, I think it was crafted to appeal to other, less enlightened, governments that the US is making the "right" noises towards Israel (without actually criticizing Israel for anything it has actually done).

I'm sure that Secretary Rice is aware of Israel's moral stature, and how unfairly it is regularly judged.

So, I agree with Michael Bacon that The World's extrapolation isn't a fair reading of her likely meaning.

I wouldn't have made the statement, but nobody ever accused me of being diplomatic.

Gil

by Gil on Thu, 07/20/2006 - 05:24 | login or register to post comments

Diplomatic Language

I agree with Gil and Michael Bacon. Any diplomatic statement that aims to bring about a peaceful solution must be targeted at a number of audiences. You have to try and get your message across to all of them and produce a statement that both sides can agree with in principle. So saying yes Israel has a right to defend itself but it should also be careful in how it exercises this right is a sensible place to start. You shouldn't read it as suggesting that Israel is being injudicious in exercising it's right but the statement needs to appeal to those whose suspicion will always be that they are.

If Condi had issued a statement without the caveat you took offence to then it would be all too easy for opponents of Israel to characterise (again) the USA as an unthinking uncritical ally of Israel and therefore a supporter (of what they believe to be the case) of attacks on civilian infrastructure and civilian population centres. Any diplomatic capital, any chance of being an honest broker is set back if not gone altogether. The impact of an unbalanced statement is to polarise views and make consensus less likely.

Chirac's statements are a good example of the pro-Arab view that an honest broker needs to appeal to. He, and countless like him in the Arab world and in Europe, will see pictures of destruction in Beirut and draw his own conclusions about the morality and proportionality of it all. They will not be convinced by audacious claims of Israel having "the most morally advanced defence and foreign policy in the world" nor that they have responded in a proportional way. To bring these people and nations into a diplomatic dialogue you need to use language they can agree with but without compromising your position. I think Condi's statement is a very good example of this.

by RK on Thu, 07/20/2006 - 09:37 | login or register to post comments

Diplomacy

There are indeed various advantages to being diplomatic.

But haven't people been trying diplomatic statements for decades with little success?

Perhaps the advantages of clarity are also/more important?

Besides, there are other countries that say diplomatic things. But few others are remotely capable of saying clear and moral things. It's usually best to utilize our uniquely valuable trait instead of our fairly fungible trait.

-- Elliot Temple

My Blog

by Elliot Temple on Thu, 07/20/2006 - 09:46 | login or register to post comments

Clarity

It should also be noted that the other side has clarity. They frequently, loudly, clearly express their position. They have diplomatic announcements as well (not very good ones), sure. But the clear position that the Jews are bad and that the natural Jewish habitat is the sea is what wins them most of their supporters.

And this lack of diplomacy doesn't get them in much trouble.

People go way out of their way to pretend it isn't clear.

Acquiescing in this huge imbalance about which side can be how clear is harmful.

We are the good guys. they are the ones who should be hiding their true motives.

-- Elliot Temple

My Blog

by Elliot Temple on Thu, 07/20/2006 - 09:51 | login or register to post comments

Propoganda

I think you're absolutely right that the other side has clarity for which it isn't punished. Even handedness can sometimes imply moral equivalence and this is unfair on Israel. For example the statement from UN Human Rights Commissioner Louise Arbour suggesting both sides might be guiltily of war crimes through deliberately targeting civilians verges on the crass. It's fairly obvious that Hezbollah are targeting civilians and it should be equally obvious to anyone with an ounce of military knowledge that the IDF are not. To suggest that both parties actions are equally close to being war crimes is to let Hezbollah off the hook.

I think it's wrong to say that Hezbollah gather most support from their anti-Semitic statements. That is probably the case when it comes to appealing to Anti Semites (especially in the Arab and Muslim world) but when it comes to European public opinion the media footage from Gaza, West Bank and Lebanon does so much more. That's why Hamas and Hezbollah adopt tactics that will result in civilian casualties on their own side. If there was no propaganda value to it they wouldn't do it but they know that the cameras will be there when they wheel the children into the hospital. My particular despair is that the western media rarely comment on this when they show the footage. This cynical manipulated of the international media has been with us for a long time (I first became aware of how low some people will go during the Bosnian and Kosovan conflicts) but the media seem unwilling to address or even acknowledge it. Think I'm going off on a tangent here. I'll stop now.

by RK on Thu, 07/20/2006 - 10:43 | login or register to post comments

New Language

Editor,

Your suggested language has much to commend it, but it isn't relevant to the issue of whether The World's extrapolation was a fair reading of her likely meaning. Nevertheless, I agree that any party offended by your language would not have been influenced by the original to contribute to peace.

by Michael Bacon on Thu, 07/20/2006 - 12:17 | login or register to post

Diplomacy

The difference in the two texts is subtle but the difference in the way people would interpret them is vast. The first is balanced and hopes for peace and saving of innocent lives. The second backs Israel.

Moderate governments (and people) inclined to a pro-Arab position would read an uncritical support for Israel as opposed to the more neutral original. These governments would know that the statement was wrong (targeting civilian and civilian infrastructure) and would therefore see Rice as a partisan player and therefore not a credible person to negotiate a peaceful solution. It would also possibly encourage the likes of Chirac et al to put out counter-statements deploring the Israelis and calling for a ceasefire.

I'm not challenging the morality of the IDF or suggesting that your new text is wrong in any way. My point is that Rice doesn't need to say it. It would be undiplomatic and unhelpful. Consider Javier Solana's comments after he left Beirut the other day. Amongst a lot of balanced diplomatic language he said that having seen the damage he had to say the Israeli action was disproportionate. After that what Israeli can trust Solana to facilitate a peaceful resolution? He should have stuck to his first answer which was that if people considered the Israeli response disproportionate it would be harder to defeat terrorism. A statement moderates on both sides can agree with.

by RK on Thu, 07/20/2006 - 13:14 | login or register to post comments

The difference in the two tex

The difference in the two texts is subtle but the difference in the way people would interpret them is vast. The first is balanced and hopes for peace and saving of innocent lives. The second backs Israel.

I agree that the first one doesn't back Israel. That's a problem. Shouldn't Israel be backed?

BTW there is no such thing as a moderate supporter of jew killing. There are only the guilty and perhaps the really ignorant. Also there are the committed, and the people who can be scared into stopping. Stuff like that.

Perhaps moderates means the people who aren't sure about jew killing and are frequently complicit, but aren't motivated enough to start their own militia?

I also take issue with the idea of credible negotiators. The credibility of a negotiator doesn't matter, because neither side will, or should, put their trust and fate into some diplomat's hands. They can evaluate offers based on whether they are good no matter who they are coming from.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/blog/>

by Elliot Temple on Thu, 07/20/2006 - 20:00 | login or register to post comments

No Offense

Some people think that the IDF has a right to defend Israel from Hizballah by cutting off their access to Syrian and Iranian arms and by tracking down and imprisoning or killing members of Hizballah, as it is currently doing. None of these people would be offended by Rice making a stronger statement of the kind provided by the World above.

What about the people who think that Israel is in the wrong? Of the politicians who have some influence over what happens in the Middle East, like the governments of Syria, Saudi Arabia, Iran, Turkey and so on, some are democratic and free, some are not. The countries that are not free are ruled by tyrants who propagate conspiracy theories and sometimes believe their own propaganda, as can be seen by looking at the media of these countries. A conspiracy theory addled dictator will either have a reasonable interpretation of American statements or view them through the corrupting lens of some conspiracy theory. In the latter case the tyrant will see any statement of support for Israel, no matter how mild, as a provocation.

Some people will say that the alternative to Rice's statement outlined above by the World is undiplomatic. However, this is based on their experience of living in a free society that isn't unconditionally ruled by a conspiracy theoretic crackpot. In a free society minor differences of phrasing will make some difference to the way that a government will respond to some offer. For example, an offer from Japan to America to reduce a tariff by 10% as opposed to 5% might make or break a trade agreement. Hizballah doesn't care if people want to meet them halfway and only let them kill half of the Jews in Israel, say, nor does the Iranian government. None of these people will take steps that will hurt Israel in any major way, although they might refuse to buy Israeli fruit or something like that. But they wouldn't support anything Israel does anyway, so it's wrong to care what they think.

by Alan Forrester on Thu, 07/20/2006 - 21:30 | login or register to post comments

"It's wrong to care what they

"It's wrong to care what they think"

You (meaning not only Forrester, but all the rest of you at The World), and those who share your attitudes are just as much the reason World War Three now looms as are the Muslim immoderates. You will change your tune when the missiles start hitting the quiet leafy avenues/bustling urban centres where you live.

Except that doesn't happen to people like you, does it? It happens to people in other countries, whose lives are worth rather less than yours. If only you and yours were the eggs that had to be broken to make the omelette, you might find that you took the loss of lives a little more seriously.

Sorry, had to say that in the vague hope of cracking your callous shell of cold hard logic; you know, the one from the safety of which you talk about bloodshed as if it were something right and necessary. I'm sure you won't reply to this comment, since I haven't engaged your insane arguments enough for you to pick me up on some semantic irrelevancy or other.

by a reader on Fri, 07/21/2006 - 08:23 | login or register to post comments

Jew Killers

Elliot,

I have a high regard for the quality of the writing on this site and frequently agree with the principles being promoted. However in this string I think your passionate support for Israel is clouding your judgement and your last post verged on the offensive.

The most striking example of this is the phrase you wrote in reply to my mentioning of "Moderate governments and people inclined to a pro-Arab position". You said "...there is no such thing as a moderate supporter of jew killing. There are only the guilty and perhaps the really ignorant...". That statement is breath taking in it's arrogance. It's the kind of extreme "all our opponenets are infidels and apostates and must die" bull I'd normally expect to dribble from the mouths of Nasrallah or al-Zawahiri. It paints everyone who doesn't agree with you as the enemy and leaves no room for compromise and little room for dialogue. Some states do want the descrtuction of Israel. I'd include most countries with a Muslim majority in this camp. But the vast majority of people and nations are not "supporters of jew killing". They are opponents of killing and in this crisis (like many before) Israel is doing quite a lot of killing. Hence the calls for them to stop and their sympathy for Lebanon and disdain for Israel. You can and do argue on the validity of the IDF cause. That the killing is justified in the pursiut of their military objectives and self defence. Fair enough but don't start flining hyperbole around that means everyone who disagrees with you is a secret anti-semite who longs for the destruction of Israel. It is devisive, polarising and offensive.

I also have to disagree with you on the role of credible negotiators. Take a look at the resolution of the Bosnian war, even Kosovo and the roles played by Russia, the EU and the US. As long as the current conflict doesn't result in the complete destruction of Hezbollah (which of course it won't, even if there was a massive land war) then there will be a need for some kind of mediation. Sure you could possibly patch together a deal without one but the complete lack of trust by both sides would make a future conflagration almost inevitable. What a credible negotiator allows you to do is put more trust in the promises of your opponent that you would normally because you know they are being monitored and a break of the promise will be recognised as such. The negotiator / facilitator / mediator needs to have power (economic or military) behind it and it needs to be viewed as objective and fair. Given that the US is already seen as partisan it would need to exclude them or at least balance them against another party, perhaps the EU or Russia. Undiplomatic utterings make this future diplomacy much harder and probably mean more lives will be lost before we get there.

In the current crisis I support Israel's actions and feel that the blame lies squarely with Hezbollah. I'm also sure that if there are any war crimes being committed it is by them. But I also think there is a risk that Israel will go too far. Every Lebanese civilian that dies is a propaganda victory for Hezbollah. Take a look at the BBC message board and you will see that the majority of people support Israel because they can recognise the provocations they have suffered. This support will ebb away the more Lebanese non-combatants die and will flow even faster when you call any doubters "Jew killers".

We're on the same side here Elliot and I hope you read this as constructive criticism.

Ruairidh

P.S. In response to Alan's post. True the difference in phrasing will be lost on Hezbollah but it's not Hezbollah this is aimed at but the wider pro-Arab world. Not all of whom will be blind to the subtleties of diplomacy.

P.P.S. I don't know how many of you are based in the UK but if you may want to read the front page of the Sun. Omar Bakri Mohammed (remember him?) has asked for a visa to visit the UK and was turned away from a UK warship evacuating women and children. Hilarious

by RK on Fri, 07/21/2006 - 09:30 | login or register to post comments

But the vast majority of peop

But the vast majority of people and nations are not "supporters of jew killing". They are opponents of killing and in this crisis (like many before) Israel is doing quite a lot of killing. Hence the calls for them to stop and their sympathy for Lebanon and disdain for Israel.

I wish it were so. But it is not. If it were, those people would be equally opposed to other killing that takes place world wide. They aren't.

We're on the same side here Elliot and I hope you read this as constructive criticism.

Yeah, no problem. Criticise away. I enjoy lucid arguments in favor of any position.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/blog/>

by Elliot Temple on Sat, 07/22/2006 - 01:00 | login or register to post comments

Re: "It's wrong to care what they..."

Somebody wrote:

You (meaning not only Forrester, but all the rest of you at The World), and those who share your attitudes are just as much the reason World War Three now looms as are the Muslim immoderates. You will change your tune when the missiles start hitting the quiet leafy avenues/bustling urban centres where you live.

They've already attacked London and threatened British people like Salman Rushdie with death.

Except that doesn't happen to people like you, does it? It happens to people in other countries, whose lives are worth rather less than yours. If only you and yours were the eggs that had to be broken to make the omelette, you might find that you took the loss of lives a little more seriously.

Islamists are killing people in Sudan, in Indonesia and in many other countries. I think the civilised countries of the world should help their victims to get rid of the Islamists. Unfortunately, that involves some risk that innocent people will be killed. If people don't resist Islamism it is certain that many people will be killed as the Islamists want to establish theocratic states that will murder and oppress people. The choice is not between a diplomatic policy that entails no risk that anyone will be hurt and a reckless policy that will hurt people. It is between a rational policy of taking out terrorist groups and the tyrannical governments that support them and an irrational policy of pretending that they have demands that we should be prepared to grant. What is the halfway house between Israel being a judenrein Islamist theocracy and Israel being a free society?

by Alan Forrester on Sat, 07/22/2006 - 20:04 | login or register to post comments

The Pacifist Tendancy

"I wish it were so. But it is not. If it were, those people would be equally opposed to other killing that takes place world wide. They aren't."

To be honest they usually are. Speaking about the UK at least the people currently wringing their hands over Lebanese civilian deaths would also have complained against the Iraq war, the Afghan invasion, the Kosovan bombing campaign and so on. It is a pacifist tendency that a lot of people here share. Any military action that makes it onto the news will be similarly disapproved of. The key point here is that it needs to make it onto the news. Most people won't go out of their way to find out the current state of play in Kashmir / Darfur / Eritrea / Sri Lanka / Algeria / Columbia / Chechnya or wherever. Ask them to explain any one of the above conflicts and they'll struggle but show them the picture of a bombed out house and they'll chorus "this is terrible". Tell them that the house was being used to store missiles that were to be fired on civilians and they'll squirm but their view won't really change. They are not "anti" or "pro" one side or the other in any meaningful ideological way. They take the side that seems to be suffering the greater civilian casualties.

I know people who think what Israel is doing is terrible. I disagree with them and try and discuss the issue with them. Their knowledge is patchy and their logic simple. To call them supporters of Jew killing would be grossly unfair. I'd rather call them pacifists, with all the naivety that tag implies.

So perhaps the question should be is there more criticism of Israel in the media than other countries in conflicts, and why? I think that there is. Take the examples above, especially Chechnya and Kashmir (both big motivators for the global jihad) and compare with Israel. Why is that? Certainly the Russians or Sudanese are more ruthless so it can't be that. I think there is an anti-Israeli agenda in some parts of the media and this dovetails conveniently with the fact that it is generally easier and safer for westerns to report from Gaza / West Bank / Beirut than it is from Grozny or Srinagar.

I'd be interested in your thoughts on the role now being played by Dr Rice given your earlier assertion that there was no need for a credible negotiator. Do you think she will bring peace by mediating or is she just a conduit through which Israel and Lebanon can discuss terms without the loss of face / momentum from direct negotiations?

by RK on Tue, 07/25/2006 - 10:44 | login or register to post comments

An explanation from the BBC

As to the question why does Israel get more negative coverage from the media here is a comment lifted from the BBC website.

BEGINS

Here are some stark statistics:

- Around 30 to 40 people are killed every day in the current Israel/Lebanon conflict.

- About 100 people are killed every day in the violence in Iraq.
 - And 1,200 people are killed every day in the war in the Congo.
- All three of these stories are due to appear on tonight's Ten O'Clock News. They will probably run in that order - with the Middle East getting by far the most attention.

Does this say something about how we value human life? It's a fair question and one I worry about.

Here is our reasoning for not reversing the order. The war in the Congo has been going on for decades - it is desperately important (as we will reflect tonight), and a story we will keep returning to. Similarly the Ten has led the way in attempting to show the scale of the violence in Iraq in recent months - we have regularly led the programme with stories from there, and the BBC is the only British broadcaster with a full time commitment to being there.

The Middle East needs more time and space for a variety of reasons:

- The sheer complexity of the situation requires space to help provide context and analysis.
- The current conflict plugs into so many other stories around the world, from what Tony Blair and George W. Bush call the "War on Terror", through to the price of oil, even the situation in Afghanistan.
- Many people fear the consequences of conflict in the Middle East more than anywhere else, and it is our job to help people understand a "scary world".

In short, our judgement is that Middle East is currently the biggest story in the world - by a wide margin - and it has the greatest implications for us all.

Craig Oliver is editor of the Ten O'Clock News

ENDS

Complexity - sorry don't buy that. The current crisis is quite simply really. Certainly more straight forward than the complete mess that is the Congo.

So there you have it. It seems to boil down the fact that the BBC are more worried about Israel because their actions could stire up the hornets nest of Islamism and Arab nationalism and what this means for the war on terror.

by RK on Tue, 07/25/2006 - 10:59 | login or register to post comments

media bias

RK:

I agree the media presents a very biased view, and some people are ignorant enough not to be aware of this. But I think many people are complicit. It's hard to never ever hear about the Congo even once. It is going to be on the news tonight, as you've posted. Not as much attention, but still there. So anyone who really cared about killing -- a true pacifist -- would quickly see the Congo issue was most important, (even from a brief mention) and tell all his friends. Some proportion of those people would look into it more and start websites to inform other people who were ignorant. This growing movement would get attention. More people would find out. They would demand the media change its practices. etc

But all that does not happen. Because, as I said, many people are complicit.

Note also that many people read some blogs but choose not to read ones that would broaden their perspective. And many people choose not to watch Fox which would also help some. All those people who don't understand the other side, and don't want to know, are complicit.

You mentioned pacifists being naive. I agree and consider this quite important. It's common place that these people simply have not thought about the issues. However, if that's the case, why do they have opinions on them? Can it be that the leaders of anti-Israel marches, for example, have never really thought about combat, killing, terrorism, hostages, etc?

This is somewhat appealing because it may mean they are not bad people. But it is perhaps not very plausible. It looks to me like there must be something wrong with their thinking (on these issues) that has the effect that they don't figure anything out.

I presume you're aware that your examples of killing people don't like were all involving USA? Israel's ally.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/blog/>

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 07/25/2006 - 17:08 | login or register to post comments

Ignorance is Bliss

Your description of what an active pacifist might do is all very sensible but most are not active. So I think complicit is too strong. It implies a conscious decision and I think their naivety is more coincidental. Consider what proportion of "Live8" marches knew the first thing about global economics beyond what they'd read in the fliers, or the number of "Stop the War" marchers who could find Darfur or Congo on a map but felt moved to protest against Israel. The answer, I suspect is low in both cases. So why do they march? They march because they have their consciences pricked by the media and because it's cool. Political dissent and direct action are de rigueur these days, especially with the dash of celebrity glamour usually thrown in.

So why does exposure to other views not enlighten them? I think it is because their lack of knowledge means they don't know just how ignorant they are. (See this paper, I imagine you've seen it before but it encapsulates my point <http://www.apa.org/journals/features/psp7761121.pdf>). Yes they've thought about combat and terrorism etc but their starting from a simple world view where everyone is fundamentally decent and every thing could be worked out if we just sat down and talked about it. Therefore any violence is uncalled for. Complete bull I know but that seems to be what they think. You said "It looks to me like there must be something wrong with their thinking (on these issues) that has the effect that they don't figure anything out." I agree there is. It's ignorance in the most part. Ignorance is different from stupidity. Lots of these people are intelligent enough to develop a deep understanding but they don't put the time in. Ironically I believe because they don't think they need to – they think they understand perfectly.

"I presume you're aware that your examples of killing people don't like were all involving USA? Israel's ally."

Sorry I don't follow you here. My examples covered conflicts the USA are certainly not involved in, at least not in an active military sense. Colombia yes but Chechnya, Darfur, Eritrea, Sri Lanka, Algeria, Kashmir no.

by RK on Wed, 07/26/2006 - 09:05 | login or register to post comments

Ignorance

Children have way more ignorance than the adults we are discussing, but it does not prevent them from learning things, including things about the Middle East (every knowledgeable middle eastern scholar was once ignorant about it, BTW). Ignorance isn't a force that stops people from improving.

The examples I was referring to were Iraq, Afghanistan, and Kosovo. Those were the ones I thought you said that people don't like (which, of course, only includes ones they know about).

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/blog/>

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 07/26/2006 - 16:27 | login or register to post comments

Wars people don't like

The common theme of those three is also that British forces were involved so there was a lot of media coverage and a debate about what the UK should or should not do, hence the protests from the anti-war lobby. In fact these are the only major conflicts involving the British Armed Forces since the first Gulf War except Sierra Leone.

It is true that the SWP/STWC backbone of the anti-war(s) movement is also anti-american so that may have an influence here but that's another discussion. Come to think of it I don't remember the Sierra Leone deployment being quite so controversial.

by RK on Thu, 07/27/2006 - 08:45 | login or register to post comments

Afghanistan

I should explain myself a little more on the Afghanistan comment. I choose this example because I think anyone who was against this war is either deluded, ignorant or a pacifist. The case for action was incredibly compelling and the majority of people knew this. I sometimes use it as a sanity test to gauge what kind of person I'm speaking with if we end up discussing geopolitics. If they were against the Afghan campaign then they're a cretin.

I can remember leaving work and going into Westminster tube in the month between 9/11 and the start of the bombing campaign. I took what I thought was a free newspaper from a guy handing them out at the entrance. When I settled down to read the thing I was disappointed to find I had a four page 'Stop the War' flier in the mock up of a newspaper. For a laugh I decided to read it anyway. What was enlightening was just how stupid and uninformed the whole thing was. The only thing that stuck in my mind was the article that seriously claimed the only reason the USA was going to invade Afghanistan was to allow the construction of a gas pipeline from Central Asia through Pakistan to the Indian Ocean. I wish I'd kept it but I felt embarrassed to be seen reading it so I ditched it long before I got home.

by RK on Thu, 07/27/2006 - 09:03 | login or register to post comments

The EU, Human Stem Cells, And Poodles

The European Union has decided to restrict its funding of human stem cell research to experiments that do not involve the destruction of fertilised eggs.

Some members of the EU are devoutly Catholic countries. Their people have irrational religious objections to that sort of research. So why should they fund it? Indeed, but now the EU will take money in the form of taxation from Britain (which is a major net contributor to the EU budget), and will forbid its use for good research that most Britons approve of.

Part of the problem with a system that requires politicians from many different countries to pool their spending is that they have to compromise on issues where their constituents disagree. Within the evolved democratic political tradition of a single nation, such compromises take place too, but they then form part of a political process in which they are discussed, dissected, reviewed, and generally implemented in such a way that their proponents are held responsible for their outcomes, and the policies can be amended or abandoned in response to criticism, and so progress can be made. The EU has no such process. indeed, there is no such thing as the European political process at all, or a European political party, or a European national debate on anything. Yet genuine political accountability depends on the existence of such processes, which is why the European Parliament is not only a meaningless, formal imitation of a democratic institution but would remain so if it were (disastrously) given significant legislative powers. Still less accountable are the European Commissioners, who are insulated by layer upon layer of institutional defences against the slightest danger that they could be held to basic standards of rationality.

At the moment, the British press and 'opinion makers' have taken to shrieking 'poodle!' whenever the Prime Minister does not achieve the full reversal of a major US foreign policy in deference to British domestic opinion. Yet somehow the EU invariably gets a pass when it materially overrules, undermines and thwarts the British people's means of deciding on their own governance inside Britain.

If Britain cannot reform the EU it should leave it.

That may be precisely the best approach for Britain. Britain should be able to access the best of both worlds if it's smart. Blair, with all of his shortcomings, is smart, and he's done an great job overall. Brown isn't looking to pull out of the EU - or he doesn't seem willing to use the threat of pulling out as a chip. By the way, I don't know how many people saw the Bush-Blair press conference. I thought Blair's performance was masterfull. But we're a bit spoiled here.

by Michael Bacon on Sat, 07/29/2006 - 20:47 | reply

What Shall I Compare Thee To Now?

It is a fine summer morning.

There was a time when mornings like this were regarded as the epitome of beauty. When Shakespeare wanted to extol the beauty of his beloved, he compared her to a summer's day.

There was a time when religious people would regard a morning like this as a sign of divine grace. When they walked out and saw a day like today, they would pray – literally, pray – in thanks for it.

Today, the devotees of the prevailing religion regard a fine summer's day as nothing but an omen, as terrifying as comets and eclipses once were. To them, it signifies impending punishment for our hubris, for the wickedness of seeking to change the world for the better. If they are pleased at all, it is with glee at the portent of the disaster that will one day vindicate them. But basically they hate the summer's day. They finer the day, the more they hate it. Yet when they try to besmirch it, it remains clear and beautiful.

Sun, 07/30/2006 - 14:44 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

What are you talking about? W

What are you talking about? Who hates summer days? Is it the Moon-God disciples? Priests of the Greek ski god Alpinios? Help me out here.

by a reader on Mon, 07/31/2006 - 06:30 | reply

Re: What are you talking about?

Think before you enjoy it. Etc.

by Editor on Mon, 07/31/2006 - 08:36 | reply

Oops. My mistake then. I read

Oops. My mistake then. I read religion and assumed it meant exactly that. This is why I shouldn't express myself so early in the morning.

That said, I have to point out that most people, including the most die-hard of industrialists, don't really enjoy record-breaking heat in late July. Whatever the cause, once the summer morning has passed by and the summer day hits its stride, it's just not that nice to be outdoors, or even indoors sans AC, when all-time high temperature records are being replaced.

by a reader on Mon, 07/31/2006 - 11:22 | reply

Who Has the Burden of Proof?

Is it incumbent upon those who believe that substantial global temperature increases are dangerous to prove this beyond a reasonable doubt?

Or should substantial global temperature increases be assumed dangerous to humanity, unless demonstrated false beyond a reasonable doubt?

by a reader on Mon, 07/31/2006 - 20:36 | reply

Burden

Seems each proposition is true in some respects. If these are the only choices, reasonable doubt is an awfully high standard. A recipe for gridlock - perhaps not such a bad idea.

by Michael Bacon on Mon, 07/31/2006 - 23:10 | reply

it's one thing to think that it's one thing to think that very long term trends may be scary, and quite another to think a tiny data point today has anything at all to do with global warming. people who think they have "experienced global warming" or whatever are just proving they don't know how to think. temperatures fluctuate. get over it.

Elliot

by a reader on Fri, 08/04/2006 - 01:56 | reply

What a ridiculous thing to sa

What a ridiculous thing to say.

It is a fine summer morning.

There was a time when mornings like this were regarded as the epitome of beauty. When Shakespeare wanted to extol the beauty of his beloved, he compared her to a summer's day.

Umm, OK. So he compared his beloved specifically to the hottest day on record, right?

Is it beauty proportional to the number of people dying of heatstroke?

To them, it signifies impending punishment for our hubris, for the wickedness of seeking to change the world for the better.

Yeah right, because blowing the tops off of mountains and drilling for oil in the ANWR are things that make the world better. Only someone who truly hates progress and prosperity, worships Gaia and pines for the days when we lived in houses made of mud could wish for renewable sources of energy, or be alarmed at the prospect of the Earth reverting to a mesozoic climate within a few centuries.

by a reader on Fri, 08/04/2006 - 18:55 | reply

a "renewable source of energy"

a "renewable source of energy" really means wanting to never have to solve energy related problems again. this is not possible, anti-progress, and very bad. thinking and problem solving are good and not to be avoided. BTW we already invented nuclear power. it's pretty cool.

FYI most of those heat stroke deaths are people who would have died in the next few days anyway.

Elliot

by a reader on Fri, 08/04/2006 - 19:44 | reply

What if...

What if the number of heat stroke deaths in summer goes up but the number of hypothermia deaths in winter goes down by more?

by David Deutsch on Fri, 08/04/2006 - 19:56 | reply

Elliot: So is the water cycle

Elliot: So is the water cycle an affront to your belief system?

David: Touché. I have no adequate response within the microcosm-debate of heatstroke vs hypothermia.

There is however a good a priori, non-ideological reason to think that large-scale global warming is more likely to be A Bad Thing than A Good Thing. It's essentially the same as the reason why a large mutation is overwhelmingly more likely to be bad than good for an organism.

by a reader on Fri, 08/04/2006 - 22:27 | reply

Large mutation

Nice argument, but I think there are some problems with it. One is: who says this is a "large" mutation? In evolutionary terms, calling a mutation large is just the same as saying that it is very likely to do harm, so the argument would be circular. Fortunately, though, you don't need to say "large". Small mutations are also more likely to do harm than good.

But how much harm? One could use your analogy to argue that there's a good a priori, non-ideological reason to think that large-scale global warming is most unlikely to be A Bad Thing. It's essentially the same as the reason why a small change in the environment is overwhelmingly likely to have a negligible effect on an organism: the organism is adapted, and hence near a local maximum of adaptation. So a small change in the conditions will produce only a second order change in the degree of adaptation. (Of course, the environment is not an organism and is not adapted to anything. But we are adapted, and so is our civilisation.)

And another possible way to apply the same sort of analogy is: a large change in the global economy of the kind required by interventionist solutions, is overwhelmingly likely to do more harm than good - actually for all the usual reasons, not just analogy with the evolution of organisms.

Finally, I fear analogies aren't going to get us very far. The real problem is that we don't understand the climate change process, or its effects, very well. That is why I advocate a stance of problem fixing in preference to the chimera of problem avoidance.

by David Deutsch on Fri, 08/04/2006 - 23:03 | reply

Water Cycle

Water Cycle: Well, ultimately we are going to "re use" a lot of the atoms on Earth. But what renewable power means is: anything that requires atoms to start the process in a hard-to-create configuration is discarded as permanently unworkable. Why? Because people think we can't solve the problem of putting ever more atoms into that configuration. Of course we can. We can burn coal forever if we want. So it's perfectly renewable.

What lefties want is something that would provide unlimited energy (though at a low rate per time. they don't seem to care about the consequences of limited energy per time) without thinking. they want mechanical maintenance routines to work forever. they want us to never face a problem like a scarcity that requires creativity to solve. because they don't have optimism in human creativity.

Elliot

by a reader on Fri, 08/04/2006 - 23:21 | reply

(Sigh)

So much ignorant nonsense in such a short thread (assuming you are talking about global warming - it's a little difficult to work out, among all the tendentious pseudo-arguments).

Destabilising the world's ecosystems is BAD. End of. The balance is so delicate, and we know so f little about it, that playing silly buggers with it is akin to pointing a loaded pistol to your head and saying: "Well, I know very little about kinematics, therefore I don't think the bullet is likely to hurt me - after all, Zeno has proved that an object can't REALLY move - ergo, it's a reasonable risk to take". And then pulling the trigger.

Incidentally: anti-science hysterics, a bunch not noted for a deep understanding of how science works, often accuse scientists of hubris, of saying (allegedly): "We know everything, and we are telling you global warming is a real danger".

Actually, it's quite the reverse; scientists by and large are saying: "We don't really know how the weather works, but we are making some worrying observations. The rise in CO2 concentrations - a measurable result of burning fossil fuels - is strongly correlated with rising temperatures. CO2 levels are rising faster and faster. Perhaps it's suggestive of an impending catastrophe, because we DON'T know what to do about it. And we can't work out the exact details of how the injection of heat energy is causing massive fluctuations in cycles such as hurricanes, to say nothing of melting ice-caps, but it's happening: maybe it would be prudent to think seriously about stopping this process?".

But hey, if humanity is dead set on destroying itself ...

by yoni on Sat, 09/09/2006 - 22:00 | reply

2nd-order changes

"the organism is adapted, and hence near a local maximum of adaptation. So a small change in the conditions will produce only a second order change in the degree of adaptation"

Proves nought. Second-order changes can be large enough to destabilise the system if they persist in spreading and growing. It's not what order it is, but what magnitude it is. Just because something is growing linearly rather than quadratically (say) doesn't mean that it's benign, or that its magnitude won't soon exceed some critical threshold. Global warming is growing linearly (say): so?

by yoni on Sat, 09/09/2006 - 22:05 | reply

Delicate

Yoni,

Why do you think the Earth's ecosystem is in a delicate balance?
What are the signs that it's not very stable?

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/blog/>

by Elliot Temple on Sat, 09/09/2006 - 23:25 | reply

Ecosystem

There are tons and tons and tons of examples to demonstrate this;

here is just one:

Within my small county in England, I am already seeing great changes in the prevalence of certain animal and plant species compared with only 10 years ago.

Certain quite common birds have given up migrating, because of the changed seasonal temperature patterns.

These changes affect other phenomena in turn (think insects, pollinated plants ...), both here and at the migration destinations.

I am not saying that a new balance won't be found, but the current balance is being disturbed and will flip into a different one. The process, and the end-result, is/will be stressful and potentially catastrophic to many species, including Homo sapiens.

The result could be the disappearance of many species, e.g. those who are already migrating northwards within Britain and may be squeezed out altogether by falling off the top of Scotland when their living space - which is temperature-delimited, to say nothing of their food which may also be temperature-delimited - disappears.

If the process goes on far enough, H. sapiens itself may disappear. Don't forget that the Maldives are shrinking, and London's flood defences are groaning. And we are very early in the process. Over the next 100 years - a mere blink - China will generate a huge amount of CO₂.

Other examples abound. Judging by the 3 Gorges dam, China is hell-bent on creating other kinds of disasters. And look up what happened at the Aral Sea: if that's not an ecosystem destroyed by human intervention, I don't know what is.

If and when H. sapiens disappears at the end of the process, the system will stop drifting away from equilibrium and settle down to a new one. In the global scheme of things, that's all fine and dandy, but is that what you want?

by Yoni on Sun, 09/10/2006 - 11:00 | reply

Re: Ecosystem

Is there a scientific study about the birds you've noticed? If so, please show us. If not, how do you know that you've really noticed anything? It could be coincidence, or you could have an unconscious bias, or you could have forgotten how many birds you saw in the past at this time of year, or how many there were a decade ago. Or your sample size may be too small to conclude anything, or there may be other causes you haven't investigated, or there could be a reason the bird changes indicate cooling temperatures. Without subjecting your theory to intense scientific criticism, you can't tell if it's any good or not.

I'm also curious which reasoned and articulate global warming advocates predicted these changes in bird migration. Or even, which ones predicted significant temperature changes would already be happening in 2006? I know some people said we are doomed by next week, but did any of the more scientifically oriented people say that?

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/blog/>

by Elliot Temple on Sun, 09/10/2006 - 18:57 | reply

Birds

"Is there a scientific study about the birds you've noticed? If so, please show us. If not, how do you know that you've really noticed anything? It could be coincidence, or you could have an unconscious bias, or you could have forgotten how many birds you saw in the past at this time of year, or how many there were a decade ago"

This borders on a smear, and certainly relies on sneering innuendo. It is not even remotely a serious comment.

All I will say is that I am a trained scientist, and that I have been taking part in the annual RSPB survey - which has a huge sample size - for many years.

That's already more than your patronising comments deserves.

by Yoni on Sun, 09/10/2006 - 23:07 | reply

Science

Could you please direct me to the science surrounding bird movement that indicates either global warming or that the world ecosystem is delicate?

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/blog/>

by Elliot Temple on Sun, 09/10/2006 - 23:37 | reply

Re: Ecosystem

You might find this talk illuminating.

by Alan Forrester on Thu, 09/21/2006 - 20:37 | reply

Bird ecology and global warming

I assume Yoni was talking about the Pied Flycatcher... if not I'd be very interested to know what bird he was talking about.

Anyway, I have written up a short summary about the pied flycatcher on my own blog, with links to secondary sources which link to the original papers. Basically what is happening is that the pied flycatcher times its migration based on the length of days. Since that is a constant, its migration schedule stays constant. However, the caterpillars in Northern Europe that it depends on for food in the spring are being born earlier, because their life cycle is tied to temperature. This means no food for the birds. Bad.

There are other effects. What about pollinator species and the plants they pollinate maturing at a different time? This has serious implications for the food chain.

Some trees produce fruit at a certain time of year. They have evolved to depend on migrating birds that pass by at that time to eat the fruit and spread the seeds. When timing gets thrown off, the trees don't spread.

by Will on Tue, 10/31/2006 - 13:57 | reply

Stasis

So basically animal code is full of hacks and kludges and rules of thumb, and they break down if circumstances change. So to keep animals functional, we'll just have to make sure nothing ever changes.

-- Elliot Temple
curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 10/31/2006 - 20:25 | reply

stasis

Sort of. If the pace of environmental change outruns the ability of species to adapt, the results can be catastrophic.

by Will on Tue, 10/31/2006 - 20:37 | reply

Catastrophe

Well, OK, but biological evolution is really, really, really slow. A few generations of humans is just a blink of the eye.

Now, you seem to say it'd be a catastrophe if some species went extinct. I have nothing against those birds or caterpillars. But we can't just halt progress for a tens of thousands of years, or more. That is just inviting the death of all species.

The only hope for survival for humans is to improve our science sufficiently before a gigantic meteor hits, or some other large scale disaster. We have a time limit. And if we die, all the other species will die too, when our sun goes. The only thing that could save them is if humans survive to either take them elsewhere, or to tinker with the sun.

Human progress is not only our only hope, it's the only hope of all the other species on Earth.

-- Elliot Temple
curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 10/31/2006 - 21:21 | reply

catastrophe

It seems we disagree on what a 'catastrophe' is. I think global warming and environmental destruction is indeed a real catastrophe, comparable to a meteor hitting the planet.

And I'm not saying that we should halt progress. I'm saying that we need to carefully consider our future and take measures to head off catastrophe.

But what if I was? What if progress means that billions of humans die off? Is that acceptable to you?

by Will on Tue, 10/31/2006 - 21:40 | reply

I don't understand how you co

I don't understand how you compare catastrophes. In one case, all humans and all animals die. In the other, some animals die, a handful of humans die, and life is less comfortable. That's comparable?

Even if progress meant billions of humans dying, isn't that worlds better than all humans being dead, period?

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 10/31/2006 - 22:00 | reply

catastrophe

Well for one thing, global warming appears to be human induced. We have no control over an asteroid that strikes us. It's like the difference between a lightning strike and a murder.

For another, stopping a meteor strike is relatively simple. Humans excel at delivering explosive power at a distance. Simply blow it to pieces or divert it. An easy technological challenge - and a straightforward one. There won't be endless debates about whether we should stop it or whether it's even happening.

Third: there's no evidence that a meteor would wipe out all life on earth. It's happened several times since life began on the planet without destroying all life, and I have no doubt humans would be among the survivors if there were any.

Fourth, we can see the evidence of environmental catastrophe all around us. There's no reason to believe a meteor will strike anytime in the near future. One is a clear and present danger.

by Will on Tue, 10/31/2006 - 22:12 | reply

Copyright © 2007 Setting The World To Rights

Not Mere Rhetoric

Mere Rhetoric is on a roll with important facts and trenchant commentary about the Israel-Hezbollah war and related matters. Here are some must-read posts:

IDF Videos Show Hezbollah Shelling Israel From Civilian Areas

(Videos of Hezbollah using Lebanese civilians as human shields.)

Syria is Hiding Weapons in Civilian Aid Convoys. Of Course They Are

To stop these convoys, Israel has chosen to bomb roads and bridges so that no transports can get through at all. It's not the ideal solution, but it's better than constantly having to hit civilian convoys because intelligence indicates they're transporting rockets that will be rained down on Israeli homes and schools. Israel's choice is to kill civilians or to blow up roads - they chose to blow up roads, and of course are being criticized for destroying Lebanese infrastructure.

Even 40 Years Ago, Anti-Zionism was Already Anti-Semitism

Well, duh. Anyway, there's an article about it from the post-six-day-war era that seems uncannily current.

The Lebanese Prime Minister is Either a Simpering Imbecile or a Shameless Liar

Actually it's pure evil. The Lebanese Prime Minister (himself recently so heavily praised by Condoleezza Rice and every other Western politician that it's a miracle he hasn't been made Prime Minister of the whole world) says that the videos showing Hezbollah firing from civilian areas are faked by Israel. Mere Rhetoric comments:

If the stakes involved were anything less than a genocide against millions of Jews for the second time in under a century, there might actually be humor in this sick comedy.

About That Other Group of Genocidal Lunatics Currently Shooting, Bombing Israelis

...the Palestinians are usually very careful and keep their weapons safely under the beds of women and children. The IDF has come up with a new way of dealing with this tactic - a way that the Jewish state, because of the double standards and duplicity of the international community, has been loathe to employ in the past. Here's how it works: when the IDF discovers that the weapons being used to murder Israelis are being stored in a house they tell everyone to leave the house, then they blow up the weapons from the air. Western human rights organizations refer to this tactic as "collective punishment" - because Palestinians who let Hamas store weapons in their living rooms should not be inconvenienced when Israel has to come in and blow those weapons up.

Like Hezbollah, Hamas Uses Children As Human Shields

The videos of the air attacks show how Hamas makes use of the Gaza youth; they are sent to collect Qassam rocket launchers, after they have been used, and the IDF holds back from targetting them.

IDF Sacrifices Its Commandos to Minimize Lebanese Civilian Casualties

IDF commandos carried out their 17th operation deep in Lebanon. They were dispatched under the cover of darkness to Tyre to make sure that less than 24 hours would be allowed to pass between when a Hezbollah cell launched rockets into Hadera and when that cell would be eliminated. Two of them ended up severely injured in the mission, one sustaining shots to the midsection. Why didn't Israel just let the IAF take care of the job? Because the terrorists were firing from a civilian neighborhood and hiding in an apartment building

[...]

The IDF is the most moral army in the world.

Indeed.

Well done, Omri of Mere Rhetoric.

Sat, 08/05/2006 - 19:11 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Bombing roads

Apparently the other reason for bombing roads is to stop Hezbollah from bringing in the trucks that they need for launching the rockets. For examples of the trucks used for launching rockets such as Katyusha see wikipedia.

by Mikko on Sat, 08/05/2006 - 22:45 | reply

Tactics

Destroying Hezbollah's ability to fight is taking – and will take – Israel far longer than was at first thought. There are several reasons for this: as always in war, the first casualty is the plan. But the reason that stands out is Hezbollah's astonishing success at the tactic that has been developed over decades by the Palestinians: using willing human shields. Hezbollah have taken this tactic to new heights of evil – and effectiveness.

Never before in history has an army succeeded in packing a battlefield with human shields, filled with an ideology of hatred and spite and in many cases willing to die – with their children – and using the enemy's decency and humanity as a weapon of war. The great majority of Israel's military casualties to date have been caused, through this tactic, as a result of their own conscious choice to send ground troops to capture objectives that could have been erased from the air or by artillery.

The tendency in the media, and in Western public opinion, to attribute the exact opposite tactics to Israelis by accusing them of a 'disproportionate response' to being under threat of mass murder is nothing short of evil too.

Thu, 08/10/2006 - 14:11 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

my interlocutor: tu quoque or tu spread lies?

I heard Israelis do this too.

by a reader on Fri, 08/11/2006 - 08:30 | reply

Israelis too

Did you?

Well tell us which Israeli school is built on top of a weapons cache, and which residential apartment building the IDF has planning sessions in.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/blog/>

by Elliot Temple on Fri, 08/11/2006 - 14:45 | reply

I heard 0=1

I'm consistently impressed by people's ability to find moral equivalence in the face of the most overwhelming evidence against it.

Simple models can be very nice. But, when they are contradicted by all credible evidence they should be rejected.

Gil

by Gil on Fri, 08/11/2006 - 18:08 | reply

'Palestinians'

Why are colluding in the myth that there is such a thing as 'Palestinians'?

by Yoni on Sat, 09/09/2006 - 21:46 | reply

Re: 'Palestinians'

Presumably you mean that the very use of the term 'Palestinians' concedes that, prior to the large-scale immigration of Jews in the 20th century, there was a nation called 'Palestine' that claimed sovereignty over the territory that now includes Israel. That is indeed a myth, but the use of the term 'Palestinians' does not 'collude in', or concede, that myth.

The term, as used nowadays by everyone including the Israeli government, is a way of referring to a particular group of people, organised separately from the surrounding political groups.

In passing, note that although that group of people had none of the attributes of a nation in 1900, they do have them now.

by Editor on Sat, 09/09/2006 - 22:24 | reply

Britain And The Town Square Test

A young colleague of ours recently went for a walk in central Oxford, England – almost literally in the town square. She was not, initially, intending to apply Sharansky's town square test but that's how it turned out. Whether Britain passed or not is still in doubt. Judge for yourselves. Here is her account, which she has adapted from three posts on her personal blog:

First Post, July 21st:

I was in town today and bought an Israeli flag — about five feet long. While I was walking to the bus, I decided to wear it as a cape (mostly to show my support, partly to see if I'd get any reactions). My head was a good couple of inches higher than usual, and whenever I noticed it in a reflection on a window, I smiled broadly.

There was a shout by someone a while behind me. "Yisrael! Yisrael!" I turned around and saw a woman. She shouted to me — presumably in Hebrew — and stuck her thumb up. I grinned and stuck my thumb up high, before continuing on my way.

A few of my friends said it might be dangerous to wear it in public. So naturally, I decided that I must go back into town some time wearing it. This is England, after all. A free country. Who's going to attack a 17-year-old girl for wearing a flag?

Second post, July 29th:

I went to town yesterday to pick up a friend from the train station. I wore my Israeli flag as a cape again. At one point, two girls stopped me and asked if I was from Israel. I replied "No, and I'm not Jewish either, but I do support Israel." They said they were from Israel. I asked them why they were here, and they said because of the war. They seemed to be happy about the flag. I walked away smiling, glad to make them feel welcome in England.

Later on that day, someone I passed called out "Shalom!" I turned around and started talking to this guy. As far as I could gather, he used to be a medic in Israel for the army. He shook my hand, said something in Hebrew, and I think he prayed or something like that. So far I had had only good reactions, which was rather cool.

Today, however, was something different. I was at the train station to pick up another friend, when some guy approached us and asked why I was wearing the flag. I said that I support Israel. He said something to the effect that I had "better take it off". I shrugged this off and we went on our way.

About five minutes later, he approached us again and said "What did I tell you?" I looked a bit confused. "Take it off," he demanded. He kept looking at me, so I took it off so he'd stop (he was rather intimidating). When my other friend arrived and we left the station, I put the flag back on and we went back into the centre of town.

After stopping for some food, we went to our bus stop. By this time, it was around 7:10pm, but still broad daylight (being summer). I was alarmed to find the same guy approaching me again. He stopped in front of me and said "What did I tell you? Take it off. If I see you again with it I'll hurt you."

Now that wasn't pleasant. I wasn't all that scared at the time, though it was annoying that I had to take the cape off. But now I'm a bit scared of going into town while wearing it, in case he might be there.

Third post, August 10th:

I went into town again today with my sister, my friend, and my Israeli flag-cape. We were walking down a busy street when I saw the same guy from before. "Shit," I thought, and we quickly walked past. He shouted behind us "Take it off! Take it off!" Somewhat worried, I discreetly took off my flag (replacing it by an American flag).

We kept walking and I put the Israeli flag back on. The guy saw me again and shouted "Take it off! I'm coming for you!" Another guy was with him this time. We kept walking, turned a corner and ducked into a cafe, where my friend phoned the police. We kept looking out round the cafe door. Both guys were waiting on the other side of the street, watching for us to come out. At some point while we were talking to the police, they left.

We decided to go home. Shortly afterwards we were phoned by the police. They're coming later today to get a statement.

People have warned me that I shouldn't wear my flag in public. People don't understand why I still wear it, if I've been threatened, and have a fair chance of being threatened in the future.

Natan Sharansky, a Russian Jew, spent 10 years in prison and in labour camps in the Soviet Union for campaigning for human rights. They claimed it was because he was a spy, and they wanted him to 'confess' that he and his friends were American spies. If he 'confessed', they would let him go. But he didn't. He never did. He spent 10 long years in these hellish conditions for what he believed in.

Sharansky was a scientist, and while he was imprisoned, he thought of Galileo. Galileo was imprisoned and threatened with torture for saying that the earth revolved around the sun. Galileo gave in and finally said that he was wrong and the world was at rest. "If Galileo gave in, why shouldn't I?" Sharansky thought.

No. It was precisely because of Galileo that Sharansky did not give in. Because of Galileo, the world stayed in the state of having bad science for a lot longer than needed. Because of Galileo, people in similar situations ever since have thought "If he gave in, why shouldn't I?" Sharansky did not want people to think the same thing with him. In the end, after his years of imprisonment and mistreatment, Sharansky was freed. He had not once given in.

I don't want to be like Galileo. I want people to think, "If Lulie stood up for what she believes in, so should I!", just as Sharansky did.

In Natan Sharansky's book, A Case For Democracy, he proposed a test called the Town Square test. He wrote:

"If a person cannot walk into the middle of the town square and express his or her views without fear of arrest, imprisonment, or physical harm, then that person is living in a fear society, not a free society. We cannot rest until every person living in a 'fear society' has finally won their freedom."

Right now, Britain is failing the Town Square test. I don't want my country to be like this. I don't want to be scared into not showing my support for a cause that I feel strongly about. This is supposed to be a free country, dammit. I refuse to let anyone scare me into submission.

Am Yisrael Chai!

Update 1: Berkeley...?

Update 2: Alan is inspired to do the same.

Update 3: What the police have done so far. Very creditable.

Sun, 08/13/2006 - 23:02 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Sorry to say...

I'm surprised that it took until day three to have an incident that involved the authorities.

Well done, Lulie, I'm sure Israel is proud to have friends like you.

by Solomon on Mon, 08/14/2006 - 19:28 | reply

On the Rightous the World Stands

Thank You for supporting Israel and the Jewish people in their`s, many will say, worst moments in recent history.

It takes a lot of courage, to demonstrate a support the way You chose to. May it be that Hashem, God of Israel, bless You with His closeness for ever. Amen!

by Zeev Zion on Mon, 08/14/2006 - 20:36 | reply

Let my people go

Natan Sharansky would be proud of you. I am, too. :)

by Sissy Willis on Mon, 08/14/2006 - 20:45 | reply

Fear not

I much admire your courage and convictions. I wish I had had such clarity of conviction when I was 17. Do not fear, and do not let yourself be silenced.

(BTW, your reference to Galileo is only partly correct, and I encourage you to read more about the actual case. He was charged by the church for teaching heliocentrism as fact, rather than as theory (which it was, at the time); and astronomical research, including the advancement of heliocentric studies, continued quite vigorously.)

Good luck!

by Eddie on Mon, 08/14/2006 - 21:13 | reply

Good Show

Thanks for supporting Israel, especially as you're not Jewish! It's heart-warming.

Frankly, you've got more guts than I. I'm Jewish, and I live in New York, and I would never appear in daylight with an Israeli flag. You put me to shame.

I think your country actually passed the test really well. Look at it this way: There was only one guy who bothered you (ok, he was joined by a friend, once). I thought there'd be crowds brandishing their fists. However, much the response was encouraging, I wouldn't do this just anywhere. For instance, I wouldn't go into immigrant neighborhoods. That would be another thing altogether. It's one thing to be brave and another to be suicidal. There may indeed be hostile crowds in neighborhoods like that, and they would consider intimidating you as their own practice of "freedom of speech."

by Joanne on Tue, 08/15/2006 - 01:15 | reply

Oops, one more thing

I just realized that you were walking around Oxford, a university town! That was brave, as universities are generally hotbeds of anti-Israeli feeling. Maybe you didn't hit so much hostility because you did this during the summer and not during the academic year, when students, profs, etc. would be around.

by Joanne on Tue, 08/15/2006 - 01:19 | reply

Gay pride

Try showing homosexual affection (no kissing, just holding hands) in certain neighbourhoods. Well, maybe works if you're a girl; I don't know.

by a reader on Tue, 08/15/2006 - 06:34 | reply

Thanks!

Thanks for the support, and inspiration, Lulie! As long as Britain has folks like you fighting for her, all is not lost!

by Andy @ Cozy Corner on Tue, 08/15/2006 - 12:39 | reply

Thank you all for your kind a

Thank you all for your kind and encouraging words.

To a reader and Joanne: I see what you're saying, but I think this is a bit different. I wasn't trying to provoke anyone, or even confront anyone like ProtestWarrior do. I wasn't going to any particular parts of town where I knew there were violently anti-Israeli people. I was just expressing a view peacefully in the most public area of town. The Town Square test is not about whether you can go to an immigrant neighbourhood waving an Israeli flag in their faces and expecting everyone there not to bother you; it's about whether you can go to the town square -- where every subculture of that community goes -- and express your view peacefully without fear of harm. I don't mean it's acceptable for assault to happen anywhere, but that's not what the Town Square test is about. For one to be unable to go to the most public place in town and express an opinion means that one is unable to express that opinion, full stop. It means that there is no room for criticism on the way that society thinks and acts on things.

By the way, reader: I've seen gay men in Oxford holding hands. It's not a big deal here. At least in the city centre -- it might be in the Muslim areas.

by Lulie on Tue, 08/15/2006 - 13:09 | reply

Nicely said

"The Town Square test is not about whether you can go to an immigrant neighbourhood waving an Israeli flag in their faces and expecting everyone there not to bother you; it's about whether you can go to the town square -- where every subculture of that community goes -- and express your view peacefully without fear of harm...For one to be unable to go to the most public place in town and express an opinion means that one is unable to express that opinion, full stop."

by Solomon on Tue, 08/15/2006 - 14:03 | reply

Good on you!!!

Thanx for supporting Israel.....we need it with all the islamcrap attacking us from all sides. Dont let these bastards scare you from freedom of speech. Keep up the good work and you should also take pics of anyone that threatens you.

Good luck,

Jay

by jay on Tue, 08/15/2006 - 18:44 | reply

Well...OK

Fair enough, Lulie, but I didn't mean to imply that you were being provocative in any manner. What I meant was that some people don't need much to be provoked. The fault would've been theirs, not yours. Anyway, maybe it's my squeamishness talking. Best wishes.

by Joanne on Tue, 08/15/2006 - 19:49 | reply

Thank you Lulie!

I really want to thank you for being so supportive of Israel. I am a proud Jewish girl living in Canada and while i have seen a few cars driving around with Irsaeli flags recently, i myself do not have the courage to do what you have done (which is a very sad thing).

I am glad that you have been able to stay safe and that you have had quite a few positive experiences. My cousin lives in the UK and i will tell him to be on the lookout for you if he is ever in Oxford!

by Lindsay on Tue, 08/15/2006 - 21:13 | reply

Well done, hold your head high

It takes some courage, I would shake your hand if I saw you in public.

by Jono on Wed, 08/16/2006 - 06:01 | reply

Wow

Hey there,

I found this website through Solomon's. I am a Canadian Jew. I must say that I am so amazed by you. You have tremendous courage and I commend you. Thank you for your support.

Justin.

by a reader on Wed, 08/16/2006 - 07:27 | reply

Gay men and whatnot, and flags

Yep: I was thinking of Muslim neighbourhoods. Not everyone knows to keep their fists to themselves.

As for wearing that flag: I don't count myself among the supporters of creating the state of Israel in 1948. None the less, if anyone attacked you for wearing that flag while I was nearby, I would launch a Voltairean counterassault on them.

As for the continued existence of the state of Israel today, that's a different matter. Let all those who support return to matters as of 100 years ago as a matter of knee-jerk reflex look at Yugoslavia - or (former?) Kurd territory for that matter. A wrong may have been done, but you don't make it right by committing yet another wrong. Chasing history and historical national and religious borderlines is essentially a pastime for fascists ("remember "Mare Nostrum"); leave things alone.

But in any case, I defend your right to wear that flag, and smile at seeing your brave heart.

by a reader on Wed, 08/16/2006 - 07:44 | reply

A wrong may have been done?

Reader: Please read our Short History of Israel and disabuse yourself of the misconceptions that currently inform your judgement of Israel's legitimacy in 1948. The Voltaireian impulse that would have you defend Lulie today would have been the least of several overwhelming moral reasons to support the creation of Israel in 1948 – and the Jewish National Home before that. It saved hundreds of thousands from genocide and millions from oppression, created incalculable good in practically every sphere of human endeavour, and wronged no one. The only wrongs that were done in 1948, and have been done since, were the vicious attempts to prevent that, and their consequences.

by Editor on Wed, 08/16/2006 - 08:29 | reply

Thank you for your link. Inte

Thank you for your link. Interesting reading and somewhat (but not totally) different than what I had hitherto believed history to be. I'll read more.

A retro-historical question that might seem silly: Why choose that precise site for a Jewish state when the most virulent anti-Jewish sentiments are to be found precisely among your new neighbours? I am not talking "rights" nor, nor ignorance of pre-Roman history. I just wonder why one would choose to settle land among one's worst enemies.

by a reader on Wed, 08/16/2006 - 13:40 | reply

Retro-historical question

You're very welcome.

Why choose that precise site...?

As you will see when you read further, there were many reasons, of which it is hard to pick a pre-eminent one. Several other possible sites were considered by Zionists during the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, of which we mention two in our Brief History: One was Uganda, which was briefly the majority choice in the Zionist movement. As this example shows, the stereotype of the Zionist movement as being driven by religiously-based irredentism is very wide of the mark. The scheme was never implemented, partly because it would have required a degree of organisational cooperation from the British that was, in the event, never forthcoming. Also that idea was overtaken by events as tens of thousands of Jewish refugees from the mass murders in Russia voted with their feet for Palestine. (Note that, at the time, and for several decades afterwards, the Jewish people had worse enemies than the Arabs, and very few friends who were in a position to help: it was far from being a case of 'settling among your worst enemies'.) The other was Alaska, which never became a refuge because the US Congress resolutely refused permission. Remember, casual antisemitism was endemic in the West at the time.

Other pertinent reasons were: that there was already a Jewish community in Palestine, small but culturally significant because of its long history and its tradition of Jewish scholarship. Also, of course, that there were many sites there of historical and religious significance to the Jewish people. Many of these were in Jerusalem, the holy city of the Jewish religion, which had had a Jewish majority since 1850. Then, also, there was the consideration that the safe haven for Jews would have to be a place where the existing non-Jewish population would benefit economically from an influx of Jews [of course, almost anywhere would have benefited, but that was not understood under the then-prevailing socialist economic consensus], and where, as the Balfour Declaration said, no one's civil or political rights would be adversely affected.

While none of these and other reasons would have been decisive in itself, taken together they left no other sane choice. Indeed, the whole thing happened too late. Had the State of Israel been founded a mere ten years earlier, it might well have saved millions from the Holocaust instead of merely hundreds of thousands.

by Editor on Wed, 08/16/2006 - 15:43 | reply

Curious

Love this idea Lulie but in the interests of fairness could you try the same experiment wearing the flag of Iran? Or maybe that of Hezbollah? (Not a nation state or a particularly attractive organisation in my eyes but nevertheless.)

I am sure that the vast majority of people won't even recognise these flags but I would be curious as to the reactions of those that do.

I would be willing to bet that should the police become involved they would tell you to take it off.

by Mike on Wed, 08/16/2006 - 22:07 | reply

Re: Curious

I understand why you might guess that's how it is. But the facts are not like that.

<http://www.girlontheright.com/2006/08/hezbollah-on-our-streets-in-our-cities.html>

it made me angry that they asked us to move, because "we were putting their guys in danger". Us? If there was danger, it didn't come from our side. Later on, when someone showed up with a Hezbollah flag, we pointed out to one of the cops that Hezbollah is recognized in Canada as a terror organization, and that man should be arrested.

At this rally, as usual, the potentially violent hezbollah supporters are left alone by the cops while the Israel supporters are told to get out of the way.

As to wearing flags ... as mentioned in the quote, someone had a Hezbollah flag even though it's apparently illegal in Canada to wave flags of terrorist organizations. But despite it being illegal, the cops still wouldn't stop it.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/blog/>

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 08/16/2006 - 22:29 | reply

Still Curious

Take your point Elliot, but a demonstration is a completely different circumstance.

I would be interested in the attitudes of 'ordinary' people on the street when presented with a non-threatening individual carrying a flag that is very much regarded as threatening in our society, much as the Israeli flag is to some. (Not me I hasten to add.)

by Mike on Thu, 08/17/2006 - 13:26 | reply

A flag is a 'passion' accessory

Well done Lulie!

by John H on Fri, 08/18/2006 - 00:52 | reply

Re: Still curious

A demonstration is indeed a different circumstance and does not directly address the town-square-test issue. Nevertheless, scenes like this are nowadays frequently seen in Britain and would seem to make it implausible that the British police would harrass an otherwise nonthreatening person solely for wearing a Hezbollah flag in a 'town square' situation. It is still more implausible, on general grounds, that in Britain such a person would have cause to fear assault by supporters of Israel, for that is simply not a stance that is condoned, let alone adopted, by such factions.

Having said that, the two situations would not, in fact, be remotely comparable. Supporters of Iran and of islamic terrorist organisations frequently threaten actual violence, against British people, in Britain. For instance, there are the threats against Salman Rushdie's life, and the repeated threats to behead infidels, bring 9-11 to Britain and so on. And there has been actual mass murder, and attempted mass murder, of British people, in Britain, in the names of those causes. If British law were to ban the incitement to commit such acts, whether by wearing flags or otherwise, this would in no way violate the town square test.

by Editor on Fri, 08/18/2006 - 11:20 | reply

Re Re Curious

Editor

Again you have chosen an image of someone demonstrating. To say that this scene occurs frequently in the UK is a huge exaggeration. Last year I lived in Birmingham I have family in Bradford (Both areas with significant Muslim populations) who I visited regularly and I can say I that I have never seen anyone wearing a Hezbollah t-shirt or carrying an Iranian flag. I am not saying it doesn't happen but it certainly doesn't happen frequently.

Mike

PS. Could you make the verification questions slightly more challenging please. Just about anybody can post here!

I am also not saying that it is supporters of Israel necessarily who may attack the person but ordinary British citizens, or maybe even more moderate Muslims who don't want to be associated with the actions of extremists. If Lulie in this case succeeded then that would be great, however until the experiment is undertaken we have no proof either way.

I am merely interested in the reaction of people to flags, and there meaning.

Are you not even slightly curious?

by Mike on Fri, 08/18/2006 - 12:50 | reply

Mike, if you are so curious w

Mike, if you are so curious why don't you do it?

by a reader on Sat, 08/19/2006 - 10:12 | reply

not sure about this flag business....

hmmm... i'm not too sure about this Israeli flag thing.

i'm mean, not everyone , in everyday situations, walks around with a flag draped around them.

a much better test would be a t-shirt, with the Israel flag on it , or maybe "i support the IDF" on it.

an interesting experiment would be to do the town square test using two different t-shirts - do the first test with an israeli t-shirt, then do another with a hezbollah or PLO style t-shirt.

Record the reactions, what happens, etc...

by archduke on Sat, 08/19/2006 - 17:21 | reply

bravo!

oh sorry - i forgot to say - well done!
it sure is a very very interesting (and brave!) experiment you have conducted.

Supporters of Israel , like myself, in the UK, really need to push this one. Or have the Islamists stolen the agenda in our country to such an extent that it is now dangerous to express support for Israel openly? I dearly hope it is not.

by archduke on Sat, 08/19/2006 - 17:30 | reply

Flags

Hezbollah's flag depicts a machine gun because that's what Hezbollah is.

Israel's flag depicts a shield because that's what Israel is.

by a reader on Sat, 08/19/2006 - 18:29 | reply

good point. i cant add anymo

good point.
i cant add anymore to that...

by archduke on Sat, 08/19/2006 - 23:45 | reply

Remember Cambridge is quite a

Remember Cambridge is quite an international city with the university and everything. I think that if you walked through any other town/city in Britain you would have a much stronger response.

Thank you for supporting Israel, Peace, and Democracy!

by a reader on Sun, 08/20/2006 - 09:15 | reply

I'm afraid I wouldn't recomme

I'm afraid I wouldn't recommend you to do that in the centre of Birmingham, England's second city. That would be risky. There are many representatives of a certain peaceful religion in Brum.

by Trofim on Sun, 08/20/2006 - 10:00 | reply

The moral issue

Mike and archduke:

Consider the moral implications of the 'experiment' you are suggesting.

As we wrote, this event was primarily an expression of a political opinion and only secondarily an application of the town square test to Britain.

The opinion being expressed was a morally right one even though it is, alas, unpopular. Expressing it was a noteworthy event for many reasons. As some of the discussions that this has raised on other blogs, and several of the coments on this thread, show, it has caused people to re-examine their own criteria for expressing their support for Israel, and to reconsider their own assessments of a society in which revealing one's support for Israel is an act of bravery.

Expressing the opposite opinion in the same way would be morally wrong to at least the same degree as expressing this opinion was morally right. Neither the principle of freedom of speech nor that of scientific curiosity erases the distinction between right and wrong. In this case it is the distinction between incidentally offending people who support mass murderers, and deliberately contributing to the intimidation of people who support their victims. Doing the latter would be indefensible.

In answer to your question Mike, no, we are not curious because, for the reasons we gave above among others, we are in no doubt that you are mistaken in your belief that British police would forcibly remove an Iranian or Hezbollah flag if displayed under similar circumstances.

by Editor on Sun, 08/20/2006 - 15:16 | reply

good explanation

ah yes of course.

well explained Editor. thanks.

(and i do love those maths questions when submitting - helps the braincells... very novel.)

by archduke on Sun, 08/20/2006 - 21:59 | reply

Fair Enough

OK, editor I will go with that.

A reader, I would have thought the reason I would not do it was obvious, I am a lilly livered, yellow bellied piece of skirt!

Bloody hell, 8X6. That is a tough one.

by Mike on Mon, 08/21/2006 - 01:48 | reply

I like Archduke's t-shirt idea

I live in Israel and am trying to picture what would happen if a citizen (Muslim or Jew) wore a Palestinian flag in public. I think it would be met with suspicion if not outright harassment, and in some cases / areas, violence. For this I'm ashamed. re a Hezbollah flag -- forget it in Jewish areas, although it would be OK in Arab towns. For this, though, I'm not ashamed: They're out-and-out terrorists. Way to go, Lulie!

by Miriam Erez on Mon, 08/21/2006 - 06:44 | reply

Well Done

Stick to your principles - and don't allow others to put you down.

by David Wildgoose on Mon, 08/21/2006 - 07:17 | reply

Wearing the Israeli Flag

Well done. Never be afraid to voice your opinion in a free country. The trouble is tha England is all that free today and has double standards. The next time you go into town and want to wear the flag may I suggest that you take a few "heavies" with you and keep them in the background but close at hand and hope that the guy who previously threatened you "tries is luck" again. If he does let the 'heavies" teach him a lesson he wont forget. Good luck and Israel thanks you for your support.

by Spencer on Mon, 08/21/2006 - 12:26 | reply

Well done!

Lulie: I did the same in Buenos Aires, Argentina last month. It made me feel proud and awkward at the same time but it was worth it. Nothing happened although the people looked strange.

In Buenos Aires

It is really worth it. Thank you for your tale and I hope the guy gets arrested for threats.

by Fabian on Tue, 08/22/2006 - 15:40 | reply

2 Experiments for the price of one

At my blog, I'm proposing merging this experiment with the "mass lone protest evening"...

by Francis on Wed, 08/23/2006 - 15:58 | reply

Time for some Krav Maga lessons

Well done, of course, Lulie, but if you're going to do that sort of thing then it's high time you looked into taking some martial arts classes. Krav Maga would be in keeping with your Israeli theme, and it also has the advantage of being pretty widespread, well-taught, and practical.

by Tim Starr on Tue, 08/29/2006 - 18:10 | reply

Failing the test

This is a great idea and I admire you for publicly standing up for Israel.

It seems a little harsh to say that Britain as a whole "is failing the town square test". It sounds as if pretty much all the harassment was from just one persistent individual who kept popping up. He sounds like a stalker and I hope the police follow up with him, but that's not the same as society in general being intolerant.

Out of curiosity, did that one guy (and his friend who appeared later) appear to be Muslim?

by Infidel on Fri, 09/08/2006 - 12:35 | reply

Hezbollah flag

People walk around freely around England wearing the kaffiyah - the (unofficial but widely recognised) PLO symbol - an organisation whose charter endorses genocide. Nobody dares challenge them.

Fact.

Well done, Lulie!

by Yoni on Sat, 09/09/2006 - 19:31 | reply

Dear Lulie, I am very gra

Dear Lulie,

I am very grateful for what you have done. Can you please elaborate as to what happened with the police? And are you planning on coming to the Washington, D.C. area any time soon?

by a grateful American on Mon, 09/11/2006 - 01:15 | reply

Updates With The Police

Infidel: Yeah, the main guy seemed to be Muslim. I didn't see the other guy much, so I'm not sure.

As for what happened with the police: they came over and took a statement from me and the friend who phoned the police. Later, they phoned me to ask me to come in to see if I could identify the guy. They showed me some pictures of people who it might be, but none were him. They're currently in the process of checking the CCTV cameras for him.

I've actually seen him again since this story. We just walked past each other in a busy street and exchanged a look. I wasn't wearing a flag then, so I only got a snigger this time. The police have told me to phone them if I see him, so I did that straight afterwards. They're checking the CCTV cameras for that too.

I'm glad to see they're taking this case surprisingly seriously.

-Lulie

by Lulie on Mon, 09/11/2006 - 11:44 | reply

Why would you support Israel

Besides this being a total fairy tale, I want to know why anyone would support a country that was made by stealing Palestinian land by killing and ejecting the rightful owners?

What rights do Arabs, Muslims have in Israel? Forget about wearing a Palestinian flag in Tel Aviv. Israel targets and attacks anyone around the world who even calls Palestine a country.

Your full of bullshit - everything on this site

Editors' note: Normally we would delete any comment from someone whose e-mail address purports to be killalljews@now.com. Moreover, we might not always permit comments characterising this site as excrement and/or accusing us of lying. But we have decided to do so on this occasion and to reply. See our comment below.

by a humanitarian on Thu, 09/21/2006 - 12:28 | reply

Re: Why would you support Israel

"What rights do arabs, muslims have in Israel?"

For one, they have the right to be part of the government. For another, Arab legislators have the right to address the Knesset in Arabic, not Hebrew, and have it translated.

They have other rights as well. A better question might be: what rights don't they have?

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Thu, 09/21/2006 - 13:07 | reply

Re: Why would you support Israel

This is not a forum for the vulgar abuse of its owners, let alone for making antisemitic death threats ('a humanitarian's' purported e-mail address being killalljews@now.com), and we make no promise that in future we shall permit comments characterising this site as excrement and/or accusing us of lying. We do so in this case for two reasons.

The first is that 'a humanitarian's' comment is an unusually concise illustration of how one is compelled to believe extreme factual falsehoods if one is to sustain an anti-Zionist moral position. Look how important it is to 'a humanitarian' that he speak out and declare to be a "total fairy tale" some events in Oxford that he has no knowledge of whatsoever. For he feels he does. Similarly, he feels obliged to bear witness to his completely baseless fantasy that Israel "targets and attacks anyone around the world who even calls Palestine a country" - and on the same day that Israel's Foreign Minister passionately called for the establishment of a Palestinian state living in peace side by side with Israel.

Our second reason is this: 'a humanitarian' presumably wants to think of himself as a humanitarian. In view of the deep and murderous hatred he expressed here, it is pointless to beg him to discover the facts before he expresses it again. But there is a lesser thing that we might urge him to do: find out what the opposing position (the one adopted by actual Israelis and Zionists, not the monsters in his head) is. And before even doing that he might do well to look here.

by Editor on Thu, 09/21/2006 - 16:42 | reply

Does this mean I can wear a Swastika as a cape too?

A symbol of hatred, illegal occupation and the forceful attempt to erradicate an entire race: This is what the Israeli flag has come to represent which why it is so offensive that you trivialise it. I always thought the strong use of colour and hindu symbology made the Swastika a striking flag but I would never be so disrespectful to those that suffered under the Nazi regime to suddenly start wearing it as a cape... Idiot.

by a reader on Sun, 10/22/2006 - 15:09 | reply

False Parallelism

a reader wrote

A symbol of hatred, illegal occupation and the forceful attempt to erradicate an entire race: This is what the Israeli flag has come to represent which why it is so offensive that you trivialise it.

The last two allegations (illegal occupation and racial eradication) are demonstrably false. As for the first one (hatred) I agree with the reader: In my experience, and I put it to you as an objective fact, the hatred is the one directed toward Israel by those in Arab and Muslem societies (including non-Arab Iran, etc.) whose ideal society is one in which tyranny, religious or otherwise, is the common order. They incite and use hatred against Israel, the US, and more broadly the entire Western civilization as a way to further and perpetuate this very ideal.

-- Cyrus Ferdowsi, <http://libiran.blogspot.com>

by Liberal Iranian on Fri, 10/27/2006 - 20:31 | reply

Heart Warming

Brave move and I commend you! Appearances should not matter...Freedom of Speech should not mean you can be bullied or threatened. Anyone who thinks Freedom of Speech is something that can be used for aggression is exploiting the whole concept and is the reason why we are losing our freedoms...Having the right to say what you want does not excuse one to incite violence or fear through what is said!

Although I don't support Israel in all it does but I would never think of yelling at someone for wearing the flag or even be annoyed in the least. I would not even give the person a third look (anyone who has a flag around them gets a second look :P). It is refreshing to see that you weren't attacked by extremeist idiots (well not all that quickly). I don't really support either 'side' when it comes to Israel (both view points have compelling arguments). My only hope is that there is peace and soon.

by MRG on Sat, 02/24/2007 - 16:33 | reply

A Light unto the Nations.

I would like to share with you two brief conversations I have had recently.

I was told by one friend that this is the "tisk, tisk" society of people who care but who will do nothing. I asked her what it will take for people to stand up against the hate and she said, most likely it will happen after 17 bomb the Parliament Buildings and not get caught planning it.

I never think in terms of miracles, but last night I spoke with my son about every happy moment being precious and in it's own way, a miracle.

Thank you for you being a miracle...a sign of hope...a light unto the nations...

l'chaim

clink

rochelle

by Rochelle Michaels on Tue, 02/27/2007 - 17:57 | reply

This is brave

I am thinking of doing the same, i have worn my magen david chian over my shirt before but this is really nothing. I have an Israel flag on my wall and i may put it to the test. i think a shirt with the flag printed on would me more suitable. You dont see many people with flags around so it can be seen as provocative however you are still 100% right to do it and no one has any right to threaten you with violence for doing so. The fact that a man would threaten a 17 year old girl, shows how low these kind of people are, the reason a person with a hizbolah flag would not be attacked is because the attackers are those people.

by Roy on Wed, 03/07/2007 - 04:54 | reply

Free Burma!

Free Burma!

International Bloggers' Day for Burma on the 4th of October

International bloggers are preparing an action to support the peaceful revolution in Burma. We want to set a sign for freedom and show our sympathy for these people who are fighting their cruel regime without weapons. These Bloggers are planning to refrain from posting to their blogs on October 4 and just put up one Banner then, underlined with the words „Free Burma!“.

www.free-burma.org

by Free Burma! on Sun, 09/30/2007 - 19:50 | reply

Thank you

I do not even know if you check the comments made on this page anymore, but even for the sake of the other visitors of your website, I have to state the reverence I have for your actions. Your test is very meaningful, regardless if one supports Israel or not. Your test could have been any single one of a plethora of controversial political icons.

The most important thing, however, is that you have revealed an up-and-coming crisis for Western Society. Could the freedoms we so take for granted be in jeopardy? What you did took guts, and you put your neck on the line for what you believe in. The world needs more people like you.

by a reader on Wed, 03/12/2008 - 18:14 | reply

The Rising Tide Of Insanity

We said some time ago that the War on Terror would be more accurately called the war against conspiracy theories. And we have occasionally pointed out how conspiracy-theoretic thinking is becoming common in the mainstream of political debate.

Things are still getting worse. According to a recent opinion poll,

More than a third of the American public suspects that federal officials assisted in the 9/11 terrorist attacks or took no action to stop them so the United States could go to war in the Middle East

Note the characteristic conspiracy-theoretic allegation that powerful malevolent people are acting ostensibly with one agenda (protecting Americans from harm) that has popular support, while secretly pursuing a different and incompatible agenda that does not have popular support (because it involves mass-murdering Americans). And hence that the people who support the current policies because of their ostensible purpose (such as ourselves) are dupes.

In a structurally similar conspiracy theory regarding Israel, the Washington Post reporter Thomas Ricks – a Pentagon correspondent, no less – has claimed that during the recent fighting in Lebanon, Israel purposely left Hezbollah missile launchers intact, so that they would be used to murder Israelis and hence provide public-relations justification for Israel's incursions into Lebanon, whose ostensible purpose was to prevent precisely such murders.

Those two conspiracy theories share a degree of detachment from reality that is so extreme that if it occurred outside the political arena it would uncontroversially count as insanity. And yet they enjoy mainstream acceptance, and respect even from many who do not (yet) share them. But there is worse: these delusions are not random. They are focused – on evil – in a manner, and to a degree, not condoned in the West since the 1930s.

By this measure, the war is being lost. We can only repeat the call we made before: Persuade them. Persuade them because in the long run, if you fail to persuade them, they will kill you.

Re: Persuade Them

I try.

Good post.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/blog/>

by Elliot Temple on Fri, 08/18/2006 - 00:37 | reply

Immigrants

In my observation, the situation is getting particularly worse among middle-eastern immigrant communities in the West. The less assimilated they remain, the worse this sort of thinking becomes too. And the more "intellectual" among them are also more likely to be reading and relating to the likes of Chomsky and hence be influenced by them. So, I see it as partly an identity problem, and partly irrational intellectualism.

-- Cyrus Ferdowsi, <http://libiran.blogspot.com>

by Liberal Iranian on Fri, 08/18/2006 - 20:20 | reply

Like that one about..

Nazis starting the Reichstad fire. C'mon gimme a break!

by a reader on Sat, 08/19/2006 - 00:41 | reply

Is Wikipedia correct on the h

Is Wikipedia correct on the history surrounding these events?

by a reader on Sat, 08/19/2006 - 10:35 | reply

Reichstag fire

The Wikipedia article on the Reichstag fire currently includes the assertion "During the election campaign, the Nazis had run on a platform of fervent anti-terrorism". But in reality the platform of the Nazis (see, for instance, the Program of the NSDAP) was not based on anti-terrorism but on irredentism, antisemitism, conspiracy theories, victimhood-based nationalism, and totalitarianism. Reinterpreting Nazism, or Nazi claims to be preventing a Communist revolution, as "fervent anti-terrorism" is no more than a pathetic present-day attempt to justify the 'Bush=Hitler' trope and the associated conspiracy theories.

The alleged relevance of the Reichstag fire to the discussion here is presumably this: if it is insane to believe that the Bush Administration was complicit in the 9-11 attack, why was it reasonable to suspect that the Nazis were responsible for the Reichstag fire? The answer is that although the two theories have superficial similarities - they both allege conspiracies by governments to destroy buildings - the latter does not have any of the attributes that make conspiracy theories irrational (and so is not a conspiracy theory in the usual sense of the term). In particular, secretly setting the Reichstag fire (or secretly persuading a single dupe to set it, as the case may be) would not have involved any dedicated Nazi in doing anything contrary to the Nazis' publicly defended ideology. Therefore it does not require the Nazis to have had a secret ideology that violently conflicted with their overt one, does not entail an impossible recruitment system, dupe-management system, and so on.

We urge you to read our series on conspiracy theories.

by Editor on Sat, 08/19/2006 - 12:24 | reply

In other words

"The World" has the only "true" interpretation of the facts. All other theories should be discounted.

by a reader on Sun, 08/20/2006 - 22:51 | reply

Other Words

I think that those are not just other words, but a false assertion of the implications of the original words.

The World responded to an assertion that the commonly accepted theory that Nazis started the Reichstag fire was similar to the conspiracy theories that they criticize, by explaining why the theories are different.

The reader ignores the argument and implies that The World claims some sort of unique authority over interpretation of facts. This is in direct conflict with the evidence and is not only misleading, but rude.

Gil

by Gil on Mon, 08/21/2006 - 00:08 | reply

Re: Immigrants

Welcome, Liberal Iranian.

What you have observed is no doubt representative - a very sad and worrying fact. However, there must be something more to it than "partly an identity problem, and partly irrational intellectualism". For that does not, in itself, seem to explain the focus on evil. In the past, silly intellectuals with or without identity problems have believed in all sorts of silly things like spiritualism, telepathy, Esperanto, Freud, Jung, muesli, flower power, yogis, and murderous totalitarian tyranny. Moreover, generally, only a small proportion of all irrationality descends to the level of insanity. Now it seems to be murderous totalitarian tyranny all the way down, and insanity is mainstream.

by Editor on Mon, 08/21/2006 - 00:51 | reply

Re: Other Words

1. If the Nazis were indeed "secretly" behind the fire doesn't that imply that their publicly stated objective were different? Why go to the bother of doing it secretly? Why couldn't the Nazis just publicly say: "Let's burn down the Reichstag!"?

2. The World implies that the US government could not possibly be involved in 9/11. (btw, I am not implying that it absolutely was involved) Like any good detective examining a crime, one has to ask: Who stood to benefit from the crime? One of the obvious answers is: government officials.

3. There is a good deal of evidence that the US government did know about Pearl Harbor beforehand and had been trying for some time to provoke such an attack. Let's assume for a second that this was an absolutely proven fact. Gil, would you be outraged by such a conspiracy? My guess is no. Because you believe US participation in WWII was a good thing anyway. Similarly, my guess is that if you had evidence that the US government (hypothetically) allowed 9/11 to happen that you would sit on it. Because, even though you were appalled by 9/11, you are happy to see the US (and more broadly the west in general) involve in a war on the Arab/Islamic world

by a reader on Mon, 08/21/2006 - 04:48 | reply

Outrage

I would indeed be outraged by a conspiracy to allow the Pearl Harbor attack to be successful, as a means to get into the war (and, btw, I have been outraged by this possibility for quite a few years). The government has an obligation to defend the country, and this would have been a massive betrayal regardless of the ends desired. I would think, by the way, that the fact that the attack was attempted at all would have been sufficient for propaganda purposes, even if the attack was met with a successful defense.

I would feel similarly about complicity with the 9/11 attack.

I am absolutely not "happy" to see the US involved in a war.

I do prefer that actual threats be recognized and addressed earlier rather than later, to help minimize them before more casualties are necessary. But, I don't think that this recognition requires, or justifies, mass murder.

If I knew of such a crime, I would not sit on it, but I would do what I could to bring the facts to light and the criminals to justice.

For some reason, I still have enough confidence in most people to trust them to handle the truth reasonably. I think they can distinguish between criminal internal conspiracies and real external threats.

Gil

by Gil on Mon, 08/21/2006 - 06:07 | reply

The Israeli commando raid

The Angry Arab comments on the recent failed Israeli commando raid.

Interesting observation.

by a reader on Tue, 08/22/2006 - 08:01 | reply

Thin line between naïve conspiracism and naïve cynicism

While some fall into the folly of assuming that every conspiracy-theory is meritorious simply because it is possible, even though it has no concrete support -- others run blindly to the other end of the spectrum and flippantly dismiss anything that even sounds conspiratorial, regardless of the amount of support it has. A good middle ground would seem to be to maintain a healthy suspicion toward any power-structure whose ability to operate clandestinely makes it largely unaccountable in the public sphere, while reserving final judgment until all of the facts of the matter have come to light (or as many as can be discerned given the nature of the case). And if one should question whether the USA has the ability to operate in such a clandestine manner in the global sphere, making bed-fellows out of our enemies only to use that alliance to a strategic advantage (while the public remains largely ignorant until after the fact), I might remind you of the Dixie Mission's approval of the Maoists, followed shortly by the US backing the KMT in the Chinese civil war; and Eisenhower's formal recognition of Castro, followed shortly by the Bay of Pigs invasion and Operation Mongoose. Money is a powerful motivator, and history shows time and again that it is often-times a more valued commodity than human life or civil rights.

by MonkeeSage on Thu, 08/24/2006 - 19:50 | reply

The Rising Tide of Insanity

It is the height of insanity to call this The Rising Tide of Insanity. Height of insanity is said tongue in cheek. In fact this phenomenon has nothing to do with insanity. It has only to do with the easy sloppy habits of current argument.

The War on Terror is another fine example:

Please explain how you fight a War on Terror. Where for example do you place your army? Now to call this a War on Conspiracy Theories goes even one step further in ridiculous rhetoric. Call it what it is.

The Argument for Reason. The Argument Against Ideology. The Thinking Man's Guide to Thinking Rationally. Banish Such Banal Titles as The Rising Tide of Insanity. Please.

by a reader on Mon, 08/28/2006 - 04:36 | reply

Re: The Rising Tide of Insanity

We shall, when we are convinced that there is a psychological difference between believing that the 9-11 attacks were perpetrated by the US Government, and believing that one is the Emperor Napoleon.

by Editor on Mon, 08/28/2006 - 15:16 | reply

Fair Enough

Glad you set the record straight.

by a reader on Mon, 08/28/2006 - 23:55 | reply

Re: Other Words

1. If the Nazis were indeed "secretly" behind the fire doesn't that imply that their publicly stated objective were different? Why go to the bother of doing it secretly? Why couldn't the Nazis just publicly say: "Let's burn down the Reichstag!"?

The Nazis' publicly stated objectives were the destruction of liberal democracy in favour of national socialism, i.e. - state control of the economy and enslaving or exterminating "non-Aryans". Setting fire to the Reichstag, blaming communists and using this as an excuse to murder or imprison their political opponents is entirely consistent with this ideology.

2. The World implies that the US government could not possibly be involved in 9/11. (btw, I am not implying that it absolutely was involved) Like any good detective examining a crime, one has to ask: Who stood to benefit from the crime? One of the obvious answers is: government officials.

The American government claims to want to save lives. Even the stupid actions they take that result in the deaths of many people seem to be taken with that objective in mind, e.g. - the War on Drugs. In terms of their stated values they did not benefit from 9/11. So your assertion relies on the American government having motives different from their stated motives.

3. There is a good deal of evidence that the US government did know about Pearl Harbor beforehand and had been trying for some time to provoke such an attack. Let's assume for a second that this was an absolutely proven fact. Gil, would you be outraged by such a conspiracy? My guess is no. Because you believe US participation in WWII was a good thing anyway. Similarly, my guess is that if you had evidence that the US government (hypothetically) allowed 9/11 to happen that you would sit on it. Because, even though you were appalled by 9/11, you are happy to see the US (and more broadly the west in general) involve in a war on the Arab/Islamic world

I would be disgusted by FDR's actions if I thought FDR had allowed Pearl Harbour to happen in order to get America into WW2. But the idea that FDR deliberately allowed Pearl Harbour is false. And as FDR never publicly expressed any wish to harm Americans as opposed to helping them again this is a conspiracy theory. FDR did plenty of stupid things for which we can justly berate him, allowing Pearl Harbour to happen deliberately was not one of them.

by Alan Forrester on Sun, 09/10/2006 - 21:19 | reply

Logic 101

Alan Forrester: "So your assertion relies on the American government having motives different from their stated motives."

I do believe he's finally got it! Congrats, Alan. Most people are addicted to drugs, religion or some other ideology. There are a handful that are sober when they write something. I'm having a martini right now!

Many are stuck on a "good and just" America and can't even admit the other logical possibilities that aren't so happy and innocent. The same people that plead "logic" and "sanity" are the very people won't don't understand that logic is about working through all existing possibilities methodically. Discounting possibilities without being able to disprove them is the true insanity. We don't teach critical thinking skills in schools because... we can't think critically.

In fact, assimilating a large network of political facts together requires an extensive hard drive in that cranium of yours so it's not surprising that people still running Windows 3.1 can't understand beyond the fluffy surface of happy-happy-joy-joy. Those people edit Wikipedia and believe that people tend to edit in "good faith", hahaha. Loooooneytooooooons. Do you hear windmills in your mind.

by Easter Bunny from Hell on Thu, 09/14/2006 - 08:36 | reply

Loonies on the horizon

"Many are stuck on a "good and just" America and can't even admit the other logical possibilities that aren't so happy and innocent"

America is a human mental construct. America cannot be 'good' or 'bad': only people can be either.

The loonies who go around believing in the most complex and unlikely theories simply because they are the most complex and unlikely, are the last people who should lecture the sane among us on critical thinking skills.

by Yoni on Sat, 09/16/2006 - 16:26 | reply

Re: Logic 101

Many are stuck on a "good and just" America and can't even admit the other logical possibilities that aren't so happy and innocent. The same people that plead "logic" and "sanity" are the very people won't don't understand that logic is about working through all existing possibilities methodically. Discounting possibilities without being able to disprove them is the true insanity. We don't teach critical thinking skills in schools because... we can't think critically.

The title of your post is rather ironic as the one thing nobody could learn from it is logic. There are an infinite number of possible explanations, including an infinite number of theories in which the whole world is a dream in my mind. So I could not methodically work my way through all of the possible explanations. And as you are not running down the infinite list I can see that you don't take your own idea seriously. So let's move on to how we really can learn about the world. We can learn by proposing explanations and subjecting them to criticism. Sometimes we can even exclude a whole category of explanations because they are all susceptible to arguments of a particular form. I exclude all explanations that involve the external world not being a dream in my head without running through all of them by using a philosophical argument against solipsism, which may be found in The Fabric of Reality, by David Deutsch. Basically the world I see around me is complicated and autonomous from me so all solipsism really does is relabel the external world as a dream. Similarly I exclude all conspiracy theoretic arguments by arguments which may be found here.

by Alan Forrester on Thu, 09/21/2006 - 20:27 | reply

Rising Tide of Insanity

Bravo!

by Jeanie Starr on Mon, 10/16/2006 - 09:20 | reply

Test for Conspiracy Theories.

I suggest another 'test' that conspiracy theories should be held up to:

Assume that you are one of the ring-leaders, at the start of the planning phase of this conspiracy.

Assume that you wish to achieve their aims (according to the conspiracy theorists) - power, wealth, a war with the Middle East, accessing Iraqi oil supplies, whatever.

What courses of action are open to you? How risky is each? How costly?

Given the various alternatives, is it possible that you would select 'the conspiracy theory' as a suitable way forward?

I believe that the USA-involvement-in-9/11 conspiracy completely fails this test. There are so many simpler, cheaper, and safer ways for the USA administration to achieve the nefarious aims attributed to them by the conspiracy theorists - if they wanted to. Which one depends on what you believe the USA's aims were.

E.g. - Getting their hands in Iraqi oil. It would have been so much easier for the USA to cut a deal with Iraq than to engineer a war. The USA was the driving force behind maintaining the UN sanctions, and could have had them lifted if they wanted to. They could have negotiated almost anything with Saddam - exclusive oil deals, US military bases on Iraqi soil, etc. Saddam was a pragmatist above all else. With the USA with him, rather than against him...

by Mk on Mon, 04/30/2007 - 13:39 | reply

'Human Rights' In The Cause Of Tyranny: Who Is To Blame?

There is some damning criticism of Human Rights Watch in this article by Alan Dershowitz. In regard to Lebanon, it leaves little room to regard HRW as more than a Hezbollah propaganda organ – and a crude one at that. And Amnesty International is even worse, says Kenneth Anderson, who also claims that:

It's not merely an organization or a movement that is at risk - it is the credibility of human rights itself.

If the very concept of protecting human rights is being eroded because its most prominent advocates insist on siding with tyranny, who is to blame? The 'moonbats' and 'idiotarians' who run those organisations? Well, yes, of course. But also, no. For evil to triumph, it suffices that good people do nothing.

And good people are doing nothing. Where are the impartial human-rights organisations? The ones that conscientiously investigate alleged atrocities and then take a reputable view about what, factually, happened. The ones that support the liberation of Iraq and Afghanistan, support the existence and self-defence of Israel, recognise the need to use force to protect lives and liberties, and want it to be used morally. The ones that care both about the humane treatment of terrorists by the armed forces of the US and Israel and others who are trying desperately to save innocent lives and about the appalling violations of human rights perpetrated and planned by those terrorists and the tyrannical governments that support them. And keep those two issues in their morally proper perspective.

They are missing. And that is through no fault of the anti-war movement. It is entirely the fault of our side.

Update: Alan has further comments at Elegance Against Ignorance.

Further update: If you're interested in this issue it is worth reading this article by Dershowitz, mainly about Amnesty International's recent condemnation of Israel, and this uncompromising but remarkably empty defence of both Amnesty and HRW, entitled "Diversionary Strike On a Rights Group".

Sun, 08/27/2006 - 17:00 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Questions

I agree with your central statement. But two questions remain to be answered:

1. Why?--Why these sort of human-rights organizations have not been created? Are "good people" disillusioned with the whole idea of such organizations? Are they busy with other higher priority tasks? Have they put their trust with the existing ones? Are there enough "good people" committed to seeing such a (monumental) task through?

2. How?--How and by whom should such orgnaizations be created? What is the proper venue and foundation? Source of funding? Etc.

-- Cyrus Ferdowsi, <http://libiran.blogspot.com>

by Liberal Iranian on Mon, 08/28/2006 - 19:38 | reply

liberation of Iraq?

Any human rights organization that seriously claimed that Iragis have been "liberated" would be laughed out of town.

by a reader on Wed, 08/30/2006 - 01:46 | reply

Re: liberation of Iraq?

Why?

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/blog/>

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 08/30/2006 - 03:06 | reply

Re: Re: liberation of Iraq?

By most people's standards Abu Ghraib tortute, raping of young women by soldiers, and violence verging on civil war does not qualify as "liberty". Even by the World's own proclaimed standards Iraq is not "liberated". I invite you to do the "town square" test there Elliot. (if we restrict that test to Iraqi citizens, not an outsider like you would be, it would still fail.) Even by the World's weak standard of (at least) supporting Israel, Iraq fails (Mr. Maliki condemned Israel's actions in Lebanon)

To cite the "liberation" of Iraq in the same paragraph with the other cited actions merely serves to bring those into question as well.

by a reader on Wed, 08/30/2006 - 12:44 | reply

Re: liberation of Iraq?

Is passing the town square test your standard for qualifying for the term 'liberation'?

One problem with that is that very few countries pass the town square test completely. For instance, in Britain after World War 2, blasphemy was still a criminal offence. So according to the town-square standard of liberation, forcibly overthrowing Nazi rule in the Channel Islands was not a liberation because the new regime failed the town square test in regard to criticism of certain religious dogmas. That has the same logic as your claim that the overthrow of Saddam was not a liberation because the new regime fails the town square test in regard to (for instance) Israeli flags. In both cases (post-liberation Channel Islands and post-liberation Iraq) the region in question passes the town square test incomparably better than it did before.

We think that such transistions are indeed liberations under the prevailing usage of the term 'liberation'. But much more important than terminology is the substantive issue of whether human rights organisations ought to have been endorsing the overthrow of the Saddam regime (as we advocate) or working to keep it in place (as they did in the event).

by Editor on Wed, 08/30/2006 - 16:06 | reply

Re: Questions

Good questions.

by Editor on Wed, 08/30/2006 - 16:07 | reply

Shades of transition

If Elliot had gone to an Iraqi town square during Saddam's rule and denounced Islamic fundamentalism, he might very well have been applauded. Worst case he might have been deported.

Today he would most likely be shot before opening his mouth. Is this an example of "liberation transition"?

Perhaps the "town square test is completely invalid if it is not an objective pass/fail but subjective shades of "transition".

by a reader on Thu, 08/31/2006 - 22:46 | reply

Re: Shades of transition

I believe I understand what you are asserting. But I don't understand why I am supposed to deem it to be true. Nor have you revealed why you do.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/blog/>

by Elliot Temple on Fri, 09/01/2006 - 00:45 | reply

Liberation and Liberty

The anonymous reader is confusing, (1) the stable (and evolving) prevalence of liberty in a society and, (2) the initiation of the gradual (and painful) movement towards that situation. "Liberation" is the name of the latter; the former is called "freedom." A near always passing of the town-square test is necessary and sufficient for (1), but not for (2). I am not sure what a good objective measure for "liberation" is. I suggest it must include the increasing "volume" of debate taking place on the pressing issues of the society. This has certainly been the case in Iraq. That situation can be contrasted with the situation in Iran, which is the reverse. (Say, for the policies adopted by the government on its nuclear program.)

-- Cyrus Ferdowsi, <http://libiran.blogspot.com>

by Liberal Iranian on Fri, 09/01/2006 - 10:46 | reply

Re:Liberation and Liberty

Which is which? Here is a list of a dozen countries, Which are in a state of "freedom" and which are in a state of "liberation" and which are neither?

Pakistan

China

Russia

Ukraine

Serbia

U.A.E.

France

Philipines

Vietnam

Nepal

Bolivia

South Korea

by a reader on Fri, 09/01/2006 - 12:14 | reply

Re: Re:Liberation and Liberty

Although some of them are plainly clear, I cannot claim I have adequate information at the moment to answer your question accurately in all instances. This information can be found out given enough time. Before expending that time, however, I would like to know what purpose would such an exercise serve in our discussion.

-- Cyrus Ferdowsi, <http://libiran.blogspot.com>

by Liberal Iranian on Mon, 09/04/2006 - 08:19 | reply

Re: Shades of transition

"If Elliot had gone to an Iraqi town square during Saddam's rule and denounced Islamic fundamentalism, he might very well have been applauded. Worst case he might have been deported.

Today he would most likely be shot before opening his mouth. Is this an example of "liberation transition"?"

Let us suppose this were true (it probably isn't, but lets say it is). Is this evidence that Iraq as run by Saddam was more liberal, or would it simply be evidence that the offenses that would get you shot in Iraq have changed since the invasion?

Do you suppose that shouting "Saddam is an oppressive dictator" in the pre-invasion Iraqi town square would have been a safe thing to do? People were reputedly dragged from their beds and tortured to death for much less.

It's also important to consider who would be doing the shooting. In the pre-invasion Iraq you would be shot by the republican guard - in the new Iraq you would be shot by a criminal. Granted you're just as dead either way, but at least in the latter case there's a slim chance that the culprit may be prosecuted for their crime, instead of getting a promotion.

I think in the end it is better to live in a free country with a legitimate government that isn't coping well with terrorism, rather than an oppressive regime where even the terrorists are too afraid to step out of line.

by a reader on Tue, 11/14/2006 - 13:45 | reply

Jack Bauer

I think in the end it is better to live in a free country with a legitimate government that isn't coping well with terrorism, rather than an oppressive regime where even the terrorists are too afraid to step out of line.

I agree. Let's consider what Jack Bauer would do in each situation.

1) a free country, with a legitimate government, but poor security forces

Jack would personally take over security and kill the terrorists, thus creating a free country with no downsides.

2) an oppressive regime with terrorists too scared to step out of line

Jack would personally kill the oppressive regime, then personally take over security for the country. He'd kill the oppressor and the terrorists. We'd end up with the same final result: a free country with no downsides.

So, what's the difference? In scenario 2, Jack has to kill more people. Thus, scenario 2 is further away from a good, free country.

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 11/14/2006 - 21:53 | reply

Copyright © 2008 Setting The World To Rights

The Problem Is The Spin

A Parliamentary Inquiry is about to report a large increase in the number of antisemitic attacks in Britain in recent years, which has accelerated further since the recent war between Israel and Hezbollah.

More shameful than the numbers is the fact that the character of the attacks has changed. While in the past most antisemitic attacks came from tiny fringe groups, Mark Gardner of the Community Security Trust reports that nowadays the attackers are from across society [...]. "When it's verbal abuse, it's just ordinary people in the street, from middle-class women to working-class men. All colours and backgrounds. We hardly ever see incidents involving the classic neo-Nazi skinhead. Muslims are over-represented."

Indeed, a few days ago this violence from 'across society' spread to the normally staid House of Lords, when Lord Janner, who is 78 and Jewish, was physically attacked by Lord Brammer who is 82. The attack was caused by their disagreement over Israel's non-existent war crimes in Lebanon, and subsequently legitimised by Janner's colleagues, who apparently persuaded him to make no complaint.

In hate-mail to senior Jewish figures, ordinary Jewish people were being blamed for the deaths of Lebanese civilians. "There are also references to the Holocaust, saying that Hitler should have wiped out the Jews."

Mr Gardner said that the rise in attacks reflected increased hostility to Israel and Jews in the media and across society: "The number of anti-Semitic attacks reflects the mood music around Jews and Israel."

Where does this 'mood music', to which ordinary British people are responding, come from?

Jon Benjamin, of the Board of Deputies, said: "The problem is the spin that Israel is an irredeemably evil regime, and we are concerned that it may become common currency to connect British Jews with this."

But this spin that Israel is fundamentally evil cannot be separated from the spin that British Jews are fundamentally evil and therefore legitimate targets for attacks. If Israel really were evil then the two issues could easily be separated, because the Jewish community in Britain would then certainly become active in the campaign to de-legitimise Israel. But that cannot happen because, in reality, Israel is a moral beacon to the world. The spin that it is evil and the spin that Jews are evil are the same out-and-out lie. On the grand stage of world history, this lie is part of the millennia-old and incomparably widespread and persistent evil known as antisemitism. But the proximate cause, today in Britain, is a powerful, self-sustaining irrationality in the subculture known as the media.

In the sidebar of the Times article that reports these dismal developments is the very phenomenon that is causing them. Of the six headlines linked there under the heading 'Related Stories', at least four carry the spin of Israel's alleged evil, and not one even hints at Israel's case, or even that it has one.

The mildest example is: Annan says Syria to respect Hezbollah arms embargo, (link). This would be much less misleading if it were Syria claims it will respect Hezbollah arms embargo. By reporting Syria's claim through the mouth of the UN Secretary General (who was doing nothing more than report what was said to him) The Times manages to attribute maximal authority to that claim. Only deep in the article, and nowhere in the headline, is there a hint that there exists an opposing point of view, namely that Syria's claim is a ludicrous and cynical lie whose main purpose is to de-legitimise Israel's self-defence.

The worst of this particular batch of headlines is Cluster bombs leave 'toys' that kill children (link). The casual reader will receive the impression that Israel has littered Lebanon with toy-shaped booby traps with the satanic intention of maiming and murdering Lebanese children, an impression that is, again, only dispelled deep in the article, and even then not explicitly. The spin here is the ancient antisemitic blood libel that Jews are child murderers. This is expressed, in the context of the Lebanon war, in the lie that Israel has targeted innocent civilians – a lie that is frequently intensified by the explicit or implicit claim that this blood lust is directed especially towards children.

In a culture that excoriates President Bush for once using the term 'crusade', even though in English that word has carried no specifically Christian or anti-Muslim connotation for centuries, there can be no excusing these antisemitic spins as accidental. They are part of a systematic phenomenon of entrenched irrationality that is poisoning our society and causing violence. Yet the cause is not (for the most part, anyway) that journalists wake up one morning and realise that it is The Jews who are responsible for all the evils in the world, any more than Lord Brammer woke up one morning thinking that Lord Janner is responsible for all his troubles. Mel Gibson thinks like that, and so do many cultures, even in Europe. But the antisemitic spin that is spreading through mainstream British society is not rooted in racial or religious hatred of Jews, but rather it is the other way round. (Indeed, one of the ways it entrenches itself is that its purveyors can honestly testify, from introspection, that they are motivated by no such hatred. This, in turn, leads them to imagine that they are seeing for themselves proof that those who accuse them of bias are guilty of yet further offences, namely whining and slander.) The pathological spin originates in a pathological world view which, in itself, makes no direct reference to Jews or any other group. Yet by its inner logic it homes in on Jews, and hence on Israel. For some powerful but as yet only dimly understood reason, Jews are, as always, the canaries in the coal mine, the first to suffer the effects of poison.

Update 1: Solomonia makes the same point, but he is able to express it in just three words.

Update 2: The IDF's policy on cluster bombs.

Sat, 09/02/2006 - 20:12 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

'In a culture that excoriates

'In a culture that excoriates President Bush for once using the term 'crusade', even though in English that word has carried no specifically Christian or anti-Muslim connotation for centuries'

Since you mention it, the first crusade didn't do the Jews a lot of good either but note the lack of people arguing that Bush is an anti-semite who wants to burn them all in their synagogues because of the 'crusade' comment.

by Leigh on Mon, 09/04/2006 - 20:22 | reply

Re: 'In a culture that excoriates

Indeed.

by Editor on Mon, 09/04/2006 - 20:36 | reply

History of England Conspiracy Theory

As I read British History it strikes me that the Brits via their pompous ideas of Empire could be blamed for causing almost everything wrong with the world, including fomenting mistreatment of Jews by almost every country and culture where the Brits meddled for centuries. Lord Brammer might rightly attack himself proclaiming mea culpa, mea culpa for the sins of his forebears rather than feebly making an ass of himself by attacking an apparently much younger, nobler man.

I could blame the Brits but I won't. It would be another easily refuted conspiracy theory. Rather I'll leave it to the media to exploit that one knowing that a reporting opportunity is never missed wherever public blame and the possibility of innuendo presents itself. Besides, noone ever refutes the media, not really.

by a reader on Mon, 09/04/2006 - 22:39 | reply

Cluster bombs

I don't understand your point about cluster bombs. Israel clearly has left a lot of cluster bombs in Lebanon, and they certainly will kill a lot of children. So I assume you are objecting to the implication that that was the intention rather than an unfortunate side effect. Is that right? If so then I think the article would not give a casual reader that impression, rather they would get the impression that Israel acted with casual disregard for the lives of others. Do you think that the use of cluster bombs was justified?

by GS on Tue, 09/05/2006 - 17:08 | reply

Disregard

Israel acts with the most regard for life of all countries. It is most hesitant to do anything that would might put civilians at risk. Even guilty ones (ie, children who retrieve weapons are not shot). Israel has sent commandos instead of bombs, at great risk, because of its regard for life.

Saying, or implying, that Israel acts with casual disregard for human life is an awful slander and completely indefensible.

Also note there does exist fierce internal debate in Israel about life and collateral damage, so implying casual disregard is unforgivable.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/blog/>

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 09/05/2006 - 19:27 | reply

Thank you so much

Thank you so much for your words. They are very much appreciated.

One thing I have realized is that fascists never stop with one group. Their hatred and aggression is never content with lashing out at one group. They seek domination and use fear and violence to achieve this. Sound familiar?

I am very surprised that Europe has not learned this lesson. Throughout the Arab-Israeli(muslim-Jewish) conflict, Europe has sold Israel out countless times, coming to the aid of those who wish to destroy her, silent when when she is attacked, and condemning her when she defends herself. Israel's enemies, or I should say the Jews enemies are not rational. They are fascists.

By the way Europe has dealt with this conflict, they have given the green light to muslims and have basically told them that this behavior is acceptable.

Now, when these fascists who believe that this behavior is acceptable arrive in your country, and the only way they know how to deal with things is through violence, what do you think will happen when you make these people angry? What do you think they will want if you try to appease them? They will want more.

Europe has told the muslim world that this fascist behavior is acceptable, now the Jihad is on their doorstep.

I really like your blog. Keep up the good work.

Justin from Canada

by Justin on Tue, 09/05/2006 - 20:00 | reply

To see the difference between

To see the difference between Muslim and Jew, one only has to compare the palestinian national anthem to the Israeli one.

One is about hate, the other about love.

Palestinian:

My country , my country

My country , the land of my grandfathers

My country , my country

My country , my nation , the nation of eternity

With my determine, my fire and the volcano of my revenge

The longing of my blood to my land and home

I have climbed the mountains and fought the wars

I have conquered the impossible , and crossed the borders

My country , my country , the nation of eternity

With the resolve of the winds and the fire of the guns

And the determination of my nation in the land of struggle

Palestine is my home , Palestine is my fire , Palestine is my revenge and the land of eternal

My country , my country , the nation of eternity

I swear under the shade of the flag

To my land and nation , and the fire of pain

I will live as a guerrilla , I will go on as guerrilla ,

I will expire as guerrilla until I will be back

My country , my country , the nation of eternity

Israeli:

As long as the Jewish spirit is yearning deep in the heart,
With eyes turned toward the East, looking toward Zion,
Then our hope - the two-thousand-year-old hope - will not be lost:
To be a free people in our land,
The land of Zion and Jerusalem.

Justin from Canada

by Justin on Tue, 09/05/2006 - 20:08 | reply

Re: Thank you so much

Justin from Canada: Thanks.

by Editor on Wed, 09/06/2006 - 10:49 | reply

Cluster bombs

So Elliot, can you answer my question. Do you believe that the use of cluster bombs was justified?

by GS on Wed, 09/06/2006 - 16:44 | reply

Re: Cluster Bombs

GS wrote:

I don't understand your point about cluster bombs. Israel clearly has left a lot of cluster bombs in Lebanon, and they certainly will kill a lot of children. So I assume you are objecting to the implication that that was the intention rather than an unfortunate side effect. Is that right? If so then I think the article would not give a casual reader that impression, rather they would get the impression that Israel acted with casual disregard for the lives of others.

The difference between intentional killing and killing with casual disregard for the lives of 'others' is not very relevant here. For any users of force, both are viciously immoral. Presumably, then, you do agree with us that the headline gives the reader the impression that Israel is viciously immoral.

Do you think that the use of cluster bombs was justified?

Yes. Cluster bombs were used only in cases of military and moral necessity - for instance, where Hezbollah missile crews were literally in the act of firing volleys of missiles into Israeli cities and, because of the location and terrain, other means of attack would not have stopped them. The other means of attack, which were attempted where they could work, included, as Elliot pointed out above, ones that risked the lives of Israeli soldiers. Had Israel had callous disregard for the the lives of others, they would not have done that, and they would have used far more destructive weapons and thereby saved the lives of many Israelis.

That fact that, in this way and in many others, Israel's actual tactical decisions routinely include compromising important military objectives, and risking Israeli lives, in order to spare enemy civilians, is simply incompatible with the accusation you have made, and which you rightly attribute to The Times as well. (Incidentally, in Israel's case, 'military objectives' are themselves confined exclusively to those that are necessary to prevent the murder of Israelis.)

Perhaps you are opposed to the use of cluster bombs in principle. Perhaps you have profound moral objections to all explosive weapons, or to any military tactics that might harm civilians, or whatever: we can't tell. If so, we disagree, and so do the military planners of virtually every nation that fights wars. But even if you were right about that, that would still in no way justify imputing to them such vile states of mind as having casual disregard for the lives of others. Far less does it justify imputing such states of mind to a whole nation, as you do.

by Editor on Wed, 09/06/2006 - 18:48 | reply

BBC antisemitism

We mustn't forget that grandmother of all institutionalised antisemites, the BBC. Virtually every news item that can be slanted against Israel, is slanted against Israel.

Just 2 examples out of thousands (incidentally, they also demonstrate that the BBC doesn't understand the difference between news reporting and editorial comment):

1. Lebanon 1982, a BBC reporter stands in front of bombed buildings in Tyre, and says:
"Once again, Israel has decided to cock a snook at world opinion". This would be despicable as an editorial, but as so-called 'reporting'??? The hack knows what Israel has 'decided' to do? And moreover, that its decision involves naked aggression even though the peaceful world has tried to stop the war? And of course, that there's been no aggression by the Arabs that triggered this war?

2. On the BBC website 2006: Maale Adumim is described, supposedly factually, as an 'illegal' settlement. There is a tiny comment to the effect that Israel disputes this.
Note well: not 'Some people/governments/what-have-you claim that it is illegal' but 'it is illegal'. The BBC is now the arbiter on this fact, not an unbiased commentator - and of course, it is judge/jury/executioner (well, it would love to be, so great is its puffed-up self-importance) on this issue AGAINST Israel.

The fact that Maale Adumim is not illegal by any sane criteria is neither here nor there in this case: it's the BBC's constant bias that is important.

by Yoni on Sat, 09/09/2006 - 20:24 | reply

war

Hi Justin

I like many others know that Israel is the victim of the area but also the power. How can I with all humility express a sentiment towards the people of Lebanon who have no control over their fate. I do not wish to denigrate the state of Israel but I also see injustice to the innocent Lebanese (not all) who have suffered. I do wish the whole area a sense of responsibility for their actions.

Best wishes to all.

by a reader on Sat, 09/16/2006 - 19:10 | reply

Innocent Lebanese

It is a terrible tragedy that many innocent Lebanese were harmed. And I agree with you that responsibility is important. That's why we must make sure Hezbollah is destroyed entirely so it can never hurt people again.

The innocent Lebanese were hurt through a combination of

- 1) Hezbollah's immoral, aggressive initiation of a war
- 2) Hezbollah's use of innocent Lebanese, including children, as human shields
- 3) Hezbollah's intentional tactic of maximising Lebanese casualties
- 4) Israel's moral, defensive actions that carefully tried to minimize Lebanese casualties

Israel's actions were only necessitated because of Hezbollah's actions, and I'm sure you'll agree that Israel should have defended itself -- it's better that way. So the real problem that caused all this suffering is purely Hezbollah's decision to start the war.

For balance, you may want to consider what the causal lists look like for the innocent Israeli casualties.

-- Elliot Temple

<http://www.curi.us/blog/>

by Elliot Temple on Sat, 09/16/2006 - 19:40 | reply

"Did President George W Bush'

"Did President George W Bush's Invasion Of Iraq Contribute To Causing The 9-11 Attack?"

Are you intending that to be a trick question? Anyone who answers yes has got a head full of sand, with 9-11 occuring way before the invasion of iraq.

Justin

by Justin on Mon, 09/18/2006 - 06:40 | reply

Copyright © 2008 Setting The World To Rights

Did President George W Bush's Invasion Of Iraq Contribute To Causing The 9-11 Attack?

view

results

Yes

No

Wed, 09/13/2006 - 15:12 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Poll On The Cause Of The 9-11 Attack

Please vote in our new poll (in the sidebar on the right). It is just a yes/no question about the cause of the attack on the US on September 11, 2001.

Update on 2006-9-20: So far the poll is overwhelmingly exonerating President Bush's invasion of Iraq.

Wed, 09/13/2006 - 15:16 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Huh?

I'm confused by the poll question.

Is there time-travel involved?

Gil

by Gil on Wed, 09/13/2006 - 18:27 | reply

Re: Huh?

Shhhh... :)

by Editor on Wed, 09/13/2006 - 18:41 | reply

Aim low.

That way you have a good chance of success. Even though the Iraq war has been a complete disaster at least it didn't cause 9/11!

I imagine the editor can sleep well at night knowing that he didn't cause the sinking of the Titanic.

by a reader on Thu, 09/14/2006 - 22:52 | reply

Re: Aim low.

The servants of Allah are not bound by your infidel notions of causality.

by Kevin on Thu, 09/14/2006 - 22:59 | reply

And surely the most likely re

And surely the most likely reason why anyone would vote 'yes' is that they thought the question was about the first gulf war.

by a reader on Sun, 09/17/2006 - 11:56 | reply

Unlikely

The one thing those people are unlikely to overlook is the letter "W".

Gil

by Gil on Mon, 09/18/2006 - 01:43 | reply

Complete disaster?

To the author of 'Aim low' who said "the Iraq war has been a complete disaster":

Please remember that one man's tyrant is another man's freedom fighter.

Although Saddam was a freedom fighter to you, he was a mass-murdering, warmongering tyrant in some people's opinion, and therefore, to them, the war has not been a complete disaster at all.

Those people's opinions are just as good as yours, and you should acknowledge their validity, not go making sweeping comments implying that your truth is the only one.

by a reader on Mon, 09/18/2006 - 02:12 | reply

re: Complete disaster?

Silly me, I was thinking of the $4000 and counting per household it is costing me. I guess I don't have the god-like vision of you and your friend George to see that I am better off without that money to protect myself as I see fit.

You are correct, not everyone sees it as a disaster, in fact, I'm sure Mr. bin laden sees it as a success well beyond his wildest dreams!

by a reader on Tue, 09/19/2006 - 11:17 | reply

Exonerated?

"So far the poll is overwhelmingly exonerating President Bush's invasion of Iraq."

Um, no. The poll is overwhelmingly showing that most readers can tell one year from another. I wonder how many of those it snagged simply hadn't had their coffee yet.

by Samuel K Duro on Thu, 09/21/2006 - 06:38 | reply

Re: Complete disaster?

Silly me, I was thinking of the $4000 and counting per household it is costing me. I guess I don't have the god-like vision of you and your friend George to see that I am better off without that money to protect myself as I see fit.

You do? Really? Personally I'd rather have an organisation that specialises in defence defend me at least some of the time. Of course, self defence is part of the best strategy for dealing with any threat. With some threats, like muggers, it should probably play a very large role. However, self defence is of limited use against Islamist terrorists and states who sponsor them. If you tried to take out Iran's nuclear facilities on your own you'd almost certainly end up dead very quickly. You need lots of information and either weapons or the economic clout to make economic sanctions against Iran stick. All of this requires a large amount of money and lots of people. The best way to maintain such an organisation is for lots of people who can't provide such defence services to pay people who can: it's called division of labour. Now it would be nice if we currently had a voluntary means to do this, but we don't so we're stuck with doing it through taxation for the immediate future.

You are correct, not everyone sees it as a disaster, in fact, I'm sure Mr. bin Laden sees it as a success well beyond his wildest dreams!

So you think that bin Laden is glad that he lost a major source of funding and training facilities?

by Alan Forrester on Thu, 09/21/2006 - 19:49 | reply

Re:Re: Complete disaster?

Alan,

Would you come to my house, hold a gun to my head, demand $4000, and claim you are doing this to protect me?

by a reader on Thu, 09/21/2006 - 22:51 | reply

Libertarianism

A Reader,

We have tax funded government today. It's unreasonable to use this as an argument specifically against government programs you don't like. All government programs are equally guilty of being tax funded, so you can't use this as an argument about which are better/worse.

There are various exceptions to this, especially when we have a free-market alternative in place. A government grocery store program would be horrible. But we don't have a free market army ready.

-- Elliot Temple

by Elliot Temple on Fri, 09/22/2006 - 00:23 | reply

Not answering the question

The question was simple Elliot. Would Alan coercively take money from me? (and claim he was promoting "freedom") If he does it with enough of his friends (i.e. democracy) does that somehow make it ok? Don't pretend that being some sort of hard nosed "realist" gives you an out.

by a reader on Fri, 09/22/2006 - 11:34 | reply

Libertarian Coercion

The overwhelming majority of people will not vote for libertarian philosophies and policies. It is morally repugnant to coerce people into following libertarian ideology.

Persuade them. Don't coerce them.

by a reader on Fri, 09/22/2006 - 14:59 | reply

Libertarian Coercion?

I'm not sure if that last comment was a bad joke, or just stupid.

What kind of coercion was "a reader" referring to?

Gil

by Gil on Fri, 09/22/2006 - 17:50 | reply

Re: Not answering the question

The answer to your question is most likely, No! But if you are suggesting that paying for the defense forces should be done on a completely voluntary basis, you better have a working theory of how that would work. Do you?

-- Cyrus Ferdowsi, <http://libiran.blogspot.com>

by Liberal Iranian on Sun, 09/24/2006 - 09:30 | reply

Why do you want to coerce me?

Would Alan coercively take money from me? (and claim he was promoting "freedom") If he does it with enough of his friends (i.e. democracy) does that somehow make it ok? Don't pretend that being some sort of hard nosed "realist" gives you an out.

If there was a country in which the law allowed for private voluntarily funded armies I would much prefer to live there. I would not go round to your house, put a gun to your head and demand your money.

In the real world, there is no country where people are allowed to raise private armies. Now, you say that I am wrong to say that the government should use the power it has taken to promote freedom. You say, further, that it is morally equivalent to going round to your house and putting a gun to your head and demanding money from you to defend freedom. Your position is rubbish as I would prefer a situation in which armies were supported by voluntary subscription. Furthermore, in the current situation in which raising private armies is forbidden, your advocacy of non-interventionist foreign policy is entirely morally symmetrical with respect to use of tax monies. How so? Well, you and I both know that if I were to raise a private army to invade Iran, say, tax money would be used to stop me and put me in jail. So by advocating a non-interventionist foreign policy for Western governments you are recommending that my tax money should be used force me to back a policy that I find abhorrent: neutrality toward evil tyrants and the terrorists they sponsor.

by Alan Forrester on Mon, 09/25/2006 - 19:53 | reply

Re: Libertarian Coercion

The overwhelming majority of people want to use government taxation to fund the military because they believe it is the most efficient way of providing defense for the nation. More efficiency implies that people have more money and therefore more freedom to do what they want. And more freedom implies less coercion.

If a libertarian proposes using anything other than democratic means to end government taxation (that supports the military), he should be jailed because such a proposal could only be implemented by using violence to contravene majority preferences.

Therefore the only morally defensible and consistent position for a libertarian is to favor gradual democratic change. Since the public thinks it is less coercive because it is more efficient to utilize the government to fund a sufficiently powerful military, essentially noone except a radical libertarian will favor eliminating our publically funded military.

Until libertarians can demonstrate that we can obtain a private army with the strength and power of the United States military, but by spending less money, citizens will continue to favor utilizing government taxation, unless a libertarian is prepared to coerce everyone else by overthrowing the government.

Therefore, libertarians must logically favor utilizing democratic processes, if they do not wish to be coercive.

by a reader on Thu, 09/28/2006 - 02:26 | reply

Coercion

Alan,

Why do you have to raise a private army? Why don't you just raise enough money from private citizens so the government wouldn't have to tax the rest of us so much? Isn't the real problem that you can't raise enough money privately, therefore you favor using coercion to force the rest of us to pay for the Iraq war?

Since you and others can't raise sufficient funds privately to give to the military, so that no taxes have to be raised, perhaps people don't really favor funding the Iraq war?

by a reader on Thu, 09/28/2006 - 02:40 | reply

Re: Coersion

A reader wrote:

Since you and others can't raise sufficient funds privately to give to the military, so that no taxes have to be raised, perhaps people don't really favor funding the Iraq war?

First, that sort of army is a private army: if the money is raised privately why should it be given to a government army?

Second, Where does the Iraq war come into your argument? How do you know the same statement is not true for any war? Or the city police for that matter? Perhaps the people you are talking about feel they can get a free ride of security on other people's private donations?

-- Cyrus Ferdowsi, <http://libiran.blogspot.com>

by Liberal Iranian on Thu, 09/28/2006 - 05:12 | reply

False Dichotomy

An army in which individuals voluntarily contribute money....

"First, that sort of army is a private army: if the money is raised privately why should it be given to a government army?"

Cyrus Ferdowsi

Alan seemed to imply that he had to choose between two evils. He implies that a military, funded by taxation, is wrong because people are forced to contribute, even if they do not want to. He says he would like to use "subscriptions" to create a private army, but an existing government would then use taxation to stop him. So either way the government is preventing him from doing what he wants. So if he has to pay taxes to the government, he at least wants the money to go to fighting tyrants and not towards keeping him in prison.

I am pointing out that Alan's grim choices are not so limited. If he could raise substantial sums of money (say 40% of the military's budget per year), and promise it to the military in exchange for the government cutting taxes plus some input into how the military is utilized, he could make progress towards having a military funded by voluntary contributions. In order to raise that much money, contributor's opinions about the role of the military would surely need to be taken into account.

Alan may not be able to have a private army, right now, but if he could raise nearly half the money needed to run a military in a year and exchange it for lower taxes, he could make substantial progress towards privatizing the military.

"Perhaps the people you are talking about feel they can get a free ride of security on other people's private donations?"

Yup. You got it. The real reason Alan is not participating in a process right now that would lead towards privatizing the military is that it wouldn't work. He can't raise that much money for a military because of the "free ride(r)" problem.

by a reader on Thu, 09/28/2006 - 23:44 | reply

Re: False Dichotomy

promise it to the military in exchange for the government cutting taxes plus some input into how the military is utilized

In a democracy, that's called attempted bribery. And so, yes, Alan would go to jail yet again.

A government can't sell its defense policy to a private corporation!

("What about Halliburton?!". Yeah, yeah, very funny.)

by a reader on Fri, 09/29/2006 - 00:28 | reply

Re: False Dichotomy

'Attempted bribery'. Yes, and also, under that scheme the contributors would not get their portion of defence taxes back. So they would not be buying defence, only a 'say' in a policy that they already agree with! Plus they would be indemnifying some of the anti-war people whom the government is forcing to contribute. But why, under Libertarian ethics, should they be under any obligation to indemnify the victims of someone else's crime?

by Editor on Fri, 09/29/2006 - 00:39 | reply

Alan Favoring Coercion

"Yes, and also, under that scheme the contributors would not get their portion of defence taxes back."

Yes. The contributors would pay money, get some money back because of lower taxes, but have to cover more of the overall cost of defense than their non-contributing neighbors. That is the essence of the free rider problem.

If everyone voluntarily contributed their portion of their current defense tax bill, defense costs would be fully covered. Furthermore, this supermajority could vote to eliminate involuntary taxes to pay for defense, once the money was collected.

So the government is not stopping Alan from transitioning our democratic government to a system of private support of the military. The free rider problem is.

Therefore, the reader is asking a very legitimate question. Is Alan willing to hold a gun to a neighbor's head (with help from his "buddies") to extract $4000 to defend the neighborhood.?

Alan says "no" to this question. But when there are free rider problems, his actions are saying "yes".

by a reader on Fri, 09/29/2006 - 14:06 | reply

You and What Personal Army?

Actually Haliburton is a very reasonable approach to addressing the dilemma. Private enterprise always has a solution for the right price for any country or any individual or group of individuals who wants to buy defense and offense. Private enterprise is also the essence of all defense purchase and contracting including R&D, weapons systems, and even unmanned drones and "smart systems" of all types which are getting "smarter" and more capable every day. The real question is not if it is feasible privately or publicly. It is being done right now, the lines are becoming blurry between private and public and private defense and even armies (security with the right for hired security forces to bear sophisticated arms and use them to defend extensive property interests) It is inevitable that this approach will be expanded in a free global economy. The real question is will any of us be happy with the private support (call it Halliburton) results?

by a reader on Mon, 10/02/2006 - 16:17 | reply

The only poll on this questio

The only poll on this question is the one for the next presidency, and judging by your president's current approval rating I would say this is probably overwhelmingly in against the war in Iraq (and by extension as a cause of 9/11).

Where are the WMD dude?

by a reader on Fri, 03/23/2007 - 14:11 | reply

A Victory For Pro-DDT Campaigners

In the 1980s the World Health Organization joined other NGOs and government organisations in ceasing to promote 'indoor residual spraying' with the insecticide DDT as a method of combating the spread of mosquito-borne diseases, especially malaria. This decision was bad for people living in regions where malaria was endemic, and a triumph for environmental campaigners who had raised fears about DDT's health and environmental effects.

There was a vitriolic controversy about whether this policy was justified. There never was any good evidence that DDT was harmful to the health of humans, and the environmental damage centred on the threat to certain species that were of sentimental and scientific interest. This limited level of potential harm had to be weighed against the fact that malaria was one of the world's leading causes of death and disability of human beings.

And it has remained so. The good news is that the World Health Organization has now reversed its policy on DDT, giving it a clean bill of health and denying that it does any 'environmental' damage when used for indoor residual spraying. Most other relevant agencies concur. This is a great victory for those who have been arguing all along that the anti-DDT policy was harmful and had been adopted for essentially frivolous (or as we would put it, religious) reasons. It is a defeat for environmentalist pressure groups which fought bitterly for an almost total ban on DDT. But most of them finally conceded that this was wrong.

Since the new consensus is that DDT, used carefully, is not environmentally dangerous after all, the issue of how much environmental damage is worth how much human suffering and death is now mercifully relegated to theoretical status as far as DDT policy is concerned. But it does, in general, remain an urgent moral issue, and one that is hardly addressed in the political arena. As part of the critical debate about the current environmentalist consensus, should we not also be debating past policy? How much unnecessary suffering was caused by the policy that the WHO and environmental pressure groups have now reversed?

Wed, 10/04/2006 - 14:07 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Why

What finally clued them in?

-- Elliot Temple
curi@curi.us
Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 10/04/2006 - 20:50 | reply

There was never a DDT ban

I'm reposting this because it's been a day or two since I tried to post it before. Apologies if this is a multiple post.

This whole DDT thing is a bunch of crap. For one thing, the WHO never banned it. The US did, after we eradicated malaria (although screens and indoor climate controls had a big part to play there too). The WHO has always advocated limited indoor use of DDT to combat the spread of malaria. The problem is, people don't take kindly to government workers coming into their homes to spray crap on their walls that stains them brown.

DDT is not a magic bullet to solve the problem of malaria in the third world. The roots of the problem are corruption, poverty, and incompetence (many times caused by centuries of European colonialism). DDT has only limited effectiveness - mosquitos quickly become resistant to it if it is sprayed in large quantities. Bed nets and anti malaria drugs would be a better option. I guess DDT could be used as part of a rotating cycle of pesticide, but there has never been anything to stop governments from doing that anyway.

by Will on Mon, 10/16/2006 - 00:34 | reply

Re: There was never a DDT ban

Will wrote:

The WHO has always advocated limited indoor use of DDT to combat the spread of malaria.

Indeed. But didn't it cease advocating its widespread use 30 years ago? Didn't it actively promote indoor residual spraying for malaria control until the early 1980s, and did it not then focus instead on other measures because of (among other reasons) health and environmental fears about DDT? Which it now considers mistaken?

by Editor on Mon, 10/16/2006 - 01:08 | reply

Tim Lambert who blogs at Del

Tim Lambert who blogs at Deltoid has good information about the 'DDT' controversy:

<http://scienceblogs.com/deltoid/ddt>

Check out this blog post, which is quite enlightening concerning the present situation.

Two quotes:

"The fact is that until 1994, DDT was the WHO's insecticide of choice for malaria vector control."

"Nor did WHO stop promoting DDT....Alan Schapira rebutted such claims in November 2004: WHO has never given up in its efforts to ensure access to DDT where it is needed....And the WHO's 2004 statement on ITNs (nets) vs IRS (spraying) clearly supports IRS in regions of unstable transmission...."

It's a good post, read it.

Also check this one out, about the new policy.

As for environmental stuff, this is from the Telegraph article you linked to:

"So far, the clearest adverse impact of the pesticide has been a steep decline in the number of bird species in areas where it has been used." Birds are vital to the natural world. They spread plants by eating the seeds and control pests. It's no accident that Rachel Carson's book Silent Spring concentrated on birds - when they go, the natural world will go badly out of whack.

by Will on Mon, 10/16/2006 - 12:15 | reply

Re: Tim Lambert who blogs at Del

Thanks for the links, Will.

In regard to the WHO's new DDT policy, the first one seems to assert the following:

- The WHO's dramatic press release announcing a change in policy is misleading, because in fact their new policy on DDT is virtually the same as the old one.

And the second one:

- The WHO's new policy on DDT is unsound, because it was formulated by Westerners who do not understand Africa.

This is a little confusing. In your opinion, has there been a change in WHO policy on DDT or not?

by Editor on Mon, 10/16/2006 - 13:04 | reply

Did they really change their policy?

I think what has happened is that the WHO always said that IRS (indoor spraying) should be used in certain areas: namely, areas where malaria levels fluctuated. One reason for this is because IRS lasts for a long time and also has a deterrent effect... it's a cheap way to keep insects from resting on your indoor surfaces for a couple years. In areas where there is a lot of Malaria, high levels all the time, they recommended other methods of control.

Now they recommend IRS for all areas, which is where the critique in the second post comes in.

Where the WHO press release (and subsequent news articles) were misleading is in the quote: "in the 1980s the World Health Organization joined other NGOs and government organisations in ceasing to promote 'indoor residual spraying' with the insecticide DDT as a method of combating the spread of mosquito-borne diseases, especially malaria."

They never stopped recommending it, they have just started to push it more aggressively.

That may seem like nitpicking, but it is highly annoying to environmentalists like myself, because it comes in the context of a long campaign to discredit environmental groups who don't like DDT. Once again, I recommend that anyone who's interested head over to Deltoid where Tim has been keeping up with this for a long time.

by Will on Mon, 10/16/2006 - 16:22 | reply

Re: Did they really change their policy?

They never stopped recommending it, they have just started to push it more aggressively.

You seem to be saying: Prior to the 1980s the WHO had a certain policy about indoor residual spraying with DDT, namely to promote it in some situations and not others. Contrary to the WHO's recent press release, there was little or no change in that policy in the 1980s, but the press release is correct in saying that now there has been a change: they are pushing indoor residual spraying with DDT more aggressively. And this new policy is unsound.

Is that correct?

by Editor on Mon, 10/16/2006 - 16:52 | reply

Yep, that's what I'm saying

Yep, that's what I'm saying. Basically, anyway. From the 2005 WHO FAQ on DDT (caution, pdf):

"WHO recommends indoor residual spraying of DDT for malaria vector control."

I don't know about specific dates... but I think you restated the gist of my argument correctly. The WHO has never not recommended IRS.

by Will on Mon, 10/16/2006 - 18:17 | reply

Re: Yep, that's what I'm saying

Thank you; that's clear now.

And is it your position that the major environmentalist organisations such as the Worldwide Fund for Nature fought vehemently for an almost complete ban on DDT, but have now changed their policies too?

by Editor on Wed, 10/18/2006 - 10:55 | reply

I'll look into that

Not sure what all the major enviro groups wanted. I'm sure there were different positions. I'll look into it and get back to you.

by Will on Wed, 10/18/2006 - 16:00 | reply

Rachel Carson didn't recommend a complete ban on DDT

From an editorial in the NYT by Nick Kristoff, Jan 2005:

I called the World Wildlife Fund, thinking I would get a fight. But Richard Liroff, its expert on toxins, said he could accept the use of DDT when necessary in anti-malaria programs.

"South Africa was right to use DDT," he said. "If the alternatives to DDT aren't working, as they weren't in South Africa, geez, you've got to use it. In South Africa it prevented tens of thousands of malaria cases and saved lots of lives."

At Greenpeace, Rick Hind noted reasons to be wary of DDT, but added: "If there's nothing else and it's going to save lives, we're all for it. Nobody's dogmatic about it."

To see what Rachel Carson actually said about DDT in Silent Spring, go here. Basically she's pointing out the problem of resistance - the more you spray DDT or any chemical pesticide, the more the insects develop a resistance and the less effective it is. With that knowledge, and the knowledge of what it does to the natural world and maybe to humans, it would be foolish to use DDT too much. She says:

"No responsible person contends that insect-borne disease should be ignored. The question that has now urgently presented itself is whether it is either wise or responsible to attack the problem by methods that are rapidly making it worse."

You might also look here for more information about what the World Wildlife Fund recommended in the 1990's.

I'm sure there were differing opinions. Environmental groups have a spectrum of different operational frameworks. But I don't think any major enviro group would advocate a ban on any technology that could save millions of lives. They might caution about the need for more research and caution in using the technology, and they might present alternatives that would actually work better.

by Will on Wed, 10/18/2006 - 16:46 | reply

Ban

"I don't think any major enviro group would advocate a ban on any technology that could save millions of lives."

Aren't you assuming your conclusion?

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 10/18/2006 - 20:02 | reply

Those last two sentences are

Those last two sentences are my opinion. Please take them separately from the evidence presented in the first part of the comment.

by Will on Thu, 10/19/2006 - 00:33 | reply

Did (does) the WWF want to ban DDT?

From the WWF homepage:

Quote:

"Because of the availability of safer and effective alternatives for fighting malaria, WWF is calling for a global phaseout and eventual ban on DDT production and use."

"The first report, "Resolving the DDT Dilemma," released in June 1998, notes that DDT is linked to effects in animals or humans such as reduced lactation and reproductive problems. ...

"Resolving the DDT Dilemma" offers a framework to guide malaria control programs toward reduced reliance on all pesticides, and a 'tool kit' of alternative techniques, along with several recommendations including:

- * DDT should be phased out of use and ultimately banned;
- * Targeted programs emphasizing reduced reliance on pesticides and better environmental protection should be developed by WHO, World Bank, UNEP, and other multilateral and bilateral assistance agencies;
- * Adequate financial and technical resources must be provided to undertake integrated vector management programs;
- * Research is needed on the hazards from chronic exposure to synthetic pyrethroids being used as alternatives to DDT for indoor spraying and to impregnate bednets.

"The third report released by WWF, "Disease Vector Management for Public Health and Conservation" demonstrates that a variety of innovative mechanisms can control malaria and other diseases just as effectively as DDT. These alternatives are less harmful to the environment and human health. Detailed case studies in six areas?

Africa (Botswana, Tanzania, and Western Africa), India, the Philippines, and Mexico? focus on a variety of alternative techniques.

"WWF initially [in 1999] called for a global phaseout and eventual ban on DDT production and use by the year 2007, together with financial and technical assistance to the developing world....However, it also raised fears that DDT would be phased out without sufficient guarantees of protection of public health from malaria. To allay these fears, WWF has set aside discussion of the 2007 deadline, while retaining its commitment to eliminating DDT. Both the UNEP and WHO recognize that such elimination can be a "win-win" situation for public health and environmental protection."

by Will on Thu, 10/19/2006 - 01:19 | reply

More DDT info

Tim Lambert has an older blog with a bunch more posts about DDT. From what I've been reading tonight, it looks like the main cause of the resurgence of Malaria in the 1970s was growing resistance to DDT, combined with governments trying to save money/corruption/incompetence.

<http://timlambert.org/category/science/ddt/>

by Will on Fri, 10/20/2006 - 04:11 | reply

A Reflection On The Town Square Test

A free society is not just a place that lacks oppressive laws. It is a place that is made free by people taking freedom seriously. They not only value freedom, they want to live in a free society, and they want to do, and to speak up for, what is necessary to keep their society free. Such as defending freedom for others, not only themselves.

In regard to the events we reported here, where someone was harassed and threatened for wearing an Israeli-flag cape in Oxford (see also here), some have said that being threatened by one individual is not a failure of the town square test: one person is not representative. But the town square test is not about whether a society has any criminals. It is about whether citizens take steps to create a free atmosphere. It is true that the police can't be everywhere, so if you aren't necessarily safe to express your political opinion in dark alleys, at night, that is no failure of the town square test. However, the point of the test is that you are in the town square. It's daylight, people are there. Are you now afraid to state your political opinions? If you are, the people around you are not reliable in their commitment to freedom. They can't be counted on to help you be free, should you need that help. In a country that properly passes the test, you will feel safe despite the existence of some criminals, because the other people in the square will stand up for you even if they disagree with your view.

Sat, 10/07/2006 - 02:12 | digg | del.icio.us | permlink

Setting the bar a bit high?

I think any urban centre should be expected to fail the town square test. Some people are violent and unreasonable, by their nature. As for by-standers, most don't want to get involved, daylight or dark night. Isn't that human nature, rather than a reflection of a society's commitment to liberty?

Chris Pontius is a case in point. I doubt that he knows about Natan Sharansky, but one of Chris' videos amounts to a failed attempt at the town square test. He suffered physical harm while stating a religious belief. On the other hand, a few people stood up for him. Anyway, watch it all here.

by Pond on Sat, 10/07/2006 - 16:27 | reply

More evidence that the "Town Square" test is a BS test.

by a reader on Sat, 10/07/2006 - 16:58 | reply

The bar

I think any urban centre should be expected to fail the town square test. Some people are violent and unreasonable, by their nature. As for by-standers, most don't want to get involved, daylight or dark night. Isn't that human nature, rather than a reflection of a society's commitment to liberty?

Chris Pontius is a case in point. I doubt that he knows about Natan Sharansky, but one of Chris' videos amounts to a failed attempt at the town square test. He suffered physical harm while stating a religious belief. On the other hand, a few people stood up for him. Anyway, watch it all here.

First, nobody is aggressively violent by nature, rather some people are violent because they are idiots. They can learn to use violence only in self-defence or defence of others and to settle other differences through discussion.

Second, if doesn't cost a group of people much to stop an attack by a single aggressor. The real issue is do they want to stop the attack?

The mere fact that Pontius was harmed doesn't seem to be the point of that video. The man who hit him was rather large. The people around him just could not stop him immediately, but they did try and eventually succeeded. They were trying to make it safe for Pontius to express his views. The delay might have also been because they thought the idiot would stop attacking him because he would feel ashamed at his actions. This would be a better outcome than the thug being forced to stop his attack.

If I were to be beaten up in the middle of Oxford for wearing an Israeli flag would anyone even try to stop the attacker? I don't know. I don't think I would bet on it.

Finally, I am somewhat confused as to why anyone would say that this constitutes evidence that the town square test is BS. Perhaps the poster who said that would explain further.

by Alan Forrester on Tue, 10/10/2006 - 21:38 | reply

Finally, I am somewhat confus

Finally, I am somewhat confused as to why anyone would say that this constitutes evidence that the town square test is BS. Perhaps the poster who said that would explain further.

Maybe because they're from a farm. Not everybody has the point of view of a city slicker or a town mouse.

by a reader on Sat, 10/14/2006 - 16:49 | reply

Town Squares

I happen to think that the most important lesson of this is that we do not have enough Town Squares. If I parade around town or at the mall with a hammer and sickle hat at most I may generate a few odd looks and frighten a few old ladies. A North Korean flag wearer might get some people angry but most would not recognise it. Easy Rider Captain America flag wearing is good for the movie posters and would not get me shot at today on the highway but I might get pulled over and be given a sobriety test.

Town Squares however should be a place for recognized public discourse and the occasional odd hat or flag wearer. There are too few of them. Reasonable debate, visual statements, and speech giving is generally confined to the whispers of electronic bloggers on their fave websites. Political smear ads on the other hand have taken over the media and made ad executives easy millions. It is hard to turn away from their visual onslaughts.

However where is the Town Square in all of this? Reasoned debate is drowned out by the sound of trucks and autos whizzing by and ignored by the masses of blue light shoppers absorbed in the ring tones of their cell phones as they rush by on sidewalks.

by a reader on Mon, 10/23/2006 - 15:04 | reply

Armed Robbers Off Limits

this might be a little off the center of the topic, but i recently learned that CCW holders are forbidden from shooting an armed assailant in the process of robbing someone else - say, a convenience store clerk - unless the assailant is accosting the CCW holder personally.

i think if an armed maniac enters a store one is in, one is plenty endangered and justified on that ground alone, but apparently the law is that if it's not our hide it's not our business and we should just duck behind the slurpee machine until the clerk is dead and the assailant gone, or face murder charges.

this struck me as perverse and an insult to the concept of civic responsibility, but there it is.

by susan28 on Sun, 01/28/2007 - 23:58 | reply

'Software Piracy' Is Not Theft

Charcoal Design has an article arguing that the metaphor of 'theft' or 'piracy' for unauthorised use of information (such as software) can be highly inappropriate, immoral and damaging.

Yes, software creators need to have an incentive to produce their products, and they also have a moral right to receive the fruits of their labour. But they have no moral right to harm someone who has done them no harm. And it will be disastrous if a law based on a silly metaphor continues to shield this vital industry from the need to create innovative ways of marketing, and new types of relationships with their customers, appropriate for the still more knowledge-dominated economy of the future.

This, too, is a problem that has to be solved if we are to set the world to rights.

Update: See also their article on the future of Apple Computer.

Tue, 10/24/2006 - 22:42 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

So what about other forms of

So what about other forms of "intellectual property"? Is The World for or against those?

by a reader on Wed, 10/25/2006 - 08:42 | reply

I agree so called software pi

I agree so called software piracy is not harming the producers. Have you seen Weird Al's "Don't download this song"? Very funny take on music piracy. :)

What about art theft, though? When someone steals someone's art, and poses as its own art, unfairly profiting from it? Or a company with better marketing skills as the artist, sells it as "royalty free stock". What do you think about that?

by a reader on Wed, 10/25/2006 - 22:10 | reply

Piracy is not copyright violation

Piracy and copyright violation are not the same thing (though they may overlap).

Claiming somebody else's work as your own is depriving them of their rightful reputation for creating the work, and any profit you make from hijacking their creativity is fraud - you are conning the person who pays you for the work, and may or may not be depriving the artist of the money from the sale as well, since it seems likely that if someone was willing to pay you for the art, they would have been willing to pay the actual artist as well, assuming he or she would have been willing to agree to the same terms.

Generally speaking, software pirates do not claim to have created the works they are distributing. And as long as they aren't charging for it then they are not demonstrably depriving the creator of any revenue, since those that download it may well have been unwilling to pay (if they would have been willing to pay had a pirate copy been unavailable, then the decision to pirate instead rests on their conscience, not the distributor's).

Claiming work as your own, and charging for it without making it clear that you are not ethically entitled to profit from it are both fraudulent and immoral activities (As well as being illegal). Distributing a work that is hard to obtain otherwise (for reasons of scarcity or cost) is not fraudulent as long as you make it clear that's what you are doing (it is of course still illegal, unfortunately).

What you are distributing doesn't matter. The same would be true with any medium for creativity, whether it is spoken, written, recorded, painted or programmed.

by Nick on Thu, 10/26/2006 - 12:57 | reply

Copyright as contract

I'm not sure I understand the article referenced. On one hand Deutsch appears to think protection against copying is not necessary for innovation. On the other hand he does appear to do so when he writes:

I am not suggesting that software companies shouldn't fight piracy - it is this very fight that spurs much of the innovation I've been advocating - I only ask that they fight fair.

And here Deutsch misses the point completely:

Similarly, affluent 'adults' will not pirate because they have neither the time nor the inclination to trawl the dark recesses of the Internet looking for seedy pirate web sites when they can more easily walk into a shop.

This is an attempt to have your cake and eat it too. The reason affluent adults will not pirate is because there is copyright law. Now does Deutsch advocate making copying legal or not? If yes, then software makers will no longer be able to sell their software at a premium. Because legal copies will be sold by others with the same quality and they will no longer be sold at seedy pirate web sites. If no, then Deutsch must accept that action is taken against copyright infringers, whether they be young girls or grown men. Whether this is a function of the state or private initiative is a different debate.

I believe copyright arises via freedom of contract. Just as when you order dinner at a restaurant, you implicitly agree to pay for it afterwards, so too when you buy anything with the label "copyright" you implicitly agree not to copy it or let someone else copy it (except for backup purposes). If everybody abides by their contract, we have de facto copyright.

The problem is some people will not abide by their contract. Or someone who has not been bound by the contract may find or steal or borrow software and make a copy. But a copyright contract means that the buyer gains only certain limited rights with regard to a property. A copyrighted book remains in one sense physical property of the seller. The buyer buys only the right to read the book and do some other things with it (similar for software). All other rights with regard to the physical property, including the right to copy, remain with the seller. And therefore the finder of say a software DVD on the street does not have the right to read that DVD on his computer and make a copy. Even though he does not have a contract with the original owner, he is not the rightful owner of the DVD. Nor can he be given full ownership rights by the previous owner, because that owner cannot give away rights he does not have, and the right to copy remains with the original seller. And so via purely physical property rights, an immaterial copyright can be derived.

Compare this to renting a house. If I rent a house a condition may be that I am not allowed to allow anybody to smoke in the house. If I sublet the house to someone else, that third person can never gain the right to smoke in the house, even though he signed no contract to that effect himself. I can never give or sell a right with regard to a property which I do not have. Therefore I cannot give or sell the right for someone to smoke in the house. And similarly, I can never give or sell someone the right to copy a DVD which I "bought" ("rented" would be more accurate) if I do not have full property rights to that DVD myself (and in particular do not own the right to copy it).

One might argue that if I pay for downloaded software, I download that software to my own physical harddisk. In that case I can no longer argue, it appears, that part of my harddisk remains physical property of the seller and that he keeps the right to use it to make copies. Well, one could in fact argue exactly that. Part of the contract could be that the seller gains some physical ownership over the part of my harddisk where I store the copy. Now my point is not that such a contract should really be made. My point is that we can always find some way for a copyright contract to be phrased so that copyright arises out of purely physical property rights. And the very fact that that is possible makes copyrights reasonable, whether or not people actually take the trouble to phrase it in such ways.

Henry Sturman

Legality and Morality...

It seems to me that the solution of this problem rests on the distinction between legal and moral rights. I think software piracy is theft and that's all there is to it in legal terms. Whenever somebody pirates a piece of software the software maker has a legal right to prosecute the pirate and as I will explain that is how it should be. However, there is a distinction between when it is legally feasible to prosecute somebody for theft and when it is right to do so.

Consider a person who sees a bunch of grapes in a supermarket and wants one of them. Now, she doesn't want to buy a whole bunch because she knows she won't eat most of them, so instead she takes a single grape without paying for it. Perhaps she does this once or twice a year. Now the supermarket manager might catch the whole thing on CCTV and decide not to prosecute. Why? Well, it would be a bit silly wouldn't it? And it would drive away customers. And it would be wrong to throw a person in jail for taking a single grape.

Nevertheless, I think that grape theft should be a prosecutable offence. Why? Well, imagine that somebody comes in every day for a year and steals two grapes. That starts to add up to the supermarket losing a significant amount of money. Likewise setting up a massive file sharing network with the sole purpose of systematically undermining a company's private property rights seems quite wrong to me.

I think there is a combination of factors at work which make software piracy a problem - some of this may be the fault of software companies, some of it is the fault of other people. Let's take the little girl alluded to in the article who downloads a copy of Brittany's Dance Studio. Well, the girl's parents have a computer, so the software can't really be out of their price range IMO. So if the little girl really wants it and the parents haven't bought it then it is very likely that the parents are dicks, which is very common. Even if it puts a bit of a strain on the budget they might say something like: "If you really want this we'll get it, but we won't be able to get that pink pair of jeans you want until next month." or whatever. The point is parent and child can come to a common preference. So a prosecution seems reasonable to me.

What about the students who can't afford the thousand dollar software package? Well, the software company could choose not to prosecute or to offer students a concession offer or the right to put their software on some number of computers specified in advance, with copies above that number being prosecutable. So for six students the number would be six computers or whatever. And if a student copies software from Uni perhaps the software company ought not to prosecute if he can't afford it.

Of course, all of the cases I've given above are a bit vague and could have holes poked in them but my point here was not to give a comprehensive list of when prosecutions should and should not be made. I just wanted to highlight the distinction. I think we should move past discussing the legality of this issue, on which the software companies are right. Rather we should start suggesting in which sorts of cases software companies should prosecute and discuss solutions to the problems raised by cases in which prosecution seems unjust.

by Alan Forrester on Thu, 10/26/2006 - 17:17 | reply

Hypothetical parents unfairly slandered

Alan wrote

"Let's take the little girl alluded to in the article who downloads a copy of Brittany's Dance Studio. Well, the girl's parents have a computer, so the software can't really be out of their price range IMO. So if the little girl really wants it and the parents haven't bought it then it is very likely that the parents are dicks, which is very common. "

Not necessarily. It may be that the parents are decent people and so is the little girl, and she wants to play Britney's Dance Studio, but doesn't think it is worth $60 of her parent's money. Rather than lie to them by telling them that she thinks it's worth more than it is, or ask them to knowingly spend more money on something than it is worth, she instead downloads a copy for free (whilst retaining the option of asking them to purchase it should it unexpectedly turn out to have hidden depths).

If this reasoning were applied to shoplifting then it would obviously be wrong to steal something because you don't think it's worth the price tag, but since nobody loses out either way when she downloads it (versus not playing it), I fail to see any moral dilemma.

by Nick on Thu, 10/26/2006 - 18:55 | reply

... hard to obtain otherwise

Distributing a work that is hard to obtain otherwise (for reasons of scarcity or cost) is not fraudulent as long as you make it clear that's what you are doing (it is of course still illegal, unfortunately).

As one interested in the history of computing, this is of some interest to me. In order to use and maintain most obsolete machines, violating copyrights is almost essential, since manuals and software are no longer available by 'legitimate' means (although a few manufacturers have graciously granted free non-commercial license to obsolete material). In this respect, trademark law, with its "use it or lose it" rule, could be a reasonable model; it would protect Disney's continuing interest in Mickey Mouse without forever criminalizing the use of material of no commercial value.

by Kevin on Fri, 10/27/2006 - 00:24 | reply

Software trespassing as breach of contract

Henry and Alan both make interesting points which I think somewhat cancel each other out. Yes, we do have to distinguish moral from legal issues, but in contract law they overlap in a unique way that has no close analogue in other branches of the law. Contract law is unique in that the parties themselves decide the conditions that they must obey, and society at large enforces this.

Consequently society - other people - may choose not to enforce certain types of contract. Morally, why should they?

Thus, for instance, contracts 'in restraint of trade' are invalid under existing law. So are contracts intended to fulfil an illegal or an immoral purpose. In the past, the latter have included contracts for the purpose of prostitution, an exception which would obviously be illiberal. But, for instance, what about contract terms which benefit no one but do harm people who themselves have done no harm? Surely those terms are nothing but harmful. Why should society jump up and intervene by force?

A related issue is this: if no harm has been done, surely the plaintiff should not be allowed to sue for damages: there were none.

by David Deutsch on Fri, 10/27/2006 - 00:26 | reply

Contracts not applicable here

In response to Henry:

Attempting to apply contract law to pre-existing intellectual property has the same problems as trying to apply normal property law - it is an analogy that doesn't fit.

A contract is supposed to be agreed before either party makes a contribution to ensure that once the contribution is made the other party doesn't renege on their part of the bargain.

If party A signed a contract agreeing that they would pay party B to create a piece of software, then, once the work had been done refused to pay, certainly that would be a breach of contract. In the case of commercial software however party C creates a piece of software first and then goes out looking for people who will retrospectively pay for it to have been created. There is no contractual obligation for anyone to do this since it was not agreed in advance.

And of course if any given person doesn't pay then C is no worse off than they were before and still has every opportunity to find someone else who will, unlike person B, who may be forced to renege on other contractual agreements (such as paying back a bank loan) because person A didn't pay.

In the first case, party A would need to pay even if they decided they no longer wanted the software, yet clearly in the second case it would be ludicrous to suggest that people must pay for software created by C, even if they don't want to use it. The two cases are therefore not analogous. (BTW, C may go bankrupt because they wrongly assumed more people would buy the software than do, but that could happen just as easily if nobody used the software illegally).

When installing a piece of software, a user may read the contract and agree with it. Alternatively they may read the contract and say "I don't agree with that, I think I should be allowed to use the software without paying instead". They don't expect the author to do anything for them in the latter case, so they don't need to sign a contract to proceed (they may need to click a check-box marked "I agree", but it is debatable that that constitutes contractual agreement - I don't believe its ever been tested in court).

The software author is not providing a service to the user in return for the demands they make - the user is expected to hand over money, and/or inconvenience themselves (by not installing multiple copies of the program for example), but the software author offers nothing in return for this. They aren't offering the physical media since the user has either provided that themselves or someone has paid for it already (if they stole it then that is theft according to the standard definition and not relevant here), and they aren't providing any creativity or intellectual effort, since this effort was already expended prior to the user's involvement.

The only thing that the author provides to the end user in return for their money is access to a service. When the user decides to pay for that service, they are aware that the price includes both the cost of distribution and a markup to cover the original development. The user never agreed contractually that that they thought that the product was worth the price quoted, and if they don't feel that it is then they have the (currently illegal) option of getting the product via a different distribution channel that doesn't cost as much. By doing this they are not violating a contractual obligation, at least not a legitimate one.

If on the other hand they do think the product is worth the price, and can afford it, but still don't pay it, then they are acting in a way that they themselves probably recognise as being unethical, and will have to deal with that. Even then I don't consider that it should be illegal since it is really no worse than listening to a busker in the street for half an hour and then not dropping any coins in his hat.

by Nick on Fri, 10/27/2006 - 00:57 | reply

Private Property and Software

I think I might need to address the issue of why we have private property at all. In order to produce any commodity a person must consume resources. Even those little Buddhist monk fellows who produce feelings of serenity or religious piety in hippies and buddhists need to eat, assertions by the monks to the contrary notwithstanding. We need to be able to criticise the distribution of property between different ends and that's why we have the institution of private property. If a person can't persuade other people to give him enough resources to make a particular product by argument that constitutes a criticism of that product or of his salesmanship, i.e. - his ability to distribute knowledge of the product. (The product is useless if people don't buy it because of crappy salesmanship.) This applies just as much to computer games and programmes as it does to apples or books or whatever. It is perfectly possible to distribute a book against copyright law by photocopying it and putting the photocopies on the Internet for people to download illegally. However, when people do this they deprive the author of money that he might have used to make more books either directly or simply by paying for food or whatever. So contractual exchange of property is one of the essential institutions of criticism of any free society.

Nick objects to prosecuting illegal downloads on the spurious grounds that ticking a box saying "I agree not to filch this software by giving it to other people," is not a contract. The person signing it might not read it or might agree to forfeit the software company's support if the product goes a bit wrong or whatever or might sign it without any intention of sticking to it. People can and do sign loan agreements and other kinds of contract without reading them, should all such contracts be void? If people are too stupid to read contracts or if they just can't be bothered to pay for something does that get them an out of jail free card? I should also note that traditionally when a person signs a contract that he does not intend to fulfil people look on such behaviour as a bad act on the part of the person signing the contract, not on the part of the person who drew it up. Furthermore, I don't recall signing any contract saying that I wouldn't beat the shit out of the next person I see on the street, or that I wouldn't go the nearest shop, put a brick through the window and start stealing stuff. I respect these rules despite not having signed a contract to do so because these rules are objectively right and no free society could exist in which people systematically refused to respect them. I think that intellectual property in software tends to fall in that category. It costs money to develop software. If that software is distributed for free in violation of a contract saying that the buyer would not distribute it the software company often loses money that it might otherwise have received. This does harm the company.

Now let's go back to the case of the little girl:

It may be that the parents are decent people and so is the little girl, and she wants to play Britney's Dance Studio, but doesn't think it is worth $60 of her parent's money. Rather than lie to them by telling them that she thinks it's worth more than it is, or ask them to knowingly spend more money on something than it is worth, she instead downloads a copy for free (whilst retaining the option of asking them to purchase it should it unexpectedly turn out to have hidden depths).

If this reasoning were applied to shoplifting then it would obviously be wrong to steal something because you don't think it's worth the price tag, but since nobody loses out either way when she downloads it (versus not playing it), I fail to see any moral dilemma.

Let's suppose that this is true. She doesn't think the game is worth nothing or she wouldn't want it at all. There are lots of ways she can enjoy the computer game without paying sixty dollars. She can rent it from Blockbuster. She can buy it in a year or so as a budget release for a much lower price. She can try to find second hand copies and so on. In all of these cases, her buying or renting the computer game at the very least does not make it more probable that people will buy games of the same sort in the future because they will be able to sell the game when they're bored with it or rent the game to other people. She ought to want to find a legal solution and she ought to be able to get help from her parents to do so. I do see a moral dilemma.

David points out that some contracts are wrong and ought not to be enforced:

Thus, for instance, contracts 'in restraint of trade' are invalid under existing law. So are contracts intended to fulfil an illegal or an immoral purpose. In the past, the latter have included contracts for the purpose of prostitution, an exception which would obviously be illiberal.

Some contracts are invalid under existing law and it is rightly a matter for debate what sort of contracts ought to be enforced when somebody chooses to try to get the authorities to enforce them.

But, for instance, what about contract terms which benefit no one but do harm people who themselves have done no harm? Surely those terms are nothing but harmful. Why should society jump up and intervene by force?

Well, if none of the parties to a contract want it enforced then I don't see that there is much of a problem. If one of the parties does want the contract enforced then there is a disagreement about the harm done or benefit gained by enforcing or not enforcing the contract. The person who wants it enforced thinks that it would be harmful for the contract not to be enforced, other people might disagree. It might be the case that some cases of illegal downloading are like this as I implied in my original post. I might be prepared to concede in some such cases that the downloader ought not to be prosecuted. But that's a long way from saying that such acts are not theft. If a starving orphan child steals a loaf of bread that is theft, but the government ought not to prosecute the orphan. Perhaps software companies ought to make provisions for some people to buy their software under different terms, e.g. - poor students, I see no need to scrap intellectual property in software.

A related issue is this: if no harm has been done, surely the plaintiff should not be allowed to sue for damages: there were none.

An "if" that is not indiscriminately applicable to illegal downloading even if it might be applicable in some individual cases.

It seems to me that there is more than a touch of utopianism about this post. The World didn't take the time to weigh up the actual damage done by illegal downloading and whether people have other alternatives. Nor did it take the time to look at whether there might be solutions that would involve making suggestions for better software selling policies. No, instead it just threw the whole edifice of intellectual property in software out the window.

by Alan Forrester on Sun, 10/29/2006 - 17:36 | reply

Alan writes: "In order to

Alan writes:

"In order to produce any commodity a person must consume resources... So contractual exchange of property is one of the essential institutions of criticism of any free society."

I'm going to assume that "institutions of criticism" is worldspeak for "mechanisms to promote creativity", so forgive me if I misinterpret what you mean, but I assume that you are saying people should be allowed to sign binding contracts when exchanging property and expect them to be respected even if the burden they place on the other party could be considered totally unreasonable (e.g. not allowing them to make backups in case of damage). This is true, with the proviso that the contract must not require either party to behave in a way which is immoral, or impose ludicrous penalties for violation (such as death). This would seem to imply that someone who buys the software legitimately and then violates the terms of the contract by copying and distributing the software should be subject to penalties, but it does not imply that the author should be permitted to extrapolate huge imaginary "lost earnings" and charge them to the violator, nor does it imply that the violator should suffer prison. I would guess that the worst legitimate penalty you could justify placing on the violator would be confiscation of the software and any ill gotten gains from its resale, minus the price he originally paid for it.

Anyone receiving the software from this person would not have been party to the contract, so they would not be subject to any penalty. In fact, if they paid the contract violator for the software they should be probably offered a refund if they return all copies - though this should not be compulsory.

Alan continues:

"I don't recall signing any contract saying that I wouldn't beat the shit out of the next person I see on the street, or that I wouldn't go the nearest shop, put a brick through the window and start stealing stuff. I respect these rules despite not having signed a contract to do so because these rules are objectively right and no free society could exist in which people systematically refused to respect them."

As he himself points out this is a case where contract law doesn't apply. Some things we don't do because a contract says we shouldn't, some we don't do because they are objectively wrong, some things we don't do because they are wrong even if we have signed a contract saying we should. Morality exists independently of contracts - contracts do not define right and wrong, and there are some things to which they do not apply. Since the whole thrust of my previous point was that contracts aren't applicable in this case, I'm not sure what point he is trying to make by pointing this out.

"I think that intellectual property in software tends to fall in that category. It costs money to develop software. If that software is distributed for free in violation of a contract saying that the buyer would not distribute it the software company often loses money that it might otherwise have received. This does harm the company."

If the company were to release the software and someone wrote a bad review and then people didn't buy it, that would harm the company. Does that mean writing bad reviews is immoral? If someone can, through a non-immoral act cause another person harm, that doesn't suddenly render that act immoral after all. The morality of software piracy needs to be defined independently of its consequences.

In reference to the little girl:

"There are lots of ways she can enjoy the computer game without paying sixty dollars. She can rent it from Blockbuster. She can buy it in a year or so as a budget release for a much lower price. She can try to find second hand copies and so on. In all of these cases, her buying or renting the computer game at the very least does not make it more probable that people will buy games of the same sort in the future because they will be able to sell the game when they're bored with it or rent the game to other people. She ought to want to find a legal solution and she ought to be able to get help from her parents to do so. I do see a moral dilemma."

In the hypothetical situation I was describing it was assumed that there was no alternative channel by which to get the game. This counter-argument is very much tied to the real-life happenstance of the situation, in which the software developers, in conjunction with a third party have arrived at a clever a viable way allow people to try the game without paying and yet still make revenue for the developer. On the one hand Alan has avoided the issue of whether the girl would have been right to pirate had such an option not been available (as it often isn't), but on the other hand he has illustrated a very good example of how the developer can apply creativity to solve the problem (crap software being expensive) in a way that makes everyone happy (videogame rentals). If they had instead been allowed to exact a profit by getting the police to round up all 13yo girls who pirate, and then sued their parents for $50,000 each, it seems unlikely that there would have been much incentive for them to devise this (much better) solution.

Incidentally, it's worth noting that Sony recently launched an attack against the second-hand gaming market. Although most people criticised them for this money-grubbing attitude, since developers make no direct profit from the second-hand games market, it does raise the question of why we should consider second-hand intellectual property to be morally distinct from piracy anyway? Just because someone is making a profit, it doesn't mean the developer benefits. In fact how is selling a used game any different than selling an unused pirate game? In both cases you profit from the publishers work without them getting a penny, and in both cases you deprive them of a sale since that customer won't be buying a legitimate new copy instead. And yet since there is obviously nothing morally reprehensible about second hand games (at least to any sane person) it would seem to cast further doubt about the validity of the "lost revenue = stealing" argument commonly used against pirates.

"It seems to me that there is more than a touch of utopianism about this post. The World didn't take the time to weigh up the actual damage done by illegal downloading and whether people have other alternatives. Nor did it take the time to look at whether there might be solutions that would involve making suggestions for better software selling policies. No, instead it just threw the whole edifice of intellectual property in software out the window."

I believe that the path to a utopian society is to first work out what the ideal situation would be and then compromise if necessary when pragmatism requires it - not to shoot for an unsatisfactory solution in the first place. This is sometimes called "not going in with your highest offer first".

The closing argument of the original article was that software developers should be seeking innovative solutions for better software selling policies rather than concentrating its efforts on demonising and prosecuting pirates. So what makes you think that The World isn't interested in doing that?

The purpose of intellectual property rights is to promote innovation, but it has become patently obvious (no pun intended) that they can easily be abused to stifle creativity and competition, (or just to make a fast buck at the expense of some poor sap), and that violating them can benefit humanity in many cases. So why not 'throw the whole edifice out' and see if we're better off without it? After all, we're just talking...

by Nick on Mon, 10/30/2006 - 10:51 | reply

Piracy

"If the company were to release the software and someone wrote a bad review and then people didn't buy it, that would harm the company. Does that mean writing bad reviews is immoral? If someone can, through a non-immoral act cause another person harm, that doesn't suddenly render that act immoral after all. The morality of software piracy needs to be defined independently of its consequences."

Nick,

Keeping a promise (for example, honoring a contract) is usually considered ethical behavior! So Alan is not defining moral behavior just by its consequences. There is a principle involved.

An honest review that is critical of a product and thus causes its sales to fall, is not the same as stealing the product! Owners of a product do not own the right to column space in newspapers or on blogs. Therefore they cannot restrict an individual's right to express an opinion in such a column. Such a restriction would be illegal and immoral.

If you own a television, I cannot say you have economically damaged me because you have not given it to me. In almost all circumstances, it would be illegal and immoral to take your television from you. Similarly, software developers and distributors do not own the right to other people's money. So others can rightfully (morally and legally) try to convince potential customers not to spend money on a software product.

On the other hand, software developers do own their own product, the fruits of their labors. Owning something means restricting other people's rights to use it in a particular way and allowing other people to use it in a particular way, for the most part at the discretion of the owner. If you instead "pirate" those rights, by downloading software without paying for it, that is properly considered illegal and immoral because it is taking the product of the developer's labor without compensating him.

The developer would not have put in the hours to develop the product if others could simply use his product without paying for it. Stealing software is immoral for the same reason that stealing labor (slavery) is immoral. People properly own the fruits of their own labor, unless someone compensates them for their time.

By respecting intellectual property rights, Alan is defending the moral principle that coercing people into giving up the products of their labor is wrong.

by a reader on Mon, 10/30/2006 - 22:39 | reply

"...software developers do ow

"...software developers do own their own product, the fruits of their labors. Owning something means restricting other people's rights to use it in a particular way and allowing other people to use it in a particular way, for the most part at the discretion of the owner."

The problem with this statement is that software developers do not own the product once they have sold it. If they burn it onto a CD and you pay money for that CD then you own it. What they own is the copyright, which to me means that they own the right to claim credit for the work, and to charge for reproductions of it. You have paid for one such copy however, and that copy is yours to do with as you please within the confines of moral behaviour.

"The developer would not have put in the hours to develop the product if others could simply use his product without paying for it. Stealing software is immoral for the same reason that stealing labor (slavery) is immoral. People properly own the fruits of their own labor, unless someone compensates them for their time."

You are simply repeating the flawed analogy of "copyright violation is theft" without justifying it. In fact you attempt to reinforce it with the even more inaccurate assertion that "copyright violation is slavery". Forcing someone to work is slavery (whether you pay them or not). However not paying someone for work they do voluntarily is not slavery, and is only immoral if you agreed beforehand that you would pay them for it.

You are not stealing their labour because with intellectual property, the fruits of that labour can be recycled infinitely. Steal as many copies as you want, and they still have an infinite supply. Forget for a minute whether copyright violation is right or wrong, the point here is that it is not anything like slavery, and it is not anything like theft.

"By respecting intellectual property rights, Alan is defending the moral principle that coercing people into giving up the products of their labor is wrong."

Where is the coercion? This is yet another metaphor in lieu of an argument. Nobody is trying to make software developers give their software away for free, on the contrary it is they who are trying to make others not give it away.

Software developers are perfectly entitled to use any morally legitimate means to control the distribution of their software, whether it be through copy protection schemes, competitive pricing and distribution, or legal action against those who cause them actual (provable, calculable) harm.

The point of the article was that the harm caused by philanthropic (free) redistribution has been massively overestimated, and the legal penalties for such actions are wildly disproportionate, and must be heavily clamped down to prevent publishers abusing the legal system to recoup outrageous fines from the few pirates they manage to catch and make examples of. They cannot be allowed to blame poor sales on pirates and then expect the pirates to pay the difference - pirates for the most part just supply software to those areas of the market unwilling to pay for it, and they do no calculable harm by doing this because most users of pirate software would not have paid for it anyway.

The way they get away with fining pirates for more than they've taken is by using the "theft" metaphor to imply that pirates selling copies is like them stealing them off the shelf. But that's not true - the pirates aren't manufacturing wealth from nothing - software is not a money tree. If you copy a CD full of valuable data then together those two identical CDs have exactly the same value as the first one (plus the miniscule cost of the media). The same is true of 10, or 100, or a 1000 copies. You cannot steal or devalue intellectual property in that way - you cannot increase or reduce its worth by duplication.

The true value of intellectual property is the number of people willing to pay for it, multiplied by the amount they are willing to pay. A pirate is no more likely to influence those numbers than a magazine reviewer is.

by Nick on Tue, 10/31/2006 - 00:51 | reply

Re: Legality and Morality...

I argued that copyright should be viewed as a contract. David replied:

Consequently society - other people - may choose not to enforce certain types of contract. Morally, why should they?

Indeed. Nobody is forced to enforce any contract. But in a free society one will always be able to find someone willing to enforce a certain contract. So even if only 1% of arbitration agencies enforce copyright contracts, one can still hire one of those 1% to enforce the contract. If the other 99% do not agree with the legality they might use force to prevent the 1% from enforcing copyright contracts. Whether that would be right depends on the question of whether copyright contracts are legal. So my point is that David's distinction between legality and morality does not solve the problem. In a society where copyrights are considered illegal and immoral, copyrights can not be enforced. In a society where copyrights are considered legal but immoral, copyrights will be enforced.

David also writes:

A related issue is this: if no harm has been done, surely the plaintiff should not be allowed to sue for damages: there were none.

Perhaps. But this can be solved by specifying payments in the contract. If I download software costing 10 euros I might be asked to agree that if I allow someone to copy it, then I will pay a charge of 1000 euros. If society believes in freedom of contract that contract can be enforced, not because of the principle of damages but because of the principle of property exchange.

Henry Sturman

by Henry Sturman on Tue, 10/31/2006 - 20:36 | reply

Re: Legality and Morality...

Henry writes:

If society believes in freedom of contract that contract can be enforced

So if someone enters into a contract to love, honour and obey another person for the rest of her life, and later decides that she doesn't want to obey any more, a society that believes in freedom of contract will force her to obey nevertheless?

And 'freedom of contract' also implies that third parties who believe that entering into such a contract is immoral, are nevertheless obliged to enforce it? (Or to stand by while the 'aggrieved' party uses force.)

by David Deutsch on Tue, 10/31/2006 - 23:13 | reply

Legal vs Moral

I think Henry's position is something like:

- legal things are ones you have a right to do without anyone using force against you

- all contracts are legal, including their enforcement with those premises, then a third party who thinks something is a bad way to live, but legal, must not intervene.

but I disagree that all contracts ought to be legal. that allows for slavery contracts. i think it needs to be legal to quit a contract and only owe damages.

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 11/01/2006 - 00:29 | reply

Re: Legality and Morality...

David replied:

So if someone enters into a contract to love, honour and obey another person for the rest of her life, and later decides that she doesn't want to obey any more, a society that believes in freedom of contract will force her to obey nevertheless?

Perhaps we should distinguish between a contract and a promise, as Rothbard suggests. And certainly a marriage promise (or contract) should not be enforceable for the simple reason that it is understood that it will not be enforced. In our culture we all know that marriages are not to be taken as literal enforceable contracts. One of the reasons for this is that we understand love can not be forced. But one might specify in a marriage contract things such as that if one party leaves the other, he agrees to pay a charge. In fact such contracts do exist, and such a charge is called alimony.

Elliot writes:

but I disagree that all contracts ought to be legal. that allows for slavery contracts. i think it needs to be legal to quit a contract and only owe damages.

I agree not all contracts should be legal. So in that sense I agree freedom of contract is not 100%. For example, the contract to commit a crime (e.g. a hit contract) should not be enforceable. Whether slavery contracts should be enforceable, I'm not sure. A point can be made that certain rights are inalienable, so that you can't sell yourself into slavery. But again, people can agree to charges if they, say, quit their job without giving 6 months notice. But there would be exceptions. For example, a doctor should not be permitted to quit an operation in the middle of it so that the patient dies. And a pilot agreeing to fly someone to the North Pole and back should not be able to refuse the return journey.

Also, it seems right that soldiers in a voluntary army are punished for desertion. If soldiers are paid for their services and trained, then we should be able to rely on them. Also, suppose an astronaut's training costs a million euros. Then again it seems unfair that he should be able to quit the moment his training is done. Unless perhaps he pays back the million euros, but if he is not rich he won't be able to pay, and so this does imply in such a case a slavery contract of sorts should be enforceable.

Henry Sturman

by Henry Sturman on Wed, 11/01/2006 - 01:25 | reply

damages

Also, suppose an astronaut's training costs a million euros. Then again it seems unfair that he should be able to quit the moment his training is done. Unless perhaps he pays back the million euros, but if he is not rich he won't be able to pay, and so this does imply in such a case a slavery contract of sorts should be enforceable.

yes, slavery "of some sort". but what sort? exactly the conditions that will cause him to pay back the debt. and nothing else, no matter how small note that in the case of a music CD, the damages are not so large, so paying them back is a lot easier. the damages, for many types of piracy, are zero.

promises, as Godwin taught us, are not rational. if something is right to do, I will do it whether I promised or not. If I promise to do something, and in the event it is wrong to do, then I have promised to do wrong. so promises vary between useless and wicked.

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 11/01/2006 - 02:04 | reply

contracts

contracts are supposed to help people. they should not be a mechanism to create Rules and Authority over people. as long as everyone consents to a contract, and finds it useful, then great. but if they don't consent, they should stop. this is just basic human decency. don't do stuff that hurts people.

stopping, of course, can be problematic. but how could it possibly be reasonable to demand anything from someone who quits a contract but the damages to you? if he pays those, you have lost nothing (except a nice opportunity. but he did not and does not owe you that.)

-- Elliot Temple
curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 11/01/2006 - 02:09 | reply

I think the key point about c

I think the key point about contracts, which has been lost in a sea of extreme examples, is that a contract cannot be used to enforce lifelong involuntary servitude, or anything else that violates the rights of a participant. If you sign a contract agreeing to do something but then later change your mind, then the contract is intended to ensure that the other party does not suffer unduly as a result of that decision - not to ensure that you suffer to make them feel better. This means that you are contractually obliged to make it up to them as best you can, but that's all.

In the case of a doctor who wants to quit surgery, there is no way he can make it up to the patient if he lets them die, hence he is duty bound to ensure that they don't. That may mean having to finish the surgery, but he can probably get away with calling in a colleague in most cases.

In the case of a soldier who wishes to desert, he can do so but he must ensure that he does not endanger his fellow soldiers or the war effort in doing so. This is liberally and unfairly interpreted by the army to mean he cannot do so during wartime at all, but in this day and age the penalty for deserting in a way that does not endanger lives is likely to be minor.

A wife or husband who decides to leave a marriage cannot be forced by contract to stay, but they may be expected to pay money to compensate their partner for irreversible life choices they have made on the understanding that the marriage would last longer.

A person who agrees to work indefinitely as a slave, but later changes their mind can leave without owing anything since the other party has only gained by their generosity, and was never legally entitled to it. They may however be expected to help make arrangements for their replacement and give an adequate notice period, to avoid causing harm by their sudden departure. The exact same thing is true of paid employment, incidentally.

In the case of a software pirate, the contract can oblige them not to give away or sell copies of the software, and if they violate it they can have the software itself, and any ill-gotten gains confiscated. The contract cannot however impose an arbitrary fine of $500,000, or any other unreasonable penalty, any more than a prenup could dictate that a bride must submit herself to the electric chair if she ever decides to leave her husband. The penalty terms in a contract must be reasonable in order to be legally binding.

by Nick on Fri, 11/03/2006 - 09:43 | reply

Software is not property, sof

Software is not property, software is a form of knowledge.

Is it moral to prevent the spread and growth of knowledge?

by a reader on Mon, 12/04/2006 - 02:21 | reply

Maybe a better question would be...

Is it moral to own knowledge?

by the same reader on Mon, 12/04/2006 - 02:23 | reply

Nothing Can be Owned Except Knowledge

by another reader on Thu, 12/07/2006 - 00:54 | reply

Is it moral to restrict knowledge?

I suppose it is for what is clearly harmful knowledge, like how to build a nuclear bomb. But what about useful knowledge? How about an AIDS cure? Or the GENOME sequence? Or software? In these cases, it could be argued that people are being harmed by restricting who can use these forms of knowledge. Is the coercion of those that would like to replicate this knowledge justifiable?

by a reader on Thu, 12/07/2006 - 06:12 | reply

Software and Community in the Software and Community in the Early 21st Century

Keynote address given at Plone Conference 2006 by Eben Moglen of the Software Freedom Law Center. The moral implications of owning knowledge are discussed.

by a reader on Sun, 12/10/2006 - 18:16 | reply

Ecological Footprints

The Worldwide Fund for Nature (WWF) has devised a measure of the impact that a given country has on the planet's environment. They call this the country's 'ecological footprint' and they report it in units of area. It is the area of the Earth that could notionally produce the resources in question (for example, forests could convert atmospheric carbon dioxide back into trees at a certain rate per unit area). The metaphor there is that the planet has only a fixed area. So if we use it up, some of us are going to have to be ejected through Spaceship Earth's metaphorical airlock. At present, each person needs 2.2 global hectares to support the demands they place on the environment, but the planet is only able to meet consumption levels of 1.8 global hectares per person

So we are overdrawing our ecological account. Soon we shall need two planets, they say.

Using the WWF's annual report on these issues, the BBC report cited above includes a chart showing the ecological footprint per capita of a few selected countries, essentially as follows:

As you can see, the huge boots of Americans, Australians and Britons are trampling over the world's bio-space, while poor but virtuous Sierra Leoneans and Afghanis are trading lightly on the Earth's sacred resources. It seems obvious who most deserves to be kicked off the planet.

But does this measure make sense?

First off, we're not at all sure that the measures of 'footprint' themselves are accurate. The data are hard to collect and harder to interpret, and many assumptions had to be made. For example, 48% of the footprint is currently due to carbon dioxide emissions. So if you think that the global warming problem might be solved, you will have to reduce most of the footprint estimates. And so on. But never mind all that. Even on the assumption that their footprint measure is accurate, dividing it by a country's population is of doubtful value. For example, if a country doubles its population without doubling its productivity, its real impact on the environment will increase, but its impact per capita will go down. The country will count as more environmentally virtuous – smaller ecological footprint per capita – by virtue of its runaway overpopulation! Conversely, a country that uses resources very efficiently may still count as becoming more environmentally unfriendly (larger footprint per capita) solely because it has also achieved low population growth.

This is the wrong way round. A better measure of environmental virtue would be the ecological footprint per unit GDP. This does not allow countries to 'cheat' by merely increasing their population without changing their physical effect on the environment, but it does take account of whether a country is wasting resources or using them efficiently. Out of curiosity, we used the WWF's numbers and the BBC's countries to construct the appropriate chart:

The countries are now in approximately the opposite order. Notice that the United States goes from worst on the chart, to using less than capacity, even though the worldwide average is 125% of capacity. This isn't a coincidence. Western countries create their 'footprint' as part of their productive process – creating the very things that let us lower the footprint while also increasing human welfare.

Footprint-per-GDP is, in our opinion, a better measure of countries' environmental virtue. And it does not even take account of the other huge factor that is missing from the WWF's analysis: the 'area' (real or metaphorical) needed to sustain one person is not a constant of nature but depends on the available technology. For instance, how well the Earth can recover depends in part on how many carbon-dioxide-fixing machines we can build, and how efficiently, which in turn depends on how much wealth we can create and how fast. And hence the developed countries, the villains of the piece according to the environmentalists' narrative, are in reality even more environmentally virtuous even by the WWF's standards of 'impact' than our chart makes them seem.

(Data collected by Elliot Temple.)

Fri, 10/27/2006 - 23:37 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Unscientific

The science in the WWF report is unbearably bad. They fudge numbers and basically say that:

- A) they do their honest best
- B) they fudge in what they believe to be the right direction

Doing your best isn't good enough. You need to actually have enough valid data, of the right types, not fudge your numbers to represent what you guess the data would say if you had it. Guessing is less accurate, and less scientific, than using real numbers.

You may think I'm joking, but they admit this in their report. For example they said their data about biodiversity over-represented whatever species people liked to study. So they just counted those less. How much less? Well, something about dividing the world into regions which they assume to be equally important, and then assuming that the convenient already-collected data for each region really is representative.

And people study vertebrates more than invertebrates. So how can they make conclusions about invertebrates, without nearly enough data? Easy. Just assume the trends for vertebrates apply.

-- Elliot Temple
curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Sat, 10/28/2006 - 22:06 | reply

Country-centric Ideas

Sierra Leone in the best or worst of environmental scenarios is not going to make or break the globe. Neither will Great Britain or Germany. China and India might due to growth and carbon use factors. However, even here we are dealing only with county-centric ideas.

Land area and hemisphere measures of various factors per population unit would make for a more interesting and pointed indicator of environmental footprint(s). Deep ocean areas might also be looked at to provide a number of baseline measures.

One time static measures of any sort are not usually very useful. Plot global trend charts. Take a series of snapshots using standard year intervals. Analyze the data through many different screens. Trends and their advantages and concerns will begin to emerge. Except in the extreme, this is not a competition between countries to be the bad-boy, hero of our environmental future. This is a scientific learning process that is ripe for useful discoveries.

by a reader on Sun, 10/29/2006 - 02:19 | reply

Environmental Virtue

The world's footprint measure seems better. But what exactly counts as environmental virtue? In which important ways will the environment degrade if the total human footprint exceeds the available area? Put another way, should we be making the environment better for humans to live in, or for animals and plants to live in?

Or do we try to minimise our impact and leave the other species to their fates? This amounts to partitioning the earth into two environments and reducing the net flux between them. Domed cities and space bubbles might be cool. But assuming animals aren't worthless, who manages the natural environment then? Does nature really know best, given that it has destroyed more than 99% of all historical species?

If we refuse to allow existing species to continue to die out, should we preserve them by gardening the earth and, as a side effect, allowing their fitness to deteriorate? Or should we merely collect their DNA, and the DNA of as many extinct species as we can find?

by Tom Robinson on Sun, 10/29/2006 - 20:37 | reply

Nature Knows Best

Why should nature know best? Why should what already exists be any good? Isn't that basically an obfuscated benevolent-creator-God theory?

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 10/30/2006 - 08:39 | reply

Are you serious?

Elliot, are you serious?

Nature is important because it sustains life on the planet. Plants create oxygen, insects carry disease, forests control erosion and flooding, swamps filter water and help dampen the effects of hurricanes...

What will be the economic impact when Salmon go extinct? What was the economic impact when Chestnut trees were wiped out?

Nature has a very real impact on humanity.

by Will on Mon, 10/30/2006 - 14:26 | reply

the US consumes more per person than any other country in the wo Ecological footprinting is not that hard. You simply look at the amount of resources humans use. If you want to do it country by country, just look at the resources each country uses: for example, how much paper does a country use each year? How many miles does the average citizen drive per day? How much electricity does the country use, and how is it produced? How much waste does the country produce? How do they farm? How much food do they consume?

The BBC method appears flawed, but it still can provide a general picture of which countries have the biggest footprint per person. Note that the WWF assesses nations' footprints in a variety of different ways. In many cases, the US does better than developing countries, in others it does worse.

There is no doubt that the US, in general, consumes more per person than any other country in the world.

Also, don't assume that technology will solve problems by default. Computers, for example, were supposed to reduce our dependence on paper and save the forests, but we now use more paper than ever before, resulting in a variety of increased ecological impacts.

by Will on Mon, 10/30/2006 - 15:18 | reply

Serious

Will,

I am serious. I certainly agree some changes to the Earth would not be good for us. But the natural state certainly isn't either. Adding cities and roads and sky scrapers has served us well. I'll be happy to see a lot more of those.

I don't think it's reasonable to evaluate whether a change is good based on a conception of whether that is the way nature wanted it. That is essentially theism. I think we should evaluate whether a change is good based on the expected effects for humans, and their desirability to humans.

-- Elliot Temple
curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 10/30/2006 - 18:11 | reply

Re: the US consumes more per person than any other country

The WWF report (PDF version) does not say the US has the highest footprint per capita.

One of the problems with the WWF report is the lack of scientific care and precision. So even if the US is fairly close to the top, I think we should be more careful what we say about it.

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 10/30/2006 - 18:17 | reply

Nature knows best

If you act according to a belief that "nature wanted it" then yes, you are acting irrationally. But I'm not sure who's arguing that in this thread.

The thing is, nature does know best in many ways. If we anthropomorphize nature, we are being foolish.

But if we try to understand ecology and evolution, we begin to see that nature is made up of communities. Some plants fix nitrogen and other nutrients in the soil, animals and fungi help decomposition (thus nourishing the soil), predators and prey interact in complex ways, animals spread seed and pollinate plants.

When one species is stressed, that plays out in the whole community, in ways we are only just beginning to understand. The more stressed populations, the more humans begin to take notice: forest fires, blights in valuable crop species, erosion, flooding, nuisance species spreading, etc.

Human civilization started around 12,000 years ago. We have had a relatively stable ecosystem in that entire time, and this has supported our rise. There is every indication that the scale of changes we are seeing now will be catastrophic.

So yes, in a way, nature does 'know best.'

by Will on Mon, 10/30/2006 - 21:08 | reply

US consumes more per capita

You are right, the WWF report puts the US second in per capita footprint. The United Arab Emirates is first, mostly because of CO2 emissions. It's also, if I'm not mistaken, one of the richest countries in the world.

The US still far and away has the biggest footprint. For one thing, it has 300 million people, whereas the UAE has only 3 million people.

Now, I still don't get your logic behind assessing footprint by GDP. One thing you will find in the report is that higher income nations have a bigger footprint across the board. The more money there is, the more goods will be bought and sold, and the more resources must be consumed to do so.

Even if you play with the numbers, the footprint (the amount of resources consumed) remains the same. By assessing GDP you are showing that some countries are more efficient at producing wealth from the resources they consume. You are not showing that they have a smaller footprint.

Am I wrong? Please explain that a little better.

You accuse the WWF of a lack of scientific rigor in their report. What alternative assessments can you provide?

by Will on Mon, 10/30/2006 - 21:29 | reply

"the more resources must be c

"the more resources must be consumed to do so."

Resources, in net, are not "consumed", they are created by our knowledge. Our ability to utilize energy, for example, is not limited by finite resources, but rather by our knowledge about how to access the virtually unlimited supply, throughout the universe.

"By assessing GDP you are showing that some countries are more efficient at producing wealth from the resources they consume."

Because resources are mostly not "consumed", the rate of growth of efficiency determines who will create the most resources over time(not "consume" the most resources). Footprint per GDP is a reasonable first approximation to who is creating resources the most efficiently.

by a reader on Tue, 10/31/2006 - 00:38 | reply

consuming resources

I think we are using different definitions of resources and consumption here. You say that resources are not consumed but produced. But the whole concept of ecological footprinting is based on quantifying the amount of land required to support a given person or nation. For example: how much electricity do you use, and how is that produced? How much paper do you use and how many acres of forest do you need to produce that paper? How much food do you eat and how many acres must be used to produce it?

The sorts of resources that GDP measures are different. They include things like services, ideas, entertainment. A totally different set of data.

by Will on Tue, 10/31/2006 - 00:50 | reply

Re: consuming resources

Will wrote:

How much food do you eat and how many acres must be used to produce it?

The sorts of resources that GDP measures are different. They include things like services, ideas, entertainment. A totally different set of data.

Do you agree that the first quantity depends heavily on the second? For example, the amount of food that a hectare of land can produce (a quantity of the first kind) depends on all sorts of factors of the second kind such as how much nitrogen can be fixed in factories at a given price, and how many people are needed to work the land to achieve a given rate of food production, which in turn depends on how cheaply tractors can be manufactured, and so on.

by Editor on Tue, 10/31/2006 - 14:24 | reply

food and acreage

Yes and no. In an industrialized society, yes, the efficiency of food production depends on technology which depends on the economy.

But there are other models. Hunter gatherers, for example, can provide for themselves with minimal technology required. They don't (at least very rarely) overuse the land, so they always have more next year.

Organic farming is another example.. still requires technology but a different kind, knowledge of soil biology, pests and predators, etcetera, and it has different effects on the surrounding environment than industrial farming - less pesticide and fertilizer runoff into local watersheds, for example.

Also there is the question: what kind of food do you eat? In the underdeveloped world, herders vs. agricultural societies use the land differently. In the developed world, meat eaters use more land per capita because livestock requires more land and water to feed than the equivalent amount of vegetable protein.

With more wealth, people generally choose to eat more meat, which is more resource intensive, rather than choosing to eat a vegetarian diet and thus becoming more efficient in land usage. So technology and wealth do not necessarily lead to more efficient agriculture.

by Will on Tue, 10/31/2006 - 14:42 | reply

Re: food and acreage

Will:

For hunter-gatherers, is it true or false that the number of people who can be supported by a hectare of land depends on their technology?

Also, are you saying that hunter-gatherers use less land per person to produce food than the average American does? Or is it just agricultural societies in the 'underdeveloped world'? Or both, or neither?

by Editor on Tue, 10/31/2006 - 15:57 | reply

huntergatherers and GDP

My point about hunter gatherers was that there are ways of living that don't exactly fit into 'number of people supported per hectare.' Hunter gatherers live in a stasis with their environment. Their population generally remains constant, and there is always ample food. In addition, the land they live on is multipurpose. It is wildlife habitat, carbon sink, water filter, and food, clothing and shelter for humans all in one.

I don't have facts and figures about land usage per cultural/economic area. If you really want me to I will research it and get back to you. My point is that different ways of producing food have different impacts on the land. In some areas, herding causes desertification. In others it is well adapted to the local environment. Industrial meat production is very land intensive. Industrial farming is slightly less so, but with other side effects.

I am beginning to think you are sidestepping my question to you: Is it or isn't it true that when you assess ecological footprint per GDP you are only assessing how efficiently a nation produces wealth when they consume resources, and totally ignores the question of how much resources they consume, which is the focus of the WWF report?

by Will on Tue, 10/31/2006 - 17:25 | reply

Re: huntergatherers and GDP

I am beginning to think you are sidestepping my question to you: Is it or isn't it true that when you assess ecological footprint per GDP you are only assessing how efficiently a nation produces wealth when they consume resources,

We are not sidestepping it: we replied that the two are inextricably connected, and invited you to agree. Your answer was "yes and no", and that you'll get back to us.

and totally ignores the question of how much resources they consume, which is the focus of the WWF report?

Yes. Our post was primarily about the report's use of the footprint-per-capita measure, and to this end it largely conceded (for the sake of argument) their way of calculating the footprint itself.

by Editor on Tue, 10/31/2006 - 17:50 | reply

the basic message: the earth is being used up

This is an interesting conversation to have, because we are getting at one of the primary differences between people who think environmental issues are paramount and people who think economics are paramount. My point is not that footprint per GDP is a worthless way of looking at the state of the world. It is very important, as it can provide some hints about which way we might want to go as a society to reduce our own footprint.

But it seems to me that you were downplaying a real problem, which is that richer nations are using up the world's resources. If you examine the WWF report, you'll see many different things. For one thing, wealth seems to be a primary factor in resource consumption. The countries with the biggest footprint per person are primarily America and the Western European countries. So there is no reason to assume that producing wealth more efficiently makes a nation a better environmental citizen.

Another thing you'll see is that population also makes a big difference in footprint. If you look at the map on page 18 of the report, you'll see that China's footprint as a country is almost as big as the US - China has a much lower standard of living but four times the population as the US. So what happens when the Chinese achieve the same wealth as the US? They'd better learn quickly to be more sustainable or they could screw the whole planet. What about India, which currently uses even less land per person than China?

So let's not ignore the basic message of the WWF report: we are using up the earth faster than it can replenish.

Now, as for technology being inextricably linked to ecological consumption... well, technology can provide solutions. I think sustainable technologies hold a lot of promise and are being underutilized right now. The more technologically advanced nations are also the wealthy nations, and as I've already pointed out, more wealth leads to more consumption in general. It doesn't have to be that way in the future, but it is that way right now.

And please don't think that environmentalism is anti economic growth! There are ways to have a high standard of living and still cut our footprint. Likewise, technology and economic growth are necessary to find more environmentally efficient ways of living.

by Will on Tue, 10/31/2006 - 19:00 | reply

focus

and totally ignores the question of how much resources they consume, which is the focus of the WWF report that was not the focus of the WWF report. there were two focusses. one was footprint per capita (and by country), not total footprint. the other focus was biodiversity.

the per capita assumption isn't about how much resources are being used, and for what. it's about how powerful individual people are, and how rich they are. it's opposed to effective, rich people, and gives better scores to nations stuffed to the brim with poor people. and it will do that even if the poor nation uses, in absolute terms, more footprint than its rich neighbors.

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 10/31/2006 - 19:33 | reply

Your ideology is showing

"it's opposed to effective, rich people, and gives better scores to nations stuffed to the brim with poor people."

Oh really? Look again. China has a similar footprint to the US. The point is not that China is a better environmental citizen. Any fool can look at the data and see that a country with a billion people that has the same footprint as a country with 300 million people is a serious problem now and will be an even more serious problem in the future. Where in the report does it state that China is somehow "better" than the US because their per capita score is lower? This is not an IQ test, it's a measure of the state of the environment.

"that was not the focus of the WWF report. there were two focusses. one was footprint per capita (and by country), not total footprint. the other focus was biodiversity."

Once again, we are using two different definitions of words here. Your use of the word "focus" is something that the report uses to analyze data. When I say focus, I'm talking about the general conclusion of the report. Perhaps my use of the word focus was in error. I apologize.

Also, note that the report analyzes consumption per capita, per region, per country, and by wealth.

Here's the conclusion, quoted from the foreward:

"The Living Planet Report 2006 confirms that we are using the planet's resources faster than they can be renewed – the latest data available (for 2003) indicate that humanity's Ecological Footprint, our impact upon the planet, has more than tripled since 1961. Our footprint now exceeds the world's ability to regenerate by about 25 per cent."

Pointing out that richer countries consume more is not the same as attacking the rich countries. The report is merely pointing out the basic facts.

Look, I don't want this to turn into a 'you're wrong no you're wrong' kind of debate. I think that the idea that economics are fundamentally opposed to the environment is a bad idea for economics and for the environment. I'd like this to be a discussion, not a political debate.

That said, if you can point out some kind of proof that the WWF has an ideological agenda, or that their science is seriously flawed, by all means, do so.

by Will on Tue, 10/31/2006 - 19:59 | reply

Science

I commented on their science above. It's the first comment.

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 10/31/2006 - 20:21 | reply

science

Do you have an alternative assessment? Because the WWF report also seems to be in line with accepted science on the state of the biosphere.

by Will on Tue, 10/31/2006 - 20:34 | reply

Re: Science

Whether the report reaches popular conclusions is irrelevant to whether they followed the scientific method.

I don't personally have an alternative, scientific conclusion. I haven't done any research.

The Copenhagen Consensus Center is investigating which environmental issues it is most effective to spend money fixing (what will benefit people the most, per dollar). Global warming is rated poorly. I haven't looked into their approach in depth, but I have read a lot of Lomborg's book (he's in charge of the Center) so I can speak for his thoughtful and careful approach.

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 10/31/2006 - 21:14 | reply

science?

I didn't say the conclusions were popular. I said they were in line with other scientific assessments of the biosphere.

There is ample evidence of species decline. If you want I will provide some links, but I'm confident you can find the information yourself.

As for Bjorn Lomborg, he's not a scientist, he's a statistician. I wrote a review on my own website of his book, read it here. His book suggests that he has no clue about biology or ecology. He doesn't mention invasive species, for example, and his data on forest health starts from the 1950s, after most of the US had been logged.

I will say that I think his perspective is useful in looking at the interplay of environment and economics. But it is worthless for assessing the real state of the biosphere.

Anything else?

by Will on Tue, 10/31/2006 - 21:25 | reply

Re: Anything else?

Just to be clear: you still haven't defended the methods used by the WWF "scientists", only their conclusions.

If you'd like to concede they are no good, even as a thought experiment, we could discuss what that means for the report. If not, I'll wait.

-- Elliot Temple
curi@curi.us
Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 10/31/2006 - 21:29 | reply

"You say that resources are n

"You say that resources are not consumed but produced. But the whole concept of ecological footprinting is based on quantifying the amount of land required to support a given person or nation."

Will,

The point is that nations with higher average GDP are far more able to utilize land efficiently (that is, need less land, for example to provide food for a given person). This occurs precisely because the technology is better. So technology both drives the relative size of the footprint of a country and the amount of food that can be produced from a given amount of land.

It makes no sense to "quantify the amount of land needed to support a given person..." and then quantify which people are taking more than their share.

The amount of land needed to support a person is not fixed. Essentially, the poorer nations are not utilizing their land efficiently, so this drives up the world-wide average amount of land needed to support a given person. If poor nations would develop economically, their efficiency in land use would increase, and therefore the world-wide average amount of land needed to support a person would decrease.

Therefore, if poor nations economically develop, each person worldwide will need less than the cited "2.2" global hectares that is said to be required to support the demands he places on the environment (because more efficient land use usually places less demand on the environment, for a given amount of people). So helping poor countries to be economically vibrant, paradoxically decreases the relative "ecological footprint" of the United States.

"The Living Planet Report 2006 confirms that we are using the planet's resources faster than they can be renewed – the latest data available (for 2003) indicate that humanity's Ecological Footprint, our impact upon the planet, has more than tripled since 1961. Our footprint now exceeds the world's ability to regenerate by about 25 per cent."

This does not make sense. In free societies, we do not "consume" resources, rather in net we produce them. The elements needed to sustain life are virtually limitless throughout the universe. What is often scarce is our knowledge (and ethical behavior). As mentioned in a previous post, it is knowledge deficiencies alone that make energy scarce. If we grow virtually all of earth's food in space or on another planet, the 2.2 global hectares that is said to be needed to support the demands a person places on the (earth's) environment will shrink to close to nothing.

Our continued focus on economic growth via knowledge growth when coupled with ethical behavior will continue to make the world a more hospitable (and ecologically safe) place for humans.

by a reader on Tue, 10/31/2006 - 23:54 | reply

resources?

"The point is that nations with higher average GDP are far more able to utilize land efficiently (that is, need less land, for example to provide food for a given person)."

So if the richer nations are more efficient, then why do they also have a bigger footprint? Shouldn't China be considered more efficient since it supports a billion people with the same size footprint as the US?

We are comparing apples to oranges here. I've already said, GDP measures something totally different than ecological footprinting. There are resources and then there are resources. Ecological footprinting measures natural resources - air, land, water, lumber, food. Ecological footprinting does not measure the value of services, government spending, capital investments, ideas, entertainment, etcetera.

Now I'm not saying that technology can't aid in more efficient utilization of natural resources and thus give us a smaller footprint. I'm just saying that it hasn't.

by Will on Wed, 11/01/2006 - 04:50 | reply

Science?

Elliot,

I'll address the criticisms in your first comment below.

"You need to actually have enough valid data, of the right types, not fudge your numbers to represent what you guess the data would say if you had it. Guessing is less accurate, and less scientific, than using real numbers."

They do use real numbers. They have a pretty sophisticated and in depth analysis. What they do:

1. Identify the resources that require land area to produce. For example, charcoal, wood for construction, paper, firewood, etc. all are resources the use of which can be quantified. So are agricultural products. For CO₂, they calculate the amount of land that would be required to naturally absorb the emissions.
2. find out how much of those resources were consumed per country. Easy enough - look at various economic reports.
3. figure out how much land was required to produce the resources consumed.

Blammo! Instant ecological footprint. It's very straightforward actually.

Now for your next criticism:

"they said their data about biodiversity over-represented whatever species people liked to study. So they just counted those less. How much less? Well, something about dividing the world into regions which they assume to be equally important, and then assuming that the convenient already-collected data for each region really is representative."

Um, are they going to go into the field and collect data on every single species in each bioregion? Not with the funding they've got currently they won't. They use data that has already been collected and verified, and they track it over time. If they can they use multiple datasets. I've already pointed out that their conclusions jive with the accepted science.

"And people study vertebrates more than invertebrates. So how can they make conclusions about invertebrates, without nearly enough data? Easy. Just assume the trends for vertebrates apply."

Vertebrates have a much bigger impact on the environment than your typical invertebrate. They eat more, move faster, etc. If invertebrates are declining we have every reason to assume that biodiversity in general is in decline. The index uses data about nearly 1000 species (including invertebrates, by the way) and determined that their populations are in decline. That's bad news, even if, say, Jellyfish and mosquito populations are on the rise.

For a closer look at the methodology: A download can be found here about the methodology of the 2005 report. Another is here about the methodology used in the 2000 report.

More information about the methodology behind the living planet index can be found here, pdf.

by Will on Wed, 11/01/2006 - 06:07 | reply

Science

" If invertebrates are declining we have every reason to assume that biodiversity in general is in decline. "

that is philosophy/argument, not scientific measure

you say they don't have the funding to study every species. ok. that's not my problem. they should only claim things they have the funding to research properly.

the already existing data is fine as data about individual species. but there way of combining it by regions to represent the whole world can't be said to be based on scientific measurement.

worse, they say things like they don't combine figures from different studies to get enough data points for a species, because it would not be valid. but if the two studies intended to be compatible, then they do combine them. intent is not science.

-- Elliot Temple
curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 11/01/2006 - 07:50 | reply

Apples and Oranges are Both Fruit

"So if the richer nations are more efficient, why do they also have a bigger footprint? Shouldn't China be considered more efficient since it supports a billion people with the same size footprint as the United States?"

No, China is creating fewer resources per person than the United States. Or, said another way, China is "less efficiently" utilizing a virtually unlimited supply of natural resources.

"Ecological footprinting measures natural resources -- air, land, water, lumber, food."

You are assuming that natural resources, like the ones listed above, are somehow "used up" by nations like the United States. I have explained how, for example, energy and usable land can be created, indeed will be created, virtually without limit. It is precisely those countries creating a bigger "ecological footprint" per person which are making these resources more and more available. Since the potential to access these "natural resources" exist without practical limit in the universe, the issue is who is able to create access to more and more of these available resources.

Those countries with higher average per capita income have higher incomes precisely because they are creating greater access to ultimately unlimited resource supplies.

What natural resource, essential for human happiness and survival (with the possible exception of ethical behavior) is not expected to be created in sufficient quantities to enable ultimately unlimited growth in human potential?

Resources are not lacking. Knowledge is. And knowledge is being created, for the most part, in advanced Western Industrialized countries.

What critical resource is really being "used up" or consumed, with no possible substitutes that will not be even better?

by a reader on Wed, 11/01/2006 - 12:59 | reply

science?

Elliot:

"that is philosophy/argument, not scientific measure"

Actually, it is science. The scientific method: formulate a hypothesis, gather data to support, perform experiments to verify. If the experiment/observation does not match the hypothesis, then formulate a new hypothesis. If it does, look for more data/experimental evidence to support.

I'll ask you again: can you provide an alternative assessment of the state of the biosphere that is scientifically credible? I don't consider Bjorn Lomborg to be credible for reasons I've already explained. Anyone else?

by Will on Wed, 11/01/2006 - 17:00 | reply

apples and oranges

"You are assuming that natural resources, like the ones listed above, are somehow "used up" by nations like the United States."

I'm not assuming it. It's been demonstrated and it's very simple. We are using up land to produce our food, houses, roads, fuel, etc.

You haven't really explained how land and resources can be created without limit (btw I detect a little Bucky Fuller in your language - have you been reading his stuff?). But even if it can, the question is not: 'can we create unlimited resources?' but rather 'are we using up our resources too quickly?'

If the earth was a business, we would have a budget. Since money is not really a good way to measure the state of the environment, ecological footprinting is a new way to look at the planet's budget.

Now, if we were a business, and the land we have available to produce food, fuel, housing, paper, roads, bury garbage, etc. was our budget, then we are using up our budget 25% faster than we are replenishing it.

If we were a business in that situation, we would have to enact spending cuts or we would go out of business. It's that simple. If your position at work was costing a company 25% more than it was earning the company, then the company is going to look hard at eliminating your position, or cutting costs. It wouldn't matter if you said: 'But I can produce infinite wealth for you!' What matters is that you do or do not produce the wealth.

Again, I'm not denying that technology can lower a nation's footprint. I'm saying that it hasn't so far, in fact, it's done the opposite.

"What natural resource, essential for human happiness and survival (with the possible exception of ethical behavior) is not expected to be created in sufficient quantities to enable ultimately unlimited growth in human potential?"

The future won't necessarily be the end of all humans. But the environmental trends we can see all around us if we look indicate that the world is going to be harder to live in, and there will be massive human suffering. Do you want to eat jellyfish instead of fish? That's likely in the next 50 years. Would you like to see more poison ivy, kudzu, bush honeysuckle, and other invasive species instead of trees and flowers? We are almost certainly headed in that direction.

What about more insects and fewer birds? More crows and starlings and fewer warblers and woodpeckers? No maple syrup? More possums and raccoons and squirrels, fewer otters, wildcats, muskrats, and beavers?

What about watching whole nations die for lack of fresh water? That's coming. More sickness and death from air pollution? That's coming. More floods and mudslides because of logging and mining? Just wait.

What about no more wild rivers? No more pristine natural places? Think it's unlikely? Would you drink from any river within 20 miles of your home?

It really all depends on how you define happiness.

by Will on Wed, 11/01/2006 - 17:18 | reply

Something to think about

Bacteria and insects will adapt quickly to changing conditions because they have short life spans and reproduce in quantity.

What a wonderful future we face!

by Will on Wed, 11/01/2006 - 17:20 | reply

Re: Science

If [vertebrates] are declining we have every reason to assume that biodiversity in general is in decline.

that is philosophy/argument, not scientific measure

Actually, it is science. The scientific method: formulate a hypothesis, gather data to support, perform experiments to verify.

Which data gathered in the WWF report supports or verifies the statement that declining vertebrates implies general biodiversity decline?

-- Elliot Temple
curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 11/01/2006 - 18:07 | reply

science?

There's no need to support it in the report. It is generally accepted as a measure of biodiversity.

by Will on Wed, 11/01/2006 - 18:09 | reply

science

Look at it this way: we can base our physics on theories of what electrons and atoms do despite having never actually seen an atom. We can state that light behaves as both a particle and a wave, and make predictions, without ever seeing the particles that make up light.

Inference happens all the time in science. We infer the size of stars by their magnitude and color, and from that we can also infer their lifespan and what elements they contain. We don't have to physically travel to a star to do that.

by Will on Wed, 11/01/2006 - 18:15 | reply

Re: Science

There's no need to support it in the report. It is generally accepted as a measure of biodiversity.

If that is so, shouldn't the WWF report say it is generally accepted, and cite a solid scientific study on the matter?

-- Elliot Temple

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 11/01/2006 - 19:26 | reply

science

If it truly is accepted, why bother?

by Will on Wed, 11/01/2006 - 20:46 | reply

Science

What the WWF report says is:

Plants and invertebrates were excluded, as few population time series data were available. It is assumed that trends in vertebrate populations are indicative of overall trends in global biodiversity.

If it is an accepted conclusion so solid that it doesn't need a citation, why did they call it an "assumption"? And why did they say the reason for this assumption was a lack of data (implying they would not have assumed it if more data was available)?

-- Elliot Temple
curi@curi.us
Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 11/01/2006 - 21:07 | reply

assumptions and science

I don't know why they used the word assumption. At its heart, it is an assumption.

But it's not the same as assuming your iron is turned off without checking it. It's more like assuming that a star has certain elements in it because when you look at it through a spectroscope you see certain colors, and then from that assuming the lifespan of the star. Of course no one has ever monitored the entire lifespan of a star, but there is enough supporting evidence that you can make a reasonable guess and make predictions based on that guess.

With vertebrates, there are a lot of things that measure ecosystem health. Many large vertebrates require large areas of contiguous, undisturbed habitat. They require certain plants for food and habitat, certain types of soil that support their favored food, etc.

Put another way, it's like measuring the health of an economy by monitoring the number of rich people in the economy. Maybe not the best measure, but if it's all you've got there are still ways to get good information from it.

by Will on Wed, 11/01/2006 - 21:55 | reply

A Reader

Dear A Reader who wrote:

"What natural resource, essential for human happiness and survival (with the possible exception of ethical behavior) is not expected to be created in sufficient quantities to enable ultimately unlimited growth in human potential?"

I'm curious who you are :) If you're interested in talking, email me.

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 11/01/2006 - 23:31 | reply

Science

Will,

What seems to be obvious is often false. That's why scientists very carefully document all their assumptions which seem obvious. And they consider each carefully. If someone else has already examined an assumption, that is fine, but they will reference the previous work they believe is sufficient. So even if the WWF was perfectly right to study the way they did, their report is lacking in scientific rigor.

But the exact proportions and relations between vertebrate and invertebrate biodiversity are not obvious, and not easy to quantify. So when the WWF assumes they are exactly proportional, that is making up numbers, and the results are therefore extremely restricted in applicability.

To make this more concrete, here are some factors they apparently did not consider:

- Animals eat plants. More vertebrates could mean less plants
- Why should there be proportional amounts of big animals and microscopic ones, which have very different habitat needs?
- The effect of humans on animal populations is very complex. For example, when animal populations get low, humans ruin trends by trying to save endangered species. And how hard they try depends on how much they like that animal.

-- Elliot Temple

Cur@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 11/01/2006 - 23:46 | reply

More Apples and Oranges

"You are assuming that natural resources, like the ones listed above, are somehow "used up" by nations like the United States."

Reader

"I'm not assuming it. It's been demonstrated and it's very simple.
We are using up land to produce our food, houses, roads, fuel, etc."
Will

If something essential was being depleted "to produce our food, our houses, our roads, fuel, etc." then the prices of these items (in aggregate) would be rising due to scarcity of resources. We can measure whether or not prices for essential items have in net increased by determining the amount of work that an average human being has to do in order to purchase items essential to life (food, housing, clothing, etc.)

Another way of measuring the availability of essential resources is to determine whether life-expectancy has increased or decreased. If life expectancy is decreasing, then indeed, some essential resource is being depleted.

As it turns out, human beings are having to work fewer and fewer hours to afford the essentials of living. Therefore these items are far more available to each person, even than 100 years ago. (The price of essential resources needed to live has fallen in terms of the amount of work needed to obtain them).

Even if a life-sustaining resource is plentiful now but will be gone rapidly because of an expected environmental catastrophe, say 25 years from now, futures markets would dramatically increase the price of this resource, at the present time. But this hasn't happened, either. The price of essential resources, as measured by the amount of work that a citizen of the planet has to do in order to survive, has fallen dramatically in human history, and continues to fall.

Life-expectancy is also increasing. Therefore the environment is (in net) more health-promoting and life-sustaining than it ever has been. If an "essential" resource were missing or scarce, human beings could not obtain it as readily, and so on average would be dying at an earlier age. But they are not.

The simple fact of increasing human well-being shows that life promoting resources are being created in greater and greater amounts, despite the odd suggestion that somehow we have less of them, or will soon have less of them.

"Now, if we were a business, and the land we have available to produce food, fuel, housing, paper, roads, bury garbage, etc. was our budget, then we are using up our budget 25% faster than we are replenishing it."

If a person spends more money than he takes in, then he goes in debt to someone. Precisely who are the citizens of the world in debt to, from an ecological perspective? If you say "our children", then why on average (worldwide) are our children progressively having to work fewer hours to meet their needs. That is, why are there more "essential resources" available to them for each hour that they do work, or will work.

"But the environmental trends we can see all around us if we look indicate that the world is going to be harder to live in, and there will be massive human suffering...Do you want to eat jellyfish instead of fish? That's likely in the next 50 years."

How can you possibly know that humans will have to eat jellyfish? If the price of fish goes up, people will grow them on farms, as they already do. And why should I eat jellyfish? or fish? For ethical reasons, I am a vegetarian. I don't want animals to suffer.

"What about watching whole nations die for lack of fresh water? That's coming."

Only in a world full of virtually infinite quantities of water, can someone see scarcity. I have no doubt that nations can dehydrate themselves to death. But the major factor that prevents people from drinking adequate amounts of water is repressive political organization, not inadequate amounts of water. People want to drink. Free market organization and the absence of war has provided and will continue to provide virtually unlimited quantities of clean water to those who value freedom enough to allow people to work for what they want. Water purification and desalinization efforts allow millions of people the world over to drink abundant quantities of fresh water.

"Would you drink from any river within 20 miles of your home?"

Yes, utilizing my water purifier. A more interesting question is whether I would have been as healthy drinking river water 200 years ago. Unfortunately, because of parasitic infection (e.g. Giardia), I think not.

by a reader on Thu, 11/02/2006 - 01:07 | reply

Astrophysics

Will wrote:

We infer the size of stars by their magnitude and color, and from that we can also infer their lifespan and what elements they contain. We don't have to physically travel to a star to do that. [...]

It's more like assuming that a star has certain elements in it because when you look at it through a spectroscope you see certain colors, and then from that assuming the lifespan of the star. Of course no one has ever monitored the entire lifespan of a star, but there is enough supporting evidence that you can make a reasonable guess and make predictions based on that guess.

But there's a vital difference.

It's impossible to infer things from observation alone. All the 'inferences' you mention in astrophysics are made from the observations plus a universal theory, which contains a substantive explanation, unrivalled and independently corroborated, of why the inferences should be true. When we aren't able to apply such a theory to interpret an astronomical observation, for whatever reason, we cannot make inferences of that kind; indeed, whenever there's even the slightest wiggle-room, working out what's happening, even approximately, becomes very hit-and-miss.

by David Deutsch on Thu, 11/02/2006 - 01:11 | reply

Astrophysics vs. ecology

I wasn't so much trying to say that the examples I gave about stars were guesses or assumptions. I was trying to point out that there are other supporting strands of evidence in the study of ecology, enough so that we can draw inferences from basic trends.

by Will on Thu, 11/02/2006 - 04:25 | reply

scientific rigor

Elliot:

"their report is lacking in scientific rigor."

"the exact proportions and relations between vertebrate and invertebrate biodiversity are not obvious, and not easy to quantify. So when the WWF assumes they are exactly proportional, that is making up numbers, and the results are therefore extremely restricted in applicability."

The WWF doesn't assume them to be exactly proportional. They don't have to be exactly proportional, either, to be a problem. Some animals will prosper, some will perish. Of course, which will prosper? Microorganisms that cause disease? Insects that carry disease? Scavenger animals that will further damage ecosystems?

Here is a direct quote from the paper "The Living Planet Index: using species population time series to track trends in biodiversity" by Loh et al. Google scholar it if you want to read more about the methodology used in the 2006 report.

The index is currently based on nearly 3000 population time series for over 1100 species. All species in the index are vertebrates. (p. 1)

The LPI indicates that populations of wild species of vertebrates have declined overall from 1970 to 2000. The extent to which this is a reflection of trends in global biodiversity as a whole has not been determined. In situations where habitat loss is the primary cause of population declines, it is reasonable to assume that there is a positive correlation between declines in vertebrate and non-vertebrate populations. Where hunting, fishing or indirect exploitation is the cause of a decline in a particular vertebrate species, the decline will not necessarily be indicative of population trends in other species in the same ecosystem. At large scales of entire realms, oceans, regions or biomes, overall declines in vertebrate populations are significant in their own right and may also be seen as indicative of changes in underlying ecosystem processes(p. 5-6).

The WWF report is not intended to be a comprehensive report of the state of the biosphere. It examines the ecological footprint of humanity and a general index of the state of the planet. There are many other sources that support the conclusion of the Living Planet Index that world ecosystems are in trouble.

by Will on Thu, 11/02/2006 - 04:57 | reply

apples and oranges?

"in order to purchase items essential to life"

"human being are having to work fewer and fewer hours to afford the essentials of living."

Are they? All over the world? In sweatshops in the third world? Are hunter gatherers who have been 'globalized' working less than the four hours a day their old lifestyle required? Are you really looking at the whole picture of humanity or only at the wealthy nations?

"If something essential was being depleted "to produce our food, our houses, our roads, fuel, etc." then the prices of these items (in aggregate) would be rising due to scarcity of resources."

Not so. We in the rich nations don't see the scarcity because we import much of our resources. It's not evident here because our wealth insulates us. It is becoming more evident around the globe. This is what the report is talking about when it calls the US an ecological debtor nation. We just haven't run out of credit yet.

"Even if a life-sustaining resource is plentiful now but will be gone rapidly because of an expected environmental catastrophe, say 25 years from now, futures markets would dramatically increase the price of this resource, at the present time."

That's an assumption, not a fact. Just one example: What about a blight that spreads rapidly because of monocultural agriculture and wipes out a crop?

"Precisely who are the citizens of the world in debt to, from an ecological perspective?"

The wealthy nations are currently in debt to the poor nations with still abundant ecological wealth - but the poor nations lack the power to collect, so in the long run we will be in debt to our children.

"If you say "our children", then why on average (worldwide) are our children progressively having to work fewer hours to meet their needs?"

See above, and also note that you can't predict the future. Our children may or may not be working fewer hours to meet their needs 5 or 10 or 30 years down the road.

"Free market organization and the absence of war has provided and will continue to provide virtually unlimited quantities of clean water to those who value freedom enough to allow people to work for what they want."

Actually nature provided the abundant clean water. Wealth, not free markets, determines who will get the clean water in the future. I bet you pay for your water right now, actually.

"A more interesting question is whether I would have been as healthy drinking river water 200 years ago. Unfortunately, because of parasitic infection (e.g. Giardia), I think not."

200 years ago, you would have been adapted to the local parasites.

Notice that I highlighted a few things in your statements. I think it is very interesting that you make your assumptions based on work and economics.

Here's something for you to consider.

400 years ago, when Europeans first came to America, wildlife was stunningly abundant. It was said that a man couldn't dip an oar in a river without hitting a fish. Trees, some of them 20 feet in diameter, covered the eastern half of the country. A squirrel could go from Georgia to New York, hopping from Chestnut tree to Chestnut tree and never touch the ground. The chestnut trees produced 6000 nuts each per year. A man could point a blunderbuss into a flock of birds at random and be almost guaranteed to bring one down. Flocks of passenger pigeons darkened the sky for days as they passed overhead. In the Pacific Northwest, you could dunk a basket into a river and pull up enough Salmon for your family to eat.

Nowadays, we consider ourselves lucky to be "allowed to work".

by Will on Thu, 11/02/2006 - 05:31 | reply

"200 years ago, you would hav

"200 years ago, you would have been adapted to the local parasites"

Surely health was much worse in 1806 than now?

by a reader on Thu, 11/02/2006 - 09:23 | reply

200 years ago

Depends on where you lived. Indigenous people in Australia currently live an average of 57 years, shorter than the average Australian. But there are other measures of health besides lifespan, and the lifeways and environment of the Aborigines have changed considerably because of the white folks.

So how healthy were people back then to relative to today? For a European or American, almost definitely worse. For others? Who knows?

Life existed on this planet for millions of years without water treatment technology.

by Will on Thu, 11/02/2006 - 13:38 | reply

Something interesting

This study came out as we were having this discussion.

Global Map Shows New Patterns of Extinction Risk

It is interesting because it shows that a high density of endangered species from one group (birds or mammals or fish, for example) doesn't necessarily mean that species from other groups in the area are endangered. In other words, if birds are endangered in one area, land mammals might be doing just fine.

It is only tangentially related to our current discussion, but it can provide some context for looking at biodiversity. Note that this study examines the concentrations of endangered species per area, while the Living Planet Index examines overall population trends in vertebrates worldwide.

It is relevant because it illustrates how one assumption about ecology have been turned on its ear: the idea that one species can be an indicator for all is demonstrated to be a bit more complex by this study.

Of course, a decline in, for example, bird populations, even if mammals seem to be doing fine in the same area, is still a problem. Birds prey on caterpillars and insects which can destroy trees. They spread seeds and nutrients as they travel. Some of them provide prey for other species, etc. which is why a study that shows a general decline in vertebrate species worldwide is cause for alarm.

by Will on Thu, 11/02/2006 - 14:59 | reply

ocean biodiversity, jellyfish, rich nations, and weeds.

A new study published in Science (subscription only, but you can read the abstract. Try a university library for a copy) suggests fish species will be gone in 50 years if trends don't change, and outlines the problems for the ocean and man if biodiversity continues to collapse.

Also, richer nations are depleting the fisheries of poorer nations:

Brashares, Justin S., Peter Arcese, Moses K. Sam, Peter B.

Coppolillo, A. R. E. Sinclair, and Andrew Balmford. "Bushmeat Hunting, Wildlife Declines, and Fish Supply in West Africa." Science. Vol 306, Issue 5699, 1180-1183 , 12 November 2004

Kaczynski, Vlad and David Fluharty. "European policies in West Africa: who benefits from fisheries agreements?" Marine Policy. 26. 2003.

Alder, Jacqueline and Ussif Sumaila. "Western Africa: A Fish Basket of Europe Past and Present." Journal of Environment & Development. 2 June 2004.

A glimpse at our future:

About eating jellyfish in the future.

Planet of Weeds

by Will on Fri, 11/03/2006 - 02:36 | reply

Plentiful Food in the Past?

http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Jamestown%2C_Virginia the winter of 1609-1610 at Jamestown became known as the "starving time" as the settlers faced starvation, and scheduled supply ships were delayed by weather. ... The colonists had not planned to grow their own food. Instead, they expected that trade with the locals would supply them with enough food between supply ships. But new evidence suggests that the Native Americans had very little food to start with.

Apparently getting food was not as easy as dipping a bucket in a river, or picking nuts. It was hard enough that a lot of people died.

And it wasn't just the white people who had trouble. The Native Americans, who had had many generations to figure out how to get food, themselves had very little.

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Fri, 11/03/2006 - 04:33 | reply

food at jamestown

Good point.

1. The colonists were from one England, hated and feared the American wilderness, and had very little idea how to survive in it. And they had no plans to grow their own food.

2. I'd like to see the 'new evidence.' Perhaps there were some local changes that led to scarcity in the area? Diseases brought by the colonists?

Of course, food was not always plentiful everywhere all over the world before evil white folks came and destroyed everything. But there was a general abundance, naturally. That abundance is what let us survive and evolve as a species. Now, in many places, that abundance is gone, or disappearing.

There are theories that scarcity led to the adoption of agriculture. If that is the case, then humans had to have encountered areas of scarcity, or they never would have adopted that more labor intensive lifestyle.

by Will on Fri, 11/03/2006 - 15:06 | reply

Consuming vs. Creating Resources

Will wrote:

I'm not assuming it. It's been demonstrated and it's very simple. We are using up land to produce our food, houses, roads, fuel, etc.

And what happens to our food, houses, roads and fuel when they are produced using land? They do not vanish into thin air. They are also used for some purpose. For instance a road, fuel, etc. may be used to bring fertilizer to a farm where an already "used" land is used a second time to produce more food. The complex web of all such activities makes up our economy, and when that economy is free, the net result is that the increasingly efficient use of land due to the growth of knowledge makes the "consumption model" of resources irrelevant. I agree with "a reader" that the essential resource necessary for sustaining a free economy is effectively created by the same economy. The name of that resource is knowledge.

-- Cyrus Ferdowsi, <http://libiran.blogspot.com>

by Liberal Iranian on Mon, 11/06/2006 - 07:57 | reply

producing resources?

Can you quantify this? Can you demonstrate that knowledge actually makes us more efficient in using land? If so, why is it that the richer and more technologically advanced countries use more land than the poor countries?

This study is a snapshot. One way to test your idea would be to examine trends over time, perhaps comparing economy trends with footprint trends. In that case, you might see some kind of trend that technology is making life more sustainable. But the evidence seems to show otherwise.

With a little thought maybe we can turn that trend around.

by Will on Mon, 11/06/2006 - 15:00 | reply

Re: producing resources?

Will wrote:

why is it that the richer and more technologically advanced countries use more land than the poor countries?

Could you be specific about what you mean by this? Taken literally, it says that the technologically advanced countries have a greater combined area than the other countries, but if you look at an atlas you will see that that is not true. The argument here seems to be about efficiency, so perhaps you mean that. Efficiency is always defined as a ratio: some measure of benefit per unit usage of a resource. So if you are referring to efficiency, you must mean that some benefit per unit area of land is less in technologically advanced countries than in others (and less now in the US than it was at the time when the inhabitants were hunter gatherers?). What measure of benefit are you referring to? Presumably not GDP? Or population? What is it?

by Editor on Mon, 11/06/2006 - 15:24 | reply

producing resources

why is it that the richer and more technologically advanced countries use more land than the poor countries?

I'm talking about the footprint of the richer countries. The footprint is the amount of land used to produce the resources that a country consumes.

I was responding to Cyrus' comment that:

when... economy is free, the net result is that the increasingly efficient use of land due the growth of knowledge makes the "consumption model" of resources irrelevant.

My challenge to him is: how do you prove that land is being used more efficiently? If it is being used more efficiently, why is it that richer nations have a bigger footprint than other nations?

by Will on Mon, 11/06/2006 - 16:35 | reply

a difference in perspective

We keep coming back to the same point, so I'm going to try to restate the problem as each side sees it.

I take the WWF's view that the earth's renewable resources are being used faster than they are being replenished. I believe that this will be disastrous down the road.

You (I'm speaking to everyone else here) seem to believe that wealth is beneficial in its own right and with market freedom it will fix our environmental problems on its own. For that reason, countries that use more of the world's resources should be forgiven, because they also tend to produce more wealth and everything will even itself up down the road.

Is this a correct restatement of your arguments?

by Will on Mon, 11/06/2006 - 16:42 | reply

GDP/land

Will,

Your last comment is not a correct statement of my argument. I do not take the view that wealth will solve the problems, but knowledge. There is a causal link between the growth of knowledge and the generation of wealth, but it is important to emphasize the actual source of solutions.

About your challenge: land is being used more efficiently in the free industrialized countries because it generates more (a lot more) wealth. That is, the ratio of GDP/land is much bigger there. This is the measure of efficiency of land use and the essence of The World's post. This is also my answer to the Editor's question to you in their last comment.

-- Cyrus Ferdowsi, <http://libiran.blogspot.com>

by Liberal Iranian on Mon, 11/06/2006 - 18:27 | reply

GDP vs. land use

Cyrus,

Can you demonstrate a clear connection between increasing knowledge and increased efficiency of land use? Because when I look at the data provided by the WWF I see that the richer countries use more land (have a bigger footprint) than poor countries.

If wealth indicated efficient land use, then why is this so? Why aren't the poorer countries using more land and the richer countries less?

I've said it before but I'll say it again: GDP has a lot of irrelevant information included if you want to compare it to footprint. For example: how does buying a ticket to a concert increase sustainability? What about getting in a car wreck and going to the hospital, which increases GDP? What about all the money that is spent on television programs and advertising, purely for the sake of entertainment and marketing? How do these things increase the efficiency with which we use natural resources on the planet? These things all contribute to the GDP.

by Will on Mon, 11/06/2006 - 19:19 | reply

Footprints

The footprints are not amount of land, they are supposed to be, roughly, amount of pollution. Half the footprints are CO2; the amount of CO2 created doesn't necessarily have much to do with amount of land used.

Additionally they are footprints per person. So even if they could be counted as land per person you'd still have to multiply by population sizes to see who used the most land.

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 11/06/2006 - 19:33 | reply

Footprint Per GDP

If wealth indicated efficient land use, then why is this so? Why aren't the poorer countries using more land and the richer countries less?

It is so. That's what the original post showed. It calculated footprint per GDP. The rich countries produce more stuff per unit footprint.

You're free to deny that rich countries produce useful stuff, but that is not the same issue as efficiency of production.

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 11/06/2006 - 19:36 | reply

GDP

What about getting in a car wreck and going to the hospital, which increases GDP?

That decreases GDP. It is known as the broken-window fallacy.

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 11/06/2006 - 19:42 | reply

broken windows

What about getting in a car wreck and going to the hospital, which increases GDP?

That decreases GDP. It is known as the broken-window fallacy.

Alright, I won't debate you about that. What about my other examples? What about money spent on video games and pornography? What about the millions of tons of paper used to print magazines and newspapers? Etc.

by Will on Mon, 11/06/2006 - 20:07 | reply

footprints

"The footprints are not amount of land, they are supposed to be, roughly, amount of pollution."

Actually, it is the amount of land required to sustain the level of consumption. Reread the papers I linked to. They totaled the amount of resources (lumber, paper, food, fuel, etc.) consumed per country, calculated the amount of land used to produce those resources, and that's the footprint.

Amount of CO2 is also turned into land use, although there is some wiggle room here. They calculated the amount of land that would be required to absorb the CO2 produced and got an acreage which is added to the footprint.

by Will on Mon, 11/06/2006 - 20:15 | reply

gdp vs. footprint

If wealth indicated efficient land use, then why is this so? Why aren't the poorer countries using more land and the richer countries less?

It is so. That's what the original post showed. It calculated footprint per GDP. The rich countries produce more stuff per unit footprint.

You're free to deny that rich countries produce useful stuff, but that is not the same issue as efficiency of production.

I'm not denying that wealth, knowledge, etc. are useful. And I'm not arguing about efficiency of production.

I'm arguing about efficiency of land use.

It doesn't really matter how much 'wealth' or 'knowledge' you can produce from an acre of land if you use that land up faster than it can replenish itself.

by Will on Mon, 11/06/2006 - 20:22 | reply

Video games and other measures

Will,

The money and time spent on video games is generated by and is part of the same economy as a whole. The teenager in the US who spends his parents' money on a video game gains from that in many different ways. His imaginative power and mental ability as an adult is affected by the video games he played as a teenager. He usually grows up to be a productive member of the US economy, contributing to the staggering GDP of the US compared to developing countries. The teenager in a developing country is more than happy to be able to spend the same money on a video game. Not having enough cash, he has to spend other types of money (time, education, etc.) to buy similar products. He has limited choice and ends up spending more than the cash equivalent that his American peer spends. This reflects and contributes to the fact that the economy he is part of is less efficient, mostly due to restrictive practices, at providing his needs.

If you insist that GDP is not a good measure of the knowledge that generates it, you should suggest some other measures of knowledge to normalize the footprint/land use. For example, one may choose to count the number of research papers in some or all fields of sciences. This number is not as comprehensive as GDP because it does not contain the plethora of non-research knowledge on which the efficiency of the economy depends. It is affected by some extraneous factors, such as the size of the society and the focus of its economy. But I am guessing the results would be, within limitations, more or less the same as GDP.

-- Cyrus Ferdowsi, <http://libiran.blogspot.com>

by Liberal Iranian on Mon, 11/06/2006 - 22:02 | reply

Knowledge from land

Will wrote

It doesn't really matter how much 'wealth' or 'knowledge' you can produce from an acre of land if you use that land up faster than it can replenish itself.

What if you produce the knowledge that allows you to replenish the land faster than it currently does itself?

-- Cyrus Ferdowsi, <http://libiran.blogspot.com>

by Liberal Iranian on Mon, 11/06/2006 - 22:05 | reply

Will's Argument

Will, maybe I can help you with your argument, although I disagree with it.

You must be saying that although wealthier countries are currently producing more goods and products per unit land area than they ever have before, there are long term side-effects associated with enjoying all this wealth, now. In producing all these goods and services that Westerners want at the present time, Western nations are producing toxins, for example greenhouse gasses.

The "footprint" of the United States is "too big", meaning we are creating more toxic byproducts than we are recycling in our national land area. So we are using up more than our fair share of the overall ecological recycling capacity of the world. Worse, the world as a whole is creating more toxic byproducts than the world's natural ecological processes can recycle. Therefore, toxic compounds are building up. Right now, efficiency in economic production is not being compromised, because levels of toxic compounds (like CO₂) are not so high as to adversely affect productivity very much. For example, temperatures have not risen high enough from greenhouse gasses to degrade farming capacity. Furthermore, gains in knowledge have increased economic productivity per land area probably faster than coincident toxic waist increases have degraded that efficiency. That's why "a reader" can argue that efficiency gains continue to rise. But a worldwide ecological footprint larger than the current land area of the entire world must be a harbinger of our eventual inability to sustain the efficiencies we are currently enjoying in the Western world.

Why? A hectare of land can only be made to produce more of a product, for example food, up to a certain point. We must eventually work harder to get more output from the same input (land). There must eventually be diminishing returns. Isn't that a law of economics? But toxic products can build up virtually indefinitely. Therefore, although economic efficiency is high and currently growing, it will eventually plateau, and then fall, as it eventually succumbs to the ultimately finite productive capacity of the earth – made increasingly less by the relentless build-up of toxic waste, greenhouse gasses, and general ecological destruction.

Therefore, although we are relatively comfortable now in the Western world, we must conserve our natural resources immediately, to prevent catastrophe in the long-term.

Will,
Is that a reasonable summary of your position?

by a reader on Tue, 11/07/2006 - 00:44 | reply

resources and knowledge

What if you produce the knowledge that allows you to replenish the land faster than it currently does itself?

I understand the drift of your argument: wealth creates knowledge, resources, and technology.

That would be great but based on the evidence I have I don't see that happening. Can you provide me with solid evidence that a. wealthier countries use land more efficiently than poor countries, and explain to me why, if a is true, b. rich countries all have a bigger footprint than poor countries?

by Will on Tue, 11/07/2006 - 15:30 | reply

Will's argument

You have restated the basic drift of my argument. But you put a little too much emphasis on 'toxics'.

The issue goes far beyond toxic pollution. The ecological footprint, for example, shows that we are using too much land. Wild habitat is destroyed daily, on land and in the seas. Where original habitats have been destroyed, invasive species move in, making it difficult or impossible for the local ecosystem to recover.

Then you have the issue of global warming compounding the problem. We have already seen that spring is coming earlier - this throws off prey/predator relationships when predators use different markers (length of days) than the prey (seasonal warmth) to start mating. So you get predators looking for prey whose population has already peaked (google 'pied flycatcher global warming'). The change in seasonal timing also throws off birds and insects that pollinate as plants bloom earlier - this can affect commercial agriculture and thus humans directly.

So it's not just about pollution, although pollution is a problem.

by Will on Tue, 11/07/2006 - 15:59 | reply

going in circles?

It seems to me that we are going in circles with Will. So I repeat my take on the issue: it is knowledge (of many sorts and in huge amounts) that solves problems, not wealth or technology per se. These are themselves the results of the growth of knowledge. If by using a land you create the knowledge of how to replenish it, you have no such thing as the problem of "using up" the land.

Can you provide me with solid evidence that a. wealthier countries use land more efficiently than poor countries, and explain to me why, if a is true, b. rich countries all have a bigger footprint than poor countries?

Answers to both questions have been given in the post and previous comments. But, for the sake of clarity: how do you define the efficiency of land use, Will?

-- Cyrus Ferdowsi, <http://libiran.blogspot.com>

by Liberal Iranian on Tue, 11/07/2006 - 18:45 | reply

arguing in circles

I define ecological efficiency (efficiency of land use) as the amount of land required to support a person. This is the same measure as that used by the WWF.

AT the core, it seems to me that I am talking about ecology and you all are talking about economy.

Here is the problem with your position. The ecological footprint measure used by the WWF states quite clearly that a. on average, a person in the so called developed world requires more land to support their lifestyle than a person in the 'developing' world.

Furthermore, the report states that b. the earth's resources are being used up too fast.

You have consistently argued that because the developed world produces stuff, we shouldn't worry about b. the fact that the earth's resources are being used up faster than they can be replenished.

You are in effect waving your hand to make the problem go away. Just because we produce some vague 'knowledge' doesn't mean that we aren't using the planet up. The knowledge that we need to produce to slow down the consumption and reduce our footprints is not being produced by the wealthy countries - or if it is, it is not reflected in the WWF report and you have not provided hard data to prove that it is so. (If you can present hard data, rather than just a general argument, please do so).

Calculating footprint per GDP, then, is only marginally useful, and effectively avoids the real, serious, glaring issues pointed out in the report: a. Rich people use more and b. we are using the world up faster than it can replenish.

That is the substance of my argument, and despite your (everyone I have engaged with so far) presenting various vague generalities (wealth produces knowledge and stuff), you have not convincingly demonstrated to me how footprint per GDP is anything more than marginally useful for assessing and dealing with issues a and b.

Perhaps a better way to use GDP to assess ecological efficiency would be to compare the footprints of nations with comparable GDPs - perhaps the top twenty or thirty richest nations. Then you would have an idea of which nations are better at producing wealth per dollar from a particular amount of land, and you would have an idea of which developed societies should be emulated. I have a feeling that Britain and the US would fare poorly on such a comparison.

I would like for us to be able understand each other at least. I have had a feeling throughout this thread that my opponents aren't fully grasping what I am saying. I'm sure you feel the same about me. My apologies.

by Will on Tue, 11/07/2006 - 22:22 | reply

Trying to reach some understanding

Will:

I think we agree on this:

The footprint of an entity (nation, person, amount of wealth, etc) is defined as the amount of land needed, at the present state of technology, to sustainably produce the resources being used by that country or person, or to create that wealth.

What I think we may disagree on is this: The footprint, thus defined, is not a constant area, but changes with time.

Let's not get hung up on why it changes; but I guess you'll want evidence that it does change. OK. For example, in 1800, the population of the world was below 1 billion, and the economist Thomas Malthus calculated that even considering agriculture alone, and ignoring other uses of resources, it could support only about twice that at the average standard of living for 1800. In other words, the total world footprint then was 0.5 (Earth areas). Since then, the population has increased about sevenfold and the resource usage -- well, I don't know what figures you'd want me to take, but at the most conservative estimate it has to have increased at least 20-fold. So by Malthus' measure of footprint, the current footprint has now increased to at least 20 -- or correcting that for carbon dioxide, to at least 40. Yet in reality it has increased to only 1.3.

Similarly, in 1970, the environmentalist Paul Ehrlich calculated that the Earth could sustainably support, at the average standard of living at the time, slightly fewer people than were alive at the time -- in other words, the footprint then was slightly above 1. And Ehrlich, too, wasn't counting carbon dioxide. Had he known of its harmful effects, he would have calculated the footprint at closer to 2.

Since then, world resource usage has again increased greatly. Hence by Ehrlich's measure of footprint, the Earth's total footprint has now increased to -- what? -- at least 4, say. Yet it has actually fallen to 1.3.

Hence, isn't it misleading for you to use the terms "footprint" and "land use" or "resource use" interchangeably? For the conversion factor between footprint and land area is not constant.

by David Deutsch on Wed, 11/08/2006 - 01:46 | reply

Numbers

Will asks how economic efficiency can increase (more product per land area) while ecological "efficiency" decreases (presumably amount of natural resources for the next generation to use divided by the amount of natural resources for this generation to use).

Imagine that a company in the United States manufactures a computer. A certain amount of labor and effort went into making that computer. We trade that computer for a certain amount of oil from Saudi Arabia.

A few years later, knowledge increases, so we are now able to build a more powerful computer, without having to work any harder. Because the computer is more powerful, the Saudi's are willing to give us more oil per computer, because they like the more powerful computer better. So we can now say that the United States is more economically efficient. We have worked no more hours, but are now able to import more oil, because we can trade a more powerful computer to the Saudis.

But the land area of the United States has not increased. Therefore from an economic perspective, we are using our land more efficiently. We are working the same amount of hours on our land, and importing more oil. And with more oil, we can produce even more goods because of the extra energy we have. Economic efficiency of land use has thus increased in the United States.

Now let's look at it from Will's ecological perspective. There is a finite amount of oil in the ground the world over. By making a better computer, we are taking more of a finite supply of oil out of the ground. So now our descendants have fewer natural resources (less oil). And the more efficient we become (better and better production of computers) the more the Saudis take oil out of the ground for us to use, but not for our descendants to use. So the ratio of resources available to our descendants divided by resources available to us has decreased. Ecological efficiency has decreased.

According to Will, the earth is only able to generate ("replenish") energy for us at a certain mostly fixed rate per land area. It will take, for example, millions of years for enough animals to die and geological conditions to be right to transform dead animals into oil and replenish the oil supply for our future. If we exceed a certain rate of use of energy, it would take much more available land (a bigger planet) for the earth to replenish the energy supply that we are currently taking from the earth per unit time.

So we require a bigger planet to satisfy our hunger, for example, for energy. But we don't have a bigger planet, so we are using up more land resources (energy recycling capacity) per time than we are putting back into the earth. Our ecological "footprint" is too big. Indeed, the more economically efficient the United States becomes (getting more oil per unit work because of making better computers) the larger the ecological footprint of the United States, because we can use up more of the earth's natural resources per time.

This is why Western nations have the largest ecological footprints and also the highest economic efficiency per land area (for now, anyway). Increasing knowledge increases the efficiency by which Western nations can produce goods that other people want. These other nations (or their dictators) trade their natural resources to the United States in exchange for the trinkets (like computers) that we give them. The more efficient we are at making trinkets (because of our increasing knowledge), the more efficiently we rape the land of developing nations, enjoying short-term benefit, but causing long-term catastrophe.

Knowledge allows people to make things which other people want. Others then are willing to use up natural resources to get those goods created because of knowledge. This is why hunter-gatherer societies did better than we do. Will says hunter-gatherers did not have to work so hard to support themselves. Fifty-thousand years ago, hunter gatherers knew less. This ignorance prevented them from harvesting natural resources at too rapid a pace. They could not deplete their environment. So these noble savages, and their children (as long as they also kept them in ignorance) could continually pass to the next generation, a world continually and renewably rich in natural resources, for everyone to enjoy.

Knowledge, far from helping humanity, actually has been the means by which humanity was and is destroying itself.

But it is possible for us to learn from this, before it is too late.

If instead of selling the Saudis a computer, we had sold them many solar panels in exchange for oil, the ecological balance sheet would be different. Those solar panels would utilize land, for example, because they would have to be physically placed somewhere on earth. But in doing that, we would be increasing the rate that the earth produces energy for us. We would be using knowledge to help, rather than hurt, us. If we traded the Saudis enough solar panels, the energy that we would be creating from the sun could more than match the energy depleted by taking oil from the ground. If we also planted numerous trees, these could ingest the carbon dioxide produced from burning the oil, so we would not be overtaxing the earth's natural ability to absorb carbon dioxide. Alternatively, we could simply use less oil and more solar energy to begin with. Then we would not be using up more energy per time than the natural energy-creating capacity of the land. If we are not using up resources faster than the world wide land area is naturally (and via technology) recreating resources, our worldwide "footprint" would not be larger than the area of the earth, itself.

So as illustrated above, economies can utilize land more efficiently (at least in the short-term) from an economic perspective, while the ecological balance sheet tells a different story. But according to Will, we should follow the ecological (not the economic) balance sheet, because eventually there will be a reckoning. If we continue to use up energy resources, for example, faster than the geographical area of the earth can naturally replenish those resources, eventually energy will run short, prices will rise, and economic efficiency will fall -- just as ecological efficiency has already fallen.

My counter argument to Will was that if his theory were really correct, we should see, now, price increases for energy resources, for example in future's markets. If efficiency will eventually fall because of a world-wide shortage of resources relative to demand, prices will rise. People will try to stockpile resources.

But we don't see that. Why? Because "natural" resources have substitues. The issue is not whether oil resources will be used up, but rather whether energy resources will be used up. Citizens of the world are "voting with their feet". That's why prices for most resources are not rising. People are betting that increasing knowledge will continue to incrementally create more new resources per unit land area, than that same knowledge destroys resources per unit land area. Resources created by "learning something" divided by resources consumed by learning the same "something" is a measure of whether one is an optimist or a pessimist. A ratio greater than one means you are an optimist. Most of the readers of the World, as you can tell, are optimists!

"each person needs 2.2 global hectares to support the demands they place on the environment, but the planet is only able to meet consumption levels of 1.8 global hectares per person"

Consider the ratio 2.2/1.8. Will, if you are right about the future of our world, eventually we will use up our natural resources and economic efficiency will fall dramatically. For example, the oil will be used up so we won't be able to take (and burn) as much oil per unit time. Therefore our ability to place "demands" on the environment will fall. Therefore the top number (2.2) will fall.

But the bottom number (1.8) will fall, as well, given your doomsday scenario. If knowledge decreases (not likely) or if the environment becomes polluted or more hostile, the environment will be less able to meet (recycle) consumption levels of 1.8 hectares per person.

The future you are predicting (lower levels of the top number and lower levels of the bottom number) is, by the way, exactly the condition of the numbers that hunter-gatherers experienced, if their "scientists" had calculated such a number. Hunter gatherers took fewer resources from the environment (top number) per time. But the ability of their environment to recycle the resources THEY NEEDED (bottom number) was less as well. For example, if there were too many people per unit area, the number of animals was not sufficient to hunt and eat. That's why the population density of hunter gatherers had to be so low.

By the way, it is very likely that for hunter-gatherers, their top number was also higher than their bottom number. The migration of hunter-gatherers from the probable evolutionary origin of humans in Africa, North through Europe and Russia and then across the Bering Strait into the New World probably occurred because of a shortage of animals. Vast remains of dead animals over the edges of cliffs suggests that hunter gatherers did not "conserve" animals, but indeed drove entire herds off of cliffs. They therefore created a scarcity of animals. For the hunter gatherers to survive, they had to continually migrate north to follow the dwindling animal herds that they were destroying. Finally, hunter-gatherers arrived in the new world.

The original "conservers" of resources important to humans, were the agricultural societies that evolved in the wake of the migration of the hunter gatherers. They protected private property, to prevent the over-hunting of the land by hunter-gatherers. Thus the city-state came into being in the fertile crescent, as a response to the over-exploitation of nature by hunter-gatherers.

The above is the theory of the economic historian Douglas North (Structure and Change in Economic History). He won the Nobel Prize partially because of this work.

I don't expect to be able to convince you that both numbers (resource use, resource creation) will continue to increase because knowledge will continue to increase. But please do note: When you are predicting doomsday scenarios, the problem is not so much that the top number (the footprint) is too big, but rather that you believe that it will eventually get too small. Please also note that historically, the top number would seem to be (at least in dynamic societies) always larger than the bottom number.

And it has not predicted doom.

I think that knowledge and ethical behavior, alone, are the only ways to deal with our uncertain future. The very thing that increases use of and creation of resources, is therefore the very thing (I think the only thing) that will protect us from uncertain catastrophies. Since niether you nor I really know what will happen in the future, I think we have to bank on increasing our knowledge. And yes, that implies increasing our productive and destructive capacities.

by a reader on Wed, 11/08/2006 - 03:19 | reply

Re: understanding

The footprint of an entity (nation, person, amount of wealth, etc) is defined as the amount of land needed, at the present state of technology, to sustainably produce the resources being used by that country or person, or to create that wealth.

I would take out the word 'sustainable', but yes.

What I think we may disagree on is this: The footprint, thus defined, is not a constant area, but changes with time.

I don't disagree. I am aware of Ehrlich and Malthus.

There are several important differences between now and back in 1970 or 1800. Notably, global warming, overfishing of the oceans, global trade which brings invasive species around the world, etc.

I've never denied that knowledge and technology can offer more efficient land use.

What I am arguing is that, as things stand right now, there must be a radical change or we will see Ehrlich and Malthus' predictions borne out, just a little late. Wealth does not automatically produce better technology. We have overcome obstacles in the past, but that does not mean that we will again this time - at least not without concerted effort.

Hence, isn't it misleading for you to use the terms "footprint" and "land use" or "resource use" interchangeably? For the conversion factor between footprint and land area is not constant.

Misleading? Perhaps. Did I intend it that way? No. I assumed everyone was on the same page, since we are, after all, talking about the WWF's report on ecological footprints.

by Will on Wed, 11/08/2006 - 03:30 | reply

Re: Understanding

Will wrote:

Ehrlich and Malthus' predictions...

Wait! I realise that most critics of environmentalism cite Malthus and Ehrlich in order to make fun of how wrong their predictions were. But that's the opposite of what I'm doing. I'm not citing them for what they were wrong about but for what they were right about: not for their predictions of their future, but for their calculations of the footprint at the time.

So, given that the human race's footprint (adjusted for carbon dioxide) has fallen from perhaps 1.7 or so in 1970 to only 1.3 now, the next question I want to ask is -- again, not what made it fall, but who? Was it not the people of the developed countries, and in particular, the change in the way those people used resources?

by David Deutsch on Wed, 11/08/2006 - 03:59 | reply

Re: Numbers

You just about stated my argument. However, I don't consider our usage of oil to be part of our footprint. Neither does the WWF, who calculate footprint as the amount of 'bioproductive' land required to support a certain level of consumption. Oil is only part of the footprint to the extent that it produces pollutants like CO2 that take up bioproductive land.

I think a more illustrative example, instead of oil, might be fishing. Fishing is a booming industry in the developing world, the biggest agricultural commodity that is traded internationally. Rich nations buy fish from poor countries, propping up the economy. The wealth that the poor countries get from fishing increases their standard of living and allows them to fish more.

Now, fish catches are beginning to level off and decline, even though more and more people are getting into the business. What happens? The prices go up, so there is more incentive to keep fishing. The fishermen also increasingly turn to other, more destructive practices like bottom trawling or shark finning.

Eventually, unless something changes, the ocean's ecosystems will collapse. Free markets will not solve the problem. Aquaculture might, but not by itself.

When the ocean fisheries are finally depleted, one billion people who currently depend on fish for their daily protein will face starvation.

Knowledge, far from helping humanity, actually has been the means by which humanity was and is destroying itself.

I never said this, and I don't believe it, although I can see how you might get that from my using hunter gatherers as an example.

I agree more with this:

I think that knowledge and ethical behavior, alone, are the only ways to deal with our uncertain future.... Since neither you nor I really know what will happen in the future, I think we have to bank on increasing our knowledge.

Increase our knowledge, yes, and rather than dismiss the problem, focus our knowledge on fixing it.

by Will on Wed, 11/08/2006 - 04:09 | reply

1.3?

Where do you get the figure of 1.3? The WWF report says 2.2 per person.

by Will on Wed, 11/08/2006 - 04:13 | reply

nevermind

Nevermind, you are taking out carbon dioxide, correct?

by Will on Wed, 11/08/2006 - 04:14 | reply

Re: 1.3

No no, I'm leaving carbon dioxide in. 2.2 is the WWF-calculated footprint in hectares per human, and in those units the Earth's capacity is currently 1.8.

1.3, or perhaps $2.2/1.8=1.22$, is, as I said, the current WWF-calculated total footprint of the human race measured in units of the Earth's total surface area. In effect, it is how many Earths we are currently using.

by David Deutsch on Wed, 11/08/2006 - 04:22 | reply

Re: 1.3?

It seems we haven't agreed on our definitions of footprint . First you said:

Similarly, in 1970, the environmentalist Paul Ehrlich calculated that the Earth could sustainably support, at the average standard of living at the time, slightly fewer people than were alive at the time -- in other words, the footprint then was slightly above 1.

Then you said:

So, given that the human race's footprint (adjusted for carbon dioxide) has fallen from perhaps 1.7 or so in 1970 to only 1.3 now,

Which figure are you saying Ehrlich came up with? 1 or 1.7?

I am also confused by your usage of the number 1.3. That's a ratio, not the total footprint per person as the WWF defines it.

When I (and the WWF) say footprint, I mean the amount of land a person, nation, whatever, uses.

You seem to be saying with your figure of 1.3 that the world is exceeding the earth's capacity by 30 percent (the WWF says 25%). Is that correct? Is there another word for that figure that we could use besides footprint to avoid confusion?

by Will on Wed, 11/08/2006 - 04:56 | reply

Re:1.3

Prof. Deutsch,

Let us look at the ration 2.2/1.8.

Would it not be correct to say that historically, both numbers (2.2 and 1.8), should have increased over time, likely because knowledge has increased over time?

Isn't it less important what the ratio is, and more important for human success that the top number continues to increase indefinitely? Presumably, the top number will not be able to increase indefinitely unless the bottom number also increases. And increasing knowledge should make them both continue to go up over time?

Have I missed something?

by a reader on Wed, 11/08/2006 - 05:41 | reply

Clarification?

I think Prof. Deutsch is saying that the figure for Ehrlich was about 1, but Ehrlich did not take into account carbon dioxide damage, so Ehrlich's figure if he had known about carbon dioxide damage, would have been closer to 2, say 1.7.

According to the WWF the correct figure is 2.2/1.8 which is approximately 1.22 (conservatively round up to 1.3).

I think Prof Deutsch is asking who caused this ratio to fall?

by a reader on Wed, 11/08/2006 - 05:58 | reply

Ratio

I am also confused by your usage of the number 1.3. That's a ratio, not the total footprint per person as the WWF defines it.

The WWF report says we are using up 125% of capacity. We are using up 1.25 earths worth of resources. Soon we will be using 2 earths.

1.3 is just 1.25 rounded up. It's how many earths the WWF says we are using. This can be compared to how many earths worth of resources other people calculated we were using.

We need to use these units, after the division, b/c if the WWF says we are using 2.2 out of 1.8, and someone else says we are using 22 out of 18 (in different units), that is actually the same, and comparing 2.2 to 22 would be totally wrong.

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 11/08/2006 - 06:07 | reply

did footprint fall?

David:

...not what made it fall, but who? Was it not the people of the developed countries, and in particular, the change in the way those people used resources?

You assume that the footprint actually fell.

Since the 1970's, fish stocks have plummeted. Across the board, just dropped off a cliff. Vertebrate populations are dropping all over the planet. Habitat destruction has continued.

There have also been positive developments. In the US, environmental regulations and the EPA reversed a lot of the decline here. New agricultural technology made cropland more productive - probably the main thing that has prevented Ehrlich's prediction from coming true.

What actually seems to have fallen is the -calculated- footprint. How do we know that Ehrlich's figures were correct? Certainly we have much better information today than we did then.

Also, maybe the footprint didn't fall. Maybe the technological measures we have come up with in the years since Ehrlich made his predictions are only stopgaps, and will only slow the impending collapse rather than stop it?

I kind of like the model proposed by a reader, that the number on top (the amount we use up) gets bigger, but so does the number on the bottom (the amount the planet can support). That seems pretty accurate to me.

The thing is, it is a constant balancing act to keep the top number from outpacing the smaller number.

by Will on Wed, 11/08/2006 - 06:52 | reply

footprint

he said the percent of capacity being used fell from 170% (or more) to 130%. that doesn't mean the total footprint (as an absolute number) fell, b/c capacity may have gone up.

-- Elliot Temple
curi@curi.us
Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 11/08/2006 - 07:28 | reply

footprint

Well, if the carrying capacity of the earth went up, that is slightly different from footprint going down.

If that's what happened (and I think that is what happened with Ehrlich's predictions) then it was the richer nations that caused it to happen because of advancements in agricultural technology.

That doesn't automatically mean that richer nations get a free pass now. Either they must reduce consumption or figure out a way to increase carrying capacity.

by Will on Wed, 11/08/2006 - 15:01 | reply

Re: footprint

Will wrote:

Well, if the carrying capacity of the earth went up, that is slightly different from footprint going down.

No it isn't. Not according to the definition we have agreed, which was:

The footprint of an entity (nation, person, amount of wealth, etc) is defined as the amount of land needed, at the present state of technology, to produce the resources being used by that country or person, or to create that wealth

So if the carrying capacity of the Earth goes up, the amount of land needed to produce the resources currently being used goes down, and the footprint goes down proportionately. Right?

by David Deutsch on Wed, 11/08/2006 - 15:19 | reply

footprint

if the carrying capacity of the Earth goes up, the amount of land needed to produce the resources currently being used goes down, and the footprint goes down proportionately. Right?

Allow me to think out loud here:

One number (2.2 according to the wwf) is the amount of land required to support every human.

The other number (1.8) is the amount of acres per person the earth could support. So when the top number (2.2) gets bigger than the bottom (1.8), we are in a period of ecological deficit. When it is smaller than the bottom, we are building up our natural capital, so to speak.

New technologies that increase the agricultural productivity of land will decrease the top number. I honestly don't know how much impact these technologies would have on the bottom number. That seems like it would be something like x/p , where x = the amount of available bioproductive land and p = population. X should be a constant unless we can create technologies which allow previously unusable land to become productive, which is rather different from making the existing land more productive.

So population increase because of better technologies could cause that bottom number to shrink, even as the top number shrinks. In that case, your percentage figure, 1.3, could go up even as footprint per person shrinks. Your percentage figure could go down if technology increases enough to make the top number smaller than the bottom, or if we can make the bottom number bigger by decreasing population or increasing the available land.

Then there is the possibility that agricultural land required per person decreases, but because of increasing wealth, other resources consumed goes up: more land required for timber, paper, etc. In this case, population will increase, the bottom number will shrink, the top number will increase or stay the same, and the percentage figure will increase.

There is also a possibility that we have underestimated the bottom number, and our technologies are allowing us to exploit and destroy the available resources more 'efficiently.' I'm thinking of fishing here, where fish stocks have collapsed, but we keep finding ever more destructive ways to keep producing high catches. In other words, we have found short term solutions, stretching the earth's carrying capacity but not actually increasing it.

Am I being clear here?

In any case, is all this actually relevant to your rhetorical point?

by Will on Wed, 11/08/2006 - 16:53 | reply

Agricultural Efficiency

Consider the ratio we have been talking about.

You are correct that increases in agricultural productivity will decrease the ratio, but it does so not by decreasing the amount of resources that individuals consume per time (the top number), but rather by allowing the land to "replenish" more food per time (if there is no extra toxic waste from growing the food more efficiently).

So increases in agricultural productivity, everything else equal, increase the bottom number, but do not decrease the top number. The reason the top number does not decrease is that if food is produced more efficiently, the price falls and if anything people consume more of it (or the population increases to take more advantage of the lower price of food). Either way net food consumption increases. Economists say that in most situations, food is not an "inferior" good.

So, increases in agricultural productivity raise the bottom number, and do not decrease the top. A higher bottom number means one can "replenish" more food from the earth per unit time when agricultural productivity increases (providing that there are no toxic byproducts from these increased efficiencies).

So these are my questions (similar to Prof. Deutsch).

You (Will) have agreed that the bottom number has historically increased over time.

A. Who has cause the bottom number to increase over time?

And equally importantly

B. Why have these people acted to increase the bottom number ? Put another way, what incentive have these people had to increase the bottom number?

by a reader on Wed, 11/08/2006 - 20:55 | reply

agriculture

You are right, new agricultural technology would increase the bottom number. But it would also decrease the top number, which is the amount of land required to produce the resources consumed by an average human.

Keep in mind the other variables: population, amount of other resources consumed, etc that could affect this number.

Anyway, the answer to your question:

a. what has caused the bottom number to increase over time? Well, we haven't actually proven that it has increased. We have seen that Malthus and Ehrlich's calculations were wrong. Perhaps they underestimated the carrying capacity of the earth, or overestimated the footprint at the time.

Also, perhaps we are stretching the earth's resources, rather than extending them.

B. Why have these people acted to increase the bottom number? Put another way, what incentive have these people had to increase the bottom number?

I know the answer you want to hear, so for the sake of argument, I'll give it: the technologically advanced, richer nations have given us technology that has made agricultural land more productive.

What was their motivation? Profit.

So I've said it. But this doesn't prove a thing. In addition to the possibilities stated above, note the fact that past trends do not prove future trends. There could be a number of things that affect our ability and desire to develop new technologies.

Also consider the possibility that our development of new technologies must occur at a rate fast enough to repay our ecological debt.

by Will on Wed, 11/08/2006 - 21:59 | reply

Past and Future

Will,

So I've said it. But this doesn't prove a thing. In addition to the possibilities stated above, note the fact that past trends do not prove future trends. There could be a number of things that affect our ability and desire to develop new technologies.

You don't need to prove it: you need to explain it, which you have. Also, you are right that the future does not follow from the past inductively. But if we can explain past trends according to a rule that is not falsified yet (in our case, the rule that the incentives of people in free, industrialized countries result in increases in the carrying capacity of the Earth) it is irrational to throw that rule away on the vague statement that it is not proven. No law of Nature is ever proven. As to problems: they arise constantly and they must be solved (not erased) by allowing the free growth of knowledge.

-- Cyrus Ferdowsi, <http://libiran.blogspot.com>

by Liberal Iranian on Thu, 11/09/2006 - 03:47 | reply

What Should Be Done?

There seems to be a reasonable amount of understanding and agreement now. And we don't need total agreement about the current state of the Earth. What to do next only partially depends on that.

The WWF wants to appeal to governments to force people to live with a lower footprint -- to use less stuff per person. And it designed its measure, footprint per person, to finger rich, lower-population nations as the ones using more than their fair share, who should be forcibly made to stop.

And the WWF wants to scare people into taking action -- changing their personal lives to consume less. People should spend more of their time recycling, and buy more environmentally friendly products, and so on.

Whether the current state of the Earth is a problem or not, I oppose all that. I want to see a focus on science, and optimism that we can fix problems, rather than pessimism and trying to avoid them. We don't have perfect foresight, so problem avoidance cannot work reliably. (Note: of course sometimes if you do know about a problem in advance, avoiding it may be easiest/best)

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Thu, 11/09/2006 - 05:29 | reply

Technological Breakthrough Lowers Footprint

Want to use less water?

<http://www.physorg.com/news82299918.html>

Now showers can use 30% less water without feeling less pleasant.

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Fri, 11/10/2006 - 01:31 | reply

Yay. Let's all be happy-cl

Yay.

Let's all be happy-clappy optimistic libertarians and hold hands and sing hymns to knowledge and about the rich and the smart are soon going to build us a better boat - who needs to throw all that heavy stuff overboard or plug the leaks?! Increase, increase, we say!

by Neil on Sat, 11/11/2006 - 13:12 | reply

One Billion Humans

Thanks Will and the Libertarian legions.

Seriously, thanks.

I like nice round numbers and elegant math. My conclusions on the above for now are that these factors:

Smarter, fewer humans

More edible cellulose, etc.

Better use of plentiful electrons in combination make for an elegant formula for a good life on a carbon based planet.

Doesn't seem too hard to figure out.

Cheap, technologically efficient birth control (and the knowledge to use this technology wisely) while eating/wearing tasty paper products and driving around in our electron fueled vehicles, now that's the ticket!

You scientists can do the math. What the heck, I'll triple the fudge factor, three billion humans works too. That's my WWF theory and it works.

by a reader on Mon, 11/13/2006 - 17:07 | reply

Carbon Dioxide,

...man-made carbon dioxide emissions that is, make up just 0.017% of the green house gases in the atmosphere, and carbon dioxide is the least effective green house gas anyway. The past 170 years have been the coldest in the past 1000 years. The coldest period in the past 170 years was during one of the biggest booms in man-made carbon dioxide emissions in history. The ice caps are growing and sea levels are stable or even falling. What's the big deal with this climate change malarky?

Besides, sooner or later the Earth is going to become uninhabitable and it doesn't matter how many of us take up cycling. There is no 'solution' to climate change except to move to another planet, or to build massive Space 1999-style enviro-domes or something like that. In the meantime I'm going to keep eating my beef, using my incandescent lightbulbs (which don't poison the planet, unlike the other kind) and driving my 4x4. I might even smoke a few cigars while I'm at it.

by The Cynical Libertarian on Sun, 03/18/2007 - 11:49 | reply

I recommend some schooling...

I don't know if you took basic maths? But I'll have a go.

In a democratic system (doubtful you believe in this philosophy) the weighting is relative to the individual. Ergo each person carries the same burden.

Weighting by GDP just doesn't make sense.. That's the equivalent of giving votes in a political system based on how much money you earn (again this may be the interpretation in America).

I know you see yourself as some kind of agent-provocateur but please don't waste my time publishing such tosh...

by a reader on Fri, 03/23/2007 - 14:02 | reply

Questions For The Iraq Study Group To Study

It is reported that the Iraq Study Group led by the highly Realistic James Baker has unanimously agreed to a report that will call for a gradual pullback of American combat troops in Iraq but stops short of setting a firm timetable for withdrawal, The New York Times reported on Wednesday.

And this differs from the present policy how? Like this:

the Times said the Iraq Study Group will recommend that Bush make it clear that he will start the troop withdrawal "relatively soon," indicating sometime next year.

That's very clear and Realistic. No firm timetable, but a firm timetable of withdrawal by December 31st 2007. Independently of what may, realistically speaking, happen as a result.

That recommendation would be a compromise between calls from some Democrats for a timetable to withdraw U.S. forces and Bush's insistence that forces should remain until the mission to stabilize Iraq was completed.

Recommendations of the panel, which is co-chaired by former Secretary of State James Baker -- a close Bush family friend -- and former Democratic congressman Lee Hamilton, will be much harder for Bush to resist than if the group were divided, experts and study group advisers say.

This is an astonishingly amoral position for something called a 'study group' to adopt. It is almost as if they would rather have an effect -- any effect, even one that none of them agree with -- than be ignored. They would rather subscribe collectively to a report that every one of them considers mistaken, than state individually what they believe to be the truth.

If the result is just a vague anti-Bush editorial that could have been written without study, at the outset, we wonder what the Iraq Study Group has been studying, and why. We hope that they have at least studied the following vital issues, and will include careful guidance on them in their final report:

- Will the report be cleared with Allies, such as Iraq, Australia

- and Israel, before any action is taken to implement it?
- Is there a Plan for the Aftermath of the report? In particular, have enough troops been allocated to ensure that the report's Aftermath in Iraq is completely non-violent?
 - If not, will all use of force resulting from this report, by all parties in Iraq, have full UN Security Council approval?
 - Will the arrangements properly safeguard Iraqi antiquities?
 - And Iraqi oil installations?
 - Will there be adequate arrangements for the refugees?
 - Has sufficient attention been given to the effect of a US retreat on the Arab Street?
 - What does the group recommend as the exit strategy from their report?

Thu, 11/30/2006 - 07:06 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Iraq Study Group

1. Will the report be cleared with Allies, such as Iraq, Australia and Israel, before any action is taken to implement it?

I suspect that whatever decisions are arrived at by the White House will be discussed with the Allies, including the U.K., before any action is taken. I do not think the report will be "cleared," if what's meant by that is a veto right.

2. Is there a Plan for the Aftermath of the report? In particular, have enough troops been allocated to ensure that the report's Aftermath in Iraq is completely non-violent?

I don't think enough troops will be allocated to insure that the Aftermath is completely non-violent. Iraq is far from non-violent now with the current level of forces, and there is not the political will to invest materially more blood and treasure to the conflict.

3. If not, will all use of force resulting from this report, by all parties in Iraq, have full UN Security Council approval?

Clearly no.

4. Will the arrangements properly safeguard Iraqi antiquities, and Iraqi oil installations?

No, remaining antiquities and Iraq oil installations are currently under constant threat and given the answer to the second question above, will continue to be under threat.

5. Will there be adequate arrangements for the refugees?

Currently there are large numbers of internal refugees, as well as refugees in bordering countries. Given the answer to the second question above, it's hard to imagine that any plan will adequately provide for the current refugees, let alone additional refugees caused, for example, by increased fighting in the wake of a U.S. withdrawal.

6. Has sufficient attention been given to the effect of a US retreat on the Arab Street?

I suspect that this issue is discussed in some detail, since it lends itself to broad conclusions either to withdraw, stay the course, or increase commitment.

7. What does the group recommend as the exit strategy from their report?

Good question.

by Michael Bacon on Thu, 11/30/2006 - 15:57 | reply

The Crux of Incountry Stability

Since we are speculating on what the Study Group report should speak to:

How might the actual aftermath of the war be conducted, beginning with the surrender of Baghdad in spring 2003, given the stirred Sunni/Shite/Kurd dynamics which continue to fester until addressed?

How can the U.S. and allies deal most practically with the now ingrained perception of all Iraqi citizens that they are an occupied country not responsible for their own destiny?

Rephrase these two questions however you would like in order to make them clearer. Thorny issues, but they are, and always have been the crux of the core problem to be solved.

by a reader on Fri, 12/01/2006 - 04:21 | reply

Too Subtle?

The responses thusfar lead me to wonder whether it has been understood that these "vital issues" are versions of some of the unrealistic criticisms of the original invasion.

Gil

by Gil on Sat, 12/02/2006 - 01:11 | reply

Questions

I thought "Questions For The Iraq Study Group To Study" was a good title and the post asked some serious and usefull questions regarding the current war. Perhaps I was wrong.

by Michael Bacon on Sat, 12/02/2006 - 01:22 | reply

Results of the experiment

Experience has shown that most of the unrealistic criticisms of the original invasion were realistic. In Popperian terms, the justifications, or rationalizations, for the original invasion have been proven wrong.

by a reader on Thu, 12/07/2006 - 15:53 | reply

Cold comfort this probably ha

Cold comfort this probably hasn't worked out well in some "universes" other than ours. How quickly the US changes course in a variety of ways will depend, as it did in the Vietnam instance, on how things play out in the US Congress. It looks like Bush, at least for now, is going to resist ceding control of his fate and will change only to the extent the US Congress can successfully force the issue. Or perhaps the political pressure will be great and the changes come more quickly.

by Michael Bacon on Fri, 12/08/2006 - 23:08 | reply

The real questions

Do you still think that the War in Iraq was a good decision, that the Iraqis would welcome the liberating bombs, and that this war helps fighting the War on Terror? Do you still think that those opposing it were "idiotarians"?

by a reader on Sun, 08/19/2007 - 13:56 | reply

yes

yes

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 08/20/2007 - 00:23 | reply

Christians In The Middle East

The Archbishop of Canterbury, Rowan Williams, has said that by invading Iraq the British and American governments have made life more difficult for Christians in the Middle East. In particular, large numbers of Christian refugees are leaving Iraq in fear for their lives. But it's not the Coalition forces whom they fear. The alleged responsibility of the British and Americans is indirect. What is it?

Islamists say that Christians are crusaders trying to dominate the Middle East along with the American and British governments. Hence the Islamists' campaign of terrorism against them is not unprovoked religious persecution and mass murder but simple self-defence. That the Islamists made that argument is not news. But why has Rowan Williams accepted it?

On the purely factual level he is simply wrong. For example, in Sudan, Islamists have been trying to exterminate Sudanese Christians on and off since 1955. The American government can't have prompted this campaign of genocide by invading Iraq. And, as Daniel Pipes points out, Christians have been disappearing from Iraq and most other countries in the region for several decades.

Williams blames the American and British governments because he has a cartoonish view of the world in which foreign people are only ever poor or violent because the rich Western countries have persecuted them. He doesn't treat Islamists in the Middle East as human beings, responsible for their actions, but only as ciphers, their deeply held convictions mere reflexes, determined by the decisions of Westerners. That's why he doesn't say that the Islamists are to blame for murdering and persecuting people, and instead blames the American and British governments who are trying to prevent the Islamists from doing that.

In doing so, he isn't just slandering the West, he is also doing a disservice to the Islamists by not expecting them to act as civilised human beings. And by publicly transferring responsibility for their crimes specifically to those who are trying to stop them, he is collaborating with them against their victims, including many Christians. Williams may be well-intentioned, but his moral relativism can only make the terrible situation in the Middle East worse.

You've said it all. Thanks.

by AIS on Tue, 01/09/2007 - 02:23 | reply

Reframing the issues

Hi, Apart from all the other misconceptions, offences against reason and confusion of ideas, originating from a relativist world view and its tendency to live exclusively in the here and now, is the hole in our historic awareness. And so it happens that without that knowledge we are re-framing the story of ourselves through the eyes and in the terminology of Islam. This apparently extends to the Anglican archbishop, which is a shame. He of all people should know better. We've now heard so often about our appalling record (crusades, imperialism, slave-trade, colonialism), that we have come to believe it ourselves and are repeating it in those terms. Perhaps it's time the truth be told, that without Christian civilization, built on the ruins of Athens and Rome, we would today be quite a different lot. And that we owe Christianity Universal Human Rights (not the U.N. as some are fond to point out), the rule of law, labour rights, science and all the other human achievements that are presently claimed by the children of the Enlightenment. Yes, we owe Christians in the East a great deal as well; they are the original inhabitants of Asia Minor and the Near East, that have been conquered, reduced to dhimmitude and left to fend for themselves. By the way, it is another misunderstanding of relativism to think that if you "talk yourself down", correspondingly you "talk the other up". Quite the contrary is the case!
Nice blog! Keep it up! Cheerio! Cassandra <http://millennium-notes.blogspot.com/>

by Cassandra on Tue, 01/09/2007 - 13:25 | reply

Tolerance of Intolerance

Relativistic thinking leads to a peculiar problem. If one person cannot judge another's behavior because he does not live in his skin and cannot see through his eyes, then how should disagreements be settled? If each antagonist's conflicting idea about what each will do is determined by equally valid but differing perspectives, then a philosophy that starts out sounding tolerant to each, devolves into a philosophy that supports conflicting patterns of behavior, otherwise known as violence.

By uncritically accepting the Islamists perspective that Westerners are "Christian Crusaders", no doubt in the name of being tolerant, the Archbishop unwittingly accepts the legitimacy of the consequences of that worldview, namely the massacre of Christians -- surely the height of intolerance.

The Archbishop, like relativists who argue similarly, adopts a morally inconsistent and therefore morally wrong position: The tolerance of intolerance.

by a reader on Wed, 01/10/2007 - 00:54 | reply

Your comment

Really enjoyed and appreciated your comments! I used them today in a post by your leave. You can find them here:

<http://millennium-notes.blogspot.com/2007/01/impossible-made-possible-dictatorship.html>

If you have any objections or would again like to comment, please by all means.

Best, Cassandra.

by Cassandra on Fri, 01/12/2007 - 21:56 | reply

Microsoft, Again

Nick at CharcoalDesign is not pleased with Microsoft.

Mon, 01/29/2007 - 23:15 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

OFF TOPIC: Why do atheists inspire such hatred?

CNN asks: Why do atheists inspire such hatred?

by a reader on Tue, 02/06/2007 - 21:53 | reply

Hounded By Animal Rights Activists

Some animal rights activists are getting hot and bothered because some people sell coats made partly of dog fur – which is illegal in the United States.

Now, measures to prevent fraud (like selling fake fake fur under the guise of real fake fur) are one thing. But we think that people should be allowed to sell real dog and cat fur if they want to. Dogs were created by nature and human civilisation through natural and artificial selection. Dogs themselves can't generate new ideas, although people can train them to do stereotypical things like fetching sticks. So everything that might make a dog unique can be easily recreated by getting another dog of the same breed and treating it in a similar way.

If someone acquires a psychological attachment to a dog that they own – or for that matter to a picture that they own of a dog that never existed – then of course it should be a crime for someone else to destroy the dog or the picture. But for the same reason, if somebody chooses to kill their dog, that is an innocuous act. They can, for example, easily replace the dog with another that is just like it. If they also sell the dog's fur, everyone concerned is better off.

By contrast, human beings are capable of generating new ideas. So if somebody kills a human being they may have destroyed unique ideas that could make the world better. They cannot be replaced by simply treating another human in a similar way – even if that were a moral thing to do. Even if a person appears to have no good ideas, we may simply misunderstand the merits of his ideas. That is why we set up institutions, such as law and moral traditions, to ensure that choices between rival ideas can be made on the basis of reason, not violence. That is why killing a human being is wrong, except as a necessary consequence of defending another human being.

And that is why human beings have rights, while dogs and other animals do not.

Sun, 02/18/2007 - 16:03 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Let me be the first to tell you that you are wrong on a number of counts. You have set up an argument based on apples and oranges. (Humans are human and Dogs are, well, only dogs. So your point is that dogs are not humans?)

Dogs are not humans but neither are they "owned" by humans like a house or car or some other inanimate object. The simple fact that dogs, or elephants for that matter can be dominated/domesticated by humans who have exploited their natural species tendencies does not make it o.k. to kill them if their "owner" decides to on some whim, unless somehow the dog or the elephant has become crazed and is dangerous to others. I don't really have any problem if you personally want to wear a dead dog coat or elephant skin shoes, that's your choice, but please make sure that that dead dog/elephant died of natural causes.

If on the other hand we create a market for dog carcasses or the fur of dog you can be sure that some wrong-ideaed human will figure out a way to make a profit from it and establish the dog fur trading and coat making industry. A fine end for man's best friend and he doesn't have very many. And as far as dogs and other animals not having rights, who said they asked for any?

Go on about how every human being has worth and rights partly because he can think and explore new and fascinating ideas and there is no problem with that. But leave the dogs, cats, and elephants alone when it comes to the human fashion industry.

Or maybe you think we should harvest ivory, make cat head amulets to ward off evil spirits, or make dog fighting a national sport. I could make a case for each of those possibilities philosophically but it wouldn't make any of it morally right.

Of course you aren't talking about killing real dogs, only theoretical ones. So for the sake of argument go on about how you think dog fur is a wonderful all-weather coat for us naked apes. I don't mind one whit.

by a reader on Mon, 02/19/2007 - 01:47 | reply

creating novel ideas or feeling pain?

I'm not sure I agree that generating new ideas should be the criterion of whether causing harm to an entity is morally acceptable. The better criterion should be the ability to feel pain. If an animal, say a dog or a higher mammal, can feel pain due to its more evolved nervous system then causing pain, suffering or death to such animal should be considered morally wrong, unless it is demonstrably clear that it would prevent greater pain of suffering somewhere else.

by AIS on Mon, 02/19/2007 - 05:38 | reply

Pain

Pain isn't the same thing as suffering. Nerves in a test tube can send electrical impulses. It's only suffering if there is a mind there to care about it.

-- Elliot Temple
curi@curi.us
Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 02/19/2007 - 08:48 | reply

Pain

AIS and Elliot:

Whether or not pain (in some sense) is relevant to morality in general, it is surely not relevant to the issue here, which is killing animals and wearing their fur. This can be done painlessly.

by David Deutsch on Mon, 02/19/2007 - 13:15 | reply

Pain

David,

I am curious as to your view of "how" relevant to morality is the issue of pain in killing animals. Assuming, for the sake of argument, that certain killing of dogs for fur is done in a way that involves a material amount of pain, would this then be relatively strong support for the view that such killing would be immoral?

by Michael Bacon on Mon, 02/19/2007 - 18:25 | reply

Re: Pain

Assuming, for the sake of argument, that certain killing of dogs for fur is done in a way that involves a material amount of pain, would this then be relatively strong support for the view that such killing would be immoral?

On that assumption (including the assumption that the pain is of the morally relevant kind - let me call it 'suffering'), the immoral thing would be inflicting that suffering, not killing the animal nor wearing its fur.

Suppose a certain amount of suffering was practically unavoidable in killing that type of animal. Then, strictly speaking, what was morally relevant would not actually be the suffering but the difference in suffering between that necessitated by the humane killing and that which would be experienced if the animal eventually died of natural causes.

Your assumption then leads to some conclusions that I don't think most animal rights supporters would like. For instance, not only would it be immoral to breed any such animals in the first place (because of the inevitable suffering that they would experience during their lives and deaths), but the only moral environmental policy would be to reduce the number of wild animals capable of suffering to the absolute minimum needed for humans to thrive.

by David Deutsch on Mon, 02/19/2007 - 19:01 | reply

"rights"

The premise of this post and its comments have all been wrong. Man's rights are not derived from his ability to feel pain, they are also not derived from his capability or - willingness - to create ideas that others find useful. Instead it is the source of his ability to create ideas that are the cause of man's rights.

Rights can only be held by beings who are capable of reasoning and choosing.

The whole "animal rights" movement is based on a single --invalid-- syllogism, namely: men feel pain and have rights; animals feel pain; therefore, animals have rights. This argument is entirely false, because man's rights do not depend on his ability to feel pain; they depend on his ability to think.

Rights are ethical principles applicable only to beings capable of reason and choice. There is only one fundamental right: a man's right to his own life. To live successfully, man must use his rational faculty--which is exercised by choice. The choice to think can be negated only by the use of physical force. To survive and prosper, men must be free from the initiation of force by other men--free to use their own minds in guidance of their choices and actions. Rights protect men against the use of force by other men.

None of this is relevant to animals. Animals do not survive by rational thought (nor by sign languages taught to them by psychologists). They survive through inborn reflexes and sensory-perceptual association. They cannot reason. They cannot learn a code of ethics. A lion is not immoral for eating a zebra (or even for attacking and killing a man). Predation is their natural and only means of survival; they do not have the capacity to learn any other.

Only man has the power to deal with other members of his own species by voluntary means: rational persuasion and a code of ethics rather than physical force. To claim that man's use of animals is immoral is to claim that we have no right to our own lives and that we must sacrifice our welfare for the sake of creatures who cannot think or grasp the concept of morality. It is to elevate amoral animals to a moral level higher than ourselves - a flagrant contradiction. Of course, it is proper not to cause animals gratuitous suffering. But this is not the same as inventing a bill of rights for them at our expense.

The granting of fictional rights to animals is not an innocent error. We do not have to speculate about the motive, because the animal "rights" advocates have revealed it quite openly. Again from PETA: "Mankind is the biggest blight on the face of the earth"; "I do not believe that a human being has a right to life"; "I would rather have medical experiments done on our children than on animals." These self-styled lovers of life do not love animals; rather, they hate men.

The animal "rights" terrorists are like the Unabomber and Oklahoma City bombers. They are not idealists seeking justice, but nihilists seeking destruction for the sake of destruction. They do not want to uplift mankind, to help him progress from the swamp to the stars. They want mankind's destruction; they want him not just to stay in the swamp but to disappear into its mud.

There is only one proper answer to such people: to declare proudly and defiantly, in the name of morality, a man's right to his life, and his liberty.

Editor's note: This comment appears to have been copied from this post by Edwin A. Locke at the Ayn Rand Institute.

by a reader on Tue, 02/20/2007 - 06:52 | reply

Rand

Are you a big fan of Ayn Rand?

Also, why do you put your stance forward as disagreeing with the original post, when you largely agree? (It said an important thing was that people have ideas. It denied animal rights.)

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 02/20/2007 - 08:30 | reply

Pain & Rights

I think the issue is less who or what has rights and more the morality of man inflicting pain where doing so is unnecessary to achieve legitimate purposes. Notwithstanding that animal rights activists might not like the logical conclusions that could be drawn from such an analysis, I think David's statement that "what was morally relevant would not actually be the suffering but the difference in suffering between that necessitated by the humane killing and that which would be experienced if the animal eventually died of natural causes," is an appropriate way to look at these types of issues.

by Michael Bacon on Tue, 02/20/2007 - 14:38 | reply

Live dog

If you read today's news you will be enlightened to see that a dog, a laborador retriever, was credited by three mountain climbers on Mount Hood for saving their live while they waited for technology devices to locate them. If they had instead depended on animal fur, such as hair of the dog, they likely would have perished.

Live dogs are better than dead ones.

I agree on the rights point. It is ridiculous to speak of animal rights, but there we go again anthropomorphizing.

As to human morality, there is a strong case for fostering appreciation of the dog species. Dogs get it, reason or no reason. A good human is one to be loved. A dog has no silly ego which tells flawed thinking men that they have rights above others, the others being classified as lesser humans or lower animals. Dogs on the other hand treat all good humans as one and the same. Thinking or not, dogs would have never caused the holocaust, a thousand ugly wars, slavery, child abuse or a million incidents of race baiting.

Dogs would gladly give you the fur off their back but what thinking human needs it anyway. Goose down is a much more effective insulator and mink is preferred by 99 percent of women as a fur of choice. Dogs, live ones, just give warmth and service and return the love of a decent master. A dog will go with you anywhere, even to the top of Mount Hood in a blizzard. Who knows what stupid humans were doing up there in a blizzard, but the laborador willingly followed.

Meanwhile PETA and this board and other misguided humans were sitting on their thumbs debating animal rights.

In a blizzard give me a live dog any day.

by a reader on Tue, 02/20/2007 - 14:41 | reply

Re: "rights" and Rand

In reply to the Randian reader: making choices (in the sense you intend - for instance, not the kind of choice that dogs or present-day computers can make) is itself an irreducibly creative act, as is using reason (in the sense you intend). So we are not in disagreement on that fundamental point.

Your comment appears to have been copied from this post by Edwin A. Locke at the Ayn Rand Institute. But to give credit where credit is due, we have inserted an attribution after your comment.

by Editor on Tue, 02/20/2007 - 15:26 | reply

Technology Devices

Certain trained dogs are "technology devices" in the relevant sense -- a tool used by humans who have knowledge of how to use it, and who make it themselves (via dog training). Destroying them is destruction of valuable, private property. Which is perfectly legal if you are the owner, and rightly so: maybe you're making an even more valuable movie. Or maybe you are risking the death of that dog in a rescue, without its signed consent.

-- Elliot Temple
curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 02/20/2007 - 20:17 | reply

Three dog night

To clarify, in the Mt. Hood case, the dog was warm-blooded and furry and hence warm. The three climbers huddled around the warm dog throughout the freezing night. The dog kept them warm enough to survive until technology devices which they were wearing were located the next day by the mountain rescue team.

I don't know if rescue dogs were involved. As for signed consent, a pawprint backed up by a wagging tail is sufficient.

by a reader on Tue, 02/20/2007 - 20:44 | reply

Live Dogs

"Live dogs are better than dead ones."

Assume for the sake of argument that the climbers could only have saved themselves by killing the dog and there was no way to do this in a timely fashion other than by inflicting a great deal of pain. In that case a live dog isn't better than a dead one, and the infliction of pain to kill the dog would still have been a "moral" response.

by Michael Bacon on Tue, 02/20/2007 - 22:02 | reply

Bravo The World

Dogs seem to fall on a scale between tools and comforters.

The dog that saves mountaineers from death is merely a sophisticated tool. Likewise a dog that provides hair is a tool (or a resource).

The dog owner who is neurotically attached to her animal is using it as a comforter. It would be cruel to kill it just as it would be cruel to steal a child's teddy bear.

(Hopefully nobody is suggesting that stuffed toys have rights.)

However if she'd understood that humanity doesn't depend on having emotions but upon having thoughts and ideas and choices then she might not have become attached in the first place. She might have been saved a great deal of inconvenience and veterinary bills.

At present, when people are exhorted to treat other people 'like human beings', they are really being asked to treat people like dogs (i.e. to have regard for their emotional states, but not necessarily to try to take them seriously.)

This has got to be one of the most difficult prejudices to set right.

by Tom Robinson on Wed, 02/21/2007 - 00:00 | reply

What is a 'mind'?

OK I will call it suffering instead of pain. I do agree that you need a mind to feel the nerve signals etc. as suffering. Yet I do not understand how you can be so certain that dogs have not already got a primitive mind, mind enough to feel suffering in the sense above?

I also accept the point of Dr. Deutsch that suffering alone is not sufficient as a criteria versus the argument for extermination as an end to natural or otherwise sufferings that will ensue. That an argument based on uniqueness, "individuality" is needed for instance as a source of creating new ideas.

My point again is how we can be so certain that a being conscious enough to feel some sort of suffering for instance- given the assumption that such being exist- won't contain "enough" originality as an "individual" of its species? That maybe it is more skillful in hunting and even "thinks up" an "insightful" maneuver in one of its hunts at the spur of the moment that would ensure its survival against all odds? Would that not be a crude primitive "idea" of some sort?

Or that it if it is capable of suffering, as an assumption, that its instinct for survival might not cause him immense fear and suffering at the moment of extermination once it its self-sustaining survival instincts become active? That at that moment it senses somewhat what is going to happen to it soon afterwards?

I guess it all boils down to this: We have no clue what a mind is really? No real model of a mind. So how can you be so certain to speak of an higher mammal as property or mere reflexive machine? Given the odds, I think an argument can be made in favor of restraining from hurting higher animals unnecessarily on moral, given that we basically have no clue of what is a mind and how it works, for these three reasons:

1- the banality of the alternative act, like fur coats, does not justify the possibility of inflicting suffering on a primitive "mind" enough to suffer and unique enough to deserve existence.

2- Higher animals do exhibit behaviour that seem like they are semi-conscious, They do exhibit fear, they have some kind of memory etc. You claim all of these are mere reflexes, but there is really no reason as far as I can see why we should accept such claim.

3- From an evolutionary perspective your view leaves the question of how man's consciousness, self-consciousness, mind and idea producing facility arose at all given that whatever exists among the rest of the species on the face of the earth is mere blind reflexes. Was it a miracle? Wouldn't it make sense to assume that we as a species are capable of producing ideas at this immense scale, that does indeed set us apart from all other animals, as a result of many many little- I don't know- primitive "ideas" and "skills" of specific members of lower species, "individuals" in a crude sense, in their battle of survival that were caused and in turn-by merely surviving and adding their genes to the gene pool wher otherwise they should have been dead- causing the growth of the nervous system untill it reached this turning point?

To be sure I definitely agree that man has achieved a unique feature that sets her apart from all animals completely and that there is a huge gap between us and all other animals. I am simply not willing to deny the existence of hierarchy on the other side of the gap and that it could nevertheless be significant on the moral value of our behaviour to them. I am not willing to adamantly press all that is on the other side basically to the level of vegetable. The fact that the gap exists is important of course. It also makes humans alone to act under the domain of morality for instance. That is why suffering induced by natural causes or other animals do not enter the equations of morality. Animals and the world in general is amoral. There is no evil in the way the rest of the world acts.

I also want to add that I did not suggest pain or suffering to be the basis for rights. I only argued in connection to moral behaviour and the two are not the same thing. If you see another human drowning, say, you have the right as a free man to walk away and not risk your existence but it would be morally wrong nevertheless.

by AIS on Wed, 02/21/2007 - 17:40 | reply

Human Rights

Animals do not warrant the same respect, dignity, and rights that humans do, but that does not mean that we should not treat animals with compassion. AIS makes a good point.

As importantly, those who argue that animals do not deserve respect, have hardly convinced most people that dogs should be treated as mere tools. Therefore if someone walks down the street with a dog fur coat on, he is forcing others to watch the spectacle, something that is very offensive to most people in the United States and Britain.

Before damaging other people (not just animals) by wearing dog fur coats, you need to convince people that what you are doing is right.

And you have not that. So what you are advocating is wrong.

by a reader on Wed, 02/21/2007 - 18:14 | reply

Offending

You say walking around in fur is "damaging" people. What is your reason for this? Because, you said, it would offend them deeply.

I do agree some people would be deeply offended.

But I am deeply offended by the notion that the offensive should be illegal. And I am deeply offended by this sort of "burden of acceptability" which requires new or unusual things to justify themselves, and otherwise suppresses them.

That certainly is not one of the principles of America.

-- Elliot Temple
curi@curi.us
Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 02/21/2007 - 20:16 | reply

Minds

AIS:

Animals have been known to do few things that a present-day computer programmer would have difficulty imagining how to write. Present day computer programs aren't intelligent, at all, although they sometimes fake it.

The exceptions are all evolved knowledge found in every animal of that species, not learned knowledge. For example, if we observe dragonflies doing very advanced flying maneuvers, which we don't understand the aerodynamics of, then that's some cool knowledge. And it's easily explained by evolution: dragon flies that do slightly more advanced flying maneuvers are favored to breed more (due to winning more fights). But it's very badly explained by intelligence. All (or most) dragonflies learn this idea? Which is so complex humans are having trouble figuring out what it is?

We can discuss any specific animal trait if you like.

-- Elliot Temple
curi@curi.us
Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 02/21/2007 - 20:40 | reply

Here's a thought.

Human beings are often bastards, and some people build up indignation about this, which they find it convenient to release in the form of slippery arguments for animal rights.

The slipperiness of these arguments comes from the desire to make a loud noise rather than a point. The real purpose is not to make a sincere argument for equality with animals, but to remark on human failings.

I also offer you a thread about PETA from b3ta.

by Felix_ on Wed, 02/21/2007 - 23:05 | reply

Deeply Offended

"I am deeply offended by the notion that the offensive should be illegal."

And who can disagree with this? But illegality isn't the issue, is it?

The point isn't whether wearing dog fur should be illegal - it shouldn't. Nor is the main question, in my view, whether great efforts should be undertaken to try to make illegal the unnecessarily painful killing of dogs for fur. Rather, it has more to do with personal behavior. Is it fundamentally moral for me to purchase these dog-fur lined coats knowing that unnecessary pain was inflicted to obtain the fur? If there are other reasonable alternatives, I say no. If there are no other reasonable alternatives, such purchases would seem appropriate. In the end, for each of us, morality is an individual endeavor.

by Michael Bacon on Thu, 02/22/2007 - 02:11 | reply

Uncertainty

Elliot,

I agree about insects for instance with you completely. They are one end of the spectrum. The other end is us and we know for sure that we have a mind because we are these minds. That we are discussing this itself is predicated on it. All I am saying is since we have no real objecting model to understand what mind is I don't see how we can say this with certainty about higher forms of animals, like chimps, say, and that this uncertainty has moral consequences in the way we should treat them.

There are for instance reports of apes, even elephants acting as though they can recognize themselves in the mirror. Link. I don't see how you can dismiss all of this with such certainty.

by AIS on Thu, 02/22/2007 - 03:26 | reply

Naturally induced suffering irrelevant in moral consideration

I also wanted to add that I disagree with Dr. Deutsch's claim that natural suffering should be considered as a relevant factor in deciding what actions are morally justifiable. There is an important fallacy in this line of argument.

One conclusion of such argument is that it would perhaps be more justified to kill an animal painlessly to guard it against suffering by natural causes like disease-assuming of course that they are capable of suffering. (which we simply do not know either way in case of higher mammals at least)

There is nothing in the above argument that wouldn't apply to humans as well, even en masse and without their consent. Partly for this reason, it seems to me, The World concludes that suffering is not the right criterion. They propose the capacity to produce ideas and the uniqueness of the individual and its potential instead as the reason replacing the inducement of suffering.

I don't think this is the right conclusion.

Let's follow this argument. Whatever reason is given why idea creation is worthy of protection against extermination, the fact that we the idea creators are ourselves the results partly also of the actions of species in the past with complex nervous systems and brains could be seen as a proof that their use of their brain- and not just the information encoded in their genes- makes them worthy of the same protection. (after all that was the point of evolving brains in the first place. Genes alone couldn't handle the complexity of the environment efficiently enough). Even lower forms of life who are basically nothing but their genetic code, aren't they themselves each an embodiment of a separate idea?

Which leads to this idea: Natural selection works by killing as many such "ideas" as it can so only the fittest can survive. Why can't the same be applied to idea creators. Shouldn't we consider actually attempting to exterminate deliberately as many of them as we can to ensure only the fittest idea creators populate the future and so ensure substantially better quality ideas to be created by them? These assumptions also could lead to some conclusions you wouldn't like.

The similarity of the last quote is of course deliberate because the two lines of reasoning are very similar and both entail the same wrong idea. Mixing the immoral acts of nature with moral acts based on choice of self-conscious beings like us who can form sophisticated enough ideas including the concept of morality itself.

Ironically precisely because it is reasonable to argue that any being that is capable of suffering must be complex enough, to have a primitive kind of "mind", to be a self contained entity, "mentally" segregated from the rest of the world at least to some degree, that it is vulnerable to natural suffering. Eliminating that self-sustained system to end the suffering would place the actions done against it outside the domain of morality. It is not dissimilar to the case of a changing system. It must remain partly unchanged to be defined as a system in that context. So killing an entity to prevent it from natural suffering is not an option viable to moral questions and by the same token natural suffering is a necessary part of any being that can be the subject of moral study. Therefore the natural world is amoral and, so far as we can say, only human actions are prone to judgement by moral standards (but higher forms of animals could themselves be the subject of moral treatment without their actions being prone to moral judgement. In the latter sense they are part of the natural world.)

Interestingly ascribing moral value to natural acts is precisely what comprises the very essence of evil in the cultural and religious traditions handed in to us from antiquity. Satan for instance literally means the accuser, that is, the one who accuses the structure of reality as whole - God in symbolic religious jargon of you want- as being the ultimate evil and the only real cause of injustice. This leads almost immediately to concluding that even the worst kinds of deliberate criminal action is not only justifiable since it ends this suffering inherent in creation but actually has the highest moral value.

I think that is also what is lurking underneath all oppositions to free society and market economy who are adapted to the amoral natural state of "unfairness" by identifying it as moral vice. As it has been shown over and over again in history they end up justifying much more horrible deliberate crimes at the end...and for good reasons.

by AIS on Thu, 02/22/2007 - 03:28 | reply

Re: Naturally induced suffering irrelevant

the fact that we the idea creators are ourselves the results partly also of the actions of species in the past ... could be seen as a proof that their use of their brain ... makes them worthy of the same protection.

A species that has the potential to evolve into humanlike beings doesn't have the same moral status as human beings.

Why can't the same be applied to idea creators. Shouldn't we consider actually attempting to exterminate deliberately as many of them as we can to ensure only the fittest idea creators populate the future and so ensure substantially better quality ideas to be created by them?

Rather than murdering idea creators we simply 'kill' false ideas through criticism. For example, the idea that animals are aware of their pain or emotional status.

by the same token natural suffering is a necessary part of any being that can be the subject of moral study

Doesn't this imply that human suffering is inevitable? If so, can you give an example of a way of suffering which can't be avoided?

by Tom Robinson on Thu, 02/22/2007 - 06:55 | reply

Planned Obsolescence

When machines surpass humans in all capacities to generate new and fruitful ideas all individuals will be as irrelevant as a dog fur collar worn for fashion's sake.

Fear not this is only a intellectual theory based on the above debates and future machines will critique it better than any of us can at this point in time.

Of course it is possible that machines may grow to keep us for other reasons than our crudely formed reasoning minds.

by a reader on Thu, 02/22/2007 - 22:45 | reply

Murder is Easier

Rather than murdering idea creators we simply 'kill' false ideas through criticism.

Tom Robinson

Let's assume for a moment that it is very likely that a person will continue to generate unproductive and wrong ideas (say he has a worsening condition like Alzheimers).

Wouldn't it be cheaper (and more ethically justified) just to kill him, instead of wasting valuable time and energy on killing his ideas and feeding him?

And if future machines are predictably better idea generators than we are, why shouldn't they exterminate all of us biological creatures. Their ethical justification would be to help their machine descendants to be exposed to better ideas. Survival of the fittest?

by a reader on Fri, 02/23/2007 - 17:21 | reply

A few points

1. Granted animals are not the same as humans. But to suggest that animals have no rights whatsoever seems a bit extreme, since this suggests there is no limit at all to what people should be able to do to animals. Should people be able to torture dogs just for fun, for example? I would think the answer to such questions, as some have suggested above, depends on whether animals are capable of real suffering and on whether this suffering is comparable to how a human suffers. This is an important philosophical question which is often ignored, both by animal rights activists (they simply take it for granted animals feel pain just as humans do) and by animal rights cynics (such as the post above which is only interested in animals' ideas and not in the question of whether animals can suffer).

2. To claim that laws against murder exist to protect the free development of ideas is not only very rare, but also, it seems to me, very odd. Surely, humans have some kind of intrinsic value and right to life (or at least so we assume) apart from the use of humans as a means to something else (i.e. the creation of ideas useful for other people). So, even if it can be proven that some person can never have any useful ideas, surely that in no way diminishes his right not to be killed.

3. What in fact is the argument for the assumption that ideas and knowledge play such a prime role in morality and existence? What about other factors, such as happiness? For example, is not a culture with decent happy people who do not make any advancement for hundreds of years better off than a culture with unhappy people who create a lot of technological inventions? Is creation really the only or main object of human life? Why?

4. David's argument that if animal's suffering is bad, and if an animal suffers when it dies, it would be bad to breed animals, seems incorrect. It would seem more logical to balance an animal's suffering against its experience of pleasure. If an animal enjoys more pleasure than pain during his life, then one might argue that animal's life is a good thing, and if the pain is more than the pleasure its life would be a bad thing. (This is ignoring any value animals might have for humans, but that's a different issue.)

5. I think the main reason it's ok to kill an animal (at least painlessly) is that an animal does not foresee its own death. So for an animal it's not really a terrible experience to be killed. For humans it is, because they suffer by the knowledge that they will die. Also, a human's life has continuity. For a human it is important to finish certain projects, such as learning as much as possible, seeing his kids and grandkids grow up, etc. For an animal it doesn't work that way. Also, when a human is killed his friends and family suffer, whereas for animals I would think that is not (or much less) the case. As for the question of causing unnecessary pain to animals, I think the extent to which that should be legal depends, as said above, on the question to what extent different kinds of animals can genuinely suffer. And I think we do not yet know the answer to that question, but it is important to think about that. In any case, I do think that even if animals can suffer that is of less intensity and importance than humans suffering. And animal suffering can be justified at least partially to the extent that it helps humans (i.e. cure disease, provide food and fur, etc.).

6. The notion that one can "prove" that animals just have no rights is scientism. We have to argue about what is the best way to treat animals legally and otherwise, and one can't evade that question by some pseudologic reasoning. Rights are not objective natural "things", but rather are a human invention, a tool used to discuss and describe moral reasoning and moral conclusions.

Henry Sturman

by Henry Sturman on Sat, 02/24/2007 - 04:30 | reply

Dog Torture

Should people be able to torture dogs just for fun, for example?

Torturing dogs is not fun. So how could a person torture dogs for the fun of it? Why are you worried that someone would?

I see that an irrational person could have a dog hurting ritual. One reason this should be stopped is because it is hurting the human. That is enough reason.

That's the moral aspect. There's also the law. Should this irrational person be jailed for hurting himself and destroying his own property? No more than I should be jailed for destroying my Cinema Display (which is much nicer than a dog).

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Sat, 02/24/2007 - 08:09 | reply

Avoidable?

Tom,

A species that has the potential to evolve into humanlike beings doesn't have the same moral status as human beings.

I did not say that it does. The question was would they have any moral status at all?

Rather than murdering idea creators we simply 'kill' false ideas through criticism.

Sure, but that does not explain why the other alternative is wrong, as in killing a human being is wrong, except as a necessary consequence of defending another human being.

To say any idea can prove to have merits that are not recognized does not really provide a justification. even in the most non-violent and fair traditions there is limits of efficiency, many ideas could be forgotten only to be discovered later when their time has come (so to speak). So one can argue if an idea has merit it will eventually come up and be accepted once the need for it arises. So- it could be argued- what's the big deal? Why spend so much time and energy to ensure non-violence and idea preservation?

Harsh natural selection in the most brutal fashion could still be viewed by some to be as efficient a tool as any other in getting the meritorious ideas out and distinguishing them from the not-meritorious ones by speeding up the need for them. I still think this approach can't really provide a moral basis

...can you give an example of a way of suffering which can't be avoided?

What do you mean by being avoided? I guess any particular event that causes suffering is in principle avoidable (even death I guess, once technology advances that far.)

But in practice how can every single one of them be avoided by pre-planning for every single individual at all times? Accidents happen and new forms of problems emerge by necessity and the unknown will always remain there. At any given time and for any given individual there are myriads of things that can and will cause him/her suffering even if all of them were in principle avoidable by itself. (Not to say that an individual who is so sheltered never to be challenged enough to risk suffering won't produce any interesting ideas after a while either.)

by AIS on Sun, 02/25/2007 - 01:35 | reply

Uniqueness

AIS wrote:

Let's follow this argument. Whatever reason is given why idea creation is worthy of protection against extermination, the fact that we the idea creators are ourselves the results partly also of the actions of species in the past with complex nervous systems and brains could be seen as a proof that their use of their brain- and not just the information encoded in their genes- makes them worthy of the same protection. (after all that was the point of evolving brains in the first place. Genes alone couldn't handle the complexity of the environment efficiently enough). Even lower forms of life who are basically nothing but their genetic code, aren't they themselves each an embodiment of a separate idea?

The point of evolving brains was to process information quickly according to particular set theories contained in their genes. For example, a beaver's brain processes information about where logs are how a particular log should be carved so that it fits into his dam and so on. But the beaver can't understand how to make a dam from other materials. His theories on how to ake a dam are fixed by his genes and don't change. As such, he is interchangeable with other beavers.

As for the assertion that a given worm, Fred, is unique this seems obviously false. The information on how to make any given worm is contained in worm genes, so we can make a worm that is identical to Fred in every respect through genetic engineering.

by Alan Forrester on Sun, 02/25/2007 - 16:14 | reply

Happiness and Knowledge

Henry Sturman wrote:

1. Granted animals are not the same as humans. But to suggest that animals have no rights whatsoever seems a bit extreme, since this suggests there is no limit at all to what people should be able to do to animals. Should people be able to torture dogs just for fun, for example? I would think the answer to such questions, as some have suggested above, depends on whether animals are capable of real suffering and on whether this suffering is comparable to how a human suffers. This is an important philosophical question which is often ignored, both by animal rights activists (they simply take it for granted animals feel pain just as humans do) and by animal rights cynics (such as the post above which is only interested in animals' ideas and not in the question of whether animals can suffer).

Let's take it as given that we don't know whether animals suffer or not and are unlikely to learn at any point in the near future. Let's also take for granted the idea that animals can suffer in the service of making you criticism of the post as strong as possible. So we have to take actions that we think are likely to reduce suffering, such as only killing dogs for fur under general anesthetic or something like that. We would also presumably prevent people from torturing animals. But by the same token we might consider it right to do things that we know will make animals suffer in the interests of preventing avoidable human suffering, e.g. - testing medicine on animals. And human suffering would still rank above animal suffering since it would also inhibit the growth of knowledge.

2. To claim that laws against murder exist to protect the free development of ideas is not only very rare, but also, it seems to me, very odd. Surely, humans have some kind of intrinsic value and right to life (or at least so we assume) apart from the use of humans as a means to something else (i.e. the creation of ideas useful for other people). So, even if it can be proven that some person can never have any useful ideas, surely that in no way diminishes his right not to be killed.

The first point that you think there is some transcendent value in a human being above and beyond ideas is unanswerable as it stands as you have not explained what you think that value consists of. When you come up with a theory we can discuss it until then I have no reason to change my position. As for the second point: how can we be sure that a person can never have any useful ideas unless he is completely brain dead? Nobody is psychic and so nobody has access to another person's ideas. Consider a homeless drug addict who roots through bins for food. Perhaps he will learn that what is doing is not a very good idea and will become a better person and develop new knowledge about how and why people end up in such distressing circumstances.

3. What in fact is the argument for the assumption that ideas and knowledge play such a prime role in morality and existence? What about other factors, such as happiness? For example, is not a culture with decent happy people who do not make any advancement for hundreds of years better off than a culture with unhappy people who create a lot of technological inventions? Is creation really the only or main object of human life? Why?

Let's suppose that totally uncreative people can be happy. I think this is a dubious proposition, but let's grant it anyway. Well, their happiness can only consist of psychological feelings generated according to a fixed set of ideas, dispositions, feelings and so on. Because they generate no new knowledge their influence on the rest of the world will be finite and indeed sooner or later their civilisation will be totally destroyed by something that catches them by surprise, e.g. - the Sun will undergo enormous changes in a few billion years that will make Earth uninhabitable for human life. So their lives will consist of pushing a finite set of buttons for pleasure for a finite time, after which they will all die and no new people of that type will ever exist again. They will also be stuck with a finite set of buttons to push to get themselves out of unhappy states and it is a lot easier to get things wrong and be unhappy than to get them right and be happy. So if a person gets in an unhappy state and pushes all the buttons and stays unhappy then he is stuck in a polluted waterway without any means of propulsion.

Now consider a culture that grows new knowledge. First, each time they invent a new idea or technowhatsit they have to consider their new situation to be better than the old one or they would scrap the new idea or technowhatsit. The growth of knowledge is potentially open-ended so they could have an infinite number of such improvements. Furthermore they will become happy in new ways that don't involve pushing the finite buttons on the pleasure machine in their genes and their current ideas. For example, quantum theory is a lot cooler than classical physics and makes people who understand it happy in a way that somebody who doesn't understand quantum physics won't understand. So I don't think it can be true that everyone in a culture that is growing knowledge is unhappy. And the unhappy people will have more chances to make themselves happy than they can possibly explore.

Now let's return to the culture that doesn't grow knowledge. Knowledge can grow by accident: a person can make a mistake and then decide it is an improvement. For example, a person can mispronounce some word and find the result funny or illuminating. Perhaps this is how Freud came up with his psychological theories and I have little doubt that lots of jokes come from this process. And then of course there is the famous story of how Alexander Fleming discovered penicillin, how Roentgen discovered X-rays and so on. With finite knowledge mistakes are bound to be made and some will be regarded as improvements by those who make them? So where does this new knowledge go? The only answer can be somebody has to deliberately squash it, which will make its originator unhappy. So I don't think a culture that fails to generate knowledge can be a happy place.

by Alan Forrester on Sun, 02/25/2007 - 17:11 | reply

How did it get there?

Alan,

Let's forget about the worm, but how do you think the information to make a dam got into the beaver's genes?

If you go enough back in the line that led to beavers you'll get a point where no dam building information was coded.

How did it get there?

How could it ever have got there if, as you say, every member of all the species in that line were always interchangeable to each other given all the changes of their environments and the emerging threats to their survivals?

by AIS on Sun, 02/25/2007 - 20:43 | reply

By Accident

How did genes enabling dams to be built become incorporated into beavers?

A descendant of beavers had a series of genes that mutated. In a given environment, these genes increased the frequency of dam-creating behaviors which helped the organism to survive. So the behaviors were selected for and therefore genes promoting those behaviors were selected for, as well.

An idea, namely that building dams is sometimes useful, was created by accident by evolution, but it was nonetheless an interesting idea.

So the evolutionary process generates ideas, and this argues that evolutionary processes should be protected and respected. And the growth of ideas and anything that generates them should be protected -- including animals species' as a whole.

This could imply that the beaver species should be protected, because it evolves, but it (unfortunately) does not argue that any given beaver should be protected. My intuition tells me that a given beaver should have some protection if in the hands of a human (e.g. protection from torture).

AIS can you help me formulate an argument as to why an individual beaver, as opposed to animals as a whole, should be protected, at least to some extent?

To those who would give an individual higher mammal no rights at all, I don't need to be reminded that humans should have considerably more rights. That is obvious to me.

I'm wondering why it is ethically wrong to torture an individual beaver, or for that matter an elephant or a primate, if it gives a human being pleasure to do so? Why do we (in my view appropriately) react with revulsion to the sight of a higher mammal being tortured?

by a reader on Mon, 02/26/2007 - 16:57 | reply

Moral judgements precede preferences

why it is ethically wrong to torture an individual beaver, or for that matter an elephant or a primate, if it gives a human being pleasure to do so?

I think that there's a false premise implicit in that question. It is that preferences precede moral judgements. In other words, preferences are a given, a parameter to be input into our moral theories, which then produce an output such as: yes, you may do it if it gives you pleasure, or no you may not do it even if it gives you pleasure. And it's true that moral theories may sometimes have such implications. But that conceals the more important underlying fact that in reality, how much we are pleased or repelled by doing a thing depends on how we judge it morally. For a human, the moral judgement precedes the preference.

That is, I think, why Elliot was asking above why a person would want to torture an animal. Asking whether they 'would be right to do it if they took pleasure in it' may not make sense in the absence of a clear theory of why they might be right to take pleasure in it.

by David Deutsch on Mon, 02/26/2007 - 18:05 | reply

Autonomy and Happiness -- Important Principles

"Asking whether they 'would be right to do it if they took pleasure in it' may not make sense in the absence of a clear theory of why they might be right to take pleasure in it"

Human happiness is an ethical value in its own right and human autonomy is also an ethical value. People often honor others' preferences, by allowing them to pursue actions in pursuit of their preferences, because doing so often increases human freedom and joy. Morality is often, but not always, increased when human freedom is increased.

A person may believe that his happiness and autonomy are increased by folding and unfolding a piece of paper 3 times and/or by torturing an animal. If no other more important ethical principles are violated, I am disinclined to try to discourage someone from folding and unfolding a piece of paper three times, if paper-folding seems to cause broad smiles after the creases are made. The folder's happiness and freedom from coercion are important ethical values to me.

On the other hand, if someone were to torture a Bonobo (intelligent primate) or an elephant, or even when natural phenomena injure these animals, I become upset.

The fact that I become upset in either case means that I must believe that intelligent mammals have some right not to be injured, unless other more important principles are violated in protecting them. Somehow the right of a torturer to autonomy and short-lived happiness does not seem to me sufficient to justify intentionally injuring an intelligent mammal, unless there are more compelling ethical principles involved.

But it is not obvious to me why I want to give an individual elephant at least a few rights to protection, even if it violates a torturer's ethical right to pursue worthy goals like increasing his own autonomous action and happiness. I was asking AIS or someone else to help me formulate why an individual intelligent mammal, like an elephant, should have some protection from people and even natural phenomena, unless more important and relevant human values are compromised.

by a reader on Mon, 02/26/2007 - 19:59 | reply

One Little Thing

This isn't the whole answer, but: neither repeated paper folder nor elephant torture are much fun. If my friend was doing either, I'd be strongly inclined to discourage him from continuing. That doesn't mean psychological pressure, or force, only advice. I don't see any basis for choosing one or the other extreme: leave them to rot, or feel force is OK.

One consequence of this is that he may voluntarily change his behavior to something that he (now) considers better. That's a result we can all applaud.

Another is that he may engage in rational discussion, and give reasons for what he does. If so, I can argue with him. Then one of us may be persuaded by the other, and we'll all agree and be happy. And if no one is persuaded, that's OK too: I'll be content not to use force knowing my weak arguments that failed to persuade are a very poor justification for using force. And I won't feel bad, because I will have a way forward, a path available to make progress: all I have to do is improve my arguments.

That's a wonderful path because it has the happy consequence that the more I progress along that path, the more I'm creating the chance that if I actually was mistaken for some reason, I'd find out.

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 02/27/2007 - 21:25 | reply

individual higher animals

One of the reasons I chose beaver over a worm was that this genetic information concerns behaviour of the animal. My point is the mutant individual is therefor a bit different than all the other ones. Also it is the change in environment that distinguishes a "mutant" from the rest. (there are many "irrelevant mutations" going around. Also in higher mammals the differences ultimately can concern behaviours. I guess that means that any individual of that animal can potentially be the one, or better said, be among the ones in consecutive generations who would bring about a behavioural change, a sort of very primitive "idea creator" of sorts. The best answer I can give would be something like this: I see morality a specifically human trait that need not, and IMO should not, be based on any more abstract and universal grounds than the specific features of us humans. Like say sexual drive. There is no need to search for it in the stars. We, through evolution, have acquired two features. One is that we have a developed notion of ourselves and this gives us a complicated instinct of self preservation that we could generalize, conceptualize and so on. The second is that we can put ourselves in another person's shoe and identify with him/her on an almost instinctive level. "Person" here would be anything that looks intelligent and anthropomorphic enough to our senses. The two together drive us towards an attitude to preserve the other (related to the idea of a "self" separated enough from the world to have independent existence) and also to reduce his/her suffering (related to the idea of a "self" complicated enough to actually suffer) as much as possible. We need to act this way to be whole and functioning to our best potential.

Now, in the absence of objective model of minds etc. and the possibility that higher mammals might actually suffer and be the way they look and tickle those instincts in us I think a case could be made against unnecessarily commit acts that could be torture and sources of suffering.

of course if we eventually manage to construct a good enough objective and scientific understanding of minds that are reliable (in the sense our best scientific theories are reliable at any given time) to be the basis of our judgements and if it so happens that that theory tells us that humans are alone in having such features, then this case shouldn't be considered as valid anymore no matter what our "instincts" continue to tell us.

I guess you can say that would define a certain category of rights for them: the right to not be potentially suffered for no good reason. But I am reluctant to talk about rights, because there are other categories of rights that have completely separate sources (like the right to not to be killed painlessly , as Dr. Deutsch pointed out) many of which are based on attributes that clearly only humans posses.

Besides rights and morality there is also the concept of compassion that although has overlaps with the other two (as they do with each other) should be considered independent from them too. But that's another story.

by AIS on Tue, 02/27/2007 - 23:38 | reply

Thanks

"...guess that means that any individual of that animal can potentially be the one, or better said, be among the ones in consecutive generations who would bring about a behavioural change, a sort of very primitive "idea creator" of sorts."

I think it is possible (but very very rare) that an individual animal (or an evolutionary process within an animal) creates a genuinely useful idea, but creativity is so rare that I find it hard to base a theory of animal protection based on it.

"Now, in the absence of objective model of minds etc. and the possibility that higher mammals might actually suffer and be the way they look and tickle those instincts in us I think a case could be made against unnecessarily commit acts that could be torture and sources of suffering."

So uncertainty about whether or not an individual animal has a very primitive consciousness, forces us to utilize our intuitions. Since higher mammals seem to "tickle those instincts" that make us believe that we are in the presence of a simple mind, we should protect animals to some extent, unless proven that there is no vestigial mind to protect.

OK. I'll buy that. I hope that you would add, however, that once it can be shown that a fully functioning mind is present, capable of genuine creativity, then such a being should have virtually absolute sorts of protections (for example, to life)

The fear is that if animals have some rights, and we have more because we are smarter, then more intelligent aliens than we, will be able to "ethically" take our rights, just as we take the primitive rights of animals if they conflict with ours.

Should there not be some absolute "cut-off", beyond which a being is said to be "fully conscious" and therefore entitled to a full spectrum of rights, for example the right to autonomous action?

by a reader on Thu, 03/01/2007 - 00:55 | reply

Cut Off

Should there not be some absolute "cut-off", beyond which a being is said to be "fully conscious" and therefore entitled to a full spectrum of rights, for example the right to autonomous action?

Yes. I believe There is. It is not just that we are more intelligent. It is much more than that. We have passed a critical point in which our intelligence is now of a different quality altogether. We are self-conscious entities and we have developed verbal abilities, we produce and enhance on abstract concepts and as the success of our scientific endeavours have shown we possess the ability to understand nature with basically limitless depth that far exceeds what was needed to survive in our immediate surroundings, and as such we are real and genuine 'idea creators' as The World points out.

As I said before that gives us rights of a completely different nature than what we have been discussing here.

by AIS on Sun, 03/04/2007 - 18:50 | reply

Other way around?

You wrote: "But that conceals the more important underlying fact that in reality, how much we are pleased or repelled by doing a thing depends on how we judge it morally."

Why isn't it the other way around? How we judge the morality of doing a thing depends on how much we (most of us in the human race) are pleased or repelled by it.

by a reader on Sat, 03/17/2007 - 00:51 | reply

Re: Other way around?

a reader asked:

Why isn't it the other way around? How we judge the morality of doing a thing depends on how much we (most of us in the human race) are pleased or repelled by it.

Say you are at a friend's house for dinner and he serves you a delicious stew. Halfway through, he informs you that the stew is made from the freshly-killed bodies of your arch-enemy's children.

Whether you are now pleased or repelled by the prospect of eating the second half of your dinner depends on your moral judgements. If you were raised in a culture in which revenge-cannibalism is deemed highly moral, and you agree with those values, you might well relish the second half even more than the first. If your moral stance is informed by Western values you might well be repelled by the second half - and acquire a want to rid yourself of the first half for good measure.

You are right that it is common for people to invent moral justifications after they have first decided what they want. But perhaps what has happened in such cases is that 'what they want' was itself determined by other moral values which, however, they want to shield from criticism (perhaps including their own) by denying that they exist. Then they can claim that the 'want' is just a brute fact, allegedly immutable, by which they cannot be judged or judge themselves. Thus, for instance, a wife-beater may first blame his wife, and if that argument seems to fail, he might fall back on blaming his rage, not his dehumanising opinions of the proper role of women. Yet without the latter opinions his rage might not even be present, or if it were, might result not only in different behaviours but in different wants.

Ideas have consequences!

Does that answer your question?

by Editor on Sun, 03/18/2007 - 05:30 | reply

When...

...dogs make themselves a society in which they can enumerate their rights, I'll recognize those rights. Until then, they're the bounty of the Earth and free for the taking as far as I'm concerned. Of course, if someone owns a dog it would be wrong to harm or interfere with that dog without their owner's consent, but if I ever own a dog, I shall do with it as I please. I happen to be rather fond of dogs in fact, so 'as I please' is unlikely to involve killing it. However, if someone else owns a dog and wants to kill it, I respect their right to do so.

Now, where did I put my seal-pup-skin slippers...

by The Cynical Libertarian on Sun, 03/18/2007 - 11:56 | reply

New or Unique?

Is it the creation of "new ideas" or "unique ideas" the criterion set forward by The World as the moral basis of not causing harm? These are different and could have different consequences.

In the examples examined in the post, it seems to me that The World is actually taking "unique ideas". This could be too strong. It could exclude, depending on what is thought to be unique, a sizable chunk of humanity.

On the other hand, "new ideas" would include machines running certain forms of intelligent programs.

Also, what does The World mean by "creating an idea"? Do you consider the expression of the idea in human-intelligible terms (e.g., language) part of the creation? If so, wouldn't that also exclude some members of the human kind?

-- Cyrus Ferdowsi, <http://libiran.blogspot.com>

by Liberal Iranian on Thu, 05/31/2007 - 09:01 | reply

Dogs don't suffer. It's a fact!

Dogs suffer less than people. It's a scientific fact. I don't know where I read that in a journal. But it doesn't matter because facts no longer matter. They said so on the 6 o'clock news. Facts are passé.

by a reader on Fri, 06/15/2007 - 07:37 | reply

Idea creation as a competitive goal

Although animals do not create ideas on the same level we do, there are some cases in which our interaction with animals seems to have driven them genetically to copy our ability to acquire behavior beyond genetic tendencies, and this could be considered a definition of an idea. This can work both ways: Dogs create ideas because their survival depends on helping us. Bears and tigers create ideas because their survival depends on hurting us.

You could argue what this means about how to treat bears and tigers, but as far as dogs it means they are, objectively, our friends, deserving of respect, and that torturing them is absolutely wrong.

by Collin on Tue, 10/16/2007 - 19:13 | reply

example?

can you give an example of an animal idea?

it should pass the test of being something we could not easily program our non-intelligent desktop computers to do.

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 10/16/2007 - 20:12 | reply

It is not the Issue, It is the "Activists" that bother me.

I am a mere laymen, but my issue with animal rights activists is the way they go about their cause, normally in a thrust in your face, bully-ish way. I can think of one example of being on the street as a "shopper" and stepping toward a certain company store, which, unbeknown to myself on that day, was selling real fur garments (I had, call me ignorant, just popped into town to have a look around, I had no intention of buying, it was more browsing). As I stepped into the entrance way, I was assaulted, and yes, I mean "assaulted" by a animal rights activist, who slapped an advert into my face, literally. I thought at first I was being mugged and got very flustered, in a ready to attack stance, only to realise that on this peice of paper was some issue to do with how fur was extracted from animals for clothing purposes. Now I am not being funny, I am an animal lover and have pets, and quite frankly I would happily see the abolishment on all cruelty, but it really incensed me that animal rights people think it is ok to slap humans while looking after their cause, they call this raising awareness. What did I do, on that occasion. Well, true to the human instincts of fight and flight that had kicked in, in a stance to relieve the tension, I tore up the paper and threw it back at the woman in disgust, who then, I heard, whilst walking away, said

" oh these people just don't care"

As I walked into the store I thought "we care enough but just not for your bullying ways in handling the matter." It actually has the opposite effect. I mean, why would anyone want to support them anyway, it is not the issue that puts people off but their behaviour in dealing with raising awareness to the public, and well they are just abusive. I can't support the hypocrisy of raise awareness through being cruel to stop cruelty. Bloody stupid people who are so mis informed and mis managed it beggers belief. I went into the store anyway, just to prove that point. When will they learn bullying people does not get you support.

by anon on Sun, 10/21/2007 - 21:23 | reply

Other Way Around (continued)

Do one's feelings help to (correctly) determine moral behavior or not?

"Say you are at a friend's house for dinner and he serves you a delicious stew. Halfway through, he informs you that the stew is made from the freshly-killed bodies of your arch-enemy's children."
Editors

Yes, one's ideas about the source of the meat do help to determine one's feelings about the morality of eating it and even one's feelings about the taste of the food.

Ideas, including ideas about morality, determine and should determine one's feelings about many things. But sometimes feelings provide valuable intuition about what is moral, when we lack the knowledge to formulate more definitive moral theories.

When we feel revulsion about eating the cooked bodies of dead children, and then the food tastes bad, our thoughts are determining our feelings.

But whether we are hungry before we eat often does determine whether the food tastes good. Our hungry feelings determine our thought that the food tastes good.

To deny that feelings of hunger influence the way the food tastes (and the way we formulate a moral theory that justifies the way we eat) denies that evolution, to some extent, created feelings in us to potentially guide rational thought and behavior. Our feelings of hunger and satisfaction from food evolved for a reason. Beings who tend to be more rational may tend to survive better in a variety of environments. It is therefore likely that evolution created in us a set of rational feelings (the feeling of hunger and the feeling of satisfaction when healthy) to guide and promote the formation of rational theories ("We ought to eat when hungry and we should eat well-balanced meals in order to feel good")

Now, one might claim that the existence of an evolutionary "reason" for the existence of feelings of hunger proves the editor's point that theories, explicit or not, determine the feelings we have about things.

And if our unconscious/inexplicit theories were made conscious and examined, then possibly we could make the most rational choice possible, now taking into account our previously unexamined inexplicit theories (This is so even if our inexplicit theories, once consciously evaluated, remain the source of our feeling states. We may feel good about doing something, but know that it is wrong and so choose to do the right thing).

Perhaps our conscious and unconscious theories can be reconciled and the best chosen. But even if possible, this is quite difficult and currently not realistic in many situations. But if we were perfectly able to do it, we would act on thought alone, and not on feeling. At the very least, our inexplicit thoughts (that determine our feelings) would be readily apparent to us.

Is it the editor's position that in the absence of full knowledge, we should never trust our gut feelings in helping to determine our moral positions? For example, our intuitions strongly tell most of us that some animals, for example dogs and especially higher primates have ideas -- but very primitive ones -- in addition to more highly developed feeling states. Is it the editor's opinion that unless we fully understand the origin of these intuitions and feelings in ourselves -- so that we can subject them to conscious criticism -- we should assume that our intuitions contain no truth about the likely mind-state of higher animals? So our sense that higher animal's suffer, somewhat as we do, should not be used to help guide rational decision making vis-a-vis animals?

Why can't our feelings of revulsion at the site of a screaming, tortured dog not be used to help guide us to want to stop the torture. Do we have to be sure this feeling of revulsion is completely rational first? It does sometimes seem that one's feelings can be a guide, albeit an imperfect one.

What do you think?

by a reader on Mon, 10/22/2007 - 22:23 | reply

"it should pass the test of b

"it should pass the test of being something we could not easily program our non-intelligent desktop computers to do."

What can humans do that can't easily be replicated by a computer program?

And how do you define "easily"?

by A Guest on Thu, 11/22/2007 - 18:38 | reply present day computer programs present day computer programs can barely walk or drive cars. humans can correct capitalization much better, and generally parse language better. and computers today don't understand natural language at all. humans are better at writing novels too. etc it isn't important how "easily" is defined, the point is we don't write AI programs today. if we can write a program to do something today, and especially if it's easy, then obviously that task doesn't require intelligence to do. it's mechanical. a mindless computer can do it.

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Fri, 11/23/2007 - 01:42 | reply

present day computer programmes

Its true that the present day Computers are there but they do not have the feelings like the humans and more over they always need command to execute a job.

by Max on Mon, 04/07/2008 - 15:04 | reply

The Sailors And The Holocaust

The affair of the 15 British sailors and Marines illegally captured and mistreated by Iran and then released has been a humiliation for Britain and the West, and a triumph for the Iranian regime and every other enemy of the West.

Clearly the British government is not claiming the moral high ground to which it is entitled. It is not demanding the trial and punishment of the perpetrators of the blatant war crime, nor reparations for the victims and for Britain itself. It is not behaving in any way like the wronged party. This stance implicitly, but unmistakably, legitimises Iran's actions and creates a new, more dangerous status quo.

We don't know what additional price was secretly paid, if any. But it seems plausible that, in some way or other, Britain conveyed to the Iranian regime that it will never use force against Iran under any circumstances. If so, this reverses Prime Minister Blair's official policy of not ruling out force. It is rumoured that only last year this policy was important enough to Mr Blair to cause him to sack the then Foreign Minister, Jack Straw.

What does all this have to do with the Holocaust? Only this: A reversal of that policy would translate into a British endorsement of the Iranian nuclear weapons programme. Hence it would be tantamount to condoning, and enabling, the Iranian regime's planned destruction of Israel and Second Holocaust.

Wed, 04/11/2007 - 16:41 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

The Holocaust

Iran's regime likes to deny the Holocaust for political reasons. Their ploy with the British sailors played true to form: tell the world about the generous and beneficent Iranian government, how well it treats those it captures although their country has been so unfairly vilified by "The West". The lesson is that Iran's government cares nothing for the reality of the situation, only for the propaganda opportunities of parading trite images before the world media.

Hitler's Germany understood this practice well. Neville Chamberlain and his ilk were easily deceived because they wanted the propaganda to be true. There is a lesson of history to be learned.

Propagandists require willing participants, willing skills and foils for their trite images to succeed.

The war journalist Martha Gellhorn wrote of her experiences upon entering Dachau shortly after Germany's surrender. Her experiences of the aftermath of Hitler's Germany as exemplified by the piles of dead and the ghosts of the living were real beyond anyone's imagination. Her cynical optimism for the future of the human species was forever quenched. She wrote a novel shortly thereafter, Point of No Return. The chief protagonist, a U.S. Army enlisted man, at the end of the story, the war over, intentionally drives his jeep into a small group of innocent German citizens, killing three. There is no moral of the story other than no German in peace is worth living after what they each had allowed their country in war to become.

It is only a novel. But her frame of mind was clear.

She never forgave the Germans, despite several visits well after the war had ended. She never saw hope for their recovery from the twin sins of obedience to authority or the cruel authority of rule. She forever after believed that the Germans by nationality, all of them, were beyond redemption. They were forever damned.

Is today's Iran the same as Nazi Germany, history again preparing to repeat itself? Is every Iranian as guilty by name and deed as their worst propagandist? Is every Iranian an obedient son or daughter or a cruel practitioner of the lie and the equivalent of a hobnailed boot? Is there any hope for the citizens of a country that would allow their leader to deny the Holocaust? At what point, if ever, is the Point of No Return?

And for England, too: where is the Point of No Return?

by a reader on Fri, 04/13/2007 - 03:04 | reply

twisted, dangerous, ugly thinking

"...by nationality, all of them, were beyond redemption. They were forever damned."

by a reader on Sat, 04/14/2007 - 16:58 | reply

liberationist interventionism good stuff. so what criteria do you use when deciding which places to invade, and how many innocent people are allowed to be killed before it stops? should "we" go into North Korea? Venezuela? Russia? England? America?

one problem with waging war is that it invariably increases the power of the state. does war ever serve any other function (aside from untold misery)?

what should policy towards Iran consist of? maybe leaving them well alone, for a start. the insane evil foreigner label is usually mistaken, but still, the possibility exists that a particular state will kill millions of people. forgive me if the previous century doesn't contain enough examples of this. all we can do is give any enemy as little reason to be evil as possible. i don't see that pretending to own the world is the best strategy for peace.

thanks.

by a reader on Wed, 04/25/2007 - 15:49 | reply

how many giving Iran "as little reason to be evil as possible" won't help us. they already have no reason to be evil; no one has such a reason. being evil is wrong.

some people want bad things. it is unacceptable to let them be and hope they choose not to hurt us, when we could defend ourselves. even if a war increases state power it is better than the giant risk of a tyrant using the weapons he goes to great lengths to build.

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 04/25/2007 - 22:48 | reply

but Elliot...

"even if a war increases state power it is better than the giant risk of a tyrant using the weapons he goes to great lengths to build." are you sure? what if others disagree? i'm not sure that a libertarian position is to force the state on people and then increase its size. i'm sure this has happened before...

how sure are you of this giant risk? who is being targeted anyway? assuming the threat is "real," is it entirely unrelated to the fact that America and co commit crimes of such great magnitude? and so, as a method of preventing an attack on America, should American violence in the Middle East stop, or increase?

everyone legitimises aggression as defence. why is it any different when the "defenders" are American? to ignore the consequences of America and co believing themselves to be the legitimate world police seems to me to be grossly mistaken. libertarians do not usually accept the lies told by their government.

so, why not nuke the whole of Iraq to make sure that nothing bad ever happens again? and Iran. and North Korea. and so on. this is the logical consequence of your position, is it not? "libertarians for war"?

perhaps you can give a few examples of previous interventions (mass state killings and the increase of state power) that have been both morally justified and successful. (e.g. WW2 being all Hitler's fault, etc)

by a reader on Thu, 04/26/2007 - 11:40 | reply

difference

what's the difference if it's American or Iran doing the attacking and calling it defense?

only one of these countries has elected officials that declare, in public, their genocidal intentions and desires.

who is targetted?

top targets are israel and USA. see for example the pictures here:

http://atlasshrugs2000.typepad.com/atlas_shrugs/2005/10/the_world_witho.html

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Thu, 04/26/2007 - 18:24 | reply

Answers

These words by Elliot are worth repeating:

giving Iran "as little reason to be evil as possible" won't help us. they already have no reason to be evil; no one has such a reason. being evil is wrong.

In response to some of a reader's questions:

Question 1)

assuming the threat is "real," is it entirely unrelated to the fact that America and co commit crimes of such great magnitude? and so, as a method of preventing an attack on America, should American violence in the Middle East stop, or increase?

What "crimes" and of what "magnitude" are you referring to? The daily tens of people killed in Iraq are not killed by Americans, nor are they Americans. They are ordinary Iraqis killed by criminal terrorists and co. Even the invasion of Iraq had a very temporary "increase" of American violence, and that only against Saddam's regime. The "American violence" today is directed against those who are disrupting the creation and the progress of a free and stable Iraq within some margin of error. The people of Iraq were and are not the target.

Question 2)

everyone legitimises aggression as defence. why is it any different when the "defenders" are American? to ignore the consequences of America and co believing themselves to be the legitimate world police seems to me to be grossly mistaken. libertarians do not usually accept the lies told by their government.

This has nothing to do with "Americans." It has to do with defending people's lives and freedoms. The police in a small city might also raid the criminals' command center. That the world does not (and with current conditions cannot) have a functioning and legally binding police force does not relieve the burden from the shoulders of the free nations of the world to act as one when and where they can and are morally bound to. Especially when and where the responsible "international" bodies fail to do so. Look at Darfur now. How long should we wait? Till the problem erases itself out?

Question 3)

so, why not nuke the whole of Iraq to make sure that nothing bad ever happens again? and Iran. and North Korea. and so on. this is the logical consequence of your position, is it not?

No it is not. The logic here is to protect people's lives and freedoms from those criminals who deny them these inalienable rights. Evidence: the basis and the practice of the political system, following discussions, stated goals and objectives, and the enacted policies of the major player in all this, i.e. the US. The logical consequence cannot be killing those same people -- that is the illogical consequence. You assume that the logic at work is instead an evil one that seeks to enslave other peoples for their resources etc. You are mistaken. I challenge you to present a coherent theory in support of this that would stand up to rational criticism.

-- Cyrus Ferdowsi, <http://libiran.blogspot.com>

by Liberal Iranian on Mon, 04/30/2007 - 09:23 | reply

Joe Republican And A Better World

Curi fisks a didactic leftist story by telling a better story.

Tue, 04/17/2007 - 22:10 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Dull Utopia Prospers

Steve and Joe and their poor liberal buddy seem to be cut from the same dull cloth. A better world has given them each their own country and let their ideas compete or maybe that is what Steve is trying to say in his libertarian didactic. Although Steve Lib is cocktail party boring in the same way as Joe Pub and Liberal-boy his ideas are much better, enviably so, say both Joe and Liberal-boy as they stare over their drinks and across the great capitalist divide. If only Steve would run for office he could be elected president of all the Republics. However Steve long ago had a better idea. He is now a multinationalist who trades across borders and with a skilled accountant on his payroll he successfully avoids paying taxes to anyone, even to himself. It is the best of all possible worlds.

by a reader on Wed, 04/18/2007 - 23:42 | reply

A Better Story

It is a better story and maybe someday with alot of practical hard work it can become real. It probably has to incubate first in a sparsely populated U.S. state, a minor eastern european country or a remote temperate atoll.

by a reader on Thu, 04/19/2007 - 01:49 | reply

Good stuff. I'd forgotten yo

Good stuff.

I'd forgotten you were libertarians!

by a reader on Sat, 04/21/2007 - 14:18 | reply

Popper vs Rand

A reader 01:49,

It would be great to see a truly Libertarian state. Please, however, let it be one that is inspired more by the philosophy of Karl Popper than by the philosophy of Ayn Rand. Rand's Objectivism seems to me to have fallen into the traps of inductivism and essentialism (to name but a few ism's), although it contains many good ideas about freedom, minimum state etc.

I would be interested to get the opinion of people here how an Objectivist-Libertarian state would compare to Popperian-Libertarian state. I suspect that because Objectivist philosophy is based on untruths that an Objectivist-Libertarian state would not be the sort of paradise Elliot imagines.

by Brian S on Mon, 04/23/2007 - 14:35 | reply

Not Quite True

1. "Competition Lowers Prices" -- Usually it does, unless there is predatory pricing. In these situations, wealthier firms lower prices below the cost of production, believing that they can survive the loss of money longer than their competitors. Once competitors are driven out of the market, prices then rise.

2. "Specialization Lowers Prices" -- Only up to a point. Otherwise any given individual would use his time in such a specialized way that he would do precisely one activity at work, not more than one. But this does not occur. Therefore, too much specialization raises prices, by increasing the number of people who need to interact to produce a product (too much specialization increases transaction cost).

3. "For every use of tax money that helps you (other) government expenditures....don't help you...Overall you lose."

It is humorous (and ironic) that libertarians think they know how to spend other people's money more efficiently than those spending it. The overwhelming majority of rich people will not vote for libertarian types of economic organization. And rich people pay the overwhelming majority of taxes. This means that rich people believe that certain types of charitable giving and economic organization are more efficiently produced by the government (there are many reasons for this).

And the fact that rich people do not usually support libertarian causes, yet libertarians try to convince rich people to do so, also implies that libertarians believe they know how to spend rich people's dollars more efficiently than those who spend it.

But of course it is usually libertarians who denigrate those favoring taxation, by claiming that those favoring taxation believe that they know how to spend other people's money better than those spending it.

So libertarians and those favoring taxation, to be fair, both believe that they know how to more efficiently spend the money of other people. A few goods are more efficiently produced by the government (certain types of charitable giving, military production, roads), and most by the free market.

4. Companies will be accountable, responsible, and pay regulators if customers will pay for those things.

Knowledge/information will be inefficiently underproduced in free-market economies because knowledge is costly to produce, yet it is very difficult to charge those using the knowledge the full benefit that they realize because of their use.

The inefficient under-creation of knowledge is like the inefficient underproduction of cars in certain societies that do not have an effective police force. If an automobile producer has to pay the full cost of producing an automobile, yet people can just take half of his new cars off of his car lot, automobile producers will produce fewer cars. In other words, cars will be inefficiently underproduced.

Likewise, in a pure free-market economy, knowledge will be inefficiently under-created, because others can simply use whatever knowledge is created, without having to pay for the research needed to create it. People "steal" knowledge in this way by simply telling each other about the knowledge. Since the relatively free distribution of knowledge should not be stopped in society, there is a role for government to subsidize the creation of knowledge, to compensate others for the cost of creating it, and to create the knowledge that helps virtually everyone. So there is a role, at the very least, for government to subsidize those firms that create knowledge about products, if the government does not fill this role itself.

5. "Benefits from employers come straight out of your wages." Not quite true, either. Depends upon the shape of supply and demand curves.

by a reader on Mon, 04/23/2007 - 17:19 | reply

Objectivism

For what it's worth I think very highly of Popper, and have mixed feelings about Rand. Rand's attitude (as expressed in her fiction) to selfishness and capitalism and individual responsibility has considerable merit. And her descriptions of what is despicable are perhaps even better. But Objectivism is not fallibilist and not fully coherent.

In the interest of discussing different libertarian attitudes: I think the wrong type of libertarianism is expressed in the Free State project. They want to get thousands of people to move to a state and vote the same way. They expect that because they are all libertarians, they will all agree what to vote. That is never going to work.

-- Elliot Temple
curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 04/23/2007 - 17:52 | reply

If Selfishness is Good....

If you believe selfishness is good, is altruism bad?

by a reader on Mon, 04/23/2007 - 18:32 | reply

Altruism

I believe altruism and self-sacrifice are bad.

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 04/23/2007 - 21:10 | reply

Altruism and Self-Sacrifice

Why is altruism bad?

by a reader on Mon, 04/23/2007 - 22:02 | reply

Altruism

I know far and away the most about myself and my preferences, and much less about those of other people. So I'm in the best position to help myself.

If someone can justify to me why helping them with something is worthwhile, then there is no need for altruism: trade will suffice.

If I like and value someone, say an excellent philosopher, and I give him money because I want to help him to write more, that is charity but it is not altruism: I'm doing it because I want to support things I value.

When it comes down to it, to be truly altruistic an action cannot benefit me. It means doing things I have no incentive to do; no matter how well I do them, my life will not improve.

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 04/23/2007 - 23:31 | reply

Re: Altruism

Elliot wrote:

When it comes down to it, to be truly altruistic an action cannot benefit me. It means doing things I have no incentive to do

But isn't it worse than that? If you think that an action is morally right, then (unless you are for some reason psychologically conflicted or irrational about it) you will choose to do it. In which case it does benefit you in the sense that counts: according to your own values. Hence an action taken wholeheartedly and in the belief that it is morally right, can never be altruistic. And I suppose that is the reason that altruism is basically immoral. (Though I would not go so far as to say it always is.)

by David Deutsch on Mon, 04/23/2007 - 23:48 | reply

A Beautiful Mind

If you read the history of this man carefully, or even if you don't, you'll see some very interesting and intricate mathematical adaptations of game theory that show that certain categories of altruistic practices benefit not only the group, but also the individual, improving chances for both individual and group success. Some forms of "altruism" seem to be built (evolved) into our bones.

Hey, even take the holocaust. Some individuals sheltered persons at great risk and no obvious benefit to themselves. Were they wrong to do this? No.

by a reader on Tue, 04/24/2007 - 00:02 | reply

Inefficient Knowledge Creation

What to do about the cheapness of making digital copies of books, music, movies, scientific papers, etc is an open problem. Concluding that therefore we need them to be funded involuntarily is absurd. For one thing, a libertarian society will have courts with standards of conduct similar to present day laws (unless and until they have an even better idea that actually works), so copyright can exist just as well as with government. And for another, pointing guns at people is hardly a solution to funding and is a recipe for funding things that should not be funded. Also a recipe for people being shot or scared.

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 04/24/2007 - 06:35 | reply

Re: Objectivism

Elliot,

I agree that Objectivism is not fully coherent. I still don't really understand how Objectivists justify induction from their Law of Identity! Like you, I find much merit in Rand's writings, but I wonder how the flaws of Objectivism would expose themselves in an Objectivist society.

Even though many Objectivists seem to misunderstand Popper (for example, this), they are not shy in criticising him. Now I accept that some of the criticism of Popper is valid - he was fallible after all and his social engineering is highly questionable - but by denying Critical Rationalism, Objectivists deny our best theory of knowledge creation and this can only be bad for libertarianism.

by Brian S on Tue, 04/24/2007 - 11:47 | reply

Altruism

David,

I think I must be misunderstanding you.

If an adult sacrifices his life to save the lives of 3 children, do you consider this an altruistic act?

If you do, why is it wrong?

If you don't, then are you saying sacrificing ones life for children is selfish because it is acting in a way that is consistent with the moral values of the individual making the sacrifice?

by a reader on Tue, 04/24/2007 - 13:36 | reply

Who is Pointing the Gun?

"And for another, pointing guns at people is hardly a solution to funding and is a recipe for funding things that should not be funded. Also a recipe for people being shot or scared."

I assume that by "pointing guns" you mean using voting to decide the appropriate amount of funding for certain goods like funding for research, expenditures for the military, production of roads, and funding for charitable giving. The overwhelming majority of rich people (and the rest of the country) will not vote for libertarian systems of economic and governmental organization. People (even the rich) favor utilizing democratic rule in many situations. So the people who pay most of the taxes (the rich) must "want" to have a "gun" pointed at their head to have money "involuntarily" taken from them, because they consistently vote for democracy!

More likely, Americans and other free people perceive that libertarian forms of economic organization are so inefficient at providing certain goods and at providing morally acceptable societal outcomes, that those advocating such an awful politico-economic system, are perceived as trying to point guns at the rest of us!

by a reader on Tue, 04/24/2007 - 14:54 | reply

Re: Who is Pointing the Gun?

Americans and other free people perceive that libertarian forms of economic organization are so inefficient

Not long ago, those free peoples voted in election after election for Keynesian economic policies. Does that mean that they 'perceived' that the present non-Keynesian form of economic organisation is inefficient?

Surely it doesn't make sense to counter a minority opinion that more freedom is needed, with the argument that it is a minority opinion and therefore the freedom in question is not needed.

by David Deutsch on Tue, 04/24/2007 - 16:55 | reply

Re: Who is Pointing the Gun?

A reader 14:54,

Try not paying your taxes and you will find out what Elliot means. It seems to have escaped your attention that rich people go to considerable lengths to minimise their tax liability. And that despite this, rich people contribute enormous amounts on a voluntary basis to charity.

by Brian S on Tue, 04/24/2007 - 17:05 | reply

Less Freedom?

"Surely it doesn't make sense to counter a minority opinion that more freedom is needed, with the argument that it is a minority opinion and therefore the freedom in question is not needed."

If libertarian economic organization is inefficient at providing certain types of needed goods (the military, roads, certain types of charitable giving), while democratic processes lead to more efficient results, then the libertarian strategy takes money from people, involuntarily. And taking money from people is wrong.

People therefore voluntarily choose democratic processes to settle certain of their differences because they believe it maximizes their economic choices and therefore their freedom.

Therefore, it should not be surprising that the majority of free people support democracy, and not exclusively libertarian policies. Given the effectiveness of democratic political processes, it should not even be surprising that the wealthiest are prepared to finance this productive enterprise, with their taxes.

by a reader on Wed, 04/25/2007 - 00:37 | reply

Voluntarism

Suppose that democracies produce more wealth than voluntarist societies by forcing people to do productive things they would otherwise irrationally refuse to do (or refuse due to the logic of public goods or some such).

Does it then follow that voluntarist societies take money away from people which they would otherwise have, and is thus forces them to be poorer by not allowing them to do what would make them richest?

Let me restate the problem.

Consider a business venture to produce widgets. Jack has the idea of how to do it, and it will make billions of dollars. He just needs a bit of capital to get started, so he asks Sue for a loan. Sue refuses.

In a voluntarist society, trades only take place when all parties wish them to. Jack will have to persuade someone to help with his widgets, or provide his own starting capital. He might fail to do those things and remain poor even if his widget idea is excellent.

Contrariwise, in the sort of society you advocate, Sue could be forced (by majority vote, or by laws of officials already elected by vote) to loan money to Jack. This, you say, saves Jack from being forced to be poor, and forced not to produce widgets.

Sue can be forced to give the loan, which she does not want, or Jack can be forced not to have a loan, which he does not want. There is symmetry.

So, there is no such thing as a way to proceed in which no one is forced. There is no such thing as a voluntary society. There is only such thing as a society which is in denial about its use of force.

But there's more. Sue would end up with more money if she gave the loan, so she really has nothing to lose, and is therefore acting perversely. Her refusal to help both of them is actually the most violent and hateful act being considered, and is therefore the one that should not be allowed.

Is that, roughly, what you believe?

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 04/25/2007 - 01:41 | reply

Are democracies better producers of public goods?

1) To posit that democracies are better at producing public goods as a mere hypothetical, then observe that popular behavior indicates that the hypothetical is widely-believed to be true, does not establish the truth of the hypothetical. What evidence is there that democracies are better producers of public goods than the free market? None that I'm aware of, even for military defense.

2) If X really is a public good, and this public goods problem is insurmountable by the free market, and the benefit of the public good would exceed the cost of coercive production of that public good, that still doesn't solve the public goods problem, because coercive production of public goods is also a public good. Why should the public good of coercive production of, say, public roads, be any less insurmountable than free-market production of public roads? The infinite regress problem is what's really insurmountable.

3) My favorite analogy to the public goods rationale for coercion: Suppose Joe wants to have sex with Sue, but Sue doesn't want to. But Joe would benefit more from having sex with Sue than it would cost her, so Sue ought to be forced to have sex with Joe...

Tim Starr

Fight for Liberty!

<http://groups.yahoo.com/group/fightforliberty/>

by Tim Starr on Wed, 04/25/2007 - 20:34 | reply

Sue and Joe Sex

Let's say Sue is not forced to have sex with Joe. Joe wants to have sex with Sue but Sue is not convinced by the best of arguments to have sex with Joe. In a society of two, Sue and Joe both libertarians, do not procreate and the society dies out. This is not an argument for coerced sex. It is however the fact of what happens to a public good when pure libertarian ideals are enforced by the libertarians themselves.

by a reader on Thu, 04/26/2007 - 16:17 | reply

society of 2

in a society of 2, the overwhelming issue wrt having sex is whether they wish to create children. so if sue doesn't want to, it will be because she wants society to die out, or has a reason that something else is the best way to make society continue on.

it's easy to disregard disagreement as nonsensical when you don't think about why people hold their opinions.

it is also possible that sue has a very bad or nonsensical reason. but in that case persuading her of a better idea is easy. the worse sue's present idea, the easier persuasion is.

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Thu, 04/26/2007 - 18:13 | reply

Who Stops Rape?

"What evidence is there that democracies are better producers of public goods than the free market? None that I'm aware of, even for military defense."

3) My favorite analogy to the public goods rationale for coercion: Suppose Joe wants to have sex with Sue, but Sue doesn't want to. But Joe would benefit more from having sex with Sue than it would cost her, so Sue ought to be forced to have sex with Joe..."

Tim Starr

In a society of millions, it is very expensive for a given individual to convince everyone that a given law is correct, even though virtually everyone wants laws that must apply to everyone. Since the cost of creating a law that everyone publically agrees to is concentrated on the people trying to get everyone's consent, and the benefits are diffuse in society, the law itself is a public good. And it will be virtually impossible to create unanimous consent (for any law whatsoever) because of the selfish incentive of some to lie about their preferences, in order to make money from those libertarians so enamored of consent, that they must pay off those who disagree to get them to change their mind.

Therefore, if Tim does not believe in government production of public goods (like the laws of America and England), then he must logically not believe in the public production of the law itself, because it is the fundamental public good. And so he must logically believe that laws should only apply to those who voluntarily consent to them.

Therefore a law prohibiting rape will not apply to a rapist, who by definition does not voluntarily submit to the law. So contrary to what Tim says, libertarianism logically permits rape, even though the overwhelming majority of libertarians are opposed to it.

So what does stop rape? Certainly not libertarian principles, which logically permit it.

The overwhelming majority of citizens know that rape is wrong. Our moral compass is so clear on this that we vote to outlaw rape, regardless of what the minority thinks, and then use the coercive power of the state to force any rapist who disagrees with us to do what we want. This is democracy in action.

by a reader on Thu, 04/26/2007 - 22:03 | reply

A brief history of morality (Was: Altruism)

a reader asked:

If an adult sacrifices his life to save the lives of 3 children, do you consider this an altruistic act?

If you do, why is it wrong?

If you don't, then are you saying sacrificing ones life for children is selfish because it is acting in a way that is consistent with the moral values of the individual making the sacrifice?

It's hard to answer that because the word 'altruism' is, in our culture, used in two different senses, one factual and one moral, and it's customary to equivocate heavily between them. So I'll have to answer by giving a brief history of morality.

I think that the story so far is something like this:

In primitive societies, moral behaviour was conceived of as being obedience to the authority of the ruler, the priest, the parent and the traditional taboo. Moral rightness could therefore be defined as the degree to which one sacrificed one's own welfare for the sake of such duties. In the West, when Christianity came along, this conception of morality was overlaid (but in no way replaced) by the idea of a religious duty of self-sacrifice for the benefit of other people – also known as altruism. Unlike the old duties, this new duty was almost never enacted. But by serving as a universal unattained standard, it helped to create a state of mind dominated by guilt, fear, self-loathing, lack of self-confidence, pathological selfishness, and self-sacrifice, all of which stabilised society. But it was an unimaginably bad society, by our standards.

Then came the Enlightenment, with its principled scepticism, hostility to authority both secular and religious, and celebration of the value of individual human beings. Rejecting the arbitrary and overtly irrational elements of previous moral philosophy, Enlightenment thinkers swept away the idea that morality was based on obedience or duty. But even though many of them were atheists or agnostics, they were still Christians at heart, and it did not occur to them to question the identification of morality with altruism. Thus they arrived at utilitarianism:

In the sphere of individual decisions affecting only oneself, altruism is irrelevant to utilitarian considerations, and utilitarianism amounted to 'do what you like'. This does not assert anything positive: It must immediately be followed by, but inherently cannot answer, the question 'thank you, but what should I like? What would it be best for me to strive for?'. But it was invaluable in its day simply for contradicting earlier conceptions of what constituted right behaviour in the individual domain, and by extension, in the domain of mutually consenting interactions between people. In those areas there was no longer any way of defending an exhortation to sacrifice oneself for some supposedly transcendent purpose. All that mattered was that the preferences of individual human beings be satisfied.

But in regard to society as a whole, and the relationship between it and the individual, utilitarianism floundered a bit. A doctrine of inviolable human rights was developed to protect that domain of individual and mutually consenting interactions. But beyond that, the best that utilitarianism could come up with was the maxim of 'the greatest good for the greatest number'. This suffered from all the lack of content of the individual version, plus the irremediable problem of the inter-subjective comparison of utilities (what is the 'good' of more than one person?). And, given the previous history, it was taken for granted that what this means in practice is: it is right to sacrifice oneself, and others, for the greatest good of the greatest number. One's own welfare is technically included in this 'good of the greatest number', but when the numbers in question are in the millions and billions, that makes no practical difference whatsoever.

Again, these values were virtually never enacted by anyone, but the real effect of their adoption was to continue to cause those same old pathological states of mind which stabilised the remaining moral traditions of obedience and duty. These were now increasingly confined to obedience and duty to the state. People were then ready, intellectually and psychologically, for totalitarianism and socialism.

Totalitarianism, and to a lesser extent socialism, acquired poor reputations during the twentieth century. (Totalitarianism because it led so reliably to mass murders, and socialism because of its failure ever to achieve prosperity, and because of the relative success of 'capitalist' economic systems.) But the underlying morality that led to them both is still largely unchanged and unchallenged (Randians are an honourable exception, but their philosophy has its own problems that inhibit its widespread adoption), and so many forms of both are still popular under other names, such as environmentalism, and under disguised forms of the same moral justifications, such as the 'public good problem'.

And that brings us to the present day.

by David Deutsch on Sat, 04/28/2007 - 11:20 | reply

Public Goods

Would you elaborate on how public good problems are implicitly based in utilitarian thinking?

Why is 'capitalist' in quotes?

-- Elliot Temple
curi@curi.us
Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Sat, 04/28/2007 - 19:57 | reply

Public Goods

In what sense is the belief in the existence of public good problems a form of belief in totalitarianism or socialism?

by a reader on Sat, 04/28/2007 - 23:52 | reply

Re: Public Goods

how public good problems are implicitly based in utilitarian thinking

For instance, a person who conceived of morality in terms of obedience, religious or other duty, or human rights, would not consider it a problem that some economic system does not always achieve the greatest good of the greatest number (or even the greatest good of every individual) in every transaction.

In what sense is the belief in the existence of public good problems a form of belief in totalitarianism or socialism?

None.

by David Deutsch on Sun, 04/29/2007 - 00:15 | reply

Greatest Amount

When considering the "greatest amount of good possible" (for greatest number, or not, never mind that), if we take into account that we are looking at the overall effects of a system, then if we do conclude a system doesn't have that property, we know it could be improved upon.

And if we know a specific area where the greatest good is not being achieved, then we should perhaps consider suggestions about how to treat that situation differently. Especially if it is a property of our system that it can never achieve the greatest good in an entire category of situations.

I'm not saying any of the above is true of capitalism. But it is a view someone could take about capitalism that could describe their opinion on public good problems but does not obviously contain utilitarian assumptions.

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Sun, 04/29/2007 - 02:42 | reply

Simply

So for someone who likes their assumptions in small doses and simply stated, how does altruism in the utilitarian sense (beyond the old saw of god and country) serve the greater good?

Is altruism only a vestigial evolutionary appendage of our cultural past?

My best guess is that no system theory yet fully explains away the greater good of an altruistic act (often committed without deep aforethought to its likely effect of a greater good).

I abhor systems in practice. Obeyed, they decay and stratify into old weathered icons like statues to the gods. In theory, however, some are just fine as working models of almost perfection.

Still, altruism in the individual state continues to live on.

by a reader on Sun, 04/29/2007 - 14:42 | reply

Benefits of Voting for Enforced Contracts

"But there's more. Sue would end up with more money if she gave the loan, so she really has nothing to lose, and is therefore acting perversely."

Elliot, this really does not capture the argument.

There are two separate steps that one needs to understand, before one understands the usefulness of democracy.

1. People can unanimously agree in their own minds that they want to do something to get something; and also all agree to have themselves held responsible for doing what they have obligated themselves to do. A person may agree to something in exchange for everyone else being obligated to do what he promises, as well. In some cases 100% of people may vote to do something AND rationally vote for enforcement of the agreement.

2. Once the rationality for unanimous voting in favor of enforcement of contracts is understood, then the rationale for agreeing to participate in other "real-world" voting, where one can end up in the minority, can also be understood. But I'd like to focus on the rationale for voting to enforce contracts now, when 100% agree on the contract, because it is not clear that you understand this.

Back to your analogy. Let's say that instead of Sue giving a loan to Joe, instead Sue has capital equipment that she WANTS to give to Joe in exchange for money that Joe WANTS to exchange to Sue. So both want to trade money for capital equipment. But assume that each must leave his goods in different parts of the woods at night for the other to pick up, but both are afraid the other will not leave his respective good (money or capital equipment). And assume they will never see each other.

A selfish Joe could think,
"If I don't leave the money in the woods and Sue leaves the capital goods, I make off with the money and the capital goods. But if I don't leave the money and Sue does not leave the capital goods, then I was smart not to have left the money in the woods, because Sue was not intending to leave her capital goods, anyway. So no matter what Sue does, (a selfish Joe thinks!) I am better off not leaving the money."

But this reasoning applies (in reverse) to Sue, as well. So no matter what the other does, it is in each one's selfish interest not to leave his goods in the woods, and no trade takes place.

So amongst selfish individuals, no trade takes place, THOUGH IT WOULD HAVE BENEFITED BOTH OF THEM. This situation is a variant of a non-iterated prisoners dilemma, which is a type of "public good" problem involving 2 people.

If Sue and Joe (by themselves) tried to exchange purely voluntarily using the woods at night, the trade might not take place. So voluntary interaction, without enforcement of contracts, may not lead to optimal results.

But if both could VOTE for the following option and both in fact vote for enforcement, the trade could take place.

"If either Sue or Joe fails to deliver the goods, a policeman will track either one down and force him or her to give up his/her goods."

(Honesty of policemen is an interesting problem. Whether it is easy to verify and track the honesty of the police is an interesting discussion, but perhaps one that you would be willing to discuss with me later).

The point is, a mutually beneficial trade can take place when each one votes for two things:

1. for the trade to occur (so we know what each one wants) and
2. for the enforcement of the agreement if both agree to the trade (So each is willing to allow him/herself to be violently coerced, in exchange for the other agreeing to being violently coerced, if either breaks his promise).

The key to understanding democracy is to understand that 100% of people may vote for each person to take a particular action (e.g. follow a law, or pool money for a community project). And 100% may vote to have the contract enforced if some individual does not follow his agreed upon behavior.

One can understand the usefulness of democracy only if one first understands that:

1. If the enforcement of a contract is fair (by the police) then
2. It could be rational for 100% of people to vote to be coerced into following a contract, even if an individual party to the contract later decides to not follow the contract he voted for.

What does voting for being "coerced into following a contract" mean? In certain situations a voting individual may vote for the contract plus the enforcement of the contract, but later change his mind, perhaps because others have already contributed and the project is finished, so he no longer sees the need to pay. Being "coerced into following the contract" means that such an individual can be coerced into paying the community, even if he now refuses, because he agreed in advance to the application of force, if he ultimately refuses to pay.

If you can not see how 100% of the people could rationally vote for enforcement of a fair contract voted by 100% of the people, even if someone later reneges on the contract, then you will not be able to understand the benefits of democracy, and further discussion is not useful.

The first vote in establishing a just society, in my view, is for all to agree that contracts, voluntarily agreed to, must be enforced.

But if you can in fact see how enforcement of voluntarily agreed upon contracts benefits trade and can better humanity from a moral perspective, and if you can see that 100% of a particular group of people could vote for that; then we can proceed in seeing how a just society, utilizing democracy, could form. And I will be able to explain to you how agreeing to voting, even if one sometimes is in the minority can, from a certain perspective, reflect the unanimous will of all.

by a reader on Mon, 04/30/2007 - 19:54 | reply

I particularly like the liber

I particularly like the libertarian idea of independent quality-check companies instead of governmental tax-subsidised beurocrats.

Suppose, I am a chocolate producer. I can benefit only from economy of scale, i.e. selling a lot of chocolate to the public with a better price than my competitors. Now, since it becomes very popular idea to hire an "independent" quality-checker, many customers will prefer to buy chocolate from independently checked company. And because I sell chocolate in huge quantities I can afford to pay a million or so to a quality-checker. After getting me as a million dollar customer and considering competition amongst quality-checking companies we will have yet to see how independent their independent checks are going to be. This sort of things hapening even now in non-libertarian countries like UK or USA. There are examples of sponsored academic research on quality of certain food products that are quite obviously biased towards the sponsor's needs.

Many big companies would prefer to invest bigger money into desinformation of population rather than on safety, quality etc..

Hoping that in libertarian society shenanigans will cease to exist for natural reasons is a little bit naive.

by a reader on Thu, 05/10/2007 - 14:33 | reply

The first vote in establishin

The first vote in establishing a just society, in my view, is for all to agree that contracts, voluntarily agreed to, must be enforced.

But if you can in fact see how enforcement of voluntarily agreed upon contracts benefits trade and can better humanity from a moral perspective, and if you can see that 100% of a particular group of people could vote for that; then we can proceed in seeing how a just society, utilizing democracy, could form. And I will be able to explain to you how agreeing to voting, even if one sometimes is in the minority can, from a certain perspective, reflect the unanimous will of all.

I agree about the 100% case. That's easy. So go on :)

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 05/16/2007 - 05:33 | reply

OK

Let's assume that it is rational for people to prefer a dam to be built to prevent flooding on farmland, and in fact 100% of 100 farmers privately agree that it is worth it to each of them to pay their share of the cost of the dam.

If there is no vote, but unanimous agreement is required before a project proceeds, then individuals who may secretly want the dam and think it is worth their share of the cost, nonetheless have a selfish incentive to claim that they don't want the dam, so that others pay for it instead of them. So there are societal costs associated with people not telling the truth about their preferences. Namely, projects that may benefit everyone, may be underfunded.

These costs can be reduced in certain voting situations. If the majority preference is enforced and each farmer thinks it is rational to split the cost of building the dam amongst everyone (all 100 farmers), all will in fact vote for it. So voting is valuable in this instance, because it causes the voters to be honest about their preferences.

Do you see why a group of 100 people, all of whom correctly suspect (but don't know) that 100% of everyone else wants to fund a project (like a dam to prevent flooding of their farms), could rationally prefer to vote for a project (with majority rule) rather than meet in a room and negotiate?

by a reader on Mon, 05/21/2007 - 23:09 | reply

Liars

I agree that liars are an issue and that certain systems create an incentive to lie in this way.

But if you take a majority vote and then force everyone to pay, you are not just making liars pay, you are also making people who honestly don't want the project pay. That is using force to take money from innocents to pay for a project you want.

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 05/21/2007 - 23:35 | reply

Unanimity

Because everyone is known to be rational and because everyone therefore expects that 100% of everyone else will also vote for it, do you see how 100 people could rationally agree that they WANT to vote for the dam.

You agreed to the below.

'But if you can in fact see how enforcement of voluntarily agreed upon contracts benefits trade and can better humanity from a moral perspective, and if you can see that 100% of a particular group of people could vote for that; then we can proceed in seeing how a just society, utilizing democracy, could form.'

It was rational for 100 people to vote to enforce contracts. (Right?) So it could theoretically be possible for 100 people to want to vote for a dam to be built (for rational reasons, as well).

And if all 100 farmers all agree to a vote on the issue, what is the objection? You have already agreed that 100 people could all agree to vote that they want to enforce contracts. What's the conceptual difference?

by a reader on Tue, 05/22/2007 - 17:18 | reply

100%

Suppose you try to get a unanimous vote. If you succeed, that's that. If some people vote against it, now what? Either they are lying, or they really don't want the project at the price.

Even if you suspect that every no-voter really does want it, your policy of forcing everyone will indiscriminately catch innocents.

If they all agree to vote and abide by the majority decision that's fine. But of course that isn't how things work IRL. I can't withdraw from a vote on some new tax and refuse to be bound by it.

-- Elliot Temple
curi@curi.us
Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 05/22/2007 - 20:31 | reply

Immigration

How does our Libertarian handle immigration in a better world?

Are borders obsolete?

How does one deal with criminality and free flow of terrorists in a capitalist free market society?

by a reader on Tue, 05/22/2007 - 23:41 | reply

Unanimous rule

One hundred people could all agree as follows:

- a. When someone thinks there is a public good issue that should be funded, all 100 agree ahead of time to anonymously vote on each issue presented as a putative public good.
- b. When the anonymous vote occurs, the project is funded if and only if all unanimously vote to fund the project, and the unanimous vote binds all of them to fund the project according to the amount specified in the language that they voted on.

Is that OK?

by a reader on Wed, 05/23/2007 - 00:33 | reply

unanimous

yes, fine.

btw in that system there is no incentive to lie: a single person saying he doesn't want the project prevents it from happening at all. if you lie, other people don't pay for you. so if projects don't happen it suggests at least one person honestly doesn't want them (at that price).

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 05/23/2007 - 01:05 | reply

Borders

Ultimately borders will go. Ultimately no one will want to be a criminal. Ultimately persuasion will solve terrorism.

In the short term, an improved policy I advocate towards borders is to consider especially bad rulers of other countries to have less legitimacy -- to respect their borders less.

As far as our borders, a step in the right direction would be to decrease restrictions on trade of medicine with Canada and Mexico.

We could speculate about the second and third small steps. But what steps 50-1000 are we don't know yet. Fortunately we don't have to. One step at a time is sufficient.

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 05/23/2007 - 01:11 | reply

"btw in that system there is

"btw in that system there is no incentive to lie"

Yes, that's the interesting and good part of voting. Lying has many costs. One of the main ones is that it makes cooperation between like-minded people (pooling money and other pooling of effort) much more expensive. Something that reduces the amount of lying (for example people having the opportunity to express their preferences by voting) saves money for everyone.

So voting has economic value. How much?

Let's say the unanimous rule voting system helps the 100 people to save a lot of money by pooling money when the group unanimously thinks they are funding a public good.

And then all 100 have an idea for saving even more. Instead of voting on one issue at a time, they agree to vote on 10 issues (all specified in advance) at a time. And they agree to pay for each project if 90% (not 100%) consider the good a public good and agree to the amount of money that the 90% majority thinks is correct. And the 10% agree in advance to follow the will of the 90% majority, even if on any particular vote, a particular individual is one of the 10% who does not agree that a project should be financed.

Why might they all rationally agree to this type of voting system?

Because all clearly see that money is saved when people do not have an economic incentive to lie about what they want. And anonymous voting solves the economic problem of people having an incentive to lie about their preferences. If all 100 expect that they will agree with everyone else, say 85% of the time, the amount of money lost when a given individual is in the extreme minority, and so funds a project he does not favor, may be expected to be less (perhaps considerably less) than the amount of money gained because of the economic gains from mass cooperation in producing projects that the overwhelming majority think are public goods.

So a given individual may rationally decide to lose a little bit of money when he (rarely) is in the extreme minority in one situation, in order to gain even more by being in the majority most of the time.

So do you see how participating in this partial form of partial democracy could be a rational economic decision on the part of all 100 of the farmers?

by a reader on Wed, 05/23/2007 - 09:10 | reply

Government

What you say is correct, as far as it goes.

Organization of people to facilitate coordination, such as building bridges, is much better than nothing. Our government embodies a significant amount of the organization we've created; it helps us cooperate.

An anarchist might think that no institutions is one step away from non-coercive institutions, and that having a government is two steps away (step 1: destroy government). But this is incorrect, and the mistake is not to realize that people make mistakes. Creating institutions for human cooperation is an error prone process and we should not condemn the ones we have just because they contain error. Starting over would just mean more error; we have been reducing the errors over time and should not throw that out. In fact, the only reason we even have a much idea of what a voluntarist society would look like is because we are a good part of the way there.

But it's also important to recognize that while the sort of voting schemes you propose do indeed have advantages over nothing, and over various worse ideas, and perhaps over various naive schemes of individual rights, they contain errors. And, today, we know some of the errors they contain.

One major error is the idea that we don't have better ways of dealing with public good problems than government. But we already solve a wide variety of public goods problems using the free market. People seem to try to only count hard problems as public good problems, but that doesn't hold up logically. Mostly public goods problems are easy (by present day standards). We should be aiming to increase the proportion of public good problems which the market solves, and we should be optimistic and know it's only a small change and that serious progress can be made now.

Another issue is that our government could be more respectful of individual rights and liberty, and care more deeply about whether actions are voluntarily undertaken. Sure you can lump votes on 100 issues together and say, "Agree to them all, because on balance it's good for you". But it's even better if you don't. It's even better if the choices available to people lets them decide what they want to participate in with a finer degree of granularity.

I understand the reason for lumping things together: it is a way to fight lying. But there do exist other ways to fight lying which have less adverse effects on innocents. Trying to lie to people so that they buy things which benefit you is one way to become wealthy. But it is not at all the most efficient, effective, moral, interesting, fun, or enjoyable way. You and I would not want to live that way. No one else would either, if only they had more knowledge. Better education is just one strategy to end lying; there are others too.

So overall, yes our Government is a good thing, and it is worlds better than the darkness from which we originate, but it certainly can be improved further, and treating people less forcefully is one of the ways that it will improve.

-- Elliot Temple
curi@curi.us
Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Fri, 05/25/2007 - 22:59 | reply

Straw Man

"One major error is the idea that we don't have better ways of dealing with public good problems than government."

I demonstrated that given certain circumstance and given our current state of knowledge, democratic voting can solve certain types of problems relatively efficiently and with respect for individual rights.

But you are attacking a straw man. I know of virtually no one who believes that the government should solve all public good problems. Where have I stated that I believe that government is a panacea, in anything that I have written?

Obviously, companies can produce certain goods profitably, even when in the process of producing these goods, other goods are produced and it is costly to exclude "free riders" from enjoying these free goods. If the goods that people get by being "free riders" are "public goods", then the market is providing public goods with no government help.

Far and away, though, the most important way that public goods are provided is by ethical behavior of citizens. For example, when people are honest about publically stating their preferences, even if they could benefit financially by lying about what they want, groups of people can coordinate activities and produce public goods. And most importantly, no doubt because of faith in G-d, but also because of humanistic inclinations, public goods are produced because of altruism, self-sacrifice, and charity. Virtually no one who believes in democratic voting is opposed to ethical behavior, as you imply. Indeed, the only argument against altruism that I have heard has come from you!

by a reader on Sun, 05/27/2007 - 16:41 | reply

Re: Straw Man

Any use of straw men is inadvertent.

Regarding altruism, I don't think it is ethical. But I think that's a tangent we don't need to get in to.

I'm glad you agree the market provides some public goods easily. As you're aware, that means the distinction of which goods are problematic and should be provided by government is different than the distinction between a public good, and not a public good. So, could you specify precisely what the distinction is? How do you determine which goods the government should provide? Is it being a public good plus some other criteria?

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Sun, 05/27/2007 - 18:35 | reply

Benefits and Costs

When the expected future economic benefits minus costs of government action is greater than the expected future benefits minus costs of allowing the free market to produce the good, the good should be produced by the government.

Since government is remarkably inefficient at producing things, most public goods should not be produced by the government.

by a reader on Sun, 05/27/2007 - 23:45 | reply

re: benefits + costs

What I believe you are saying is: when it's efficient, then govt should produce a good.

As an aside, for the record, I want to point out that I don't completely agree with that: there are other important criteria besides efficiency. One important criterion is whether it is forceful or fully voluntary. But never mind that for now.

There is a different issue I want to discuss. People make mistakes. Some of the dams and bridges and so on were bad to build, even if the most efficient party was the one to build them. It is hard to know which to build, and which not. So one question this brings up is: when it's determined that a project was a mistake (and how will that determination be made?) who will suffer the harm done, and how?

Do you want to say what you think the answers should be? Alternatively, if this makes sense so far, I can say what I think each of our answers is.

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 06/06/2007 - 05:59 | reply

Economic Efficiency vs. Cost Effectiveness

"When the expected future economic benefits minus costs of government action is greater than the expected future benefits minus costs of allowing the free market to produce the good, the good should be produced by the government."

A reader

"Some of the dams and bridges and so on were bad to build, even if the most efficient party was the one to build them."

Elliot Temple

If the expected future benefits minus costs are greater than zero for a project and are greater than the next best alternative, the project should be completed (by the government if it is more efficient, or by private enterprise if it is more efficient.)

You are talking about cost effectiveness, I am talking about economic efficiency.

by a reader on Mon, 06/11/2007 - 02:56 | reply

zero

I was assuming the benefit might be less than zero. Many proposed real projects -- some with millions of supporters in the US alone -- are billions of dollars below zero.

I think we are agreed that doing projects with negative net value is a bad idea. So back to my question:

So one question this brings up is: when it's determined that a project was a mistake (and how will that determination be made?) who will suffer the harm done, and how?

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 06/11/2007 - 03:38 | reply

Your Sense of Things

How do you think it should be determined that a mistake was made and who should make the determination?

by a reader on Mon, 06/11/2007 - 15:21 | reply

back to basics, perhaps naively

Roughly speaking, it seems that there are two groups of people who would take issue with the original story: those who are repelled on first principles and those who like the world which Mr. Temple envisions but are offended that he seems blind to, or at least does not acknowledge in his story, something crucial.

Of the first group little needs to be said here. Obviously there are people who find beautiful a worldview rooted in things like altruism, duty, cooperation, compassion; who disagree strongly with Prof. Deutsch that this has anything to do with guilt, fear, self-loathing, lack of self-confidence, or other pathology; who find his morality as ugly as he finds theirs. This fundamental argument will endure.

The sticking point with the second group is much weaker and thus, in a way, of greater concern, for perhaps something can be done to eliminate it. One way into it is to look at how the second group would react to the distillate of Mr. Temple's story: "Steve is a self-made man who takes care of himself." This is bound to raise hackles because of what it does not recognize.

The minor point:

Do you not agree that the "liberal" policies highlighted in the story served a purpose at one time? That they were part of getting us to where we can now talk about a libertarian world, difficult to imagine arising from barbarism, feudalism, or even the capitalism of a century ago? That the hero of the story, while self-made from the perspective of a world that has already "had libertarian policies for centuries", is not self-made in the sense that centuries or millennia of struggle prepared the way for that world? (This may seem obvious or irrelevant, but surely "X is bad; Y is good" elicits a very different reaction from "X had its time but now we are ready to do better with Y". To be fair, some of the comments above adopt this latter tone.)

In any case, this is not the major point, which is:

It is difficult to deny, regardless of one's politics, that something else helped our society arrive at its massive wealth and a stage of development where we can talk seriously about a libertarian world: massive violence in the form of colonization, enslavement, theft, and so on. What do Mr. Temple and other libertarians say to those who are attracted to a libertarian future but see the redress of injustice as a prerequisite to getting there, even to starting the conversation? Who think that it is obscene, and obscenely easy, for us to consider Steve "self-made" when he and we are riding on a legacy of advantage stolen from their ancestors?

Of course one can argue that this issue is logically separate from the fun and useful exercise of imagining what a future libertarian world would look like, and that someone engaged merely in this exercise is not obligated to address it; but to a great many people, it is so centrally important that any political conversation that ignores it will be entirely alienating. (And the last line of the story really asks for it.)

If this issue has already been well addressed in libertarian texts, I would be grateful to be pointed in the right direction.

by a reader on Fri, 06/15/2007 - 21:19 | reply

Massive Violence

It is difficult to deny, regardless of one's politics, that something else helped our society arrive at its massive wealth and a stage of development where we can talk seriously about a libertarian world: massive violence in the form of colonization, enslavement, theft, and so on.

To the extent massive violence in each of those forms happened, that made us poorer. Just like if we do anything like that today, it only hurts us. Horribly immoral actions are not where prosperity comes from. Do you disagree?

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Sat, 06/16/2007 - 01:48 | reply

Determining Mistakes

How do you think it should be determined that a mistake was made and who should make the determination?

In a free market system, where we insist on consent from all those whose resources are used in a project, the people who lose when the project fails are precisely the people who believed that it would succeed and put their money (or effort, trust, etc) where their mouth was. Concomitantly, those are the people who gain when it succeeds. (Others may gain as well. That is not a downside.)

No one has to make a determination about which projects are successes and which are failures, and then to punish and reward accordingly. People put resources into a project, and get other resources back. They then, as a matter of fact, do or do not have resources to continue with further projects, and this corresponds to how good they are at choosing projects.

A good project is one that either in fact creates something valuable, or one that creates things other people want (whether those things are valuable or not). Making things others want which are in fact bad is a mistake, but people who do it do not become poorer. But their customers do, so such silliness is not self-sustaining. Besides, doing what other people want you to is altruistic ;)

People with good judgment find they have more and more wealth to make determinations about without anyone ever having to determine whether this person has good judgment or not. And people who are mistaken a lot become poor, again without anyone judging them personally. And the only way to be able to participate in large projects again is to either persuade people with wealth (who tend to have good judgment), or to collaborate on some successful projects, such as working at Wal-Mart, or being a plumber.

That is what I think should happen.

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Sat, 06/16/2007 - 02:27 | reply

If public goods then externalities

"In a free market system, where we insist on consent from all those whose resources are used in a project"

Nonsense.

For example, you have insisted that the free market can have spillover effects in which people benefit. So public goods can be produced. But if the free market can do that, then it can involuntarily take goods from people, as well. That does not involve consent.

by a reader on Sat, 06/16/2007 - 22:49 | reply

Example

Please give an example of the free market taking people's goods without consent. It only counts if this is legal to do without compensation (in principle).

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Sat, 06/16/2007 - 23:25 | reply

settling accounts

To the extent massive violence in each of those forms happened, that made us poorer. Just like if we do anything like that today, it only hurts us. Horribly immoral actions are not where prosperity comes from. Do you disagree?

Thank you for your response. I do not disagree. I like what you say very much. But I see it as only glancing the crucial issue, and so I am not sure how to bring us round to a conclusion.

A woman descended from slaves recently said: "You white men think that the world is ready, or nearly ready, for your libertarian dream. You might be ready, but don't you understand that we will never be ready until you pay what you owe us?"

What is to be done about the profoundly felt you/we opposition at the core of her world? Many people on this site, reading the original story about "what life would be like in my (libertarian) world", can identify: my becomes our; we are imagining a future world together. What about all the people who cannot, not because they do not like the world imagined, but because they see a chasm of injustice separating them from this latter we?

by back to basics author on Sun, 06/17/2007 - 07:41 | reply

Externalities and Public Goods....Require Government Calculation

As a consequence of free market production of cars, one person claims that pollution has decreased his air quality and the manufacturer of the cars denies that the air quality is damaged by his production.

Whether the production of cars is an economic success or a failure depends precisely on whether the government (for example the courts) makes economic calculations about whether air was stolen or not.

You said with respect to the free market, "No one has to make a determination about which projects are successes and which are failures, and then to punish and reward accordingly."

Do you care to reconsider?

by a reader on Sun, 06/17/2007 - 15:14 | reply

re: settling accounts

A woman descended from slaves recently said: "You white men think that the world is ready, or nearly ready, for your libertarian dream. You might be ready, but don't you understand that we will never be ready until you pay what you owe us?"

Many white men were not slave owners, and many slave owners were not white. Certainly white, American slave owners played a role in the history of slavery worldwide. But it is a relatively small role in the overall picture. Where are all the complaints about every other culture that held slaves? And the complaints against the African and Muslim slave traders who sold slaves to white men?

The answer is: those complaints are, like slavery in the West (but still not everywhere), long gone.

And so they should be. I held no slaves. My parents held no slaves. I owe nothing. And the woman making the complaint. Was she a slave? Or her parents? No. Were some of her distant ancestors? Presumably, yes. But so what? She has plenty of opportunity to have/make a good life. The slavery of her ancestors is not hurting her today.

It seems like slavery reparations ideas have both a narrow focus on slavery of black people by white Americans (which is wildly unfair), and have a tribal/racist mentality that sees slavery of one race by another, and counts present day people as part of the same races of the past.

You ask what is to be done about this? Argument and persuasion. Many black people today would agree with what I say above. One day when people argue these things more eloquently and more publicly it will become common sense.

Perhaps there are fundamental flaws in present day American black culture inhibiting this process. One further answer of what is to be done about those is the spread of better parenting techniques. With those in place, many irrationalities will fall away in a single generation. Replacing public schools would help too.

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 06/19/2007 - 00:14 | reply

Re: Externalities

Me:

No one has to make a determination about which projects are successes and which are failures, and then to punish and reward accordingly.

You:

Whether the production of cars is an economic success or a failure depends precisely on whether the government (for example the courts) makes economic calculations about whether air was stolen or not.

A decision about the right policy towards air pollution, is not a decision that Toyotas are a success and Fords a failure. The person making air policy might not know anything about cars. The reason that's possible is he isn't making a decision about cars, only one that indirectly affects cars.

Indirect effects of this sort are common. If I decide to buy billions of tons of steel, thus increasing the demand and the price, that too might affect which car projects succeed, but it does not give me any power to direct their future. It just isn't my decision. And, again, I might know nothing about them.

A more direct effect is a policy about allowed width of cars set by road owners (private or government). This is an important law (so cars fit in lanes). And it could cause a too-wide car line to go out of business overnight. But it does not at all constitute a person making a determination about which projects are successes and which are failures. If the wide car is redesigned there's nothing the width-decider can do. And if it sells despite being too wide -- perhaps for off-road use, or for monster truck competitions, or even in protest against the width regulation -- again he has no power. And as in all the other cases, he isn't making a decision about that car project as proved by the fact he could just as well have never heard of it, and also by the fact that his decision could accidentally have the opposite effect.

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 06/19/2007 - 00:51 | reply

Slaves

Okay. I hate even going there, but it can't be ignored.

A capitalist argument can be made for slavery. Indentured servant works too. I find it all morally reprehensible, but truth requires that it be looked at. As capitalists we all rise on the backs of those that preceded us, slaves and indentured servants and illegal immigrants too. Economically, at some phase of human societal development it works. Like it or not, the bluejeans you wear, even the ones you paid alot for, we're produced by forms of slavery intricately interlaced with most other entrepreneurial forms along their production and sale life cycle. Why are some of these forms prohibited in Great Britain and America and not even considered in our advantageous free trade with China or Malaysia, where human labor is just worth so much less? Is this because we are enlightened capitalists and libertarians and they are not because they so willingly endure forms of slavery and economic oppression so not to starve?

Or is it easier just to turn our heads away and ignore the economic truths of supply and demand and unfettered production, and instead look happily to the future when all economic boats will rise, in theory anyway. I have never seen a reasonable libertarian answer to the current and past reality, or even the realistic future one, other than to argue that because of the past and current imperfections of our moral foolishness we haven't yet seen the light.

It is so easy to ignore the externalities when we don't have to look at them.

In the meantime, I try to choose the least slavery possible and reject libertarian and all other easy utopias for one and the same moral reason: human worth, although messy and complex to look at and address, comes first.

by a reader on Tue, 06/19/2007 - 15:50 | reply

Sweat Shops

The reason people work for Nike/etc in China/etc is because they want to. It may suck by American standards, but they see better working conditions and higher pay. Nike does not send out armed groups to round up workers, because people do it voluntarily.

Nike and others have no way to keep wages down by their own choice. The only thing that keeps them down is when the supply of willing (and sufficiently skilled) labor is much larger than the demand. In other words, wages will increase when there are more such factories.

All this worldwide free trade stuff is good, nothing to be ashamed of.

BTW I don't see how a slavery or indentured slavery could hold up in court. Someone decides not to do it anymore. That's breach of contract. Now what? Well, he owes compensation, but the court is just going to make him pay some money. So he can end the slavery part at a moment's notice. So it was never really slavery.

-- Elliot Temple
curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 06/19/2007 - 20:59 | reply

Nike per se is not the problem

Nike has had their feet held to the fire, literally, more than once and as a good western company has seen the light and corrected most of their own abuses. But Nike is only one of hundreds of thousands of corporate mediators of free trade. If you haven't been to China, Eliot, you can hardly imagine. Free will includes the will to starve, I would guess, and for your children to starve as well. This is not even the Chinese government per se, but the completely unfettered free trade across borders. What thing live or dead or manufactured do you want? You can get it in China. Plus China is not alone. If you can't get it there, it can be made clean for you by the murky transactions of many hands until it reaches your pristine shores.

Libertarians look the other way or excuse all this as an aberration of misguided humans. In theory, free trade works, always. In utopia, everything works.

Another example. Build a superhighway north through Texas, a private road for trucks for all those cheap sweatshop goods from Mexico, right alongside the honestly traded ones. Yet, paradoxically raise a 1600 mile concrete barrier 12 feet high so no Mexicans can cross to where the real opportunity is. This is the reality of "free trade".

Contracts? Bah, humbug. There only as good as the paper they're printed on and the honor of those signing them.

by a reader on Wed, 06/20/2007 - 14:41 | reply

Sources

Could you give some sources on some bad things going on in China, and then give a brief explanation of why you think the free market is responsible for that?

-- Elliot Temple
curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 06/20/2007 - 19:53 | reply

Slaves

Slavery is bad for the economy.

<http://hnn.us/blogs/entries/20776.html>

The old doctrine that the slavery of the black, is essential to the freedom of the white race, can maintain itself only in the presence of slavery, where interest and prejudice are the controlling powers, but it stands condemned equally by reason and experience. The statesmanship of to-day condemns and repudiates it as a shallow pretext for oppression. It belongs with the commercial fallacies long ago exposed by Adam Smith. It stands on a level with the contemptible notion, that every crumb of bread that goes into another man's mouth, is just so much bread taken from mine. Whereas, the rule is in this country of abundant land, the more mouths you have, the more money you can put into your pocket, the more I can put into mine. As with political economy, so with civil and political rights (Frederick Douglass, November 17, 1864).

by a reader on Wed, 06/20/2007 - 22:47 | reply

Re: Sources

You may be asking the wrong question and of the wrong person.

Corporations should be asking, and should be asked this question.

Some are, and some are asked; and some are not or even troubled by it.

I am not against the ideal of free trade. However, when we experience trade across different market economies, we cannot rationalize away the deep differences or the exploitation of human worth inequities.

If I as a corporation (remember, the corporation in U.S. law is an individual) decide that "free trade" is the only factor, I will be willing to buy melamine laced dog and cat food, or at least turn my head the other way because I did not produce it. I will be willing to buy and sell Colgate toothpaste that is neither Colgate or toothpaste but a facsimile of brand recognition laced with a poisonous substance, or I will say that is an anomaly, a slip-up, how could I know. I will not be alarmed that behind the doors of a production facility (even to call it that begs the question) very young children work in deplorable conditions to produce goods which may even be dangerous to their health and growth, if I don't care to consider that. In the case of agriculture, the local barnyard may have no western sanitation much less clean slaughter facilities and yet dried and canned and even frozen products made specifically for export may contain the barest evidence of this dangerous contamination or it may not be readily evident if there were no checks on-site. As to manufacture, and manufacturing processes, there is piecework that I have seen myself, done by Chinese children younger than 12 years of age in their own crowded one room family residence on their bare pallet beds for pennies an hour. Someone is buying that for western markets knowing full well the ultimate source and not caring, if final cost of production rules all their decisions. By the way, this will certainly not be mentioned in their annual stock report.

But the examples and sources would be endless, so I won't dwell on them. Let the corporations do this, if they only would. Unfettered by the responsibility of actual production, some will, and some won't. So who checks?

The western world creates some, many of these markets. Therefore, if a U.S. corporation (as legal individual) buys these items wholesale, whereas their home country would never allow such abuses among their own people, and in fact would consider a number of these practices of production to constitute criminal acts if Americans were "hired" or contracted to produce the goods, there is either the veil of ignorance or the murkiness of criminal intent on the part of the corporation which contracts for them.

Ignorance of the law is no excuse, but who checks. Some certainly do not. Criminal intent should be proveable but is not. Hide behind the banner of "free trade" and the excuse that the buyer should be beware? Let the buyer beware is not sufficient caution. A label, made in China or Guatemala or Uganda tells the buyer almost nothing. Where are the penalties under our laws if the offending party is even found?

So the primary question is not one of "free" trade in the utopian sense but one of the uncontrolled and hardly monitored easy abuse under the pristine umbrella and noble idea of international free trade. Free trade does not mean freedom of corporate responsibility, but in effect this is what occurs, and this is how the mantle is worn too often.

I return again to Texas. Here is an example of another problem. There is no free trade when it comes to the production of goods by human capital across certain borders. I am cheap and exploitable if I live on one side of the border. I am not employable if I live on the other side of the border, unable to compete. Yet the goods produced by these hands, exploited, enslaved, or indentured, enter freely. Thus "free trade" is not truly free, nor is it intended to be under such skewed terms.

Ireland important export and international commerce is a good example of free trade. Texas and Mexico, or China via Mexico to Texas is not. Calling it free trade when it is demonstrably not is a travesty. There was a time when Ireland was not a good example of the institutions of free trade, and it had to do, then as now, with externalities and human worth. I guess as good utopians we can hope that by chance and evolution it will someday, like Ireland, all become truly free.

However, in the present I personally opt for moral honesty.

by a reader on Thu, 06/21/2007 - 00:24 | reply

Poison

If I as a corporation (remember, the corporation in U.S. law is an individual) decide that "free trade" is the only factor, I will be willing to buy melamine laced dog and cat food, or at least turn my head the other way because I did not produce it. I will be willing to buy and sell Colgate toothpaste that is neither Colgate or toothpaste but a facsimile of brand recognition laced with a poisonous substance, or I will say that is an anomaly, a slip-up, how could I know.

Criminal actions aren't free trade anymore than robbing someone is.

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Thu, 06/21/2007 - 01:49 | reply

Governments and Borders

So we return to the point about honoring borders:

"In the short term, an improved policy I advocate towards borders is to consider especially bad rulers of other countries to have less legitimacy -- to respect their borders less."

Thus if free trade is not to be trusted as a transaction because of the lack of consistent regulation of safety and production and bad standards of control within the exporting country, there is also less legitimacy -- and we should respect their borders less as a trading entity.

Free trade requires a level playing field. To reiterate, common standards of human worth, common standards of production and control, common standards of monetary policy and subsidy, common standards of law and corporate responsibility all calculate directly into the free trade equation. That is reality.

Without honoring and safeguarding all of the above principles, trade across borders cannot in any sense be fully honest commerce, or free.

by a reader on Thu, 06/21/2007 - 03:53 | reply

Borders, Level Playing Field

Leveling playing fields is not the point. Either you are a criminal, or you are buying the fruits of criminal behavior, or it is perfectly fair. Not necessarily level -- maybe your father was richer and more helpful than mine -- but it's free and it's just fine.

Borders have little to do with free trade between individuals, they just have to do with governments. When governments stop meddling in trade, borders will be irrelevant to trade.

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Thu, 06/21/2007 - 20:44 | reply

Of Course

And then there will be only honest men or criminals.

Just read today in an international journal about the Chinese government finally acknowledging "luring and enslavement" of individuals, families, and some children to the brick kiln industries of China. This was their words, not mine. Honesty and open recognition of abuses is key. Corporations, at least in the U.S. have the status and responsibility of individuals under the law. Let's keep it that way. No hiding behind borders allowed.

by a reader on Thu, 06/21/2007 - 23:14 | reply

Child Slavery

Elliot,

What do you think about trading with countries that abduct children and force them to work. Should there be restrictions on trade with those countries?

by a reader on Fri, 06/22/2007 - 14:04 | reply

Child Slavery

Restrictions on trade in general is not a very ideal approach -- why let some bad apples spoil it for the rest of us? I'd much rather see criminals arrested. Abducting children is a crime.

Knowingly receiving stolen goods is a crime too, and the principle applies just as well to slave-made goods (which we could easily think of as stolen from the maker).

What about unknowingly? Well if you took reasonable precautions and stop when you find out, that's not a crime. If you wear a blindfold to avoid noticing that is a lesser crime.

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Fri, 06/22/2007 - 19:33 | reply

Enslave or Kill

Enslaving someone and making him work is a crime, as you say. But does it make a difference to you that the child may have been given a "choice" of dying or working in slavery. Should one still not buy the fruits of the slave's labor?

Let's say a totalitarian dictator says to you that it would be good if you buy the products of slaves' labor because otherwise the slaves government will execute them. Would you argue that we should (nonetheless) buy the goods?

This question is somewhat analogous to the question of whether we should buy goods produced from factories with barbaric conditions, if these factories nonetheless provide slightly higher wages than other equally barbaric alternatives.

by a reader on Mon, 06/25/2007 - 21:20 | reply

Government Efficiency Calculations

"We don't need a proper analysis. Government can't decide to limit its actions only to efficient ones -- even if it wanted to -- because it cannot know for sure which actions are efficient. No one knows that. That's why there is risk involved in investing in companies." Elliot Temple, from the Setting the World to Rights post "Not like This"

"A decision about the right policy towards air pollution, is not a decision that Toyotas are a success and Fords a failure. The person making air policy might not know anything about cars. The reason that's possible is he isn't making a decision about cars, only one that indirectly affects cars."

Elliot Temple

Government must make economic calculations to prevent externalities. A decision to tax a certain amount for air pollution may very well destroy certain car manufacturers whose production techniques pollute extensively.

And government calculations of the cost of air pollution are no more complex than government calculation of the appropriate subsidies to companies that as a byproduct of private production also produce public goods.

In both cases the government must make economic calculations. In both cases the government decision can make some businesses profitable and others not. So contrary to your apparent view, the government need be no more involved (nor no less involved) in helping produce public goods as stopping externalities (stealing).

Do you see that the government is making decisions about efficiency in both cases. In the case of the pollution, the government must decide about the efficiency loss to those who must inhale polluted air. In the case of scientific production of technological goods, the government must weigh the value of created knowledge to all, and subsidize appropriately.

The point is, in either case it can be more efficient if the government is involved. And if the government is involved in stopping externalities, it makes sense (from an efficiency perspective) that the government should be involved in subsidizing the production of public goods.

by a reader on Mon, 06/25/2007 - 22:05 | reply

efficiency

you say that preventing polluting other people's property with poison gasses is about efficiency just like subsidizing goods w/ public benefit is about efficiency -- and govt should do both.

i think the first is about preventing crime -- damaging people's property without compensation -- and the second is something that shouldn't be attempted. it's true that preventing crime is efficient. but that doesn't make it the same thing as subsidies to favored companies. i want a government that does its best never to judge the merits of particular people or companies. one where there are no officials deciding if they like my product and it's worthy of special treatment. that sort of arbitrary authority is a bad thing.

by Elliot on Fri, 07/06/2007 - 17:13 | reply

hostages

Let's say a totalitarian dictator says to you that it would be good if you buy the products of slaves' labor because otherwise the slaves government will execute them. Would you argue that we should (nonetheless) buy the goods?

that is a hostage situation not an economic policy issue. they'll kill the hostages/slaves unless we do as told.

by Elliot on Fri, 07/06/2007 - 17:40 | reply

Who Determines?

"you say that preventing polluting other people's property with poison gasses is about efficiency....I think (the issue) is about crime -- damaging people's property without compensation."

Who should determine whether pollution is a "poison gas" that damages other's property? The courts? The legislature?

How should it be determined that a given amount of pollution released is considered a "poison gas" that damages property?

by a reader on Mon, 10/29/2007 - 21:39 | reply

who should rule?

the important thing is not who should rule. nor, especially, what answer is reached. it is that errors can be corrected.

so, i don't especially care whether the courts get to decide, or congress makes a law, or whatever. my point was about what I think is the right way to think about the situation, not about who should have power. i should hope that people would agree with me, and then it would not matter who is in power.

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 10/30/2007 - 10:07 | reply

OK

How should it be determined that a given amount of pollution released is considered a "poison gas" that damages property?

by a reader on Wed, 10/31/2007 - 12:49 | reply

By people thinking about the

By people thinking about the issue using reason, and then making piecemeal changes to the existing system.

I can't tell you how much of which chemicals is poison. I'm not a chemist. And a chemist probably can't tell you the full answer, either: to do that, one needs knowledge of our laws and legal precedents.

So what needs to happen is cases get taken to court, expert witnesses testify, over time legal precedents improve, perhaps sometimes public opinion shifts and a law is altered, etc

Standards for how much of which chemicals is a problem will also change due to things like the easy availability of pollution cleanup nanobots.

-- Elliot Temple
curi@curi.us
Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Thu, 11/01/2007 - 00:36 | reply

How Much Pollution?

Given our state of knowledge, the amount of pollution that causes a dangerous amount of exposure varies between people. For example, those with asthma or chronic obstructive pulmonary disease will be damaged by lower concentrations of pollution than others. If someone has a vulnerability to a particulate toxin in pollution, it may increase risk of cancer in him and only a few others.

If the court allowed noone to suffer any risk of being damaged by pollutants, then the costs of realizing this goal would be prohibitive. This is so because no firm can produce virtually anything without also producing and releasing into the environment minute quantities of a toxic byproduct.

Should a company be allowed to expose any non-consenting individual to any risk at all from pollution?

If yes, what factors should be considered by the judge in determining the amount of risk that a company can be allowed to expose the public to? For example, should the judge be able to consider that the company is making people wealthy and this wealth may decrease rates of death more than pollution increases it?

by a reader on Mon, 11/05/2007 - 15:01 | reply

how much

A) you and i should not be the ones deciding how much

B) obviously factories should be legal. people with special needs are responsible for taking care of those.

For example, should the judge be able to consider that the company is making people wealthy and this wealth may decrease rates of death more than pollution increases it?

no. courts should not be making judgments about which companies will be successful in the future.

what factors should be considered by the judge in determining the amount of risk that a company can be allowed to expose the public to what harm would this do to avg person? is it something reasonable people should be able to consent to? what's the precedent? are there known problems with that precedent? do i have a good reason for ruling against precedent? and whatever else it is courts consider.

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Tue, 11/06/2007 - 00:21 | reply

I Don't Understand

Should a judge allow a new company to be able to expose a non-consenting individual to a small risk from pollution?

Should a judge allow a new company to be able to expose a particularly vulnerable non-consenting individual to a level of pollution that will injure him unless he moves away, though virtually everyone else will be unharmed by the pollution?

by a reader on Thu, 11/08/2007 - 22:46 | reply

you ask hard to answer questi

you ask hard to answer questions. we have a way of dealing with issues like this, but it isn't for some individual to decide. i'm not even a judge. i don't know a lot about legal traditions. the important thing is that a ruling is made (by someone who understand what our culture knows about how to make rulings) and that the ruling can be changed in the future if people decide it's causing problem and a different policy would be better.

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Sat, 11/10/2007 - 07:16 | reply

Watered Down Nonsense

In the Sunday Telegraph, James LeFanu writes that we should be nicer to homeopathy. Specifically he takes issue with Michael Baum, Professor Emeritus of Surgery of surgery at University College London, who has pointed out that homeopathy has no more merit than astrology. LeFanu writes:

The claim that homeopathy is "unsupported" by evidence would be contradicted by the many tens of thousands of people worldwide who say that it has cured their asthma or eczema or markedly reduced their reliance on conventional medicines. Are they all, as he would suppose, foolish and self-deluded?

Of course they are; either that or for some reason the news has not reached them (as it clearly has not reached LeFanu) that science is, in the words of Richard Feynman, "what we have learned about how to keep from fooling ourselves". So if you don't use it when reasoning about what does or doesn't work, what will reliably happen is that you will continue to fool yourself.

Millions of people believe in witches and would swear that killing old women can and does alleviate a wide range of misfortunes including diseases. So, finding a group of people who claim that something cures them has no bearing at all on whether it does. LeFanu, unfortunately, continues:

It is true that homeopathy's supposed mechanism - treating like with like, where "the lower the dilution the more potent the remedy" - seems "barmy" to Western science. But so does acupuncture.

No demonstrable channels of communication cross the six feet that separate the toes from the skull, so how, as is undoubtedly the case, does twiddling a needle in the former cure a crashing migraine in the latter?

What? First of all, there is in fact no good evidence for acupuncture as a treatment of anything. But never mind that: pain and touch nerves do carry information from the foot to the brain. LeFanu is a physician and cannot possibly be that ignorant of basic anatomy. So it is, again, his standards of argument that are at fault. The Telegraph's editors ought to require a higher standard of reasoning in their newspaper than this watered down nonsense.

Sun, 05/27/2007 - 14:06 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Nonsense in the News

The Telegraph? When was the last time we've read anything but nonsense and hokum in the newspapers?

The article on homeopathy sounds like another fine example of prospective prize winning journalism to me. Of course, said with tongue in cheek but the state of news reporting is in one sad state.

Sure they can write for consumption, but what of substance? They cut down trees for this? Yet we still subscribe to the stuff or some at least still waste their time on it.

It is no wonder that newspapers are dinosaurs fighting extinction. They need to hold on to their dwindling readership and the homeopathy and ufo articles apparently help meet the sunday quotas for articles in the pop-science section.

by a reader on Wed, 05/30/2007 - 00:01 | reply

Placebo

The person who comes up with the mechanism of action of a placebo will be quite famous, as he will be able to partially treat many conditions.

I don't object to the use of placebo's, as long as there is informed consent. Acupuncture is a powerful placebo, and potentially useful to many people.

by a reader on Wed, 05/30/2007 - 00:52 | reply

Re: Placebo

A study in 2001 concluded that placebos are ineffective except for conditions, such as pain, that have a large subjective component.

"The high levels of placebo effect which have been repeatedly reported ... are the result of flawed research methodology," said Dr. Asbjorn Hrobjartsson, a professor of medical philosophy and research methodology at University of Copenhagen.

It seems likely, then, that in most cases flawed methodology, rather than the placebo effect, is responsible for people falsely concluding that they have been cured by homeopathy and the like.

by Editor on Wed, 05/30/2007 - 01:34 | reply

Chicken Hypnosis and the Faculty of Reason

In his new book, "The Assault on Reason", Al Gore tells us how to hypnotise chickens. Find out how by reading the section on politics, pundits, and the modern media.

Does this picque your interest? If so, read on.

The source of the paradox of knowledge standing side by side with psuedo-knowledge is that reason is a higher order faculty that can be rather easily subverted into psuedo-reason. The fact that one can read and write and speak in complete sentences, quote authorities and journals, and believe and espouse complex psuedoscientific arguments, does not prove that our faculties of reason are fully engaged. Further, working in opposition to reason, there are tried and true methods, employed consciously or not, but certainly habitually and repetitively, in which repeated incidences of passive exposure to today's pundits via media distribution tend or intend to intrigue us with nonsense. The bond between consumer and producer of nonsense is created and fostered.

How so, and also importantly, Why so?

Firstly, it is of benefit to the pundit, as well to the ubiquitous media carrier to espouse and carry such nonsense. Nonsense is easy to produce, can be produced in great volume and with vast repetition, and it sells, rewards the producer, because readers and viewers enjoy the experience of being placed in a semi-trance state. It is a natural state but with sufficient soft prodding can also become an acquired pleasure.

Consumers in a semi-trance state will read or view almost anything set constantly before them and with sufficient repetition and exposure will tend to believe the content.

To coin a descriptive term, I will call this phenomenon, Cereal Box Syndrome. It is likely a distant cousin to the phenomenon of Chicken Hypnosis but is of a somewhat higher order on the scales of neurological evolution since it involves language, attitudes, and acquired beliefs.

The simple antidote in the case of a hypnotised chicken is to grasp the bird in the right hand like a football, and throw forward in a smooth flowing motion. The spell is immediately broken and the bird flies away unharmed.

I leave it to science to more clearly elucidate the antidote for what I have labeled Cereal Box Syndrome, but which certainly is more dangerously pervasive and subtle than the effects of chicken hypnosis.

Fortunately and in summary we can be assured, there is a vaguely remembered but sure and certain cure for CBS, and it is, to state simply:

Reasoning. Pure and simple, wide awake, Reasoning.

by a reader on Wed, 05/30/2007 - 15:01 | reply

Pain is a Problem

"A study in 2001 concluded that placebos are ineffective except for conditions, such as pain, that have a large subjective component."

I have seen that study. It is one amongst many. But even if its conclusions are accurate, pain is a problem for many people. To the extent that a placebo (versus doing nothing) helps that is a good thing.

by a reader on Wed, 05/30/2007 - 16:28 | reply

Placebo

A Reader:

You said placebos are ok if there is informed consent. Homeopathy and acupuncture patients don't give informed consent.

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Wed, 05/30/2007 - 21:26 | reply

Who Will Blame The Blamers?

The German Chancellor Angela Merkel wanted to scrap nuclear power, but has decided not to for environmental reasons.

Why is it that the environmental movement is not being blamed for global warming? They must be the largest single cause, due to their decades-long campaign against nuclear power. (Though perhaps they will soon be the second largest cause, after the desire of Indian and Chinese people not to remain destitute for ever.)

Perhaps it is because the sacred task of blaming people for global warming has been entrusted to the high priests of the environmental movement itself. So who will blame the blamers?

Mon, 07/09/2007 - 00:22 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

A Good Argument

This would be a good argument if it was not just plain wrong. The main reason why nuclear power plants have not been built is because they were non-competitive in cost with other more cost effective options. Coal-fired plants have been by far the cheapest option in most countries, the only problem being that they're high polluters and the costs of pollution and air quality degradation are not factored into the equation. Clean coal may be an option with new technologies.

Nuclear power however is a great energy option in addition to renewables such as wind and hydro power in many regions when the cost of oil rises above a certain price and cooling water supplies are readily available via large rivers and lakes. We're near that threshold price now and that is why nuclear power plant designers and builders are putting nuclear power plants back on the table.

by a reader on Tue, 07/10/2007 - 15:48 | reply

Re: A Good Argument

It is not easy to separate the issue of cost from that of environmentalist politics. The emotiveness of radioactivity and nuclear weapons allowed environmentalism to win the political debate at the time. For instance, the accident at Chernobyl in the Soviet Union was used as an argument against Western nuclear power technology, yet the thousands of coal miners killed in China were never used as an argument against Western coal mining. As a result, governments imposed costs and other obligations on nuclear power that were never imposed on other power sources. That was the means by which nuclear power became 'non-competitive'.

Bear in mind that nuclear power stations were being built at full speed in the 1960s, when oil was far cheaper than now.

by Editor on Wed, 07/11/2007 - 00:58 | reply

Plant Factors and Market Considerations

It is certainly correct that power choices are based on a number of complex decisions, some of which have are influenced by public opinion. One of the reasons why nuclear power stations of various designs were built in the 1960s into the 1970s was because of the exciting idea that nuclear power was the energy of the future and this caught the wave of an energy zeitgeist so to speak. That idea impetus in itself was not a bad thing, but required more actual examination and development.

Not all designs were equal although there was a fair amount of technological innovation in nuclear plant design and construction. Some of the early designs were flawed, most apparent in the Russian series designed reactor at Chernobyl where a sudden shutdown could actually cause, and did, a runaway reactor and quick steam buildup leading to a steam explosion exposing the reactor core and materials. Even where there were not major design flaws, downtime and plant inefficiency was often a problem, as well as the fact that there was little design standardization. Nuclear power and improved design has come a long way since then.

High initial capital cost and long lead time to build a nuclear plant is still a major factor in construction decisions. Some costs have been brought down by improvements in design efficiency and it is likely that capital cost will be brought down further by building of multiple plants with the same improved design, also considering that there are several design alternatives. In the United States a major factor in cost of fuel is that spent reactor fuel will not be refined and reused. This choice was a reasonable political decision at least at the time it was made, so as to prevent the proliferation of a fuel source with a potential use for nuclear weapons. (This consideration is resurfacing in the debate about Iran or other countries perhaps much more politically stable than Iran acquiring such fuel sources for peaceful use of nuclear power, but with an option for weapons grade fuel use.) Yet in other countries which already have a viable program of nuclear power, such as France, reuse and refining of spent fuel has not been so problematic, and their fuel costs are thus much more competitive against coal or gas, or oil.

The cost of oil (and natural gas) is increasingly a factor because of the related increase in demand for electric power as oil becomes more costly and less plentiful as an energy option. Until recently, and beginning in the 1970s an abundance of coal and gas fired plants were easily meeting the energy demands in several countries so that there was little incentive to build new nuclear plants. Their high initial capital cost and uncertainty about future energy demands meant that almost no new construction occurred. An additional factor, still true today, was that the most desirable sites which had ready access to abundant cooling water and other preferable geologic siting were utilized early on.

It is likely that nuclear power today and in the foreseeable future will have a well deserved resurgence as one potential choice for power generation among several complementary options, but will not in itself be a power generation panacea for any country or region.

by a reader on Wed, 07/11/2007 - 03:56 | reply

The Global Supplies of uranium-238

The global supplies of uranium-238 are such that even continuing with the number of plants we have we have only enough uranium-238 for around 42-72 years of Nuclear power. If 60% of world power was Nuclear we would have enough for about /10-18 years/. This means that it is just impractical to rely on Nuclear for our energy into the future on any large scale.

These estimates are produced with the following sources. European Commission's Green Paper on Energy 2-3 million tonnes. And a more generous estimate (source unknown) 4-5 tonnes. Some people claim that there is around 17 million tonnes available across the globe, this includes things such as sea water. But its safest to work with more conservative estimates.

by Ian Fisher on Wed, 09/12/2007 - 11:05 | reply

Re: The Global Supplies of uranium-238

Though it is not economic yet to extract uranium from seawater, it can certainly be done, and the estimate you quote, namely that there are 12-15 million tonnes of uranium there, is too low by orders of magnitude. The figure is in fact over 4 billion tonnes. (The concentration is about 3.3 milligrams per cubic meter and the volume of the oceans is about 1.3 billion cubic kilometers.)

However, it is unlikely that we shall ever have to rely on that. On land, elements are not evenly distributed but occur in ores. Ores can be discovered – but that takes effort and money. As a result, the known reserves of valuable ores tend towards a certain multiple of the current rate of use. The exact multiple depends on all sorts of economic and political factors but for obvious reasons it would not be surprising if it were a few decades. Furthermore, controlled nuclear fusion is likely to become economic within a few decades, which makes it unrealistic to imagine the world having to rely on uranium for the indefinite future.

Therefore, it is only "safest to work with more conservative estimates" if one wants a reliable way of raising resource-depletion fears regardless of the truth of the matter. If one wants to plan rationally for the future, it is useless. Assuming that today's 'known reserves' are the only resources that will ever be used has the same logic as estimating that one will starve when the current contents of one's larder have been eaten.

by Editor on Tue, 12/25/2007 - 21:12 | reply

Okay. So assume that you're c

Okay. So assume that you're correct on all of that, aside from the fact of Fusion. While I'll accept your statement about the larder, similarly you shouldn't assume scientific advancements. That, to me, is like saying "I won't do anything to help with any problems, because they'll be sorted out in the future"

Some sources say, that the mining of Uranium requires more power than it generates. (The source is probably somewhat unreliable, and I apologize on that basis)

The economic figures also tell us that off-shore wind power generates kWh at a similar price to Nuclear, while on-shore rivals coal

Missing

Sorry if the Picture should not have been posted, I am relatively new to the site and not completely familiarized with the rules

by Ian on Tue, 01/15/2008 - 23:06 | reply

Knowlege and Energy Abundance

"While I'll accept your statement about the larder, similarly you shouldn't assume scientific advancements. That, to me, is like saying "I won't do anything to help with any problems, because they'll be sorted out in the future"

I don't think the editors are saying that we should not try to solve problems. I think they may be disagreeing with you about the means to solve problems.

The best way to solve energy shortages is to generate new knowledge about how to safely produce energy. That is not saying "I won't do anything to help with any problems". Looking for resources creates new knowledge and so creates more resources.

The worst way to solve the problem of energy shortages is to claim that there are only finite resources. That limits us to a finite amount of production in the world economy that then diminishes over time as resources are "used up". Everyone is forced to "conserve"; but it is knowledge that is scarce, not resources. We need to look for knowledge, not the alleged finitude of resources.

If your graphs are correct, then individuals will generate power utilizing wind. If the growth of knowledge then makes nuclear power more affordable, producers will switch to generating power utilizing nuclear reactors.

The point is there is no need to tell people that there is a finite amount of wind or a finite amount of appropriate uranium. There is no need to stop nuclear power generation if it is too expensive, because of an alleged lack of uranium. If safe nuclear production is too expensive, those producing it will simply not be able to sell it (because their product will cost more!)

Perhaps you are saying that the rate of growth of knowledge about how to efficiently harvest safe energy from the wind is going to be faster than the rate of growth of knowledge about harvesting safe energy from nuclear power. But then you are not saying that we should not use nuclear energy because of a finite amount of uranium, which I think was your point.

Moreover, as long as governments insist on a reasonable degree of safety in producing energy, the market will determine which energy resource is currently cheapest, and I have no doubt that we will utilize that resource.

But we do need to stop frightening people about an alleged lack of energy resources.

by a reader on Thu, 01/17/2008 - 00:13 | reply

Well, arguably that is, by ex

Well, arguably that is, by extension what I am arguing. Even in my first post, I did not really mean to explicitly imply "We are going to run out of Uranium-238 and there will never be any more!" instead what I was saying, is that the ability to produce cheap Nuclear energy has almost reached it's maximum, especially due to the limited supply of /cheap/ uranium, aka, it may well never really get any cheaper, while I would conclude that Wind Energy is still only just beginning to bud.

Fast breeders could promise cheapening due to less fuel, but infact this would be completely incorrect, as most of the cost of nuclear energy is in the setup and decomissioning a fast breeder's energy would infact cost more, as the reactors are more expensive.

Another intriguing fact is that, in the UK anyway, it might well take 15-20 years to set up the next generation of nuclear facilities.

by Ian on Thu, 01/17/2008 - 01:29 | reply

The Backlight is On, But Nobody's Home

Can Google really save the world by changing the background colour of their home page?

Nick at CharcoalDesign peers through the screen of environmentalist silliness.

Mon, 07/30/2007 - 14:11 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Well

Well, this isn't really about the environment, it's also about energy efficiency. I'm all for using energy in the most efficient way possible. It saves money and the extra energy that is saved can go to further productive use.

by Paul Eres on Tue, 07/31/2007 - 19:37 | reply

Fine print

Where he says "environmentalists" he really means "Luddites", back to the pre-industrial age in his terms.

He makes the point that it is a ridiculous scheme, color choice to save energy. In addition he does save a vast amount of pixel power himself by writing his blog in nearly microscopic print. So maybe he is a pixel "environmentalist"?

by a reader on Thu, 08/02/2007 - 23:57 | reply

Environmentalism

For some reason all my attempts at comments to this list are getting blocked as spam, but I'll try again anyway.

I take no issue with trying to save energy for its own sake because this is a quantifiable goal. Energy has a dollar value and as such can be weighed against other factors. For example you might argue that saving $0.03 per year is worth sacrificing the readability of your search engine, and then that is an argument that can be refuted (rather easily, I suspect).

On the other hand, in the context of environmentalism, saving energy becomes "saving the world". Since saving the world is of unquantifiable value, it becomes impossible to frame arguments of the form "is it worth doing" and so it achieves a religious status.

I therefore oppose energy-saving suggestions from environmentalists on general principle. If the same measure were proposed purely for energy saving reasons then I oppose it because a) it doesn't work and b) it wouldn't be worth the trouble even if it did. However were a more effective measure to be presented then I might not object to it.

by Nick on Mon, 08/06/2007 - 11:35 | reply

Google's response

Google has posted some commentary on the subject.

by a reader on Thu, 08/09/2007 - 23:24 | reply

Ignorance

On the occasion of the outcry over the iPhone's $200 price cut, a critic of Daring Fireball claimed

No, there's more to this issue than people not understanding capitalism.

Indeed. It wasn't just 'not understanding capitalism', it was not having even the remotest clue what the proponents of capitalism consider to be their core position and their core arguments. This is not unusual. Many people in our society lack any such clue.

[T]his price drop shows that Apple was making more of a killing than anyone could have possibly imagined, more than anyone could have possibly thought was fair.

I mean, you could probably figure out the raw cost of a pork belly, but an iPhone is a little harder to pin down.

In a sense, this sweeping ignorance is a terrifying state of affairs. In another, a very hopeful one.

Fri, 09/07/2007 - 13:56 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

hopeful one

Why a "very hopeful one"?

by a reader on Fri, 09/07/2007 - 21:15 | reply

Re: hopeful one

Because it suggests that all we have to do is inform them.

by Editor on Fri, 09/07/2007 - 22:00 | reply

Hope

Another hopeful sign is that the hackers who visit news.ycombinator.com tend to get it.

<http://news.ycombinator.com/item?id=51232>

Someone wrote:

I think most early buyers would prefer a $200 cash rebate rather than a $100 gift certificate to the Apple store. Especially since almost everything in there is above the $100 level. I think the gesture's nice, but it's definitely not completely fair.

And I replied:

What's fair about buying something at a price that you think is worth it, then going back a month later and complaining you aren't happy anymore?

I got massively upmoded.

This also got upmoded:

And they'd prefer a $20,000 cash rebate and a Macbook Pro even more. Especially since Macbook Pros are nice. What of it? They thought $599 for an iPhone was fair. They're getting at least $100 more than they expected.

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Fri, 09/07/2007 - 23:07 | reply

Worth and Value are different than Price

Value is in the mind of the beholder. Price is a fickle thing.

Ironic beauty?

The first I-Phones were worth all of the $599 subjective value to anyone who bought one. These buyers were each first on their block to own a flashy new gadget. They paid the appropriate price for what they coveted or they would not have bought it.

The subjective value of the I-Phone today is $399 or less. Price can change according to markets or the calculated whims of the market. The consumer surprise was in how quickly the price tag changed. Yet, worth is still in personal usefulness of a product. So where's the beef?

To be first on your block, the subject of buyer envy, is temporarily worth more than the initial price of the product to those who shell out the cash. In the psychology of capitalistic purchase, you believe that exclusivity and price is a status symbol. Oops, the phone is no longer quite so exclusive.

Not much different than buying a pig in a rhinestone studded poke. If you need the pork, if you can eat the pork, you're happy. If you think rhinestones on the package are diamonds you're bound to be dissatisfied.

Worth, like beauty, is in the deep utility of the thing according to its merit. False worth, like fake beauty, can be obscured by price. Let the buyer beware of his own mindset.

Worth and Value? Capitalism is a whole 'nother thing altogether, only marginally related. Sometimes the sudden recognition of that truth by a public outing, in this case by no less than the "god" of Apple - Steve Jobs, brings wails and collective gnashing of teeth.

Regardless of Price, the I-Phone is still a beautiful gadget. I want one.

by a reader on Sat, 09/08/2007 - 15:08 | reply

Why is it Hopeful?

by a reader on Sun, 09/09/2007 - 16:48 | reply

Re: Why is it Hopeful?

Because it suggests that all we have to do is inform them.

-- Elliot Temple

curi@curi.us

Dialogs

by Elliot Temple on Mon, 09/10/2007 - 01:09 | reply

Hopeless

And, do the forum conversations support the idea that irate buyers, once informed, are changing their minds?

I think we need to do more than inform them.

Most of these people won't change their minds by just being exposed to better theories. They need to believe that there's a real chance that their cherished myths might be wrong. Until then, many of them won't take the criticism seriously.

I don't think this will happen until economic understanding is much more generally widespread. Believing that prices are whims should become as unfashionable as believing that the earth is flat.

Gil

by Gil on Mon, 09/10/2007 - 14:22 | reply

Earth is Flat?

What is a "fair price"?

Curious as to how we cultivate economic understanding in a flat-minded world.

by a reader on Mon, 09/10/2007 - 16:03 | reply

Fair and Spherical

Well, some people define "fair" rather strangely (in my opinion). Often, it seems to be something like "Something I'll continue to feel good about no matter what changes in the world, including my mind."

I don't see how an offering price can be "unfair" (absent fraud). If a buyer doesn't like it, he doesn't have to accept it.

But, more technically, I think most people should accept that "fair price" is one that approaches a market clearing price, in a relatively efficient market, driven by supply and demand.

As for how to spread economic literacy, I'm not sure. I'm confident that it will happen in the long run, but I don't know how to speed it up dramatically. Anti-market communities, like religious communities, seem to have developed a strong immunity to conventionally persuasive arguments.

See the comments to this mildly economically literate post in on a fairly "progressive" blog: Vacation Mandates, again

Maybe it would help if some pop-culture icons made it cool to understand markets.

Until then, I guess we have to patiently continue to make the same arguments, and hope that the best arguments gather enough momentum break through most of the resistance.

Gil

by Gil on Mon, 09/10/2007 - 17:02 | reply

Link Correction

Oops. I meant to use this link for: supply and demand above

Gil

by Gil on Mon, 09/10/2007 - 17:05 | reply

Price Cut

I can't disagree that people are silly to complain about buying something they wanted at a price they were willing to pay. That's the way it works.

The interesting question is why Apple cut the price. I don't think it was part of their initial plan. If they had foreseen the response and bad PR, I'm sure they would have tried to handle it differently.

And, if Apple was "making more of a killing than anyone could have possibly imagined," they would have just kept on making it. That's also the way it works.

It almost certainly wasn't selling like they'd hoped. Maybe they wanted to clear the market for the holiday season and their line of new products. Maybe there's something in their agreement with

AT&T that requires certain sales figures to be met (each one is a new subscriber for AT&T), and the failure to meet the targets results in direct or indirect financial penalties of some sort. Who knows?

Anyway, no one who bought a phone has any reason to complain (about the price) and no one should think that such a drastic price cut so soon after the launch is the result of a successful plan.

by Michael Bacon on Tue, 09/11/2007 - 21:13 | reply

Sheesh!

I think the state of affairs is terrifying again.

This is unbelievable.

Gil

by Gil on Wed, 10/03/2007 - 04:44 | reply

More on Worth and Value are Different than Price

I was reminded of this topic recently when reading the story of the little known Varian Fry who ran a small agency which rescued over one thousand individuals from the Nazis at the beginning of WW II. With only $3000 strapped to his leg, a list of names, and a noble cause he and his small staff made a permanent difference in the lives of so many.

In contrast, I read how the U.S. government wasted 20 billion U.S. with a noble cause and total stupidity. See http://www.amconmag.com/2005/2005_10_24/cover.html, Money for Nothing.

It's true, worth and value are different than price. The crucial factor seems to be good common sense versus blind knee-jerk ideology. Let the buyer beware.

by a reader on Wed, 01/02/2008 - 05:16 | reply

Not Fair

Gil,

"...'fair price' is one that approaches a market clearing price, in a relatively efficient market, driven by supply and demand."

You are now arguing that the iPhone initial price was NOT FAIR. The price would not have dropped so precipitously if it had been "fair", using your definition. (In a very efficient market, when the price was high more firms would have been selling it, lowering the price to just above the average total cost of producing it). Apple would not have had to change the price at all, it would have fallen by itself.

When demand fell, in a very efficient market, many firms would have left the market leaving the price approximately the same (at just above the average total cost of production). All firms buying the iPhone from Apple would have continued to pay approximately the same amount (close to the minimum average total cost).

The fact that the price fell precipitously shows that the market was in fact not that efficient. In a truly efficient market, it should be the number of firms in the market that changes, not the price of the good. The price of the good (in a truly efficient market) should stay at just above average total cost when demand for the good changes.

Gil, I'm not sure your concept of "fair" is fair to the brilliance of the marketplace.

by a reader on Mon, 01/07/2008 - 18:59 | reply

Don't mean to hijack the thread

Don't mean to hijack the thread or anything, but is everything all right at The World? Been a while between posts.

by a reader on Wed, 01/09/2008 - 02:45 | reply

Re: Don't mean to hijack the thread

Thanks for the concern. We're all rather busy, is all.

Normal service will be resumed as soon as possible.

by Editor on Wed, 01/09/2008 - 18:26 | reply

Discovering new secrets of the universe no doubt

I was concerned as well. Glad all is sticking ticking along.

by Solomon on Tue, 01/22/2008 - 01:46 | reply

errr...

...that's "still ticking along."

by Solomon on Tue, 01/22/2008 - 01:50 | reply

Are you so sure YOU understand it?

Your argument is basically that

a) because of Apple's legal right (you seem to assume that ethical right is implicit in the legal right) to shape price(s) as the company sees fit:

b) the consumer is obliged to shut the hell up and bear it.

Sorry, this is not the case. Market is a democracy and the consumer is not obliged to do anything. True enough, in our Lawyer Age when purchasing the device means agreeing to EULA stating pretty much that the purchaser has absolutely no rights to anything and that the purchased device does not even belong to him whilst the manufacturer has no obligations whatsoever Apple could do pretty much anything. Yeah, they can milk the early adopters for all their money and then show them the middle finger. But such behaviour has consequences. Because the consumers will not bear it, suck it up and so on. They are not paid for it, quite the opposite - it's them who have the money Apple wants. And they can turn away from a brand that treats its consumers this way. So no, the consumer has no obligation to shut the frig up. He does not have any obligation whatsoever - he can complain, whinge and whine. And vote with his wallet.

by Piotr Smolanski on Wed, 04/02/2008 - 15:01 | reply

Copyright © 2008 Setting The World To Rights

Setting The World To Rights

Ideas have consequences.

home | archives | polls | search

Setting The World To Rights Is On A Break

Thanks to everyone who has enquired. Yes, we are all fine. We're just busy for a while with other interests. We shall be returning as soon as possible.

Tue, 02/12/2008 - 09:57 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Copyright © 2008 Setting The World To Rights

Did the French Revolution influence the American Revolution?

view

results

- Yes
 No

Vote

Tue, 07/22/2008 - 19:08 | digg | del.icio.us | permalink

Paging Doc Brown

Wake up McFly!

The French Revolution took place AFTER the American Revolution. Asking whether it influenced the American Revolution is like asking whether Duran Duran influenced the Beatles. A proper question might be: Did the French Revolution influence the early American Republic? (The answer is a very big yes by the way.)

I must assume that you're trying to illustrate how many people are ignorant of basic history by asking a trick question.

This reminds me of an experiment in which a small group of university students went around asking women to sign a petition to do away with women's suffrage. The received many signatures before someone finally balked at being asked to sign a petition to deny women the right to vote. Worst of all, those who signed the petition most likely have fully functioning reproductive organs.

by Lee on Mon, 07/28/2008 - 21:28 | reply

Re: Paging Doc Brown

Lee - you may well be interested in our previous poll too, and especially in its results.

by Editor on Tue, 07/29/2008 - 15:31 | reply

